Silvanus may have had in determining the form of 1 Peter, there is all the difference in the world between discourses which Peter delivered in the early days of the Church to the populace and the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem, in the house of Cornelius at Cæsarea, or later in Jerusalem before the Apostolic Council, and a letter which he directed Silvanus to write from Rome to the Gentile Christian Churches in Asia Minor at a much later time, and in altogether different circumstances (n. 2). All that can be claimed is that the impression of Peter's religious attitude and ecclesiastical position, which we get from Acts and the Epistles of Paul, agrees perfectly with the manner in which he conceives his new task in 1 Peter. Here we find the same unhesitating recognition of the divinely blessed labours of the missionaries among the Gentiles, and of the equal Christian standing of Gentile Christians and Jewish members of the mother Church (Gal. ii. 7-10; Acts x. 47, xi. 17, xv. 7-11; cf. 1 Pet. i. 4-12, ii. 3-10, v. 12); the same concentration of the gospel message upon the death on the Cross, the Resurrection, and the Second Coming of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 3-5, 11; Acts ii. 23-36, iii. 13-26, iv. 10, v. 30 f., x. 39-42; cf. 1 Pet. i. 3-7, 18-21, ii. 21-25, iii. 18, 21 f., iv. 1, 5, 13, v. 1, 4, 10). Finally, we observe also the consciousness of preaching as an eye-witness about the closing scenes of Jesus' life to others, who through this testimony are enabled to believe without having seen (Acts ii. 32, iii. 15, iv. 20, v. 32, x. 39-42; cf. 1 Pet. v. 1, i. 3, 8). But the modest reserve with which this consciousness is expressed in the letter (above, pp. 146, 155) is strong evidence against the suspicion that some later writer is here artificially and presumptuously assuming the rôle of Peter. Nor would such a writer, after having assumed this rôle, have again obscured the Petrine authorship, in which he wanted his readers to believe, by remarking that the letter was actually written by Silvanus, a secretary (v. 12). What could have been the motive of such a forgery? An "apology of Paulinism, written by a member of the Pauline party" at the time of the "persecution of the Church by Trajan, and intended for members of the Petrine party" (Schwegler, Baur, and others), would have been altogether superfluous in an age when generally throughout the Church Peter and Paul were looked upon as brothers closely united in their work (Clement, 1 Cor. v. 47; Ign. Rom. iv.). Possibly such an apology may have been needed by Jewish Christians in Palestine, but certainly not by the Churches in Asia Minor founded by Paul and his helpers. Consequently, if the writer had this or some similar purpose in view, he chose a very peculiar address for his letter. Just as strange are the means which he chooses to accomplish his end. Paul is not once mentioned by name, nor referred to in a way that would be intelligible, although i. 12, 25, v. 12 offered the amplest opportunity for such reference. Not a word is said about the opposition of Paul to the Judaisers in Galatia, who claimed to be followers of James and Peter, or to the Cephas party in Corinth; and yet the readers, whose knowledge of Peter's teaching, based as it was only upon verbal reports, must have been very indefinite, are to infer from certain resemblances to the Pauline Epistles that Peter has adopted the disputed teachings of Paul in order thereby to justify them!

The undeniable use of Pauline ideas in 1 Peter, when considered without prejudice, leads to an entirely different conclusion. It is in line with the relation of 1 Peter to James, already discussed (n. 3). The necessity of saying some word of encouragement to the Christians in Asia Minor, whose persecutions had recently grown very severe, recalled to the mind of Peter, or Silvanus, or of both, the letter of James, which some fifteen years before had been such a help to them as well as to other Christians, and which, as proved by Paul's letter to the Romans (vol. i. 127 f., 429), continued to be widely known. The result was that a number of ideas and expressions found in James were reproduced in 1 Peter. A writer thoroughly original could not have permitted himself to follow so closely an older model. But from all that we know of Peter there is not the slightest reason to assume that he was original, in the sense that James or Paul or John was original. On the contrary, his nature was such as to make him susceptible to influences from without; while the fact that he recovered so quickly from the errors into which this tendency led him, proves that in doing that which was good and wholesome he did not have to contend with a strongly biassed character. Similarly, a writer who was concerned to maintain a show or reputation of originality would have avoided these quotations from another writer, or would have concealed them more. Peter, who in v. 12 shows himself so little concerned in this regard as to permit the readers to give Silvanus all the credit for this beautiful letter, was not bound by such considerations. The only thing which he was able to claim for himself and put to his own credit was the intention of applying for the benefit of the readers what Silvanus wrote in his name, and what James and others before him had written. This inclination on his part is in no sense external, interfering with the natural flow of his own thoughts. The reader who is not familiar with the originals does not observe the influence which they have had upon the form of 1 Peter. The temper and tone of the whole is independent and fundamentally different from James. That there is no question here of slavish imitation of single passages, or of dishonest plagiarism, is proved by the fact that earnest efforts have been made to reverse the relation and make James dependent upon 1 Peter.

Exactly similar is the case of the undeniable agreement between 1 Peter and some of the Pauline letters. The only letters of Paul to which 1 Peter shows resemblance in thought and language are Romans and Ephesians

(n. 4). But this fact finds no satisfactory explanation, if we assume that some author of a later time simply happened to make Peter use Paul's language. On the other hand, it is the most natural thing in the world, if this letter was actually written by Peter in Rome, in the year 64, with the assistance of Silvanus. When Peter went to Rome to fill up the gap made by the departure of Paul (above, p. 162), he must have had a very natural inclination to read the letter of Paul's preserved in Rome in which the apostle had made his first effort to establish relations between himself and the Roman Church; and when he found himself called upon to address the Churches in Asia Minor, with which up to this time he had remained personally unacquainted, in a letter which was to bear testimony to the genuineness of the gospel brought to them by Paul and his helpers, and to the truth of their Christian profession, he was under necessity of making the instruction which they had previously received his starting-point, and of adopting the tone of Christian address to which they were accustomed. But where could he find a better model than in the letter which Paul had written two or three years before to the same group of Churches, or to a large number of the Churches of the same group, namely, those in the province of Asia? The existence of a copy of Ephesians in the year 64 at Rome, where Paul wrote the letter, need occasion no surprise, since Ephesians was a circular letter of which possibly a number of copies were prepared immediately after it was written, and so were preserved in Rome (cf., moreover, vol. i. 249 f., n. 6).

The dependence of 1 Peter upon Romans and Ephesians is proof of its genuineness; since a pseudo-Peter, writing in the year 75 or in 110, would have had no occasion to imitate these particular letters of Paul. A pseudo-Peter of the time of Trajan would not probably have recognised the true character of Ephesians as a circular letter to the Churches in Asia (vol. i. p. 479 ff.), and he would have been far more likely to use Galatians than Romans, since his alleged compilation is designed to pose as a letter of Peter among the Churches of Galatia as well as those of other regions.

If, on the other hand, it could be shown that the use of the name Babylon to designate Rome is explicable only if the writer is dependent upon Rev. xiv. 8, xvi. 19–xviii. 24, it would be a serious argument against the genuineness of the letter. But is it not possible that the relation is just the reverse? and, besides, what reason is there for supposing that such ideas arose and were spread simply through literary agencies? Just as the Jews called Rome and the Roman Empire Edom, and just as among Christians Jerusalem and Zion were typical designations of their commonwealth, which centres in heaven and has its future upon earth (Gal. iv. 25 f.; Heb. xii. 22, xiii. 14; Rev. xxi. 2), so Babylon, which among Greeks and Romans was the proverbial type of a great luxurious city, under the influence of historical tradition and O.T. prophecy, came to be used by Jews and Christians as the figurative name for the capital of the world-empire which was hostile to the Church of God, though no one was able to say who had used it first (n. 5). The name did not originate either with Peter or John, both of whom assumed rather that their contemporaries and fellow-believers were familiar with the Babylon of the present.

Moreover, there is nothing about the representation of the situation of Christianity in the world at this time which renders impossible the composition of the letter in the last years of Peter's life. Very frequently has it been supposed that the letter represented conditions in the time of Trajan; but this assumption is due to a misunderstanding of the interchange of letters between Pliny and Trajan, as if no attempt had been made by the Roman government before the year 112 to suppress Christianity

(n. 6). It is due equally to a misunderstanding of the statements in 1 Peter relative to persecution. It is true that in 1 Peter we have a representation of the relation of Christians to their heathen environment different from that of the earlier Epistles of Paul, with the exception of 1 Thessalonians, which presupposes a temporary and local persecution of Christians in Thessalonica. While in Paul's Epistles we do have suggestions of hostility to Christians on the part of Jews (Jas. ii. 6 f.; 1 Thess. ii. 14; vol. i. 88 f.) and of Gentiles (Rom. xii. 14-21), there is also evidence that there were Churches of considerable importance which lived quite unmolested (1 Cor. iv. 8-10, viii. 10, x. 27, xv. 33; 2 Cor. vi. 14-16), and believed themselves able to get fair treatment even in heathen courts (1 Cor. vi. 1-8). Consequently, when we read that practically the same sufferings to which Christians were then being exposed in Asia Minor had to be endured by Christians throughout the world (1 Pet. v. 9), an entirely new situation is presented. Indeed, the readers themselves had not been accustomed to suffer in the way that they are now compelled to suffer (iv. 12). It is not a general experience of Christians—an experience they have always had—which is described in v. 8, but a present fact; even now the devil is passing through the land like a lion roaring for his prey. The final consummation of things is at hand (iv. 7); the judgment begins (iv. 17). From beginning to end the letter is filled with references to a recent unfavourable change in the situation of Christians, especially those in Asia (i. 6 f., iii. 9-17, iv. 4 f., 12-19, v. 8-12). This impression is simply strengthened by the fact that in the later letters of Paul—in those that were written shortly before 1 Peter (64 A.D.) as well as in those that were written shortly after—there are various indications that the relations between Christians and their heathen neighbours were more strained than at the time when Romans and the Corinthian letters were written;

cf. Col. iv. 5; Eph. iv. 27 f., v. 15 f., vi. 12; 1 Tim iii. 6 f. (in the last passage the best interpreters make ὁ διάβολος refer to the class of slanderers), vi. 1; Tit. ii. 5, 10.

When we inquire what these sufferings on the part of Christians, which Peter felt it necessary to notice, actually were, we observe at the very outset that nowhere in the letter is there the slightest hint of bloody martyrdoms, nor even of imprisonment and the confiscation of property. Nor is anything said about judges before whom they were brought, acts of worship which they were commanded to perform, and recantations under the pressure of persecution. But we do find such hints in N.T. writings of a later date and in the oldest portions of the post-apostolic literature (n. 7). For this reason it is impossible to believe that 1 Peter was written at the time of the Johannine apocalypse and of the letter of Clement (90-100). Still less is it possible to believe that it was written about 110, at the time of the Ignatian letters and of Pliny's Epistles. The attacks upon the Christians at the time of 1 Peter were various in character (i. 6); but they were due mainly to and consisted primarily of slanderous and calumnious attacks upon them as Christians. They were insulted "for the name of Christ" (iv. 14). And, as is shown by what immediately follows (iv. 15), it was this in which their sufferings consisted primarily if not exclusively; whenever a specific injury is mentioned which they suffered at the hands of the heathen, it is always of this character:—καταλαλεῖν (ii. 12, iii. 16), λοιδορεῖν (iii. 9), and ἐπηρεάζειν τὴν ἀγαθὴν ἐν Χριστῷ ἀναστροφὴν (iii. 16); βλασφημεῖν (iv. 4), and ὀνειδίζειν (iv. 14). They are to silence their slanderers by their good conduct (ii. 15); they are to put them to shame (iii. 16); above all, they are not to answer reviling with reviling, but with blessing (iii. 9). The very first condition of a comfortable life is to refrain from evil and deceitful words (iii. 10).

Even in the passage where the suffering Christ is held up as an example especially to slaves, it is not said that He refused to use His power to defend Himself against violence (Matt. xxvi. 51-55, xxvii. 40-44; John xviii. 36; Heb. xii. 2 f.); but that when He was reviled He reviled not again, and did not give vent to threatening words when He was compelled to suffer (ii. 23). It is true that in this same connection, besides the reviling, suffering is mentioned which involved actual violence; but in the foreground of the pictures stands the reviling, to which one less patient would have replied with reviling and threats. As a concrete example of the unjust treatment which slaves, to whom these words are addressed, frequently had to endure at the hands of their heathen masters, cuffing, not reviling, is mentioned (ii. 20). Of course it goes without saying that a hostile feeling toward the sect of Christians that had become general would not be limited to insulting words. Every Christian had daily to expect actual injury (iii. 14, εἰ καὶ πάσχοιτε; iii. 17, εἰ θέλοι τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ); but, according to Peter's opinion and exhortation, the Christian ought not to fear it (iii. 13). The form and extent of this persecution we are able to infer only from casual hints. The designation κακοποιοί, which was slanderously applied to Christians, is quite general (ii. 12, iii. 17, iv. 15, n. 8); and equally general is the exhortation to a virtuous walk among the heathen and to good works which is contrasted with it. But this is followed immediately by a special exhortation to silence the ignorance of these unreasonable slanderers by obedience to the emperor and his officers (ii. 13 f.; cf. Acts xvi. 21, xvii. 7), and by the exhortation to show to all—naturally to all to whom it is due (Rom. xiii. 7)—the honour which their position demands, without prejudice to their special love for their fellow-believers, and especially to honour the emperor, without prejudice to their fear of God (ii. 17), all of which indicates that the Christians were accused of a hostility to the State which had its source in their religion and in their close fellowship with one another. The fact that the discussion of the relation of Christians to the State is followed by a detailed discussion of the relation of slaves to their masters (ii. 18-25), and of wives to their husbands (iii. 1-6), while the conduct of husbands to their wives is touched upon only briefly (iii. 7), and the character of the exhortations to slaves and wives (cf. especially iii. 1 f. with ii. 12), show that Christian slaves and wives were accused of insubordination to their heathen masters and husbands. Christians were looked upon as the enemies of social order generally. The inner freedom from all earthly conditions of which they boasted was regarded as a revolutionary spirit. Every fault observed in the conduct of individual Christians was laid to the charge of their peculiar views, so that their fine words about freedom and the service of God were regarded as cloaks for their hostility to social order and the State (ii. 16). The inevitable result was the defaming of the name of Christ Himself, whom they confessed and after whom they were called (iv. 14, 16; n. 10). The same was true with reference to the impression made by the earnest lives of the Christians, especially by their abstinence from heathen worship and the festivities associated with it. Wonder at the peculiarities of the Christians led to the blaspheming of the things that they regarded as holy, and the source of their own sanctification (iv. 3-5). All the acts of the Christians, even when they were not known, were construed in accordance with their supposed views. They were looked upon as κακοποιοί in the broadest sense of the word. They were accused of everything bad. In cases of serious crimes, like murder and theft, Christians would necessarily be the first to be suspected (iv. 15). The natural consequence was that they were accused of crimes, arrested, and brought before magistrates; and in the course of such trials the fact that they belonged to the sect of Christians would be brought out, also the leading principles of their religion. Exhortations, like those which we read in Eph. iv. 28, Tit. ii. 10, 1 Thess. iv. 6, compel us to assume that not all the members of the newly organised Gentile Christian Churches abstained from acts which were punishable before magistrates. Persons so accused and so punished suffered as thieves, deceivers, and similar characters. Peter urges and expects that as the regular outcome of such trials the readers shall prove that there is no ground for suspecting them of acts which are criminal or subject to punishment; so that it shall appear that the only reason for suspicion against them, for their arrest, and for their unfair treatment by magistrates, is their Christian confession. In this case they suffered "as Christians," and were partakers of the sufferings of Christ, the innocent Lord, who was reviled, accused, and executed (iv. 13; cf. ii. 21, iii. 18), in the same sense that Paul was during his five years of imprisonment (Col. i. 24, iv. 3; Eph. iii. 1, 13, iv. 1, vi. 20; Philem. 1, 9; Phil. i. 7, 30, iii. 10), although as a result of Paul's trial "his bonds in Christ were made manifest" (Phil. i. 13); i.e. the trial brought out the fact that he was innocent of the offences against public order of which he was accused, and that he was indicted, imprisoned, and brought before the tribunal simply because he confessed and preached the Christian faith. It is really impossible to see how anyone can discover in 1 Peter a persecution of the Christian confession carried on by the imperial government or by any civil authority. The persecution of the Christians originated not with the authorities, but with the populace; and it consisted mainly of slanders and insults against the Christians, and blasphemous remarks about Christianity. In daily intercourse Christians were made to feel very strongly the hostility of their heathen neighbours; in particular, Christian slaves suffered at the hands of their masters. When investigations were made by the police or by the courts because of serious crimes, the general suspicion of the criminal character of Christians, particularly of their hostile attitude toward the existing political and social order, put them in a bad position at the very outset. They were suspected first in connection with definite cases, and in the accusations which followed they were charged with general crimes and misdemeanours. If, in these trials, their religious confession and their brotherhood came up for discussion, it was nothing essentially different from what happened in their daily private intercourse with non-Christians. There was constant need for endeavour to remove this suspicion by setting forth the nature of Christian views. Christians must "be always ready with an answer for every one and before every one who demanded of them a reason for their peculiar hope" (iii. 15). There is nothing in the language which implies inquiry by the police or officers of courts, but primarily only what happened in daily intercourse (cf. Col. iv. 6). But of course Peter's exhortation and the rule which he lays down include also the cases where a Christian happened to be brought before a judge, and where, as was unavoidable in view of popular feeling, the religion and morality of the Christians came under discussion. But, in Peter's opinion, here, as in daily life, the proof of pure intentions and of moral conduct afforded by deeds was more weighty and more effective than an apology in words.

In view of the contents of 1 Peter, it is impossible to believe that Christians were brought to trial and sentenced by magistrates to pay fines, or to undergo imprisonment, banishment, or execution, simply on account of their confession (ii. 9). And in this the situation of the Christians at the time of 1 Peter is essentially different from that in which they found themselves after Nero's attack upon the Roman Christians—presumably for the first time during the reign of Domitian, when the attitude of the imperial government and of the provincial authorities was altogether changed. On the other hand, the representation of popular feeling toward the Christians as recently having grown more hostile, which we find in 1 Peter—written at the beginning of the year 64 or shortly before—is definitely confirmed by the words of Tacitus, written late in the summer or during the autumn of the same year (Ann. xv. 44): “Ergo abolendo rumori Nero subdidit reos et quæsitissimis pœnis affecit, quos per flagitia invisos vulgus Christianos (or Chrestianos) appellabat.” The universal hatred which was heaped upon the Christians, and the opinion held by the vast majority of the populace that the Christians were a band of dangerous criminals, whose extermination would be for the good of the State and of society, a utilitas publica, were not, according to Tacitus, the result, but the presupposition of Nero’s action against the Christians, on the charge that they were responsible for the burning of Rome in the autumn of 64. Even then the name Christiani was the object of popular hatred and of every evil suspicion (n. 10). This presupposition meets us as a simple fact also in 1 Peter. On the other hand, nothing is said in 1 Peter about the consequences of this popular feeling, such as were realised in Rome in the autumn of 64, not only in the execution of Christians, but their execution in large numbers and in a most gruesome manner. How is this omission to be explained, if the letter was written in 95 or 110 or even later? How inconceivable is the colourless description of the situation of Christians throughout the world in 1 Pet. v. 9, if this letter was written by Peter himself shortly after he had passed through the scenes of 64 in Rome upon the ground which had drunk the blood of saints and apostles (Rev. xvii. 6, xviii. 20, 24), or if it was written by some one in his name after his death! ¹

1. (P. 173.) For the chronology and historical position of Polycarp, cf. Forsch. vi. 1–157. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 39. 16) says of Papias: κέχρηται δ’ αὐτὸς

¹ See Addendum, p. 617.

μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς Πέτρου ὁμοίως. If not strictly proven, it has been shown highly probable (above, p. 163 ; cf. also § 51, n. 10) that Papias interpreted 1 Pet. v. 13 as referring to Rome, and used this passage in support of the tradition that Mark was written in Rome. In Eus. H. E. iv. 15. 9, it is said of the Philippian letter of Polycarp: κέχρηταί τισι μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ τῆς Πέτρου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς. While 1 Pet. is not formally quoted in this letter, a number of passages in it show unmistakable resemblance to the same. Cf. the writer's Ignatii et Polyc. epist. 1876, pp. 110–132 ; GK, i. 957 f. In Polycarp, i. 2, after a peculiar expression taken from the speech of Peter in Acts ii. 24, the following words are found, which suggest 1 Pet. i. 8, 12: εἰς ὃν οὐκ ἰδόντες πιστεύετε χαρᾷ ἀνεκλαλήτῳ καὶ δεδοξασμένῳ εἰς ἣν πολλοὶ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν εἰσελθεῖν, which makes it necessary to assume either a most singular coincidence, or that Polycarp knew that Acts ii. and 1 Pet. originated with the same man, namely, Peter. For the further testimony to 1 Pet. by Clemens Romanus, Hermas, Justin, Basilides, and the Valentinians, see GK, i. 576, 759, 773, 958. In this connection it may be observed that it is doubtful whether the citation from Justin, following that of Iren. v. 26. 2 in Cramer, Cat. viii. 82, really belongs to Justin or is an addition by the redactor of the catena, as is held by Otto, in his edition of Justin, Opp. ii. [3rd ed.] 254, n. 7. For the impossibility of making 2 Pet. iii. 1 refer to 1 Pet. see § 41.

2. (P. 174.) Worthy of notice, however, is the correspondence between 1 Pet. ii. 7 and Acts iv. 11 (cf. Matt. xxi. 42 ; Mark xii. 10), and between 1 Pet. iv. 5 and Acts x. 42 (cf. 2 Tim. iv. 1).

3. (P. 175.) For the relation of 1 Pet. to James, see vol. i. 133 f. The thought of Jas. i. 3 (vol. i. 127), which is correctly understood and freely reproduced by Paul (Rom. v. 4 f.), necessarily takes another and more modest place in 1 Pet. i. 7 ; since Peter, while he retains the word, gives it quite a different meaning (vol. i. 133).

4. (P. 177.) In favour of the conscious dependence of 1 Pet. upon Eph. is the fact that they begin with exactly the same words, εὐλογητός—Χριστοῦ ὁ, followed by a participle,—a construction which does not occur in this or similar form in any other N.T. Epistle. The participial clause which follows is different, as is also the reason assigned for the thanksgiving. But the reference to the future κληρονομία, 1 Pet. i. 4, is found also in Eph., only farther from the beginning, i. 14 ; while the thought which immediately follows Eph. i. 4 f. (cf. i. 9, 11), namely, that of election through the divine foresight and predetermination, has been utilised already in 1 Pet. i. 1 f. The exhortations to a Christian life, in contrast to the former heathen life of the readers, 1 Pet. i. 14–18, iv. 2 f., correspond to a whole series of expressions in Eph. : ὡς τέκνα ὑπακοῆς=ὡς τέκνα φωτός, Eph. v. 8 ; ἐν τῇ ἀγνωσίᾳ ὑμῶν διὰ τὴν ἀγνοίαν τὴν οὖσαν ἐν αὐτοῖς, Eph. iv. 18 ; ἐκ τῆς ματαίας ὑμῶν ἀναστροφῆς=ἐν ματαιότητι τοῦ νοῦς αὐτῶν, Eph. iv. 17 ; μηκέτι ἀνθρώπων ἐπιθυμίας . . . βιώσαι=μηκέτι ὑμᾶς περιπατεῖν κτλ., Eph. iv. 17 ; αἰσφλυγίαις . . . εἰς τὴν αὐτὴν τῆς ἀσωτίας ἀνάχυσιν=μὴ μεθύσκεσθε οἶνω, ἐν ᾧ ἐστὶν ἀσωτία, Eph. v. 18. Eph. ii. 11–22 differs greatly from 1 Pet. ii. 4–10 in the way in which the Gentiles are reminded of the fact that now, as Christians, they are entitled to all the rights and honours of the people of God. This renders all the more striking the fact that in both passages the figure used is that of a building in which Christ is the corner-stone and Christians are the building stones. Paul develops the figure briefly at the end of the entire discussion; Peter makes a varied and detailed use of the same, in connection with various O.T. expressions, and also sayings of Jesus. The building suggests the Lord of the building, who has chosen this particular stone for a corner-stone, and Himself has put it in place, after it had been rejected as worthless by the foolish master-builders. From the thought of the living character of the person of Christ, who is represented as the corner-stone, is argued the living character of the stones built upon this foundation, as well as the freedom of their attachment to Him. The comparison of the building with the temple suggests the thought of the priesthood and the offerings. The corner-stone is also the curb-stone (Prellstein), over which passers-by stumble. It would seem almost as if in 1 Pet. ii. 4-8 one were hearing the voice of a preacher making various applications of the figure suggested by his text, Eph. ii. 20-22. Nor is it strange that at the conclusion of both letters it is suggested that back of the men, through whose hostilities the readers are compelled to suffer, stands the devil, whom they are steadfastly to resist (1 Pet. v. 8 f.; Eph. vi. 11-13). Other resemblances in thought and language, e.g. that between 1 Pet. iii. 21 f. and Eph. i. 20-22, do not furnish positive proof, nevertheless they go to confirm the correctness of the observation that Peter and Silvanus had Eph. before them. Whether, as Hofmann holds (vii. 1. 206), they intended to suggest to the readers directly the circular letter which had been sent to them, is doubtful. The relation of 1 Pet. to Rom. is certainly quite different. While from the beginning to the end of 1 Pet. there are portions which are parallel to Eph., with Rom. there are only scattered points of contact. Cf. in this connection Hofmann's fine exposition (vii. 1. 207-212); on the other hand, the effect of Seufert's exposition (ZfWTh, 1874, S. 360-388) is to evoke the dissent of every intelligent reader of 1 Pet., rather than to convince him of its dependence upon Rom. It is especially the hortatory portion of Rom. to which 1 Pet. shows numerous points of resemblance: Rom. xii. 2 = 1 Pet. i. 14, μὴ συσχηματίζεσθαι, with substantially the same object in the dative; Rom. xii. 17 = 1 Pet. iii. 9, μηδενὶ (μὴ) ἀποδιδόντες κακὸν ἀντὶ κακοῦ, in both instances standing between an exhortation to humility and the advice to preserve peace with non-Christians, while in the immediate context in both passages stands the command that they bless their persecutors instead of reviling them again (Rom. xii. 14). Taken in connection with such clear resemblances, a certain weight is to be given also to similarities in the same chapter, which cannot be used as positive proof, such as the similar use of λογικός,—not to be found elsewhere in the N.T. or LXX,—Rom. xii. 1, 1 Pet. ii. 2, and the conception of offerings, in a figurative sense, made by Christians, Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 5. In relatively close proximity to these parallels, Rom. xiii. 1-7 and 1 Pet. ii. 13-17, occurs an exhortation with regard to civil authorities. The sense is not only the same, but several expressions are alike, e.g. the aim for which civil authorities exist is described thus: εἰς ἐκδίκησιν κακοποιῶν, ἔπαινον δὲ τῶν ἀγαθοποιῶν, 1 Pet. ii. 14 = τὸ ἀγαθὸν ποιεῖ καὶ ἔξεις ἔπαινον ἐξ αὐτῆς . . . θεοῦ γὰρ διάκονός ἐστιν ἑκδικῶν εἰς ὀργὴν τῷ τὸ κακὸν πράσσοντι (Rom. xiii. 3 f.). Notwithstanding, Peter's thought strikes one as independent. While Paul emphasises the thought of the divine institution of the civil order and the subserviency of the same to God, Peter represents it more broadly, describing it as πᾶσα ἀνθρωπίνη κρίσις. By this he does not imply that the civil power was created and endowed with its functions by men, which would be contrary to the whole Jewish (Dan. ii. 37) and Christian (John xix. 11; 1 Clem. lxi.) conception of the same, but means that government is an institution which belongs in the human realm and not in the domain of revelation. The adjective ἀνθρώπινος (Rom. vi. 19; 1 Tim. iii. 1; above, p. 124, n. 6) is not used in the sense of θνητός (e.g. in Rom. vi. 12), which suggests a conceivable motive for the conduct that Peter condemns,—a motive which he rejects,—so that the exhortation practically means, “Be subject to the government, and do not think that you are released from this obligation because this is only a human institution.” But this word is meant to suggest to the readers that Christians are to honour and support everything that contributes to the maintenance of good order in human affairs, not less but more zealously than other people (cf. Rom. xii. 17; 2 Cor. viii. 4; Phil. iv. 8). The fact that Peter, writing from Rome, the seat of the imperial government, to provincial Christians who were governed by deputies sent from Rome, mentions not only the emperor, but also expressly the ἡγεμόνες sent by him into the provinces, while Paul, writing to Christians in Rome, speaks more generally of ἐξουσία, ἐξουσίαι, ἄρχοντες, is only another proof that we are not dealing with some man of letters who patterned what he wrote after more ancient models, but with Peter himself, who took account of the actual conditions under which he wrote. Cf. an imperial decree of the third century in Grenfell and Hunt, Fayûm Towns, p. 120, τοῖς ἡγεμόσιν τοῖς κατ’ ἐπιτροπείας παρ’ ἐμοῦ ἀπεσταλμένοις. That Rom. ix. 32 f. and 1 Pet. ii. 6, still more ii. 4–8, were not written independently of each other, is proved (1) by the fact that both apostles in quoting Isa. xxviii. 16 are practically agreed against the strongly variant reading of the LXX; even the addition ἐπ’ αὐτῷ (Rom. ix. 33, x. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 6) is certainly spurious in the LXX; (2) from the fact that after the quotation of Isa. xxviii. 16, following a quotation from Ps. cxviii. 22, in 1 Pet. ii. 7 f. are added the words λίθος προσκόμματος καὶ πέτρα σκανδάλου, which are taken from Isa. viii. 14, but vary greatly from the text of the LXX, and which Paul inserts in the quotation of Isa. xxviii. 16. Here also Peter does not copy Rom.; he is familiar with the prophetic text from his own reading, since in ii. 6 he gives the characteristics of the stone,—as also earlier in ii. 3,—passed over by Paul. But there remains in his memory also the form in which Paul had quoted the words of the prophet, and, following the cue suggested by Paul’s combination of Isa. xxviii. 16 and Isa. viii. 14, he adds also Ps. cxviii. 22. The relation of 1 Pet. iv. 1 to Rom. vi. 7 shows just as clearly an acquaintance on the part of the later author with the older writing; for the thought that death annuls man’s relationship to sin, which is only differently expressed in the two instances, is very boldly applied in both cases, first to the death of Christ and then as the ground of a moral obligation on the part of those who have been redeemed through His death. Similar relations do not exist between 1 Pet. and any other of Paul’s letters. Gal. iii. 23 and 1 Pet. i. 5, quoted by Hilgenfeld, Einf. 633, agree only in the use of the word φρουρεῖν. It would be more natural to compare the latter passage to Phil. iv. 7, which likewise would be to no purpose.

5. (P. 178.) Regarding the use of Edom for Rome, cf. Weber, Jüdische

Theol. § 81, 8; Schürer, iii. 236, A. 55 [Eng. trans. ii. iii. 99, n. 29]. See also in 4 Esdr. vi. 8 f. In 4 Esdr. iii. 1 f. (28, 31 in contrast to Zion) Babylon is certainly not the city on the Euphrates; but if not Rome, at least the place which the writer knew to be the seat of the heathen power inflicting its burden upon Israel. Gutschmid, who held that the greater part of this book was written in 31 B.C., suggested Alexandria (Kl. Schriften, ii. 277). In spite of his evident interest for Egypt, the Jewish Sibyl of the years 71–73 claims to understand by Babylon Rome (Sibyll. v. 143, 159; cf. ZfKW, 1886, S. 39–45). Concerning Babylon-Rome in Rev. see below, § 75, n. 2. According to the Midrash on Cant. i. 6 (translated by Wünsche, S. 35, cf. Sanhedr. 21b; Shab. 56b), Rome was called Romi-Bablon, because the clay out of which its first huts were built was mixed with water brought from the Euphrates. Paul does not use the word Babylon, but applies a prophecy concerning the departure of the exiles from Babylon (Isa. lii. 11; cf. xlviii. 20) to the separation of the Christians from the heathen world (2 Cor. vi. 17). For the proverbial meaning of Babylon among Greeks and Romans, see Pauly-Wissowa, RE, ii. 2667.

6. (P. 179.) The opinion that the rescript of Trajan to Pliny altered the legal status of the Christians—a view against which the present writer argues in an earlier work, Hirten des Hermas, 1868, S. 128 f.—is beginning to give way to a better view. With the position there advanced agree Arnold, Stud. zur Gesch. d. plinian. Christenverfolgung, S. 27, 39, 42, 47; C. J. Neumann, D. röm. Staat u. die Kirche, i. 17, 22 f.; Mommsen, HZ, 1890, S. 395 f.; Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 212, 215 f., 226, notwithstanding many differences.

7. (P. 180.) Without distinguishing between what refers to the immediate present in the several writings and what is said with reference to past events, the following forms of punishment may be cited: imprisonment and confiscation of property, Heb. x. 32–34; banishment, Rev. i. 9; Hermas, Sim. i. (cf. the writer's Hirten des Hermas, S. 118–135); executions, Rev. ii. 13 (? see § 73, n. 3), vi. 9, 11, xii. 11, xvii. 6, xviii. 20, 24, xix. 2, xx. 4; Heb. xiii. 7 (?); Clem., 1 Cor. v. vi.; Herm. Vis. iii. 2. 1; Sim. viii. 3. 6 f., ix. 28. 2–4. All these cases are prior to the time of the letters of Ignatius and Pliny.

8. (P. 181.) κακοποιός, iv. 15, occurs in a list of offences of a more definite character, so that it is natural to take it in the more definite sense which maleficus (used to translate κακοποιός in Tert. Scorp. xii. and Cypr. Test. iii. 37) certainly came to have, = “sorcerer, witch,” etc. Cf. the astrological term οἱ κακοποιοὶ τῶν ἀστέρων, Artemid. Oneir. iv. 59; also Suet. Nero, xvi. “Christiani genus hominum superstitionis novæ et maleficæ.” The term is interpreted in this sense by Le Blant, Les pers. et les martyrs, 1893, p. 62. But there is no certain proof of the corresponding use of κακοποιός, and if this were the meaning, we should expect rather μάγος (Acts viii. 9–11, xiii. 8; Acta Thecla, cc. xv. xx.) or γῶγς (2 Tim. iii. 13; Orig. c. Cels. i. 6). Furthermore, the contrasted statements in 1 Pet. ii. 12, 14, iii. 17 show that the word was meant to be taken in an entirely general sense (cf. Mark iii. 4; Luke vi. 9; John xviii. 30; 3 John 11). The word appears to be weaker and not so definite as κακοῦργος, Luke xxiii. 32 f.; 2 Tim. ii. 9 (“transgressor,” often with the special sense “rogue,” “cheat”; cf. παροῦργος). The list of misdeeds with which the Christians were charged is concluded almost immediately with a general expression.

With a new ὥς, as something of especial importance, ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος is subsequently added. This word, which does not occur at all in the earlier literature, and only at a late date in ecclesiastical literature, and then not independently of 1 Pet., means one who acts as an overseer of things and persons that are foreign, i.e. a person who assumes to exert a determining influence and guardianship over men and affairs which do not concern him. While the word is omitted from the text altogether by Peshito, Tert. Scorp. xii. translates it alieni speculator; but in the oldest Latin Bible (see Cyp. Test. iii. 37) it is translated curas alienas agens. E. Zeller (Sitzungsber. der berl. Ak. 1893, S. 129-132) calls attention to the fact that this criticism was lodged against the Cynic philosophers, who made it their business to be the overseers (κατάσκοποι, ἐπίσκοποι) of the rest of mankind. Cf. especially the famous description Epict. iii. 22, and the answer to the criticism which it contains, § 97, οὐ γὰρ τὰ ἀλλότρια πολυπραγμονεῖ (the Cynic) ὅταν τὰ ἀνθρώπινα ἐπισκοπῇ, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἴδια; and, on the other hand, the confession of the philosopher in Hor. Sat. ii. 3. 19, "aliena negotia curo, excursus propriis." Like the Cynics, the Christians were criticised for their inordinate zeal for making converts, for their unsolicited concern about the souls of others, and for their interference in the most intimate affairs of the heart and the home. But while the Cynics held that they were under obligation to exercise their preaching and pastoral office in the most decisive, authoritative, and defiant manner possible, only denying that in so doing they were meddling with things that did not concern them, the apostles (cf. also 1 Thess. iv. 11) condemn conduct which could be more or less justly described as ἀλλοτριοεπισκοπεῖν. Everywhere they exhort their followers in their intercourse with non-Christians to act with wisdom and modest reserve, to do good, and to suffer evil in silence (1 Pet. ii. 12, 18, 23, iii. 1, iv. 8-10, 15-17, v. 6; 1 Thess. iv. 12; Col. iv. 5 f.; Phil. iv. 8), which, of course, did not mean that when it was a question of witnessing to the truth this witness should not be given boldly. What 1 Pet. iv. 15 omits is almost as instructive as what it contains. There is no trace in 1 Pet. of the three famous charges of ἀδοκῆς or ἀσέβειας, of the eating of flesh of children, and of unchaste orgies in connection with Christian worship. The first charge was in vogue as early as the time of Domitian (Dio Cass. lxvii. 14, lxviii. 1), and was noticed by Pliny, since he required Christians who were accused to perform heathen acts of worship (Ep. ad Traj. xvi. 5). So also the second and possibly also the third charges came under his notice: inasmuch as, in the light of the confessions of persons who had been Christians, he describes their celebration of the sacrament in common as a "coire ad capiendum cibum, promiscuum tamen et innoxium." After the time of Justin there is constant reference to all three charges.

9. (P. 184.) The opinion that 1 Pet. presupposes a persecution of the Christians at the instigation of the civil authorities (maintained still by Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 279-302; Exp. 1893, pp. 285-296) is based primarily upon the words, ἐν δρόματι Χριστοῦ, iv. 14, and ἐν τῷ ἀρόματι (al. μέραι) τοῦτο and ὡς Χριστιανός, iv. 16. But ἀναδίδεσθαι does not mean "To be accused before a court," and πάσχειν taken alone does not mean "To suffer punishment in consequence of a judicial sentence," still less "To be executed." A person convicted as a thief or ἀλλοτριο-

ἐπίσκοπος would certainly not be punished with death. The exhortation, "If anyone suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed," would be very strange indeed, if this suffering were execution. When one is on the point of being executed, there are matters of deeper concern than whether one is ashamed of his position and confession, or proud of it. It is self-evident that God can be glorified in the name of Christ without sacrificing life (cf. Phil. i. 20), and there are classic instances which show that arrests and trials which end with acquittal can be regarded as suffering for Christ's sake (see above, p. 183). But even granted that in iv. 16 the reference is to cases where Christians are executed as Christians, this is nothing essentially different from what happened in Rome in the year 64, Tac. Ann. xv. 44; for, according to Tacitus, with whom Suetonius (Nero, xvi.) and the Christian traditions agree, this was not a case of the punishment of a few Christians along with other suspected persons, but those who bore the Christian name in Rome were accused, sought out, and executed, first as incendiaries, and then afterwards many of them merely on account of the misanthropy due to their religion. Quite in agreement with this description, the readers of 1 Pet. would then have been executed primarily as murderers and thieves; but where it was impossible to prove such charges, also as members of a dangerous society, i.e. as bearers of the Christian name. It would then foreshadow what happened some months later in Rome on a larger scale. The uncertainty which Pliny desired cleared up ("nomen ipsum—aut flagitia coherentia") has in a certain measure always existed, and has really never disappeared entirely, and is repeated in analogous cases even to-day. Were the Armenians massacred in 1895 and 1896 because of their nationality, or their Christian confession, or anarchistic intrigues? One is reminded also of the vacillations of the anti-Semitic movement of our own day. But, as has been shown (above, p. 184 f.), there is nothing which indicates that even individuals who were Christians had up to this time suffered martyrdom, either in Asia Minor or in Rome, where the letter was written. This shows that the letter was written before July 64. It is true that the word ἀπολογία, iii. 15, does suggest a judicial process (Phil. i. 7, 16; 2 Tim. iv. 16; cf. Ramsay, op. cit. pp. 280, 294), but it is employed in the N.T. (1 Cor. ix. 3; 2 Cor. vii. 11, xii. 19; Rom. ii. 15) as elsewhere in literature quite commonly with reference to other conditions, and the context (ἀεὶ παντὶ τῷ αἰτοῦντι ὑμᾶς λόγον) shows that it is used here in exactly the same sense as in Col. iv. 5 f. (πρὸς τοὺς ἔξω . . . πῶς δέι ὑμᾶς ἐνὶ ἐκάστῳ ἀποκρίνεσθαι). Ramsay, who (op. cit. p. 281) discovers in iii. 15, and even in v. 8, the spying out of Christians by Roman officials at the behest of the authorities with a view to their judicial punishment, is far from doing justice to the text, when in the Expositor (1893, p. 288) he substitutes for the Roman officials, private inquisitors—delatores.

10. (Pp. 182, 185.) To find in the use of the word Χριστιανός (1 Pet. iv. 16) an indication that the letter was written later than the year 64 is to contradict all existing sources, Christian and heathen. While Baur (Christentum und Kirche der 3 ersten Jahrh. 432) questions the account in Acts xi. 26 because of the genuinely Latin form of the name, and claims that the name originated in Rome, but without calling in question the correctness of Tacitus' statement in Ann. xv. 44 ("quos . . . vulgus Christianos appellabat"), that in 64 the name was commonly used, Lipsius (Über den Ursprung und ältesten Gebrauch des Christennamens, Jena, 1873) endeavours to prove that the name is Greek in form, and probably originated in Asia Minor in the last decades of the first century. From the historical point of view, the following brief remarks may be made with reference to Lipsius' statements, which are confusing and too long to be considered in detail here:—(1) To begin with, there seems to be nothing whatever suspicious about the statement that in Antioch during the year 43–44, in consequence of the extraordinarily rapid growth of a Church consisting mainly of Gentile Christian converts, the Gentile populace came to apply to them the name Χριστιανοί (Acts xi. 26), for the reason that when Acts was written, even if this was as late as the year 110, this name was anything but a designation of honour of which its bearers were proud. On the other hand, the statement is rendered all the more trustworthy by the fact that, according to the original recension of the text, the narrator states immediately after xi. 27 f. that he was a member of the Antiochian Church of that time. The date of the origin of this name given in Acts is possibly confirmed by the reference of Jas. ii. 7 (vol. i. p. 99, n. 8). The incidental use of the name by king Agrippa II. some fifteen years later (Acts xxvi. 28) does not impress one at all as if Luke were trying in this way to confirm the historical invention which he had introduced in an earlier passage. If this had been his purpose, there were passages in Acts xii.–xx. better suited for it. (2) To explain the clear statement of Tacitus as an anachronism is unreasonable and purely arbitrary. Tacitus is not here referring conditions prevailing in the time of Trajan to the time of Nero, but is describing the events of 64 in their true historical setting (cf. Ramsay, 229, 241). Why, if this were the case, did he not use appellat instead of appellabat? But his whole account hinges upon the words “quos vulgus Christianos appellabat”; for, if the Christians were not known in Rome at that time as a society distinct from Jewish as well as heathen organisations, and if they were not designated by a special name, an intelligent man, who as a boy passed through the events of 64, could not relate that Nero accused the Christians. To this is to be added the testimony of Suetonius (Nero, xvi.), who describes the event from a different point of view, but also places the name Christiani in the time of Nero. (3) After all has been said, the fact remains that an inscription found on a wall in Pompeii in the year 1862, which became illegible shortly afterwards, contained at least the letters HPISTIAN; and the common use of the name Christian in Pompeii prior to the year 79, when the city was buried, is proved by C. I. L. iv. No. 679; Tab. xvi. 2, 3; cf. de Rossi, Bull. di arch. christ. 1864, pp. 69 ff., 92 ff. Prof. Sogliano, who is opposed to this interpretation, reports, in an open letter to Prof. Chiapelli (Giornale d'Italia of October 11, 1905), concerning an earthen lamp, with a monogram of Christ in the form of a cross, which was found on July 3, 1905, between the strata of ashes and of stone in a Pompeian villa, and, from its location, probably in the rooms of the slaves. More accurate proof of this statement must be left to the proper archaeologists. (4) Since the Christians were compelled, probably as early as 64 (cf. Ramsay, 238, concerning the meaning of fatebantur in Tac. Ann. xv. 44), and from that time on with more and more frequency, to answer the question, “Are you a Christian?” it is easy to see how gradually the name came to be used within the Church itself. The first traces of this usage are to be found in Ignatius (Rom. iii. 2; Magn. iv.; more clearly ad Polyc. vii. 3; Χριστιανισμός, in contrast to Judaism and heathendom, Magn. x. 3; Rom. iii. 3; Phil. vi. 1). It occurs also in Justin. In contrast to this usage, in 1 Pet. iv. 16 it is employed in the original way, being used by heathen who condemned or persecuted the Christians, and occurs in no other sense. It is not necessary here to discuss the linguistic question whether the name as originally used among the heathen was incorrectly pronounced and written Χρηστιανός (thus cod. N, Acts xi. 26, xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16; Suet. Claud. xxv. Chrestus; Just. Apol. i. 4, 46, 49, ii. 6; Tert. Apol. iii.; Nat. i. 3; Laet. Inst. i. 4; I. Gr. Sicil. et Ital., ed. Kaibel, Nos. 78, 754; C. I. Lat. x. No. 7173; cf. Blass, Hermes, 1895, S. 465). It is of special importance to distinguish between adjectives ending in ἄνός, ἄνους, and the formation which we have before us here of adjectives in ἰάνός from a name (of a person, city, or country). The first formation is Greek as well as Latin, though much more frequently used in Latin than in Greek. Here belong naturally Ἀσιανός (Thucyd. i. 6, 138), Σαρδιανός (Xenoph. Hellen. iii. 4. 21; Ionic Σαρδιηνός, Herod. i. 22), Τραλλιανός, Σουσιανός, since in these cases the ι belongs to the stem. Consequently these words are not different from Ἀγκυρανός, and do not help in any way to explain formations in -ιανός. Just as little light is thrown upon the problem by the remarks of the older grammarians, who describe these and similar forms as τύπος τῶν Ἀσιανῶν (Lipsius, 13, A. 1), instead of which the modern grammarians remark more clearly, "The suffixes in ἄνός, ηνός, ινός, are formed only from names of cities and countries lying outside of Greece" (Blass-Kühner, i. 2. 296). But while these formations were used by the Attic writers of the best period, and to some extent were even borrowed by Latin writers (e.g. Asianus later than Asiaticus), adjectives in ἰάνους derived from proper names are not a Greek, but a late Latin formation (Archiv f. lat. Lexikogr. i. 183). That they found their way from popular and provincial language into literature only gradually toward the end of the Republic, is illustrated by Gell. iii. 3. 10. While the learned Varro thinks that only Plautinus, and not Plautianus, ought to be derived from Plautus, he refers the fabulæ Plautianæ to a comic writer, Plautius; and it makes no special difference whether there was an obscure poet by the name of Plautius (Ritschl, Parergon Plaut. 95) or not. This is confirmed by actual usage. While from names in o, onis, Cicero constructs such forms as Milonianus, Pisonianus, Neronianus, Catonianus (ad Qu. fr. ii. 4 [6]. 5; also Catoninus, ad Fam. vii. 25, cf. Liv. xxiii. 38. 9, Varronianus), he avoids Cæsarianus (since the true reading, ad Att. xvi. 10, is Cæsarinus), which is used by Auctor, Bell. Afric. 13; Nepos, Attic. 7—two writers whose style is said to be unrefined (Schwane, Röm. Lit., 5te Aufl. S. 381, 386). Cicero ventures once to construct the form Lepidianus (ad Att. xvi. 11. 8) from a noun in -us. Under the influence of false analogies from the older period (Æmili-anus Pompei-anus), after the beginning of the imperial era these forms appear more and more frequently in literature; cf. Velleius Patere. ii. 72, 74, 76, 78, Brutianus; ii. 82, Crassianus; Tac. Ann. ii. 8, Drusianus; Ann. i. 109, 57, 61, ii. 7, 15, 25, Varianus; Ann. xiv. 15 (cf. Suet. Nero, xxv.; C. I. L. vi. Nos. 8640, 8648, 8649, 12874), Augustianus, also Augustalis (Ann. i. 15, 54; C. I. L. vi. Nos. 909, 910, 913), Augustanus (C. I. L. vi. No. 8651). Inasmuch as these forms originated in the provincial speech of the Romans, and since their adoption into literature was resisted by the stylists, it is possible that through the intercourse of daily life they became familiar to Greek-speaking Orientals before they made their appearance in literature. There is no occurrence of the same in Greek literature earlier than Ἑρῳδιανοί (Mark iii. 6, xii. 13; Matt. xxii. 16, and the names of heretical sects in Just. Dial. xxxv., cf. Apol. ii. 15 ?); but this does not prove that the word Χριστιανοί, which was of popular origin, was not used in Antioch as early as 44 A.D. (Acts ii. 26). A writer like Lucian (de Hist. conscrib. 21) makes fun of the Atticists, who in their zeal to Hellenise everything Roman changed Τίτιανός (which was possibly not formed from Titus, but from Titius) to Τιτάτιος. The less educated barbarians, Syrians, and Jews, who, through their intercourse with Roman officials and soldiers, must have taken over into their speech numerous Latin words and names, did not notice that Χριστιανός was not a genuine Greek word, and they did not concern themselves about this when they formed it. Regarding words borrowed from the Latin, see vol. i. p. 64 f. Attention may also be called to Latin words used by Ignatius, a native of Antioch, in the year 110; cf. the writer's Ignatius, S. 530-533.

§ 41. THE AUTHOR AND READERS OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER ACCORDING TO THE LETTER'S OWN TESTIMONY.

Whereas in his First Epistle Peter designates accurately the group of Churches which he is addressing (i. 1), and indicates in an unmistakable manner the place from which he writes (v. 13), in 2 Peter there are no geographical data whatever. The designation of the readers is extremely indefinite, even when compared to that of Jas. i. 1 (2 Pet. i. 1). In 1 Peter, aside from the mention of his name in the greeting, Peter lets his own person fall into the background in a way that seems strange, and only in three places (i. 3, 8, v. 1) does he make even slight reference to his own relation to the person and history of Jesus (above, pp. 146-156). On the other hand, in 2 Peter the writer calls attention repeatedly and emphatically to what he alone, or in company with others, heard Jesus say, and to what he had seen with his own eyes of Jesus' doings (i. 14, 16-18, also i. 3; see n. 10). In 1 Peter the apostle addresses the readers as one who is personally unknown to them, introduces himself to them, and in a sense lets himself be represented by Silvanus, one of their missionaries (v. 12 ; above, pp. 149, 175, 176) ; 2 Peter presupposes a relation between himself and the readers which was of long standing, and which is to be cultivated by continued intercourse until the death of the writer.

To begin with what is relatively clear, Peter calls this his second letter in which he designs to stir up his readers to keep in remembrance the prophecies of the O.T., and the commandment which originated with the Lord and Saviour, and which has been brought to the readers by their apostles (iii. 1, n. 1). This description of the purpose of the writer and the essential contents of his letter fits 2 Peter exactly. In the opening passage i. 5–11 emphasis was laid upon the active exercise of all Christian virtues, especially in view of the promised kingdom of Christ (ver. 11) ; and even in i. 4 attention was called to the great promises of Christ. Immediately after these exhortations to the practice of the Christian virtues in view of the coming of Christ, Peter speaks of his own obligation to keep the readers in remembrance of these things so long as he shall live, and of his earnest purpose shortly to fulfil this obligation again (i. 12–14),—all of which is in such entire agreement with what he says in iii. 1 ff. concerning the purpose and essential contents of this and his former letter to the readers, as to make it certain that in writing the second passage he had the first in view. In both cases he calls his exhortations a διεγείρειν ἐν ὑπομνήσει (i. 13, iii. 1 ; cf. ὑπομιμνήσκειν, i. 12, with μνησθῆναι, iii. 2), and emphasises and justifies the designation of his exhortations as mere reminders by recognising that the readers are already in possession of the truth (i. 12), or that their minds are pure (iii. 1 ; cf. Rom. xv. 14 f.). The lack in i. 12 f. of any specific description of the teachings, such as is found in iii. 2, is supplied by the περὶ τούτων (i. 12), which refers back to i. 5–11. And although in this passage the eternal kingdom of Christ is not expressly called a subject of O.T. prophecy, at the end of the first section of the letter very explicit reference is made to the prophetic utterances, the trustworthiness, value, and intelligibility of which for Christians is dependent wholly upon the self-revelation of Jesus (i. 19-21).

But iii. 1 f. is in no sense to be taken as referring exclusively or even mainly to the preceding parts of this letter. In that case the absence of any reference to the whole of the second section of the Epistle (chap. ii.) would be strange. Consequently what is said in iii. 3 f., which follows iii. 2 without any break in the sentence, is part of the description of what Peter intended to say to his readers in this letter as well as of what he had said in the one that preceded. At the same time, the participial sentence, iii. 3 f., together with the explanatory clauses that follow (iii. 5-7), mark the transition to a new reminder and exhortation (iii. 8-18), not previously discussed with the same definiteness in this letter, to which new passage the description in iii. 1 f. applies far more than to i. 5-21. For, not only is reference here made to the "Day of God" (ver. 12) predicted by the prophets, and to the new world which they also predicted (ver. 13), but the readers are very strongly reminded of their obligation to live in accordance with these expectations, i.e. with the "command" applicable to Christians (vv. 11 f., 14 f., 17 f.). Thus in iii. 1 f. Peter not only describes the preceding parts of the letter, but, as he clearly says, has in view all that remains to be written. He describes in substance at this particular point the meaning and the purpose of the letter: because now, after the long discussion in chap. ii., which does not come directly under the description of iii. 1 f., he is taking up again the thought of i. 5-21, intending once more to exhort his readers more strongly and indeed, after what has been said in chap. ii., more definitely to the holy life enjoined by the prospect of the prophesied end of the world. There was no more necessity of proving in detail that the last things which are recalled to mind in what follows were predicted by the O.T. prophets, than there was of showing that the moral requirements made in this same final section were in keeping with the command of Jesus and the moral recommendations of the apostles. The mere fact that at the beginning of the third section (iii. 2) the writer says that the prophecies of the O.T. and the command of the apostles originating with Christ are what he desires to recall to the readers' minds in this letter, shows that the admonitions which follow go back to these sources. Moreover, in i. 19 f. he had strongly urged upon his readers' attention prophetic prediction as this was confirmed and interpreted by the gospel history.

If, then, the description of the essential contents and purpose of the two letters of Peter in iii. 1 f. suits 2 Peter, it follows that the earlier Epistle of Peter to the same readers, referred to in this passage, was essentially the same as 2 Peter in the points mentioned. This being so, it is impossible to suppose that Peter here refers to 1 Peter. For, while there are numerous exhortations to moral conduct in 1 Peter, these are nowhere referred to the command of Jesus and the teaching given by the missionaries to this group of readers. Still less can it be said that 1 Peter is a reminder of prophetic utterances, more specifically of the end of the world, predicted by the prophets. There is only one passage where reference is made to the prophets (1 Pet. i. 10 f.), and here they are represented as announcing beforehand the sufferings and glory of Christ, i.e. the contents of the gospel; but where mention is made of the objects of the Christian hope, the day of judgment, and the glorification of the Church (1 Pet. i. 3-7, ii. 12, iv. 13, 17, v. 4, 6, 10), there is no reference whatever to the O.T. prophets.

The fact that since the fourth century our 2 Peter has followed our 1 Peter in most Bibles, cannot be used to support the claim that these are the two letters mentioned together in 2 Pet. iii. 1 ; for who can affirm that Peter did not write twenty letters and send two or three letters to more than one group of Churches ? From this description which covers both letters it follows that the earlier letter in question—which, however, was sent to the same readers—was not our 1 Peter, but a letter which has not come down to us.

It is improbable, notwithstanding what is said in iii. 15, that 2 Peter, like our 1 Peter, was directed to the Gentile Christian Churches in Asia Minor. The urgent exhortation to live a life which shall be in harmony with the trustworthy prophecy of the Day of the Lord, of the end of the world, and of a new world, is concluded in iii. 15 with an injunction to the readers, already intimated in iii. 9, to regard as their salvation the patience shown by the Lord Jesus in the deferment of His return. This injunction, which would be unintelligible apart from what is said in the passage at the conclusion of which it stands, and which, therefore, is not meant to be taken apart from iii. 5–13, is now represented as being in harmony with what Paul, the beloved brother of Peter and his readers, wrote to these same readers according to the measure of wisdom given him. The readers of 1 Peter were in large part at least identical with the readers of Ephesians (vol. i. p. 479 ff.). So long as it was maintained that the earlier letter of Peter mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 1 must be the letter which precedes 2 Peter in the Canon, unavoidably the letter of Paul referred to in 2 Pet. iii. 15 was connected with this same circular letter, namely, Ephesians (n. 2). But Ephesians does not agree with what, according to 2 Pet. iii. 15, Paul wrote in his letter directed to the readers of 2 Peter. What is said of all of Paul's letters (iii. 16, "As also in all his epistles, speaking in them of these things") might be justified by occasional remarks of Paul bearing upon the subject here under discussion, but not the reference to a letter dealing specifically with the same theme (iii. 15). The reference must be to a thoroughgoing exposition of this subject, from which Paul's specific teachings could be ascertained. The exhortations to a correct Christian life are throughout Ephesians based upon entirely different grounds (iv. 1, 20-25, v. 1-3, vi. 1-3, 8, 9), and the argument of the duty of sanctification, on the ground of the expectation of Christ's second coming, is much less frequent in Ephesians (iv. 30, v. 5 f.) than in other letters of Paul (1 Thess. v. 1-11; Rom. xiii. 11-14; cf. 1 John iii. 3). It would be more natural to suppose that the reference is to Hebrews than to Ephesians, although in Hebrews reference is made to the promise which is certain, only delayed in its fulfilment, in order to exhort the readers not so much to a virtuous life, as to a steadfast maintenance of faith and confession, which is not possible without struggle against sin (Heb. iii. 7-iv. 13, x. 35-39, xii. 1-17, 25-29). If only Paul had written Hebrews, or if the author of 2 Peter could have regarded Hebrews as a work of his! But this is impossible (§ 47); so that we are compelled to conclude that the letter of Paul mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 15 is in existence quite as little as Peter's own earlier letter to the readers of 2 Peter mentioned in iii. 1.

Moreover, we have no knowledge of the carrying out of the intentions expressed by the author in i. 12-15 (n. 3). When he gives assurance that in the future he will be always ready to recall to the readers' minds such things as are to be found in the present letter, and goes on to explain that he feels this to be an obligation for the rest of his life,—all the more because he knows, partly through a revelation made by Christ to him, that he will die a sudden death (n. 3),—the language used can apply just as well to oral teachings as to future letters. Only, in case the reference were to oral teachings, we should expect the contrast between the present written and the later oral reminiscences to be expressed, or, if both were meant, we should expect a distinction to be made in this double form of teaching between the oral reminiscences which he would give when present and the written communications he would send when absent (n. 4). Apparently, therefore, Peter declares his intention of sending to the same readers in the future an occasional letter like this present one. To be clearly distinguished from this statement is what Peter says in the words that follow: "I will give diligence that at every time ye may be able after my decease to call these things (truths or teachings) to remembrance" (n. 5). Only, if Peter had previously expressed the intention or hope of visiting the readers again and impressing upon them once more orally the truths in question, could this statement be taken to mean that Peter, in view of the fact that scripta litera manet, is not satisfied with oral teachings, but when he leaves the readers, or afterwards, will put such teachings in written form, so that they may be permanently remembered by them, or will see to it that others do it for him. Since, however, there is nothing anywhere in the context to suggest this contrast between oral teaching and its embodiment in written form, the only contrast possible is that between such written communications as the present letter, the earlier letter mentioned in iii. 1, and similar letters which Peter intends to write in the future on the one hand, and a more extensive literary work on the other. The former are off-hand products, and are expected to have only a temporary effect; the latter is designed to be of permanent value. No light is thrown upon the contents of this proposed work by the sentences that follow, in which Peter merely substantiates his right and the right of others, whom he mentions along with himself, to perform such literary work (vv. 16-18), but, at the same time, its character is indicated by the sentences that precede. The τούτων of ver. 15 resumes the περὶ τούτων of ver. 12, although the expression which intervenes—"the truth which is with you (the readers)" (cf. Jas. i. 21)—and the natural difference between letters of a merely temporary character and a book claiming to be of permanent value forbid limiting the contents of the latter to exactly the same topics as are discussed in 2 Peter. The work in question was clearly designed to be doctrinal in character like 2 Peter, not a historical work. Even if 2 Peter was written as late as 170, the Gospel of Mark cannot be the work in question; for it was not until long after this date that the story originated according to which Peter commissioned Mark to write his Gospel (n. 5); and even after this opinion had grown up, Peter could not be represented as expressing this intention in words applicable only to a religious treatise. A writing which might claim to be the product of the literary intention here expressed is not in existence, and so far as we know never existed.

From the passages already considered it follows that Peter has stood for a long time in an official relation to the persons receiving this letter, which relation he feels himself under obligation to maintain until his death through instructions by letter, and after his death through a treatise designed especially for them, just as he has maintained it heretofore by a letter like 2 Peter. He had also brought them the gospel, not alone, to be sure, but in co-operation with other missionaries. For he can mean nothing less than this when he says of himself and of the companions whom he mentions along with himself, "We have made known unto you the power and coming of Christ" (i. 16, n. 6). Even assuming that the δύναμις of Christ means only that power which Jesus obtained through His resurrection and exaltation, in contrast to the weakness in which He had previously lived and suffered (2 Cor. xiii. 4; Rom. i. 4),—a view which has very little in its favour,—this sentence cannot be made to refer to the instruction of persons who are already believers concerning the exaltation to power and the coming of Christ —instruction which presupposes a previous preaching of the gospel—simply because there was and is no preaching of the gospel which does not make known to the hearers the resurrection, exaltation, and coming of Christ. All subsequent teaching can be only the recalling of these fundamentals of the gospel, or the indication of their consequences in the life or thought of believers. Therefore it is impossible to suppose that Peter is here referring to that earlier letter (iii. 1) and also to similar communications to the same group of readers by his fellow-workers, or that he, in a manner so unclear as this, identifies the original preaching of the gospel with all later oral and written references to it. Our 1 Peter is quite out of the question; since the gospel was not preached to Christians in Asia Minor by Peter, but by others from whom he distinguishes himself (1 Pet. i. 12). Furthermore, there is no teaching in 1 Peter concerning the power and coming of Christ which begins with the gospel and develops the idea it contains. Those to whom 2 Peter is directed must be persons among whom Peter laboured as a missionary, i.e. persons belonging to the circumcision. The language used to describe the gospel in i. 16 is applicable to it as it was preached in Israel—in other words, among the contemporaries and countrymen of the Lord and His apostles, who were more or less familiar with the facts of the gospel history (Acts ii. 22, x. 37). They not only were externally acquainted with the historical appearance of Jesus, but also treated the same quite materialistically (cf. 2 Cor. v. 6); they therefore needed to have it made clear to them that in this weak man, who was denied, reviled, and put to death by His fellow-men, there dwelt a power which not only had found expression during His lifetime in wonderful miracles (Acts ii. 22, x. 38), but also had broken the bonds of death and raised Him to the throne of God (Acts ii. 24–35, iii. 15, iv. 2, 10, 33, v. 30), from whence He was to come again to finish His work (Acts iii. 20, x. 42). It would seem as if at times the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles was confined to the word of the cross (1 Cor. i. 17 ff., ii. 2); but in the preaching to Israelites who were contemporaries of Jesus emphasis was laid upon the resurrection of Jesus, the revelation of His power and His return. The faith of Jewish Christianity was faith in the glory of Jesus (Jas. ii. 1; cf. vol. i. p. 151, n. 7).

It is also impossible to assume that Peter here identifies himself with Paul and his missionary helpers, such as Barnabas, Silvanus and Timothy, and connects his preaching with theirs. For, in the first place, Peter distinguishes, just as clearly as does Paul (Gal. i. 17, ii. 7-9; 1 Cor. xv. 11, ix. 5), between the missionaries to the Gentiles and the group to which he himself belonged (1 Pet. i. 12); and although he calls Paul the beloved brother of himself and of the readers (2 Pet. iii. 15), he does not intimate in any way to them that Paul was one of their apostles (2 Pet. iii. 2). In the second place, in order to make this identification, it is necessary to assume, against the clear impression of the entire letter, that it was not directed to a definite, homogeneous group of readers, but to the whole body of Christians who owed their conversion to the apostolic preaching, to which also Paul, according to iii. 15, must on one occasion have addressed a letter. But even then the identification of Peter with Paul and his helpers in i. 16 ff. is inconceivable; for the missionaries to the Gentiles could not claim what Peter here claims for himself and his companions concerning their personal relation to the gospel history. This is the third reason which prevents us from identifying Peter's work with that of Paul and his helpers. In preaching the gospel, Peter and his companions have not followed fables cunningly devised or artfully presented, but have preached as those who were eye-witnesses of the majesty of Jesus. Although Paul may have treated his experience near Damascus as a substitute for the fact that he was not like the earlier apostles, a personal disciple of Jesus (1 Cor. ix. 1, cf. xv. 8), he could not affirm with reference to himself, nor could anyone say of him, that he preached the gospel as one who was an eye-witness of the self-revelation of Jesus which formed the content of the gospel. The comprehensive language which Peter uses is comparable only with what personal disciples of Jesus elsewhere affirm with reference to themselves (John i. 14, cf. ii. 11, xix. 35; 1 John i. 1 f., iv. 14; Acts x. 39-41) and with what Peter himself at least intimates in 1 Pet. i. 8, v. 1 (above, p. 147).

The group of preachers with which Peter identifies himself is indicated by the reference to the particular experience on which he bases his claim that he and his companions have declared the power and return of Jesus to the readers as former witnesses of His majesty, i. 17 f. If it be certain that the event referred to is the transfiguration on the mountain described in all three of the synoptic Gospels, then it is also to be assumed that the author of 2 Peter, like the evangelists, knew that the only eye-witnesses of this event were the three apostles, Peter, John, and his brother James (n. 6). Consequently these three are the preachers spoken of in i. 16, though, naturally, there is no exclusion in i. 16 of other apostles who stood in essentially the same historical relation to Jesus. Just as Peter here identifies himself with others of the twelve apostles by the use of "we," so he does also in iii. 2, where he uses the expression οἱ ἀπόστολοι ὑμῶν. "Your apostles" is not synonymous with "The apostles," but serves to distinguish from the entire class of men who may claim the apostolic name, those who have exercised the apostolic office among the readers here addressed, i.e. the missionaries to whom these Christians owe their conversion (cf. 1 Cor. ix. 2; Clem. 1 Cor. v.; cf. above, 69, n. 6). The expression implies a contrast to other apostles who were not the apostles of the readers, and other Christians, to whom the apostles here intended were not apostles. It is thus quite impossible to suppose that the expression "Your apostles" includes apostles who laboured in fields that were widely separated, much less can it include all the apostles without distinction. The suggestion that such language sounds strange on the part of one who himself belonged to the group of missionaries thus designated, is due to the misunderstanding of a mode of speech which is constantly being used, and which is sometimes extremely natural. On the other hand, to assume that the author does not identify himself with this group is to make i. 16 stand in glaring contradiction to iii. 2. This is sufficient to disprove the correctness of that interpretation of iii. 2, for which, in itself, there is no sufficient reason (n. 7). Taking these two passages together, it seems clear that 2 Peter was not directed to a single local Church, the origin of which was due to the preaching of Peter alone (cf. 1 Cor. iii. 10, iv. 15, ix. 2), but probably to a larger group of Christians, among whom Peter had laboured with other missionaries in the founding of Churches. Chap. iii. 2 alone is insufficient to prove that these were not Churches in Asia Minor, or any other region within the sphere of Gentile missions, but Churches within the sphere of Jewish missions, though this is established by the unavoidable connection between iii. 2 and i. 16. The fact that later in the course of their life Peter and others of the twelve apostles engaged in missionary work among the Gentiles in Rome or in Asia Minor, does not justify, on the part of one speaking in their name, the use of such language as that in i. 16, to describe their relation to the Churches founded by Paul and his helpers, nor the distinction made in iii. 2 between them and other apostles who had no official relation to these Churches. Nor can the beginning of this letter be used in proof of this hypothesis, except by presupposing what cannot be proved, namely, that 2 Peter followed 1 Peter, and was intended as a second letter to the same group of readers.

The statement of Peter in i. 1, that the readers, through the righteousness of our God and Saviour, Jesus Christ, have obtained faith of like value with that of Peter and his companions (n. 8), might be taken as implying a contrast between the Jewish Christians, in whose name Peter here speaks, and the Gentile Christians, whom he addresses; since by making no distinction in this regard between Jews and Gentiles, God shows Himself a fair-minded and just judge (Acts x. 34 f., 47, xi. 17 f., xv. 8 f.; Rom. ii. 11-29, iii. 22-30, x. 12). If there were only something in the context to indicate a distinction between Jews and Gentiles within the Church! The author begins by calling himself by the name which he had always borne, using the form most distinctively Jewish, and then adds the surname which Jesus gave him in token of his position among the disciples, and his place in the future Church (n. 9). Quite in harmony with the use of these two names, he calls himself, from one point of view, a servant of Christ, and, from the other, an apostle of Christ. The former title is appropriate to Simeon of Bethsaida, who, with his brother Andrew and many others after them, when they believed on Jesus, accepted Him as their Lord. On the other hand, the apostolic title corresponds to Cephas or Peter, to whom the Lord, by the bestowment of this surname, held out the prospect of a special calling, to which he was appointed when the twelve apostles were chosen, and which was confirmed subsequently more than once. But neither the position which Simeon occupies as the first of the personal disciples of Jesus, nor the position which Cephas has as foremost among the apostles, prevents him from recognising that the faith to which the readers have been brought through his own and his companions' preaching (i. 16) is of like value with his own faith and that of his companions. The distinction thus removed, or at least stripped of its religious significance, is simply that between personal disciples and apostles of Jesus, on the one hand, and, on the other, all those Christians who had not stood in such personal relation to Jesus, nor received the special calling corresponding to this personal relation, but had nevertheless been led, through the efforts of disciples and apostles, to believe on the Lord, who had bought them (ii. 1). The distinction is essentially the same as that between eye-witnesses of the majesty of Jesus and those to whom the eye-witnesses had brought the knowledge of it (i. 16; cf. John xix. 35, xx. 29, 31; 1 John i. 3). The same distinction is apparently expressed also in the sentences that follow, i. 3 f., which are not very clear, nor textually certain (n. 10). Here Peter identifies himself with the other disciples and apostles of Jesus, whom He called personally by the revelation of His glory, and by the demonstration of His moral power, to whom also through the knowledge of Himself He gave all that was needful for a true life and a pious conduct. He then contrasts himself and the other disciples and apostles with the readers to whom the Lord, through these disciples and apostles,—namely, through their preaching of the gospel,—has given very great promises, by virtue of which hereafter they may become partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the perishable pleasures of this world. While it is true that this distinction between the personal disciples of Jesus and other Christians, who have not seen and heard Jesus, is sometimes expressed where the former are addressing Gentile Christians (1 Pet. i. 8; 1 John i. 1-4; John i. 14, xix. 35), exactly the same distinction existed within Jewish Christianity from the beginning of the apostolic preaching.

Inasmuch, therefore, as there is not a single word in 2 Peter which suggests the Gentile character of the readers, and since it has also been shown that 2 Pet. iii. 1 cannot refer to 1 Peter nor 2 Pet. iii. 15 to Ephesians, the evidence of the statements in 2 Pet. i. 16-18, which are in perfect agreement with i. 1-4 and iii. 2, retains its full force. The letter is shown to be a hortatory writing of Peter's to a large group of Churches, who owed their Christianity to the preaching of Peter and other men from among the twelve apostles and the personal disciples of Jesus. From this it follows that the readers were, for the most part, if not altogether, Jewish Christians, and that they are to be sought in Palestine and the regions adjoining, but not in the regions north and north-west of Antioch; because until the death of Peter (64 A.D.; above, p. 161 f.) the agreement of the year 52 (Gal. ii. 7-9; cf. Matt. x. 23) was kept by all the missionaries, one of whom the writer indicates himself to have been (i. 1-4, 16-18). It was probably in Palestine and the adjoining regions that the preaching journeys of Peter and his companions, referred to by Paul in the year 57 (1 Cor. ix. 5), were made. The journey of Peter to Rome at the very end of his life, and the composition in Rome of his letter to the Gentile Christian Churches of Asia Minor (above, p. 158 ff.), did not make him a missionary to the Gentiles, and did not bring him into such a relation as that expressed in 2 Peter with any Church outside the "Land of Israel." In this entrance of Peter as an element in the life of the Gentile Christian Churches organised in Asia Minor by Gentile Christian missionaries, and as a factor in the development of the Roman Church, in the building of which Gentile Christian and Jewish Christian missionaries worked together, we have a foreshadowing—but only a foreshadowing—of the development which, at a date considerably later than the death of Peter and Paul, took men like John and Philip to Ephesus and Hierapolis.

There is no means of determining more definitely the geographical position of the readers. The use of the Greek language is no objection to the supposition that 2 Peter was intended for the whole circle to whom James also wrote in Greek. Nor does the use of the name "Simeon Petros" imply anything more (Acts xiii. 1, xv. 14, n. 9). The reference to a letter of Paul's to the same readers (iii. 15) does not help us, for the reason that this letter has not come down to us (above, p. 198 f.). It is very natural to suppose that during the two years of enforced idleness in Cæsarea (from 58–60 A.D.), when his arrest put an end to the exercise of all personal influence among them, Paul took occasion to send some written word to the multitudes of believing Jews (Acts xxi. 20), on whose behalf he had made his last journey to Jerusalem. Or it may have been a smaller group of Churches, mainly Jewish Christian, to which this lost letter of Paul's and 2 Peter were directed, e.g. the Churches in Ptolemais, Tyre, and Damascus, with which Paul was personally acquainted (Acts ix. 22–25, xx. 3–7; cf. xi. 19, xv. 3), and others in the regions indicated of whose history we know nothing.

The time at which 2 Peter purports to have been written can be more accurately determined than the location of the readers. Although it is not directly stated in i. 14 that Peter knows his death is near (n. 3), and although we do not know that this expectation was fulfilled, even if Peter entertained it, i. 12–15 does convey the general impression that it is an aged man who is speaking. In iii. 16 mention is made not only of a letter of Paul's to the readers of 2 Peter, but also of many other letters of his which had found some circulation and had been misunderstood. This could hardly have taken place before the year 60. Furthermore, the way in which the doubt as to the fulfilment of the prophecy concerning the end of the world is expressed (iii. 4; cf. § 42, n. 5), indicates the end of Peter's lifetime. The first generation of Christians is beginning to disappear. On the other hand, there is nothing to indicate that Peter had reached Rome, the goal of his life-journey. It is natural to suppose that, if Peter had recently come to the capital of the world for the first time in his life, he would indicate in some way his residence there, as he does in 1 Pet. v. 13. On the other hand, he is not in the immediate vicinity of his readers. He has written them previously, expects to do so soon again, and anticipates the sending of frequent letters (above, p. 198 f.). He shows familiarity with ecclesiastical conditions and movements outside the world of the readers; indeed, he shows familiarity with the same within the sphere of Gentile Christianity. We should probably be able to locate the place where the letter was written more exactly, if we knew from what point and by what route Peter went to Rome sometime in the autumn of 63. It is natural to think of Antioch. Taking everything into consideration, and assuming for the time being that 2 Peter is genuine, we may date it somewhere between 60 and 63. This makes it earlier than 1 Peter.

1. (P. 195.) In view of the character of what precedes and follows, the reference of iii. 1 f. to the entire Epistle yet unfinished—and in particular to the third section of the Epistle which begins at this point—is quite as certain as is the similar reference of ταῦτά σοι γράφω, 1 Tim. iii. 14 (see above, p. 39, n. 2); and here the ταῖτην . . . ἐπιστολήν makes the reference more definite than the ambiguous ταῦτα in 1 Tim. iii. 14. That this description is meant to apply equally to the first Epistle, to which reference is here made, is proved by the use of ἐν αἷς instead of ἐν ᾧ. The difficult expression τῆς τῶν ἀποστόλων ἱμῶν ἐντολῆς τοῦ κυρίου καὶ σωτῆρος undoubtedly means the same as that which in ii. 21 is described as the holy commandment handed down to the Christians, or the same as διδασχὴ κυρίου διὰ τῶν δώδεκα ἀποστόλων, the title of the so-called Didache. In form the expression finds a parallel in Acts v. 32, if the correct reading there be αἱ τοῦ μαρτυρεῖν τῶν ῥημάτων τούτων (cf. Winer, Gr. § 30. 3, A. 3 [Eng. trans. § 30. 3, A. 3]), as the present writer believes to be the case. The expression is a harsh one, but even titles such as Ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ Σωκράτους ἀπομνημονεύματα are quite as inelegant (GK, i. 475, A. 2). In fact, the harsher the words (τοῦ κυρίου καὶ σωτῆρος), the more arbitrary it is to strike them out as a gloss; while to derive them from Jude 17 (Spitta, 224), where they are not found, is altogether impossible. No mistake has been made in the transmission of the text of the passage, since the Syrians ["The commandment of our Lord and Saviour, which" (sc. was communicated) "through the apostles"] were able to get over the difficulty only by a free translation, while the impossible combination of ἐμὼν with κυρίου, which occurs here as in the Sahidic, Coptic, and Ethiopic versions, is not made less difficult by the reading ἡμὼν instead of ἐμὼν—a variant found only in a few cursives. In this connection it may be remarked that the historical investigation of 2 Pet. is rendered difficult, not only by the style, which is often obscure, but also by the text handed down, which is in an especially bad condition. Readings which could not have been invented and which are certainly original, such as the order of words in i. 17 preserved by B alone (below, n. 6), and passages which can hardly be understood without resort to conjecture, such as i. 20, will suffice as illustrations. Tischendorf's apparatus in ed. viii. has been enlarged and corrected since its appearance, especially by Le Palimpseste de Fleury, ed. Berger, 1887, p. 41 f., and by Gwynn's investigation of the ancient Syriac version, which was probably a part of the Philoxenian text, in Hermathena, vol. vii. 1890, pp. 281–314. This translation (called in Tischendorf, Syr. bodl.) is designated S² by the present writer (see list of abbreviations). One source of the corruption of the text was the comparison of readings in 2 Pet. with Jude. This, however, can be used to correct the text. Whether we hold 2 Pet. to be dependent upon Jude or the reverse, the one document is certainly a very ancient witness for the text of the other. If the correct reading in Jude 12 be ἀγάπαις, then it must be that Jude read ἀγάπαις in 2 Pet. ii. 13, and that this, therefore, is the correct reading in the latter passage; or, if 2 Pet. is dependent upon Jude, then it is hard to conceive how Peter could change the clear ἀγάπαις of Jude to ἀπάταις, which does not make as good sense. So in this case also the original reading in 2 Pet. ii. 13 seems to have been ἀγάπαις.

2. (P. 198.) Most modern interpreters take the letter of Paul's mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 15 to be Eph.—with especial positiveness Hofmann (vii. 2. 113 ff.). Grotius (p. 1060) and Dietlein (Der zweite Petrusbrief, 229–235) think that Rom. is meant; the elder Lightfoot (Opp. ii. 109, 116) and Bengel in his Gnomon think that the reference is to Hebrews. The last hypothesis would be impossible, even if 2 Pet. had been written at a time when Heb. had come to be regarded by part of the Church as an Epistle of Paul's; because a pseudo-Peter who undertook to compose an Epistle of Peter to the Ἑβραῖοι, to whom Paul had previously written Heb., could not have been content with a salutation, not a word of which refers clearly to the Ἑβραῖοι, nor would he have ventured in iii. 1 to lead the readers to suppose that 2 Pet. was meant for the same readers as 1 Pet. The credit for having broken radically with exegetical traditions regarding the letter of Paul mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 15, and the letter of Peter mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 1 belongs to Spitta (221–227, 286–288).

3. (Pp. 199, 209.) As to i. 12–15, μελλήσω with the present infinitive is hardly to be taken, as in Matt. xxiv. 6, or as μέλλω with the future infinitive (Acts xxiv. 15, xxvii. 10), as a mere periphrasis for the future; but is intended to express the thought that the writer will be ready in the future, as often as necessity arises, to recall to the minds of the readers truths with which they are familiar, as he has done in the past, and as he does now throughout this entire letter. Copyists and translators, who knew nothing of the fulfilment of the promise here made, found the expression too strong, and changed it in some instances to οὐ μellellhsw (in the sense of "I will not hesitate"—non differam, Palimps. Flor. and other Latin MSS), in other cases (the Antiochian recension and the Syriac versions) to οὐκ amellhsw. The only other thing to be noted with regard to the variant readings is the fact that in ver. 15, besides X, the Armenian version and one cursive also S² read σπουδάσω (see Gwynn, op. cit. 291). But this is an intentional alteration, designed to make it possible to connect the sentence with the letter which Peter was writing at the time. Even the σπουδάσατε of S³ and a few cursives, if taken as an aorist used in the graphic sense, tends, on the one hand, to confirm the reading σπουδάσω against σπουδάω, and, on the other hand, shows, as does also the latter reading, that copyists and translators could not bring themselves to read here again a promise of Peter's which he seemed not to have fulfilled. What Peter says about his future literary plans is conceived altogether in the light of the end of his life. He refers to it three times in vv. 13, 14, 15. Only in ver. 14 is there a definite view expressed regarding its manner or time. His knowledge concerning his death, while not based exclusively upon a revelation of Christ, is due in part to this; since it is inadmissible to take the καί here as the pleonastic καί which is common with particles of comparison (so Hofmann, Spitta), for καθώς does not here introduce a comparison, but a determining authority. With regard to the question what or what kind of a revelation is meant, it is to be observed: (1) That Peter refers to this revelation of Christ quite incidentally, and only in order to confirm an expectation certain on other grounds. In view of the fact that Peter was one of the missionaries who preached the gospel to the readers, and that there had been frequent intercourse between him and them, it is not likely that the readers were wholly unfamiliar with it, so that the reference is not to a communication from Christ which Peter had recently received. How great an interest these Christians who were intimately acquainted with Peter must have had in learning from him that the Lord had recently appeared to him in a vision, and made known to him that he was to die quickly, or soon, or suddenly! As a matter of fact, however, the simple expression used, ἐδήλωσέν μοι, does not indicate any such wonderful revelation. (2) Taken alone, ταχινός, like ταχύς, does not mean either "soon" or "sudden," but "quick," "rapid." It may mean (a) the speedy termination of an action (John xx. 4; Jas. i. 19), and, taken in that sense here it would designate a quick death as contrasted with a death following long sickness. Since, however, the whole future may be conceived as something coming, approaching the subject, and since the rapid completion of this conceived movement involves the early appearance of the coming event, (b) the adverbial expressions ταχίως, τάχιον, τάχιστα, ταχύ, ἐν τάχει, especially when used with futures and imperatives, frequently mean "soon, without delay" (cf. Luke xvi. 6, xviii. 2; Matt. v. 25; 1 Cor. iv. 19; Phil. ii. 19, 24; 1 Tim. iii. 14; Heb. xiii. 19, 23). In all these cases the thing signified is not the quick termination of the action itself, writing, journeying, etc., but the immediate happening of the event in question. But (c) the approach of the future so conceived can itself be represented as a slow or rapid process, according as the future event is thought of as approaching gradually, or as coming without perceptible preparation and warning, like a bolt of lightning. So we get the meaning "sudden"; cf. Rev. ii. 16 (= iii. 3; 1 Thess. v. 2-4; 2 Pet. iii. 10) also Gal. i. 6; 2 Thess. ii. 2. It is in this sense that we say in the Litany, "Deliver us from evil and sudden death." The first meaning (a) "quick" is not applicable here; for, no matter whether he expects to die and be taken from his work by a death struggle lasting only a few minutes, or only after years of illness, this can hardly have any important influence upon his valuation and use of the time remaining until he is called upon to meet this quick or gradual death. The second meaning (b) "soon" suits better; since the consciousness that only a short span of life remains, may make one zealous in the performance of his calling, and remind him of the necessity of providing for the time after his death. Cf. Ep. Clem. ad Jac. ii. (Clementina, ed. Lagarde, p. 6). Against this interpretation there are the following objections: (1) This certain knowledge that he was soon to die Peter could have obtained only through a revelation from Christ made to him recently, unless recourse is had to the improbable supposition that Christ had told him long before just how many years he was to live. In neither of these cases could he refer as incidentally as he does to this revelation of Christ as something with which the readers are already familiar. (2) The use of the adjectives ταχύς and ταχινός in this sense is certainly rare. ταχύς καρπός, Clem. 2 Cor. xx. 2, cited by Spitta (87), is not a clear illustration of this usage. (3) ταχινὴ ἀπώλεια (2 Pet. ii. 1), with which it is most natural to compare this passage, is manifestly used in the third sense (c) "sudden," meaning a destruction coming unexpectedly—unprepared for by sinners (cf. 1 Thess. v. 3; Luke xvii. 27, xxi. 35; Mark xiii. 35; Matt. xxiv. 37-xxv. 13). It is not a catastrophe coming soon, since there was no point of time from which this event could be reckoned. Good illustrations of this usage are the examples cited by Hofmann (vii. 2. 29) from Thucyd. iv. 55. 1, πόλεμος ταχύς καὶ ἀπροφύλακτος, and Eurip. Hipp. 1044, ταχὺς ἄδης ("sudden death"). Anyone knowing and pondering the fact that he is to die a sudden death, will not in any given instance put off what he regards as his duty until another day which seems to him better adapted for its performance or which is more convenient; rather, not knowing whether he may claim the next day as his, he will always be ready to do what the present day demands. But it was just this which Peter promised in ver. 12 with regard to the instruction of the readers during the remainder of his life. We have seen how the certainty with which Peter expected a sudden death is based only in part upon the revelation of Christ to him, or, to speak more accurately, how he finds this knowledge to be in harmony with the revelation of Christ, from which it is to be inferred that he believed this to be certain quite apart from the revelation, which is practically the same conviction Paul had as to the martyr's death he was to die (see vol. i. p. 546 f.). Furthermore, it is not to be assumed that Christ had said to Peter in so many words what he here gives as his own conviction. In this case his conviction would rest entirely upon the words of Christ, and nothing could be said of Peter's independent knowledge about the same thing. There is nothing, therefore, which prevents our taking the words of Jesus preserved in John xiii. 36 and xxi. 18 f. as the foundation of 2 Pet. i. 14. The former saying contains no clear statement as to the manner of Peter's death, but, in the light of later reflection upon it, Peter could say that it did mean something more than that he was to die at some future time like other men, and, like all other disciples, through death to come into the presence of Jesus in heaven. If he came to feel that he was to die suddenly, then this word of Jesus must have been confirmation of the feeling; it could hardly mean to him anything else than that he, like Jesus, was to die a violent death. While it is true that sudden death is not always violent death, violent death, murder, or execution is always a sudden death, and stands in contrast to death which approaches gradually through sickness or old age. The other saying of Jesus, John xxi. 18, does convey primarily the idea that Peter, who is now young and impetuous, will become a helpless old man. But with this is connected the other thought that in his old age he shall fall into the hands of hostile men. The narrator of the story in John xxi. 19 takes the entire saying as a prophecy of Peter's martyrdom, and, in one feature of the picture (ἐκτενείς τὰς χεῖράς σου), he finds a reference to the definite manner of his death, namely, crucifixion. If this interpretation, like other interpretations of obscure prophetic utterances of Jesus (cf. John ii. 22, vii. 39, xii. 33), was not made until after the prophecy was fulfilled,—i.e. until after Peter's crucifixion,—it does not follow that Peter and the others who heard Jesus say this word had no thoughts about the prophecy. The reference to violence which he was to suffer at the end of his life (ἄλλος ζώσει σε καὶ οἴσει ὅπου οὐ θέλεις) was sufficient to enable Peter to say that his premonition of a violent death was confirmed by the Lord Himself, and at the same time to regard it as a second saying of this character (cf. John xiii. 36). Peter does not quote the word spoken by Christ to him, but says that his expectation is in accordance with a saying of Jesus. He describes the laying aside of his earthly tabernacle as sudden rather than violent, because the latter thought is appropriate in this context only as it is involved in the former. On the other hand, the language of Peter is extremely unnatural if the reference is to the legends already mentioned (see above, p. 168 f.). The saying of Jesus, ἄνωθεν μίλλω σταυροῦσθαι, quoted by Origen (tom. xx. 12 in Jo.) from the Acts of Paul, does not appear in this place to have reference to Peter at all; and, according to Origen's interpretation, it does not refer to the physical crucifixion of a disciple. In the Gnostic Acts of Peter, however, this saying is made to refer to the crucifixion of Peter in Rome—and that in the double sense in which ἄνωθεν may be used ("again" and "from above"). In the crucifixion of Peter, Christ experienced His own crucifixion again; Peter was crucified head downwards (ed. Lipsius, 88, 92 f.; GK, ii. 846, 853, A. 3, 878 f.). Reference to this blunt μῦθος σεσοφισμένος is not in harmony with the delicate and modest recalling of the saying of Jesus in 2 Pet. i. 14. If this legend is based upon a saying of Jesus—specifically of the risen Jesus—preserved in the more original form in the Acts of Paul (GK, ii. 879), in the first place it is, to say the least, extremely doubtful whether it refers to Peter. But if it does, and describes his future crucifixion, then, from the critical point of view, it can be regarded only as a fanciful development of John xxi. 18 f. Whereas the canonical account distinguishes between the mysterious saying of Jesus and the interpretation of the same made in the light of the event, this fanciful story, and the later tale of the Acts of Peter, put into the mouth of Jesus Himself a prophecy exactly suited to the subsequent events. However, it is not with a fable like this that 2 Pet. i. 14 shows affinity, but with the words of Jesus preserved in John xiii. 36, xxi. 18.

4. (P. 200.) With what has been said above, p. 199 f., cf. 2 Thess. ii. 15 ; 2 Cor. x. 10, xiii. 10 ; Phil. i. 27 ; Polyc. ad Phil. iii. 2.

5. (Pp. 200, 201.) Michaelis (Bibl. 1056), Schwegler, and others compare μετὰ τὴν ἐμὴν ἔξοδον, i. 15, with Iren. iii. 1. 1 : μετὰ δὲ τὴν τούτων (i.e. of Peter and Paul) ἔξοδον Μάρκος τὰ ὑπὸ Πέτρον κηρυσσόμενα ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν παραδέδωκεν. See also § 49. Inasmuch as the death of Peter is clearly spoken of in ver. 14, ἔξοδος in ver. 15 can be understood only as referring to him ; cf. Luke ix. 31 ; Heb. xiii. 7 ; Acta Jo. (ed. Bonnet, p. 184. 9), probably also Hermas, Vis. iii. 4. 3. Nor is Irenæus' meaning different in the passage cited. The strong emphasis of τὴν ἐμὴν ἔξ., used instead of τὴν ἔξ. μου, is to be noticed. After Peter dies others will teach and write ; but he desires that after his death it shall still be his voice that exhorts the readers.

6. (P. 201, 204.) With regard to i. 16 ff., it is to be borne in mind first of all that γνωρίζειν τινί τι means, "To make known to one something that he has not known before." This is its meaning even in 1 Cor. xv. 1, where, not without irony, Paul uses a certain contradictio in adjecto. Also in 1 Cor. xii. 3 and Gal. i. 11, truths and facts with which the readers could not have been wholly unacquainted are intentionally spoken of as if they were entirely unknown. The expression has the force of an emphatic οὐ θέλω ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν or ἢ οὐκ οἴδατε. Furthermore, although παρουσία, like ἐπιφάνεια (see above, p. 133), can be used of the first as well as of the second coming of Christ (cf. Luke xii. 51 ; Heb. ix. 11), here, in accordance with the uniform usage of the N.T. (Matt. xxiv. 3, 27, 37, 39 ; 1 Cor. xv. 23 ; 1 Thess. ii. 19, iii. 13, iv. 15, v. 23 ; 2 Thess. ii. 1, 8 ; Jas. v. 7 f. ; 1 John ii. 28 ; cf. also 2 Pet. iii. 4, 12), it can refer only to the second coming, especially in view of the fact that otherwise it would have to precede δύναμις. But the interpretation of δύναμις as meaning the power manifested by Jesus while still upon the earth, is in keeping not only with the usage of the Gospels and of Acts in describing the miraculous work of Christ (Mark v. 30, vi. 2, 14, ix. 23 ; Luke iv. 14, 36, v. 17, xxiv. 19 ; Acts ii. 22, x. 38), but also with the usage of 2 Pet. itself (i. 3 ; see n. 10). There is no reason, however, why the conception should be limited to this power, and that power excluded which was shown by Jesus as He passed through death and resurrection to heavenly glory, which also will be fully manifested at His coming. It is just as arbitrary to limit ἐπόπται γενηθέντες τῆς ἐκείνου μεγαλειότητος either to the transfiguration upon the mountain, which is not mentioned until ver. 17, and then only in order to illustrate and confirm what has just been said (still advocated by Spitta, 97), or to the appearances of the risen Christ (as Hofmann, vii. 2. 33). There is nothing in the expression itself which would limit it in this way ; since Jesus' own μεγαλειότης comes to view, not only in these particular events, but in everything in which a θεία δύναμις of Jesus (i. 3) was expressed, or His ἰδία δόξα (i. 3) became manifest to those of His contemporaries who believed during His earthly life (John i. 14, ii. 11 ; cf. 2 Cor. iv. 6), in all those μεγαλεῖα τοῦ θεοῦ (Acts ii. 11) in which in and through Jesus God showed His μεγαλειότης (Luke ix. 43),—just as the glorification of God through Jesus is at the same time a glorification of Jesus (John xi. 4, 40, xii. 28, xiii. 31, xvii. 4, 10). The transfiguration upon the mountain and the appearances of the risen Christ are a part of these experiences of Peter and his fellow-disciples ; but only when what they witnessed is conceived of in the entirely general sense implied by the absence of every specification, does the term serve as an adequate contrast to μῦθοι σεσοφισμένοι, and a suitable description of those experiences on which the preaching of the apostles was based. Nor does the ἐκείνου necessarily refer to one "beyond us," i.e. to the exalted Christ (Hofmann), but applies equally well to Him who lived once here upon the earth (1 John ii. 6, iii. 5, 16), but now can be no more seen even by His own. In this rests the peculiar significance of those preachers of the gospel who, by reason of the fact that they saw and heard what Jesus did and said in His earthly life, were able to declare what had happened as well as what was to take place in the future (John i. 14; 1 John i. 1 f., iv. 14; Acts x. 39-41). The interpretation of i. 17 f. is rendered difficult, but not made impossible, by the anacoluthon. If, as is certainly the case, vv. 17b, 18 refer to the event described in Matt. xvii. 1-13, Mark ix. 2-13, Luke ix. 28-36, λαβὼν παρὰ θεοῦ πατὸς τιμὴν καὶ δόξαν cannot be taken in the sense in which Hofmann takes it, as referring to the glorification of Jesus completed at His resurrection (cf. 1 Pet. i. 21; John vii. 39, xiii. 32); for then there is no intelligible connection between this final glorification and the heavenly voice at the Transfiguration. Nor does the honour and glory received consist of the voice from heaven, which thought would necessarily be expressed by φερομένης, in the sense of an imperfect participle, instead of ἐνεχθείσης. The only other meaning possible is the visible glorification of Jesus in the scene upon the mountain. The dazzling light, by which the disciples saw the countenance and garments of Jesus illumined, can be called glory and honour which Jesus received at that moment from the Father (cf. Luke ix. 39, εἶδον τὴν δόξαν αὐτοῦ), with just as much appropriateness as the saying in Ps. viii. 6 about the crowning of mankind with δόξα καὶ τιμὴ can be applied in Heb. ii. 9 (cf. iii. 3, v. 4 f.) to the earthly life of Jesus while He had death yet before Him. Spitta's opinion (104, 496), that Peter, in contradiction to the Gospels, conceived the voice from heaven as preceding the visible transfiguration, cannot be justified from the text; for even if the words be translated, "After a voice sounded," it is by no means certain that the genitive absolute is dependent upon the participle λαβὼν. It is rather like λαβὼν, dependent upon the principal clause of the sentence, which is left unexpressed. The latter is the more probable construction, for otherwise ἐνεχθείσης would certainly precede λαβὼν (cf. Heb. ix. 19). Furthermore, in the description of similar events, such as the appearance of the angels to the shepherds, the baptism of Jesus, the conversion of Paul, the visible phenomenon always precedes the audible. Why not here, as in the Gospels, without making Peter contradict these accounts? Nor does the present writer agree with Spitta when he claims that "it is possible to determine with entire certainty" (Spitta, 106) the originally intended continuation of the sentence beginning with ver. 17, though he regards it as quite possible that Peter did intend to say practically what is found in ver. 18 without breaking the construction of the preceding verse. Possibly he meant to write διελύθη ἡμῖν περὶ τῆς παρουσίας αὐτοῦ, which is not expressly stated in the Gospels, but quite in harmony with Matt. xvii. 10-13; Mark ix. 11-13; cf. Matt. xvi. 28; Mark ix. 1; Luke ix. 27; or he may have meant to write διατάλατο (ἐνετάλατο) ἡμῖν, ὥα μετὰ τὴν ἀνάστασιν αὐτοῦ πᾶσι γνωρίσωμεν τὴν δυνάμιν καὶ τὴν παρουσίαν αὐτοῦ, which might be suggested by Matt. xvii. 9; Mark ix. 9 f.;

Luke ix. 36. These conclusions of the sentence agree better with the contents of ver. 16 than do ἡμᾶς εἶχε σὺν αὐτῷ ὄντας ἐν τῷ ὄρει τῷ ἁγίῳ (Spitta) and other similar expressions, which, moreover, leave the break in the construction unexplained. On the other hand, it is perfectly conceivable that, having expressed with vivid realisation in an independent sentence (ver. 18) the important circumstance that he and his companions themselves had heard the voice and been witnesses of the whole scene, Peter might leave the intended principal clause of the sentence unexpressed. Whatever the grammatical form of the intended principal clause, the clause itself was not necessary in order to complete the sense; for the thing of chief importance—corresponding to the ἐπὶσπται γενηθέντες of ver. 16, which is the chief point to be established—Peter has already expressed. In fact, neither this nor any other passage in 2 Pet. can be shown to contradict the view of the events on the mountain, given in the Gospels. In Matt. xvii. 5, Mark ix. 7, Luke ix. 35, it is said that the voice sounded from the cloud which afterwards overshadowed the scene; in 2 Pet. it is said that it came from heaven; but these two passages are related in the same way as the narrative in Acts i. 9 is related to the reminiscence of the same in Acts ii. 34. In the Gospel passages the fact that it is God who speaks appears only from the contents of the call; in 2 Pet., on the other hand, God is also expressly called the “majestic glory,” i.e. God in His majesty is declared to be the efficient cause of this revelation; but this would not imply a contradiction, even if the thought were here expressed that God in this phenomenon of brightness, μεφελὴ φωτεινὴ (Matt. xvii. 5), became visible (cf. Ex. xiii. 21, xiv. 24, xvi. 10, xxiv. 16). But there is no ground for even this assumption. The attribute μεγαλοπρεπής can be used with reference to the audible voice itself (Ps. xxix. 4), and the μεγαλοπρέπεια of God (Ps. cxlv. 5, cxi. 3; Clem. 1 Cor. lx. 1, lxi. 1) or of His name (2 Macc. viii. 15; Clem. 1 Cor. lxiv; cf. ix. 1, xix. 2, xlv. 7), also His δόξα (Rom. i. 23, vi. 4), or even the μεγαλοπρεπής δόξα (Clem. 1 Cor. ix. 2), are spoken of where there is no reference whatever to physical perceptibility. Further comparison with the Gospels brings out clearly the fact that the presentation by Peter is an independent one. Thus (1) the most interesting and remarkable features are omitted by Peter, e.g. the appearance of Moses and Elias, although, in view of the purpose expressed—to speak of the word of the prophets (i. 19 f.)—it was most natural to recall just these things. (2) The language of the heavenly call differs from the account given in all three of the synoptics in the following particulars:—(a) The omission of αὐτοῦ ἀκούετε at the close; (b) the insertion of εἰς ὃν ἐγὼ εὐδόκησα, the only parallel to which is the ἐν ᾧ εὐδόκησα of Matt. xvii. 5; the ἐγὼ of Peter is not found in any of the parallels (Matt. iii. 17, xii. 18, xvii. 5; Mark i. 11; Luke iii. 22); (c) most unparalleled of all is the order of words, ὁ υἱὸς μου ὁ ἀγαπητός μου οὗτός ἐστιν, witnessed only by Cod. B, but rightly adopted by Westcott-Hort. The ταῖσδε (not ταύτης) is apparently designed to indicate that Peter does not claim absolute accuracy in his reproduction of the words spoken from heaven. (3) The twice-repeated φωνὴ ἠνεχθείσα, vv. 17, 18, seems to presuppose a φωνὴ ἠνέχθη in the underlying narrative, which, however, is not found in any of the Gospels (but cf. Acts ii. 2). (4) The fact that the place where the Transfiguration took place is here called τὸ ὄρος τὸ ἄγιον, but is not so designated in the Gospels, is explained by the fact that this mountain was not in itself holy, but was made a holy mountain for Christians by the knowledge of what Jesus, in company with His most trusted disciples, experienced there. Consequently in the narrative, in which the point of view is before the event, it is called a high mountain (Matt., Mark), or a (neighbouring) mountain (Luke), but in the retrospect of the eye-witness it becomes the holy mountain. If, on the other hand, Peter meant to refer to a mountain which was already venerated by the readers as a holy place, and even visited by pilgrims, he would not have failed to mention it by name, or in some other way to indicate its geographical location; for if at the time when 2 Pet. was written there was any holy mountain so venerated by Christians, there were other mountains—e.g. the Mount of Olives, from which the ascension took place—that had at least as much claim to this designation as the mount of transfiguration. But the term which Peter chooses, taken out of its connection, is far more applicable to Zion (Ps. ii. 6, iii. 5; Joel iv. 17; Zech. viii. 3; Dan. ix. 16-20; Acts vi. 13; Rev. xiv. 1), or Sinai (Ex. xix. 3; 1 Kings xix. 8) than to any mountain in Galilee. The expression, therefore, is not due to the fame of the locality already established and expressed by use of the common name "The holy mountain," but grows out of associations of the event recalled. It is also to be observed that there is no ancient local tradition with regard to the place of the transfiguration. The tradition which makes Tabor the scene of this event is no older than that which places the temptation of Jesus upon the same mountain, and both traditions grew out of the almost identical designation of a mountain in Matt. iv. 8 and xvii. 2 (GK, ii. 690 f.). In the Gnostic Acts of Peter (ed. Lipsius, 67. 10), Peter speaks as follows in connection with a lesson just read from the book of the gospel (perhaps Mark ix. 2-13): "Nunc quod vobis lectum est, jam vobis exponam. Dominus noster volens me majestatem suam videre in monte sancto, videns autem luminis splendorem eius cum filiis Zebedæi, cecidi tamquam mortuus et oculos meos conclusi et vocem eius audivi talem, qualem referre non possum, qui me putavi exorbatum ab splendore eius; et pusillum respirans dixi intra me: 'Forsitan dominus meus voluit me hic adducere, ut me orbaret.' Et dixi: 'Et hæc tua voluntas est, non contradico, domine.' Et dans mihi manum elevavit me, et exurgens iterum talem eum vidi, qualem capere potui." The words majestatem (cf. Palimps. Flor. 2 Pet. i. 17, de magnifica majestate, Vulg. a magnifica gloria) and in monte sancto, perhaps also vocem talem, are taken from 2 Pet. i. 17 f. In the Acts of John also (ed. Bonnet, p. 195. 8-11) the event is described briefly, in order to connect with it a related story purely fictitious in character.

7. (P. 205.) For the impersonal designation of the apostles by one who belonged to the apostolic body (iii. 2), cf. Eph. iv. 11; 1 Cor. xii. 28; vol. i. p. 506 f. Every preacher or teacher is apt occasionally to say to his hearers or pupils, "Your preachers or teachers," without prefacing it with a "we." The aged preacher in Clem. 2 Cor. xvii. 3, 5, goes so far even as to employ a "we," including himself and listeners, and then to contrast the two together with the presbyters who preached to his hearers, although he himself is now preaching to them. :

8. (P. 206.) The interpretation of πίστιν ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ κτλ., i. 1, to mean "Faith in the righteousness," etc., which led to the change of the reading in 8 to εἰς δικαιοσύνην, is to be rejected for the following reasons:

(1) Such a description of the essential element in Christian faith is unparalleled, and there is nothing in the rest of the letter that would occasion such a description here. (2) δικαιοσύνη is without the article which would necessarily be used, if the reference were to a righteousness of Christ upon which the Christian based his hope of salvation. Moreover, such a righteousness would be more properly described as that of the man Jesus, than as the righteousness of "our God and Saviour." (3) There is a question about this construction of πίστις in all the N.T. passages where it is supposed to exist (Gal. iii. 26; Eph. i. 15; 2 Tim. iii. 15; cf. 1 Tim. i. 14; 2 Tim. i. 13). ἐν δικαιοσύνῃ is therefore to be taken with λαχοῦσιν. The assignment of human destinies has been made in righteousness (cf. Tit. iii. 5; Acts xvii. 31; Rev. xix. 11), and it is due to the righteous act of the Lord that those converted by the apostolic preaching, who have not seen nor heard Him, have come into the possession of a Christianity of no less value than that of the original disciples (cf. Cat., ed. Cramer, 85), εἰς τὸ ἴσον αὐτοῖς τοῖς ἀποστόλοις ἀναφέρων χάρισμα.

9. (Pp. 206, 209.) With regard to the use of Συμεὼν instead of Σίμων, see vol. i. p. 29 f. Leaving out of account the thoroughly Jewish character of the name, the use of this original name along with Πέτρος proves that the writer did not intend his letter for the same group of readers for whom the greeting in 1 Pet. i. 1 was meant. The Concordance shows how uncommon outside of Palestine was the use of Simon or Simeon to designate the apostle Peter, whether used in place of the latter name or along with it. Paul calls him only Peter, or, what is the same thing, Cephas, which corresponds to Peter's own usage in 1 Pet. i. 1 (above, p. 155). Mark calls him Simon until he is given a surname in iii. 16; from that point on only Peter is found in the narrative, which is all the more striking because Mark does not conceal the fact that Jesus called him Simon to the end (xiv. 37, λέγει τῷ Πέτρῳ Σίμων). Luke also calls him regularly Simon until he is given another name (vi. 14); then he uses just as regularly Peter in both books, even when he is addressed by Jesus, Luke xxii. 34 (alongside of Σίμων, xxii. 31; cf. Mark xiv. 37); Acts x. 13; although he lets us know that he was generally called Simon (Luke xxiv. 34), or Symeon (Acts xv. 14), by his companions in Jerusalem. Simon Peter occurs only once (Luke v. 8); "Simon with the surname Peter" is used in the Cornelius passages where Peter is thought of as being at a distance (Acts x. 5, 18, 32, xi. 13), though the simple designation Peter is found in the same narrative (fourteen times in the passage Acts x. 1–xi. 18, fifty-two times altogether in Acts). In John, Simon alone occurs only in i. 41, Simon son of John in i. 42, xxi. 15–17; from i. 40 on, Simon Peter is used seventeen times, from xiii. 8 on it is used interchangeably with Peter fifteen times. Except in address (xvii. 25, Simon; xvi. 17, Simon Barjona), Matthew never uses Simon; Simon with the surname Peter occurs only in the call and in the list of the apostles (iv. 18, x. 2), and on one other solemn occasion (xvi. 16); in all other cases Peter is used, occurring some twenty times. There is no means of determining whether the person who translated this Gospel into Greek found uniformly in his original Kēpha, or in passages where he found Simon replaced it by Peter, which was more familiar to his Greek readers. With regard to the interchange of the Aramaic Kēpha and the Greek Πέτρος, it may be said that the latter once adopted as the translation was more natural to the Greek language. Just as Syrian translators and theological writers always wrote Kepha, so the N.T. writers used regularly Πέτρος. The former is found only once in the Gospels, John i. 42, where the writer, following an inclination which he often manifests, retains the original words of the saying which he is reproducing. All the cases where Paul writes Kepha are explained by the reference which he has to the "Hebrews," who, with appeals to the authority of Peter, were meddling with his affairs in Galatia and Corinth (above, p. 155, n. 8).

10. (P. 194, 207.) The present writer regards it as certain that ver. 3 f. follows ver. 2 without any break in the grammatical construction, as held by Lachmann and by Spitta (27 f.), who has proved this to be the case particularly by a correct interpretation of Ign. Eph. i., Rom. i., Smyrn. i., Philad. i., correcting fundamentally the writer's edition. He also holds that in ver. 2 τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ Ἰησοῦ and similar words are to be omitted before τοῦ κ. ἡ. and τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν, read with P, Vulg. (in the best MSS.), to which S², S³, Aug. Specul. pp. 606, 16, 630, 1, and some cursives add simply Ἰησοῦ Χρ. The same theme is dealt with here as in i. 8, ii. 20, iii. 18, namely, the knowledge of Christ. Therefore it is Christ who is referred to in i. 3. It is commonly held that in the N.T. only God, never Christ, is described as calling men; but that this claim is erroneous is evidenced not alone by Gal. i. 6 and 1 Pet. ii. 9, regarding which there may be difference of opinion, but by the expression κλητοὶ Ἰησοῦ Χρ., Rom. i. 6, and passages like Matt. ix. 13; Mark ii. 17; Luke v. 32. So also the expression κλητὸς ἀπόστολος Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. i. 1, represents Christ as calling His disciples as well as sending them (1 Cor. i. 17), cf. ZKom. Gal. 43 f. If ver. 3 f. is thus closely connected with ver. 1 f. the ἡμᾶς (and ἡμῖν) of ver. 3 cannot be taken other than as ἡμῖν, ver. 1, namely, as referring to the apostles and personal disciples of Jesus, as distinguished from the Christians who were not called until they were called through their preaching. This distinction is also expressly made in ver. 3. Whereas God or Christ calls all other Christians through the preachers of the gospel, He called the apostles by the manifestation of (His) own glory and virtue. It was particularly natural for an apostle, whom Jesus Himself in the most literal sense of the word had called (Matt. iv. 19–22; Mark i. 17, 20, ἐκάλεσεν αὐτοὺς; Matt. viii. 22, ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 10 f., 27, ix. 57–62; John i. 39, 43), to speak of Jesus as the one who called men, and to emphasise the fact that Jesus had called him and his companions directly through His own personal act, through the demonstration of His own glory and moral power, in contrast to the fact that all other Christians owed their call to the preaching of weak men, even that of Peter himself (i. 16). The words δόξα καὶ ἀρετή are intended to suggest the evidences of miraculous knowledge and power, which Jesus had shown at the time of these calls (John i. 42, 47–51; Luke v. 4), and the impression of His moral greatness (Luke v. 8; John i. 49), which rendered impossible or overcame any resistance on the part of the one who was called. Especially in the first word we have expressed the same view of Jesus, as He lived in intercourse with His disciples upon earth, that is found in i. 16 (above, p. 215) and in the words immediately preceding in ver. 3, τῆς θείας ἐνανθρωπείας αὐτοῦ; for it may be regarded as certain that the reference in these expressions is to the supernatural power which dwelt in the man Jesus, and not to the power of God as the Creator and Ruler of the universe—particularly in view of the fact that in ver. 1 Jesus is called our God and Saviour, and of the fact that, according to the more probable reading, God the Father is not mentioned at all in ver. 2. The same Jesus who personally called the apostles, by reason of His own divine power and through the knowledge of Himself, to which He led them, also bestowed upon them all true blessings (τὰ πάντα, SA; cf. Rom. viii. 32), especially the things necessary for the true life and pious conduct (Matt. xi. 25-30, xiii. 11-17, xvi. 16-19; Luke xxii. 28-35; John vi. 68 f.). It is this personal experience (cf. John i. 16, xvii. 2 f., 6-18) from which the apostle derives the authority and the courage to express the wish for the readers in ver. 2. To this he comes back in ver. 4. With regard to variant readings, which are numerous, those affecting the order of the words are not of any great importance; for even if ὑμῖν (or ἐμῖν) belongs between τίμια and καὶ μέγιστα, it must be taken with δεδωρηται (having here also the force of a middle—"He hath bestowed"). ἐμῖν does not have very strong MS. authority (AS², cursive 68), but the following may be said in its favour: (1) in the use of the N.T. Epistles in public worship, ἐμείς, which excluded the reader and preacher, was much more easily and frequently changed to ἡμεῖς, or entirely left out, than the reverse (cf. iii. 2); (2) the sudden transition to an address to the readers in ver. 4b without the insertion of a καὶ ὑμεῖς is intolerable, unless in 4a the readers are already clearly contrasted with the ἡμῖν, ἡμᾶς of ver. 3, through the use of ἐμῖν. Moreover, δὲ ὧν does not refer back to δυνάμει καὶ ἀρετῇ, which would require δὲ ἧς; still less does it refer to πάντα, which is far removed from the relative; but it does refer to ἡμᾶς, i.e. the apostles. Christ called the apostles in person, through whom, i.e. through whose preaching, He had bestowed upon the readers precious and very great promises.

§ 42. THE OCCASION OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF PETER.

From i. 12-14 alone the impression might be gained that the only purpose which the writer had in this letter was to exhort now from a distance the readers to whom he had once preached the gospel, by sending them a letter intended to take the place of the oral instructions he would not fail to give them were he living among them. This he promises also to do occasionally in the future. That he had a more definite purpose than this, however, is evidenced, first of all, by the fact that the encouragement of the readers to a well-rounded moral life on the basis of their Christian faith (i. 5) and knowledge (i. 8, 12; cf. i. 2, iii. 18) is so variously reinforced by the prospect of the completion of their salvation. Even in the restatement of the apostolic preaching the fact is strongly emphasised that in this preaching the return of Christ was made known to the readers (i. 16), and that the Lord had bestowed upon them through His disciples great and precious promises (i. 4; above, p. 220). The purpose of this revelation of the gospel is declared to be that the readers may become partakers of the divine nature in the future world, in contrast to the destruction which follows the indulgence of pleasure in this world (i. 4). In view of this glorious prospect, they are to spare neither pains nor sacrifice to make their faith and knowledge fruitful in the exhibition of all Christian virtues, in order that finally they may experience in rich measure God's generous kindness in that great day when it is decided whether entrance is to be had into the eternal kingdom of Christ, or destruction with the world and its pleasures (i. 5-11). Reference is made to this day again in i. 19, and the readers are exhorted to give heed, until this day comes, to the word of the O.T. prophets, which the self-revelation of Jesus has only served to make more trustworthy for the apostles and all Christians, and which has lost none of its usefulness. The same combination of the thought of moral obligation and the expectation of the end of the world meets us again in iii. 2, where the words of the prophets are connected with the commandment of Jesus handed down through the apostles, and is found also throughout iii. 10-18 (above, p. 196).

There is also a polemical note to be observed in both chap. i. and chap. iii. The moral requirements of i. 5-8 are reinforced by the warning reference to those with whom these Christian virtues are not to be found, and concerning whom it must be denied that they have the Christian knowledge; since by their conduct they show that they have forgotten the purification from their former sins which they experienced in baptism (i. 9, n. 1). These terrible examples do not seem to have belonged to the circle of the readers; for although the readers are exhorted to growth in virtuous living (i. 8, iii. 18; cf. i. 2) and to zeal in their own sanctification (i. 10), yet the fact that they are addressed as brothers in this particular passage and nowhere else in the letter, the even more fervent ἀγαπητοί of iii. 1, 8, 14, 17, and the whole of the remainder of the Epistle, make it evident that Peter had a good opinion of them and full confidence in them. They not only possess and know the truth, but they stand fast in it (i. 12; cf. iii. 17). But among those who confess Christianity there are persons who have learned nothing, who are not firm in the truth, and who thus easily become the prey of error and seduction (iii. 16; cf. ii. 14). And these persons who lack the Christian virtues, and are therefore immoral in character, are not only evil examples to the readers (i. 9), but also a threatening danger, against whom the readers must be warned beforehand, in order that they may not be led astray by them and so fall from their own established position (iii. 17).

A third thing to be noticed is the apologetic tone in the restatement of the apostolic preaching in i. 16–18. This must be explained as due to opposition, either to a depreciatory judgment of the apostolic preaching, or to other teachers who actually followed invented stories, and did not, like the disciples of Jesus, speak of the things of Christianity from their own personal knowledge of Jesus' self-revelation. The latter view is favoured by the emphatic way in which Peter says of himself and his companions, that they are the persons who have heard with their own ears the heavenly testimony concerning Jesus (i. 18, ἡμεῖς, omitted in i. 16); the former view is supported by the emphasis with which he assures the readers that he and his fellow-apostles were called by Jesus Himself (i. 3; above, p. 220).

Thus, in brief, almost every one of the more noticeable statements of chap. i. points forward to the contents of chap. ii. and chap. iii., and gets its full meaning in the light of these chapters. It is here that the occasion of the letter first comes clearly to view. After the mention of the O.T. prophets in i. 19-21, Peter goes on to say in ii. 1-3 that, just as in Israel the true prophets opposed those who wrongly claimed this name, so also among the readers, teachers will appear who do not deserve the name,—teachers who will smuggle in destructive heresies, find numerous followers, and covetously, by means of cunningly invented words, get gain at the expense of the Churches to which the letter is addressed (n. 2). The comparison with the false prophets of the O.T. does not imply that the persons in question claimed to be prophets; but just as the false prophets in the O.T. were resisted by the true prophets, so in N.T. times the divinely commissioned teachers of the Church, that is to say, the apostles, oppose those who set themselves up as teachers, and affect the teachers' appearance and name—an opposition which we saw appearing earlier in i. 16-18 (see above). Just as the O.T. prophets and the apostles go naturally together (iii. 2; cf. i. 16-21), without their vocations being in any sense the same, so the false prophets of the O.T. and the false teachers in the Church are associated with each other. These false prophets originated in Israel itself: so the false teachers arise out of the Church. Once they knew the way of righteousness and the Lord Christ, and through this knowledge escaped the impurities of the worldly life. They have been washed from their former sins by baptism, have submitted themselves to the holy commandment, and for a time have walked in the straight way of truth and righteousness. Now, however, they have given up all this, and have become worse than they were before their conversion (ii. 15, 20-22, i. 9); by their deeds they deny the Lord who bought them that they might be His servants (ii. 2). In chap. ii. they are charged with various forms of immoral living, especially unchastity (ii. 10, 14, 18, 20). It is in this that they will find many followers, and so cause the Christian doctrine to be blasphemed (ii. 2). The reference to the trespass of the angels who before the Flood had sexual intercourse with women (ii. 4; Gen. vi. 1-4), and to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (ii. 6 f.; Gen. xix.), suggests the unnatural vices of which they were the slaves. In particular, they made the love-feasts an occasion not only for gluttonous eating, but for seducing unsteadfast souls (ii. 13 f.; n. 3). They preferred to use their seductive arts on those recently converted, who were not yet firmly grounded in the Christian life (ii. 14, 18). In doing this they claim to be teachers of Christianity (ii. 1). They make of their teaching a prosperous business at the expense of the Churches (ii. 3, 14). This is one of the points in which they resemble the heathen prophet Balaam (ii. 15). The other point in which they are like him is in the evil counsel which Balaam gave, i.e. the betrayal of the people of God into unchastity, for which he was responsible (n. 3). The cunningly chosen language by which they endeavour to deceive the Churches and to lead individuals astray (ii. 3; cf. Rom. xvi. 18), sounds like promises of freedom (ii. 19). This same unbridled indulgence of the passions which makes these persons themselves slaves of sin and destruction they recommend to others, who heretofore have lived honourably, as the Christian freedom which they still lack (cf. 1 Pet. ii. 16). Another indication of the character of their teaching is seen in the fact that they despise the ruling powers of the other world, and revile them without fear and trembling, even evil spirits against which angels themselves do not dare to utter a reviling and disparaging judgment (ii. 10 f., 18). While Peter accuses them of ignorance, or at least insufficient appreciation, of the evil spirits they blaspheme (ii. 12; cf. i. 9, iii. 16), they themselves boast a full familiarity with them (Rev. ii. 24), which accounts for the confidence with which they speak so contemptuously of the devil and his servants, treating them as harmless beings. It is also to be observed that they mock the vain waiting of Christianity for the return of the Lord (iii. 3 f.). For it is impossible to distinguish between the libertines of chap. ii. and those who make light of prophecy in chap. iii. The latter also are immoral in their lives, and from their immoral tendencies Peter explains their denial of the prophecy concerning the end of the world (iii. 3 f.); just as, on the other hand, he derives the obligation to sanctification from the well-grounded hope of the disappearance of this world and the coming of another in which righteousness dwells (iii. 10-14). In this same connection also he speaks once more of seduction on the part of wicked men, against whom he would have the readers forewarned (iii. 17). The combining of moral demands with the expectation of the end of the world, which comes to light in chap. i. and runs through the entire letter, is due to the fact that Peter designs to warn his readers against alleged teachers of Christianity, who unite immoral theories and practices with contempt for prophecy.

So long as the discussion of this Epistle proceeded on the basis of the undemonstrable hypothesis that 2 Peter, like 1 Peter, was directed to the Gentile Christian Churches of Asia Minor, there remained the insuperable difficulty that, while the appearance of the false teachers and scoffers is prophesied to take place in the future (ii. 1-3, iii. 3), and the readers are forewarned against them, iii. 17 (ii. 10-22, iii. 4 f., 9, ὡς τινες βραδυνῆτα ἡγοῦνται; cf. also i. 9, iii. 16), the same persons are described connectedly, accurately, and apparently from life in the present tense. The transition from the prophecy of future phenomena to the description of present conditions in 2 Tim. iii. 1-9 and other passages of the last Epistles of Paul, is not really parallel with the present case above, p. 111 ff.). Even less satisfactory is the citation of such passages as Rev. xi. 4 ff. (Hofmann, vii. 2. 60). On the other hand, the explanation is simple, if it be recognised that 2 Peter was, or purported to be, directed to a group of Jewish Christian Churches between 60 and 63 (§ 41), in addition to which there existed a widely spread Gentile Christian Church. The writer distinguishes clearly between his readers who uniformly hold and steadfastly maintain a true faith, which they need only to assert and to put into general practice (i. 1, 5, 10, 12, iii. 1, 17 f.), and the false teachers and the circles in which they exert their influence. The false teachers will not arise out of their midst (cf. Acts xx. 30; 1 John ii. 19; Rev. ii. 14–16, 20–23), but will come from without—appear among them, and seek to profit by them, and lead them astray (2 Pet. ii. 1–3; cf. Acts xx. 29). It is not their existence but their appearance that pertains to the future. The contrast is not between the loyal and genuine Christians among the readers, and others among them whose lives are unchristian and whose faith is wavering, as, for example, in Rev. ii. 24, iii. 4. Rather, the readers as a body, who are regarded as having been up to this time faithful, and as maintaining a correct faith and a true knowledge, are contrasted not only with the immoral persons and false teachers who will attack them in the future (iii. 17, i. 9), but also with another group of Christians, or Churches, in which conditions are to be observed that are as yet foreign to the readers. This is shown with especial clearness by the transition from iii. 16 to iii. 17. Peter could not address the readers as a whole with an emphatic ὑμεῖς οὖν, nor speak of their ἴδιος στήριγμός, if the persons previously described (οἱ ἀμαθεῖς καὶ ἀστήρικτοι) as perverting certain difficult passages in the Epistles of Paul to their own destruction, had belonged to their own circle. Paul once wrote a letter to the readers of 2 Peter (iii. 15; above, p. 199), which has not come down to us. The numerous other letters of Paul, concerning which Peter has knowledge (iii. 16), were addressed to other Churches, and, excepting only Romans of the letters known to us, to Gentile Christians. It was among Gentile Christians that they were read. Consequently it is here that we must seek the Christians who lacked adequate knowledge of Christianity, and requisite stability of moral or religious training, and who therefore wrested difficult single statements in the letters of Paul from their natural connection, perverted them, and applied them to life in a way that was harmful to themselves.

It will be observed that this takes place in the present, not in the future, concerning which prophecies are made in ii. 1-3, and which is referred to in iii. 17 (προγινώσκοντες). These persons belong in the future only in relation to the readers, who are warned against them beforehand. The two adjectives in iii. 16, which are used with only one article, do not describe two distinct classes. As regards their moral condition, these same persons are portrayed in iii. 17 by a single word, οἱ ἄθεσμοι. But the expression ἀστήρικτοι suggests immediately ii. 14, where it is said that these false teachers prefer to entice unsteadfast souls. These unsteadfast souls are identical with those who in ii. 18, according to the correct reading, are called τοὺς ὀλίγως ἀποφεύγοντας, i.e. persons who are just escaping the sinful life and its consequent destruction (cf. i. 4, ii. 20), who are, in fact, only a few steps removed from it, and therefore possessed of thoughts and habits to a large extent such as held them before they became Christians, or, in ecclesiastical language, catechumens or neophytes (cf. 1 Cor. iii. 2 f., v. 1, 6, vi. 1-20, xv. 33 f.; 2 Cor. vi. 14-18; 1 Tim. iii. 6). Thus ἀστήρικτοι refers more to the persons enticed by the false teachers than to the seducers themselves. Naturally the ἀστήρικτοι are also ἀμαθεῖς; since, if they had learned what was correct, they would have been confirmed by the truth dwelling in them, as were the readers of 2 Peter (i. 12, iii. 17). But when it is borne in mind that Peter does not charge those who allow themselves to be led astray by false teachers so much with ἀμαθία as with a lack of experience and confirmation in Christianity (ii. 14, 18), while, on the other hand, he uses various expressions for accusing the false teachers of an ignominious ignorance, a loss of their first knowledge of Christ, and a thoughtlessness about Christian things (ii. 12, 16, 20 f., iii. 5), it becomes apparent that it is especially for the latter that ἀμαθείς is intended, so that it quite appropriately precedes ἀστήρικτοι. Seducers and those enticed by them alike believe or pretend that in certain passages of Paul's Epistles, and in other writings which they similarly misinterpret, they find support for their immoral teachings.

In the same manner as in iii. 16, the present tenses in ii. 10–22 describe existing phenomena with which Peter had become familiar elsewhere than among the readers. In particular, what Peter says in ii. 13 f. about the misuse of the Agape by the libertines is inappropriate to a prophecy intended to describe future phenomena in large outlines or in a symbolic form. It is especially inappropriate to the prophecy of 2 Peter which deals with future phenomena among the readers of this Epistle. Moreover, according to the corrected text of ii. 13, these love-feasts, the name and holy purpose of which the libertines profane, are celebrated outside of the circle of the readers. Whether such feasts were common among the readers and called ἀγάπαι, it is impossible to say (n. 3).

Peter foresees and predicts that these teachers will find numerous followers in their immoral living, which implies that this was not yet the case (ii. 2). Since the region where they will gain this following is not named, and since this prediction is accompanied by another quite independent prediction that these teachers will make their appearance among the readers and endeavour to lead them astray (ii. 1, 3, iii. 17), it follows that ii. 2 refers to results in the same region where they have been active heretofore, i.e. outside the circle of the readers, or, in other words, among Gentile Christians. Eventually also these persons will bring their arts to bear upon the spiritual children of Peter and the other immediate disciples of Jesus. What the result will be is, to say the least, not clearly stated, not even in ii. 1 (αἰρέσεις). Peter makes every endeavour to prevent their gaining followers among his readers, and says simply that judgment upon them has long been impending and will not be delayed (ii. 3 ff.).

Of an altogether different character is the prediction of iii. 3. Here Peter himself is not directly the prophet. The manner in which the revelation of the end of the world is introduced (τοῦτο πρῶτον γινώσκοντες, iii. 3; cf. i. 20; 2 Tim. iii. 1; Rom. vi. 6; Jas. i. 3), shows that he does not intend to say here anything really new, but merely to remind the readers of the prophesied appearance of immoral scoffers, and of how they are to be answered, just as they are reminded of the commandment of Jesus and the prophecies of the O.T. prophets (iii. 2, n. 4). Here he appeals, just as Paul does (above, p. 111 ff.), to prophecy, which was still current in the Church. Not altogether independently of traditional sayings of Jesus, this foretold a falling away, and moral degeneracy within the Church in the last days. Probably also prophecy declared, following again predictions of Jesus (Luke xvii. 26 f.; Matt. xxiv. 37 ff.; cf. 1 Pet. iii. 20; 2 Pet. ii. 5, iii. 5), that, owing to the long time it would be necessary to wait for the parousia of the Lord (Matt. xxiv. 48, xxv. 5; Luke xii. 45), degenerate members of the Church, who were sunk in the life of the world, would go so far as to scoff at the promise. Prophecy declared this to be a sign of the last days; but Peter does not say that for him and the readers these are future days. In fact, inasmuch as he uses direct discourse in quoting the scoffers,—employing language which is apparently reproduced from life (iii. 4, n. 5),—and inasmuch as he describes the ignorance to which this insolent language is due in the present tense (iii. 5), it is clear that he regards this prediction as already fulfilled in definite persons and events existing in the present. The time which to him is present is the last time (cf. 1 John ii. 18 ; Jas. v. 3, 7–9). But since, as has been shown (above, p. 226), these scoffers, whose scornful language concerning the parousia was only one of their characteristics, are not different from the libertines, we know also that Peter became acquainted with them among the Gentile Christian Churches outside the circle of his readers. That they, too, would make their way to the readers, he does not need to repeat. The earnest effort to guard his people against the treacherous power of these particular ideas of the false teachers (iii. 8–13), shows that Peter did not expect the appearance among them of harmful ideas of every kind, but of false teachers of a definite character, who were both libertines and despisers of prophecy. This, however, does not exclude the possibility that those among whom they find entrance will appropriate in some cases one, in other instances the other side of their doctrine and view of the world, and thus give rise to various movements or parties, all of which would be harmful (ii. 1).

Although in this letter, as in the earlier one to which reference is made in iii. 1, Peter may have met a pressing need, and fulfilled his obligation to give to the Churches, to which he along with others once brought the gospel, the benefit of his fatherly instruction by writing to them now from a distance, at the same time the occasion for letters such as this and the earlier one like it, was the experiences he had recently had in Churches outside that were for the most part Gentile Christian. There he saw the representatives of a dangerous tendency gaining an influence both by teaching and example,—a tendency which he, without being himself a prophet, but simply under the influence of prophecy as it existed in the Church, foresaw would increase in power and make its way into the Jewish Christian Church.

Whether it is really Peter who utters this warning against such a movement, or someone in the second century, who, under the mask of Peter as a prophet, describes what had actually taken place since Peter's time, cannot be decided until after the Epistle of Jude, which contains references to similar phenomena, has been investigated.

1. (P. 222.) Καθαρισμός, i. 9, cannot mean, as Spitta supposes, continuous self-purification, for the reason that this has not been forgotten (λήθην λαβόντες) by the persons here described, but left off by them at the present time. Moreover, τὰ πάλαι ἁμαρτήματα (ΣΑΚ, etc.) are not the sinful habits formed before their conversion and not yet entirely overcome, which might possibly be called παλαιὰ ἁμαρτία (cf. 1 Cor. v. 7; Rom. vi. 6, vii. 6; Eph. iv. 22), but their sins committed aforetime (Rom. iii. 25; Heb. ix. 15; cf. 1 Pet. i. 14, iv. 3; Eph. ii. 2; Justin, Apol. i. 61, τὰ προημαρτημένα; Hermas, Vis. i. 3. 1; Mand. iv. 3. 3; Sim. viii. 11. 3). Accordingly, καθαρισμός can mean only the purification from the guilt of sin, which Christians experience once for all (Mark i. 44; Heb. i. 3) when they are called and chosen (2 Pet. i. 10), and are cleansed in baptism (1 Cor. vi. 11; Eph. v. 26; 1 Pet. i. 2; Heb. x. 22; Acts xxii. 16). Also in 2 Pet. ii. 20–22, where the word καθαρισμός is not found, the figurative λουσαμένη, ver. 22, refers to the washing of baptism, and the ἀποφυγόντες τὰ μιάσματα τοῦ κόσμου, ver. 20, to the salvation from the curse of sin which takes place once for all and accompanies baptism.

2. (P. 224.) As in the case of ἐτεροδιδάσκαλος (above, p. 126 f.), so in the case of ψευδοπροφήτης and ψευδοδιδάσκαλος (ii. 1), it is not permissible to separate the adjective from the verb (διδάσκειν, προφητεύειν), construing ψεῦδος, ψεύδης, as objects of the verbal idea. Analogies, such as ψευδάδελφος (Gal. ii. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 26), ψευδαπόστολος (2 Cor. xi. 13), ψευδόχριστος (Mark xiii. 22), absolutely determine the meaning. Even a ψευδομάρτυς is not so called because he makes false statements, but because he pretends to have seen or heard something which he has not seen or heard (Matt. xxvi. 60; cf. Acts vi. 11). The LXX does not read ψευδοπροφήτης in Isa. ix. 14 ("The prophet who teaches lies"), but does use it in Jer. vi. 13, xxvii. 9, xxviii. 1, xxix. 1, 8, Zech. xiii. 2, where the original text has simply נביא, the context making it clear that this title is wrongly borne. αἰρέσεις is here translated "separatist tendencies" (Sonderrichtungen), with Hofmann, vii. 2. 46, in order by the use of this ambiguous term to leave it undecided whether the word is here used in the sense of sects, parties, as in Acts v. 17, xv. 5, xxiv. 5, 14, 1 Cor. xi. 19, Gal. v. 20, or in the sense of a general view contrary to Christianity, as possibly in Ign. Trall. vi. 1; Eph. vi. 2. In opposition to Spitta (120f.), it is to be remarked that αἵρεσις never means a single view or tenet along with which as many other tenets as one chooses may be held (in the literature of the ancient Church even the entire system of a Marcion or of an Arius was regularly regarded as only a single heresy), and that in its Christian usage αἵρεσις is never a neutral idea which comes to have a bad sense only by the addition of some such word as ἀπωλείας,—for the following reasons: (1) Ignatius is not the first to use this word in a bad sense as applying to conditions among Christians; it is so used in 1 Cor. xi. 19; Gal. v. 20; Tit. iii. 10. (2) According to the view of the apostolic age and of the ancient Church,—and this is the basis of the ecclesiastical usage of the word,—the Christian was not at liberty arbitrarily to choose from among existing views and tendencies one that pleased him, but was bound to obey the gospel as the truth. With regard to the much-disputed construction of ii. 1, it may at the outset be considered certain that we cannot, with Spitta (123ff.), take the words καὶ—ἀρνούμενοι, ἐπάγοντες—ἀπώλειαν as referring to the O.T. false prophets. After the important statement about the pseudo-Christian teachers, it stands to reason that, in order to refer back to the O.T. prophets, ἐκείνοι would be necessary. Further, there is nothing to explain the use of the present participles, ἀρνούμενοι, ἐπάγοντες, instead of the aorists, which the sense would require, nor to account for the break in the construction of the sentence, which in this case it would be necessary to assume. Consistency would require that also αὐτῶν (ver. 2) be taken to refer to the O.T. false prophets, and the πολλοί, who are at least similar to the spurious teachers of ver. 1,—so far as by Spitta's own confession, 128, they teach in a harmful manner within the Church, ver. 3,—would be docile followers of the O.T. false prophets,—for this is the relation expressed by ἐξακολουθήσουσιν, ver. 2 (cf. i. 16, ii. 15),—and not that the O.T. false prophets were merely types of the immorality and the fate of these teachers. As a matter of fact, however, there is very little to be learned from the O.T. about the teaching and conduct of the false prophets, and nothing at all with regard to their final destiny. At the latter point the lack is not supplied by the threat of destruction in Deut. xiii. 2-6—a passage which Spitta thinks (126) Peter here had in mind; indeed, throughout the description of phenomena within the Church, which is given us in 2 Pet. ii.-iii., there is no reference to the case under discussion in Deut. xiii. 2-6, namely, betrayal into idolatry by a false prophet. Balaam, whose followers the false Christians and teachers here referred to are declared to be (ii. 15), was not a false prophet from among the people (ii. 1), but a heathen. Neither in the LXX nor by Peter is he called a false prophet, but only a prophet who sinned and led others into sin. Of his end (Num. xxxi. 8) Peter makes no mention. If Peter had had a substantive at his command, such as ἀρνηταί or ἀπαρνηταί, and had used this or προδόται instead of ἀρνούμενοι, no one would find him obscure when he says: "Among you also there shall be false teachers, who shall bring in destructive heresies, and deniers of the Lord that bought them, who bring upon themselves swift destruction" (cf. the co-ordination of participles, substantives, and adjectives in Rom. i. 29-31). Just as ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι has dependent upon it the relative clause, so ἀρνούμενοι governs the qualifying participial phrase that follows it. But there are not two different classes of persons described, only a double characterisation of one and the same class; although, of course, it is possible that in some individuals in this class teaching is more prominent, while the connection of others with the movement is mainly through their feelings and manner of life. This was true of the "Scribes and Pharisees" (Matt. v. 20). Nor is there any reason to complain about the lack of logical order in the passage. We have the statement about the disciples whom these teachers will gain followed by the relative clause of ver. 2*b*, which is logically independent, and then the discourse returns in an entirely natural way to the principal subject, namely, the ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι, the thought of whom is kept in mind by the use of αὐτῶν in ver. 2. In ver. 2, Peter speaks quite generally of a large following which these teachers will secure (πολλοί without ὑμῶν or ἐξ ὑμῶν); in ver. 3 he states how these same persons will endeavour to gain an entrance among the readers. Nor does it seem to the writer to be to the point to talk as Spitta does (122 f.) about the "logical folly" of putting what was intended from the start to be the principal statement into the comparative sentence, ὥς καὶ ἐν ὑμῖν κτλ. (ver. 1*b*); while the existence of false prophets in Israel, which is intended to be only an analogy, is expressed in the principal clause (ver. 1*a*). It is clear on any interpretation that not only in the words ὥς—ἀπολείας, but also in ii. 2-22, the subject under discussion is not the false prophets of the O.T., but the analogous phenomena within Christianity. It is known that the Greek language can add in the form of a relative clause a logically independent and even strongly emphatic statement, which we express more clearly by the use of "and" and a demonstrative sentence (cf. Rom. ii. 29, iii. 8; Gal. ii. 10; Acts xiii. 43, and all three of the relative clauses in 2 Pet. ii. 1-3; Kühner-Gerth, ii. 433 f.; A. Buttmann, 243 [Eng. trans. 282 f.]). So not infrequently ὥς or ὥς καὶ is equivalent to "and so" (cf. Kühner-Gerth, ii. 431, A. 4). The phrase "and so does Paul also in all his letters," in 2 Pet. iii. 16, is an independent statement concerning which more is said below. After the statements in i. 19-20, especially the last sentence of which might seem to imply that all prophecy in the O.T. era was inspired by the Holy Spirit, it was quite natural to state definitely that there were also false prophets in Israel. This would be the case even if there were no intention of making further mention of them, but simply of preparing the way for the further statement that in the realm of Christian revelation, besides the apostles whose message was true, there are and will continue to be false teachers against whom the Churches must be on their guard. In the case of the "prophetic word," a safeguard against error is found in the fact that it is only the messages of the true prophets of olden time which are found in Scripture (γραφῆς, i. 20; cf. Rom. i. 2), not those of the false prophets against whom the true prophets had to contend. In the realm of Christian teaching this was not yet true at the time when 2 Pet. was written. A Christian literature, produced by the true witnesses of Christ, was only in process of formation (i. 12-15, iii. 15, 16). This made it all the more necessary to remind the readers, that as there were false prophets in Israel, so there are or will be also false teachers in the Christian Church. If all that follows the first mention of the ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι refers to these persons, ὁ ἀγοράσας αὐτοῖς δασυτήν naturally refers to Christ (cf. Jude 4, and the use of the word δεσποσύνοι to designate the relatives of Jesus, a manner of speech common in Palestine, Eus. H. E. i. 7. 14). For ἀγοράζω, cf. 1 Cor. vi. 20, vii. 23—the latter passage in its context. They are legally “Slaves of Christ” (cf. 2 Pet. i. 1).

3. (Pp. 225, 229.) By the “Way of Balaam,” as contrasted with the “Straight way” (ii. 15), the “Way of truth” (ii. 2), and the “Way of righteousness” (ii. 21), must be meant all that is recorded concerning his deeds in Num. xxii. 5–xxiv. 25, including the evil counsel he gave in Num. xxxi. 16 (cf. xxv. 1 f., 18), which in Rev. ii. 14 is called the “Teaching of Balaam”; cf. Didymus in Jud. 11 (Migne, 39, 1816). But it is to be observed that while the people did come to the point where they worshipped the gods of the Moabites (Num. xxv. 2 f., 5), it is always the unchastity connected with the feast that stands in the foreground (xxv. 1, 6–18, xxxi. 15 f., especially in Jos. Ant. iv. 6. 6–13). Consequently in Rev. ii. 14, 20, also the reference is not to idolatry, but to participation in idolatrous feasts and unchastity. In 2 Pet. the analogy seems to be even more limited. The reference is neither to the attendance upon idolatrous feasts nor to idolatrous worship. On the contrary, it is the meals eaten by Christians in connection with their worship in which the followers of Balaam take part at least with unchaste thought and looks (so according to ii. 13 f., especially if the correct reading in this passage be ἐντροφῶντες ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις αὐτῶν, συνευωχούμενοι ὀφθαλμοῖς ἔχοντες κτλ.). If ἀγάπαις is to be accepted as the correct reading of Jude 12 on account of the close relationship of the two Epistles, it may be regarded almost certainly as the correct reading in 2 Pet. ii. 13; for ἀπάταις, which is more strongly attested here than in Jude 12, does not have the appearance of being, and certainly is not, an isolated paronomasia for love-feasts, but is a change made by a copyist who thought that he was correcting an error; and this is so whether the word stood in the original which Jude had before him, or was an alteration made by the author of 2 Pet. of the ἀγάπαις which he found in Jude; see above, p. 211, n. 1. Tischendorf's apparatus is misleading, in that it says nothing about the ὑμῶν after συνευωχούμενοι. It is not found in the earliest translations of the Syrians (S²), Egyptians (Sahidic Version, Woide-Ford, p. 213), and Latins (Speculum pseudo-Augustini, 640. 9; the pseudo-Cyprian de Singularitate clericorum, 28; unfortunately this part of the Palimps. Flor. is wanting), and is to be omitted here as in Jude 12 on the ground that it is an addition made to συνευωχούμενοι, being apparently required by the συν. In Jude 12 it is unnecessary after ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν, because in thought everyone supplies ὑμῶν. The consequence is that the reading is much less strongly attested than in 2 Pet. ii. 13. But here also it can be omitted as unnecessary, since συνευωχέσθαι does not always necessarily mean “To feast with others,” but can also signify, especially with a plural subject, “To feast with one another”; cf. συσσιτεῖν, συσσιτία, τὰ συσσίτια, or συμπίνειν παρὰ τινι, to take part in a symposium at the home of another (Xen. Cyrop. v. 2. 28). This is the meaning here, and ὑμῶν does not harmonise with ταῖς ἀγάπαις αὐτῶν, although the two are connected in B. This addition once accepted into the text must have helped to give currency to the reading ταῖς ἀπάταις αὐτῶν, if, indeed, it did not produce it. On the other hand, where ἀγάπαις was retained, αὐτῶν, which is undoubtedly genuine, was sometimes omitted, because it did not harmonise with ἐμὴν, as, e.g. in Cod. Amiat. of the Vulgate. Peter says concerning these false teachers, these "spots and blemishes" of Christianity, these "Children of the curse": "they revel at their love-feasts, hold their banquets or common carousals with eyes full of adulterous desire, and entice the unwary with hearts practised in covetousness and hardened by it." Nothing is said which implies that unchastity itself was practised at these love-feasts. This enticement was not, as the accompanying characterisation shows, a direct temptation to impure actions, but a temptation to accept libertine principles (cf. ii. 3, 19). It would also be strange to speak only of lustful looks, and in a connection like this not so much as hint at what was worst in the conduct of these persons. But this leaves in full force the charge of sinful living, even of unnatural vices (above, p. 224 f.). The love-feasts are not described as meals eaten in company by an entire Church, but as meals eaten by the libertines. From this passage alone it might be inferred that these meals and their name were an invention of these persons, and that Peter rejects both the thing and the name, as does Clemens Alexandrinus (Paed. ii. §§ 4-7; Strom. iii. §§ 10, 11, vii. § 98). But this view is made impossible by Jude 12, and by ecclesiastical usage elsewhere from Ignatius on (cf. *PRE.*³ i. 234 ff.). But we also learn from Ignatius that, as early as the beginning of the second century, the meals (love-feasts) which ended with the Eucharist were not always eaten by the whole Church together under the direction of the officers of the Church, but that certain persons who did not accept the common faith of the Church availed themselves of this freedom and held private love-feasts (ad Smyrneos, vii.-ix.; ad Philadelphenos, iv.; cf. the writer's Ignatius, 342 f., 347 f., 363 f.).

4. (P. 230.) When iii. 3 is joined with iii. 1, 2, the possibility is not excluded that Peter had said something similar to iii. 3-7 in his earlier letter. But even in that case, especially if the form of the earlier communication is to some extent here retained, Peter does not himself prophesy anything distinctly new. Spitta (228-233) goes too far when he claims that because what is said in iii. 3 ff. has no sufficient basis in the preceding portion of 2 Pet., the earlier Epistle of Peter must have been "mainly eschatological in its contents," containing a reference to the scoffers of the last age. The statement concerning the essential contents and purpose of the two letters applies to what follows as well as to what precedes (above, p. 210, n. 1); while the break in the construction, by the use of the nominative γινώσκοντες, which renders the clause more independent, makes it all the more impossible to infer from the connection of iii. 3 with the μνησθῆναι of iii. 2, by the use of the word γινώσκοντες, that iii. 3-4 or iii. 3-7 is a recapitulation either of the preceding parts of 2 Pet. or of Peter's lost letter. μνησθῆναι introduces not an elaborate reminder of statements which have already been made, but an independent truth which needs to be impressed upon the readers' minds, only not a truth which needs to be preached to them as something entirely new. Cf. the parallel passages, above, p. 230.

5. (P. 231.) We should understand the actual language of the scoffers in iii. 4 better if they were quoted more often. Spitta (233) is right in rejecting the suggestion of Bengel, Hofmann, and others, that αἰτοῦ expresses irreverence on the part of the persons speaking. In this regard the expression is not different from the ἐκείνος of the apostles (above, p. 215 f.) and the αἰτός of the Pythagoreans (Scholium on Aristophanes, The Clouds, 195, ed. Dindorf, i. 196). These persons do speak contemptuously of the devil and his servants (ii. 10-12; above, p. 225 f.), besides indulging in other extravagant language (ii. 18); but it is altogether unlikely that these clever teachers of Christianity would have spoken disrespectfully of Christ Himself or of God. That, however, the reference is to Christ and not to God, becomes all the more certain if it be held that the persons here speaking are Gentile Christians. The question, "Where is the promise of its coming?" arose simply in connection with the parousia, concerning which Jesus had spoken in a manner implying that His contemporaries would experience it (Matt. xxiv. 34; Mark xiii. 30; Luke xxi. 32; Matt. xvi. 28; Mark ix. 1; Luke ix. 27). This determines also the meaning of οἱ πατέρες. Even if this word alone or with ἡμῶν can mean all the forebears of the persons speaking,—as, e.g. in the case of Jesus, the Israelites of the ancient dispensation (Heb. i. 1 = Matt. xxiii. 30),—the idea that these could or were expected to experience the parousia of Jesus is entirely incongruous. Only the immediate ancestors of the scoffers, and the men of that generation,—naturally only those of them who were at the same time members of the Church to which Christ promised His parousia,—could have expected, and actually did expect, to live until the parousia. The difference between the view of Spitta, who thinks that this word should be limited to the actual fathers of the scoffers (237), and that of the others, who think that it refers to all the first generation of Christians, is negligible. The absence of a ἡμῶν, and the unlikelihood that the false teachers consisted exclusively of the children of Christian parents, which even in the second century would have been a rare coincidence, favour the latter view. The older generation, which expected to live to share in the parousia, has passed away, and still it does not come; all remains as it was in former generations. In view of this fact, the younger generation throws the entire promise overboard. It would imply a strange misunderstanding of the natural use of language in all ages to claim that before such an expression as this could be used, the first Christian generation must have entirely disappeared. What Christian in the second century, writing a letter in Peter's name, would not have known that the Apostle John, for example, outlived Peter, and have realised that Peter himself, in whose name he here speaks, was one of the πατέρες, all of whom are supposed to have died when 2 Pet. was written! As one after another of these ἀρχαῖοι μαθηταί (Acts xxi. 16) passed away without having had fulfilled the hope of living to see the parousia (Acts vii. 60, xii. 2; 1 Cor. xv. 6, xi. 30; 1 Thess. iv. 13), it was extremely natural to declare the entire expectation a dream. The expression used is an unnatural hyperbole only if the letter purports to have been written between the years 30 and 50. If, on the other hand, it is to be referred to the years between 60 and 63, then an entire generation (from thirty to thirty-three years) had elapsed since Jesus had prophesied His parousia. This date is confirmed by the present passage. The difficulty arising from the fact that a double terminus a quo is given (ἀπ' ἧς . . . ἀπ' ἀρχῆς κτίσεως, cf. the repeated ἔως, Matt. v. 18), cannot be got rid of by assuming with Spitta (235) that the construction of the first ἀπό is pregnant (prior to which [sc. parousia], i.e. "before the coming of which, the fathers fell asleep"). This is evident for the following reasons: (1) there are no really analogous examples in the N.T. (cf. also the writer's Hirt des Hermas 490); (2) ἀφ' ἧς (1 Macc. i. 11; Acts xxiv. 11; Hermas, Sim. viii. 1, 4, vi. 6; cf. Acts xx. 18) is a frequent ellipsis for ἀφ' ἧς ἡμέρας (Col. i. 6, 9), or for ἀφ' οὗ (Ex. v. 23; Josh. xiv. 10; Luke xiii. 25, xxiv. 21). Apart from the above consideration is also the fact (3) that γάρ following ἀφ' ἧς would be impossible if it introduced a real relative clause, and if the phrase were not rather equivalent to ἀπ' ἐκείνης (ἡμέρας) ἦ. The language used is very much compressed, but its meaning can hardly be mistaken: "Since the fathers fell asleep, (the expected world revolution has not taken place any more than during their lifetime, but) all remains (just as it was) from the beginning of the creation."

§ 43. EPISTLE OF JUDE.

The author of this Epistle introduces himself to the readers as "Jude, a servant of Jesus Christ, but brother of James." The order and connection of the two designations which he adds to the name show that the second of these additions was not a term in common use, and it might seem as if it were necessary in order to distinguish this Jude from numerous other persons bearing the same name (n. 1). But even if it were necessary to make such distinction, that is not the purpose of the addition here. For if this were the meaning, ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου, which in this case could hardly have the article omitted before it (cf. Mark iii. 17, v. 37; John vi. 8; Acts xii. 2; Gal. i. 19), would necessarily stand directly after the name, and could not be placed in such evident contrast to the preceding designation of the writer as a Christian by a δέ. This contrast is very peculiar, since kinship with a Christian of whatever name does not stand in contrast to the relationship of service to Jesus, nor does the idea of kinship help to define the same (but cf. Tit. i. 1; above, p. 47). Even the earliest interpreters saw correctly that the one here speaking might have called himself a brother of some greater person, but preferred to designate himself his servant, using the title brother; thus set free, as it were, to indicate his relationship to James (n. 2). Jude was one of the brothers of the Lord, who, like Peter and other apostles, laboured in the year 57 as preachers of the gospel in various places (1 Cor. ix. 5 ; Matt. xiii. 55 ; Mark vi. 3 ; John vii. 3-8 ; Acts i. 14 ; vol. i. p. 105). If reference to a brother instead of a father, in order to distinguish one from a companion of the same name, is unusual, and presupposes great pre-eminence on the part of the brother in question, such pre-eminence obtains peculiarly in the present instance, where James is mentioned for an entirely different purpose. He can be no other than the distinguished James, who since the death of the son of Zebedee had been regularly called simply James (Acts xii. 17, xv. 13, xxi. 18 ; Gal. ii. 9, 12 ; 1 Cor. xv. 7), and who himself uses this name only at the beginning of his letter, not calling himself a brother of the Lord, as others called him (Gal. i. 19), but a servant of God and of Christ. Just as the absence of the apostolic title at the beginning of James, a letter addressed to the entire Church of the time, proves that the James who wrote it was not an apostle, so the similar omission at the beginning of Jude, which is also intended for a large circle of readers, proves that this Jude was not an apostle. This, if anywhere, was the appropriate place for such mention, and in the letters of Peter and Paul it regularly occurs here at the beginning. The conclusion thus drawn from Jude 1 is confirmed by Jude 17 ; for, although the mere mention of the apostles cannot of itself prove that the person speaking is not an apostle (above, p. 218, n. 7), nevertheless the solemn expression, "The apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ," which is without parallel, would sound very unnatural if spoken by an apostle. In a passage which seems to resemble this (Eph. iii. 5), Paul, whose position was a peculiar one, does not identify himself with the apostles (vol. i. p. 506 f.). And there is nothing to suggest that Jude was one of the personal disciples of Jesus, a fact so strongly emphasised by the writer of 2 Peter, and at least not concealed by the writer of 1 Peter.

Of the history of Jude's life we know practically nothing. From Matt. xiii. 55, where he is mentioned last among the brothers of Jesus, and from Mark vi. 3, where his name occupies the place next to the last, it may possibly be inferred that he is the youngest brother of Jesus, or at least one of the younger brothers. In their relation to Jesus the development of all the brothers seems to have been the same (John vii. 3-8; Acts i. 14). There is no need to repeat here what has been said concerning James in this respect (vol. i. p. 105). While James, the unmarried ascetic, did not leave Jerusalem and the temple, and so is certainly not included among those mentioned in 1 Cor. ix. 5, Jude was one of the brothers of Jesus here mentioned, who, like Peter and other apostles, made preaching tours accompanied by their wives. Naturally, in the case of Jude as in the case of the older apostles, these tours were confined to the "cities of Israel" (Matt. x. 23; Gal. ii. 9; above, p. 208). If he was born several years later than Jesus, say somewhere near the tenth year of our era, he may have survived the destruction of Jerusalem a number of years. Hegesippus informs us that toward the end of the reign of Domitian, therefore about the year 95, two grandsons of Jude, who made their living by farming, were brought before the emperor charged with being descendants of David, and Christians. He says, moreover, that these charges were made by certain heretics. According to the same writer, they afterwards occupied a prominent place in the Church of Palestine until some time in the reign of Trajan (98-117), as did also the aged Simeon, a cousin of Jesus and of their grandfather Jude, who is mentioned as the second bishop of Jerusalem (Eus. H. E. iii. 19 f., 32. 5 f.; cf. Forsch. vi. 238 ff.). The fact that Jude calls himself a brother of James shows that he is addressing Christians, among whom the latter was highly esteemed, or, if he was no longer living, among whom his memory was sacredly revered. Especially, if the latter were the case, the manner in which Jude mentions himself is natural. The lips of the leader so highly honoured in the Jewish Christian Church are sealed; a part of his duty, at least, is inherited by his brother, while another part falls to his cousin Simeon.

Notwithstanding the meagreness of the tradition concerning the brothers of Jesus, it is to be assumed that Jude had not laboured outside of the Jewish Christian world. There are no indications of it in his letter, such as are so abundant in 1 Peter. The designation of the readers would apply to the entire Church, or to any particular part of it; but there is not a single word to indicate that Jude was under necessity of first introducing himself to his readers, or of proving his right to address them. Like James, he addresses them as a teacher whom they are accustomed to hear. The verse immediately following (3) also shows that the relation in which the author stood to the readers was not created by this brief letter. He was already seriously considering, or had actually begun, writing to them concerning their common salvation, when conditions arose which necessitated the sending of this letter (n. 3). The purpose of his present letter he declares to be a summons to contend for the faith delivered to the saints once for all,—a description which corresponds to the contents of the Epistle. The fact that the readers' faith was imperilled at this time, what it was that imperilled it, and why Jude thought it necessary to write this brief letter at once, are indicated in ver. 4, and the exhortation that follows in vv. 5–23. The manner in which the faith for which they are to contend is characterised, indicates that this faith is not one thing to-day and another to-morrow, but a practically unalterable summary of religious convictions and teachings which has been communicated once for all to the Church, either by its Lord and Master, or by the preachers of the gospel (cf. Heb. xiii. 7-9, i. 1, ii. 3). This implies that, for the purposes of this letter, it is not necessary to expound and establish this faith anew. On the other hand, it would seem as if the writing, the preparation of which Jude had in mind when he received the information or made the observations which necessitated the preparation of this letter, was meant to be more didactic in character and of greater scope than the present one,—if we may judge from the statement of its subject, which, it must be admitted, is very general (περὶ τῆς κοινῆς ἡμῶν σωτηρίας). The mere fact that γράφειν ὑμῖν is used does not justify the assumption that this expression, like γράψαι ὑμῖν, refers to a letter. It does imply that the writing in question was intended for the readers, but beyond this it can refer to a work consisting of a number of parts quite as well as to a letter (cf. Luke i. 3). The expression certainly does not permit us to assume that Jude was about to address to the readers a didactic communication for which there was no special occasion, when the circumstances arose which led him to give his communication a different and more specialised content than it would otherwise have had. Rather is this brief letter to be taken as a temporary substitute for the more extended writing which he was intending to dedicate to the readers. Whether Jude ever carried out his intention of writing such a work, temporarily interfered with, or completed the work already begun, we do not know, any more than we know whether Peter carried out the similar intention expressed in 2 Pet. i. 15 (above, p. 199 f.). No writing has come down to us which could pass as the writing of Jude here referred to, or which might claim to be such a work.

Seeing that Jude had had in mind for some time the composition of a doctrinal work for the benefit of the readers, and now felt constrained by the danger threatening them to write this letter, it follows that he must have come in contact with them in his journeys as an evangelist

(1 Cor. ix. 5), and since then had kept them in mind. Consequently he had the information which seemed to him to necessitate the writing of a letter. Naturally, the readers themselves were in possession of the same facts. Nothing that Jude says implies that he is announcing new facts. On the contrary, assuming that the readers know what and whom he means, he characterises and condemns certain persons who have crept in among them and live in their midst (vv. 4, 12, 19). He calls them godless persons who pervert the grace of God into immorality, and deny the Christians' only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ (ver. 4). The first of these charges presupposes a teaching in which the fact that the Christians are under grace is used to justify an immoral life (n. 4). Since these persons claimed to be Christians, the latter charge must mean that they separated themselves from Christ as Lord by their disobedience, denying Him, not in name, but in fact, by living a life inconsistent with the confession of Him (cf. Tit. i. 16; 2 Pet. ii. 1; above, p. 224 f.). They are described with greater detail in vv. 10-13, 16, 18, 19.

In the first place, it is everywhere assumed that they are outwardly members of the Church. They are like fruit trees in late autumn, when all the trees are bare; like good trees, they have had their spring, when possibly they bore blossoms, and a summer, when they could have borne fruit; but they have proved to be unfruitful, and the gardener has torn them up with their roots (ver. 12). If they have died twice, then once they must have been called from death to life (Eph. ii. 1, 5; Col. ii. 13; John v. 24), and have sunk back again into a state of death. They take part in the love-feasts of the readers as if they had a right to do so, and indeed this right cannot be contested outwardly on the ground that they are not members of the Church (ver. 12, n. 5 at end). Nor does the fact that they create divisions, while lacking the Holy Spirit, and being still in bondage to their own natural life (ver. 19, n. 6), argue against the possibility of their regarding themselves as members of the Church; it seems rather to indicate that they considered themselves pre-eminently men of the Spirit, and made invidious distinctions between themselves and ordinary Christians, which of itself indicates their separatist tendencies. It is this second characteristic which is presupposed when among other things it is said that they are followers of Korah, who with two hundred and fifty prominent members of the congregation rebelled against the authorities and the leaders of Israel whom God had called, claiming that the entire congregation, including themselves, were holy as well as Aaron, and that God dwelt not simply with those who were in official position, but with all the members of the congregation (ver. 11; cf. Num. xvi. 2f. with Num. xi. 16 f., 24-29; 1 Cor. xiv. 25). The comparison would be meaningless unless the libertines of whom Jude is speaking had shown themselves insubordinate to the heads of the Church, on the ground that the whole Church was holy and in possession of the Spirit. Following the common practice of demagogues in every age, under the guise of an appeal to the rights of all, they asserted their right to speak, notwithstanding the regularly constituted order of the Church, drawing comparisons between themselves, as representatives of public spirit, and the spiritless officers of the Church with the members of the Church who blindly followed their authority. Moreover, the words γογγυσταὶ μεμφίμοιροι, which are genuine only in ver. 16, but at an early date were either added to ver. 11 or inserted in ver. 12, being thus brought into direct connection with the name of Korah, serve in fact to recall the fact that Korah and his company, dissatisfied with their subordinate position, murmured against Aaron, and against Moses also (Num. xvi. 11), all the more bitterly because they chafed under the deprivations necessitated by their departure from Egypt (Num. xvi. 13 f., xiv. 2, 27, 37; Ex. xvi. 2 f., xvii. 3). For similar reasons the persons whom Jude describes are discontented murmurers who complain of their fate. Dissatisfied with the renunciations which their Christian confession has compelled them to make, and with the position in the Churches which has fallen to their lot,—much lower than they feel they ought to have,—they complain against the heads of the Church (n. 5). Along with this murmuring, as in the case of Korah and his companions and wherever elsewhere in the Church similar conditions prevailed (cf. 1 Cor. x. 6, 10), there went a longing for the comforts of life enjoyed before redemption, and an actual falling back into the pre-Christian life. This is the third feature in the description of these persons. They walk according to their wicked lusts (vv. 16, 18). This is evident from the manner in which they conduct themselves at the love-feasts (ver. 12). Without any reverence for the sacredness of these meals, they treat them as banquets, and think only of securing for themselves the largest possible share of food and drink. There is even less indication than in 2 Pet. ii. 13 f. (above, p. 235) that they made these meals an occasion for the practice of unchastity. Indeed, that this was not the case is rendered certain by the fact that Jude speaks of the love-feasts of the readers (ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν, ver. 12); for he nowhere charges against them an intimacy with these wicked persons, or a participation in their sins. But the readers, who allow them to take part in their love-feasts, need to know that the persons who sit with them at the table of the Lord are polluted, and so take part in the love-feasts, not with pure hearts, but with unchaste feelings which are manifest in their looks (cf. 2 Pet. ii. 14). Jude does charge them with unnatural sins when he compares the punishment that awaits them with the punishment of the angels who committed sins of the flesh and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, describing the sins of these angels and cities much more clearly than is done in 2 Pet. ii. 4–10 (ver. 6 f.), and says expressly that the false Christians who have crept in among the readers corrupt the flesh in the same manner (ver. 8). Ver. 23 also indicates the practice of unnatural vice.

A fourth characteristic of these persons is their presumptuous talk (ver. 16), not only against the authority and heads of the Church, but even against God (ver. 15). They also set aside what should be recognised by men as a power superior to themselves, and blaspheme exalted spirits (ver. 8),—a term which, it seems natural to suppose from the following verse, includes also evil spirits. Since this conduct of theirs is associated directly with their impurity, it is to be assumed that they endeavoured to justify their unchaste conduct by a theory about the harmless character of evil spirits, or even by contemptuous remarks about the good angels, out of regard to whom other Christians felt under obligation to conduct themselves with especial modesty (1 Cor. xi. 10). The fact that all real knowledge of the spirits which they blaspheme is denied (ver. 10 ; see above, p. 225 f.), and that their blasphemies as well as their unchaste conduct are associated with visions and dreams (ver. 8), would indicate that they claimed to possess knowledge concerning the spirit world. From the single word ἐνυπνιαζόμενοι it is impossible to determine whether they claimed to have, through dream-visions, a deep insight into the spirit worlds, or whether Jude simply calls their confused ideas dreams. Even less certainly does this one word stamp them as false prophets ; nor does the reference to Balaam (ver. 11) prove them to be such ; for neither here nor in 2 Peter, nor in the O.T. is he called a false prophet (see above, p. 233). This reference serves rather to bring before us a fifth characteristic of these sinners. When it is said that for the sake of gain they gave themselves to the πλάνη of Balaam, the sin referred to cannot consist simply in expressions of their covetousness, but must be some activity in which for the sake of gain they engage with eagerness and all their strength. Since, now, in the O.T. Balaam is represented not as a man who was led or fell into error, but as one who gave treacherous counsel and thereby led the members of the Church of God into unchastity (above, pp. 225, 235), πλάνη cannot be taken in a passive, but only in an active sense (n. 7). At the same time, it is not said that in giving themselves up to the practice of heathen unchastity, as in fact they had done, though not for the sake of reward, these libertines had fallen victims to the seduction of Balaam, or to any seduction that can be compared to Balaam's counsel; but Balaam himself is their prototype, both in his πλάνος and in his acceptance of reward. It follows, therefore, as indicated in ver. 4 (above, p. 233 f.), that these persons are teachers, who endeavour to lead the members of the Church astray, not simply by their bad example, for which they would receive no reward, but by an exposition of their libertine theories designed to induce them to adopt the same views and indulge in the same practices, for which teaching they accept compensation (cf. 2 Pet. ii. 3, 14; above, p. 225; Tit. i. 11; 1 Tim. vi. 5; above, p. 101). The same situation is indicated in ver. 16. Their murmuring against the established order of the Church and its chosen leaders, and their presumptuous words, in which not even the holy God and superhuman spirits are spared, and which are also made to serve the purposes of their immorality, are not confined to their own circle, but are flaunted before such as have not yet been betrayed. They prefer to talk to persons who are prominent and rich, because of the material benefit which will accrue to them if they are successful in convincing such members of the Church. That they had already succeeded in gaining some following among the readers through their teaching, is shown by the conclusion of the letter. While it is true that here also, ver. 20 ff., the readers whom Jude expects to reach by his letter are distinguished from the false teachers just as sharply as at the beginning, still there are members of the Church who, in varying degrees, have yielded to temptation, and are commended to the pastoral care of the readers. There are some who doubt, who have not decisively rejected the pseudo-Christian teaching, but consider its pros and cons. These the readers are to convince of the folly of their hesitation, and of the untruth of the teaching so dangerous to them. There are also some who have been scathed by the fire of destruction, but can still be rescued. Finally, there are those who must be treated with mingled fear and sympathy; their unclean sins are to be hated and shunned carefully, but they themselves are to be shown that undeserved mercy which everyone himself hopes to receive at the hands of the Lord Christ in the day of judgment (vv. 21-23, n. 8).

A sixth feature in the description of these seducers is the representation of their appearance in the present as the fulfilment of a prophecy long since uttered and written down. Immediately after the mention of their appearance among the readers as the pressing occasion for writing this letter, Jude goes on to say that these persons had long before been the subject of a writing in which this judgment was pointed out (ver. 4, n. 9). In view of the fact that in what follows mention is made of different cases of judgment in the O.T. typical of what awaits these persons (vv. 5-7), and that the words of Enoch about God's final judgment upon all godless persons are quoted (ver. 14 f.), it is natural to consider the judgment to be described in the following passage, as one long prophesied, especially since πάλαι suggests παλαιὰ διαθήκη and προγεγραμμένοι recalls such passages as Rom. xv. 4; Acts i. 16; 2 Pet. iii. 2. But this interpretation of τοῦτο would be possible only if it were immediately followed by a statement as to the nature of the judgment that God was about to visit upon these persons. But this is not the case ; indeed, one searches the letter in vain for any direct statement of this kind. The cited cases of divine judgment, actual and prophesied, are more suited to indicate the sinfulness of these unworthy Christians, whom God will certainly not leave unpunished, than to portray the judgment which eventually will overtake them. It is equally impossible to take τοῦτο as an introduction to Jude's description of these persons in ver. 4b (n. 9). If, as is generally the case, τοῦτο refers to what precedes, Jude conceives the appearance of these persons in the Churches to which he is writing as a judgment, and more than that, a judgment long since prophesied in some writing. Naturally it is not a judgment fulfilled upon them or by them, but a judgment upon the Churches in which they have appeared. Jude's thought is the same as John's when he represents the coming of Christ as bringing judgment into the world, although Christ Himself judges no one and is judged by no one (John ix. 39, iii. 19 ; but cf. iii. 17, xii. 47), and Paul's when he looks upon divisions into sects which he foresees, as a judgment appointed by God in the Church, in order to distinguish faithful Christians from the impure elements in its community (1 Cor. xi. 19). It is unfortunate that such persons are constantly making their way into new Churches, just as it is unfortunate that Christians are under necessity of being persecuted for their faith ; but, looked at from the divine point of view, both are parts of the judgment which begins at the house of God (1 Pet. iv. 17) before it is fulfilled in the world ; it is one of the signs of the last times (1 John ii. 18). The readers are enabled the more easily to assume the right attitude toward this saddening fact, because Jude, taking for granted that he is recalling only what the readers already know, is able to say that the godless persons who have come among them are those of whom it was long since prophesied in written form, not simply that they would come in general, but that they would creep in among Jude's readers. One seeks in vain for such a prophecy in the Book of Enoch or in the O.T., because at the time when they were written no Christian Churches were as yet in existence. On the other hand, in 2 Pet. ii. 1-iii. 4, we have a prophecy which exactly suits, namely, the announcement that false teachers, whose theory and practice exactly corresponds to those of the godless bearers of the Christian name in Jude, will appear among a certain group of Jewish Christian Churches. The narrative in which this is found shows verbal resemblances to Jude 4 at the very beginning. Assuming, then, that 2 Pet. ii. 1-iii. 4 is not copied from an older document which Jude also had before him, it is clear that Jude is referring to 2 Peter, and that this Epistle is addressed to the same Jewish Christian Churches as 2 Peter. This conclusion is confirmed by Jude 17 f. The readers are told to keep in remembrance the words of the apostles of Christ formerly spoken, namely, that "In the last time there shall be mockers walking according to their own ungodly lusts." Perhaps the direct form of speech in which the apostolic prophecy is here reproduced does not absolutely exclude the possibility of repeated and varied prophecies being summed up in this statement (n. 10). But if this were the case, the expression would be unnatural. Moreover, it is just as impossible here to leave out of account the ὁμῶν as in 2 Pet. i. 16 and iii. 15. The reference is to words which the apostles addressed to the readers of Jude, and so also to the readers of 2 Peter. Accordingly, in ver. 4 it is assumed that the readers are familiar with a written prophecy of the entrance among the readers of the libertines which has now taken place. That such a prophecy, having reference to their conditions, was addressed to this group of readers is almost as self-evident as the fact that only a Christian could predict the appearance of false teachers among a definite group of Christian Churches. Furthermore, according to the connection of vv. 16-20, the mockers of ver. 18 are the same persons to whom, according to ver. 4, this written prophecy referred. Consequently the prophecy of ver. 4, only the general contents of which are here indicated, and the prophecy of ver. 18, which is verbally quoted, must have been contained in one and the same writing addressed to these Jewish Christian Churches. But in 2 Peter, the same Epistle which we recognise as the writing presupposed in ver. 4 (2 Pet. ii. 1-3), we find almost exactly the words quoted by Jude (ver. 18) from the same writing (2 Pet. iii. 3). Unless recourse is had to very artificial assumptions (§ 44), here is positive proof that in ver. 18 and ver. 4 Jude refers to 2 Peter, in both instances as a writing addressed to the readers of his own letter, and in ver. 18 as the writing of an apostle. Against this conclusion it cannot be argued that Jude attributes these prophetic words not to a single apostle, but to the apostles collectively. At most, a literal interpretation could here draw only the improbable conclusion that all the apostles had written a collective letter to the readers from which this quotation was made. In the very nature of the case, if he intended to use direct discourse, Jude could quote what the apostles had said to the readers on the point in question only as the saying of a single apostle, naturally, of course, assuming that other apostles had said or written similar things to the readers about the same matter. It is this very presupposition which he expresses when he mentions the apostles, and not Peter alone, as the source of this prophecy. Although this expression, in and of itself, is entirely intelligible, it is all the more natural if Jude had 2 Peter before him; since in 2 Pet. iii. 3 Peter does not represent the prophecy quoted by Jude as something new, expressed by him now for the first time, but, in marked distinction from his own prediction in ii. 1, he simply reminds the readers of this prophecy as if it were something already known and expected (above, p. 230). One apostle, who had once written a letter to the same readers on related subjects, expressing himself in the same way as Peter, is mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 15. Even if Jude knew no more than we are able to infer from 2 Pet. iii. 3, 15, with this before him he could write as he does; for he does not speak as Peter does in 2 Pet. iii. 2 of the apostles of the readers, of whom Paul was not one (above, p. 202), but of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom Paul also was counted one by the older apostles and the brothers of Jesus (Gal. ii. 9). Jude makes use also of the words of 2 Pet. iii. 2 in introducing the quotation (μνησθῆναι τῶν προειρημένων ῥημάτων), but does not copy them; rather he alters the words and adapts them to his purpose. Neither in ver. 17 f. nor ver. 4 does he, like Peter, recall the prophecies of the O.T. and Christ's commandment to the apostles, but only an apostolic prophecy.

On the exegetical side this simple understanding of the situation cannot be obscured by the remark, often made, that πάλαι (ver. 4) refers back to the remote past. Taken in contrast to the recent appearance of the sinful Christians, it can express an interval of weeks and months just as well as of years and centuries (n. 11). How long a time elapsed between the prophecy in 2 Pet. ii. 1-3 and the fulfilment of the same which was the direct occasion for the composition of Jude, cannot be inferred from the word πάλαι, "long ago," nor in general is it possible to determine it; nevertheless, ver. 5 seems to indicate a time subsequent to the great judgment of the year 70. Jude begins his statement in ver. 5 by saying that he is recalling what the readers know; and this is emphasised by appeal to the comprehensive knowledge which the readers already possess (cf. 1 John ii. 20 f., 27, and n. 12), all of which implies that he is not only citing facts known to the readers, but that he can also count upon their understanding of brief or obscure hints. How necessary this preliminary remark was, is indicated by the history of the interpretation of the closely connected sentences in ver. 5 f., which Jude must have had particularly in view when he made the remark, since the connection of the third statement (ver. 7) is much more loose than that of the others. The first thing he recalled is this, namely, "that God, the Lord (this is the meaning of κύριος without the article), or (according to the reading which is probably original, see n. 12) that Jesus, after having saved a people out of Egypt, the second time destroyed them that believed not." That a fact from the O.T. is here meant is doubtful; for then the order in which Jude cites his facts is very remarkable, since in such a case he would pass from the later books of the Pentateuch or O.T. back to Gen. vi. and xix. (cf. the opposite order in Sir. xvi. 6-10). Against this understanding of the reference is also the omission of the article before λαός (cf. Acts xv. 14; Tit. ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 9 f.; but ὁ λαός, Matt. ii. 4, iv. 23; John xi. 50, 52, xviii. 14; Acts x. 2; 2 Pet. ii. 1; and ὁ λαὸς αὐτοῦ, Matt. i. 21; Luke i. 68; Rom. xi. 1). But the most important reason for rejecting this interpretation is the impossibility of finding within the O.T. the familiar second instance in which God destroyed those who were redeemed from Egypt but remained unbelieving, in comparison to a first instance, equally well known, in which He did the same thing; for that the cases were parallel is the natural presupposition, since otherwise it would be necessary to indicate the contrast in the divine action in the two cases (n. 12). The original readers readily understood that Jude was contrasting the judgment of the generation of Israel that came out of Egypt, who, with a few happy exceptions, perished in the wilderness for their unbelief without having seen the land of promise (Num. xiv. 11–38; Deut. i. 26, 32, ii. 14–16; Ps. cvi. 24; 1 Cor. x. 5; Heb. iii. 10, 19), with another generation, which likewise, after having been redeemed as God's people, was condemned and destroyed in punishment for its unbelief. Throughout the N.T., from the discourses of the Baptist to the visions of Revelation, we find expressed, indicated, or presupposed, the idea that Christ has accomplished a redemption comparable to the liberation of Israel from Egypt (n. 12). The object of this redemption is not the Jewish people, but nevertheless a people of God to whom the titles of Israel are applied (vol. i. p. 82 f.). In neither case, after the redemption of Israel out of Egypt and after the redemption by Christ, were the redeemed people of God destroyed, but the majority of those to whom redemption was offered—those who were called first of all to the acceptance of the redemption and the possession of the blessings which it assured, i.e. the countrymen and contemporaries of Jesus, who refused to have faith in Him—were condemned for their unbelief. Jude could say that Jesus had visited this judgment upon the unbelieving mass of the Jewish people, because they had been judged by the testimony of Jesus which they rejected (John xii. 48, xv. 22, ix. 39; Matt. xii. 39–45, xiii. 14 f.; Luke xx. 18), and because the threatening prophecy of Jesus about the evil and adulterous generation had been fulfilled by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (John ii. 19 = Mark xiv. 58, xv. 29; Acts vi. 14; also Matt. xxi. 19, 41–43, xxii. 7, xxiii. 35–xxiv. 2; Luke xix. 41–44, xxi. 5, vi. 20–24, xxiii. 28–31). Jude, therefore, must have written after this event. Among Jewish Christian Churches especially, in whose minds the memory of this catastrophe was fresh, no misunderstanding was possible, and for them in particular was the judgment upon the unbelieving majority of their own people the most powerful incentive to hold fast their faith, and to maintain it even against the temptation to which they had recently been subjected,—the temptation to accept a so-called Christianity, which really denied the only Lord of the Christians, and perverted into heathen immorality the state of grace in which His redeemed servants stood.

If Peter, who died in the year 64, toward the end of his life predicted to the same Christian Churches to which Jude is addressed, that teachers of an immoral type of Christianity, and persons with whom he had become acquainted outside their circle, who scoffed at the promise of the parousia, would appear among them; and if Jude believed, subsequent to the fall of Jerusalem, that this prediction was fulfilled in the creeping in of dangerous men, whose theory and practice were alike vicious, in whom were to be discerned the essential features of the prophetic description of 2 Peter,—he could say that this had been written concerning them long ago (ver. 4), and that their coming had been foretold to the readers by the lips of apostles (ver. 17 f.). Assuming the year 75 as the approximate date for the composition of Jude,—since a date much later is made impossible by the little we know of the author's life history (above, p. 239 f.),—a period of from ten to fifteen years had elapsed since Peter had written 2 Peter to the same Churches.

1. (P. 238.) In the time of Jesus and the apostles are to be distinguished, (1) The apostle Judas, son of Simon, a man from Carioth (John vi. 71, xiii. 2, etc.); (2) the apostle Judas-Jacobi (son of a certain James, see Forsch. vi. 344 f.), Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13; John xiv. 22, probably to be identified with Lebbaeus or Thaddaeus, Matt. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; (3) Judas [Jude], the son of Mary, brother of James, Joseph, Simon, several sisters, and Jesus (Matt. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3; Jude 1, cf. Matt. xii. 46; Mark iii. 31; John ii. 12, vii. 3-8; Acts i. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5; Hegesippus in Eus. H. E. iii. 19, xx. 1-8, xxxii. 5); (4) Judas Barsabas, a man of prophetic gifts, and the respected representative sent by the mother Church to the Church in Antioch, Acts xv. 22-34, cf. vol. i. p. 31 (to be distinguished from Joseph Barsabas surnamed Justus, Acts i. 23; Papias in Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 9). Still another name (§ 44, n. 1) is that of Judas, the last Jewish Christian bishop of Jerusalem in the time of Hadrian (Eus. H. E. iv. 5. 3; Chron., anno Abrah. 2139; Epiph.

Hær. lxvi. 20), whom Schlatter (Der Chronograph aus dem 10 Jahr. Antonins 1894, S. 25-37) declares to have been the author of a chronology which he thinks Eusebius (H. E. vi. 7) refers incorrectly to the time of Severus (cf. Forsch. vi. 283, 291 ff.).

2. (P. 238.) Clem. Hypot. Lat. trans. (Forsch. iii. 83), "Judas, qui catholicam scripsit epistolam, frater filiorum Joseph exstans valde religiosus et cum sciret propinquitatem domini, non tamen dicit se ipsum fratrem eius esse, sed quid dixit? 'Judas servus Jesu Christi, ut pote domini, frater autem Jacobi'; hoc enim verum est: frater erat ex Joseph." Clement holds to the view that the brothers of the Lord were sons of Joseph by an earlier wife. The pride of the relatives of Jesus, the δεσπόσυννοι, in their family, of which Africanus reminds us (Eus. H. E. i. 7. 14), was a later development (cf. vol. i. p. 109). Of more modern writers, cf. Bengel on Jude 1, but especially Hofmann, vii. 2. 145 f. The remarks of Spitta (300 f.), which are opposed to the view here advocated, are based, if the present writer understands them correctly, upon the untenable view that the title "Brother of James" is designed to establish the authority of the writer to send this letter of exhortation, having practically the same meaning as ἀπόστολος δὲ Ἰ. Χρ. (Tit. i. 1; cf. Rom. i. 1). Even if we be disposed to look upon the honour paid to the relatives of Jesus as one of the characteristics of the Jewish Christian type of thought,—of a kind not altogether spiritual, and contrary to the thought of Christ (Matt. xii. 49),—we are not to suppose that the Churches of Palestine had so far lost their reason as to pay special honour to Jude because he was a brother of James, or to Simeon because he was James' cousin, or, vice versa, to James because he was Jude's brother. On the contrary, after they believed they were known individually as "The brother of the Lord" (Gal. i. 19), and collectively as "Brethren of the Lord" (1 Cor. ix. 5; Acts i. 14); but they themselves make no use of this title in their Epistles. Here, as in Jas. i. 1, this negative conclusion is the only one that could be properly drawn from the writer's self-designation as a servant of Jesus Christ, even if it were not necessary in view of the chastically constructed contrast between δοῦλος—ἀδελφός δέ and Ἰ. Χρ. and Ἰάκωβος.

3. (P. 241.) There is scarcely any doubt about the meaning of ver. 3. With regard to ἔσχατον, cf. vol. i. p. 456, n. 3. From περὶ τῆς κ. ή. σωτηρίας we derive the impression that this is the central point or main subject of the proposed writing, since otherwise it would have to be further defined (cf. 1 Thess. v. 1; 1 John i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 12, iii. 16; Rom. i. 3). The strong expression, πᾶσαν σπουδὴν ποιούμενος γράφειν, means more than the eager turning over in one's mind of an intention which, in the case of a writing, would imply meditation preparatory to composition. Peter had such an intention in mind when he wrote 2 Pet. i. 15, but by the use of the future σπουδάσω he indicates that this intention has yet to be zealously carried out; Jude was already engaged in the work. Cf. also Gal. ii. 10; 2 Pet. i. 5. By the ἅπασι, ver. 3 (Heb. vi. 4), which is not essentially different in meaning from ἐφ' ᾧ (cf. 1 Pet. iii. 18 with Rom. vi. 10, or Heb. ix. 12 with ix. 26), it is clearly implied that a second παρὰδιδόναι is superfluous or inadmissible. Even in ver. 5, where ἅπασι approaches the sense of "in general" (überhaupt) (Hermas, Vie. iii. 3. 4; Mand. iv. 4. 1; Didymus, Lat. omnino—ἅπασι, de Trin. i. 19, cf. ἅπασι πᾶσι), it is correlated with ἐπομνήσαι, in distinction from διδάσκειν. τοῖς ἁγίοις without further definition can only mean the whole Church, or the Church of the Holy Land (vol. i. p. 455 f., n. 2). But since in the matter of faith the latter were not distinguished from the Gentile Christian Churches (cf. e.g. Gal. i. 22-24; 1 Thess. ii. 14; 1 Cor. xv. 11; 1 Pet. v. 9, 12; 2 Pet. iii. 15 f.), and since the Epistle shows no hostile feeling toward the Christianity of other Churches, it must mean the whole Church. The objections raised by Spitta (309) are to the present writer unintelligible, and Spitta's opinion (416), that through a misreading of 2 Pet. ii. 21 (τοῖς ἁγίοις instead of αὐτοῖς ἁγίας), Jude, contrary to all known usage, understood "the saints" to mean the apostles, seems hardly to require refutation. All Christians are here appropriately called saints (cf. 1 Pet. i. 15 f.); and this thought is somewhat emphasised by the relation of the word to the context, because in what follows the writer deals with persons who are or who have been reckoned among the "saints," and who, having received the same faith as the readers, have perverted it in a direction antagonistic both to the holiness of the Church and to its faith (ver. 20).

4. (P. 243.) Since παρεσέδυσαν is used in ver. 4 as παρεσῆλθον in Gal. ii. 4 without any indication of the region where the false teachers had crept in, it is necessary in both instances to supply this from the context. In Galatians it is the Church in Antioch (ZKom. Gal. 86 f.); here it is the circle of the readers among whom they are now found, ver. 12, and also in the latter passage their entrance into the Church through a purely sham conversion and hypocritical baptism is not called a παρεσδύναι. Their teaching is that rejected in Rom. vi. 1. 15; Gal. v. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 16; and referred to in Rom. vi. 12; 1 Cor. vi. 12 ff., but described at greatest length in 2 Pet. ii. (above, p. 224 f.).

5. (Pp. 243, 245.) Even Didymus on Jude 11 (Latin version) interprets the typical significance of Korah as above, p. 244 f. Cf. 1 Cor. x. 1-11. In addressing the Church of Corinth, which was stirring up an insurrection against its founder, in 1 Cor. x. 10 Paul uses the words μὴ γογγύετε, which are undoubtedly suggested by Num. xvii. 6-14, and so are intended to remind them of those complaints against the authorities which were instigated by Korah, and after his destruction were echoed throughout the entire congregation. Cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 16, also cf. Heb. xiii. 17 with Heb. iii. 7-iv. 11. The meaning of the comparison with Cain is more obscure. Being the first of three types, it may possibly express the more general thought that the false teachers are given over to unrighteousness; since, as contrasted with the righteous Abel, Cain is an unrighteous man (Matt. xxiii. 35). With this possibly is connected the thought of 1 John iii. 12, 15, that they, on account of their "evil works," are jealous of the righteous and their enemies, and are murderers of their own brothers. It is also possible that underlying the passage there is a traditional Jewish description of these "evil works" (cf. Siegfried, Philo, S. 150 f.). Spitta (352), following the example of Schneckenburger (Beiträge z. Einl. 221), attaches great importance to the embellishment of Gen. iv. in the Jerusalem Targum i., which represents Cain as disputing with Abel, and saying, "There is no judgment, and no judge, and no other world; the righteous will receive no good reward, and vengeance will not be taken upon the ungodly." This would suit perfectly the description in 2 Pet., but does not suit so well that in Jude, where no mention is made of the denial of the eschatological hope which is especially noticeable in ver. 18. With regard to the text of ver. 12, see above, p. 235, on 2 Pet. ii. 13. Because in this instance ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν instead of ἀγάπαις αὐτῶν precedes, συν- in συνευωχούμενοι has a different force. The added ὑμῶν, which is poorly attested, is nevertheless correct in thought. There is much in favour of taking ἀφόβως with what follows, as in S² S³, and is done by Hofmann; for there is nothing inherently blameworthy about taking part in their feasts without fear. Nor can it hardly be the mere "feasting together" that is condemned, but rather the manner of their participation in the love-feasts, namely, the fact that they conduct themselves as σπιλάδες, which is clearly not here used in the sense of "rocks," "cliffs," but is intelligible only if taken as related etymologically and in sense to σπῖλοι, 2 Pet. ii. 13 ("spots"), and, therefore, as equivalent to ἐσπιλωμένοι, Jude 23; μεμιασμένοι, as in Hesychius' gloss (cf. Jude 8; Tit. i. 15; Rev. iii. 4, xiv. 4). Didymus (Lat.) reads qui in dilectionibus vestris maculatis (but read rather with Lucke maculati) cōmpulantur. Cf. Hofmann on vv. 12 and 23. This does not in any sense imply that they practised immorality at their love-feasts, but that they partook of them polluted by their unchastity, and wherever they went took with them the thoughts and passions corresponding to the character of their life.

6. (P. 244.) Ἀποδιορίζοντες, which is used in ver. 19 without the object, does not require the supplying of a single definite object any more than this is required when we speak of something that separates in distinction from something that unites. If διορίζειν is an emphatic ὀρίζειν, ἀποδιορίζειν is an emphatic ἀφορίζειν, and means a separation completely accomplished. The Pharisees, Gr. οἱ ἀφωρισμένοι (see vol. i. p. 68), separated themselves from the am ha arets and made sharp distinctions among the people of God, without withdrawing entirely from the people. These false teachers made even sharper distinctions, and created divisions along the lines of these distinctions. They are αἰρετικοί, Tit. iii. 10. In contrast to their practice stands the strong sense of unity in the Church, ver. 20f. The Holy Spirit unites (ver. 20); the ψυχικοί, who are without the Spirit, divide (ver. 19), in the first place by their presumptuous judgments, and then by conduct tending to destroy the fellowship of the Church. That they claimed in exceptional measure to possess the Spirit, asserting that they were πνευματικοί, as distinguished from ψυχικοί, is at least probable. The misuse of Pauline phrases among these persons (2 Pet. iii. 16) reminds one of 1 Cor. ii. 10–iii. 3.

7. (P. 247.) Πλάνη is clearly used in an active sense ("leading astray," "seduction") in 1 Thess. ii. 3 (cf. 2 Cor. vi. 8); 2 Thess. ii. 11 (cf. ver. 9, τῶν πλάνων); also in Matt. xxvii. 64. The deceiver of the people (ὁ πλάνος, xxvii. 63) led them astray so long as he lived (John vii. 12; Luke xxiii. 2). His alleged resurrection will not increase the error of the people, but will make stronger and more injurious his power to lead them astray. Furthermore, cf. 1 John iv. 6 with 2 John 7; 1 Tim. iv. 1. In Eph. iv. 14 also the word can be taken only in an active sense, on account of the word with which it is connected, μεθοδία τῆς πλάνης, and the context.

8. (P. 248.) It is presupposed that in ver. 22f. Tischendorf's critical apparatus is very imperfect, but that he nevertheless gives the correct reading (cf. Spitta, 377 f.). The reading is the same as that given by Clement (Lat.) in connection with ver. 23 (Porsch. iii. 85); while, on the other hand, ver. 22, like so many other verses, is overlooked, this passage is carelessly quoted by Clement from memory in Strom. vi. 65. It is impossible for the present writer to escape the impression that Didache ii. 7 is dependent upon Jude 22 f.: οὐ μισήσεις πάντα ἄνθρωπον, ἀλλὰ οὓς μὲν ἐλέγξεις, περὶ δὲ ὧν προσεύξη, οὓς δὲ ἀγαπήσεις ὑπὲρ τὴν ψυχὴν σου. The third clause is the least accurate reproduction; but the preceding, "thou shalt hate no man," is in keeping with Jude's thought, who, while he requires hatred of the sins of the wicked (cf. Rev. ii. 6), requires also mercy toward the persons themselves.

9. (Pp. 248, 249.) In opposition to Spitta's contention (311 f.) that τοῦτο τὸ κρίμα = "this accusation," is used to introduce the words ἀσεβείς . . . ἀπορούμενοι, it is sufficient to suggest (1) that this syntactical relation can be expressed only by a complete sentence either in direct discourse (1 Cor. vii. 29; Gal. iii. 2, 17), or with ὅτι (Rom. ii. 3, xi. 25; 1 Cor. xv. 50; 2 Thess. iii. 10), or by an infinitive sentence (Rom. xiv. 13; 1 Cor. vii. 26; 2 Cor. ii. 1; Eph. iv. 17); (2) that κρίμα is hardly anywhere used in the sense of accusation. Nor is Hofmann's interpretation satisfactory, according to which τοῦτο refers to the judgment visited upon the intruders in the present; for, although the sinner may be thought of as one who by his very act condemns himself (John iii. 18 f.; Gal. ii. 11), this is not stated either in what precedes or follows; so it is not a manifest fact to which τοῦτο might refer. But Hofmann states what is correct and really self-evident when he says that τοῦτο refers to what precedes, namely, to παρεισέδυσαν. Furthermore, Spitta reads more into the passage than it contains when he (314 f., 383 f.) concludes, from the article with προγεγραμμένοι, that acquaintance is here presupposed with a writing in which a still older prophecy, presumably from the O.T., is applied to the persons who now have crept in among the readers of Jude. Just as it is presupposed in John xi. 2 that the readers had heard or read of a woman who had anointed Jesus' feet, and that the information is there imparted that the woman, whose name they had not heretofore known, was Mary of Bethany; so Jude assumes that the readers know that it has been previously written or prophesied in an older writing that certain persons, who are libertines in theory and practice, will make their appearance among them. What he says now is this, namely, that the persons who shortly before have appeared among the readers are those whose appearance among them was prophesied in the older writing. But Jude's reference is not to a commentary upon a prophecy, but to a writing whose prophecy is being fulfilled in the present, i.e. to 2 Pet. ii. 1-3, where we do not find an older prophecy applied to present phenomena, but where it is predicted that false teachers will come among the readers. Although not an independent sentence, the appositive clause expresses exactly the same thought as a sentence in the form οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ προγεγραμμένοι κτλ., or something similar; cf. Matt. iii. 3, xi. 10; John i. 46 (1 John ii. 22). By the use of this form of expression in vv. 12 and 19 is preserved the identity of the persons of unchristian character who have appeared among the readers with certain persons already described, except that the relation of subject and object is the reverse of that in ver. 4, as required by the different connections of the two passages. The mockers, whose appearance in the last age is prophesied by the apostles (ver. 18), are none other than the persons who, as the readers can daily observe, create divisions (ver. 19). In the same way, after a typical and typological char-acterisation of them (ver. 10 f.), Jude identifies the persons who in the presence of the readers take part in their love-feasts (ver. 12). Of an entirely different character are the sentences in vv. 8, 10, 16, where the end sought is not the identification of figurative with actual persons, but where mention is made of different characteristics of the persons appearing among the readers, who have already been described with sufficient definiteness in ver. 4 (thus the use of οἱτο).

10. (P. 250.) The language used in ver. 18 is not entirely comparable with 1 Tim. iv. 1; for, although in this latter passage the ῥητῶς shows that the reproduction of thought is intended to be as accurate as possible (see above, p. 111), ὅτι, the formula of indirect discourse, which does not occur before the words quoted in Jude 18, indicates that the quotation is not a formal citation.

11. (P. 252.) With πάλαι, Jude 4, cf. Mark xv. 44 (according to the preponderance of evidence), also Soph. Philoct. 1030=some hours before; 2 Cor. xii. 19=since the time when Paul began to use the tone of self-defence, consequently somewhere about xi. 5, or possibly from the beginning of the letter (i. 12)—from the point of view of the readers and hearers of the letter about an hour before; 2 Pet. i. 9; Matt. xi. 21=within the lifetime of the men in question; Jos. Bell. iii. 8. 8, in contrast to ἄρτι, the time prior to the captivity which has just taken place, or, if we read οὐ πάλαι="not long ago."

12. (Pp. 253, 254.) The peculiar εἰδὼτας ἅπαξ πάντα has given rise to numerous attempts to transpose ἅπαξ, and in some instances to its omission altogether; also to change πάντα into πάντας (S², but not in all MSS.), and into τοῦτο, which is more common. Here the apparatus of Tischendorf, which is not always without errors, and not very clear, is sufficient. It is more difficult to decide whether the correct reading is κύριος or Ἰησοῦς. Ὁ θεός (without a preceding κύριος), which is badly attested by a careless quotation in Clement, Paed. iii. 44 (where λαόν also is arbitrarily put out of its place), S² and other unimportant witnesses, is out of the question, because it suits any interpretation, and is found as an addition to κύριος in Clement, Hypot. (Forsch. iii. 83). It is even less possible to assume with Spitta that the original reading was θεός without the article, which is entirely unattested. Certainly the article which is placed before κύριος in the Antiochian recension (KL S²) is not original, because it has against it all the authorities which support both κύριος and Ἰησοῦς (for which ὁ Ἰησοῦς could have been written equally well), also the dominus deus (i.e. κύριος ὁ θεός) of Clement (Hypot. Lat. trans.), and because very frequently the article is inserted before the anarthrous κύριος (Matt. i. 22, ii. 15; Jas. iv. 10, v. 10). The only choice left is that between κύριος (Σ, perhaps C* and a Greek document attributed to Eph. Syr.) and Ἰησοῦς. The latter reading is attested by AB, 66 (=Paul. 67), Sahidic, Coptic, Ethiopic, Vulgate versions; also by Origen (both in the text and scholion of the Cod. Laura 184, B 64, upon Mount Athos; see von der Goltz, Eine textkrit. Arbeit des zehnten bzw. sechsten Jahrh. 1899, S. 51; cf. ThLb. 1899, No. 16), and by Jerome, Vall. ii. 270, vii. 413. This was also Didymus' reading, not only in his Latin commentary, ad luc., but also in de Trín. iii. 19, although the text, as we have it, reads κύριος Ἰησοῦς. That the correct reading, however, is Ἰησοῦς is proved by the fact that Jerome, vii. 412, is in verbal agreement with Did. de Trin. Ἰουδᾶς καθολικῶς γράφει ("Judas de omnibus generaliter . . . inquit"), so that Jerome in this passage of his commentary on Gal. must have copied from Didymus' commentary on the same book, which, p. 370, he mentions as one of his sources. There are also certain considerations of fact which support the much more strongly attested Ἰησοῦς as against κύριος. The mention of Jesus in a statement about the redemption out of Egypt is altogether strange and quite without parallel. The situation is not materially helped by assuming, as Jerome does, that Joshua is meant; see contra Jov. i. 21 (Vall. ii. 270). This did not occur as a solution to the oldest interpreters, who substituted God for Ἰησοῦς (Clement; see above). Didymus (Migne, 39. 1813) and Jerome, in the passage where he copies Didymus (Vall. vii. 412), and apparently also Origen in the seventh homily on Deut. (in the above quoted Athos MS.), use this passage to prove that it was Jesus Himself with whom the congregation in the O.T. had to do, a thought of very early date; cf. Just. Dial. cxx., Ἰησοῦν τὸν καὶ τοὺς πατέρας ὑμῶν ἐξ Αἰγύπτου ἐξαγαγόντα. The name of Jesus did not prevent Didymus from making the sentence refer to the redemption of Israel from Egypt, without recourse to the impossible interpretation of the word to mean Joshua. Cf. also Cramer, Cat. viii. 155. 18, 157. 21, 158. 5-13, 161. 2. But whereas Clement understood correctly that Jude meant the judgment which came upon the Jewish people because of their failure to believe on Jesus (Forsch. iii. 83, 96), Didymus confines the meaning to the dying of Israelites in the wilderness; cf. 1 Cor. x. 5; Heb. iii. 16-19. It hardly needs to be proved that the adverbial δεῦτερον, τρίτον κτλ, both with the article (Mark xiv. 41; John xxi. 17; 2 Cor. xiii. 2) and without it (John iii. 4, xxi. 14, 16; Luke xxiii. 22; Rev. xix. 3; 2 Cor. xiii. 1), just as ἐκ δευτέρου (Matt. xxvi. 42; Mark xiv. 72; John ix. 24; Acts x. 15, xi. 9), shows that the action which it modifies is a repetition of an earlier action, no matter whether it is previously intimated or not that this action has already once taken place. Accordingly it is also explained how in late Greek τρίτον actually means τρίς, "thrice" (see the writer's Acta Joannis, pp. 256, 258 sub voc.). What happens a second or third time has happened twice or thrice. Recently F. Maier, Bib. Z., 1904, S. 392, has confidently claimed that τὸ δεῦτερον here as also often elsewhere is by no means a numeral adverb, but = deinde, postea, or even ex contrario. This meaning, however, should in any case be proved by the actual usage of language and not by appeal to the Thesaurus of Stephanus, or to other exegetes; for example, to Hofmann, who (vii. 2. 159-161) has left not the slightest doubt concerning his contrary opinion in this matter. The only question is with what τὸ δεῦτερον is connected. Through the position of the words it is impossible that τὸ δ. is to be taken with πιστεύσαντας, as if the reading were τοὺς τὸ δ. μὴ πιστεύσαντας. But also not with λαὸν . . . σώσας, for every intelligent author would have made this connection necessary for the reader by placing τὸ δ. before λαὸν or before σώσας. It belongs, therefore, to the principal verb ἀπώλεσεν. By this it is only indirectly said that also in the first instance on the part of many members of the nation which was to be saved, there existed unbelief to which that referred to in Jude is opposed as a similar second lack of faith; and just as indirect is the statement that in the first instance as in the second (concerning which it is directly asserted) a deliverance of a nation out of Egypt had preceded the judgment on its unbelieving members. Only if τὸ δ. preceded σώσας or μὴ πιστ.—i.e. did not belong with ἀπώλεσεν—could the meaning be, that in fact the presuppositions of the main statement, namely, the deliverance of a nation or the unbelief of many of its members, were the same in both instances, but only in the second and not in the first could the divine action be an ἀπολέσαι. Even then the contrast would probably have been expressed; cf. Heb. ix. 28, ἀπαξ—ἐκ δευτέρου (=τὸ δεύτερον ἐρχόμενος); 2 Cor. xiii. 2, εἰς τὸ πάλιν (i.e. ἐλθὼν τὸ τρίτον), οὐ φείσομαι (sc. ὡς τὸ πρῶτον). The only question is whether Jesus is to be thought of as the author of the first—only indirectly expressed—ἀπώλεσεν, which occurred in the wilderness, and so also indirectly of the first σώσας. In view of John xii. 41, 1 Cor. x. 4, 9 (τὸν Χριστόν in DGKL, Marcion; Iren. iv. 27. 3; Clement, Ecl. proph. xlix, and the ancient versions), this cannot be declared to be impossible. But from an exegetical point of view it is not possible. Since the action, with all its expressed presuppositions, is described only as a second one of its kind, the subjects in the two cases might be different; so that τὸ δεύτερον is an abbreviated expression for the thought, “And this was the second time that this happened.” The comparison between the N.T. redemption and that of Israel from Egypt is presupposed in John i. 29, 36, and more clearly in 1 Pet. i. 15–21 (ii. 9; 2 Pet. ii. 1); 1 Cor. x. 1–11 (cf. v. 7 f.; Tit. ii. 14); Rev. i. 5 f., v. 9 f., xv. 3. Jude just after the judgment upon Israel speaks in the same manner as Paul prior to 70 (1 Thess. ii. 16; Rom. xi. 9 f.), merely alluding to the coming event. Above all, a comparison should be made with the typological expressions of Heb. in connection with the redemption of the people of God, and the judgment which is to follow upon the unbelieving of the redeemed generation; see below, § 46, n. 6; § 47, n. 9, with the amplifications belonging to them in the text.

§ 44. THE GENUINENESS OF JUDE AND THE TWO EPISTLES OF PETER (N. 1).

The question with regard to the genuineness of two of these Epistles is very sharply defined. It is even more impossible in the case of 2 Peter than of James or 1 Peter, by the assumption of later additions or by modifying the greeting, to get out of the letter an old writing, the author of which is not responsible for the claims that meet us in the document. The manner in which the beginning of the letter is connected with the greeting by the construction of the sentence, the repeated and definite references to experiences of Peter and his fellow-apostles, which are in keeping with the name in the greeting and declared to be experiences of the author (2 Pet. i. 3, 14, 16-18 ; above, pp. 194, 201-210, 215-221), make it clear beyond all question that the entire letter is meant to be represented as written by Peter. If the letter is spurious, it is not pseudepigraphic in the narrower sense of the word, but from beginning to end a forgery.

In the same way, the author of Jude has not left us to guess which one of the many Jews and Jewish Christians of this name it was whom he represented himself to be ; he introduces himself to his readers as the well-known brother of the still more distinguished James (above, p. 238 f.). If this introduction should prove to be false, then certainly we have no right to suppose that some other Jude is the author ; for the use of his own name on the part of a writer, in order to dispose of his wares under the mask of some older and more distinguished person of the same name, presupposes artificiality and boldness unparalleled in pseudepigraphic literature. Until examples to the contrary have been found, we may assume as certain that a pseudo-Ezra, or pseudo-John, or pseudo-Hermas, or pseudo-Jude was not actually known as Ezra, or John, or Hermas, or Jude. As regards its place in the Canon of the Church, Jude is better attested than 2 Peter, and even than James. Although the Syrian Church, when it adopted some of the Catholic Epistles into its Canon, rejected Jude, 2 Peter, and 2 and 3 John, these four letters being translated apparently for the first time by Philoxenus (died 508), Jude was accepted about the year 200 without any question in Alexandria, Rome, and North Africa. It is not necessary to investigate here the question to what extent the suspicions as to the genuineness of Jude and its place in the N.T. Canon, which developed later, led to its subsequent rejection in the Greek and Latin Churches. On the other hand, there is no evidence that before the time of Origen, 2 Peter was accepted anywhere in the Church as a writing of the same rank as 1 Peter. And throughout the whole of the fourth century we meet at most widely separated points in the Church very decided suspicion now of its genuineness, now of its place in the N.T. Canon. So long as it was presupposed that 2 Peter was addressed to the same Churches in Asia Minor as 1 Peter, the mere fact that the latter Epistle was early and very generally accepted was a strong point against the genuineness of 2 Peter; for what prevented those who first received this letter, which must have followed 1 Peter after a short interval, from circulating it just as early and just as widely as they did 1 Peter? (n. 2). If, however, it be proved that 2 Peter was not sent to the same Churches as 1 Peter, but to the Jewish Christian Churches in Palestine or neighbouring regions, it follows as a natural result that, from the beginning and for a long period, the history of the circulation and canonisation of these two letters followed entirely different lines. Just as the Nazarenes of the fourth century, notwithstanding their favourable opinion regarding Paul, and agreement with what is said in 2 Pet. iii. 15, thought that his letters to the Gentile Christian Churches did not concern themselves (GK, ii. 669 f.); so, for a long time, the Gentile Church took little account of 2 Peter, which was addressed to Jewish Christians. They treated James in practically the same way. But, in the case of both these letters, a limited circulation and early acquaintance of individuals with them are to be distinguished from acceptance of the same by the Catholic Church as books to be read in religious services (n. 3). There are points of resemblance between 2 Peter and a whole series of writings dating from 90 to 130, namely, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, the so-called Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and the Didache, and it is very natural to suppose that several pseudo-Petrine writings are related to 2 Peter (see below, pp. 270 f., 273). In all these cases it cannot be so conclusively proved that 2 Peter is the source that no further objection is possible. Nor is this proof necessary, if it be admitted that Jude quoted 2 Peter at the beginning and end of his letter as an apostolic writing composed several years before (above, p. 250 f.).

One cannot but feel weary over the evasions by which the interpreters obscure the fact that not only in Jude 17 f., but also in Jude 4, an older Christian writing—the same which in Jude 17 f. is called apostolic—is quoted, in which Jude found predicted what he saw being fulfilled at the time when he wrote his letter. Since we now have a writing, purporting to be Peter's, which contains exactly what Jude quotes from the apostolic document cited by him, and since, besides these two express references of Jude, there are so many parallels between Jude and 2 Peter as regards facts, thought, and language as to necessitate the assumption of a literary relation between them, by the ordinary canons of criticism we should conclude that Jude knew and prized 2 Peter as an apostolic writing, and made it the basis of parts of his letter. The very artificiality of the present prevailing view, which reverses the relation, and represents the author of 2 Peter as copying from Jude, often unintelligently, requires that its exegetical proof should be all the stronger (n. 4). Certainly the style of Jude, which, in comparison with the obscure and clumsy style of 2 Peter, is clearer and generally better, cannot be used to prove the priority of Jude; for what was there to hinder Jude from surpassing many of the original apostles in the use of the Greek language and in natural fluency of speech, as his brother James did? Furthermore, it is only natural that in descriptions of actual and present phenomena, like those of Jude, the representation of the seducers should be more sharply outlined than in 2 Peter, which is so largely prophetic in character. If 2 Peter is genuine, it clearly cannot be dependent upon Jude; for, in the first place, Jude did not write until after the year 70, i.e. after Peter's death; and, in the second place, in representing as a prediction the appearance among the readers of false teachers, when from Jude he knew that they had already made their appearance among the readers of this Epistle, the writer of 2 Peter would necessarily have indicated clearly the difference between the historical presentation in his source and his own prophetic representation. He would also have distinguished between the region where, according to Jude, the seducers were already at work, and the region where, according to 2 Peter, they were to appear in the future.

But even assuming that 2 Peter is a forgery of the second century, and that Jude is a genuine writing of the late apostolic age, the view that the former is dependent upon the latter can be maintained only by a series of artificial hypotheses. If Jude 4, 17 f. has been correctly explained above (p. 250 f.), it is necessary to assume that the apostolic document which Jude quotes as his authority in both these passages was early lost, and that 2 Peter is a later caricature substituted for it. This lost apostolic writing must have resembled 2 Peter very closely. Like 2 Peter, it must have contained the prediction that persons who were libertines in theory and practice would appear as seducers among Jude's readers (Jude 4; 2 Pet. ii. 1-3). In it must have been found also a prediction regarding the scoffers of the last time, which is found in almost identical words in 2 Pet. iii. 3 and Jude 18, in the former without any definite indication as to its source, in the latter quoted as an apostolic word. The common assumption that the author of 2 Peter took these passages and all others parallel to Jude directly from this Epistle, is another hypothesis without any basis; for what prevented the author of 2 Peter from copying them all from the lost apostolic document quoted by Jude? In this case 2 Peter is not an independent writing, but, in part at least, the recasting of an ancient writing known to Jude as the work of an apostle. There is no doubt that such a writing, if it existed, bore the name of Peter, and had the form of a letter, since there is no reason why the later editor should have modified his original in these two respects. There is usually no difficulty in assuming such recasting of older genuine writings. Why in this case should we assume that the ancient and genuine document attested by Jude disappeared altogether, and that later 2 Peter was written on the basis of hints and quotations in Jude? But even assuming that this older writing was actually lost or destroyed, which is improbable, the origin of 2 Peter still remains inexplicable (n. 5). To reconstruct at a later time, from hints in Jude and from imagination, a lost apostolic prophecy concerning future errors, which, according to Jude, was actually fulfilled in the apostolic age, would have been a task as purposeless as it was difficult. It is much more conceivable that the old prophetic writing cited by Jude, and regarded by him as apostolic, was worked over in the light of more recent events to suit the spirit of the age, in order to make it more effective, and that in this way 2 Peter received all the peculiarities which have from the earliest times caused its genuineness to be questioned.

But the other assumption, namely, that both Jude and 2 Peter are spurious products of the post-apostolic age, involves the most unlikely consequences. They could not have originated independently of each other; but neither could they have been written by the same author, nor by two different forgers working together. Anyone desiring to oppose a tendency which sprang up in the post-apostolic time, on the authority of an apostle, might very well have done so in the form of an apostolic letter, in which, as in 2 Peter, the appearance of certain false teachers and scoffers is predicted. But it is difficult to understand how one who had written such a letter, or someone working in conspiracy with him, could have forged Jude also, in which the prediction of Peter regarding the future would be represented as having been almost immediately fulfilled. Circumstances seemed rather to require a prediction, in order that an apostle might be represented as prophetically condemning later phenomena in the life of the Church. It would be necessary to assume that the author of Jude regarded 2 Peter as genuine, and that the later forger was deceived by the older one. But even in this case it has yet to be explained why the person who thought that the prediction of 2 Peter was fulfilled in certain phenomena of his time used a pseudonym in order to express this single fact, and further obscured the reference of his view to his own times by putting it into the mouth of Jude, the brother of James, who had long since died.

Passing now from these considerations of a hypothetical nature to the examination of the genuineness of the letter, the very manner in which the writer designates himself in Jude 1 predisposes us in favour of the genuineness of this Epistle. According to historical tradition, Jude, the brother of James, is a very obscure personality (above, p. 240 f.); according to later tradition also, he was not an apostle, and in the circle of the early Christian authors down to the year 200, his name does not once appear (see Eus. II. E. vi. 7). What could have induced anyone desiring to defend the common Christian faith and Christian morality to represent himself as Jude? Why was it necessary for him to assume any character at all? Nothing that he says requires any particular authority. He refers to certain unpleasant conditions in the present life of his readers; describes them, and condemns them severely, but only in such a way as every earnest Christian was under necessity of doing. He declares that in these events of the present an apostolic prediction written years before is finding its fulfilment; but this, again, could be recognised and expressed by any ordinary Christian under the same conditions. Nor does he claim any special authority. He does not call himself an apostle, and intimates only in a very modest way that he is the Jude known to the readers as one of the brothers of Jesus (above, pp. 238f., 256). A further proof of genuineness is the manner in which he refers to one or to a number of apostolic writings. What forger, who could have had no other purpose in such a reference than to strengthen the authority of his own writing, would have been content with such hints as we find in Jude 4, 17 f.? Would he not have mentioned the apostle, or apostles, by name? If it be assumed that the letter is spurious, then the reference to another writing of the author, which was in the process of composition at the time this letter was written (ver. 3; above, pp. 241, 256), is wholly inexplicable. In case the letter is genuine, we have only to assume, either that the purpose of Jude there expressed, like so many other literary intentions, was never carried out, or that the writing contemplated at that time and later published, like so many other early Christian writings, has not come down to us (Luke i. 1; 1 Cor. v. 9, vii. 1). On the other hand, if the letter is spurious, it is necessary to assume that such a work of Jude regarding the Christian salvation existed at this time, and was generally known when this letter was written in Jude's name. But there is no trace of such a didactic writing of Jude's (n. 6). If such a writing in Jude's name did exist, it is wholly inexplicable why the author should speak of a writing which Jude intended to produce instead of the writing actually at hand. The fact that the author makes use of two pseudepigraphic writings bearing O.T. names, namely, the Assumption of Moses and the Book of Enoch (n. 7), lessened for a time the ecclesiastical reputation of the Epistle; but this is no reason why we should question its genuineness. Except for the references in Jude, we do not know how these two books and other writings of like character were regarded by the older apostles and the brothers of Jesus. Nevertheless, what we find in Jude would seem to indicate that several of these writings, which do not stand the test of historical criticism, were regarded in this worthy circle as reliable witnesses of genuine tradition and true prophecy. It is, however, of critical importance that Jude apparently did not use the newly discovered Greek translation, but the Hebrew or Aramaic original of the Book of Enoch (n. 7). Jude is, like his brother James, a Hebrew who is also able to handle the Greek language with comparative ease. After what has been said above, vol. i. pp. 45, 113, the fact that Jude and Peter, if he is the author of 2 Peter, used the Greek language in addressing Jewish Christians, does not require further explanation. The other things that have caused objections to Jude, namely, its description of the libertines, and the resemblance it bears in thought and language to the letters of Paul, apply equally to 2 Peter. Therefore they can be best discussed with reference to the two letters together, taking into account, of course, their mutual relations and their differences.

If, on the one hand, it seems strange that a later author should write a letter in Jude's name, it is, on the other, entirely comprehensible that the name of the chief of the apostles should be misused in the writing of a spurious letter. Perhaps as early as the beginning of the second century a κήρυγμα Πέτρου was ascribed to him, and toward the middle of the same century an εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Πέτρον, in both of which writings Peter himself assumes the rôle of author. The same is true of the ἀποκάλυψις Πέτρου, which is likewise old. Furthermore, in this same century, in the πράξεις Πέτρου, which are written from a Gnostic point of view, Peter is made the hero of a whole series of apostolic legends. Apparently in the third century he is made the principal figure in the Clementine Romance (Homilies), which is written in an Ebionitic spirit; while at the beginning of the Greek recension of this Romance we find a letter from him to James (n. 8). In view of all this, the mere occurrence of Peter's name in an ancient writing is no proof of authorship. Furthermore, the view taken above regarding the authorship of 1 Peter (p. 149 f.) deprives us of one of the chief means of determining the genuineness of 2 Peter. And yet it is with the comparison of these two letters that our criticism must begin. Notwithstanding the mention of Silvanus in 1 Pet. v. 12, 1 Peter was very early recognised and circulated as a genuine writing of the apostle. Anyone desiring to ascribe a second Church letter to Peter at a later date could not disregard the earlier and highly prized first Epistle. According to the traditional opinion, the author of 2 Peter actually made an explicit reference to 1 Peter. But we have seen that 2 Pet. iii. 1 does not refer to 1 Peter, and that 2 Peter does not, like 1 Peter, claim to be directed to the Gentile Christian Churches of Asia Minor, but to the Jewish Christian Churches of Palestine (pp. 194 f., 201–209). This, so far as the present writer is able to see, is the conclusion of a perfectly sound exegesis, and the conclusion is confirmed by the fact that there are only a very few agreements in thought and language between 1 and 2 Peter (n. 9). On the other hand, there is something strikingly original about the author's self-designation, Συμεὼν Πέτρος, which, so far as we know, is unheard of elsewhere in Petrine and pseudo-Petrine literature. The peculiar and often obscure style of 2 Peter is in itself a strong argument against the suspicion that the letter was forged at a later time. The fact that 2 Peter is entirely independent of 1 Peter, the genuineness of which was widely accepted at a much earlier date, is still stronger proof of the genuineness of the former. Then the fact is to be considered that in 2 Pet. iii. 1 a letter of Peter is referred to which has not come down to us. Now it must be admitted that the reference in this place to a letter which never existed would be meaningless, and a fiction entirely opposed to the forger's purpose, namely, to win the confidence of his readers. Accordingly, those who deny the genuineness of 2 Peter must assume that the same pseudo-Peter, or one before him, wrote another pseudo-Petrine letter. But then it is necessary to explain why only the second of this pair of forged letters is preserved, although the author calls attention in iii. 1 to the fact that he has addressed an earlier letter to the same readers. In like manner, the announcement of Peter's intention to leave to the readers a comprehensive and didactic writing (i. 15; above, p. 200 f.) presents greater difficulties than the opponents of the genuineness of 2 Peter seem to recognise. The only purpose which a forger could have had in such a reference would be to make his letter, which was as yet unknown, seem more genuine by connecting it with a recognised writing of Peter. But how incredible it is that he should assert merely his intention of composing such a writing, and not the fact that he had actually done so! And if he meant a writing in Peter's name highly prized at the time, such, e.g. as the ancient κήρυγμα Πέτρου, how aimless it was on his part to omit all definite references to it! But here again the assumption of genuineness removes all the difficulties, as in the case of the writing which Jude had planned but which has not come down to us (above, p. 269). The mere fact that Peter's letter, mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 1, has not been preserved, needs no more explanation than the fact that the letter of Paul's spoken of in 1 Cor. v. 9 was not made a part of the collection of his Epistles. The preservation of 2 Peter alone may be due to the fact that it was only in this letter and not in the earlier one mentioned in 2 Pet. iii. 1 that phenomena of Church life were discussed which appeared first in the Gentile Christian Churches, and made their way thence into the Jewish Christian Churches (above, pp. 223 ff., 242 ff.), as Peter predicts would be the case, and Jude testifies actually to have happened. For this reason 2 Peter and Jude had a certain value also for the Gentile Church, and found some circulation there (above, p. 263 f.), while a hortatory letter written by the Apostle of the Circumcision to Churches belonging in the original sphere of his labours, which lacked such reference to the dangers threatening the whole Church, remained confined within this original circle. The fact that, so far as we know, the intention of Peter expressed in 2 Pet. i. 15 was never carried out, requires no special explanation. Yet it is hard not to think that the κήρυγμα Πέτρου was an invention suggested by 2 Pet. i. 15, and intended to supply the gap in the apostolic literature which this reference indicated. In the same way the emphasis upon the parousia as an integral element of the Petrine preaching (2 Pet. i. 16), and the prophetic character of 2 Pet. ii.–iii. probably supplied the impulse for the fabrication of the ἀποκάλυψις Πέτρου.

So long as it was assumed that 1 Peter was written by the apostle's own hand, and that 2 Peter was directed to the same readers as 1 Peter, the great difference between the two letters in thought and language was necessarily strong evidence against the genuineness of 2 Peter. These two presuppositions proving to be wrong, however, this argument against 2 Peter falls to the ground. That a letter to the Gentile Christian Churches of Asia Minor, written by Silvanus at Peter's request and in his name, would be different from a letter written by his own hand to Jewish Christian Churches who owed their Christian faith to him and his companions, is self-evident. In particular, it is clear that in the latter case he would necessarily betray an entirely different consciousness of his apostolic calling and official relation to the readers. While in the first letter he allows himself to be represented, and to a certain extent introduced, by a missionary prominent in the Churches of Asia Minor, in the second he speaks as the Apostle of the Circumcision to the flock over which Christ had made him shepherd (John xxi. 15–17; cf. x. 16). In speaking to these he could say of himself what Paul said to the Corinthians in 1 Cor. ix. 2—and there was occasion for him to write in this way if, as we saw above (pp. 222 f., 245), he had become acquainted with a party which had sprung up in the Gentile Christian Churches; which spoke contemptuously of the simple Christians of the first generation and condemned the apostles; which was already threatening to bring this dangerous teaching also into the Jewish Churches. It is to be observed, however, that Peter does not defend and magnify his apostleship in anything like the severe and exalted tone of Paul (Gal. i. 1–ii. 14; 1 Cor. iii. 10–iv. 21, ix. 1–6, xv. 10; 2 Cor. x. 1–11, xi. 1–xii. 12, xiii. 1–3, 10; cf. 2 Pet. i. 1, 3, 16–18). From beginning to end the letter shows a brotherly spirit, and is in keeping with Christ's exhortation to Peter in Luke xxii. 32. Anyone who regards the synoptic narrative of the transfiguration and the words of Jesus in John xiii. 36 f., xxi. 18–22, as unhistorical, must, of course, take exception to the reference in 2 Pet. i. 14, 16–18. But it must be remembered that when such prejudices, which in the last analysis are dogmatic, are allowed to influence literary criticism, the latter ceases to be worthy of its name. On the contrary, the manifest independence of this self-testimony of Peter, when compared with the Gospel accounts (above, pp. 203, 241–248), is strong proof that it is not of late origin, certainly not so late as 150 or 170. Besides, critics who are afraid of miracles need not be so seriously embarrassed in accepting 2 Peter as genuine; because the feature of the synoptic account of the Transfiguration which appears most mythical, namely, the appearance of Moses and Elias, is omitted in 2 Peter.

Of more importance are the difficulties caused by the statement about Paul and his letters in iii. 15 f. The chief thing to be noticed here is the fact that Peter speaks of a single letter which Paul is represented as having once sent to the Jewish Christian readers of 2 Peter, and the fact that the letter is not only wanting, but also that there is no other trace of its previous existence in the early Church (above, p. 198 f.). Again, the assumption that 2 Peter is spurious, brings us face to face with the question, why again and again these persons writing in the name of Peter and Jude refer to writings, some of them already in existence and others in process of preparation, which no one else knows anything about? In reality, this appeal to a letter of Paul's, no longer to be found, is also proof of the age and genuineness of 2 Peter (cf. above, pp. 266 f., 271). In recalling to the readers' minds a single letter of Paul's with which they are acquainted, Peter mentions also a large number of other Pauline letters which, as the whole context shows (above, pp. 198 f., 227 f.), were addressed not to them, but to other Christians. There is nothing to indicate that the readers were acquainted with these letters also. Indeed, all that Peter says of them would seem to imply the contrary. He assures the readers, in the first place, that Paul in all his letters, whenever he speaks about the subject under discussion (λαλῶν, not λαλήσας), expresses himself in a similar way. Then Peter speaks of misinterpretations of certain passages in these letters (n. 10), not by his own readers, but by the false teachers and their followers, previously described in his letter, with whom he became acquainted in Gentile Christian circles (above, p. 227 f.). So far this statement contains nothing which precludes the possibility of Petrine authorship. There is nothing improbable in the supposition that from 60 to 64 A.D. many of Paul's letters had spread beyond the single Churches to which they were severally directed and were circulated in the Gentile Christian Church. Significant proof that Peter had read such letters is found in the fact that not very long after the composition of 2 Peter, when he wrote to the Churches in Asia Minor by the hand of Silvanus, he made use of Romans and Ephesians (above,

p. 177). Moreover, Peter had urgent occasion to express himself in this way regarding Paul and his letters. For, if the libertines who had made their appearance among the Churches founded by Paul justified their teaching and practice by an appeal to certain expressions of Paul's in his letters, they would have a very confusing effect upon the Jewish Christian Churches, if, as Peter expected, they made their way into these Churches in the near future. It was possible that the false teachers might be recommended to some Jewish Christians by their treacherous semblance of agreement with the great Apostle to the Gentiles, and this made their attempt at seduction all the more dangerous. In the case of the majority of Jewish Christians, however, such a connection would only serve to increase the feeling of mistrust toward the Apostle to the Gentiles which was not yet entirely overcome (Acts xxi. 20 ff.).

According to 1 Pet. i. 12, v. 12, and all reliable testimony regarding Peter, he endeavoured just as earnestly as did Paul (Gal. i. 22-24, ii. 7-10; 1 Cor. xv. 11; 1 Thess. ii. 14; 2 Cor. ix. 8-15; Rom. xv. 26-32) to promote harmony between the two branches of the Church and their respective leaders. Consequently he does not here call Paul simply his personal friend, but the beloved brother of himself and of his Jewish Christian readers (cf. Acts xxi. 20). For the same reason he reminds the readers of the letter which they had received from Paul, probably not long before (above, p. 209), and from which they can see that Paul and Peter are in agreement regarding the great essentials of Christian faith and hope and Christian morality. With this end in view he assures them that the same fundamental principles are held by Paul in all his other letters, and that, consequently, the appeal of the false teachers to his authority is just as false as is the mistrust of Paul by many Jewish Christians.

The only thing that causes difficulty is the fact that the false teachers are also said to pervert "the other scriptures" (2 Pet. iii. 16). Since elsewhere in the N.T. αἱ γραφαί is used only to designate the sacred writings of that time, i.e. the O.T. Scriptures, it might seem as if Peter included Paul's letters among these sacred writings. This would seem to bring us down to the time of Irenæus (n. 11). That this is a misunderstanding, however, is clearly proved by the fact that Peter here assumes a letter of Paul's as known, which is not anywhere mentioned in the literature of the Church among the canonical or apocryphal letters of Paul. Consequently the writer of 2 Peter did not have before him a collection of Paul's letters which were in general circulation in the second century. Furthermore, we are reminded here of the well-known Greek usage of ἄλλοι and ἕτεροι, which permits the following substantival designation to be limited to the group of words which these terms introduce (n. 12). A corresponding use of λοιποί might be possible, although examples of such use are wanting. But the very fact that the remaining writings in question are compared with the letters of Paul, or rather with certain passages in his letters hard to understand, in a way purely incidental and without any modifying adjectives such as ἅγιος (Rom. i. 2), ἱερός (2 Tim. iii. 15), θεοπνευστός (2 Tim. iii. 16), προφητικός (Rom. xvi. 26), παλαιός (2 Cor. iii. 14), ἀρχαῖος (Luke ix. 8, 19), proves that αἱ γραφαί is not here used in its technical sense, namely, "a collection of sacred writings." Among the Jews the technical use of הַסְּפָרִים = Bible did not prevent the application of the word סֵפֶר to all sorts of books and documents, as similarly among Greek-speaking Christians, the analogous technical use of αἱ γραφαί and τὰ γράμματα did not preclude the broader use of γραφή, γραφαί, and γράμματα (n. 12). The way in which the false teachers took obscure passages in Paul's letters out of their context and misinterpreted them, was only illustrative of their use of books in general. Of course, the reference is limited to books of a religious character naturally such as would claim recognition among Christian readers, either on account of the person who wrote them or of the use made of them in the service of the Church. Inasmuch as the libertines are nowhere represented as opposed in principle to the O.T., the sacred writings of the O.T. are not in any sense excluded, nor the apocryphal writings, such as Jude and Peter themselves read and used. We also do not know how large a body of Christian literature was already in existence by 60 or 64. As evidenced by 2 Peter and Jude in their time, some works had already been written, and others were projected, which have not come down to us, and in Luke i. 1 there is a definite reference to such literature; so that we are entirely free to assume that in the years 50-70 other teachers, such as Barnabas, Apollos, Silvanus, and Timothy, occasionally prepared a didactic letter, or some other writing, out of which the false teachers took single passages and misinterpreted them, as in the case of Paul's letters.

So, then, 2 Pet. iii. 15 f. contains nothing which takes us beyond the period of Peter's life, while the mention of a letter of Paul's, unknown to the Church in the post-apostolic age, is proof that 2 Peter was written in apostolic times. We know that single passages in Paul's letters, and particularly passages dealing with the moral life and its relation to heathen immorality, were misunderstood even by the original receivers, and also interpreted unfairly (1 Cor. v. 9-13; 2 Cor. i. 13 f.; vol. i. pp. 261. 322). Furthermore, we saw that probably the libertines, whose entrance into the Jewish Christian Church was predicted by Peter and described by Jude after it had taken place, appropriated forms of speech such as Paul had used in 1 Cor. ii. 10-iii. 2 (Jude 19; above p. 258, n. 6). Jude seems to have found it worth while to read Paul's letters as Peter did. Along with 2 Peter, which is formally quoted, he mentions the utterances of other apostles which must likewise have been addressed to his readers, since they are exhorted to remember the same (Jude 17; above, p. 252). The reference, therefore, cannot be to letters of Paul's addressed to Gentile Christian Churches or to individuals in these Churches, as has been assumed on the basis of passages like 2 Tim. ii. 17 f., iii. 1 ff., iv. 3 f. It is very natural, however, to suppose that he means that letter of Paul's which, according to 2 Pet. iii. 15, was directed to the same readers and was related in content to 2 Peter. If Jude read 2 Peter carefully, and ascertained from it Peter's high opinion of the wisdom of Paul in his letters, and that the false teachers misused numerous passages in other Pauline letters, it is not astonishing that he should endeavour to procure Paul's letters, and that he should read them carefully. This was all the more natural, in view of the fact that he felt it his duty to summon his readers to oppose the libertines who used as watchwords Pauline phrases which they misinterpreted. So he himself could appropriate the Pauline distinction between ψυχικοί and πνευματικοί which was misused by the false teachers (Jude 19). There are also other resemblances to Paul's letters which can hardly be regarded as accidental (n. 13). Neither Jude nor 2 Peter shows evidence of the use of literary works from the time after the destruction of Jerusalem (n. 14).

Finally, the question arises as to the character of the false teachers described in both letters. There is no essential difference between the descriptions of 2 Peter and Jude (above, pp. 224 f., 243 ff.). Though the word ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι does not occur in Jude, the thing which the word designates is found (above, p. 247 f.). While Jude nowhere indicates that these intruders despised prophecy, —an omission which is especially striking, because what Jude leaves out in ver. 18 is found in the corresponding passage in 2 Pet. iii. 3 f. which he cited,—the fact is not to be overlooked that in 2 Peter also this side of the false tendency depicted by Peter falls at once entirely into the background, and that Peter goes on to speak of the rise of various tendencies which will result from the intrusion of the false teachers which he foresees (ii. 1; above, p. 232, n. 2). It is in harmony not only with this prediction, but also with universal experience, that the representatives of the movement with which Peter had become acquainted in the Gentile Christian Churches did not reveal their whole "system" at once upon their entrance into the Jewish Christian Churches in Jude's time. They left untouched for the time being especially the teachings about the Christian hope which were so deeply rooted in Jewish Christianity, and, in general, strove to introduce their theory and practice, less by direct attack upon the common faith than by clever misinterpretation of the doctrine of grace (Jude 4), by depreciating judgments of the apostles and the simple Church officials (above, pp. 223, 243), by currying favour with the richer and more educated members of the Church (Jude 16), and by making the most of the opportunities afforded by the love-feasts for social, and yet at the same time religious fellowship (Jude 12).

It is not necessary to come down so late as the second century in order to find an illustration from other historical sources of the kind of false teachers described in Jude and 2 Peter. The essential features of this movement are to be found as early as the year 57 in the Corinthian Church (vol. i. pp. 273 ff., 298 f.). There a movement had temporarily gained a foothold which (1) advocated extremely dangerous principles with regard to sexual life, based upon the idea of the freedom of the Christian under the gospel (1 Cor. vi. 12-20), principles which were actually applied in the life of the Church. The Lord who had bought the Christians, that they might be His servants, was practically denied (1 Cor. vi. 20, vii. 23; cf. 2 Pet. ii. 1; Jude 4). From the hints in Romans, which was written in Corinth in the year 58 (Rom. vi. 1 ff., 12, 14 ff.), we also learn that an effort was made to find a theoretical support for the continuance of heathen immorality in the doctrine of the Christian state of grace, as well as in the doctrine of freedom under the gospel (2) The same movement in Corinth justified participation in the heathen cultus acts, on the ground that all Christians, as a matter of course, knew that the heathen conceptions about the gods were false, and that the demons, who in the view of Paul and all other Jewish Christians presided over the idol worship, and were dangerous to Christians, were as powerless and unreal as the gods of mythology (1 Cor. viii.-x.; cf. 2 Pet. ii. 10 f.; Jude 8-10). (3) Exalted by this feeling of superior knowledge, the representatives of this movement assumed an attitude of insubordination and irreverence toward the apostle Paul which he compares to the rebellion of Korah (above, p. 257 f., n. 5). The watchword ἐγὼ δὲ Χριστοῦ represented an attitude of scorn toward all human authority in the Church (vol. i. p. 294). (4) Those of the Corinthians who denied the most essential point in the Christian teaching regarding the future life, namely, the resurrection of the body (1 Cor. xv.), were probably representatives of the same tendency. The expectation of the future kingdom of Christ (1 Cor. xv. 23-28), which is inseparable from belief in the resurrection, was also practically denied in Corinth (1 Cor. iv. 8; vol. i. p. 273 f.). (5) The libertines in Corinth are not described as professional teachers; but just as they endeavoured to find a theoretical foundation for their practical views, so, being "strong" spirits, they declared it to be their duty to bring the "weak" to their point of view, and to impart to them the knowledge which brings freedom, and to build them up by their example (1 Cor. viii. 10; vol. i. p. 296, n. 1). (6) One of the abuses of the common meals of the Church (these meals are not yet called ἀγάπαι), which ended in the celebration of the eucharist, was the fact that by many they were degraded into occasions for revelling (1 Cor. xi. 21 f., 34; cf. 2 Pet. ii. 13; Jude 12). Here also the separative tendencies which threatened to destroy the unity of the Corinthian Church and its connection with the whole Church, came to view (1 Cor. xi. 18 f.; cf. Jude 19; vol. i. p. 284 f.). In short, all the elements of the prophetic picture of the false teachers in 2 Peter, and of the historical description of Jude, are to be found in 1 Corinthians, except that in the latter case they have not yet reached the same stage of development. In Corinth the libertines misinterpreted the written instructions of Paul (1 Cor. v. 9 ff.); they apparently applied passages which Paul had actually spoken in a way contrary to his meaning (1 Cor. vi. 12, x. 23, viii. 1, 4, x. 19); and they even boasted, when indulging in practices which Paul reproves, that they were following his instructions (1 Cor. xi. 2). All of these things are illustrations of 2 Pet. iii. 16. The only new feature is that Peter predicts that persons representing this tendency will appear among the Jewish Christian Churches as false teachers, and that Jude some ten years later testifies that this had actually happened. That these intruders are not charged, or at least not clearly charged, with participation in idolatrous sacrificial feasts, and with seducing others to such participation (above, p. 243 ff.), is not strange; for in Jewish Christian Churches such demands would have met with insurmountable opposition. Furthermore, the environment of these Churches would perhaps hardly have furnished opportunity for such practices.

In view of the mention of Balaam's name (2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11), it is at least possible that Peter and Jude knew that many persons representing this tendency did not keep themselves aloof from idolatrous worship in their own home, i.e. in Gentile lands, to the degree that Peter and Jude and Paul himself felt to be necessary. From Rev. ii. 2, 6, 14 f., 20–25 we learn that between the years 90 and 95 representatives of a doctrine in which unchastity and participation in idolatrous feasts were justified among other reasons by appeal to a deeper insight into the nature of evil spirits (Rev. ii. 24), sought entrance into the Churches of Ephesus, Pergamos, and Thyatira, and were partially successful. The occurrence of the name of Balaam in Rev. ii. 14 (cf. 2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11) of itself almost compels us to assume a connection between this teaching and what is described in 2 Peter and Jude. The historical reports regarding the party and teaching of the Nicolaitans (Rev. ii. 6, 15) favour the assumption that in the last third of the first century they sent missionaries among the Jewish Christians in Palestine, as well as among the Gentile Christians in Ephesus (n. 15). While there were numerous parties and sects representing libertinistic theories and practices in the second and third centuries, there is none that so closely resembles the seducers described in 2 Peter and Jude as the libertinistic movement with which we become acquainted in 1 Corinthians, and as the Nicolaitans of whom we learn from hints in Revelation.

1. (P. 262.) The suspicions as to the genuineness and canonicity of 2 Pet. as of Jude current in the ancient Church were shared by the theologians of the sixteenth century. Erasmus, who thought that the reference in 1 Pet. v. 12 was to a letter earlier than our 1 Pet., written by Silvanus, was of the opinion that the statement that 2 Pet. was a second (instead of a third) letter could be explained only on the assumption that 2 Pet. was spurious, or, like the earliest, the lost letter, was written by Silvanus at Peter's direction (Paraphr. in epist. can. Basil, 1521, fol. A³, cf. A⁴ D²). Luther in the year 1524 (Erl. Ausg. Bd. 52, S. 271) quotes 2 Pet. iii. 15 as one of the passages on the basis of which its composition by Peter might be questioned, in so far as it indicates "that this Epistle was written long after those of Paul." 2 Pet. iii. 9 was objectionable to him on doctrinal grounds: "Doch ist's glaublich, sie [die Epistel] nichts desto minder des Apostels sei" (still, it is credible that it may be an epistle of the apostle). Calvin in his Argumentum on 2 Pet. and on iii. 15 wavers between acceptance and rejection, but is inclined to believe that the letter was written by a disciple of Peter at his direction. Grotius (on 2 Pet. i. 1, 14, 17, iii. 1, ed. Windheim, ii. 1038, 1042 f., 1053, 1060), who is of the opinion that 2 Pet. could not have been written until after the destruction of Jerusalem, divides the letter into two letters, chaps. i.-ii. and chap. iii., making iii. 1 refer to chaps. i. and ii. as a first letter. They were both written not by the apostle Simon Peter, but by Simcon, the second bishop of Jerusalem in the time of Trajan (Eus. H. E. iii. 32). In order to establish his theory, Grotius omitted the words Πέτρος . . . καὶ ἀπόστολος, 1 Pet. i. 1, and ὁ ἀγαπητὸς ἡμῶν ἀδελφός, iii. 15, on the ground that they are interpolations. He also conjectured that the heavenly voice in i. 17 was an interpolation, so that the holy mountain may be understood as referring to Zion, and the entire passage made to relate to John xii. 28. Accordingly, Grotius, p. 1117, explained the words ἀδελφός δὲ Ἰακώβου, Jude 1, as an interpolation, and declared this Epistle to be the work of the last Jewish Christian bishop of Jerusalem in the time of Hadrian (§ 43, n. 1). Herder (Briefe zweener Bruder Jesu, 1775, Opera, ed. by Suphan, vi. 471) regarded both letters as genuine, but could not understand how the opinion could be so long held that Jude is dependent upon 2 Pet., the opposite relation being so perfectly apparent (S. 529). On the other hand, Semler (Paraphrasis ep. Petri II. et Jude, 1784, in the preface of fol. d¹ and p. 167 f.) declared both letters to be pseudonymous forgeries of the second half of the second century; Jude he held to be an epitome of 2 Pet. While J. D. Michaelis (Einkl., 4te Auf. 1788, S. 1475 ff.) defends the genuineness of 2 Pet., and is inclined to assume that Jude is fabricated on the basis of 2 Pet. (S. 1516), Eichhorn (Einkl. 1812, iii. S. 624–656) decides against the genuineness of 2 Pet., mainly on the ground of the dependence of 2 Pet. upon Jude, which he thinks was written perhaps before the year 70. And this is one of the main reasons for the wide currency of a similar view to-day. Among the moderns who advocate this view, special mention should be made of Mayerhoff (Hist. krit. Einkl. in die petrinischen Schriften, 1835, S. 149–217); among those who defend the genuineness of 2 Pet., Weiss (see especially ThStKr, 1866, S. 255–308); Hofmann, NT, vii. 3 (1875); Spitta, Der 2 Br. des Pt. und des Ju. (1885). Nor have efforts been wanting since Grotius to find a genuine Epistle of Peter in 2 Pet. by removing additions to the letter that are not held to be original. Berthold (Einkl. 1819, S. 3157 ff.) declared chap. ii. to be an interpolation based upon Jude, holding chaps. i. and iii. to be an original letter of Peter's. C. Ullmann (Krit. Unters. des 2 Pt. 1821) accepted only chap. i. as the work of Peter. Gess, Das apost. Zeugniß von Christi Person, 1879, ii. 2, S. 412 ff., is in favour of striking out i. 20^b (ἐν τῇ πόλει)—iii. 3^a (γινώσκοντες) as an interpolation.

2. (P. 264.) In explaining the entirely different reception of 1 Pet. and 2 Pet. in the ancient Church, appeal cannot be made to the lost letters of Paul to the Corinthians (vol. i. pp. 261, 270, n. 9), to the Philippians (vol. i. p. 535 f.) and to the readers of 2 Pet. (above, p. 198 f.), nor to Peter's own letter, referred to in 2 Pet. iii. 1 (above, p. 199 f.); for the reason that, so far as we know, these letters were very soon and for ever lost. On the other hand, 2 Pet. was preserved and eventually came to be everywhere accepted as a letter of Peter's. The real question is why the general circulation and acceptance of 2 Pet. was so much later than that of 1 Pet.

3. (P. 264.) For traces of 2 Pet. and Jude in the literature of the early Church, and their relation to the canon, see GK, i. 310–321, 759, 959–961, ii. 819, 853; Grundriss, 20, 21 f., 25 (A. 15), 42 f., 53, 54 f., 56, 60, 68 f., 71. For the relation between 2 Pet. and Hermas cf. the writer's work, Hirt des Hermas, 430–438; Hofmann, NT, vii. 3. 174 f.; Spitta, Der 2 Brief des Pet. 533 f. While in this work Spitta recognised only a certain general relationship between the two writings in thought and language, later he came to feel that the large number of close resemblances between them indicated a literary relationship (Z. Gesch. u. Lit. des Urchrist. ii. 399–409). According to Spitta, however, Hermas is not dependent upon 2 Pet., but in the year 64 the apostle Peter read in Rome the apocalypse which was written in Rome in the year 50 by a Jew named Hermas, and which in the year 150 was worked over by the Christian Hermas, the brother of bishop Pius of Rome (Can. Muratori, lines 73–80; Spitta, 434), into the Shepherd, afterwards so widely read in the Church. Such a theory cannot be refuted in a passing remark. But a protest is entered against the assumption of the accidental coincidence by which the original writer and the editor have the same names, thereby making the tradition and the theory agree (cf. above, p. 263).

4. (P. 265.) Luther (in the year 1522, in the preface to James and Jude, Erl. Ausg. 63, S. 158) says: "No one can deny that the Epistle of St. Jude is an extract or a copy of St. Peter's second Epistle, inasmuch as almost all the words of the two are the same." The view here expressed in an exaggerated form was held by Grotius, Bengel, Semler, Michaelis, and others without any more definite effort to establish it. Herder opposed it as the prevailing view of his time (above, p. 284). Eichhorn (Einh. iii. 637, 642 ff.) reversed this relation, and after his time the majority of critics made it one of the chief grounds of objection to the genuineness of 2 Pet. This view finally became so general that it was accepted even by those who defended the genuineness of 2 Pet., as Hug, *Einh.*³ ii. 556; Wiesinger, Der 2 Pt. 1862, S. 22 ff.; Weiss, ThStKr, 1866, S. 256 ff., 300 f.; finally, Fr. Maier, TQ, 1905, S. 547–580; ibid. in BbZ, 1904, S. 377 on Jude 4 f., see above, p. 262, n. 12. Into the discussion of this relation the question whether it was in accordance with Peter's dignity to follow closely the letter of Jude, who was not an apostle, should never have been allowed to enter, nor the conjecture that some pseudo-Peter objected to the apocryphal citations in Jude, and accordingly removed some of them and obliterated others. This presupposes a precise dogmatic distinction between what was canonical and what was apocryphal, which was not to be found throughout the entire second century, especially with reference to O.T. matters. Moreover, we cannot approve the efforts made on both sides to establish the dependence of one writer upon another, because of misunderstanding or clumsiness of expression. Jude is not copied from 2 Pet.; neither is 2 Pet. a working over of Jude. The fact that Jude appealed to an apostolic prediction known to his readers, the beginning of the fulfilment of which he witnesses, made it natural for him to follow this prophecy in describing present realities. He did so, however, only so far as the fulfilment of the same can be actually discerned.

5. (P. 267.) It is impossible to conceive of 2 Pet. as being fabricated on the basis of Jude 4, 17 f., in the same way that the so-called Third Epistle to the Corinthians and the Epistle to the Laodiceans were fabricated on the basis of 1 Cor. v. 9, vii. 1, and Col. iv. 16 (vol. i. p. 270, n. 9, p. 488, n. 2). As a matter of fact, the analogy between the two cases is very slight. (1) There is no direct reference in Jude to a writing of Peter's. (2) The reference in Jude 4, 17 f. would lead naturally to the fabrication of an apocalypse (above, pp. 270, 273) rather than to a letter in an apostle's name. (3) 2 Pet. is too earnest and rich in thought to be due, like the letter to the Laodiceans entirely and 3 Cor. in part, to the mere desire to produce artificially at some later date the missing foundation in literature of a quotation found in some apostolic writing. (4) How little attention was paid to these hints of Jude about other writings of the apostolic age is evidenced by the fact that the ancient interpreters either pass Jude 3, 4, 17 f. by altogether (Clem. Hypot.; Didymus), or at most make Jude 17 refer to 2 Pet. and the Epistles of Paul (Cramer, Cat. viii. 168). So far as we know, a second, more detailed work of Jude was never written on the basis of Jude 3 (see above, p. 242).

6. (P. 269.) There is no high degree of probability in Spitta's conjecture (104) that the writing which, according to ver. 3, Jude was about to prepare, was the same for the composition of which Peter made himself responsible in 2 Pet. i. 15, without saying whether he would write it himself or commission someone else to do so. If Peter wrote in 63 or 64 and Jude in 75, then either Peter failed to keep his promise, or Jude was lax in carrying out his commission. The only thing indicated by the two passages is that the time had come when men in apostolic circles had begun to think about providing for the future by literary work; cf. 1 John i. 4.

7. (Pp. 269, 270.) Below are placed in parallel columns (1) the text of Jude 14 f. (Tisch. 8th ed.), with the omission of the first αὐτῶν after ἀσεβεῖς, which is due to an error in printing (see Tischendorf's apparatus for these verses, and Gregory, Prolegomena, 1285); (2) the Greek text of Enoch i. 9, edited first in 1892 by Bouriant (Mém. de la mission archéol. au Sinaï, ix. 1), following the edition of Flemming and Radermacher, p. 20 (cf. Lods, L'évangile et l'apocalypse de Pierre, p. 112; Charles, The Book of Enoch, 1893, p. 329); (3) an English translation of the Ethiopic Enoch, after the German of Flemming and Radermacher, which has been compared with Dillmann's German translation (S. 1); (4) the fragment of the Latin Enoch (Pseudo-Cypr. ad Novat. 16, Cypr. ed. Hartel, Append. p. 67; cf. GK, ii. 797-801; Forsch. v. 158, 438; James, Apocr. anecd. i. 146 ff.).

JUDE 14 f.

ἰδοὺ ἦλθεν κύριος ἐν ἀγίοις μυριάσιν αὐτοῦ, ποιῆσαι κρίσιν κατὰ πάντων καὶ ἐλέγξει πάντας τοὺς ἀσεβεῖς περὶ πάντων τῶν ἔργων ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν ὧν ἡσέβησαν καὶ περὶ πάντων τῶν σκληρῶν λόγων, ὧν ἐλάλησαν κατ' αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτωλοὶ ἀσεβεῖς.

ETHIOPIC TEXT.

And lo! He has come [(Dill.) comes] with ten thousands of [(Dill.) with ten thousand] holy ones, to execute judgment upon them, and He will destroy the ungodly, and will reprove all flesh [(AL. and Dill.) will argue with all flesh] for all that which the sinners and (the) ungodly have wrought and committed [(Dill.) ungodly committed] against Him.

GREEK ENOCH.

ὅτι ἔρχεται σὺν ταῖς μυριάσιν αὐτοῦ καὶ τοῖς ἁγίοις αὐτοῦ ποιῆσαι κρίσιν κατὰ πάντων, καὶ ἀπολέσει πάντας τοὺς ἀσεβεῖς καὶ ἐλέγξει πᾶσαν σάρκα περὶ πάντων ἔργων τῆς ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν ὧν ἡσέβησαν καὶ σκληρῶν ὧν ἐλάλησαν λόγων καὶ περὶ πάντων ὧν κατελάλησαν κατ' αὐτοῦ ἁμαρτωλοὶ ἀσεβεῖς.

LATIN ENOCH.

Ecce venit cum multis milibus nunciorum suorum, facere iudicium de omnibus et perdere omnes impios et arguere omnem carnem de omnibus factis impiorum, quae fecerunt impie, et de omnibus verbis impiis quae de deo locuti sunt peccatores.

A number of different circumstances render difficult a definite judgment concerning this text. The original, which is commonly supposed to have been Hebrew or Aramaic, is lost (Schurer, iii. 203; [Eng. trans. ii. iii. pp. 69, 70]). The text of Jude is not by any means fixed, and it is quite possible that the text tradition of Jude was influenced by the Greek text of the Book of Enoch, which was current in the second and third centuries. Furthermore, we do not know when the Greek translation of Enoch, from which the Ethiopic and Latin were derived, was made. If it was made by a Christian after Jude was written, it is most likely that in this passage the translator was influenced by the quotation in Jude, just as copyists of the LXX were frequently influenced by N.T. quotations. If, on the other hand, the Greek translation was made by a Jew before Jude was written, Jude is hardly likely to have made use of the Greek version. The peculiar ἰδοὺ ἦλθεν, instead of ἰδοὺ ἔρχεται, which alone suits the passage, is a clumsy translation of the ambiguous עָתָה (cf. Isa. xxi. 9, lxii. 11; Jer. l. 41; Zech. ii. 14; Mal. iii. 19, and, per contra, Ezek. vii. 12); ἐν μυριάσιν is a Hebraism (Num. xx. 20; 1 Macc. i. 17; Luke xiv. 31), which could never have been written by anyone who had the Greek ὁὖν μυριάσιν before him. The agreement between Jude and the Greek Enoch in the choice of words is, however, closer than is usually found between two independent translators (ποιῆσαι κρίσιν κατὰ πάντων, ἐλέγχειν, ἀσεβείς, ἀσεβεῖν, ἀσέβεια, σκληροὶ λόγοι), which compels us to assume that the Greek translator of Enoch was a Christian familiar with Hebrew, and therefore certainly a Jewish Christian, who, like so many Christians in later times, became interested in the book through Jude 14, and was under the influence of the quite free citation of Jude when he translated the passage cited by Jude, which stood at the very beginning of his original. It is generally admitted by the Church Fathers that Jude quotes the Book of Enoch: Clement, Hypot. (Forsch. iii. 85, 97), "his verbis (sc. Judas) prophetam (not prophetiam) comprobatur"; Tert. Cult. fem. i. 3, "Enoch apud Iudam apostolum testimonium possidet" (GK, i. 120 f.); Jerome, Vir. Ill. iv.; Comm. in Tit. Vall. vii. 708; August. Civit. xv. 23. 4, xviii. 38; Euthalius (Zacagni, 480, 485). This has been vigorously denied by Hofmann, vii. 2. 187, 205-211 (cf. his Schriftbeweis, i. 420-424), and Philippi (Das Buch Henoch, 1868, S. 138-152), who advance the theory that Jude's only source was the oral traditions of the rabbis, and that the Book of Enoch that has come down to us was written by a Jewish Christian on the basis of Jude 14. Without claiming that the pre-Christian origin of the whole of the Book of Enoch is absolutely proved, it is possible entirely to reject this theory on the following grounds: (1) The fact that Jude uses direct discourse in quoting Enoch indicates that he has it before him in written form. Although in the addresses in which the rabbis were accustomed to interpret and enlarge upon the O.T. narratives in the synagogue certain mythical elements, including the sayings and replies of the persons in the narratives, may have assumed a relatively stereotyped form, it is inconceivable that one who was not a disciple of the rabbis, but a brother of Jesus and a member of the first Christian Church, should for this reason have quoted a somewhat long saying of the patriarch Enoch in exactly the same way that men who held the same faith, and were contemporaries of his, were accustomed to quote the prophecies of Isaiah, as these were found in the O.T. Other references in the N.T. to mythical additions to the O.T. history are confined to facts and names (Matt. i. 5; Acts vii. 22 f., xiii. 20 f.; Gal. iv. 29; 2 Tim. iii. 8; Heb. xi. 37). No one would compare the citation of the words of Jesus at a time when the gospel was as yet unwritten, but when numerous persons who had heard them were still living in the Church (§ 48), with the apparently verbal quotation of a prophecy supposed to have been spoken in patriarchal times. To deny that Jude 14 f. is taken from Enoch i. 9 is to deprive oneself also of the right to affirm that Jude 17 f. is a quotation from 2 Pet. iii. 3 (above, p. 250 f.). (2) If the Book of Enoch, or even the passage which is parallel to what is found in Jude, had been written on the basis of Jude 14 f., it would be evidenced by an exact verbal quotation of Jude; whereas, as a matter of fact, Jude, following the example of the apostles and of the ancients generally, could reproduce his citation quite freely, notwithstanding the fact that he quoted it in direct discourse. And this freedom would be all the greater if he had before him the Hebrew Enoch, which he himself was under necessity of translating into Greek. If it be true that at least this part of the Book of Enoch was written in Hebrew and is of Jewish origin, then it is impossible to believe that its author borrowed from a Greek Christian writing. (3) Besides the almost verbal quotation, there are numerous other resemblances between Jude and Enoch. This is not confined to single quoted expressions such as σκληροὶ λόγοι (Enoch v. 4, xxvii. 2), ἐβδόμος ἀπὸ Ἀδάμ (Enoch ix. 8, xciii. 3), which recur in other parts of the book. It is to be particularly observed that the fall and punishment of the angels who before the Flood had intercourse with women (Jude 6; cf. ver. 7) is described in such a way that what is said could not have been derived from Gen. vi. 1-4 or 2 Pet. ii. 4. Jude's source is rather, for the fall, Enoch vi., vii., ix. 7-9, xii. 4-6, xv. 3-xvi. 4; for the punishment, Enoch x. 11-14, xiv. 5-6, xviii. 14-xix. 2; cf. especially xii. 4 (also xv. 3), ἀπολιπόντες τὸν οὐρανὸν τὸν ὑψηλόν, and x. 12, ἤγαγον αὐτοὺς ἐβδόμηκοντα γενεὰς εἰς τὰς νάπας τῆς γῆς μέχρι ἡμέρας κρίσεως αὐτῶν κτλ. Cf. Spitta, 324 ff., 360-367. It is not so easy to establish the correctness of the opinion of the Church Fathers that Jude 9 is related to the ἀνάληψις Μωϋσέως, since the fragment of the Latin translation of this Jewish apocryphal writing (Fritzsch, Libr. apoc. 700-730) is broken off before the burial of Moses is reached, and so contains nothing corresponding to the passage in Jude. But what reason is there for disbelieving the Fathers, who had the Greek text of this book, when they say that Jude quoted from it; cf. Clem. Hypot. (Forsch. iii. 84, 96 f.), "hic confirmat assumptionem Moysi"; Orig. de Princ. iii. 2. 1; Didymus, Lat. trans. (Migne, 39. 1815); Euthalius (Zacagni, 480, 485). In particular, we are justified in assuming that there was something in this book corresponding to the passage in Jude, by a quotation in Gelladius Cyzicus (Mansi, ii. 857; cf. Apollinaris in Nicephor. Cat. in octateuchum, i. 1313; Cramer, Cat. viii. 161, 163; Matthæi, Epist. cathol. pp. 170, 238, 244). There is nothing in the parallel passage 2 Pet. ii. 10 f. referring to the same event, and so no reference to the Assumptio Moysis. It is uncertain whether Peter had in view Zech. iii. 2 (Hofmann, vii. 2. 65), the passage upon which the author of the Assumptio Moysis is supposed to have based the passage in his work used by Jude, or whether Peter thought of Enoch x. 4-8, 11-14, xii. 4 xiii. 2 (Spitta, 170 ff.). It is altogether likely that in 2 Pet. ii. 4-11 use is made, not only of unwritten Jewish tradition, but of apocryphal books, such as Enoch cited by Jude.

8. (P. 270.) With reference to the pseudo-Petrine writings, cf. GK, i. 199f., 308-311, 758, 802, ii. 742-751, 810-855; Grundriss, 25. The Epistle of Peter to James (Clementina, ed. Lagarde, p. 3) cannot be regarded as a type of the pseudo-Petrine letters to Churches for the following reasons: (1) It is not a letter addressed to a Church. (2) It was written by a man who took a view of Peter antagonistic to that of biblical and ecclesiastical tradition, whereas the view of the author of 2 Pet. is in direct accord with the same. (3) This Epistle of Peter to James was certainly not written before the third century. The subordination of Peter to James, which is part of the fundamental idea of this work, renders Peter's apostolic consciousness less prominent (p. 4. 16, κύριέ μου). This is more strongly expressed in the Epistle of Clement to James (Lagarde, 6. 12ff.).

9. (P. 271.) As to the resemblances between 1 Pet. and 2 Pet. in language and content, cf. Schott, 2 Petrusbrief, S. 167-188; Hofmann, vii. 128-129. In view of the fundamentally different character of the greetings of the two Epistles of Peter, both as regards the designation of the writer and of the readers, which precludes the possibility of intentional imitation, the correspondence in the greeting itself (χάρις—πληθυνθείη) is of no great significance; since it is limited by the phrase which follows in 2 Pet. i. 2, and by the connection made by this phrase with the text that follows (above, p. 220). Moreover, εἰρήνη ὑμῖν (or ἡ εἰρήνη ὑμῶν) πληθυνθείη is a common Jewish formula (vol. i. p. 32, n. 18). It is found in a somewhat altered form in Jude 2, and in Clem. 1 Cor., and Polye. ad Phil.,—in the last two cases clearly influenced by 1 Pet. i. 2,—and in the communication of the Smyrneans in the year 155 (Martyr. Polye.), in this case closely following Jude 2. More worthy of notice is the fact that both in 1 Pet. iii. 20 and 2 Pet. ii. 5 the number of those saved in the Flood is given as eight, though in Gen. vi. 18, vii. 7, 13, viii. 16, no number is mentioned. Moreover, that interpretation of 1 Pet. iii. 19 is in all probability correct, according to which a preaching of Christ at the time of the Flood is referred to, i.e. a preaching through Noah, so that Noah is here represented as a preacher of righteousness, as in 2 Pet. ii. 5. In such a connection the fact that the deferment of the judgment is explained by the μακροθυμία of God in 1 Pet. iii. 20 and 2 Pet. iii. 9, cf. iii. 5f., deserves notice, although the thought is itself a very natural one (Rom. ii. 4). There are, moreover, a few words and phrases which in the whole N.T. are found only in 1 Pet. and 2 Pet. or practically nowhere else: ἀρετή, 1 Pet. ii. 9, 2 Pet. i. 3, is used as an attribute of God or Christ when represented as calling men (above, p. 220); also twice found in 2 Pet. i. 5 of human virtue, and elsewhere only in Phil. iv. 8; ἄσπιλος καὶ ἄμωμος (or ἀμόμητος), 2 Pet. iii. 14, in reverse order in 1 Pet. i. 19; σαρκὸς ἀπόθεσις ῥύπου, 1 Pet. iii. 21; ἀπόθεσις τοῦ σκηνώματος, 2 Pet. i. 11; ἐποπτεύειν, 1 Pet. ii. 12, iii. 2; ἐπόπται γενηθέντες, 2 Pet. i. 16. Cf. 2 Pet. ii. 14, ἀκαταπαύστους ἁμαρτίας, and 1 Pet. iv. 1, πέπναιτο ἁμαρτίας; also ψυχαί to designate persons, 1 Pet. iii. 20 (ii. 25) and 2 Pet. ii. 14, found elsewhere only in Rom. xiii. 1. It is also to be observed that certain ideas, which recur with special frequency in one of the letters, are found also in the other: ἀναστροφή six times in 1 Pet., twice in 2 Pet., elsewhere in the whole N.T. only five times; ἀσελγεία, 2 Pet. ii. 2, 7, 18; 1 Pet. iv. 3; ἐστηριγμένος, 2 Pet. i. 12; ἀστήρικτος, ii. 14, iii. 16; στηριγμός, iii. 17; but also in 1 Pet. v. 10, στηρίξει. Notwithstanding such details, which may serve to suggest that, when Silvanus wrote 1 Pet. by Peter's directions and in his name, he was influenced by Peter's thought and language, we get from the letters the impression of a totally different style, which even in antiquity tended to make questionable the composition of 2 Pet. by the writer of 1 Pet. (Jerome, Vir. Ill. i.; ad Hebræam, Ep. cxx. 11).

10. (P. 275.) It may be accepted as certain that the correct reading in iii. 16 is ἐν αἰς (NAB, many cursives, S² S³), not ἐν οἷς (CKLP and the majority of cursives). It is equally clear that we are to read πάσαις ἐπιστολαῖς (ABC) without ταῖς inserted in N and the Antiochian recension. It makes an important difference in the sense. With the article the Epistles are represented as a definite whole, and the statement made covers all parts of the collection without exception. With the article omitted the one letter of Paul's known to the readers is contrasted with letters of all kinds which he has written. In other words, one may take any one of them he chooses and he will never find the libertine view, but everywhere the same moral earnestness.

11. (P. 277.) Cf. e.g. Iren. ii. 30. 7: "universæ clamant scripturæ, et Paulus autem testimonium perhibet"; ii. 28. 7, "et dominus manifeste dixit et reliquæ demonstrant scripturæ."

12. (P. 277.) For ἄλλοι in the above-mentioned sense (above, p. 277), cf. Kühner-Gerth i. 275. The Latins, French, and Italians also use this illogical form of speech (see Thiersch, Versuch. 423); ἕτεροι is used in the same way less frequently, Luke xxiii. 32; Thucyd. iv. 67. 2; cf. also ἕτερος δὲ τῶν μαθητῶν, Matt. viii. 21, where the meaning is a second person who is already one of the disciples, in distinction from the first who was one of the scribes, and had just declared his readiness to become a disciple (viii. 19). An analogous use of λοιποὶ must first be pointed out and is extremely improbable, because this word does not, like ἄλλος, ἕτερος, carry with it the idea of distinctive difference. Unfortunately there is wanting the original of sentences as found in Orig. Lat. trans. (Delarue, iii. 877, 888 in Matt.) § 61, apostolos ceterosque episcopos et doctores, § 72, Christi . . . ceterorumque discipulorum ejus. Cf. also the second quotation in n. 11, above. Even if λοιπαὶ were genuine in Eph. iv. 17, it could not be cited as proof of this usage; since the Gentile Christians are Gentiles, cf. Eph. iii. 1. That γραφὴ in its common sense does not occur in the N.T. is accidental. On the other hand, we find γράμματα, which in John vii. 15 undoubtedly means the ιερά γράμματα (2 Tim. iii. 15) from which the Jewish γραμματεῖς derive their title, used of writings of the most diverse character (Luke xvi. 6, 7; Acts xxviii. 21), even of letters and characters (Gal. vi. 11). Cf. the frequent use of βιβλίον referring to other than sacred books along with τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων in the prologue of Sirach. For γραφὴ see 2 Chron. ii. 10; Neh. vii. 64; Dan. v. 7 ff.; 2 Macc. xiv. 27, 48; and in Christian Literature, Iren. iii. 6. 4, 17. 4; v. prologue (regularly hæc scriptura of Irenæus' own work); Clem. Strom. vi. 32 (προϊούσης τῆς γραφῆς followed immediately by κατὰ τὴν γραφὴν, meaning "according to the Holy Scriptures"), Strom. vi. 131; Eus. H. E. ii. 11. 1 (τὴν περὶ τοῦτον παραθώμεθα τοῦ Ἰωσήπου γραφὴν, cf. ii. 10. 1, 2). Furthermore, ἡ γραφή and αἱ γραφαί are never used in the Epistles of Peter of the O.T., the anarthrous γραφῆς in

2 Pet. i. 20 means "written"; and ἐν γραφῇ, 1 Pet. ii. 6, which, according to NBA, is also without the article, signifies only "in a writing," although the reference is to a quotation from one of the prophets indirectly through Rom. ix. 33 (above, p. 188).

13. (P. 279.) Particularly striking is the resemblance between Jude 24 f. and Rom. xvi. 25, 27, τῷ δὲ δυνάμει φυλάξαι ὑμᾶς ἀπταιστούς καὶ στήσαι (in Rom. στήριξαι, but Rom. xiv. 4, δυνατεῖ γὰρ ὁ κύριος στήσαι αὐτόν) . . . μόνῳ θεῷ σωτῆρι ἡμῶν (Rom. μόνῳ σοφῷ θεῷ) διὰ Ἰ. Χρ. τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν δόξα (Rom. διὰ Ἰ. Χρ. ᾧ ἡ δόξα) . . . εἰς πάντας τοὺς αἰῶνας (Rom. εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰῶνων), ἀμήν. With regard to the genuineness and original location of Rom. xvi. 25–27, cf. vol. i. p. 379 ff. Cf. also Jude 20, ἐποικοδομοῦντες ἑαυτοὺς τῇ ἀγιοτάτῃ ὑμῶν πίστει, with Col. ii. 6 (Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 5), ἐποικοδομούμενοι ἐν αὐτῷ καὶ βεβαιούμενοι τῇ πίστει; also with Rom. xiv. 19, xv. 2, and all the passages where Paul uses the figure of building. See also Spitta, 389 ff., who discovers in οἱ ἀποδιορίζοντες a reference to the lost letter of Paul's (see above, pp. 252, 258, n. 6); but this view is hardly tenable.

14. (P. 279.) For the Assumptio Mosis and the Book of Enoch in Jude, see above, p. 286 ff. Edw. Abbot (Expos. 1882, vol. iii. 49–63) endeavours to show that Jude and 2 Pet. are dependent upon the Antiquities of Josephus (completed in 94 B.C.); but cf. per contra, Salmon, Hist. Intro. to N.T. (1885) pp. 638–653. While F. W. Farrar holds to the view (Expos. 1888, vol. viii. 58–69) that 2 Pet. is not dependent upon Josephus, but that the reverse is the case (cf. Expos. 1882, vol. iii. 401–423), Krenkel goes back to the other view, Jos. u. Lucas, 1894, S. 350. Single expressions such as τοῖς μύθοις ἐξακολουθήσαντες (Jos. Ant. proem. iv., cf. 2 Pet. i. 16), οἷς ποιήσετε καλῶς μὴ προσέχοντες (Ant. xi. 12. 6, cf. 2 Pet. i. 19), πᾶσαν εἰσηγέκατο σπουδὴν (Ant. xx. 9. 2, cf. 2 Pet. i. 5; Jude 3; also C. I. Gr. 2715a–b; Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 278 [Eng. trans. p. 361 ff.]; Prologue to Sirach, προσενέγκασθαι σπουδὴν) would have value as proof only if they were found in similar contexts, which, however, is by no means the case. But that the writer of 2 Pet. studied the work of Josephus as a model of style and imitated it, is an assumption altogether absurd. When 2 Pet. ii. 5 calls Noah a δικαιοσύνης κήρυξ (cf. 1 Pet. iii. 19 ff., above, p. 289, n. 9); and Jos. Ant. i. 3. 1 declares that Noah, incensed by the sins of his contemporaries, preached repentance to them before the Flood; and when we read in a Midrash on Gen. vi. 9 that Noah was a herald for God (Beresch. rabba, translated by Wünsche, S. 129, cf. bab. Sanhedr. 108b), —the only thing proved is that, in the synagogues where Josephus and Peter went, it was customary to enlarge upon the O.T. history. Of a different character, however, are the statements of 2 Pet. ii. 15 (cf. ii. 13 f.) and Jude 11 when they accuse Balaam of covetousness, and the statement of Philo (Vita Mosis, i. 48) and Josephus (Ant. iv. 6. 5) when the one says and the other suggests that Balaam allowed himself to be tempted by bribes; because the basis for all that is said is found in Num. xxii. 7, cf. xxii. 17 f. Nor does the statement require any explanation when it is expressly said in 2 Pet. ii. 16 (ἐν ἀνθρώπου φωνῇ) and in Josephus (iv. 6. 3, φωνὴν ἀνθρωπίνην ἀφέισα) that the ass spoke with a human voice, since that was what any child must say, if he meant to imply that the ass was understood by a man. It would be much more natural to assume that the writer of Rev. ii. 14 is dependent upon Jos. Ant. iv. 6. 6 for the statement that Balaam gave evil counsel to Balak, which is not stated in Num. xxxi. 16, except for the fact that the same is found in Philo, Vita Mosis, i. 54. The form Βαράβ for Βαρα, which is certainly the correct reading in 2 Pet. ii. 15, is not yet explained. It is taken neither from the LXX, which everywhere has Βαράβ or Βαυαβ, nor from Josephus nor Philo, who do not use the name at all. To assume an accidental error in the original MS., or in one of the ancient copies of 2 Pet., is less natural than to suppose that Peter made a mistake either through imperfect pronunciation or defective hearing. The Hebrew s is frequently interchanged with the Aramaic ṣ (סַרְסַר = ṣarṣar earth), and so it was possible for a fisherman from Bethsaida, who heard Num. xxii. 2 ff. read in Hebrew in the synagogue and interpreted in Aramaic, to make the opposite mistake (cf. O. B. Michaelis in Gesen. Thesaur. 227; Hofmann, vii. 2. 74). The use of a slight vowel—a composite shewa, having the same sound as the full vowel preceding—before or with ṣ is not infrequent (Gesen. 977), and has a parallel in Βααρνηγῆς (vol. i. p. 16). Cf. above, p. 287, regarding the relation of Jude to the Hebrew Enoch.

15. (P. 283.) If the context of Rev. ii. 2 and ii. 6 shows that the false apostles who had come to Ephesus were wandering teachers, who spread the teaching of the Nicolaitans in the Churches of Asia Minor, this is one point of resemblance between them and the false teachers in 2 Pet. and Jude. If ἐνυπνιαζόμενοι, Jude 8, refers to visions (above, p. 246), it is natural to associate the same with the prophetess Jezebel, Rev. ii. 20, who favoured the Nicolaitan teaching. With regard to time, the statement of Hegesippus to the effect that heresy did not appear in the Palestinian Church until after the death of James (Eus. H. E. iv. 22. 5), notwithstanding the fact that his report is anything but clear, may be taken as indicating that 2 Pet., which predicts the near approach of this development, was written before this date, i.e. before the year 66, and that Jude, which represents it as having taken place shortly before, was written some years later (cf. above, p. 246). If this be true, then light is thrown upon the report that the grandchildren of Jude were denounced by heretics (above, p. 240). It was done out of revenge. The remark with which Clement (Strom. iii. 11) introduces an abbreviated quotation of Jude 8–16, namely, that Jude is here making predictions about the sect of Carpocratians and other similar parties, is to be placed in the same category with the similar statements of Irenaeus and others with regard to the false teachers of the Pastoral Epistles (above, p. 128, n. 14), or the claim of Epiphanius (Har. xxvi. 11) that the Holy Ghost through Jude referred to certain parties that existed in the fourth century. What led Clement to make the citation was the parallel between Jude 12 and the report of unseemly orgies in the love-feasts of the Carpocratians (Strom. iii. 10). This itself shows that the description in 2 Pet. and Jude does not suit this party; for what is said in 2 Pet. ii. 13 f., Jude 12, about abuses practised in connection with the love-feasts (above, pp. 236, 243 f.) is not to be compared with the reports which, according to Strom. iii. 2, Clement had heard concerning the Carpocratians, and with what Irenaeus declares to be hardly credible (i. 25. 5), namely, that a community of wives was actually in practice among them in connection with the love-feasts. Of the distinctive teachings of Carpocrates and of his son Epiphanius (Iren. i. 25. 1–6, 28. 2; Clement, Strom. iii. 5–11, cf. iii. 25–27; Hippol. Refut. vii. 32; Pseudo Tert. ix.; Philaster, xxxv.; Epiph. Har.

xxvii.), there are no traces in 2 Pet. and Jude: (1) creation of the world by subordinate spirits, of whom the chief was the devil; (2) the contention that Jesus was the son of Joseph; (3) instead of emphasising the doctrine of grace and the freedom that went with it, they taught that every man must save himself, as Jesus did, by doing the will of the devil as enjoined in Matt. v. 25, and by undergoing all human experiences; for only in this way does the soul escape from the prison of the body and so from the rule of spirits, and only in this way is it kept from entering another body. (4) In the measure that they were able in this way to get the better of the spirits in the world, they attained the power to perform miracles like Jesus, and perhaps in greater degree than many of the apostles. It was for this reason that they practised magic arts. (5) Only faith and love have value; all external actions are indifferent. The imaginary distinction between good and evil, and between the ideas of ownership and theft, are due entirely to the prejudices of men and arbitrary laws, among which the decalogue is particularly ridiculous, because of the statement in Ex. xx. 17. Grotius' identification of the false teachers of 2 Pet. and Jude with the Carpocratians cannot be accepted (ed. Windheim, ii. 1045, 1047, 1049, 1053, 1058, 1117, 1120).

§ 45. THE TRADITION CONCERNING THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

The writing which, from the earliest times, has been transmitted as a letter "to the Hebrews" was, like 2 Peter and Jude, intended for Jewish Christians. There are reasons for supposing that it was written about the same time as Jude, or somewhat later. This makes the investigation of Hebrews all the more in place at this point; because, as we have seen from 2 Pet. i. 12-15, Jude 3 (above, pp. 200 f., 241 f., 286, n. 6), this was a time when the apostles and other teachers of their circle felt it necessary, in order to promote the undisturbed growth of the original Christian faith, not only to preach and write occasional letters, but also to prepare writings doctrinal in character. Hebrews is such a didactic writing, although in its form and content it is a letter directed to a definite group of readers.

Inasmuch as the letter has no greeting from which we can ascertain the name of the real or alleged author, and the character of the original readers, it seems advisable to begin with a review of the tradition concerning both these points (n. 1). Even if the investigation of these questions should be without positive results, it would be worth while to free the historical investigation of the letter from the burden of false opinion. The fact that the tradition regarding the readers is not as clear, and regarding the author not so unanimous, as we could wish, is due merely to the absence of any greeting; for we must remember that most of the ecclesiastical tradition regarding the writings of the N.T. is only the echo of the testimony of the documents regarding themselves; and this tradition is good or bad according as this self-testimony was correctly understood or not. Nevertheless, the history of an Epistle like Ephesians shows us that even such traditions as had no support from the document itself became dominant in the Church at a very early time (vol. i. p. 481 ff.). As regards the age and unanimity of the tradition supporting it, the title πρὸς Ἑβραίους stands on the same level with the title πρὸς Ἐφεσίους. It is found not only in all the Greek MSS. and the versions, but there is not the slightest trace of evidence that Hebrews was ever known by another title in any part of the Church, or that any ancient critic ever suggested another title on critical grounds, as Marcion did in the case of Ephesians. The title ad Hebræos was accepted by the Alexandrian theologians Pantænus, Clement, and Origen, to whom the letter was transmitted as a writing of Paul, and as a part of the collection of Paul's letters used in the Churches; also by all the Eastern Churches of the subsequent period which held the same traditions as the Alexandrians, and even by the African Tertullian, to whom Hebrews was known only as a work of Barnabas, and whose native Church did not include Hebrews in its Canon. Moreover, when the historians Eusebius, Stephanus Gobarus, and Photius speak constantly of ἡ πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἐπιστολή in reports which are in other respects trustworthy, and according to which Irenæus and Hippolytus knew and quoted Hebrews, though denying its composition by Paul (n. 9), it is presupposed that Irenæus and Hippolytus called the document by the same name. Otherwise the historians would either not have spoken at all of Irenæus' and Hippolytus' mention of Hebrews, or they would certainly have given the different title of the letter employed by them, if from citations and other references this were clear. Thus, although there was the greatest diversity of opinion regarding the author and canonicity of Hebrews at the close of the second century, Churches and writers were unanimous in accepting the title of the book.

From the facts incidentally mentioned above, it would seem that the traditions concerning Hebrews reached Irenæus, Pantænus, and Tertullian from very different sources, so that their common root must lie very far back. This renders it most questionable whether the common element in these traditions, which vary so much among themselves and thus are independent of one another, can be explained as due to a scribal error, or whether it is permissible to assume that Hebrews is really referred to under any other than the traditional title, e.g. under such titles as ad Alexandrinos or ad Laodiceños (n. 2). On the other hand, it is self-evident that the title πρὸς Ἑβραίους did not originate with the writer; nor, in this very brief form, which, however, is correct (n. 3), could it very well have originated with someone who merely copied the letter, or had numerous copies of it made for the purpose of circulation; but it is probably due to the circumstance that Hebrews was bound with other letters variously directed, and so was provided with a short title, in the same way as the other parts of the collection, in order that it might be more readily found and quoted.

The exact date when the Epistle was given this title is even more impossible of determination than the time when the collection of the four Gospels or of the Pauline letters was made. Nevertheless, this one common element in all the traditions concerning Hebrews is of such antiquity that it is worth while to inquire as to the meaning of the title. Since it is clear to every reader that the letter is directed to Christians, only those instances throw light upon the meaning of the title in which the name Ἑβραῖοι is applied to certain Christians in order to distinguish them from certain other Christians. This is done in two ways (n. 4). In Churches in which different languages were spoken, as, e.g. that in Jerusalem, the Jewish Christians who retained the use of the mother-tongue, most of whom were born in Palestine and continued to reside there, were called Hebrews, in distinction from the Hellenistic Jewish Christians, who were born abroad and had adopted the Greek language (Acts vi. 1; vol. i. pp. 39, 42 f., 47 f., 60, 67 f.). This was a distinction within the Jewish nation due to historical developments much older than the Christian era, which simply continued to exist in that part of the nation which became Christian as well as in the part that remained non-Christian. Besides this, however, all Christians within the Church who were Jews by birth were frequently called Hebrews, without reference to difference of language, owing to the fact that there was an aversion to calling them Jews (n. 4). The first meaning is inapplicable here; for no one could infer from Hebrews, which is written in Greek, that it was directed to Hebrew-speaking Jewish Christians and not to Hellenistic Jewish Christians. The opinion of Clement of Alexandria, that Hebrews was written by Paul in Hebrew and translated into Greek by someone else (n. 5), is palpably a false inference from the title πρὸς Ἑβραίους, and cannot be regarded as an authentic interpretation of this title, which at that time was possibly a hundred years old. The only other interpretation possible is that the title was intended to designate the readers as Jews by birth; and it is a question whether it is meant to signify more than this—something that every reader can infer from the letter itself. It is comparable to the title of 1 Peter, ad gentes, which originated in the West, and later became attached also to 2 Peter (GK, ii. 274; Forsch. iii. 100).

The title of Hebrews contains no geographical statement such as we find in the titles of Paul's letters, in the old Latin title of 1 Peter, ad Ponticos, and in a sense also in the Latin title of James, ad dispersos. In particular, the error that this title taken alone indicates Palestine, cannot be too often contradicted. If Ἑβραῖοι be taken to mean those who retained the Hebrew language, there were almost as many such in Mesopotamia as in Palestine, and there were persons of this character even in the Greek Diaspora, as in Tarsus and Rome (vol. i. p. 47 ff.). If it be taken as a designation of Christians of Jewish origin, then there were considerable numbers of such, both in the apostolic time and certainly also at the time when this title originated, who were members of Churches in places widely differing, as Rome and Antioch, Asia Minor and Egypt. It is easy to understand how almost universally, so far as we know, ancient scholars sought the readers of Hebrews in Palestine; but this fact throws no light upon the original meaning of πρὸς Ἑβραίους. In their own time it was only there and in the adjoining regions that entire churches of Christian Jews still existed; and, so far as they knew, this had always been the case (n. 6).

That, however, Hebrews was not intended for all the Jewish Christians scattered throughout the world, but for a group of readers in a definite locality, is clear to every intelligent reader at least from Heb. xiii. 7-25. This does not imply that the author of the title πρὸς Ἑβραίους himself understood it in the same way as later interpreters did. It is possible that he knew from the tradition that Hebrews was intended for the Jewish portion of a large local or provincial Church outside of Palestine. But it is also possible that in ignorance of the local destination of the letter he gave Hebrews a title resembling in form the titles of other letters, while actually expressing only the self-evident fact that the persons addressed in the letter were Jewish Christians.

The Alexandrian Church, so far as we are able to go back into its early history, always regarded Hebrews as one of Paul's writings. On the basis of this tradition, which was undisputed in his circle, Pantænus undertook to explain why Paul did not introduce himself in this letter as in his other letters by name and as the apostle of the readers (n. 5). Clement does not question this tradition, for he handles the same problem as Pantænus, solving it in a way which necessarily presupposes the Pauline authorship of the Epistle. He also asserts this directly, and apparently without any doubt as to its truth, in numerous quotations from Hebrews, as well as in the two passages where he speaks of the beginnings of questionings about the tradition (n. 5). The idea that the Greek Hebrews was a translation, was, of course, an inference from the title as it was understood at that time; but why was not the same inference drawn regarding James, or why were not the conjectures regarding the translator of the Gospel of Matthew just as definite as those regarding the translator of Hebrews, especially in view of the fact that it was known from tradition in the case of Matthew that Matthew wrote the Gospel in Hebrew? When Clement twice positively affirms that Luke is the translator of Hebrews, and in this way explains the alleged similarity of style between Hebrews and Acts, we are not to infer that his assertion is based upon a tradition to this effect, but only that the observation of the great difference in style between Hebrews and Paul's letters had given rise to doubts in the Alexandrian School about the local tradition. It was thought that criticism and tradition could be reconciled by assuming that the Greek Hebrews was a translation from Hebrew. It was natural to make

Luke the translator, because a close connection between the Gospel of Luke and the oral preaching of Paul was usually assumed; moreover, resemblances in style between Hebrews and Acts seemed to corroborate this view. Whether also views of other Churches gave impulse to these scholarly efforts we do not know. But Origen's judgment concerning Hebrews is evidently influenced by the difference of opinion which existed in the various parts of the Church regarding the authorship and canonicity of Hebrews (n. 7). He had learned that in certain quarters an unfavourable opinion was expressed regarding a Church like that in Alexandria, which had accepted Hebrews into its Canon as a letter of Paul's; for, as the result of his criticism, he concludes: a Church should be allowed to retain its good name, even when it holds such opinions regarding Hebrews, i.e. it should not be condemned on this account as unscrupulous or without critical judgment; "for the men of the olden time did not without good reasons transmit Hebrews as a letter of Paul's." Inasmuch as he is protecting his native Church against unfair criticisms, he defends also its tradition; but he does so with a full appreciation of the current objections to the same. Everyone who is capable of judging differences in style must admit that the Greek of Hebrews is better than that of the generally accepted letters of Paul, and that it does not show the lack in literary skill to which Paul in 2 Cor. xi. 6 confesses. Origen, however, did not find the reconciliation between the result of his observation and the tradition of the Alexandrian Church, as did Clement, in the hypothesis that Paul wrote Hebrews in Hebrew and that a disciple of his translated it. He does not even mention this hypothesis, so confidently proposed by Clement; but, after a full discussion of the various views, which unfortunately is only incompletely preserved for us, he finally adopts as the most probable conclusion, that the apostle, i.e. Paul, furnished the ideas, but a disciple of his put them into the form of a letter according to his instructions. Therefore, Origen's question is not who the translator was, but who wrote the Epistle working in the spirit and under the direction of his teacher Paul. Origen holds a definite answer to this question to be impossible—"God alone knows," he says; yet he is not willing to pass by altogether the learned tradition that had come to him, in which now Clement of Rome and now Luke is made the author of the Epistle. It would seem, then, as if Luke, whom Clement of Alexandria mentions as the translator of Hebrews, was mentioned by others before the time of Origen as its author. Besides him, however, Clement of Rome was mentioned in the same capacity. The numerous resemblances between Clement's letter to the Corinthians and Hebrews make the latter conjecture more natural than the supposition that Luke was the translator or author of the letter. The only thing that can be asserted with certainty is that Origen found both these names mentioned either in the oral or written tradition. Whether the representatives of these views called Clement of Rome or Luke the author of Hebrews in the limited sense in which Origen discussed the question concerning an author of the letter, associated with Paul in its production, or in the fullest sense of independent authorship, or like Clement of Alexandria called them authors in the sense of translators, we do not know (n. 5). When Origen expressed his judgment, the Alexandrian Church seems to have stood quite alone in the tradition of the Pauline source of Hebrews; he defends a single Church holding this view (εἴ τις οὖν ἐκκλησία κτλ.) against the judgment of the other Churches. It cannot be shown that this opinion was held at that time anywhere outside of Egypt, nor subsequently in any place not under the influence of Alexandrian scholars. In the fourth century we find it dominant throughout the Greek and Syrian Churches as well as in the Churches dependent upon them; the belated opposition of several Arians could not change this general opinion. The modifications in the Alexandrian tradition which Clement and Origen made when they accepted it were dropped; the tradition itself which they found and which Origen defended was adopted.

Regarding the opinion which prevailed among the Greek Churches in Syria, Asia Minor, Macedonia, and Greece in the time of Clement and Origen with reference to the origin of Hebrews, we have no direct information. In the West, Hebrews was not unknown from early times, but until after the middle of the fourth century it was excluded from the collection of Paul's letters and from the N.T. in general (n. 8). This fact is of itself significant. A letter, which to all appearances was regarded as an important ancient didactic writing by Clement of Rome, Justin, who wrote in Rome, the younger Theodotus, a disciple of the Theodotus who came from Byzantium to Rome, Irenæus, Hippolytus, and Tertullian, but which nevertheless was persistently excluded from the N.T. in Italy, North Africa, and Gaul, could not have passed as a work of Paul's in these regions, since the objections to its reception into the collection of books read in the religious services which might be raised on the ground that it was intended for "the Hebrews," could not have had more weight in Rome than in Alexandria. These objections must have been outweighed by the influence of Paul's name, if it had been connected with it. Moreover, the Gospel of Matthew, which was originally designed for Jews and Jewish Christians, was accepted into the Canon of the entire Gentile Christian Church. We also have the testimony of persons who had access to the writings of Irenæus and Hippolytus which are no longer extant, that both these teachers denied the Pauline authorship of Hebrews (n. 9). On the part of Irenæus this denial was probably only indirect, Hebrews being quoted by him without mention of Paul's name. Hippolytus, or the other hand, to all appearances protested formally against the appeal of the Theodotians to Hebrews as a work of Paul's and as a part of Holy Scripture. If in this connection Hippolytus and Irenæus had mentioned someone else as the author of Hebrews, the silence of three independent reports on this point (n. 9) would be incomprehensible. It may be regarded as certain, therefore, that Hebrews as Irenæus and Hippolytus knew it was anonymous.

There were, however, Churches in which Hebrews was transmitted as an epistle of Barnabas. It is not a conjecture or personal opinion that Tertullian expresses, as Jerome declares (Vir. Ill. v.), but simply a reproduction of a current tradition, evidently just as found in the manuscript before him, when he writes as follows (n. 10): "Extat enim et Barnabæ titulus ad Hebræos, a deo satis auctorati viri, ut quem Paulus juxta se constituerit in abstinentiæ tenore . . . (1 Cor. ix. 6); et utique receptior apud ecclesias epistola Barnabæ illo apocrypho Pastore mœchorum."

From what has been stated above concerning the indifference of the Western Church toward Hebrews, it is evident that Tertullian does not set forth in the passage cited the tradition and public opinion of the catholic Church of his African home, or of the Church of Rome. Tertullian himself proves this by the way in which he introduces the quotation. After giving proofs, taken from the apostolic writings, he cites, as something wholly superfluous (ex redundantia), Heb. vi. 4-8, as evidence of some companion and disciple of the apostles. For the catholic clergy of Rome and Africa, who controverted the Montanism of Tertullian, after the final separation of the Montanist Church, Hebrews was not a sacred writing to be used for proof texts, whereas they appealed to the Shepherd of Hermas for the principles of their lax discipline, although both Catholic and Montanist Churches had excluded it from the Bible (de Pudic. x.). As far as the West is concerned, the Churches in which Hebrews received greater consideration than the Shepherd, and in which it was handed down as a writing of Barnabas, could have been only the Montanist Churches. Since, however, Montanism was introduced into the West from the province of Asia, there is the greatest probability that the tradition concerning Barnabas as the author of Hebrews originated there, and that it was not confined to the Montanist Churches of that region. This same tradition appears again in the Latin sermons, published by Batiffol (1900), which wrongly bear the name of Origen. In them it is set forth not as the conjecture of an individual scholar, but as a fact accepted in the preacher's circle (n. 11). The discussion concerning the origin of these sermons is not yet settled, and will not come to an end without a new investigation, which fairly considers every particular. If the preacher is not Novatian, as the present writer, following others and along with them, thought he might claim, he must have belonged to a Novatian Church, and nothing is more probable than that the tradition of Barnabas as author of Hebrews was handed down from the Montanists to the Novatians, as were the polemical use of Heb. vi. 4-8, and the high value placed upon the Epistle, things which we have long known.

It appears, therefore, from the above discussion, that there existed, between the years 180 and 260, three more or less widely diffused opinions regarding the authorship of Hebrews which stood over against each other—(1) Paul (held by the Alexandrians, and perhaps the Theodotians in Rome); (2) Barnabas (held by the Montanist Tertullian, evidently already by the Phrygian Montanists and also by the catholic Churches of the province of Asia, as well as by the Novatians); (3) some unknown person (Irenæus, Hippolytus, and probably still other Catholics of the West). The common source of this threefold tradition can only be the third view (n. 12), for in each of the other two cases it is incomprehensible how a tradition originally associated with Hebrews, whether it were ascribed to Paul or to Barnabas, in the circles from which Irenæus came, could have given way to entire ignorance in regard to the matter. It is equally incomprehensible how Βαρνάβα could arise from an original Παύλου, or vice versa. The history of early Christian literature offers elsewhere examples of how writings, originally anonymous in the tradition, were ascribed to definite authors on insufficient grounds (n. 13). The receivers of the letter certainly knew the name of the author; he himself indicates in Heb. xiii. 18-24 that he was known to them, and this knowledge would surely be preserved for some time. But when Hebrews began to be circulated, it could no longer have existed in the place from which it was sent out into the Churches. In view of the fact that, so far as we are aware, Hebrews was never known to any Church writer without the title πρὸς Ἑβραίους (above, p. 295 f.), it is probable that it was connected with the collection of Paul's letters either from the beginning or through a later addition. It is therefore very easy to understand how in Alexandria the letter was attributed to Paul. The Πάυλου (ἐπιστολή) which it was necessary to supply with πρὸς Κορινθίους, πρὸς Ἐφεσίους κτλ. was also very naturally supplied with πρὸς Ἑβραίους, in the title of the appended anonymous writing (n. 13). The mention of Timothy (Heb. xiii. 23), the author's knowledge of the Scripture, the reading τοῖς δεσμοῖς μου συνεπαθήσατέ (Heb. x. 34, n. 14), which, though certainly false, is perhaps very old, all tended to strengthen this view. If Hebrews was not appended to the Pauline letters until later, it is not surprising that the Churches which had received the original collection of Paul's letters without Hebrews were afterwards unwilling to accept the anonymous letter and to recognise it as a letter of Paul's. The individuals into whose hands it came regarded it either as an anonymous writing from ancient apostolic times, or resorted to conjecture. If Paul did not write it, then it must have been written by some other distinguished teacher of the apostolic age. Barnabas was such a man. It is possible that this assumption was furthered by the fact that an ancient document with many allegorical interpretations of O.T. legal regulations, our so-called Epistle of Barnabas, was circulated in the Oriental Churches under Barnabas' name. One who was seeking for the author of Hebrews might be influenced by this document to ascribe Hebrews also to this Barnabas. This same development of the Barnabas idea is also conceivable in case Hebrews was a part of the original collection of Paul's letters. Even if ἄλλου πρὸς Ἑβραίους was not in the title, the report could have been circulated with the collection that the document was not written by Paul, but was added to the collection of his letters because of its instructive and edifying character. In Alexandria this tradition disappeared, while in other regions it was preserved, and resulted either in the separation of this letter from those of Paul, or in the conjecture that it was written by Barnabas. In brief, there is no tradition regarding the author of Hebrews which compares with the traditions regarding the authors of the other N.T. writings in age, unanimity, and an originality, hard to invent.

1. (P. 294.) For the canonical history of Heb. see GK, i. 283-302, 379, 577 ff., 759, 963-966, ii. 85, 160 ff., 169-171, 238, 275, 358-362, also *PRF*³, vii. 492-506.

2. (P. 295.) Klostermann (Zur Theorie der bibl. Weissagung und zur Charakteristik des Hb, 1889, S. 55) conjectures that πρὸς Ἑβραίους is an incorrect copy of πρὸς Βερραιούς = Βεροιαίους, and holds that Apollos, who, according to Acts xviii. 27 f., laboured in Macedonia (Where is this statement found?) and Achaia, wrote this letter to the Church in Berea, the original constituency of which, according to Acts xvii. 11, was certainly Jewish. A more natural supposition would be Berea in Syria (Aleppo), which was the main centre of Jewish Christianity in the time of Jerome. Harnack, *ZfNTW*⁷, 1900, S. 21, had an idea of πρὸς τοῖς ἑταίροις as the original title. Sender (cited in Öder's Friedl. Untersuchung über d. Off. Joh. 1769, S. 29), followed later by Hug in his *Einkl.*³ ii. 482; Wieseler, Chronol. 483 ff., Untersuch. über den Hb. 1861, i. 26 ff.; Hilgenfeld, Einkl. 104, 354, was the first to advance the view that Heb. was really the epistle ad Alexandrinus, which, according to Can. Mur. line 64, was fabricated like an epistle ad Laodiceus, under Paul's name in the spirit of the Marcionite heresy. There were also many critics who believed that in Philaster the statement was to be found (Hær. lxxxix.) that in his time (380 to 390) Hebrews was quite generally regarded as a letter to the Laodiceans. This led to the further hypothesis that the words following the Epistle to Philemon at the end of the Cod. Bern. of the Pauline letters, ad Laodicenses incipit epistola, πρὸς Λαουδακήσας ἀρχεται ἐπιστολή, are the title of Heb. which ought here to follow in the MS. This was the opinion of Credner (Einkl. 560), Anger (Über den Laodiceerbr. 29), and Wieseler (Unters. i. 34 ff.). The Epistle to the Laodiceans referred to in Can. Mur. and in Cod. Bern. is the apocryphal letter of this title which is still in existence. With regard to the Epistle to the Alexandrians, we know nothing definite or certain; cf. GK, i. 277–283, ii. 82–88, 238, 566–592.

3. (P. 295.) For the meaning of titulus see vol. i. p. 488, n. 3. In the oldest MSS. (ΣΑΒCΚ) the only words found in the title at the beginning or in the title at the end are πρὸς Ἑβραίους without ἐπιστολή, first L, and in the title also P, have this addition, and this is apparently all that Tertullian found, for he writes (de Pud. xx.): extat et Barnabæ titulus (not epistola) ad Hebræos. This title cannot be compared with those of writings which were circulated independently, such as Κλήμεντος (λόγος) προτρεπτικός πρὸς Ἕλληνας or Τατιανοῦ λόγος πρὸς Ἕλληνας (Eus. H. E. vi. 13. 7). When titles of this kind are found in MSS. without λόγος, this is to be supplied from the title of a preceding writing by another author with a different address, e.g. in Eus. iv. 16. 7 from the preceding συγγράμματα. Different still is the case of Τατιανὸς ἐν τῷ πρὸς Ἕλληνας in Clem. Strom. i. § 101. Moreover, comparison with all these titles is rendered impossible by the fact that they contain the name of the author, whereas the common source of the divergent titles Barnabæ (titulus) ad Hebræos and Παύλου (ἐπιστολή) πρὸς Ἑβραίους could not possibly have contained the name of an author.

4. (P. 296.) Ever since the time that the Jews began to call themselves Jews (Jer. xxxii. 12), they designated their race and their ancestors Hebrews (1) in a retrospective view of the patriarchal and ancient Israelitish period, particularly where there was occasion to mention Israelites from the point of view of those who were not Israelites. This is found even in Jeremiah, where reference is made to a Mosaic ordinance (Jer. xxxiv. 9, 14, along with the more modern עֲבָרִי, Jer. xxxii. 12, xxxiv. 9). Cf. also Philo (Vita Mos. i. 2, 4, 26, 27, 48, 50), where the term Hebrews is used along with Ἰουδαῖοι without any distinction of time (op. cit. i. 1, 2, 7, ii. 7), Josephus (Ant. i. 6, 2, 4, 5, ii. 5, 4, 9, 1 ff.; Bell. iv. 8, 3, v. 9, 4), and the poet Ezekiel (in Eus. Præp. ix. 28 f.), in reproductions of the ancient history, or occasional references to the same. For the same reason it is also found regularly in the Sibyllines, the alleged predictions of an ancient prophetess. The usage in Judith x. 12, xii. 11, xiv. 18; 2 Macc. vii. 31, xi. 13, is also archaic. The Jews are very seldom mentioned by Greek and Roman writers. Once Plutarch uses along with the regular Ἰουδαῖοι (Apophthegm. regum, p. 184; Is. et Osir. 31, p. 363; Quest. conv. iv. 4. 4, 5. 1, 2, pp. 669, 670), τὰ Ἑβραίων ἀπόρρητα, p. 671, in reference to their ancient institutions; once Tac. Hist. v. 2 has Hebraeos terras (cf. Jos. Bell. v. 4. 3). The term is used more frequently by Pausanias of land and people without distinctions as to time, i. 5. 5, v. 5. 2, 7. 4, vi. 24. 8, x. 12. 9. (2) The Jews regularly use Ἑβραῖοι (also ἑβραϊκός, ἑβραῖς, ἑβραῖστί) when speaking of their language and literature; cf. Philo, de Conf. Ling. xxvi.; Migr. Abrah. iii.; Vita Mos. ii. 6 (of the seventy translators); Somn. ii. 38; Congr. Erud. Gr. viii.; Jos. Ant. i. 1. 1 f., iii. 6. 7, x. 10. 6. Cf. the lexicons of Levy or Jastrow, for example, Jer. Baba Bathra, 17c, "A Hebrew and a Greek witness." So the word came to be used in contrast to Hellenistic (see vol. i. pp. 39, 48 f., 67, n. 14). (3) While the Jews with pride called themselves Jews (Rom. ii. 17; C. I. Gr. 9916, 9926; JHSt. 1891, p. 269; cf. Berliner, Gesch. der Juden in Rom. i. 72 ff., nr. 12, 81, 109), the name assumed a different significance to Christians, and even to Jewish Christians, after the majority of this people had rejected the gospel, and Ἰουδαϊσμός (Gal. i. 13, 14; Ign. Magn. viii. 1, x. 3; Phil. vi. 1; Inscription from Portus given by Dérenbourg in Mél. Renier, 1887, p. 440) came to stand for a religion hostile to Christianity—a religion, acceptance of which made those who were not Jews Jews (Dio Cass. xxxvii. 17. 1). The time soon came when the term οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι no longer sufficed to distinguish genuine from false Jews (Rom. ii. 28 f.; Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9), inasmuch as it was used for the nation which excluded the Christian Church from itself (1 Thess. ii. 14; 1 Cor. x. 32; 2 Cor. xi. 24; Matt. xxviii. 15; John xiii. 33, xviii. 14, xx. 19; Acts xii. 3, xx. 3, xxi. 11, xxvi. 2). It is only very rarely and always with an evident purpose that Christian Israelites are called Jews by themselves and others; cf. Gal. ii. 13–15; Acts x. 28, xxi. 39, xxii. 3 (in Acts xxi. 20 the text is uncertain, still more so in Acts vi. 7). Cf. also the comparatively late catholic Acts of Peter and Paul, ed. Lipsius, 122. The more favourite expression is οἱ ἐκ περιτομῆς (Gal. ii. 12; Col. iv. 11; Tit. i. 10; Acts x. 45, xi. 2; cf. Phil. iii. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 18), or the simple statement of Jewish origin, ἐξ Ἰουδαίων (Rom. ix. 24; Just. Dial. xlvii. 48; cf. GK. ii. 671, A. 2). In the post-apostolic age (2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5; Acts vi. 1 cannot be cited in favour of this usage; cf. vol. i. p. 48), they were called also Ἑβραῖοι. Although in numerous instances the linguistic meaning of the word exerted a strong influence,—as, for example, in the case of the Aramaic-speaking Nazarenes and their Hebrew gospel, as it was apparently called by Hegesippus (Eus. H. E. iv. 22. 7; cf. GK. ii. 643, 649 ff.),—in the vast majority of cases it indicates a contrast between Jews and non-Jews, without any reference to the contrast between Hebrews and Hellenists within the Jewish race itself, as in Acts vi. 1. When Clement (Pæd. i. 34; Strom. i. 11), speaking of Paul and one of his own teachers, calls them Ἑβραῖοι ἀνέκαθεν or ἀνωθεν, or when Eusebius (H. E. i. 11. 9, ii. 4. 3, iv. 5. 2) uses the same expression with reference to Philo, Josephus, and the first bishops of Jerusalem (cf. H. E. iv. 22. 7, with regard to Hegesippus), the only thing indicated is their ancestral connection with the Jewish people and faith. Clement (Pæd. i. 34) uses along with Ἑβραῖος, Ἰουδαῖος to designate their religion; and Eusebius (H. E. iv. 5. 4) uses the same word interchangeably with ἐκ περιτομῆς. In speaking of the destination of Matt., Irenæus uses once, iii. 1. 1, ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις, and in a second instance (Frugm. 29, ed. Stieren, p. 842) πρὸς Ἰουδαίους. Eusebius also calls the gospel, "which gave special joy to those of the Hebrews who accepted Christ" (H. E. iii. 25. 5), τὸ καθ' Ἑβραίων εὐαγγέλιον, both in the passage here cited and elsewhere (iv. 22. 7); occasionally also "The gospel which is among the Jews" (de Theophania syr. iv. 12). The most decisive proof is that furnished by the Ebionites, whose entire literature, so far as we know it (their gospel, the pseudo-Clementine writings, the translation of the O.T., and the commentary of Symmachus), was Greek, but who, notwithstanding, always called genuine Jews and Jewish Christians Hebrews (Clement, Epist. ad Jac. i.; Hom. i. 9, viii. 5, 6, 7, x. 26, xi. 35, xviii. 4; Recogn. i. 7, 32, v. 35), and who, according to Epiph. Har. xxx. 3, 13, occasionally spoke of their Greek gospel as a ἑβραϊκὸν and καθ' Ἑβραίων εὐαγγέλιον. "Hebrews" means here, as in Tert. Marc. iii. 12, Hebræi Christiani, Jewish Christians.

5. (Pp. 296, 298, 300.) Eus. H. E. vi. 14. 2 ff. (cf. Cramer, Cat. vii. 286; cf. Severianus, p. 115; Jn. Damasc., ed. Lequien, ii. 258; Forsch. iii. 71, 149) gives the following account taken from the Hyprotypothes of Clement: καὶ τὴν πρὸς Ἑβραίων δὲ ἐπιστολὴν Παύλου μὲν εἶναι φησι, γεγράφηται δὲ Ἑβραίοις ἑβραϊκῇ φωνῇ, Δουκᾶν δὲ φιλοτίμως (sic) αὐτὴν μεθερμηνεύσαντα ἐκδοῦναι τοῖς Ἕλλησιν, ὅθεν τὸν αὐτὸν χρῶτα εὗρίσκεσθαι κατὰ τὴν ἐρμηνείαν ταύτης τε τῆς ἐπιστολῆς καὶ τῶν πράξεων μὴ προγεγράφθαι δὲ τὸ "Παῦλος ἀπόστολος" εἰκότως. "Ἑβραίοις γάρ, φησιν, ἐπιστέλλων, πρόληψιν εἰληφόσι κατ' αὐτοῦ καὶ ὑποπτέουσιν αὐτόν, συνετῶς πάντῃ οὐκ ἐν ἀρχῇ ἀπέτρεψεν αὐτοὺς τὸ ὄνομα θεῖς." Εἶτα ὑποβᾶς ἐπιλέγει. "Ἦδη δέ, ὡς ὁ μακάριος ἔλεγε πρεσβύτερος, ἐπεὶ ὁ κύριος ἀπόστολος ὢν τοῦ παντοκράτορος (Heb. iii. 1) ἀπεστάλη πρὸς Ἑβραίους, διὰ μετρίωπτα ὁ Παῦλος, ὥσάν ἐἰς τὰ ἔθνη ἀπεστίλμενος, οὐκ ἐγγράφει ἑαυτὸν Ἑβραίων ἀπόστολον διὰ τε τὴν πρὸς τὸν κύριον τιμὴν, διὰ τε τὸ ἐκ περιουσίας καὶ τοῖς Ἑβραίοις ἐπιστέλλειν, ἔθνῳ κήρυκα ὄντα καὶ ἀπόστολον." It may be regarded as certain that "The sainted presbyter" Pantenus is the principal teacher of Clement (cf. Forsch. iii. 157-161, 168-176). Clement expresses himself just as definitely in his comment on 1 Pet. v. 13 (Forsch. iii. 83): "sicut Lucas quoque et actus apostolorum stilo exsecutus agnoscitur et Pauli ad Hebræos interpretatus epistolam." While Origen speaks of persons who called Luke not the translator, but the author of Heb., and of others who said the same of Clement of Rome (above, p. 299, and below, p. 309, n. 7), Eusebius (H. E. iii. 38. 2) changes this ιστορία, as Origen calls it, into another, according to which some made Luke, others Clement of Rome, the translator of Heb. The latter assumption Eusebius considers particularly probable because of the resemblance in style and thought between Heb. and Clement's Epistle to the Corinthians (§ 3), although he does not deny that this relationship was due to the fact that Clement was dependent upon Heb. (§ 1). Jerome in his usual fashion mixes everything up (Vir. Ill. v.; Ep. cxxix. 3, ad Dardanum). Tertullian says that Barnabas is the author of Heb. (see n. 3), while others attribute it to Luke or Clement of Rome. But the authorship of Clement is represented as affecting only the literary form, or as perhaps confined to a translation from the Hebrew. Philaster (Har. lxxxix.) states that the opponents of the Pauline authorship were divided in their opinion as to whether Barnabas, Clement, or Luke was the author (below, n. 11). Ephrem (Comm. in Pauli epist., ed. Mekith, p. 200) reproduces the two opinions that Clement of Rome was the author and that he was the translator, without accepting either. Severianus of Gabala (Cramer, Cat. vii. 115), on the authority of Eusebius mentions Clement and Luke as possible translators. Theodorus, who rejected the idea of the intentional anonymous authorship of Heb., remarks incidentally that Timothy acted as Paul's amanuensis (Cramer, vii. 113 f.). According to Theodoret, in Heb. xiii. 23, Timothy was only the messenger who delivered the letter.

6. (P. 297.) Pantænus (see preceding note) assumes it as self-evident that Heb. was directed to the same persons to whom Jesus preached, i.e. the Jewish Christians of Palestine. This was also the view of Clement, who agrees with the opinion of his teacher, which he reports; for it is only on this presupposition that Clement could assume as self-evident that Heb. was written in Hebrew, since he must have known that the Jews in Alexandria, Rome, and other places were entirely Hellenistic. Ephrem asserts very positively, p. 201, that Heb. was written shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem to the Christians of that city, the disciples of the original apostles who were probably still living there. He represents it as being a counterpart of the letter of the Jerusalem Church to the Gentile Christians in Antioch (Acts xv. 23). The same view is expressed by the genuine Euthalius (Zacagni, 526), only less definitely, when he represents Heb. as being an epistle to the Jewish Christian Churches mentioned in 1 Thess. ii. 14; by Chrysostom (Monfaucon, xii. 2, ποῦ δὲ οὖσιν ἐπέστειλεν; ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ ἐν Ἱεροσολύμοις καὶ Παλαιστίνῃ), and Theodoret (Noesselt, 543). The pseudo-Euthalius (Zacagni, 668) thinks that Heb. was addressed to the whole body of Jewish Christians.

7. (P. 299.) According to Eusebius (H. E. vi. 25. 11–14), Origen in his homilies on Heb. says: "Ὅτι ὁ χαρακτήρ τῆς λέξεως τῆς πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἐπιγεγραμμένης ἐπιστολῆς οὐκ ἔχει τὸ ἐν λόγῳ ἰδιωτικὸν τοῦ ἀποστόλου, ὁμολογήσαντος ἑαυτὸν ἰδιώτην εἶναι τῷ λόγῳ, τοῦτέστι τῇ φράσει, ἀλλὰ ἐστὶν ἡ ἐπιστολὴ συνθέσει τῆς λέξεως Ἑλληνικωτέρα, πᾶς ὁ ἐπιστάμενος κρίνειν φράσεων (αἱ φράσεις) διαφορὰς ὁμολογήσαι ἂν πάλιν τε αὐτὸ ὅτι τὰ νοήματα τῆς ἐπιστολῆς θαυμάσιά ἐστι καὶ οὐ δευτέρα τῶν ἀποστολικῶν ὁμολογουμένων γραμμάτων, καὶ τοῦτο ἂν συμφέησαι εἶναι ἀληθὲς πᾶς ὁ προσέχων τῇ ἀναγνώσει τῇ ἀποστολικῇ (Eusebius here interrupts the narrative with the remark, τούτοις μεθ' ἕτερα ἐπιφέρει λέγων). Ἐγὼ δὲ ἀποφαινόμενος εἶποιμ' ἂν, ὅτι τὰ μὲν νοήματα τοῦ ἀποστόλου ἐστίν, ἡ δὲ φράσις καὶ ἡ σύνθεσις ἀπομνημονεύσαντός τινος τὰ ἀποστολικά καὶ ὥσπερ ἐσχολιογραφῆσαντός τινος τὸ εἰρημένα ὑπὸ τοῦ διδασκάλου. Εἴ τις οὖν ἐκκλησία ἔχει ταύτην τὴν ἐπιστολὴν ὡς Παύλου, αὕτη εὐδοκίμειω καὶ ἐπὶ τοῖς οὖν γὰρ εἰκὴ οἱ ἀρχαῖοι ἄνδρες ὡς Παύλου αὐτὴν παραδεδώκασι. τίς δὲ ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν, τὸ μὲν ἀληθὲς θεὸς οἶδεν, ἡ δὲ εἰς ἡμᾶς φθάσασα ἱστορία ὑπὸ τινων μὲν λεγόντων ὅτι Κλήμης ὁ γενόμενος ἐπίσκοπος Ῥωμαίων ἔγραψε τὴν ἐπιστολὴν, ὑπὸ τινων δὲ ὅτι Λουκᾶς ὁ γράψας τὸ εὐαγγέλιον καὶ τὰς πράξεις. This is copied inaccurately in Cramer, Cat. vii. 285 f., but accurately and almost entire in a scholion in one of the Athos MSS. (von der Goltz, S. 85). For the interpretation see GK, i. 287, A. 1. To take αὕτη with ταύτην τὴν ἐπιστολὴν instead of with εἴ τις οὖν ἐκκλησία, as Hofmann suggests, v. 46, is impossible, both in view of the construction and of the sense.

8. (P. 301.) The Canon Muratori, which mentions by name and rejects two pseudo-Pauline letters, and takes account of differences in opinion concerning a writing of Peter's and the Shepherd of Hermas, has nothing to say concerning Heb. The same is true also of the African canon, circa 360

(Grundriss, 83). There are no citations from Heb. in Cyprian and contemporaries, in Optatus of Milevi and in the Acts of the Donatist controversy. In Rome, furthermore, the number of Paul's Epistles was limited to thirteen by Caius (circa 210), and Eusebius makes the statement, that even in his day the Roman Church, or many Romans, i.e. Westerners, objected to Heb. as un-Pauline (H. E. iii. 3. 5, vi. 20). On the other hand, clear traces that Heb. was read with great esteem in Rome are first found in Clement of Rome and Hermas (GK, i. 963 f., also 577 f. on Justin, and 295 ff. on Theodotus). Additional matter in nn. 9 and 11; also § 47, n. 7.

9. (Pp. 295, 301, 302.) Stephanus Gobarus says in the year 600 (see Photius, Bibl. 232): ὅτι Ἱππολύτος καὶ Εἰρηναῖος τὴν πρὸς Ἑβραίους ἐπιστολὴν Παύλου οὐκ ἐκείνου εἶναι φασί (whereas Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius reckon it among the Pauline letters). Photius says the same thing, Bibl. 121, about Hippolytus, the author of the work against the thirty-two heresies. Since Stephanus mentions Hippolytus before he does Irenæus,—although the latter is older,—it is probable that his information about Irenæus is derived solely from a remark of Hippolytus with regard to Irenæus' views concerning Heb. Evidently Hippolytus was the first who had occasion expressly to deny the Pauline authorship of Heb. in opposition to the Theodotians, while Irenæus appears to have quoted Heb. without naming the author (Eus. H. E. v. 26; cf. GK, i. 296–298).

10. (P. 302.) Tert. de Pud. xx.; cf. GK, i. 290 ff. Inasmuch as there was no Latin Bible in Tertullian's time, he must have had before him a Greek copy of Heb. with the title, Βαρνάβα πρὸς Ἑβραίους (ἐπιστολή). Merely oral traditions which are associated with the text of the books Tertullian is in the habit of reproducing in a different way, e.g. with regard to the relation of Mark to Peter and of Luke to Paul, contra Marc. iv. 5, he uses the words affirmatur adscribere solent. The attempt has been made incorrectly to discover the same tradition in the index of Cod. Clarom. of the letters of Paul, where, after the seven catholic Epistles, we have the words, Barnabas epist. ver. 850. This view is supported by Westcott, Ep. to the Hebrews, 1889, p. xxviii, with overmuch emphasis upon the idea that the numbers suit Heb. better than the so-called Epistle of Barnabas. Cf. per contra, GK, ii. 169 f., 950 ff.

11. (P. 303.) Tractatus Origenis de libris ss. scripturarum, ed. Batiffol, Paris, 1900. Up to the present time the result of the discussion seems to be the conclusion that these twenty sermons are not the work of Origen, and that they are not translations from the Greek. The view that they were written by Novatian is supported by Weyman (Archiv f. lat. Litteraturgesch. xi. 467, 545–576), Hausleiter (ThLB, 1900, Nos. 14–16), Zahn (NKZ, 1900, S. 348–360), Jordan (Die Theologie der neunten Predigten Novatians, 1902). Some of the objections raised to this view demand earnest consideration. In Tract. 10, p. 108, between a saying of the beatus apostolus Paulus quoted from Rom. xii. 1. and a quotation from 1 Cor. iii. 16, is found the following: “Sed et Sanctissimus Barnabas, ‘Per ipsum offerimus,’ inquit, ‘deo laudis hostiam laborum confitentium nomini eius’”; cf. Heb. xiii. 15. According to Epiphanius (Hæc. lix. 2), Philaster (Hæc. lxxxix. 3–8), Ambrose (de Pernit. ii. 2), the Novatians, like Tertullian (de Pud. xx.), used Heb. vi. 4–8 to justify their rejection of the “second repentance.” About the opinion of the Novatians of the fourth century concerning the author of Heb. there is no tradition, but it is probable that they also followed the Barnabas tradition, and that it was with reference to their opinion on this matter that Philaster wrote at the beginning of the chapter in which he deals with the misuse of Heb. by the Novatians: "Sunt alii, qui epistolam beati Pauli ad Hebræos non adserunt esse ipsius, sed dicunt aut Barnabæ esse beati apostoli aut Clementis de urbe Romæ (Roma?) episcopi, alii autem Lucæ beatissimi evangelistæ aiunt." This was probably written somewhat earlier than the kindred statements of Jerome, Vir. Ill. v., and much earlier than Jerome's letter to Dardanus (above, p. 308, n. 5; GK, ii. 234 f.). Philaster does not copy Jerome, nor does he, like him, attribute the Barnabas tradition to an individual, namely, Tertullian, but to a party of his own day. Pacian, Epist. i. 2, mentions the Montanist Proculus (al. Proclus) as holding a position midway between Montanism and Novatianism. When now Caius of Rome, in his dialogue with Proclus, charges the Montanists with making new Holy Scriptures, and in this connection mentions the thirteen letters of Paul exclusive of Heb. (Eus. H. E. vi. 20), it is extremely probable that Proclus had quoted Heb. as Holy Scripture, which Caius and the other Catholics in Rome (Can. Mur. and Hippolytus) did not accept as such. But it does not in any sense follow that Proclus quoted Heb. as a work of Paul's. It is much more probable that Proclus, like his admirer and fellow-Montanist, Tertullian, regarded Barnabas as the author of Heb., and, like Tertullian, quoted this Epistle as an authority, only he gave it more weight than Tertullian did.

12. (P. 304.) The hypothesis of Fr. Overbeck (Zur Gesch. des Kanons, 1880, S. 1-70), according to which Heb. at the time of its canonising in Alexandria (160-170), and with a view to its being canonised, was artificially made an Epistle of Paul's by the omission of the original greeting of the letter and the addition of Heb. xiii. 22-25, cannot be presented here with all the absurdities which it involves (cf. GK, i. 300 f., A. 1). The main difficulty with it is its failure to explain how Irenæus, Hippolytus, and the other Western writers, who did not like the Alexandrians, have Heb. in their Canon, and who were in general independent of Alexandria, came to lose the greeting. Neither does it explain the rise of the Barnabas tradition, which could originate only when and where the letter was received as anonymous, without any greeting and without any association with the name of Paul. If the alleged original greeting contained the name of Barnabas, the desire on the part of the Alexandrians to canonise the letter was no reason why they should omit the greeting; since for a time in their Church they accepted as canonical the letter which by themselves, and afterwards in Christian literature, was attributed to Barnabas (GK, i. 347-350, ii. 159, 169 f., 918-953). Even if a less distinguished name had stood in the greeting, it is inconceivable that men who were willing to make Heb. an Epistle of Paul's in an underhanded manner, and who were bold enough to set aside the greeting that stood in their way, and to insert a closing paragraph obscurely referring to Paul, should have lacked the courage and intelligence required by their undertaking to replace the original greeting with another which met their wishes.

13. (P. 304.) A parallel is found in the tradition concerning the so-called Second Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians. For some reason this ancient sermon, preached probably in Corinth, became associated with the letter of the Roman Church to the Corinthians, which, according to tradition, was written by Clement. After the writings became associated, both the address, πρὸς Κορινθίους, and the author's name, Κλήμεντος, were applied to the second writing also. As a result, in the time of Eusebius mention is made of a second epistle of Clement (H. E. iii. 38. 4), and in both Greek MSS. and in the Syriac version in which these two writings are found, the sermon had come to be called a second letter of Clement to the Corinthians. It is due simply to the fact that in the MSS. of certain spurious writings of Justin as they were handed down, there was added a τοῦ αὐτοῦ, which perhaps was at first supplied only in thought, but which is found written in the one existing MS., that the Epistle to Diognetus came to be regarded as a work of Justin's (*Otto, Just. opp.*³ ii. p. xiv).

14. (P. 304.) The reading δεσμίους, Heb. x. 34, is supported by AD* 67 (a marginal reading of the Vindob. Gr. theol. 302, which very often agrees with the uncials BM in which Heb. x. is wanting), Coptic, Vulgate, Armenian, versions S¹ S², Ephr. Lat. trans. 229 (otherwise he would not have omitted this sentence, p. 201, in his discussion of the Pauline authorship of Hebrews). In favour of the reading δεσμοῖς μου are SHLKP (also the scribe who corrected D, hence also E), most cursives, Clem. Strom. iv. 103; Orig. Ech. mart. 43 (but without μου); Theodoret in Heb. x. 34 and in Isa. v. 17 (Schulze, ii. 202, iii. 611); Cramer, Cat. vii. 241; pseudo-Euthalius (Zacagni, 670). Hofmann, v. 461 f., is the last writer who vigorously defends the latter reading. The reading of Origen and of the Latin text Clarom. (vinculis eorum, referring to the οὕτως ἀναστρεφόμενοι mentioned in ver. 33) would seem to indicate that first δεσμίους was changed to δεσμοῖς in a purely mechanical way, and the attempt was made later to make this reading clear by the addition of μου or αὐτῶν. The latter word was inserted from the text, without thought of supporting any theory of the letter's origin, but the former word is suspiciously connected with the tradition of its Pauline authorship. Where this tradition prevailed the reading was accepted; it may also have helped to confirm and to give currency to the tradition, if the reading was in existence before Clement's time; the pseudo-Euthalius, op. cit., uses this text as proof of the Pauline authorship of Heb.

§ 46. THE LITERARY FORM AND THE HISTORICAL PRESUPPOSITIONS OF THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

It is not only the lack of a greeting which makes the beginning of Hebrews seem more like an essay than an Epistle. In all the writings of the apostolic and post-apostolic age, whose epistolary character is indicated at once by the greeting, the sentences which follow the greeting are very different from those in Heb. i. 1-14.

In every case, even where a connected doctrinal exposition is intended and presented later in the course of the letter, the Epistle begins with personal remarks often very closely connected with the greeting. These vary in character, consisting sometimes of an expression of the feeling of the author toward the readers; sometimes of a remark about the occasion of the letter, or the relation between the author and the readers; or it may be some request or admonition addressed to the readers (n. 1).

The assumption that Hebrews originally had a greeting which was later intentionally removed (above, p. 311, n. 12), or accidentally lost, does not adequately explain the peculiarity of the letter's beginning. If the beginning of Hebrews was ever intended to give the impression of a letter, much more than an opening greeting must have been lost. But in this case it is incomprehensible, and without analogy in the early Christian literature, that the didactic body of the letter, which has been preserved, should begin with a fully-rounded rhetorical sentence, which does not permit of logical or stylistic relation to something that preceded. Comparison may be made with Romans, if Rom. i. 1-15 (or -16α τὸ εὐαγγέλιον) had been lost; or the experiment may be tried of cutting out the introductory part of any letter of Paul's which is predominantly didactic, to see whether it is possible to obtain something comparable to the beginning of Hebrews. The assumption that the beginning of Hebrews was intentionally or accidentally mutilated, is just as untenable as the supposition that the same thing was done to 1 John, the introduction to which seems at first sight to resemble that of Hebrews. It will be observed at once, however, that while 1 John shows in a more distinct way an epistolary character at the beginning than Hebrews, in the further course of the letter and in the conclusion it is less so. The author of Hebrews describes his production as a short letter (xiii. 22, διὰ βραχέων ἐπέστειλα ὑμῖν). He charges the readers to greet their officers and all the Christians in their locality, and he conveys to them the greetings of the Christians from among whom he writes (xiii. 24). He expresses the hope that he may in the near future visit them, or rather return to those among whom he had formerly lived. In this journey he hopes to be accompanied by Timothy, who has recently been released from imprisonment, if the latter can reach him in time (xiii. 19, 23). But even leaving out of account xiii. 18-24, Hebrews is not an essay, but, as the author himself says, an exhortation directed to the heart and conscience (xiii. 22, ἀδελφοί, ἀνέχεσθε τοῦ λόγου τῆς παρακλήσεως). The longer as well as the shorter theoretical discussions always end in practical exhortations (ii. 1-4, iii. 1-4, 16, v. 11-vi. 12, x. 19-39, xii. 1-xiii. 17). Nor do these exhortations give the impression of being an appended moral. The intensity of their language and the detail with which they are frequently worked out, would seem to indicate that they express the main purpose of the letter to which even the most artificial and detailed discussions are subordinate. From the first exhortation to the readers in iii. 1 (cf. ii. 1-4) on, it becomes more and more evident that Hebrews is not an essay meant for whoever may chance to read it, but a letter addressed to a group of Christians living at a particular time in a definite locality. It is also apparent that they are living under practically the same conditions as before conversion; that they have been and are still exposed to the same inward and external perils; consequently that they are a homogeneous and harmonious body. Hebrews is really an Epistle in the same sense as the letters of Paul to particular Churches, but less than any one of these an Epistle designed for some specific occasion. Hebrews is accurately described by what Jude says regarding the didactic writing which he planned, and for which, on account of the pressing need, he temporarily substituted a short practical letter (Jude 3; above, p. 242 f.).

Of the extant writings next to 1 John, Hebrews most resembles James in point of style. But both James and 1 John omit all direct personal communications, and indicate at once in the salutation the distinction between their written address to a wide circle of readers and oral preaching in a local Church. The author of Hebrews, on the other hand, leaves it to the bearer of his letter to indicate to the readers for whom it was intended, that it is his word to them, i.e. the word of their well-known teacher.

Even without entering deeply into the content and the development of the thought of Hebrews, it is possible to gather from the letter much that throws light upon the character of the readers and the author. The N.T. proclamation of salvation which Jesus Himself, the great original Apostle, was the first to proclaim (iii. 1, cf. i. 1), was brought to the readers and writer alike by those who heard the preaching of Jesus, and had been confirmed among them by the accompanying witness of signs and wonders, by works of healing, and by manifold manifestations of the inspiring spirit (ii. 3 f.). The author himself was not a personal disciple of Jesus, but owed his Christian faith to the preaching of such disciples. The same must also have been true of all his readers. They are represented as standing in exactly the same historical relation to Jesus and the apostles as the readers in 2 Pet. i. 16, iii. 2; cf. i. 4 and Jude 17 f. Though the language shows points of resemblance to passages like 1 Cor. i. 6, 1 Thess. i. 5, a difference comes at once to view. It could not be said of Churches founded by Paul and his helpers that they received the gospel—the first announcement of salvation—from those who heard the preaching of Jesus, nor is this anywhere said by Paul or by Peter, where he speaks to such persons (1 Pet. i. 12, 23–25, ii. 25), or by John (1 John ii. 7, 24, iii. 11). On the other hand, among the readers there could not have been personal disciples of Jesus; or those who were such must have been so few in number and so unimportant as to be left out of account. Those disciples of Jesus who had brought the gospel to the readers no longer live among them. They have either gone elsewhere in the prosecution of their missionary labours, or they are no longer alive. The latter is certainly true of the men to whom primarily the readers owed their conversion (xiii. 7). In order to emphasise their obligation to the leaders, of whom they are to be mindful, these are described as those who spoke to them the word of God, which means simply that they brought the gospel to them and were instrumental in their conversion (cf. Phil. i. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 16; Mark iv. 33; Acts iv. 29, viii. 25, xi. 19). When the readers are exhorted further to consider with admiration the end of their life and to imitate their faith, it is implied that the missionary preachers died as martyrs. The description of these deceased teachers as οἱ ἡγούμενοι ὑμῶν is justified only if they occupied, at least temporarily, an official position in the Church to which the readers belonged (above, p. 124, n. 5). The same must have been true also of the author. From xiii. 18 f. (cf. xiii. 23) it follows that prior to this time the author had lived among the readers, and hoped that his return in the near future would be a gain to them. Moreover, the general tone of the letter, and especially such passages as v. 12–vi. 3, vi. 9, xii. 4 f., 12 f., show that he was accustomed to teach, and enjoyed a certain reputation as a teacher, not only among other Christians, but also among the readers. That he was one of their ἄνδρες ἡγούμενοι (Acts xv. 22) while he lived among them, and that he will resume this position, is conclusively proved by the transition (xiii. 17 ff.) which he makes from his exhortation that the readers obey their leaders and not render their pastoral work difficult, to the request for their prayer on his behalf, the avowal of his effort to live a blameless life, the expression of his hope through the intercession of the readers to be restored to them, and, finally, the reminder that, while human teachers may come and go, Christians have always with them their great Shepherd, Jesus (n. 2).

The unconditional recognition of the preaching and life of the apostles and disciples of Jesus, who brought the word of salvation to them, carries with it a similar recognition of the original religious life of these Christians. This is also expressed directly. The foundation of Christian knowledge was rightly laid among them (vi. 1 f.); they have only to hold fast the confidence of their first faith (iii. 14); at present they are in a state of doubt and discontent, and in serious danger of falling away; and everything that the author must lament in their condition, and must fear for them, is an indication of the relaxation of the religious energy which they had shown earlier and possessed from the beginning (cf. especially xii. 12). Previously this energy had manifested itself in various ways. Its first fruit had been charity toward "the saints," which they displayed earlier and have not ceased to exercise even now (vi. 10). They must have distinguished themselves in this matter above other Churches, since the author bases his confidence that after all his worst fears of their final apostasy will not be realised, on the righteousness of God which will not permit Him to forget their labour and love in rendering this service to the saints in God's name. The language used plainly indicates that this was not mutual aid among the readers themselves, nor the charity of the well-to-do toward the poor around them, nor even charity on the part of the whole body of readers to Christians generally outside their circle. It can only mean that the readers had a prominent part in the great collection for the mother Church in Jerusalem which was begun in Antioch as early as 44, and had since been carried forward by the earnest and repeated efforts of Paul (n. 3). In the second place, the faith of the readers had been maintained considerably earlier in the face of severe persecution (x.

32-34, n. 4). It is an error to conclude, as has been often done, from xii. 4 that this persecution was bloodless; for the reference in this passage is not to suffering for the sake of the Christian confession (Phil. i. 29 f.), nor, in general, to the struggle for the faith (Jude 3), but to the conflict of the believers with their own sins (cf. Heb. xii. 1; 1 Cor. ix. 25 f.). This struggle does not, therefore, like that of x. 32, belong to the past, but extends throughout the whole earthly life. At the time when the letter was written the readers had grown weary in this struggle. They had not resisted "unto blood" the sin besetting them through manifold temptations, especially those arising through the hostility of persons not of their faith, and the necessity of life in the world (Heb. xii. 3, 5-11, ii. 18, iii. 13, iv. 15). Rather have they yielded to the same. On the other hand, in the great tribulation now long past (x. 32, ἀναμνήσκεσθε δὲ τὰς πρότερον ἡμέρας), they stood the test nobly. The fact that nothing is said of the taking of life, but only insults and oppressions, imprisonment and confiscation of property, are mentioned, does not justify the assumption that the persecution was a bloodless one. The author is not here giving a chapter of Church history in which the Church of a city or province is represented as a permanent corporate body outliving its individual members (n. 4), his object rather is to speak to the conscience of the Christians to whom he writes, by recalling the courage and willingness to make sacrifices which they once had manifested. Certainly they were not put to death at that time; in which case the author could not write to them. Nevertheless they must have been in great distress, from which they escaped only with their lives. In their sufferings they presented to the world and the Church at the time a notable spectacle (θεατριζόμενοι, cf. 1 Cor. iv. 9). Furthermore, when they themselves escaped with life and liberty, they were not ashamed of the fellowship of those who fared worse (cf. 2 Tim. i. 8, 16 f.), but visited and comforted them in prison. When forcibly deprived of their possessions they gladly sacrificed them. A reference to those who had actually suffered as martyrs in the persecution would have been out of place here, where the author's object is, not to make the sufferings and services of the survivors seem small by comparison with those of the martyrs, but to represent them as great as possible. It is natural to assume that the teachers who laid the foundations of the faith among them, whose martyrdom is referred to in xiii. 7 (above, p. 316), lost their lives in the same persecution. In all probability the μνημονεύετε in xiii. 7 refers to the same event as the ἀναμνησθε in x. 32.

The author's remark, that the readers endured this great tribulation after they were enlightened (n. 5), i.e. after their conversion, does not in any sense imply that the persecution took place immediately after their conversion. It is only intended to guard against the possible misunderstanding of the phrase "earlier days," which might be made to refer to the time prior to their conversion. Whether this remark was occasioned by the peculiar character of the earlier history of these Christians remains to be considered later. It is perfectly clear that the author intends to speak only about what they suffered as Christians, though this was at a period considerably earlier. What is here indicated incidentally is expressly stated in v. 12, namely, that the readers have behind them a long Christian experience. Because of this fact one might expect that they would teach Christianity to others; but, as a matter of fact, they have grown so dull as to seem in need again of instruction in the most elementary principles of Christianity. This blame, like the praise in x. 32 ff., shows how incorrect it is to suppose that Hebrews was addressed to the second generation of a Christian Church. In this case it would have been necessary to remind the readers not simply of their original confidence in the faith (iii. 14), of their own earlier days (x. 32), of the spirit of sacrifice which they themselves manifested at that time, and of the long period that had elapsed since they were first instructed in the principles of Christianity, but primarily of the faith, sufferings, and ripe knowledge of their deceased fathers (cf. 2 Pet. iii. 4) and mothers (2 Tim. i. 5). It is self-evident that in the interval between the first preaching of the gospel to the readers and the present, other Christians of their circle, as well as their apostles (xiii. 7), have died; but in the main the same generation is still living which had heard the gospel from the lips of the disciples of Jesus (ii. 3; cf. n. 4). Besides these indefinite hints, which indicate the date of the Epistle only relatively, there is another, disputed, to be sure, which, rightly understood, fixes the time of the composition of the letter absolutely (n. 6). The writer does not quote Ps. xcv. 7b-11 as scripture in iii. 7-11 to prove some statement which precedes or follows, but he puts rather what he himself has to say to the readers into the language of the Psalm. This is indicated by the formula of introduction and the manifestly intentional alteration of the text of the Psalm. Furthermore, the words thus freely quoted from the Psalm are referred to the Holy Spirit by the parenthetical remark, καθὼς λέγει τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, not in order to say incidentally that they are taken from the Holy Scripture,—for this it was customary to use simpler formulæ,—but in order to soften the harshness of the sudden transition from his own words in iii. 9 to those of God, as is also the case in Ps. xcv. 9 (cf. x. 15). The warning which the Psalmist once uttered to his own generation, in view of the wanderings in the wilderness, the author utters anew to the Hebrews of his time. Since it is only in proportion as they hold fast the Christian hope to the end that Christians have a right to feel themselves members of the household of God (iii. 6), the readers should not harden their hearts to-day when they hear

God's voice, as was the case in the provocation in the day of testing in the wilderness, where their fathers saw and proved the works of God for forty years. It was because this generation, notwithstanding their experience, failed to acknowledge His ways that God's wrath burned against them, and that He swore that they should not enter into the rest promised by God to His people. To us it may seem that the author is only recalling events from the history of Israel, just as the Psalmist, whose words he appropriates, did in his time. But if this were the case, it is surprising that he adds further exhortations (vv. 12-14) without expressly comparing the facts of O.T. history with the present, and without a formal application of them to the conditions of the readers, returning at the close to the thought of ver. 6. Not so with the readers who were familiar with the author's typological mode of teaching. Although here as elsewhere (xiii. 13) he clothes his own thoughts in language borrowed from the description of conditions long past, which, taken literally, do not apply to the present, still he is not, like the Psalmist, speaking of that generation which came out of Egypt with Moses, but of this generation, namely, the generation to which he and his contemporaries belonged. To this evil generation of the Jewish people who hardened themselves against the Son of God (Matt. xi. 16, xii. 39-45, xxiii. 32-38, xxiv. 34), and who for forty years (from 30-70 A.D.) witnessed God's redeeming work, first in the person of Jesus and then in the preaching of the apostles, accompanied as it was by miracles, and yet failed to acknowledge God's ways, God has sworn in His wrath that they should have no part in the rest promised to the people of God. This does not apply to the readers, since they suffered themselves to be saved from this generation through the preaching in which they believed (Acts ii. 40). But they understood perfectly what was meant when the author, using the language of the Psalmist, called this unbelieving Israel their fathers (Heb. iii. 9), instead of employing the prosaic expression their "brothers after the flesh" (Rom. ix. 3), or their "brothers and fathers" (Acts vii. 2). Those referred to are the Jewish people from whom they descended, and the decisive acts in which the hatred of the Jewish people against the final revelation of God found expression were committed by persons no longer living.

A second allegory (iii. 15–iv. 11) begins with what seems to be a purely historical exposition of the passage from the Psalm, which previously the author had used to express his own thoughts. But this interpretation ends by showing how, in its typical significance, the history of the wanderings in the wilderness applies also to the present and the future (cf. 1 Cor. x. 1–11). The entrance of God's people into the Promised Land, from which the unbelieving contemporaries of Moses were excluded, was, according to the testimony of Ps. xcv., still future in David's time. It was the same in the author's time. It is not stated in so many words that between David's time and the present a second redemption of God's people had taken place,—which was always considered the counterpart of the deliverance from Egypt (above, p. 262, n. 12), and which, like the latter, was connected with a promise. Nor is it expressly said that in Jesus Christ reappeared a more perfect antitype of Moses (Heb. iii. 2 f.), of Jesus, i.e. of Joshua the son of Nun (iv. 8), and also of David (vii. 1–17). But both are taken for granted as known by the readers, and simply recalled by a mere suggestion (iv. 2). It is presupposed throughout the whole letter that the readers understood this reference, and saw in it an allusion to the fact that as at the time of the wandering in the wilderness, so now in their own time a separation had taken place between the majority of the Jewish people hardened by their unbelief and a minority who had believed (iv. 2 f.; cf. vi. 18). It is also assumed that they understood that, while the Jews who had accepted Christ, including the author and his readers (iv. 3, vi. 18), are on the way toward the realisation of the promise, the wrathful oath of God has been fulfilled upon the rebellious majority (especially iii. 19, iv. 6). The fact that such typological and allegorical treatment of the O.T. history and the corresponding changing picture of present events does not suit our occidental taste, does not alter the fact that it was much employed in the apostolic age (cf. Gal. iv. 21-31; 1 Cor. x. 1-11; 2 Cor. vi. 16-18; Rom. ix. 14-24, xi. 2-10, especially Jude 5; above, p. 260 f.). From Heb. iii. 7-iv. 11 we conclude that Hebrews was written after the year 70, and that both author and readers were of Jewish origin.

The latter statement has been comparatively seldom disputed, but is questioned by some even to-day (n. 7). The title πρὸς Ἑβραίους does not prove that the readers were native Jews; since, whatever the age of the title, it does not necessarily reflect a yet older tradition, but may be due solely to a misunderstanding of the letter itself (above, p. 295 f.). Nor is it absolutely proved by the fact that the author calls the ancient Israelites his own and the readers' fathers (i. 1, iii. 9), nor by the fact that he calls the Church whom Christ redeemed Abraham's seed (ii. 16; cf. vi. 12-18). The former expression is found also in 1 Cor. x. 1; the latter, in Gal. iii. 7-29, iv. 21-31; Rom. iv. 11-18 (cf. vol. i. 81). And yet there is a difference between Hebrews and these thoughts of Paul's and such statements as are found in Eph. i. 13, ii. 1-iii. 12; Col. i. 21 f., ii. 11 ff., iii. 8-11; 1 Thess. i. 9; 1 Cor. xii. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 10, iii. 6, iv. 3; for Hebrews does not contain a single sentence in which it is so much as intimated that the readers became members of God's people who descended from Abraham, and heirs of the promise given to them and their forefathers, and how they became such. It follows, therefore, that they were the people of God through birth and training. If iii. 9 has been correctly interpreted, this is true beyond doubt. The difference between the godly of the O.T. and the Christians whom the author addresses, or with whom he identifies himself, is throughout only that between Past and Present (i. 1, xi. 2, 39 f., xii. 23). It is nowhere said in early literature intended for Gentile Christians that God spoke to them directly through His Son (i. 1; n. 8). Although the author states plainly the significance of the work of redemption for all men (ii. 9, 15; cf. v. 9, ix. 26-28), still he views and discusses it so entirely from the point of view of the pre-Christian Jewish congregation, as almost to make it seem that he was limiting the atoning effect of the death of Jesus to the sins of Israel (ix. 15, xiii. 12; cf. Matt. i. 21), and the significance of the New Covenant entirely to the people of the Old Covenant (viii. 6-13, x. 16 f.). That both the readers and the author belong to the Jewish people is proved directly by xiii. 13. After showing that the Christians cannot expect any material advantages from their acts of worship, because the one sacrifice upon which their salvation rests is of the nature of a sin-offering,—which, according to the law, must be burned without the camp,—and, after recalling how this idea is in keeping with the history of Jesus' life, since He was crucified outside the gates of Jerusalem,—a criminal rejected by His people,—the author adds this exhortation, "Let us therefore go forth unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. For we have not here an abiding city, but we seek after the city which is to come" (n. 9). That this is figurative language is, of course, apparent; since the camp in which the Israelites dwelt at the time of the wanderings in the desert has long since ceased to exist. Nor is it possible to supply in its place the city of Jerusalem, since in ver. 12, where Jerusalem is meant, the author does not name it, and nothing is said of a city. On the other hand, there was nothing to hinder him from naming the city instead of the camp in ver. 13. Moreover, there was no moral profit in journeying from the Holy City to the place before the gates of the city, particularly since it certainly would not lead to Jesus, who was no longer to be found before the gates of Jerusalem. What we have is therefore a figurative expression in keeping with the symbolic language of the entire letter, meaning that the readers were to renounce fellowship with the Jewish people who had rejected Jesus, to confess the crucified Jesus, and to take upon themselves all the ignominy that Jesus met at the hands of His countrymen. This demand is essentially the same as that in Matt. x. 24-39; Luke xiv. 26 f.; John xii. 25 f.; cf. Gal. vi. 14. But in its present form it was not applicable to Gentiles. These could be exhorted not to be ashamed of Christ and the gospel, or to imitate Jesus in bearing injustice (1 Pet. ii. 21 ff.), or to follow the example of Jewish Christians in enduring the hostility of their countrymen (1 Thess. ii. 14 f.). But where they are urged to renounce race affiliations, it is in the form, "Come forth from Babylon" (2 Cor. vi. 17; cf. Isa. lii. 11, xlviii. 20; Rev. xviii. 4; Jer. li. 6). The summons, on the other hand, to go forth without the camp of Israel, presupposes that those exhorted have always dwelt there.

It has been maintained that the Gentile origin of the readers is proved by the fact that their conversion in time past to the Christian faith is described as a turning from dead works, and as faith in God (vi. 1; n. 7). With reference to the second characterisation, it is not to be overlooked, in the first place, that the author elsewhere describes the same experience as believing in the gospel which they had heard (iv. 2 f.; cf. ii. 3), as a fleeing for refuge (vi. 18), as receiving the knowledge of the truth (x. 26), as a coming to the heavenly Jerusalem and to the blood of Jesus by which they were sanctified (xii. 22-24, x. 29). Furthermore, in the experience of the Israelites the time came, in connection with the gospel, when faith took the place of the law (Gal. iii. 23-25), which up to this time had dominated their religious life. This is faith in the ordinary sense, which is, primarily, faith in God (Mark xi. 22; John xiv. 1). So deeply had the emphasis which Jesus laid upon faith as the saving power impressed itself upon the Jewish Christians, that it gave rise to a false application of this truth which was opposed by James (ii. 14; vol. i. p. 126). It cannot be proved that ἔργα νεκρά—an expression occurring nowhere in the Bible except in Heb. vi. 1, ix. 14—means sinful conduct of every kind, in particular the sins of heathen life or even idolatry (n. 10). Universally, the opposite of dead is not pious or good, but living. Only those works are living which are animated by faith and done under the influence of the life-giving Spirit. On the other hand, everything is dead, even the conduct which outwardly has the appearance of being pious, which lacks spirit and faith, and is therefore vain (cf. Jas. i. 26, μάταιος; Matt. xv. 9, μάτην). The author, who universally represents the O.T. cultus as of divine establishment, although incomplete, cannot any more than Paul or Jesus treat the conscientious observance of the law as dead works, from which it was necessary to turn to God (vi. 1) and to be cleansed by the blood of Jesus (ix. 14). But he could speak in this way of conduct in accordance with the forms of legal piety, void of faith and without spiritual power. Those common human sins of which Jews and Gentiles alike must repent, and from which they must have their consciences cleansed, are manifestly not excluded. But it was only among the Jews that these sins had become connected with the observance of a formal religion of such a character that the renunciation of sin could be called a renunciation of dead works (cf. Rom. vii. 4-6).

In contrast to these dead works are those acts of worship (ix. 14)—for this is the meaning of λατρεία and λατρεύειν in Hebrews (viii. 5, ix. 1, 6, 9, x. 2), as everywhere else in the N.T. (1 John xvi. 2; Luke ii. 37; Rom. i. 9, 25, ix. 4, xii. 1)—which the Christians must render to the living God throughout their whole life. This worship of the Christians is based upon the high-priestly work of Christ performed once for all, and consists in constant prayer and thanksgiving, in works of mercy, and, generally, in a life well-pleasing to God, bearing testimony of the gratitude for grace experienced (xii. 28, xiii. 15 f.). The work of Christ is everywhere contrasted with the sacrificial system of the O.T. and the whole Mosaic ceremonial law, being represented as a living service which was performed through the Spirit (vii. 16, 25, ix. 14, x. 20), which satisfies the deepest needs of heart and conscience, and which truly corresponds to the relations existing between men and God. While, on the one hand, in the same way true Christian conduct is described in figures borrowed from the Mosaic sacrificial system (xii. 28, xiii. 10, 15 f.), on the other it is represented as being the only form of religious service (ix. 14) in keeping with faith in the living God and membership in the commonwealth of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem (xii. 22). By the use of similar figures Paul also describes the Christian life to the Jewish Christians of Rome as a spiritual service, the offering of a living sacrifice (Rom. xii. 1; cf. Phil. iii. 3). Jesus condemned the legalistic piety of His fellow-countrymen as impious hypocrisy, and compared those who devoted themselves to this life to whited sepulchres, and, in contrast to the ceremonialism of the temple in Jerusalem or of Gerizim, He demanded a spiritual worship in keeping with the spiritual nature of God (Matt. xv. 7 ff., xxiii. 27; John iv. 20-24). In the same way Paul bids the Jewish Christians in Rome to consider that, while under the letter of the law, they brought forth fruit unto death, and reminds them that it was only through their conversion, new birth, and baptism that they were enabled to render a true and living service to God (Rom. vii. 6, vi. 11, 17). Now it was just as possible for the author of Hebrews as it was for Jesus and Paul to contrast the dead works in which the readers lived before conversion, while under the law, with the service consisting of spiritual sacrifices, which it is their duty as Christians now to render to the living God. In both these cases the characterisation is applicable only to those who were Jews by birth.

The Jewish character of the readers is also apparent from the contents of the entire letter, in so far as the epistle is designed to save the readers from deserting their Christian confession. Apostasy from Christianity is a personal matter, and it does not need to be said that it is for individuals that the author is always primarily concerned. (This explains the use of τις in iii. 12, iv. 1, 11, xii. 15, 16.) These the others are not to leave to their fate, but they are to guard them from apostasy by exhortation and good example (x. 24 f., xii. 13, 15; n. 11), in order that the evil may not increase (xii. 15). But it already had such a hold upon the entire Christian community that the writer warns all the readers most earnestly against open and complete apostasy from the living God and from their Christian confession (ii. 3, iii. 7–iv. 2, vi. 4–8, x. 26–31, 35–39, xii. 17, 25), with frequent reference to the judgment of destruction that will inevitably follow such a course. The same condition of things also makes him lament their spiritual dulness (v. 11–vi. 2) and their religious and moral apathy (xii. 3–13), and leads him constantly to exhort them to hold fast their Christian confession (iii. 1, iv. 14, x. 23). They are especially exhorted to hold fast their hope in the certain though delayed fulfilment of the promises of God made to His people (iii. 6, 14, iv. 1–10, vi. 11–20, x. 35–39, xi. 40, xii. 26–28). There is scarcely a word of recognition of what was good in their conduct at the time (vi. 10, καὶ διακονοῦντες) to soften the severity of this judgment. They all lack that ideal power of faith which is illustrated by a long series of witnesses from the O.T. and by the perfect example of Jesus (xi. 1–xii. 3), i.e. a faith the essential quality of which is patient waiting for hoped-for blessings, and which finds in itself sufficient proof of invisible realities (xi. 1). It is for this reason that they find it so hard to bear the adversities arising from their Christian confession (xii. 4–11, xiii. 13; above, pp. 314 f., 324), so insignificant in comparison with what they endured in an earlier persecution (x. 32). This explains why, like their fathers in the wilderness, they make regretful comparisons between what they have lost and gained by the acceptance of the gospel (iv. 1; cf. iii. 7–iv. 10). In their disappointment they are on the point of giving up, as did Esau for a mess of pottage, their birthright which belonged to them as Christians (xii. 23) for a mere temporary improvement in the conditions of their life (xii. 16). They are about ready to treat, what for the Christians must always be most sacred, the Son of God and His atoning blood as a common thing, and thereby to make themselves guilty of the sin of the murderers of Jesus (vi. 6, x. 29). They have not yet reached this extreme, but the dissatisfaction with which they have necessarily been seized, as their faith in the unseen blessings and the hope of future blessings has grown less and less, has come to affect their belief in the Redeemer Himself (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 19). They found it impossible permanently to regard Jesus, who died a common and ignominious death and then disappeared from the world, and whose promises have remained so long unfulfilled, either as God's final and complete revelation, or as the Saviour from sin and death, or as the head of an eternal kingdom. It is necessary to show them that Jesus perfectly fulfils for them all these three functions, if only they hold fast their faith and profession. The Son of God through whom God spoke His final word to them is the true apostle of God; since He surpasses in dignity, not only all the prophets from Moses on, but even the angels through whom the law was given (i. 1–ii. 4; cf. iii. 1–6, xii. 18-29). In order to cleanse the seed of Abraham and through them the entire race from sin, to save them from death and sustain them in all their weaknesses, He must enter fully into fellowship with human life, temptation, and mortality (ii. 5-18; cf. iv. 15 f.). It was necessary at the close of such a human life, subject to temptation and weakness, for Him to offer His life to God, taking the place both of priest and sacrifice, and with His own blood to enter the Holy Place in the heavens, in order perfectly to perform the service which the high priest by his official acts had only incompletely foreshadowed, and in order, at the same time, to fulfil the promise of a priestly kingship and a royal priesthood (iv. 14-x. 18). From the material out of which these thoughts are developed, it is plain that the readers not only knew the law (Rom. vii. 1; vol. i. 374 f), but that they were accustomed to measure everything of the nature of a Divine act or institution by the standard of the O.T., especially of the O.T. law. This also proves that they were Jews by birth.

The danger against which the writer endeavours to guard the readers is not a possible falling back into their pre-Christian state, i.e. into a legalistic Judaism, or a Judaism in which the coming of the Messiah was expected. This idea is precluded by the elaborately developed comparison with the Israelites who wandered in the desert (iii. 7-iv. 10), and the short but impressive allusion to Esau (xii. 16), and the expressions used to describe the threatened apostasy. It would be an apostasy from the living God, brought about by the deceitfulness of sin, consisting in a state of unbelief (iii. 12 f., x. 26); a falling of such as are now standing (vi. 6); a cowardly abandoning of all hope in the fulfilment of the Divine promise (x. 35-39; cf. iv. 9, vi. 12-20); a renunciation of the sacrifice which alone has atoning power, without hope and prospect of another (x. 26 f.); a reviling and crucifying of the Son of God without hope of a better king (vi. 6, x. 29). If in spite of all this they still clung to their Jewish institutions, of which we cannot think apart from religion, what they possessed would be only a shadow of Judaism, a Judaism like that of Caiaphas and his companions (John xix. 15). It is not a false belief, but unbelief, into which they are in danger of sinking. All this makes it clear that the readers have not been misled, or are not in danger of being misled, by some false gospel, and by teachers of such a gospel. If this were the case we should certainly have a clear reference to such a danger, such as we find throughout Paul's letters, and also in 2 Peter and Jude. It is not until toward the end of the letter, when the main discussion gives place to exhortations, the substance of which would be appropriate in a letter to any Christians whatsoever (xiii. 1-8), that we find this warning: "Be not carried away by diverse and strange teachings, missing your goal; for it is good that the heart be established" (n. 12). In expressing this thought the author suggests that this takes place by grace. Then follows the rejection of the erroneous view that steadfastness of heart is secured by the use of certain foods, from which, nevertheless, those accepting this doctrine have reaped no profit. This is all the data we have for determining what sort of doctrines are referred to. It is impossible to derive further material for determining the character of these teachings, or the specific teaching mentioned by way of example from the following section (xiii. 10-16; n. 9), which is both grammatically and logically independent. As contrasted with the self-consistent word of God which their deceased apostles had brought to the readers, and the word of the one immortal Master Teacher, who still abides with them (xiii. 7 f.), these teachings are a motley assortment, and foreign to the nature of the Christian Church. This could not very well be said, especially to Jewish Christians, of the regulations of the Mosaic law, e.g. of the Mosaic prohibitions of the use of certain foods. Nor is it very probable that abstinence from these would be said to establish the heart. Still less does the description suit the religious meals, such as the Passover meal, or the sacrificial meals following the peace-offerings. Taking part in the sacrificial ceremonies, against which it would certainly have been necessary to warn the readers, could not be called a περιπατεῖν ἐν βρώμασιν, as has been claimed in the light of ix. 10. The language indicates rather a prescribed manner of life (n. 12). Now we know that Jewish Christians in Rome regarded abstinence from meat and wine as a means of imparting steadfastness to the Christian, and keeping him from falling (Rom. xiv. 4; cf. xiv. 13, 20, 21, xvi. 25; vol. i. p. 365 f.). In Colossæ also such rules were recommended as indispensable means of sanctification where men lived in a heathen environment (Col. ii. 8-23; vol. i. p. 463 f.). Paul also characterises such abstinence as incapable of accomplishing this end, and as generally unprofitable (1 Tim. iv. 1-8; Tit. i. 15 f.), while he describes the recommendation of such abstinence as foolish human commandments and laws (Col. ii. 6-8, 20-22). The description of such a manner of life by the positive expression ἐν βρώμασιν περιπατεῖν, which to some has seemed peculiar, has a parallel in Paul's statement to the effect that ascetics in Rome are vegetarians (Rom. xiv. 2), in his holding up before them and their opponents the truth that eating and drinking do not constitute the essence of the kingdom of God (xiv. 17), and his warning to both not to injure a brother for the sake of food (Rom. xiv. 15, 20). Both the one who from principle abstained from certain foods and the one who used all without question (1 Cor. viii. 8) moved in the sphere of the βρώματα. It is evident, therefore, that an ascetic teaching of the character represented by Jewish Christians and Jewish Christian teachers in Rome, Colossæ, Ephesus, and the island of Crete had made its appearance also among these Hebrews. With this conclusion agrees the exhortation (xiii. 4) τίμιος ὁ γάμος ἐν πᾶσιν, which does not mean that those in the married state are to regard it as holy,—this is not considered until the following sentence,—but that all, especially those who are unmarried and are inclined to despise marriage, are to honour this state. There were, therefore, those among the Hebrews who from principle despised the married life, and consequently all relations between the sexes.

With the assumption that the readers of Hebrews are to be sought for in Jerusalem has always been connected the idea that they took part in the temple worship after as well as before their conversion, and that the author is endeavouring to separate them from it, or, if they were on the point of resuming it after having broken it off, to warn them against it. So deeply rooted was this idea, that there were scholars who believed that the readers, who were to be found in Alexandria, assumed a similar relation to the schismatic worship in the temple at Leontopolis (n. 13). With reference to the Christians in Jerusalem, we know that from the beginning until their flight from Jerusalem shortly before the destruction of the temple, under the leadership of their apostles and of James, they continued to participate in the temple worship, and generally to observe the forms of the Jewish law. But if, in the opinion of the author, this constituted a forty years' resistance of the will of God revealed through Jesus, he could not have praised the beginning of their faith and their earlier Christian life (iii. 14, vi. 10, x. 32 ff.). Nor could he have represented the teachers and leaders who left the impression of their personality upon them (xiii. 7, ii. 3) as models of faith, but must have pictured them as warning examples of that stubborn self-will which clings to dead works and brings punishment upon itself. Naturally, on this hypothesis there could be no question of an actual or possible relapse of the readers into Jewish worship,—of which, to be sure, there is not the slightest hint in the whole letter,—because the Christians in Jerusalem had never ceased to take part in the temple services. The author is not dealing at all with the question as to how the Christian confession was to be combined with temple worship, and how, generally, life under the law is to be judged,—a question which every Christian before the destruction of Jerusalem had to meet, because of the existence of the Church there. If that had been his purpose, consistency with the theories developed by him would seem to demand that he condemn the whole attitude of the mother Church; and yet, in view of the position which Paul took toward the Church in Palestine, this would appear to be historically impossible. Nor during the first decades after the destruction could it be forgotten that until recently thousands of the Jewish Christians in Palestine had been zealous for the law (Acts xxi. 20), or were still so. If the author believed that this was no longer right, he must, in the first place, have demanded expressly that the readers cease from all observance of the law, now that worship according to the law was made impossible by the destruction of the temple. But he does not refer to this fact, of so much importance in determining the attitude of the Palestinian Jewish Christians toward the law, nor does he make any such demand of them, not even in xiii. 13 (above, p. 324). In the second place, if he did not wish to condemn the legalism of the mother Church and of the apostles, which he would have the readers give up, he must have excused it, either on the ground that it was a weakness, pardonable in their time, or a peculiarity for which there were good reasons. In the third place, it would have been necessary for him to state that what was accepted as right by the entire Church prior to 70, and what was practised by an important part of the same, was now no longer to be recognised, and for the change of attitude he must have given reasons. The fact that none of these things are found in Hebrews, and that none of these questions entered the author's mind, proves that he did not have the mother Church in view, and that he is writing to Christians who prior to conversion had no connection with the Jewish sacrificial worship. Throughout the letter we find him speaking, not of a temple or system of worship existing in his time at Jerusalem or Leontopolis, but of the tabernacle and the worship appointed for it in the Pentateuch. It is by this that he and his readers are to measure the service of Christ. Once he speaks of that system of worship, and the whole institution of which it was a part, as a thing of the past which was already doomed by Jeremiah's time (viii. 7—ix. 10); but, as a rule, he uses the present tense, which in a theoretical discussion is most natural (n. 13). To conclude from this that the system of worship, mutatis mutandis, still existed, would be as wrong as to infer from xiii. 11, 13 that when Hebrews was written the Jewish people did not dwell in towns and villages, but in tents. Here, however, we touch questions which cannot be answered from Hebrews alone.

1. (P. 313.) Paul, as well as Peter in 1 Pet. i. 3, begins his letters to the Churches regularly with an expression of thanks to God on behalf of the readers immediately after the opening greeting. An exception to his habit is afforded by Gal., where he uses an expression of indignation at what is happening among the readers. The expression of thanks in 2 Tim. i. 3 and Philem. 4 passes immediately into a description of his mood toward the recipients and an exhortation to them. Paul begins with similar expressions of feeling and of exhortation, but without any expression of thanks, in 1 Tim. i. 3; Tit. i. 5. In Jas. i. 2 and in 2 Pet. i. 3–5 ff.—in the latter without making any grammatical separation—there is in close connection with the greeting, a transition to an exhortation of the readers (vol. i. 146, n. 1; above, p. 220, n. 10). Jude 3; 2 John 4; 3 John 3 (for the greeting is not completed till ver. 2); Clem. 1 Cor. i.; Polyc. Phil. i.; Ep. Smyrn. de mart. Polyc. i., and all the letters of Ignatius, are begun with a statement of the circumstances which led to the writing of the letter. The Epistle of Barnabas, also, which begins by prefacing "All hail!" a form of greeting absolutely divergent from what is customary, follows it by an address to the readers, and an expression of the feeling of the author toward them.

2. (P. 317.) Even without the καί before ἡμῶν, xiii. 18, attested by D* and its Latin translation and by Chrysostom, there arises the impression which is repeated above, p. 316 f. The sudden transition from the plural of the first person, xiii. 18 (cf. ii. 5, v. 11, vi. 9, 11)—elsewhere a common expression of the author's—to the singular, xiii. 19 (cf. xi. 32, xiii. 22 f.), must have been caused by the fact that from ver. 17 on he considers himself to be one of those who watch over the spiritual welfare of the readers,—often with sighing,—and so, for that reason alone, he keeps the plural; but he also finds the “I” more natural, where he comes to speak of his outward circumstances and of his impending journey. Just as in xiii. 8 the eternally living and unchangeable Christ is presented as the immortal teacher in contrast to the preachers who pass away, so the Jesus who has been raised to heaven from the world of the dead is contrasted with the earthly readers and ministers who come and go, as the great Shepherd of the sheep, xiii. 20 (cf. 1 Pet. ii. 25, v. 4; John x. 11–18), i.e. as the ever-present regent and minister of His whole Church on earth. The author was and is still to a certain extent one of these.

3. (P. 317.) With vi. 10, διακονήσαντες τοῖς ἁγίοις καὶ διακονοῦντες, cf. the expressions used with reference to the collections for the Jerusalem congregation, 2 Cor. viii. 4, ix. 1, τῆς διακονίας τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους; ix. 12 (cf. also ver. 13), ἡ διακονία τῆς λειτουργίας ταύτης . . . τὰ ὑστερήματα τῶν ἁγίων; 1 Cor. xvi. 1, τῆς λογίας τῆς εἰς τοὺς ἁγίους, evidently also xvi. 15, εἰς διακονίαν τοῖς ἁγίοις ἔταξαν ἑαυτούς; furthermore, Rom. xv. 26, κοινωνίαν τινὰ ποιήσασθαι εἰς τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῶν ἁγίων τῶν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ; xv. 31, ἡ διακονία μου ἢ εἰς Ἱερουσαλὴμ εὐπρόσδεκτος τοῖς ἁγίοις, perhaps also Rom. xii. 13, ταῖς χρείαῖς τῶν ἁγίων κοινωνοῦντες (on the contrary, not Philem. vv. 5–7; vol. i. p. 455, n. 2); also Acts xi. 29 f., xii. 25, xxiv. 17; Gal. ii. 10; vol. i. p. 310 f. According to the usage well attested here, οἱ ἅγιοι, even without any geographical reference, signifies the Christian community of the “Holy City” (Matt. iv. 5, xxvii. 53; Rev. xi. 2, xxi. 2, 10, xxii. 19), without the words necessarily having ceased to signify the Christians generally in distinction from the non-Christians (1 Cor. vi. 1 f.; Col. i. 12; Jude 3; Rev. xiii. 7), especially with πάντες (Eph. i. 15, iii. 18, vi. 18; 1 Cor. xiv. 33). This attribute would also not be wanting in Heb. vi. 10, if, in contrast to the mutual support of those addressed, the extension of their practical love to the whole of Christendom was to be praised; cf. 1 Thess. iii. 12 f.; Col. i. 5; Philem. 5. The ἅγιοι without an article in 1 Tim. v. 10 is not a parallel case.

4. (Pp. 318, 320.) Clemens Romanus, circa 96, includes in the address to his readers the Corinthians of the years 52–57 with the members of the “old Church of the Corinthians” of that time (1 Cor. xlvii., cf. chap. i.); similarly also Polycarp, circa 110, includes the Philippian Christians of his time with those of the time of Paul (Polyc. Phil. xi. 3; cf. Forsch. iv. 251 ff.); while at the same time he very clearly distinguishes “the men of that time” from the people of the present. In this respect there is nothing to be compared with the expression of Heb., save the way in which Paul, without taking account of single deaths and new conversions, identifies the Christians who were converted by him at the founding of a congregation with the members of the same congregation at the time of writing the letter (1 Cor. ii. 1–5, iv. 15; 2 Cor. i. 19; Phil. iv. 10–16).

5. (P. 319.) Heb. x. 32–34. On the text of ver. 34 see above, p. 312, n. 14. Aside from the false δαρμούς μου instead of δαρμούς the text is given by Clemens Alexandrinus exactly as by the modern textual critics. According to vi. 4 (cf. Eph. iii. 9; Just. Dial. cxxii., twice; especially of baptism φωτισμός and φωτίζεσθαι, Apol. i. 61), φωτισθέντες signifies conversion to Christianity. But inasmuch as no ἄρτι (1 Thess. iii. 6; Matt. ix. 18; cf. 1 Pet. ii. 2) or προσφάτως (Acts xviii. 2) accompanies it, it cannot have also the meaning of νεόφυτοι (1 Tim. iii. 6) or νήπιοι ἐν Χριστῷ (1 Cor. iii. 1).

6. (P. 320.) For the exegesis of Heb. iii. 7-19, very little can be remarked here: (1) The stylistic ability of the writer forbids the hypothesis that the clause beginning with διό is not to be continued until ver. 12, so that all that is between would be a parenthesis, or that the clause introduced by διό has been left out altogether. The parenthetical insertion is limited to the words καθὼς λέγει τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον, beyond which, just as with a parenthetical καθὼς γέγραπται, John vii. 38, Rom. iii. 4, xv. 3, 21, 1 Cor. i. 31, ii. 9, the statement before begun—in this instance the statement begun by the author with διό—is resumed. The situation here is not essentially different from that in passages where a καθὼς γέγραπται and similar expressions without a following citation are joined on to the statement proper (Rom. ii. 24; John i. 23), or, where the author does not say at all that he is employing words from other writings, 1 Pet. i. 24, ii. 7, iii. 10-12; Rom. x. 6-8. (2) For this reason the author, contrary to his custom of using formal quotations, reproduces the O.T. text with conscious freedom. Without alluding to what is doubtful, he has, by the insertion of a διό, given the chronological reference to what precedes; furthermore, by changing ἐκείνη after τῇ γενεᾷ ταύτῃ, he has shown that he means not the Israelites of the Mosaic age, but a generation of the Jewish people much nearer him and his readers. The former change seems so much the more intentional from the fact that the author, in explaining the words of the psalm according to their original historical sense, restores also the original connection of the words (προσώχθισεν τεσσεράκοντα ἔτη, iii. 17). (3) If we recognise, e.g. with Bleek, Heb. ii. 436 ff., 440; Delitzsch, Komm. 119 f.; Grimm, ZfWTh, 1870, S. 31, that the author refers to the forty years since the death of Jesus, which Hofmann, v. 167, has called a venturesome exegesis, we must not conclude that the letter was written circa 70, and that the readers have had opportunity for forty years to contemplate the works of the N.T. redemption. The latter is impossible, because this is said not of the readers, but of their forefathers, i.e. of the Jewish people; the former, because the end of the forty years and the visible realisation of the Divine oath against the unbelieving, which was manifested in the destruction of Jerusalem, must have been behind the author, if he is supposed to have spoken in this sense, or in this double sense, of the forty years and of the exclusion of the unbelieving Jews on account of their forty years of unbelief, from the Sabbath rest of the people of God. It is unlikely that, among other notions of the old rabbis, the idea of a forty years' duration of the days of the Messiah, depending in part on Ps. xcv. 10 (Bleek, ii. 439; Delitzsch, 119; Weber, Jüd. Theol., § 82) should have been in the mind of the author; for the "days of the Son of Man" (Luke xvii. 22, cf. Heb. v. 7) were terminated for him, on the one hand, by the death of Jesus; on the other hand, they were still in the future, and in yet another sense endless (xiii. 8). But the utilisation of the forty years of Heb. iii. 9 for the chronology seems to the present writer to be much better justified by the character of Heb. as a whole and especially by the character of this section, than when it is concluded from Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, Act I Scene 3, "Tis since the earthquake now eleven years," that this drama was written in the year 1591.

7. (Pp. 323, 325.) "Epist. vulgo ad Hebraeos inscriptam non ad Hebraeos, sed ad Christianos genere gentiles et quidem ad Ephesios datam esse demonstrare conatur," E. M. Roeth, 1836. This thesis is maintained with characteristically confused and extravagant rabbinical learning, and with a profusion of new interpretations of N.T. passages (sixty-three of which are enumerated in a special index, S. 265 f.); cf. below, n. 10. Roeth, p. 256 f., was led to think of Ephesus by the words θείαρον, Acts xix. 29, and θεατριζόμενοι, Heb. x. 33. V. Soden (JhfPTh, 1884, S. 435 ff., 627 ff.) also contested the Jewish nationality of the readers, and thought that Heb. could be understood as a circular letter to the preponderatingly Gentile Christian congregations of Italy, including those of Rome (especially S. 647-652). Cf. per contra, Grass, Ist der Hb. an Heidenchristen gerichtet? Petersburg, 1892.

8. (P. 324.) It follows from ἐλάλησεν ἡμῖν ἐν νίφ (i. 1) that the author and the readers, who as individuals have not heard the preaching of Jesus (ii. 3), belong to the people of the circumcision, whose servant Jesus was all through His ministry; cf. Rom. xv. 8. God, or Christ, speaks to the heathen through the apostles. Cf. 2 Cor. v. 19 f.; Eph. iii. 7; Rom. x. 12-15; also Clem. 1 Cor. xlii. 1. Christ is in a way the mouth by which God has spoken, and the word which He has caused to go forth into the world (Ign. Rom. viii. 2; Magn. viii. 2); but the Gentile Christians of the old time do not say: "Christ has spoken to us." He is to them always the Christ preached, and even the idea that He was the apostle sent of God into the world (Heb. iii. 1) is noticeably unobtrusive!

9. (Pp. 324, 331.) A fundamental condition of the correct exegesis of xiii. 10-16 is a recognition of the fact that the tabernacle must be of the same importance as the altar; in other words, that it is not definitely stated that the Jewish priests, or indeed the Jews who cling fast to the Mosaic cultus, had no part in the Christian institution of salvation. Inasmuch as Christ is considered here not as a priest officiating at the sanctuary (viii. 2), but simply as a sacrifice, only those Christians whose altar is concerned can be called οἱ τῇ σκηνῇ λατρεύοντες, i.e. priests who there offer sacrifice (cf. ix. 14, xii. 28, xiii. 15 f.; Rom. xii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 5, 9; Rev. i. 6, v. 10, viii. 3). They are to bear in mind that they, in contrast to the O.T. priests who derived their support also from their altar (1 Cor. ix. 13), have no such advantage to expect from their cultus; for the offering, upon which their whole relation to God is based, is like that of the Day of Atonement, from which no priest and no layman had anything to look for but forgiveness of sins (see above, p. 324). The expression for the N.T. facts which are brought to mind, and for the demand which is based upon them, is borrowed, on the one hand, from the gospel story, and, on the other hand, from the Mosaic age and its institutions, and, in so far as the latter is the case, is quite as consciously anachronistic as xi. 26 is the opposite. Moses bore the shame of Christ in that he renounced the honourable position among the Egyptians which he possessed from earliest childhood, and attached himself to his own people. The Hebrews of the present are to take upon themselves the shame of Christ, by renouncing their connection with the Jewish people, to whom they belong by birth, and by their confession of the crucified Christ to take to themselves the same hatred and the same abuse which this people had heaped upon Jesus (cf. xii. 2 f.; Rom. xv. 3).

10. (P. 326.) In the misinterpretation of Heb. v. 12-vi. 2, Roeth, 218-239, has gone the furthest astray. By the λόγια τοῦ θεοῦ he understood the Messianic prophecies, while the whole revelation of the Word of God, including that of the N.T., is meant (cf. Heb. i. 1, ii. 3, iv. 2, vi. 5, xiii. 7; Rom. iii. 2), and found it inconceivable that those who were Jews by birth had first to be instructed in them. Cf. per contra, e.g. Matt. ix. 13, xii. 3-8, xxii. 29, 42 f.; Luke xxiv. 26 f., 44 f.; John v. 46, xx. 9; Acts ii. 16-35, iii. 21-25, vii. 2-53, xiii. 16-39, xvii. 3, xxviii. 23. But, as far as the words ἔργα νεκρά are concerned, it is well known that the gods of the heathen, not in the N.T. to be sure, but elsewhere, are said at times to be dead (Ps. cvi. 28; cf. exv. 4 ff.; Wisd. Sol. xiii. 10; Didache vi. 3); and one is reminded of the instances in which God, in contrast to the idols, is called the Living God, 1 Thess. i. 9; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Acts xiv. 15. But He is also so called even where the contrast with unbelieving or legalising Judaism obtains or is obvious, Matt. xvi. 16; Rom. ix. 26; 2 Cor. iii. 3-11; cf. Matt. xxii. 32; Luke xx. 38; John vi. 57. In Heb. ix. 14, also, any thought of the λατρεία τῶν εἰδώλων is far from the intent of the passage, as the whole context shows. On the contrary, it is rather the O.T. λατρεία (ix. 1, 9, 21) that underlies the thought. Furthermore, in Heb. xii. 22 the heavenly Jerusalem is called a city of the Living God, not in contrast to Babylon or Rome, but to the earthly Jerusalem, in which God no more reveals Himself as the Living One. In Heb. iii. 12, x. 31, 1 Tim. iii. 15, iv. 10, the contrast with false gods is as impossible as in Ps. xlii. 3. Besides, the condition of men who remain in heathendom and in heathen sinfulness of life may perhaps be characterised as spiritual death (Col. ii. 13; Eph. ii. 1, 5, v. 14); but so also is the condition of the Jews who do not yet believe in Jesus (Matt. viii. 22, cf. xxiii. 27; John v. 24, 40, viii. 21, 52), and essentially the same is said of Jewish Christians in Rom. vi. 4-11 as is said of Gentile Christians in Col. ii. 12 f. But the former depraved life of Christians who had come from a state of heathendom is nowhere characterised as a dead or lifeless way of living, but always alluded to in other terms, e.g. 1 Cor. vi. 9-11; Gal. vi. 16-21; Col. ii. 5 ff., v. 3-14; 1 Pet. i. 14-18, iv. 2-5.

11. (P. 328.) The μὴ ἐγκαταλείποντες τὴν ἐπισυναγωγὴν ἑαυτῶν of Heb. x. 25 by way of contrast has both before it and after it, on the part of those who are still firm in faith, an exhorting and inciting of others who are in danger of falling away. It cannot be said, therefore, that in many cases the tendency toward falling away had already shown itself in the habit of neglecting to attend the Christian assembly. The contrast would then have been: "Neglect not the assembling of yourselves together, but visit the services of the congregation and listen there to words of exhortation." This habit of neglecting attendance upon the gatherings shows itself much more in the case of those who perhaps would be in a position to strengthen the wavering and "to heal that which is lame" (xii. 13). Instead of fulfilling this duty and of taking the part of the weak (cf. Rom. xv. 1 f.), they abandon the assembly to which they belong, and the brethren who meet there; for their action is called ἐγκαταλείπειν (2 Tim. iv. 10, 16; 2 Cor. iv. 9; Heb. xiii. 5), in distinction from καταλείπειν. What they do is from lack of love and from ill-feeling toward those with whom they have to associate, and in a spirit against which the author himself has to be upon his guard in his relations with the readers (cf. v. 11-vi. 9),—a spirit which he holds to be possible in the case of their leaders also (xiii. 17). The result of this is that the purpose of ἐαυτῶν after τὴν ἐπισυναγωγὴν—a term which at all events is not the equivalent of ἡμῶν, or, in the sense of τινός, equal to αὐτῶν—is not to affirm that those Christians absent themselves from the Christian meetings, while they visit the Jewish synagogues. Those who had departed so far from the faith could not be called upon to exhort the others. The contrast to that assembly to which the Christians in question belong can lie only in other Christian assemblies of the same place; as to these see below, § 47. Furthermore, ἐπισυναγωγή (2 Macc. ii. 7) means, at any rate, not the place of meeting, for which συναγωγή is the technical expression, nor perhaps the individual assembly (or as 2 Thess. ii. 1, the union in a passive sense), for which only the plural would be natural, but the assembled congregation (cf. vol. i. p. 94), to which ἐγκαταλείπειν is most appropriate.

12. (Pp. 331, 332.) Heb. xiii. 9. Luther's otherwise masterful translation fails only in rendering the aorist ὠφελήθησαν incorrectly. Along with this the present περιπατοῦντες is, with *8*AD, to be retained—the idea being that there are at the present time people of this manner of life, though it has already become evident that they do not attain their purpose. In the N.T. περιπατεῖν is used of the daily manner of life thirty-two times in Paul's writings, ten times in the letters of John (cf. Acts xxi. 21)—in fact, always in this sense in the N.T.—apart from the passages where it is used in its literal meaning.

13. (Pp. 333, 335.) In regard to the description in the present tense of the ceremonial acts prescribed in the Mosaic law, and all that is connected with them (Heb. v. 1-4, vii. 5, 8, 20, viii. 3-5, ix. 6-10, 22, x. 1-4, 8, 11, xiii. 11), it is to be noticed that (1) the same form of expression is quite commonly found in writings which, without any doubt, were written after the year 70. It is so in Josephus' works, where he portrays the Mosaic institutions, Ant. iii. 7. 1 ff., 9. 1 ff.; indeed, it is so in his apology on behalf of Judaism (Contra Apion. ii. 23), where he even speaks in imperative futures and imperatives, as though the service of the high priest and the priests would continue still in time to come. So Clement, 1 Cor. xl. xli.; Plutarch, Quæst. conviv. iv. 6. 2, and the Talmud. (2) Pressing the use of the present tense would lead to the absurdities that the priests, according to ix. 6 f., still serve in the tabernacle, as they are described together with their utensils in ix. 1-5, and that the sin-offering of the Day of Atonement is still burnt before the tents in the wilderness (xiii. 11), and that Melchizedek still serves as priest-king (vii. 3). (3) Preceding and together with these expressions in the present tense, occur in decisive passages, imperfects and other forms which show that what is described as present really belongs to the past (ix. 1 f., ii. 2). (4) From ix. 9, where an especially strong proof of the continuance of the temple cultus has been found, rather the contrary is to be concluded. Of course, much in this connection is yet in debate among commentators. But, according to the definite statements of ix. 2 f., 6 f., the "first tabernacle" of ix. 8 can only be the Holy Place in contrast to the Holy of Holies, and τὰ ἅγια means not (contrary to the usage of ix. 2) the Holy of Holies, the entrance to which was by no means unknown or closed (ix. 7), but only the true sanctuary into which Jesus was the first to find and open the way (vi. 20, viii. 2, ix. 12, x. 19 f.). The time when the approach to the true sanctuary was not yet known, because the Holy Place still existed (ix. 8), is for the author time past, because he knows and believes that Jesus has entered into that true sanctuary, that He has opened the way to it, and made it known (ix. 11 f., x. 19 f.). He calls this, for the Christians, past time ὁ καιρὸς ὁ ἐνεσθηκὸς from the standpoint of the Holy Spirit, who uses the legal cultus as a means of instruction, and in the sense of all the presents in ix. 6–9. This period of the legal cultus has its limits at the καιρὸς διορθώσεως (ix. 10). If, beyond all question, however, this epoch has already begun through the high-priestly function of Christ, then the καιρὸς which, from the standpoint of the Holy Spirit who taught through Moses (ix. 9) was spoken of as present, has thereby reached its close. The Holy Place, or the division of the sanctuary by its separating curtain, is no more. To be sure, this is understood primarily in an ideal sense, i.e. for the faith of the Christians. But the expression in ver. 8, especially the ἔτι which, according to vv. 10–12, has become for the Christians an οὐκ ἐτι, must seem very unnatural to us, if in the author's day a temple with that division into a Holy Place and a Holy of Holies, still existed. The hypothesis that the readers of Heb. were still connected with the temple of Leontopolis which Wieseler, Unters. ii. 81 ff.; ThStKr, 1867, S. 665 ff., has zealously defended, hardly finds a representative to-day. All the presuppositions upon which it is based are untenable, namely (1) that the readers had anything at all to do with any temple cultus; (2) that the author describes, or has in mind, a Jewish temple and cultus, still existing somewhere in his day; (3) that the alleged contradictions between the statements in Heb. regarding the tabernacle and the arrangement of the temple in Jerusalem, find their solution in the supposition of a reference to the temple in Leontopolis, concerning whose interior arrangement and cultus we know very little (cf. the literature in Schürer, iii. 99 [Eng. trans. II. ii. 287]); (4) that in Philo, who never mentions this temple, but, on the contrary, looks upon the temple at Jerusalem as the only sanctuary of the Jewish people (de Mon. ii. 1–3, and in Eus. Præp. ev. viii. 14, 64), there should occur for the same reason—that he has in mind the temple in Leontopolis—departures from the ordinances of the Pentateuch and from the cultus at Jerusalem similar to those in Heb., cf. per contra, *PRE*³ vii. 500 f.; Grimm, ZfWTh, 1870, S. 57–66, who, however, has misjudged the “literary carelessness” in Heb. vii. 27, ix. 4 f., x. 11; on which cf. below, § 47, n. 14.

§ 47. READERS, DATE, AND AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLE TO THE HEBREWS.

It is so clear from § 46 that Hebrews was not directed to the Church in Jerusalem shortly before or shortly after the year 70, that it is only necessary to summarise a number of observations. (1) If Hebrews was written to the Church in Jerusalem shortly before or shortly after the year 70, the legalism practised by the Jewish Christians in Palestine, and particularly the participation of the mother Church, its teachers and leaders, in the temple worship, would not have been passed over so lightly, while at the same time they are so severely condemned, i.e. if the letter is supposed to answer the question as to how the Christian confession was to be combined with the cultus of the Jewish temple, which as a matter of fact it does not ask (above, p. 333 f.). (2) The very great poverty of the mother Church, which necessitated the frequent sending of money for its relief by Christian Churches abroad, proves that they could not have exercised charity to other Churches in the noteworthy way for which they are praised in vi. 10. On the other hand, it is clear that it was the mother Church which was so largely benefited by the charity of the readers of Hebrews (above, p. 337). (3) Until it was banished from Jerusalem, the mother Church had in its membership not a few persons who heard the preaching of Jesus. Consequently the Church could not be treated as one which owed its faith to the preaching of the disciples of Jesus (ii. 4, xiii. 7; above, p. 315 f.). (4) It could not be said of the Church in Jerusalem by way of reproof, that because of its age it ought to be capable of instructing others in the knowledge of salvation, and was under obligation to do the same, since in rich measure the Church had always done so (Acts viii. 4, xi. 19 ff.). Even after Antioch became an independent centre of missionary effort among the Gentiles, missionaries continued to go from Jerusalem to Galatia, Corinth, and Rome (vol. i. pp. 167 f., 288 f., 442, 540); and Paul, who had reason enough to be dissatisfied with many of these wandering teachers, nevertheless regarded the Church in Jerusalem as the source of the gospel, to which the Gentile Church was under obligation out of grateful love to send back their gifts (Rom. xv. 27 ; cf. per contra, 1 Cor. xiv. 36). (5) On the supposition that the letter is addressed to the Church in Jerusalem, it is necessary to assume that the persecution referred to in x. 32 ff. is that in which Stephen lost his life, and that in xiii. 7 reference is perhaps made to Stephen, James the son of Zebedee, and James the brother of the Lord. But how is it possible to speak, as in x. 32, of these martyrdoms which took place in the years 35, 44, and 66 respectively, and of the accompanying sufferings of the Church (cf. Acts viii. 1-3, xi. 19, xii. 1-4 ; 1 Thess. ii. 14), as a single persecution belonging to the comparatively remote past? If Hebrews were directed to the Church which reassembled in Jerusalem after the year 70 under Simeon, the cousin of James, the temporary banishment of the Church from Jerusalem, and the sufferings which the Christians undoubtedly experienced in withdrawing "from the camp" of Israel, would be included. But a letter to this Church, written before the year 90, as was certainly the case with Hebrews (see below), must have taken cognisance of the events of the year 70, which affected so deeply the life of the Church.

It would be more plausible to assume that Hebrews was addressed to a group of Jewish Christian Churches outside of Jerusalem, but in Palestine or the adjoining regions, possibly the readers of 2 Peter and of Jude, who are partly identical with the readers of James (n. 1). But there is no suggestion in these letters of any dispositions or propensities existing in this Church from which the state of mind among the readers apparent in Hebrews could have developed. These Christians were threatened only by influences from without coming from Gentile Christian circles ; and the libertines, who also despised prophecy, seem not to have ventured to criticise it directly among Jewish Christians (above, p. 279 f.). Moreover, the first two reasons given above against the supposition that Hebrews was intended for the mother Church, hold also against its having been intended for any other Church in Palestine. The poverty, relief of which was laid as an obligation upon the liberality of the Gentile Christian Churches, could hardly have been confined to the city of Jerusalem (Acts xi. 29, τοῖς κατοικοῦσιν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ ἀδελφοῖς), and we have no knowledge that the Jewish Christian Churches south of Antioch took part in that collection.

Only when it is assumed that Hebrews is addressed to Gentile Christian readers is it possible to suppose that it was meant for the Church in Ephesus (above, p. 338, n. 7). Others have assumed that it was intended for the Church in Antioch (n. 2). But, according to Acts xv. 1, 23, Gal. ii. 1-14, this Church, even before the council in Jerusalem, must have become so thoroughly Gentile in character, that the Jewish Christian minority had adopted both the morals and the views of the Gentile Christian majority. Judging from analogy, the Church in Berea (above, p. 305, n. 2), like the other Churches in Macedonia, must have been at an early date one of the "Churches of the Gentiles" (Rom. xvi. 4, xv. 26 f.). For a long time more favour was accorded the suggestion that the readers were to be sought in or near Alexandria (n. 3). When, however, the additional hypothesis that the readers were adherents of the temple at Leontopolis is rejected as being inconsistent with the contents of Hebrews (above, pp. 333, 341), this view has nothing left to support it. Of the history of the Egyptian Church before the time of Pantænus and Clement we know practically nothing. It is possible that in the first century it contained larger Jewish Christian elements, and that influences from Palestine were stronger than we are able to discover from the later development (n. 4). But this conjecture remains only a bare possibility.

On the other hand, the conjecture that Hebrews was intended for Jewish Christians in Italy, or more specifically in Rome, can be said to be probable (n. 5). The reasons which support this hypothesis are as follows: (1) It is possible if necessary to take the words in xiii. 24, ἀσπάζονται ὑμᾶς οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας, to mean that the author was at some point in Italy, and that only Italian Christians were about him, from all of whom he sends greeting to the readers. However, if this is the case, it is strange that he does not designate these Christians either as the brethren or saints about him, or as the Church of the place where he is staying (1 Pet. v. 13), but instead calls them persons from Italy, thus simply indicating their nationality. Such an expression would be natural only if, from among the Christians who are about him, the author distinguishes those from Italy. But this would presuppose that at the time both he and they were outside of Italy, and that these Christians from Italy were closely related to the readers, or that the readers had a special interest for those sending greeting because the latter were Italians (cf. Phil. iv. 22). This interest is most naturally explained if those to whom the greeting was sent were also Italians. They are greeted by their countrymen (n. 6). (2) At the beginning of the year 58, when Paul wrote to the Romans, the Church was made up of a large majority of native Jews and a small minority of Gentiles, so small that the whole Church could be uniformly addressed as a Jewish Christian Church (vol. i. pp. 421-434). When this relation between Jews and Gentiles was reversed we do not know. But we do know that while Paul was in prison in Rome, Jewish Christian missionaries of various kinds were at work in the city (Col. iv. 11; Phil. i. 14 ff.; vol. i. pp. 442, 540), and we may assume that these laboured especially for the conversion of their own countrymen. It is hardly likely that the large Jewish majority in the Roman Church was completely reversed before the year 80. It has been conjectured, not without reason, that Clement, the author of the letter of the Romans to the Corinthians about the year 96 was a Jew by birth ; and this was even more probable in the case of Hermas, the contemporaneous author of the Shepherd (n. 7). Assuming as proved that these two Roman writers were familiar with James, and that Paul saw fit to take cognisance of this letter in Romans (vol. i. 126 f., 131 f.), more than ordinary importance attaches to the fact that beyond question Clement of Rome was familiar with Hebrews, and in all probability Hermas also (n. 7). A knowledge of James, which was addressed to Christians of Palestine and the neighbouring regions about the year 50, was brought to Rome by these Christians, who constituted the nucleus of the Roman Church (vol. i. 126, 428 f.). The exact acquaintance which Clement and Hermas have with Hebrews, which was written much later, and which was not accepted and circulated in Rome as an Epistle of Paul (above, p. 301 f.), is explained naturally only on the supposition that Hebrews was first received by the Roman Christians. In the year 58 the Jewish majority of the Roman Church clung with fondness to their people, and were deeply grieved that the Jewish people, the majority of whom persisted in rejecting the gospel, were losing ground in Christendom just as they were declining nationally and politically. They were still open to many Jewish prejudices against the gospel. It was possible for the feelings which Paul contends against throughout the whole of Romans, especially those encountered in Rom. ix.-xi. 12, to subside, but they could also have developed to that degree of bitterness which we meet in Hebrews. As early as the year 58 there was a party among the Roman Christians who regarded abstinence from flesh and wine as necessary for steadfastness in the Christian life. We encounter exactly the same tendency again in Heb. xiii. 9 (above, p. 331 f.), while the related movement of which we are informed in Col. ii. 8-13 is based upon different ideas.

The view here advocated, namely, that Hebrews was intended for Roman Christians, is also supported by the fact that in Romans the Romans (vol. i. p. 427), and in Hebrews the Hebrews (above, pp. 328 f., 339, n. 11), were not in any way associated in worship with the Jews in their localities. It also deserves notice that the use of the word ἡγούμενοι (Heb. xiii. 7, 17, 24) to designate the heads of the congregation, which was not common among the Pauline Churches, was retained in Rome (above, p. 124, n. 5). The use of the expression ἐπισυναγωγή τινων (Heb. x. 25) to designate the separate assembly of Christians, finds a parallel in the words used by the Roman Hermas (Mand. xi. 9), συναγωγή ἀνδρῶν δικαίων (cf. vol. i. 94). (3) What is suggested in Hebrews with regard to the history of its readers suits the Roman Christians. If the gospel was brought to Rome for the first time about the year 50 by Jewish Christians who came hither from Jerusalem (vol. i. p. 428 f.), if these were followed in the succeeding decade by other Christians of the same nationality (Col. iv. 10 f.), and if, finally, Peter came to Rome as a missionary preacher, there is ample foundation for what is said in Heb. ii. 3. The reference in Heb. xiii. 7 is primarily to Peter, but also to Paul, and perhaps to others of the numerous Roman teachers (Col. iv. 10 f.; Phil. i. 14 ff.) with whose end we are not acquainted. The days of severe persecution, which after their conversion the "Hebrews" so bravely endured (x. 32-34), are the days of Nero. In view of the descriptions of Tacitus (Ann. xv. 44) and of Clement (above, pp. 61 f., 68 f.), and the echoes of this persecution in Rev. xvii. 6, xviii. 20, 24, the expression used in Hebrews (x. 33, θεατριζόμενοι) is not too strong, nor when rightly understood is it too weak (above, p. 318 f.). This hypothesis also explains why the writer remarks expressly that they endured this persecution after their conversion, thereby implying a contrast to other sufferings which they encountered before their conversion (above, p. 319). Some twelve years before Nero's persecution of the Christians, the Jews were driven from Rome by Claudius (vol. i. pp. 427 f., 433). Among these the Jews who subsequently became Christians, as Aquila, had suffered (Acts xviii. 2). Why should we stretch our imaginations in order to find a Church to which these allusions in Hebrews will apply, when in the events preceding the founding of the Roman Church and the history of the Church we can find the requisite facts. It is also very easy to understand how the members of the oldest Roman Church, because of their close relation with the Christian communities in Palestine (vol. i. p. 428 f.), exercised charity toward the poor Christians in Palestine without it being necessary for Paul to urge them (Rom. xii. 13, cf. xv. 25-32) to do so, and so deserved the praise accorded them in Heb. vi. 10.

(4) If Heb. x. 25 has been correctly interpreted (above, p. 339 f.), it is necessary to seek the readers in a large city where the Christians were wont to assemble in several places. Many of the readers are beginning to absent themselves from those places of worship which they had always been accustomed to attend, not because they intended to leave off attending Christian worship, and also not because they wished to attend the Jewish synagogues instead, but in order that they might visit some other Christian assembly in the same city where they could find greater edification. The author condemns this, because he thinks that those Christians whose religion is vital ought rather to stay at their post and strengthen and encourage their brothers who are weak in faith, and not to withdraw from them in discontent, leaving them to their fate in a loveless spirit, in order selfishly to connect themselves with another Christian congregation where they found more satisfaction. Hebrews was not directed to the entire Church of a large city. Were this the case, it would be difficult to explain the lack of a greeting if this were originally a part of the letter (above, p. 312 f.), and also the history of Hebrews in the Church, especially the ancient title πρὸς Ἑβραίους. According to the analogy of all N.T. and post-apostolic language (2 Cor. vi. 11; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; Phil. iv. 15; Clem. 1 Cor. xlvii. 6; Ign. Eph. viii. 1, xi. 2; Magn. xv.; Trall. xiii.; Philad. xi.), and especially in keeping with the external titles of letters, the readers of Hebrews would have been described as the inhabitants of their city if they had been the only Christians in their locality. The same would have been true if these Hebrews had lived scattered over a whole country, but had constituted the whole body of Christians in the region (cf. Gal. i. 2, iii. 1; 1 Cor. xvi. 19; 2 Cor. i. 1, viii. 1, ix. 2; Rom. xv. 26). The whole body of Christians in a province or large city could hardly have been so homogeneous as regards their condition of faith and their frame of mind as the readers of Hebrews are everywhere represented as being, especially in passages like v. 12 ff., xii. 4 ff. What differences Paul had to take into consideration in the Corinthian and Roman Churches! Nothing of this appears in Hebrews. That this undeniable fact should be made an argument against the position that Hebrews was intended for a part of a Church (Grimm, ZfWTh, 1870, S. 33; von Soden, JbfPTh, 1884, S. 439), is one of the most incomprehensible things that have been said about Hebrews. The Roman Church as a whole must have been the principal starting-point for missionary work in the West; at the time of Paul's imprisonment there were many members of the Church zealously engaged in missionary work; in the year 96, in the letter of Clement, the Church takes an active part in adjusting the disturbed state of affairs in Corinth, with an apology for having delayed so long in the matter (Clem. 1 Cor. i. 1); finally, in the year 110, Ignatius praises the Church in this language (ad Rom. iii.): "You have taught others; but I desire that you keep yourself what as a teacher you have imparted to your pupils." Such a Church as this could hardly at any time be reproved on the ground that its age ought to enable it to be a teacher of others (Heb. v. 12). The readers of Hebrews were a smaller group of persons who had been Christians for a long time, and who constituted a part of the whole Church of a large city. It was a congregation attached to some household, besides which there were in the same city one or several other similar household congregations. This conclusion is confirmed by the injunction to the readers to greet all their officers and all the saints (xiii. 24). Since the πάντας which is used twice cannot be explained here as elsewhere to mean that they were to greet all as distinguished from certain individuals or a small group of persons (Gal. i. 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 20-24; 2 Cor. i. 1; Phil. iv. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 21; Ignatius, Smyrn. xiii. 2; ad Polyc. viii. 2), the contrast must be that between the particular and the general, i.e. between the readers who are to convey the greeting and the whole Church whom they are to greet. Special significance attaches to the πάντας in xiii. 24, where the heads of the Church are mentioned a second time, in view of the fact that the leaders of the Church upon whom the pastoral care of the readers devolves are called simply ηγούμενοι in xiii. 17 (cf. 1 Thess. v. 12; 1 Tim. v. 17; 1 Pet. v. 1). The readers, who constitute a separate ἐκκλησία (x. 25), perhaps with their own officers (xiii. 17), are, nevertheless, a part of the collective Church of the great city in which they live. The history of the whole Church is their history also (vi. 10, x. 32 ff., xiii. 7), and its officers are theirs as well. Therefore the greeting is sent to all the officers and all the saints. It is difficult to find in the first century of Church life conditions which correspond more perfectly to these exegetical observations than the conditions of the Christians in Rome. Paul in his time distinguishes three groups in the Church there. In addition to the Church in the house of Aquila to which all persons in close relation to Paul belonged (Rom. xvi.

3-13), there were a second and a third (cf. xvi. 14, 15; vol. i. p. 430, n. 1). Whether one of these, e.g. the one mentioned in xvi. 14, is identical with the readers of Hebrews, or whether in the interval between Romans and Hebrews new groups were formed in the Roman Church, we do not know. Neither are we informed as to how the separate ἐπισυναγωγαί were related to the whole Church. But it is not unlikely that Hebrews was directed to a group of the Roman Christians consisting entirely of Jews (n. 8).

The terminus ad quem of Hebrews is determined by three facts: (1) the use of the letter by Clement of Rome (96 A.D.); (2) the mention of Timothy (xiii. 23); (3) the circumstance that the author is dealing with readers who in the main belong to the first generation of Christians. Timothy, who was born about the year 25 (above, p. 37), may have lived until the end of the century. The character of Clement's dependence indicates that Hebrews was written before 90. The terminus ad quem fixed by the third fact varies with the place in which the readers are sought. If this place be Rome, where Christians had lived since about the year 50 (vol. i. p. 427), we are compelled to date the letter somewhat before 90. On the other hand, according to x. 32, a considerable time must have elapsed since the persecution of the year 64. If the preceding interpretation of iii. 9 (above, p. 320 ff.) be correct, the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple had certainly already taken place. In writing to Roman Christians, the author had even less occasion to refer more definitely to this event than did Jude, who wrote to readers so much nearer Jerusalem (n. 9). There was even less occasion if the event had taken place a number of years before. In this case also the fall of Jerusalem could make the Jewish Christians all the more doubtful about the entire Christian hope. It did indeed happen in fulfilment of a prophecy of Jesus; but where was the fulfilment of the accompanying promise of the second coming of Jesus which was so intimately connected in the thought of the early Church with the judgment upon Jerusalem? We shall not be far wrong if we place the composition of Hebrews about the year 80.

We shall be least successful in determining the origin of Hebrews. It is not necessary to refute the idea that some unknown person wrote Hebrews with the deceitful intention of passing it off as a work of Paul's (n. 10). A writing which has always been anonymous in form (above, pp. 304 f., 312 f.) cannot be also pseudonymous. The genuineness of the writing is proved fully by the subordination of the author's personality to his subject, by the earnestness of his purpose—apparent in every line—to save a definite body of readers, distinctive in character, from shipwreck, and by an eloquence born out of the depths of an inspired soul. Of the two names between which the inharmonious tradition of the second century gives us choice, those of Paul and Barnabas, the first is certainly to be rejected (n. 11). Aside from the fact that Hebrews was not written until after 70, i.e. several years after Paul's death, he could not have been its author. He could not be called one of the Christians who received the word of salvation from those who heard the preaching of Jesus (ii. 3). It is not a question here of mere external knowledge of the gospel history, of which Paul also had received the tradition from older Christians where he was not familiar with the facts before his conversion, but the author is speaking of the Word of God, preached with signs and wonders, implanted in the hearts of believing hearers, and bringing salvation—the word which Paul calls the gospel of God and of Christ (cf. Heb. iv. 2, vi. 5, xiii. 7). This, however, was not received by Paul from men, nor through human teachers (Gal. i. 12), but it had enlightened him like a stroke of lightning from heaven. The matter is also settled by Origen's judgment, that the style of Hebrews precludes its Pauline authorship (above, p. 309). The fact that we have such a large number of Epistles from Paul's hand, covering a period of some fifteen years, produced under the most varying conditions and in very different states of mind, and on this account showing the greatest variety in thought, in form, and in language, compels us to affirm positively that he could not have been the author of Hebrews, which in that case must have been written before 2 Tim. The author of Hebrews is no ιδιώτης τῷ λόγῳ (2 Cor. xi. 6), but a teacher rhetorically trained, who, notwithstanding all the earnestness of his concern for the salvation of his readers, nevertheless makes it a point to put his thoughts into artistic and rhythmical language, as appears from the very first sentence, i. 1-4 (n. 12). It would be rash to affirm that the versatile Paul could not, if occasion demanded, have developed the ideas peculiar to Hebrews. But if Paul is the author, it is incomprehensible that he should never have been led by the development of thought in Hebrews and by its contrasts to suggest the thoughts which dominated him to the end, namely, that men are justified and saved by faith and not by works of the law (cf. among other passages, Eph. ii. 8 f.; Phil. iii. 9; 1 Tim. i. 12-16; Tit. iii. 5-7), and that in Christianity all national differences lose their religious significance (cf. among other passages, Col. iii. 11; 1 Tim. ii. 4-7; Tit. ii. 11, iii. 4). Furthermore, it is inconceivable that Paul, who mentions the Saviour more than 600 times in his Epistles, either as Christ, or Jesus Christ, or our Lord Jesus Christ, or simply the Lord,—only very rarely as Jesus (Rom. iii. 26, viii. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 10-14, xi. 4; Eph. iv. 21; 1 Thess. i. 10, iv. 14; cf. Rom. x. 9; 1 Cor. xii. 3), and never in his last letters, Philemon, 1 and 2 Timothy and Titus,—should in Hebrews suddenly change his usage and regularly employ the simple name "Jesus" (ii. 9, iii. 1, vi. 20, vii. 22, x. 19, xii. 2, 24, xiii. 12, cf. iv. 14)—"Jesus Christ" only three times (x. 10, xiii. 8, 21)—more rarely simply “the Lord” (ii. 3, not in viii. 2, xii. 14), but never the full Pauline formula, “our Lord Jesus Christ” (not even in xiii. 20). Moreover, the use of the plural to designate the writer (ii. 5, iv. 13, v. 11, vi. 1, 3, 9, 11, xiii. 18), which is replaced by the singular only in xi. 32, xiii. 19, 22, is contrary to Pauline usage (vol. i. 171, n. 1, 209, n. 3, 316, n. 3). An author does not assume for one writing a usage which he never afterwards employs. The hypothesis that Paul is the writer of Hebrews is not only not supported by the tradition, but rendered impossible; for although it is easy to understand how, in Alexandria, Hebrews, which was associated with Paul’s letters, was ascribed to him, it is difficult to understand how the tradition of Pauline authorship, if it was originally connected with Hebrews, could have been lost in most of the Churches, or indeed replaced by another name (above, p. 298 f.).

More can be said in favour of the Barnabas tradition (n. 13). In the first place, we know so little about Barnabas that we can form no exact conception of how he would have expressed himself as an author. We possess no writings of his by comparison with which his production of Hebrews might be disproved. It is not impossible that Barnabas, who entered the Church in Jerusalem before the year 35, who, as early as the year 38, enjoyed a certain distinction (Acts ix. 27), and was sent shortly afterward on an important mission to Antioch (Acts xi. 22), was still alive in the year 80, an old man of about fourscore years, although Hebrews does not give the impression of having been written by an old man. Just as Mark, his cousin and helper, in spite of early differences with Paul, worked hand in hand with him later (Col. iv. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 11), so it is possible that Barnabas may have been on the best of terms with Timothy, the disciple of Paul (Heb. xiii. 23). There are some traces of a tradition according to which Barnabas once came to Rome (vol. i. 432 f., n. 5). The fact that he soon showed himself inferior to Paul as a preacher (Acts xiv. 12) does not prove that he was not proficient in the use of language, although a Levite born in Cyprus and living in Jerusalem (Acts iv. 36 f.) is not likely to have possessed the very great rhetorical skill which the author of Hebrews shows. Ignorance of the ritual regulations of the temple at Jerusalem, which some think is apparent in a number of passages in Hebrews, would be neither more nor less surprising in the case of Barnabas than of Paul. This objection is not serious, however, for the simple reason that the author is speaking throughout the letter not of the contemporaneous worship in Jerusalem, but of the worship in the tabernacle which was prescribed in the law (n. 14); so that in any case the author can be charged only with lack of a technical knowledge of the law. How much or how little of such knowledge Barnabas possessed no one can say. On the other hand, it could hardly be explained how a man, who like Barnabas had been a prominent member of the mother Church, could have lost so fully from his mind its attitude toward the Jewish cultus and the ceremonial law (above, p. 334 f.); this would remain inexplicable, even if he were writing to Jewish Christians outside of Palestine. Although all of these comparisons of the little we know about Barnabas with Hebrews do not absolutely exclude the possibility of the hypothesis that this λόγος τῆς παρακλήσεως (Heb. xiii. 22) was written by the υἱὸς παρακλήσεως (Acts iv. 36), yet it is improbable when the tradition is considered. If the tradition that makes Barnabas the author goes back to the time when the letter began to circulate, which must have been the case if it is true, it is impossible to explain its disappearance, especially in circles where Paul's name was not allowed to take its place. We conclude, therefore, that the Barnabas authorship of the letter, like the Pauline, is unsupported by a real and genuine tradition, but is an ancient hypothesis (above, p. 303 f.). It is not likely that the future will ever take us beyond hypotheses. The conjecture, probably first made by Luther, that Hebrews was written by Apollos, has, not without reason, always been regarded with favour (n. 15). The union of Greek rhetorical skill with Jewish knowledge of the Scriptures for which he was distinguished, and the fiery zeal with which he testified to his faith, particularly among his countrymen, both appear in Hebrews (Acts xviii. 24-28; vol. i. 262 f., 270 f., 286 f.). The faith in Jesus which Apollos brought with him from his native city of Alexandria to Ephesus, without having previously belonged to a Church whose members were baptized, he may have owed to persons who had been led to believe through the preaching of Jesus Himself (n. 4), even before Pentecost, possibly while visiting the feast in Jerusalem. Apollos could have written Heb. ii. 3. What is said in xiii. 23 would be in harmony with his friendly relations with Paul (cf. Tit. iii. 13); also xiii. 7, if Paul as well as Peter is referred to in this passage. Luther's hypothesis has a twofold advantage over all the others: (1) among the teachers of the apostolic time, so far as we are able to form a conception of them, there is no one whom our impression of the author of Hebrews suits better than Apollos; (2) in the little that we know of his history there is nothing directly opposed to the hypothesis. But the outcome of every thoughtful discussion of the origin of Hebrews is likely to be the same as Origen's conclusion: τίς δὲ ὁ γράψας τὴν ἐπιστολὴν, τὸ μὲν ἀληθὲς θεὸς οἶδεν.

1. (P. 343.) W. Grimm, ZfWTh, 1870, S. 19-77, who refutes (S. 46-53) the theory yet held by Bleek, Lunemann, Riehm, and others, that Heb. is intended for Jerusalem, still retained Palestine as the home of the readers, and suggested (S. 71) Jamnia as their residence. Westcott does not wish to dispute this, but contents himself with the supposition that it is a congregation in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (p. xlii).

2. (P. 344.) Bohme, Ep. ad Hebr. 1825, p. xxxii ff., held the Antiochian community to be the circle of readers of Heb.; and Hofmann, v. 531 ff., with the added supposition that Paul is the author, believed them to be the Jewish Christians of Antioch and vicinity. But the very fact that in Antioch as late as 63, at the time when Hofmann believes Heb. to have been written, the Jewish portion of the congregation was still separated from the Gentile portion, is, according to Acts xv. and Gal. ii., inconceivable. That Timothy had any very close connection with Antioch is nowhere proved; and that he, profiting by the opportunity offered by the journey of Acts xviii. 22, stayed there with Paul for any length of time (Hofmann, 532), is a theory incompatible with Acts xviii. 18. At the time of Paul's leaving Corinth, Timothy was not with him, and we do not meet him again with Paul until very much later in Ephesus (Acts xix. 22; 1 Cor. iv. 17; cf. vol. i. 265, n. 2).

3. (P. 344.) The readers of Heb. were sought in Alexandria by Wieseler, Chron. 479 ff.; Unters. über den Heb., Heft ii. 1861; Köstlin, ThJb, 1854, S. 388 ff.; Ritschl, ThStKr, 1866, S. 89 ff.; Hilgenfeld, Einl. 385 ff., and others. It is possible that the author was a native Alexandrian; but there is nothing to make it likely that he belonged by birth to the circle of the readers. It would not be possible, therefore, from the origin of the author to draw any conclusion as to the residence of the readers. Concerning the alleged reference to the temple at Leontopolis see above, p. 341. The attempt of Köstlin (ThJb 1854, S. 395 ff.) to refer the οὗτος ἀναστρεφόμενος, Heb. x. 33, to the sufferings of the non-Christian Jews of Alexandria under Caligula, is unsuccessful. Cf. especially, Grimm, op. cit. 67 ff.

4. (P. 344.) If Apollos in 54 brought with him from his home in Alexandria a belief in Jesus which made him an ardent preacher of the gospel in the synagogue of Ephesus; and if, on the other hand, he knew nothing of the ecclesiastical baptism, and did not as yet possess the Christian knowledge which had developed in the Church (Acts xviii. 24-26; cf. xix. 1-7), then the conviction that Jesus was the Messiah must have spread to the Jews of Egypt independently of the organised Church, and perhaps before the rise of a Church in Jerusalem, i.e. in the days of John the Baptist and of Jesus Himself. It is to these Jews that Mark in the first instance must have turned, if he is to be rightly considered the founder of the Alexandrian Church (Eus. H. E. ii. 16. 1 and 24), and Barnabas also if he went to Alexandria (Clem. Hom. i. 9-14; cf. vol. i. 432 f., n. 5). The Jewish population of Egypt is estimated at one million (Philo, contra Flaccum, vi.); and the Samaritans, who wished to be reckoned as Jews (Jos. Ant. xi. 8. 6), were also represented there in large numbers (Jos. Ant. xii. 1). There was, as a matter of fact, in the neighbourhood of Arsinoë, a city which was either by them or after them named Samaria (The W. Flinders Petrie Papyrus, ed. Mahaffy, ii. 14, 88, 93, 94). Cf. Schürer, iii. 19-25 (Eng. trans. ii. ii. 226-230). There was, consequently, no lack of material for Jewish Christian communities in Egypt. If the Didache was written in Egypt about 110 (vol. i. 304), we might conclude that there was a connection between the primitive Egyptian Church and that of Palestine. The very fact that there were originally twelve pre-byters of Alexandria (Eutych. Alex., ed. Pococke, i. 331; cf. Clem. Hom. xi. 36; Recogn. vi. 15) might point in the same direction. Further evidence may be found in the traces of a knowledge of Jewish Christian Gospels, which appear in many of the fragments of apocryphal Gospels found in recent years in Egypt (ThLb, 1897, col. 426, 430; NZK, 1900, S. 361-370; 1905, S. 171-175). The present writer refrains from expressing any opinion concerning the Epistles of St. Anthony (especially Ep. 2 ad Arsinaitas, Migne, 40, col. 981). As a matter of fact, we have no certain knowledge of Jewish Christian communities in Egypt.

5. (P. 345.) Wettstein was the first to think of Christians in Rome, Novum Testamentum, ii. 386 f.; and more recently Holtzmann, Kurz, and the present writer (PRE², v. 666 ff.; ed. 3, vii. 501 f.). Erroneous notions concerning the composition of the Roman congregation have been the chief hindrance to the spread of this view.

6. (P. 345.) It should not be denied that expressions such as οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας, xiii. 24; οἱ ἀπὸ Καδικίας καὶ Ἀσίας, Acts vi. 9; ὁ ἀπὸ Ναζαρέθ, Matt. xxi. 11; John i. 46; Acts x. 38, denote origin, whether that of birth, or the place from which one has just arrived (cf. e.g. Acts xxi. 27; Matt. xv. 1, if οἱ is genuine here = Mark iii. 22, vii. 1), and that such a description of persons can only have arisen outside of the places where they were born, or where they customarily resided. This is not in any way altered by the transfer of the formula to other expressions than those of place, such as οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, Acts xii. 1; or οἱ ἀπὸ σκηνῆς and similar ones; nor by the cases in which, by virtue of a sort of attraction (Kuhner-Gerth. Gr. i. 546), the departure from a place is combined with the preceding residence in it, Acts x. 23, xvii. 13; cf. per contra, xvii. 11. As an instance of this is the case where a messenger sent from Sparta to Thessaly speaks in Herodotus, viii. 114 (cf. in connection also Polyb. v. 86. 10) of Ἡρακλείδαι οἱ ἀπὸ Σπαρτῆς. On the other hand, it must be admitted that a narrator, who as such is generally removed from the standpoint of the events narrated, might on occasion so express himself as to introduce a person by his title of origin, although at the time of writing the person is within his own place of residence. As the Lazarus whom Jesus raised from the dead is generally called the Lazarus of Bethany to distinguish him from others of that name, he is so called in John xi. 1, which, inasmuch as the narrative is centred at Lazarus' own home, is a not very elegant form of expression. Still worse is the ἀσπάζονται σε . . . πάντες οἱ ἀπὸ Φιλίππων, ὅθεν καὶ ἐπέστειλά σοι, which the pseudo-Ignatius, circa 370 or 400, makes Ignatius in Philippi write (ad Her. viii.). It would be hard to point out anything of this sort in a real letter, even of a man of much less education than the author of Heb. The theory of a similar clumsiness of expression in Heb. xiii. 24 would in no wise explain why the writer designates by their origin, or place of residence, those who are sending greetings, instead of characterising them as Christians of his vicinity (Gal. i. 2; Phil. iv. 21; Tit. iii. 15). If he wished, however, in a manner similar to 1 Cor. xvi. 19, Rom. xvi. 16, to extend greetings, not expressly entrusted to him to deliver, in behalf of all the Christians of the country in which he was living, he would have written αἱ ἐκκλησίαι τῆς Ἰταλίας, or something similar. It will probably have to be granted, then—(1) that the author and the Italians who send greeting are outside of Italy. (2) The Italians alone, of the Christians of his vicinity, have commissioned him to extend greetings, because they most naturally have a greater interest in the readers who live in Italy.

7. (P. 346.) Lightfoot, Clement, ii. 205, holds Clement to be a Hellenistic Jew. The present writer attempted to prove the Jewish origin of the author of the Shepherd of Hermas in his Hirt des Hermas, 485–497. Spitta, Urchrist. ii. 243–437, makes the greater part of the Shepherd the work of a Jew, Hermas, who had not yet become Christian. After attention had been called, even before Origen's time, to the points of contact between Heb. and Clem. 1 Cor. (above, pp. 299 f., 308 f.), Eusebius noticed that the latter betrayed the borrowing from Heb. not only of thoughts, but also of words. "The fact is unmistakable," writes Overbeck (Zur Gesch. d. Kanons, S. 3), "that this letter of Clement's makes use of Heb. without acknowledgment, at times copying it outright." For details, cf. QK, i. 963 f. The present writer attempted to demonstrate the dependence of the Shepherd upon Heb. in his Hirt des Hermas, 439–452, cf. Hofmann, v. 45. Spitta, ii. 412–414, allows nothing more than the possibility that the author of Heb. was acquainted with the original purely Jewish writing of the Shepherd.

8. (P. 351.) As the Roman Christians, since the time of Claudius, had been cut off from the fellowship of the synagogue (vol. i. 427), the division of the Roman Jews into a considerable number of synagogue congregations furnishes merely the analogy and not the basis for the division of the Roman Christian congregations into smaller circles, meeting at different places. Least of all is it to be imagined that one of those Jewish synagogue congregations, which during the first centuries remained such (vol. i. 47 f., 67, n. 14; 433 f., n. 6), had been transformed, at so early a period as the apostolic age, into a Christian congregation, and that the particular assembly to which the readers of Heb. belong, and which they are not to leave (x. 25; above, p. 339, n. 11), is one of these Jewish synagogues. Nestle's question (ET, 1899, p. 422), whether the title $\pi\rho\varsigma$ Ἑβραίων might not be connected with the name of the $\sigma\upsilon\nu\alpha\gamma\omega\gamma\eta$ Ἑβραίων (vol. i. 67, n. 14), is on this account to be answered in the negative; and all the more decidedly as the historical significance which Ἑβραῖοι had in the name of that synagogue was not applicable to the first recipients of Heb. (above, pp. 296, 306 f.).

9. (P. 351.) On Jude 5, where, not the destruction of Jerusalem or of the Temple, but, as in Heb. iii. 7–19, iv. 6, the ruin of the generation of the Jewish people which had sinned against Jesus is expressed, in a form borrowed from the history of Mosaic times, see above, pp. 253 f., 320 f. If Jerusalem and the Temple were in ruins, the readers must have thought of this fact when they came to Heb. viii. 13, xii. 22, xiii. 14, as the Corinthians must have done in reading Clem. 1 Cor. vi. 4 ($\zeta\eta\lambda\omicron\varsigma$ καὶ ἔρις πόλεις μεγάλας κατέσκαψεν καὶ ἔθνη μέγала ἐξερρίζωσεν); and they must have understood the author's reason for using in xiii. 13 $\pi\alpha\rho\epsilon\mu\beta\omicron\lambda\eta\varsigma$ instead of $\pi\acute{o\lambda\epsilon\omega\varsigma$ or $\pi\acute{o\lambda\eta\varsigma$, as he has it in xiii. 12. Jerusalem and its gates were no longer standing. If the readers found in xiii. 14 a contrast between the Christians, who had no enduring city upon earth, and the Jews, who in Jerusalem still possessed one, it was only because they failed to take into account the fact that (1) this contrast would have had to be expressed at least by an emphatic ἡμεῖς; (2) that a Christian, circa 66–70, in view of the prophecy of Jesus and of the actual conditions, could not possibly have said, even indirectly, that Jerusalem was a πόλις μένουσα. The Jews who have imagined this, through their unbelief, have lost the city, which they held to be enduring; the Jewish Christians, through the faith in which they have followed their forefathers (xi. 10, 13–16), have won for themselves an eternal city. That the author would have had to direct attention more clearly and strongly to the judgment of the year 70 than he does in iii. 7-19, iv. 6, ix. 8-12 (above, pp. 321 ff., 339 f.), xiii. 14, and that he would have had to use—particularly in viii. 13—the annihilation of the temple-cultus which had occurred as a most powerful argument for his position, instead of saying, from the standpoint of Jeremiah, that the end of the old covenant was near at hand, in that a new one was opposed to it by the prophets,—these and other similar challenges would be in place only if it had been necessary to combat a false devotion to the Temple and its cultus. But there is no trace of this in Heb. If a Jewish Christian addressing Jewish Christians, who viewed with a sad heart their ruin and the ruin of their people, had allowed “the brutal logic of facts” to speak more loudly and decisively, he would have been open to the reproach against which Paul guards himself in Rom. ix. 1 ff.

10. (P. 352.) Schwegler, Nachapost. Zeitalter, ii. 304 f., declares Heb. to be a pseudo-Pauline forgery. Baur, Christ. u. Kirche der drei ersten Jahrh. (2 Aufl.) 109, who viewed it as a product of Jewish Christianity, believed, however, that in xiii. 23 he had discovered the author's fraudulent purpose to introduce “his writing as one which had come from among the associates of Paul.” Köstlin wrote against Schwegler from within the circle of his own school, ThJb, 1853, S. 420 ff.; 1854, S. 437, so that Overbeck also (S. 6) viewed the hypothesis of a fiction as permanently disposed of.

11. (P. 352.) Among those who more recently represent the theory of the Pauline authorship may be mentioned Hug, *Einh.*³ ii. 461-496; Hofmann, v. 42-52, 520-561; Biesenthal, Das Trosts Schreiben des Ap. Pl. an die Hebräer, 1878; Holtzheuer, Der Br. an die Ebräer, 1883.

12. (P. 353.) On the language and style of Heb., especially in comparison with the writings of Paul, cf. Seyffarth, De ep. ad Hebr. indole, 1821; Bleek, i. 315-338; Hofmann, v. 555-561. In regard to the rhythm, see Blass, ThStKr, 1902, Heft 3, also his “(Barnabas) Brief an die Hebr. Text mit Angabe der Rhythmen,” 1903. The idea of Hofmann that Paul, freed from a five years' imprisonment, and awaiting the return of Timothy in an Italian port, must have had leisure to bestow a care in the execution of Heb. which is not his custom, is not obvious. Torn from an environment in Rome which had been familiar to him for two years past, and which was in no way oppressive, in the discomfort of a seaport city, where there could hardly have been a Christian community, and in the impatience of awaiting the arrival of Timothy, or a suitable chance of obtaining passage, Paul would have been much less in a position to bestow a conscious care upon his style than when, in the bosom of the reconciled Corinthian congregation, he wrote to the Romans; or when from Rome, surrounded by friends and helpers, after he had become accustomed to the local customs, and previous to the opening of the exciting trial, he wrote the Col. and Eph. letters. A conscious effort to attain elegance of expression and a euphonious rounding out of clauses was contrary, in any case, to the character of Paul. Such an effort is also not to be ascribed to the real author. He who would write in the style in which Heb. is written, with such great care and such ardent desire to produce an effect upon the hearts and consciences of his readers or hearers,—and the “readers” of that time were always for the most part hearers (Rev. i. 3),—to him such a style of writing must have become second nature; he could no longer do otherwise. Besides periods, everywhere grammatically transparent, symmetrically formed, and rhythmically rounded (i. 1-4, ii. 2-4, v. 1-3, vi. 16-20 vii. 18-25, x. 19-25, xii. 1, 2), in the carrying out of which the author does not allow himself to be disturbed by lengthy citations (iii. 7 ff.; above, p. 337)—besides these, alliterations and paranomasia are conspicuous (i. 1, πολ-, πολ-, παλ-, πατ-, προφ; ii. 1, περ-, προσ-, παρ-; ii. 10, παν-, παν-, πολ-, παθ-; v. 8, ἔμαθεν—ἐπαθεν; vii. 3, ἀπάτωρ, ἀμήτωρ; xi. 4, πισ-, πλει-, παρ-, προσ-). The hexameter, xii. 13, καὶ τροχίως ὀρθῶς ποιήσατε τοῖς ποσὶν ὑμῶν, has evidently arisen by chance (cf. vol. i. 118, n. 5). According to NP (ποιεῖτε instead of ποιήσατε) it does not exist; but comparison with the original (Prov. iv. 26, ὀρθῶς τροχίως ποιεῖ σοῖς ποσὶν) shows, nevertheless, the author's sense of rhythm. The correct verdict of Origen (ἑλληνικωτέρα, above, p. 309) has been sadly exaggerated when, e.g. Kurz, Komm. S. 19, "praises" Heb. "for using a Greek idiom free from any sort of Semitic colouring." Absolutely Semitic is the adjectival use of the genitive in Heb. ix. 5, Χερουβειν δόξης, "glorious cherubs" (in which the Aramaic and therefore modern Hebrew form of the name is to be noticed, which the Antiochian recension has changed to the old Hebrew Χερουβίμ); iii. 12, καρδιά ἀπιστίας; xii. 15, ῥίζα πικρίας; iv. 2, ὁ λόγος τῆς ἀκοῆς; also iv. 16, ὁ θρόνος τῆς χάριτος. No Greek, not even a Philo, would have written ἐπ' ἐσχάτου τῶν ἡμερῶν τούτων, i. 1; ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις τῆς σαρκὸς αὐτοῦ, v. 7; τῷ ῥήματι τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ, i. 3; cf. per contra, Col. i. 20, 22; Rom. vii. 24. ἥς τὸ τέλος εἰς καθύσιν, vi. 8, cf. Num. xxiv. 20, Ps. cix. 13, Isa. v. 5, is thoroughly Hebrew in conception, and still no part of a citation. The Hebraic ἐνώπιον with the genitive, iv. 13, xiii. 21, the pleonastic ἐαυτοῖς with ἔχειν, x. 34 (DKL), which badly applied pedantry has cancelled (P) or emended to ἐαυτοῖς (NAH) or to ἐν ἐαυτοῖς (min.), and other examples of the same sort, would not have been passed over by the stylists which a Josephus made use of. The complete correspondence with the LXX the author has in common with Paul; whether he had a knowledge of the Hebrew text also, and used it (cf. Hofmann, v. 522 f.), is as much a matter of dispute as in the case of Paul, and the proof of the theory that he had before him a different text of the LXX than Paul possessed (Bleek, i. 369-375, cf. per contra, Hofmann, v. 522 f.)—proof, which is presented in a manner far from convincing—is really of no importance, when, apart from this, it is certain that Paul is not the author. The opinion that Heb. is a translation of a Hebrew or Aramaic original, was held at a very early date, but on very unsubstantial grounds (above, p. 298), and has been maintained, moreover, by Michaelis, Einkl. 1356-1384, very learnedly, and by Biesenthal, S. 43 ff., very superficially. It seems unnecessary to refute it again.

13. (P. 354.) The theory which makes Barnabas the author has been defended most energetically by Weiseler. Without exactly advocating his exaggerated presentation of the tradition in favour of Barnabas, Ritschl, Theokr. 1866, S. 89, among others, has agreed with him. Recently also Blass in his edition, cited in n. 12, above, S. 9, with unsatisfactory proof from tradition.

14. (P. 355.) There has been a disposition to find, especially in vii. 27, an ignorance of the regulation of the cultus, in so far as it is held that the passage indicates a daily offering of the twofold sacrifice for his own sins and for the sins of the people as the duty of the high priest. No account is to be taken of x. 11, where ιερεύς is better attested than ἀρχιερεύς, and indicates nothing as to a definite kind of sacrificial procedure. On the contrary, in vii. 27 the twofold offering of the high priest on the Day of Atonement is unmistakably referred to, concerning which a similar expression is used in v. 3, ix. 7, and of which it is said expressly in ix. 7 (cf. ix. 25, x. 1, 3) that the high priest has to offer it only once a year. It is therefore inconceivable that vii. 27 should mean that the high priest was bound to offer this sacrifice daily. To this yearly twofold sacrifice of the high priest corresponds what Jesus has done once for all in offering Himself as a sacrifice. The limiting of the τοῦτο to the second part of the twofold sacrifice, which previously without repetition of the ὑπέρ is joined with the first part, is not permissible, any more than limiting it to the first part of the sacrifice,—a proposition which, as a matter of fact, is advanced by A. Seeberg (NJh(1)Th, iii. 367, 370). If it were intolerable to the author to think that Jesus, like the high priest, made offering also for Himself, he could not have brought out this point prominently three different times (v. 3, vii. 27, ix. 7); at best he could have called attention in passing to the fact that this part of the function of the high priest was not applicable to the sinless Jesus (iv. 15), i.e. that in this respect the typical comparison was incomplete. Instead of this, in v. 3 he lays the greater emphasis precisely upon the offering of the high priest in his own behalf, and shows in ver. 7 f. that Jesus, in spite of His innate dignity, and in contrast to His present exaltation as heavenly priest-king, nevertheless in His earthly life did offer a sacrifice, which was evidence of His weakness, His fear of death, and His unreadiness for the dread experience, and which corresponds, therefore, mutatis mutandis, to the yearly offering of the high priest for himself. In so doing the author can have in mind nothing but the struggle in prayer in Gethsemane, which he looks upon as the act of Jesus introductory to the function of high priest. In offering up His will in Gethsemane, His body upon the cross (x. 10), and His blood in the heavenly sanctuary (ix. 12), He offers Himself continually. If these three points are included in the ἐαυτὸν προσερεύχας of vii. 27, it cannot be denied that Jesus had to make an offering for Himself, or for His own sins. It is denied only that He was under the necessity of making daily the offering which corresponds to the twofold offering of the high priest; for this might seem necessary in so far as Christ has to discharge His function of high priest, not merely now and then, but continually (ii. 18, iv. 15 f., vii. 23-25, ix. 14). But this is not necessary, because Christ's offering of Himself once for all, as distinguished from that which is accomplished by the typical service of the legal high priest, has secured an eternally valid atonement and redemption (vii. 27 f., ix. 12, 26, x. 10). If the author, by his negation, in contradiction of his repeated and correct statement, wished to advance the erroneous assertion that the legal high priest was bound to offer the twofold sacrifice daily, he would have had to choose (1) another word-grouping, and write perhaps: οὐχ ὡς οἱ ἀρχιερεὺς καὶ ἡμέραν ἢ καὶ ἡμέραν ὡσπερ οἱ ἀρχιερεὺς ἔχει ἀνάγκην κτλ.; and (2) after he had just designated Jesus in vii. 26 as the high priest, he would have had to characterise the O.T. high priests, in contrast to this true and perfect high priest, as οἱ κατὰ νόμον ἀρχιερεῖς (vii. 16), or something similar. The phrase ὥσπερ οἱ ἀρχιερεῖς, unobtrusive because of its position and brevity (cf. per contra, iv. 10, ix. 25), opens the infinitive clause, which is dependent upon ἔχει ἀνάγκην, and serves merely to call to mind the fact that the action whose daily repetition is unnecessary for Jesus, inasmuch as He has completed it once for all, is precisely that which belongs to the office of high priest. Hofmann has already given what is essentially a correct interpretation of the passage. When one remembers that καθ' ἡμέραν expresses proverbially the frequent and constant recurrence of a process, no matter whether it takes place once a day or three times a week (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 31; 2 Cor. xi. 28; Heb. iii. 13, x. 11), he will not easily understand why A. Seeberg, op. cit. 368, demands πάντοτε instead of the preceding explanation. If this demand were justified, it would have precisely the same value over against the new explanation, according to which the καθ' ἡμέραν, which is excluded in spite of the position of the negation, is to be translated "in his daily recurring acts," by which would be meant the intervention of Christ for His own people (S. 369 f.). This, too, may be necessary a hundred times a day, if all the Christians on earth are to find help seasonably for their needs (iv. 16). But this new interpretation goes beyond most of the earlier ones in the obscurity of its assumed modes of expression (S. 368). In ix. 4 the error was discovered that the incense altar is made to stand in the Holy of Holies. χρυσοῦν θυμιαστήριον surely cannot refer to anything but this, which Symmachus and Theodotus (Ex. xxx. 1) as well as Philo (Rer. Div. Her. 46; Vita Mos. iii. 9) and Josephus (Ant. iii. 6. 8) regularly call by that name, though LXX, Ex. xxx. 1 and elsewhere regularly substitutes for it θυσιαστήριον θυμιάματος; neither can an incense pan, or a censer, be meant, for which, in Ezra viii. 11, 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, 4 Macc. vii. 11, and, according to one translator, Lev. x. 1, θυμιατήριον is used, but elsewhere πυρεῖον (Ex. xxvii. 3, xxviii. 3; Lev. x. 1, xvi. 12). The reference cannot be here to a vessel of secondary importance, which in the descriptions of the tabernacle is mentioned only incidentally among other vessels, and which is described, not as being of gold but of bronze, and which, furthermore, inasmuch as it was to be handled by the priests daily, every child must have known was not kept in the Holy of Holies—a place accessible only to the high priest, and to him but once a year. Even the consideration of a golden censer mentioned in the Mishna (Joma iv. 4), which was used only on the Day of Atonement by the high priest, could not lead the author astray; for this was kept, as a matter of course, outside of the Holy of Holies (Joma vii. 4). If, however, the golden incense altar is meant, it could have been no more a matter of doubt to the author, according to Ex. xxx. 1–10, xl. 1–5, 22–27, Lev. xvi. 12, than to a Philo or a Josephus, that the incense altar, as well as the table and candlestick, stood in the Holy Place. Furthermore, from the law, without any knowledge of the Jewish cultus of his time (Luke i. 8–23), he must have known that the service of the incense altar belonged to the daily duties of the priesthood (Ex. xxx. 7 f.; cf. Heb. ix. 6, x. 11), consequently that it did not stand in the Holy of Holies, which only the high priest entered once a year (Heb. ix. 7). Accordingly, in ix. 4 the special inclusion of the golden censer, or incense altar, within the Holy of Holies, cannot be what is affirmed,—a meaning which is not required by the expression (ἐχούσα; cf. ix. 1, x. 1, 36, xiii. 10, and per contra, ἐν ᾧ, ix. 2, 4;—but merely an ideal relation to it, as in 1 Kings vi. 22, which corresponds to the service connected with the altar on the Day of Atonement; cf. Delitzsch, 356–360; Riehm, Lehrbegr. des Hb. 189 f.; Hofmann, 318 f.; Westcott, 246 f. The author follows a tradition voiced in LXX, Ex. xvi. 23, and therefore followed by Philo (Congr. Brud. Gr. 18), when he makes in ix. 4 the manna jar to be of gold; and it is upon the basis of the traditional exegesis of Ex. xvi. 34 and Num. xvii. 25 that he transfers the manna jar and the staff of Aaron to the ark of the covenant, a tradition whose age is rather corroborated than controverted by 1 Kings viii. 9. What, aside from this, has been actually believed, and the fictions that have been invented concerning the whereabouts of these articles and of the ark itself, do not concern us, since the author describes (ix. 1) here, as unequivocally as anywhere, the legal regulations of the O.T. cultus specified in the Thora, and does so without any regard for possible changes of a later day, or for a cultus existing in his time.

15. (P. 356.) Luther in the Vorrede zum Hb. of 1522 (Erl. Ausg., Bd. 63, S. 154 f.), by a comparison of Heb. ii. 3 and Gal. i. 1, 12, declared a Pauline origin of the Epistle to be out of the question, and maintained that it was the work of a disciple of the apostles, “perhaps long afterward.” He called attention, furthermore, to the passages vi. 4–8, x. 26–31, xii. 17, as in their thought dogmatically questionable, closing his discussion with the words: “But whoever wrote them is unknown, and wishes perhaps to remain unknown for a time.” In the Kirchenpostille (Bd. vii. S. 181) he calls their Pauline origin a “credible delusion. They are not the work of St. Paul, for the reason that they have a diction much more ornamental than St. Paul elsewhere is accustomed to use. Some believe them to be St. Luke’s, some St. Apollos’, whom St. Luke praises” (Acts xviii. 24). Similarly, Enarr. in Gen. xlviii. 20 (Op. eeg. xi. 138): “Auctor epist. ad Hebr. quisquis est, sive Paulus sive, ut ego arbitror, Apollo.” Finally, in a sermon of the year 1537 on 1 Cor. iii. 4 f. (Bd. xviii. S. 181), he says, “This Apollo(s) was a man of great intelligence, the Epistle of the Hebrews is indeed his.” This hypothesis was recommended especially by Bleek (i. 423–430) and adopted by many; also by Klostermann, who, op. cit. 47–51, aptly portrays the characteristics of the author. The conjectures of H. Ewald (Der Hb. S. 30), that the N.T. Apollos fell later into bad ways, and might be identical with the swindler Apollonius of Tyana, has no more value than the fanciful identification of the N.T. Apollos with the martyr Apollonius, circa 180–185, in the title of his Acta (ed. Klette, S. 92). As proof of the Alexandrian origin of the author, which would be an additional reason for ascribing the letter to Apollos, special emphasis has been laid upon the points of contact between Heb. and the writings of Philo. Parallels have been diligently collected by J. B. Carpzov, Sacra Exercit. in S. Pauli ep. ad Hebr. e Philone Alex., Helmstadt, 1750; some also by Siegfried, Philo, 321–330. Intelligent discussions are to be found in Riehm, Lehrbegr. des Hb. 855 ff., and briefly also in Hofmann, v. 530. There exists between Philo and Heb. an occasionally apparent similarity of expression and a common basis of rabbinical and rhetorical training. It remains unlikely, however, that such a gifted Christian as the author of Heb. would have found pleasure in such terribly tiresome writings as those of the Alexandrian Jew; cf. Michaelis, 1385. This has no bearing, of course, upon the origin of the letter, which statement applies also to the incidental points of contact between Heb. and the remaining writings of the N.T. The citation of Heb. x. 30, in its similar departure from LXX and from the original also, as in the case of Rom. xii. 19, is the foremost proof of the author's knowledge of Pauline writings. And it is easily conceivable that, when the author wrote to the Christians in Rome, he had in mind Paul's letter to the Romans. The rest that has been collected (Brückner, Chronol. Reihenfolge der ntl. Schriften, 1890, S. 239-241) is unimportant. The alleged undeniable dependence of 1 Pet. and Jas. upon Heb. (Brückner, 35-41, 291) would compel us to accept the composition of Heb. before the year 50; and the alleged use, on the part of the author, of the Antiquities of Josephus, completed in the year 94 (Hitzig, Zur Krit. der paul. Briefe, S. 34-36), would bring us down to the year 100. The latter assertion does not seem to have found any favour even with Krenkel, who in his Josephus und Lucas, 1894, S. 345-353, would not otherwise have silently passed over the matter. As far as the relation to James is concerned, observations must be limited to the seemingly contradictory treatment of the sacrificing of Isaac and the deed of Rahab in Heb. xi. 17, 31 and Jas. ii. 21-25. To return to serious questions: the wholly original theory put forward by Luther, has the advantage over all others which have arisen in earlier and later times. Luke, whom Clemens Alexandrinus regarded as a translator, and others of about the same period, as a secretary under Paul's direction (above, pp. 298, 308), was declared by Grotius in Præloquium zum Heb. to be the independent author. Delitzsch also, in the course of his learned commentary and at its close (S. 701-707), has attempted to prove that Luke "wrote" Heb. "by order and according to the directions of Paul." Against Harnack's conjecture, that Aquila and Priscilla wrote Heb., but that the larger portion of the same should be ascribed to the more capable Priscilla (ZfNTW, 1900, S. 16-41), the following is to be noted—(1) The variation between the we and the I of the author (above, p. 354) which Harnack explains by stating that formally two persons are introduced as authors, but that in fact only one of the two wrote the letter, would by just this hypothesis be fully unintelligible. In case Aquila and Priscilla are the speakers in xiii. 18 (vi. 1-3, 9, 11, but then also ii. 5, iv. 13, v. 11), and, on the other hand, only one of them the speaker in xiii. 19, 22 f., the readers of the letter could not guess whether Aquila or Priscilla wished to be considered the actual and only author of the letter, and which of the two, who everywhere else in the N.T. form an inseparable pair, was intending soon to visit them without the other consort. While the information is given that Timothy will travel in company with the author, there is lacking in xiii. 19, 22 f. the much more necessary information that Priscilla, whose name could not have been wanting here (cf. 1 Thess. ii. 18; 2 Cor. x. 1), was planning shortly without Aquila to visit the readers, and the explanation why this was so. (2) It is inconceivable that a Jewish artizan, and especially his wife, who, according to Acts xviii. 3, regularly shared the work of her husband, should have possessed a rhetorical culture, like that of which Heb. gives evidence. (3) This hypothesis explains no better at least than the Apollos-hypothesis the disappearance of the true tradition (in opposition to Harnack, 24, 32, 38). The prejudice against the thought that the rôle of a Church teacher should fall to a woman as co-author of the letter, could at all events have led to the striking out of her name from the opening greeting, if indeed Hebrews ever had a greeting. If, however, an intentional omission of the "Address" (above, pp. 311, n. 12, 312 f.) is not to be considered as possible, as also Harnack seems to realise (16, 21), it is therefore not conceivable by what other means the names of both authors, or the name of Priscilla should have been "suppressed." Memory cannot be controlled by force; its gradual extinction is a process of nature. The latest hypotheses, according to which Aristion is said to be the author both of Mark xvi. 9-20 and of Heb. (Chapman, Revue. Bénéd. 1905, pp. 50-62) will scarcely need to be seriously controverted even when the promised proofs appear in full. A μαθητὴς τοῦ κυρίου, such as Aristion was, according to the evidence of his disciple Papias (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 4, cf. Forsch. vi. 138 ff., 218 ff.) could not have written Heb. ii. 3 f.

IX.

THE FIRST THREE GOSPELS AND ACTS.

§ 48. THE UNWRITTEN GOSPEL.

THE writings investigated up to this point have been, without exception, letters. Some of these (Ephesians, James, 1 and 2 Peter, Jude, Hebrews) were found not to be letters in the strict sense in which nearly all that we possess from Paul's hand are, but gave the impression, rather, of a written sermon or of an essay. Still in every instance what the absent teacher wrote was intended for a definite circle of readers in the same locality, predominantly of the same origin, and living under similar conditions. In these writings we found repeated reference to other Christian writings belonging to the same class. From Paul himself we learned of other letters of his, which have not come down to us, written to the Corinthians and Philippians, also of a letter which the Corinthian Church had sent to him (vol. i. pp. 261, 524 f.). In 2 Pet. iii. 15 we learned of a letter of Paul's to the Jewish Christians in Palestine, which has not come down to us, and in 2 Pet. iii. 1 of an epistle of Peter's to the same readers, now lost. Furthermore, it was clear from 2 Pet. iii. 16 that numerous letters of Paul's were read outside the circle of readers for which they were originally intended, and that Peter himself had read not a few of these (above, pp. 198 f., 209, 274 f.). In agreement with this last statement is the fact that 1 Peter betrays familiarity on the part of its author with Romans and Ephesians (above,

p. 176 f.); while Jude and the author of Hebrews appear to have been acquainted with Romans (above, pp. 279, 291, 365, line 2 ff. Paul had read James when he wrote to the Romans, and he took cognisance in his letter of its peculiar teaching (vol. i. 126 f., 428 f.). We saw that 1 Peter was likewise influenced by James (vol. i. 133; ii. 186, n. 3). Jude appeals to the authority of 2 Peter, although he does not mention the author by name, but characterises him merely as an apostle (above, pp. 250 f., 266 f.). From what we learn in 2 Pet. i. 13–15 and Jude 3 of the literary intentions of these two authors, we conclude that their writings were to be in part letters and in part more comprehensive didactic compositions, but that they were still to retain the essential character of letters (above, pp. 199 f., 242).

The question arises whether during this whole period there was no other form of Christian literature in existence—in particular, whether what Jesus had “done and taught” (Acts i. 1) was committed to writing quite as little as the revelations of the prophetic spirits in the Churches. Jesus’ words and deeds certainly could not have been forgotten, and the existence of a comprehensive body of gospel literature is of itself sufficient proof that the recollection of both was fostered in many ways. Much that Jesus desired to be left unpublished during His earthly ministry His disciples were to proclaim in all the highways and upon the house-tops. What they had experienced in fellowship with Him they were to testify openly before the world (John xv. 27; Acts i. 8, 22; Matt. x. 27; Acts x. 39, 42). His words, which are to outlast the world (Matt. xxiv. 35; Mark xiii. 31; Luke xxi. 33; John vi. 68), which taken separately are words of God, and which in their totality constitute God’s Word (John xvii. 8, 14, 17).—particularly His commands and prophecies,—they were not merely to lay up in their own hearts and to exemplify throughout their whole life (Mark iv. 20, xiii. 23; Luke viii. 21; John viii. 31, 51, xiv. 15, 21, 23, 26, xv. 7, 10, xvi. 4, 14 f.), but were to impart to others also. And they were to do this because what Jesus says to them applies to all men (Mark xiii. 37; Matt. x. 27, xxviii. 20). In fact, without proclamation of the deeds, the sufferings, and the resurrection of Jesus the missionary preaching was impossible, and teaching within the Church necessitated that the sayings of Jesus be recalled. Nor could one of these functions ever be fulfilled without in some way involving the other. So far as we are able to form a conception from Acts ii.-x. of the missionary preaching among the Jews and Jewish proselytes in Palestine, it was possible during the first years, at least, to take for granted a certain familiarity with the gospel history. The preachers needed only to recall it in order to set it at once in its true light. But even when recalled in this way the principal events of Jesus' public ministry as preacher and miracle-worker, from the days of the Baptist until the crucifixion, were brought out and made the basis of the testimony regarding His resurrection and second coming (n. 1). Among the Jews of the diaspora and the Gentiles, however, not even acquaintance with the main features of the history of Jesus' life could be presupposed. In the case of such hearers even these had to be imparted (n. 2). Here also the missionaries appear to have begun their historical account with the preaching and baptism of John (n. 1). Naturally the chief emphasis was laid upon the death on the cross and the resurrection, but the missionaries could not preach about these facts without making statements about Jesus' place in the history of His people, His Davidic descent,—which was the presupposition of His appearance as the Messiah,—His submission to the Jewish law, His activity as a preacher of the kingdom of God, and an undaunted witness to the truth,—which brought upon Him the deadly hatred of His own people,—the truly human life which He lived in spite of all the halo of miracle gathered about it, and His sinlessness. Where one who had seen and heard Jesus appeared quite outside of Jewish circles among the Greeks, and proclaimed the gospel to the latter, those who became converts must have been eager to learn the whole truth about Jesus' life,—a desire which must have been satisfied by the missionaries (cf. 1 John i. 1–4, iv. 14). Nor could the elementary regulations of Church life and religious worship be established in the newly founded Churches without reference to what Christ had prescribed and instituted. How far Paul went into the details of Jesus' life and sayings in his missionary preaching we are unable to determine from the scanty hints of Acts and the references to it in his letters, which are always incidental (n. 3).

That abundant details of this character were not wanting, is evident from the very necessity which every intelligent missionary must have felt who desired to arouse faith in the Founder of a religion and enthusiastic love for a Saviour on the part of hearers who had never heard of this person before. Furthermore, the expression "gospel of Christ," so frequently used by Paul to characterise the gospel preached by him, rightly understood (n. 2), shows that Paul always remained conscious of the connection of all true preaching of the gospel with what Jesus Himself had preached and taught (Rom. xvi. 25). Though Paul's position in this regard was not so favourable as that of the personal disciples of Jesus, it is not to be overlooked that, quite apart from his visits to Jerusalem, which were always short, Paul from his conversion in 35 A.D. onwards frequently had intercourse, lasting for years, with earlier members of the mother Church. Thus, during his three years' stay in Damascus, which was only temporarily interrupted by a journey into the dominion of Aretas, and the six or seven years when he was engaged in teaching in the Antiochian Church,—the nucleus of which consisted of refugees from Jerusalem,—there were abundant opportunities of this kind. On his missionary journeys he was accompanied and supported in his preaching by persons who had been members of the mother Church in the early stages of its growth, at first by Barnabas and Mark, later by Silas, which arrangement was manifestly not accidental, but due to careful forethought. At the time of his Roman imprisonment also, we find him again in close relations with Mark, together with a certain Jesus Justus, who was his companionable fellow-labourer in missionary work (Col. iv. 10 f.); and again in his last imprisonment the personal ministrations of this native of Jerusalem seemed to him to be almost as indispensable as the books which he had left behind (2 Tim. iv. 11-13). It is clear, therefore, that the Churches founded by Paul and his helpers did not lack from the first opportunity and means of becoming acquainted with the history of Jesus' life in its details, and their members could not have been like other men if they failed to make diligent use of this material. If, in the judgment of the greatest of the missionaries to the Gentiles, the missionary preaching was to continue to be the "gospel of Christ," in spite of the changes effected in the gospel by the death, resurrection, and exaltation of Jesus, and to retain a close relation to Jesus' own preaching, the view held regarding the relation of instruction within the Church to Jesus' teaching must have been at least equally strict (n. 2). It is "the word of Christ" Himself which is to be fully appropriated in the Church where it has found permanent lodgment, and to be reproduced in various forms of teaching and in spiritual song (Col. iii. 16). It is the very "words of our Lord Jesus Christ" which are to be followed in all religious teaching and all sound discourse designed for the instruction of the Church (1 Tim. vi. 3). In the passage in which Paul boasts that at the time of the founding of the Ephesian Church he had preached the whole counsel of God without omissions, and that he had given them besides full instruction how they ought to walk, he counts it a part of his work also that he exhorted them to remember the words of the Lord Jesus, one of which he quotes (Acts xx. 27, 35; cf. GK, i. 916, n. 1). Though unable to distinguish sharply between what was communicated originally with the missionary preaching and what was imparted later, we do, nevertheless, recognise that very early a considerable body of information concerning the history and sayings of Jesus had been circulated in Gentile Christian (n. 4) and Jewish Christian (n. 5) circles. Though, on account of the meagreness of the sources, no cautious investigator would venture an opinion as to what parts of the gospel tradition familiar to us were unknown in the Churches between 50 and 80, nevertheless it is clear that parts of the tradition then current in the Church were not embodied in the canonical Gospels (n. 4 under i. 8, 12 c, e, f, ii. 1; n. 5 under i. 13). It is also to be noticed at this point that, judging from the facts disclosed by a comparison of our Gospels with the tradition which the other N.T. writings show to have been current in the Church, the claims of the first three Gospels to be an accurate or even full reproduction of the traditions concerning Jesus' deeds and sayings current in the apostolic Church are no greater than those of the Fourth Gospel (n. 4 under i. 10, 11, ii. 5; vol. i. 121 f.).

It is a peculiar though undeniable fact that, apart from the Gospels and the first sentence of Acts, which connects it with the Gospel, and with the single exception of 1 John i. 4 (§ 70)—and this is not altogether clear—there is nothing to show throughout the literature of the N.T. that the memory of Jesus' life and words in the Church was aided by written records of the same. "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus" (Acts xx. 35); "Keep His word and testimony, His commandment and teaching, which ye have heard from the beginning" (e.g. 1 John ii. 5, 7); "Remember the command of the Saviour transmitted and taught to you by your missionaries" (2 Pet. iii. 2, ii. 21; above, p. 210, n. 1): so we read everywhere. What the witnesses saw of His life and heard from His lips they preach to others, that they might come to believe and to love Him whom they had not seen and heard (1 John i. 1-3, 5, iv. 14; 2 Pet. i. 16-18; Heb. ii. 3; cf. 1 Pet. i. 8, 12, v. 1; above, p. 147 f.). The great missionary to the Gentiles, who did not belong to the circle of Jesus' disciples, did not fail when occasion required to say to his converts in so many words, that he had delivered to them the account of Jesus' life and words, when he preached to them, just as it had been handed down to him, the gospel on which their faith was founded. The tradition spread by Paul in his work as a missionary and organiser of Churches came from the Lord Himself, whose words and life were the theme of his preaching. Nevertheless he received his knowledge of both through men (n. 6) quite as much as the Churches to whom he brought it; and when he desires to substantiate the trustworthiness of this tradition, he does not appeal to a book or to several books whose credibility is acknowledged, but to the Twelve and the hundreds of witnesses still living (1 Cor. xv. 5-7).

The opinion which arose in the third century, that where Paul speaks of "his gospel" he has a book in view, possibly Luke's Gospel (n. 7), no longer requires refutation. Throughout the whole N.T., even in Rev. xiv. 6 and Mark i. 1, the word εὐαγγέλιον means the oral proclamation of God's plan of salvation as made known and realised by Jesus; not until after the beginning of the second century do we find the word used to designate written records of the gospel history. But of the existence of such records, if we leave the Gospels out of account, there is no evidence whatever anywhere in the N.T. with the exception of Acts i. 1 mentioned above, and, if it be insisted, 1 John i. 4. Still, too much weight is not to be laid upon this fact. In the first place, we must remember that in antiquity books were much more frequently read by a single person to a large body of hearers than in modern times, and in this way were made known to many. Private reading was confined for the most part to the learned. It happened even in the realm of heathen literature that where one person gained his knowledge of a book by reading, often hundreds became acquainted with it through hearing, which was still more true on Christian soil in the Churches for whose use primarily the Gospels, like the other N.T. books, were written (n. 8). Therefore it is impossible, on the basis of the statements which represent the Christians of the apostolic age as receiving their information about Jesus' words and deeds only through hearing, to conclude at once, and for the whole period covered by the N.T. documents, that the anagnost, i.e. the lector, who read to them, was not one of those through whom they received this information. In the second place, we still meet such formulæ as "remember the words of the Lord Jesus," even when there is no longer any question not only as to the existence of the Gospels, but also as to their use in religious worship (n. 9). And there are times even at present when the preacher makes use of the same expression. The only thing that can be concluded from the preceding observations is that, during the lifetime of Paul and Peter, the beginnings of gospel literature which may have been in existence were without perceptible influence upon the life of the Church, and that, until toward the end of the first century, the gospel literature then existing, or in process of formation, was not regarded as the chief source from which the Church was to derive its knowledge of the words and deeds of Jesus—at least in regions where there were persons still living who had seen and heard Him.

The tradition regarding the origin of our Gospels places them all later than the year 60. And this tradition must appear a priori credible when it is borne in mind that in a later age the desire for trustworthy information about Jesus, together with the circumstance that these four books were the only sources from which such information was to be had, must have produced a disposition to furnish these books, which came more and more to be treated as sacred original documents, with every possible guarantee of their trustworthiness, and to put back their composition as close as possible to the facts which they recorded. The Protevangelium of James, which was written before the middle of the second century, is represented as having been written directly after the death of Herod, when Jesus was still a child (GK, ii. 775). The apocryphal literature connected with the name of Pilate, the beginnings of which belong to the same period, purports to be based upon an official report of Pilate contemporaneous with Jesus' trial and death, as shown by its ancient title (Justin, Apol. i. 35, 48, τὰ ἐπὶ Ποντίου Πιλάτου γερόμενα Ἀκτα). The tradition regarding the origin of our Gospels, which goes back at least as far as the time when these apocryphal accounts were written, and puts the first steps in their preparation thirty or more years after Jesus' death, stamps it as essentially genuine. Independently of this, however, the tradition is confirmed by the silence of the other N.T. writings regarding the existence of a gospel literature. That this generation (from 30 to 60 A.D.), living as it did in constant expectation of Jesus' return, should have taken little thought of the coming generations for whom the memory of the gospel history must be preserved, is less strange than that men should have felt so long that the necessities of the present could be met without written records of Jesus' words and deeds. In comparison with the multitude of those who wished and had to know more of the details of Jesus' earthly life, the number of original witnesses who could narrate what Jesus had said and done was none too great to begin with, and grew less with every decade. Moreover, must not the original witnesses themselves have felt the necessity of giving their own memory the definite support which the recollection of a large number of sayings heard only once, and of a multitude of events differing in character and following in rapid succession, usually finds only in written records? The single express statement which we have about numerous writings treating of the gospel history, composed before at least a part of the gospel literature that has come down to us (Luke i. 1), contains no indication of the date when these writings began to make their appearance, nor is anything definite said about their purpose and character. Notes which were intended simply to meet the personal necessities of those who prepared them can be meant or at least included. The statement can cover also such books as Luke's own Gospel, designed primarily for individuals who desired fuller information concerning Jesus. The only thing that the negative testimony of the other N.T. writings does exclude is the possibility that the Gospels were regularly read in the religious services of the Christians before the death of Peter and Paul, and the possibility that they were employed as the basis for instruction in the Church. Accordingly we are free to use our imagination and to fill even the period before 60-70 with manifold beginnings and attempts in the direction of a gospel literature. However, it is to be remembered that the imagination has a place in historical science only in so far as it serves to set in a clear light the possibility and probability of the presuppositions which are demanded by the actual facts. Nor has the imagination any rights over against a tradition, be this as meagre as it may, until it is shown that the latter is without basis in fact, and therefore false. Finally, the imagination must guard itself carefully against postulates which have possible support only in the narrow experience of scholars whose vision is bounded by the four walls of a study.

1. (P. 369.) Acts ii. 22, καθὼς αὐτοὶ οἶδατε; x. 37, ὑμεῖς οἶδατε τὸ γενόμενον ῥῆμα καθ' ὅλης τῆς Ἰουδαίας. The apostolic testimony, strictly considered, begins with the fact of the resurrection of Jesus (Acts ii. 32–36, x. 40–43. Cf. Luke xxiv. 18–21, Acts iii. 13b–15a, on the one hand, and Acts iii. 13a, 15b, iv. 2, 10, v. 30–32, 2 Pet. i. 16 [see above, p. 203 f.] on the other). That the preaching of conversion confined itself to the public ministry of Jesus, which in turn was connected with the work of John the Baptist, appears most clearly in Acts x. 37 f., but also in ii. 22, and indirectly in i. 22. The preaching among the dispersion was essentially the same in this respect (xiii. 23–25).

2. (Pp. 369, 371.) The difference between the preaching outside of Palestine and that in Palestine (see note 1) is well characterised (Acts xiii. 23–29). We get also an expressive phrase in τὰ περὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ (Acts xviii. 25, xxiii. 11, xxviii. 31), which does not differ in conception from the corresponding usage with reference to other persons (Eph. vi. 22; Col. iv. 8; Phil. i. 27; cf. Luke vii. 3, 17, xix. 9, xxiv. 19). It is the events, circumstances, and historical conditions that have to do with Jesus which, in the missionary proclamation, naturally become the subject not of communication merely, but of a preaching which aims at conviction and of an instructional discussion (Acts xviii. 25, xxviii. 23, viii. 12), forming thus an element, and a very essential element, in the εὐαγγέλιον θεοῦ . . . περὶ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦ (Rom. i. 1, 3). Quite different from this designation of the gospel in terms of the centre about which it moves is the phrase τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Gal. i. 7; Rom. i. 9. 16 (the reading in this instance not well supported), xv. 19; 1 Cor. ix. 12, 18; 2 Cor. ii. 12, ix. 13, x. 14; Phil. i. 27; 1 Thess. iii. 2; cf. 2 Thess. i. 8. The translation, “Evangeliium von Christo” [Gospel about Christ], upon which Luther ventured only in Mark i. 1, Rom. i. 9, 16, but avoided everywhere else, is to be rejected—(1) because it is the construction with περὶ which Paul uses (Rom. i. 3; cf. 1 John i. 1) to express the thought that Christ is the chief object of the Christian preaching (cf. 1 Cor. i. 23, xv. 12; 2 Cor. i. 19, iv. 5, xi. 4; Phil. i. 15; Acts v. 42, viii. 35, ix. 20, xix. 13); (2) because the analogy of εὐαγγέλιον τοῦ θεοῦ (Rom. i. 1, xv. 16; 2 Cor. xi. 7; 1 Thess. ii. 2, ii. 8, 9; 1 Pet. iv. 17), which cannot possibly mean the glad tidings of the existence or the attributes of God, is decisive against construing τοῦ Χριστοῦ in connection with εὐαγγέλιον as objective genitive, and for its construction as subjective genitive. The gospel can be named from God as the original author and sender of this message of salvation, and also from Christ as its first herald in the world. In Mark i. 1 this latter usage may be inferred directly from the opening (i. 14) of the narrative thus entitled, but it also holds good in general for the simple reason that the gospel was first proclaimed by Jesus (Heb. ii. 3, iii. 1; cf. i. 1). The “preaching of Jesus” Himself, to which Paul refers in Rom. xvi. 25, is the original form of the gospel, which no more ceases to be the gospel of Christ, because, after His departure, it is proclaimed by the apostles and other sinful men, than it ceases to be the gospel or word of God. (3) The same conclusion follows from the analogy of τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, 1 Cor. i. 6 (cf. 2 Tim. i. 8), which does not, and cannot grammatically, mean anything different from τὸ μαρτύριον τοῦ θεοῦ, 1 Cor. ii. 1; and, further, from the equivalence of ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου and τοῦ θεοῦ as a designation of the gospel (cf. Acts viii

25, xiii. 48, 49, xv. 35, 36, xix. 20; 1 Thess. i. 8; 2 Thess. iii. 1, on the one hand, and Acts iv. 31, vi. 2, 7, viii. 14; 1 Cor. xiv. 36; 2 Cor. ii. 17, iv. 2; Col. i. 25, on the other), where there can be no question that the gospel, like every revelation and proclamation similarly designated (Rom. ix. 6; Heb. iv. 12; Ps. xxxiii. 4; Hos. i. 1, iv. 1; Amos v. 1), can be called the word of God or of the Lord simply because in the last analysis God or the Lord is the speaker in it. (4) That every genitive of a person with εὐαγγέλιον is with Paul himself a subjective genitive (or genitivum auctoris), is shown further by τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου (Rom. ii. 16, xvi. 25; 2 Tim. ii. 8; cf. 1 Cor. ii. 4) or ἡμῶν (2 Cor. iv. 3; 1 Thess. i. 5; 2 Thess. ii. 14). When Paul, Rom. xvi. 25, sets τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ beside this gospel of his as a second norm, the preaching of Jesus Himself and the truth which He preached are undoubtedly intended (cf. Matt. iv. 17; Mark i. 14; Luke iv. 18; also vol. i. 412, n. 17). While the gospel of Paul and the preaching of Jesus can be mentioned side by side as two things to be historically distinguished, all true gospel, no matter who proclaims it or to whom it is proclaimed (Gal. ii. 7), falls in the category of the one indivisible εὐαγγέλιον Χριστοῦ (Gal. i. 7, ZKom, Gal. 47 f.)—the gospel of Christ as its author and its first herald. (5) The necessity of this interpretation becomes especially clear in 2 Thess. i. 8: τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ, where the use of the proper name "Jesus" (cf. Acts xx. 35) shows that the apostle had in mind the historical appearance of the Lord as the pioneer preacher of the gospel. Nevertheless here, as in the passages where the εὐαγγέλιον Χριστοῦ is mentioned, the reference is not directly, as in Rom. xvi. 25 (τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰησοῦ) to the preaching of Jesus in the historic past, but to the one message of salvation brought into the world by the preaching ministry of Jesus, and afterwards further proclaimed by His apostles and others. This message can be named from its historical origin and author, because on the lips of the apostles it is not essentially different from the message of the great First Apostle (Heb. iii. 1), the beginner of the preaching (Heb. ii. 3). (6) In the same way, too, are we to understand ὁ λόγος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, Col. iii. 16, and the similar plural term, 1 Tim. vi. 3. It is evident that this can as little signify "the word about Christ," as can ὁ λόγος τοῦ κυρίου, where it denotes the gospel (see under (3) above), or a single word of Jesus (Acts xx. 35; 1 Thess. iv. 15; cf. vol. i. p. 223, n. 4). It is rather the content of that which Jesus first proclaimed, and which has since lived on in the Christian community—gospel and commandment, promise and teaching. Where it is necessary to emphasise—as he must emphasise again and again—the application of Christ's word to the life of the believers and the Churches, Paul calls it the commandment outright (1 Tim. i. 5, 18, vi. 14). In this he does not differ from the older apostles (1 John ii. 7, iii. 23, iv. 21; 2 Pet. iii. 2). He could not speak in this way, if he did not know as well as they that Jesus Himself had given this command or law (Gal. vi. 2, τὸν νόμον τοῦ Χριστοῦ; cf. 1 Cor. vii. 10, 25, ix. 21); for men's commands and doctrines have no weight in the Church of Christ (Col. ii. 22; Tit. i. 14). In view of all this, it should be self-evident—and may be mentioned here—that ἡ μαρτυρία τοῦ Ἰησοῦ in Rev. is primarily the testimony which Jesus Himself, the true witness (Rev. i. 5, iii. 14), gave during His life on earth (cf. John iii. 11, v. 31, vii. 7, xviii. 37; 1 Tim. vi. 13). This fundamental meaning occurs in Rev. xix. 10; in i. 2 it is transferred to that which the exalted Jesus testifies to the Churches through John. At the same time, this passage shows that that which God has spoken or Jesus has testified does not cease to be considered God's word and Jesus' testimony where it is represented that, on this ground, a man acknowledges this word and testimony, and bears witness to it before others. Even when thus mediated by men (Rev. i. 9, xii. 17, xix. 10a, xx. 4; cf. vi. 9, ii. 13, xvii. 6) it is the testimony of Jesus, as it is the word of God, though elsewhere it is spoken of as the testimony of the men who hold it and confess it before the world (Rev. xii. 11). Just as one may not translate ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ (Rev. i. 9, xx. 4; cf. i. 2), "the word or doctrine concerning God," so μαρτυρία τοῦ Ἰησοῦ may not be rendered "the testimony concerning Jesus." The derivation of all Christian preaching from the lips of Jesus Himself is very clearly affirmed in the Johannine Epistles (1 John i. 5; cf. i. 1, 3). The Christian teaching is the teaching of Christ Himself (2 John 9). The one all-inclusive command of God (1 John iii. 22-24, v. 2 f.) is the command and word of Christ (ii. 3-8).

3. (P. 370.) We have examples of the missionary preaching among the Jews of the dispersion, Acts xiii. 16-41, xxviii. 23-28, and a few hints, Acts xvii. 3, 7, 11, xviii. 5, 25, 28, xix. 8, 13. We cannot form a similar idea of the preaching addressed to the heathen from Acts xiv. 15-17, xvii. 22-32, for these were occasional addresses called forth by peculiar circumstances, and followed the missionary preaching; cf. Acts xiv. 9, xvii. 17. For Paul's support by helpers from Jerusalem, cf. the writer's Skizzen, 2te Aufl. S. 82-85. With regard to the content of Paul's missionary preaching and the instructions connected with it, more light is to be had from the occasional references in the Epistles, Gal. iii. 1; 1 Thess. i. 9 f., ii. 12, iii. 4, iv. 1 f., 6, 11, v. 2; 2 Thess. ii. 5, 15, iii. 6, 10; 1 Cor. i. 6, 17-25, ii. 1-5, iii. 1 f., 10 f., iv. 17, vi. 2 f., 9 f., ix. 21 f., xi. 2, 23-25, xv. 1-11; 2 Cor. i. 18-20 (ii. 14-iv. 6), v. 11, 18-21, xi. 2-5; Eph. iii. 4-12, iv. 20-24; Col. i. 5-7, 25-29, ii. 6 f., iv. 3; 1 Tim. i. 12-16, ii. 3-7 (iii. 15 f.), vi. 3, 12-16; 2 Tim. i. 8-11, 13, ii. 8 (iii. 10-17), than from Acts (see also Acts xvi. 21, xvii. 18).

4. (P. 372.) Paret, "Paulus und Jesus," JlfDTh, 1858, S. 1 ff.; Keim, Gesch. Jesu, i. 35 ff.; Roos, Die Briefe des Ap. Paulus und die Reden Jesu, 1887, where as an appendix, S. 250 ff., the relation of the other N.T. writings to the Gospels is discussed. These questions, especially with reference to the Fourth Gospel, are treated with more suggestiveness and penetration, if sometimes a trifle boldly, by P. Ewald, Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, 1890, S. 57-97, 142-160. Cf. further Feine, Jesus Christus und Paulus, 1902; Resch, Der Paulinismus und die Logia Jesu, 1904. Here only a brief statement of the material can be given, first from the Pauline Epistles, and, further, not only from the discourses of Paul in Acts, but also from 1 Pet., which is addressed to a circle of Churches founded by Paul and his associates, and from the Johannine Epistles and Rev., of which the same is true. Rom. and Heb. occupy a peculiar position, inasmuch as the former was addressed to the preponderantly Jewish Christian community in Rome, and the latter, some twenty years later, to a part of it consisting of Christians, who were Jews by birth. For the present purpose these also may be included here:—I. THE HISTORY OF JESUS: (1) His Davidic descent, Rom. i. 3 (as an element in the missionary preaching, cf. Acts xiii. 22 f., 32-37); 2 Tim. ii. 8 (as an element in the Church confession, cf. the writer's Das apost. Symb. 40, 42); Rom. xv. 12; Heb. vii. 14; Rev. iii. 7, v. 5, xxii. 16. (2) His entrance into the common life of men, Gal. iv. 4 (γενόμενον ἐκ γυναικός without mention of a human father, cf. the writer's Das Apost. Symb. 64); Rom. i. 3 (τοῦ γενομένου . . . κατὰ σάρκα, for interpretation see vol. i. 338, n. 8), viii. 3. 29; Phil. ii. 7; 2 Cor. viii. 9; Heb. ii. 9-18, iv. 15, v. 2, xii. 2 f.; 1 John i. 1, iv. 2 f.; 2 John 7. (3) His position under the law, Gal. iv. 4; presupposed, Gal. iii. 13; Rom. vii. 1, 4; Eph. ii. 15; Col. ii. 14. (4) His baptism with water, 1 John v. 6 ff., according to the most probable meaning of ὁ ἔλθων δι' ὕδατος and οὐκ ἐν τῷ ὕδατι μόνον. On this occasion, though not only then, God testified concerning His Son (v. 10, 11). Referred to in John i. 33 f., but narrated only in Matt. iii. 17; Mark i. 11; Luke iii. 22. (5) His sinless life in obedience to God, Phil. ii. 7 f.; 2 Cor. v. 21; Rom. v. 19; 1 Pet. ii. 22; 1 John ii. 6; Heb. iv. 15 (χωρὶς ἁμαρτίας), v. 8, vii. 26. (6) His preaching work in Israel, Rom. xv. 8, xvi. 25; Eph. ii. 17 (with reference to the Gentile world, cf. John x. 16, xii. 32; Matt. viii. 11 f.; Luke xiii. 29); Heb. i. 1 (see p. 338 above), ii. 3, iii. 1. (7) His institution of the Lord's Supper, 1 Cor. xi. 23-25, with which Luke xxii. 19 f. would correspond exactly, but for the omission of vv. 19-20 in accordance with the Western text. That this event occurred on the night in which Jesus fell into the power of His enemies, or was arrested (for no more than this is affirmed in παρεδίδετο, cf. Rom. iv. 25, viii. 32; Mark i. 14; Matt. iv. 12), accords with the synoptic Gospels, which alone report the institution; likewise the indication that it took place on the occasion of the Passover Supper (xi. 24, 25, εἰς τὴν ἐμὴν ἀνάμνησιν, twice strongly emphasised, cf. Ex. xii. 14; also x. 16, τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας). (8) The struggle in Gethsemane, Heb. v. 7 f., see above, p. 362. If this passage is taken to refer to the prayer on the cross, we obtain, at least, no greater correspondence with the Gospels; for we read, it is true, in Matt. xxvii. 46, Mark xv. 34, that Jesus prayed with a loud voice in the words of the Psalm, and in Matt. xxvii. 50, Mark xv. 37, Luke xxiii. 46, that with His last breath He once more cried aloud; but there is no mention of repeated, urgent request, with strong crying and tears, for deliverance or protection from death. An independent tradition, therefore, must be represented here. If Epiph. Ancor. xxxi. was right in asserting that in the supposably uncorrected MSS. of Luke xxii. 44 the words about sweat like drops of blood were preceded by the statement that Jesus wept aloud (ἐκλαυσε), this reading, which is otherwise unsupported, must have crept into some MSS. of Luke from Heb. v. 7, or else from an apocryphal source. But Epiphanius' appeal to Irenæus, who is said to have cited this phrase, casts suspicion upon his whole account; for Iren. iii. 22. 2 does indeed mention Jesus' weeping before the bloody sweat, but derives it from John xi. 35; while Epiphanius, as so often, by reading carelessly what lay before him, has for the first time come upon the interesting fact of which he informs us as of something new. Massuet (see in Stieren, p. 543) has not succeeded in defending him against Petavius. (9) His trial before the Sanhedrin, Acts xiii. 27 f. (cf. Matt. xxvi. 59 f.; Mark xiv. 55 f.; Luke xxii. 66 ff.); 1 Pet. ii. 23 (cf. John xviii. 22 f.; Matt. xxvi. 65 ff.; Mark xiv. 63 ff., xv. 4 f.). (10) His testimony before Pilate, Acts xiii. 28; 1 Tim. vi. 13 (John xviii. 37 corresponds most nearly, cf. Rev. i. 5, iii. 14). (11) His execution by the secular authorities, 1 Cor. ii. 8; the Jews the real murderers,

1 Thess. ii. 15, who besought Pilate to put Him to death, Acts xiii. 28. Then the crucifixion (cf. John xviii. 32), 1 Cor. i. 17-23, ii. 2; Col. ii. 14; Phil. ii. 8; 1 Pet. ii. 24, cf. Heb. vi. 6; in Jerusalem, Rev. xi. 8; more precisely, before the city gate, Heb. xiii. 12; shedding His blood, Rom. iii. 25, v. 9; Eph. i. 7, ii. 13; Col. i. 20; 1 Pet. i. 2, 19; 1 John i. 7, v. 6; Rev. i. 5, v. 9; Heb. ix. 12, 14, x. 19, 29, xii. 24, xiii. 20 (recorded only in John xix. 34, and to be inferred from John xx. 20, 25, 27, but not from Luke xxiv. 39); removal from the cross, Acts xiii. 29 (by the Jews? cf. Gosp. of Peter vi. 21, also Matt. xxvii. 57 ff.; Mark xv. 43 ff.; Luke xxiii. 50 ff.; John xix. 38 ff.); burial, 1 Cor. xv. 4; Acts xiii. 29, as an element in the missionary preaching—perhaps alluded to in Rom. vi. 4; sojourn in the abode of the dead, Eph. iv. 9; Heb. xiii. 20; Rev. i. 18 (also 1 Pet. iii. 19, iv. 6?). (12) His resurrection, as an element in the missionary preaching, 1 Cor. xv. 3-20; Acts xiii. 30-37, xvii. 3, 18, 31; and in Church confession, 2 Tim. ii. 8, cf. Rom. i. 4, iv. 24 f.; Gal. i. 1; Col. i. 18; 1 Pet. i. 3 (see p. 156 above), iii. 18, 21; Heb. vi. 2, xiii. 20; Rev. i. 5, 18. Details brought out are (a) τῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ τρίτῃ, 1 Cor. v. 4; (b) appearances during a somewhat extended period, Acts xiii. 31, cf. i. 3; 1 Cor. xv. 5-8; (c) an appearance to Peter—this as an item in the missionary preaching, which is not distinctly affirmed of the remaining instances, 1 Cor. xv. 5 (presupposed in Luke xxiv. 34, but narrated neither there nor elsewhere, nor referred to in Mark xvi. 9-13); (d) an appearance to the twelve apostles, 1 Cor. xv. 5 (probably identical with Luke xxiv. 36 ff.; John xx. 19-23); (e) an appearance to more than 500 brethren at once, 1 Cor. xv. 6 (otherwise not reported); (f) an appearance to James, 1 Cor. xv. 7 (not recorded elsewhere in the N.T.; in the Gosp. of the Heb. set back to the morning of the resurrection day, GK, ii. 700); (g) an appearance to all the apostles, 1 Cor. xv. 7 (perhaps identical with Matt. xxviii. 16-20, or with Acts i. 2-8; Luke xxiv. 44-51). (13) His exaltation to heaven or the right hand of God, Rom. viii. 34; Eph. i. 20; Col. iii. 1; Phil. ii. 9; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 1 Pet. iii. 22; Heb. i. 3, iv. 14, vii. 26; Rev. v. 6, ii. 26 f. (narrated only in Acts i. 9, implied Luke xxiv. 51, even according to the shorter text, cf. Acts i. 2; alluded to, John vi. 62, xx. 17).

II. WORDS OF JESUS. (1) Acts xx. 35, πάντα ὑπέδειξα ὑμῖν, ὅτι οὕτως κοπιῶντας δεῖ ἀντιλαμβάνεσθαι τῶν ἀσθενούντων μνημονεύειν τε τῶν λόγων τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ, ὅτι αὐτὸς εἶπεν “μακάριόν ἐστιν μᾶλλον διδόναι ἢ λαμβάνειν.” All the variations from this fundamental reading (p. 372 f. above) can be reasonably accounted for; thus τὸν λόγον in the Antiochian recension, and τοῦ λόγου in others (Sahidic and Vulgate versions, some min.), because only a single saying is cited. So also with the somewhat widespread form of the saying itself, “Blessed is the giver more than the receiver,” Peshito, and in indirect quotation, Ap. Const. iv. 3, Anast. Quest. 13, μακάριος, Cod. D (in the direct form), may be a trace of this alteration, so easily suggested by the recollection of the uniformly personal subjects of the Beatitudes. More important is the proposal of Lachmann and Blass to connect πάντα with what precedes. The Peshito has altered the whole construction by inserting a καὶ before πάντα and omitting ὅτι. It begins a new sentence with οὕτως, in which μνημονεύειν also depends upon δεῖ. A misunderstanding of the connection of this infinitive with ὑπέδειξα gave rise also to the alteration μνημονεύετε. Paul admonished the elders of his time to be mindful in the conduct of their office not of this single saying only, but of all the words of Jesus (cf. 1 Tim. vi. 3). That these constitute a suitable standard for them in particular is shown by the citation of a single saying. It is not found in our Gospels. That Luke quoted it "from the Apostolic Constitutions" (see above) was a bit of naive folly on the part of the pseudo-Euthalius (Zacagni, 420), which found currency as a marginal gloss. On the other hand, Clement, 1 Cor. ii. 1 (ἡδίων διδόντες ἢ λαμβάνοντες), may have known the saying from Acts, or independently of it. (2) 1 Cor. vii. 10, τοῖς δὲ γεγαμηκόσιν παραγγέλλω οὐκ ἐγὼ ἀλλὰ ὁ κύριος "γυνῆκα ἀπὸ ἀνδρὸς μὴ χωρισθῆναι . . . καὶ ἄνδρα γυνῆκα μὴ ἀφίεναι" (cf. Matt. xix. 6; Mark x. 9, for the phrase, Luke xvi. 18, ἀπολελυμένην ἀπὸ ἀνδρός). The words which the present writer has omitted stand outside the construction, and so do not belong to Jesus' command. That a traditional saying of Jesus is intended is shown by the reverse expression, 1 Cor. vii. 12, τοῖς δὲ λοιποῖς λέγω ἐγὼ, οὐκ ὁ κύριος, and vii. 25, περὶ δὲ τῶν παρθένων ἐπιταγὴν κυρίου οὐκ ἔχω. We are still in the same position to-day with regard to the marriage of hitherto unmarried persons and of widows (vii. 39 f.), and with regard to mixed marriages (vii. 12-16). Matt. xix. 10-12 also contains no command. (3) 1 Cor. ix. 14, οὕτως καὶ ὁ κύριος διέταξεν τοῖς τὸ εὐαγγέλιον καταγγέλουσιν ἐκ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου ζῆν. Cf. Matt. x. 9-11; Luke x. 7 f., for the phrase, Matt. xi. 1, διατάσσω τοῖς δώδεκα. 1 Tim. v. 18, ἄξιός ἐστις ὁ ἐργάτης τοῦ μισθοῦ αὐτοῦ, corresponds more closely with the wording of Matt. x. 10, and exactly with that of Luke x. 7, but it is not quoted as a saying of Jesus, and only apparently as Biblical; cf. above, p. 118 f. (4) 1 Cor. xi. 23-25, the words of Jesus at the institution of the Lord's Supper, see above, under i. 7. (5) Here may be added Col. ii. 11, ἐν τῇ περιτομῇ τοῦ Χριστοῦ, as Paul calls the ecclesiastical rite of baptism. This, of course, could not be described as the circumcision which Christ underwent (Luke ii. 21; Gal. iv. 4, cf. Rom. xv. 8), for this was just what was not to be imposed upon the Gentile Christians, but the circumcision commanded by Christ in distinction from that appointed by the law. Nor can τοῦ Χριστοῦ be regarded as a substitute for the adjective "Christian,"—a term not yet found in the apostolic vocabulary,—for Paul uses the formula ἐν Χριστῷ in that sense; as in the construction with τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, etc. (see above, p. 377 f.), it can only be genitive of subject and author. So Eph. v. 25 f.; Paul knows, consequently, a command of Jesus by which baptism was ordained in the Church. Such a command we find only in Matt. xxviii. 19 (cf. John iii. 22, iv. 1). 1 Cor. i. 17 is not inconsistent with this, for Paul is not speaking there of preachers in general, nor of the twelve apostles, but declares for his own part that the command to baptize was not included in his commission by Christ. To this declaration, indeed, he was impelled by those Jewish Christians who laid stress on the fact that they had been baptized by Peter (vol. i. 303, n. 11). Peter certainly was bidden to baptize, but not so Paul, according to all accounts. (6) 1 Thess. iv. 15, τοῦτο γὰρ ὑμῖν λέγομεν ἐν λόγῳ κυρίου κτλ. Paul not only wishes to have the eschatological teaching which follows received as reverently as if it were a word of the Lord, but will have it understood as the Lord's own word. This by no means guarantees a verbal citation, but only a conscious dependence on reported sayings of Jesus. If what is thus introduced seems to close with iv. 18, this is simply because the teaching up to that point is chiefly occupied with the answer to the questions of doubt (iv. 13); in fact, it is only in v. 1-5 that conscious dependence on the discourses of Jesus becomes unmistakable. The parallels have already been indicated in detail, vol. i. 223, n. 4. Suggestions of Johannine character are also present, especially v. 4f., οὐκ ἐστὶ ἐν σκοτει, ἡμεῖς ὡς κλέπτης καταλάβη· πάντες γὰρ ὑμεῖς υἱοὶ φωτός ἐστε, cf. John xii. 35f. This completes the references to specific words of Jesus in the writings designated. There are other passages, e.g. 1 Thess. iv. 2, which imply a reference to Jesus' words, though it cannot be directly proved. The profusion of thoughts and statements in the Epistles, especially 1 John, which may have been influenced by words of Jesus living in the recollection of the writers and the Churches, cannot be indicated here. The fancies of Resch, who sees in 1 Cor. ii. 9, ix. 10, xi. 26, Eph. v. 14, 1 Tim. v. 18 formal citations from a precanonical gospel (Agrapha, S. 162, 172, 178, 222), from which Paul is supposed to have drawn in many other passages also, have not become more worthy of belief through the more detailed elaborations in his later work, Der Paulinismus und die Logia Jesu. As it is only in the second century, with Ignatius, Barnabas, and Justin, that we find it gradually becoming customary to quote from the Gospels used in the Churches with γέγραπται, it is self-evident that Paul cannot have referred to a Gospel when he used this or a similar formula. Cf. also Ewald, Hauptproblem, 143f., 202–208; the writer's GK, ii. 790ff., and many other passages; Ropes, Die Sprüche Jesu, S. 8f., and the remarks there noted.

5. (P. 372.) In the writings designed for the Jewish Christians of Palestine (aside from Matthew), James, 2 Pet., Jude, and in the corresponding discourses in Acts i. 15–xi. 18, we find references to the following gospel material:—I. HISTORICAL: (1) Davidic descent, Acts ii. 30, and, indirectly, Acts iv. 25–27. (2) "That Jesus was of Nazareth," Acts ii. 22, iii. 6, iv. 10, vi. 14, x. 38, cf. xxiv. 5, xxvi. 9. (3) The continued intercourse of Jesus with His disciples, and His public ministry from (ἀπό) or after (μετά) the baptism by John, Acts i. 22, x. 37. In addition to His preaching (Acts x. 36), His miraculous work is also particularly emphasised, and viewed as a result of His anointing with the Spirit and power, x. 38, ii. 22 (cf. iv. 27; and for δέναμις, δόξα, ἀρετή, 2 Pet. i. 3, 16; above, p. 220, line 11 from end); the baptism of Jesus is to be recalled in this connection. Galilee is mentioned as the first field of this activity, x. 37, but "His deeds in Judea and Jerusalem" are also spoken of, x. 39, cf. 37. (4) The prediction of Jesus regarding the destruction of the Temple and of Jerusalem, and that in the form in which it is given, John ii. 19, and only assumed in Matt. xxvi. 61, xxvii. 40, Mark xiv. 58, xv. 29, evidently underlies Acts vi. 14; cf. also Jude 5; see above, p. 254. (5) The call and choice of the apostles by Jesus Himself, 2 Pet. i. 3; see above, p. 220f.; presupposed, Acts i. 17. (6) The Transfiguration on the mount, 2 Pet. i. 16–18, see above, p. 215ff. (7) Jesus' prediction of the martyrdom of Peter, 2 Pet. i. 14, see above, p. 212f. (8) The treachery of Judas, Acts i. 16ff., with peculiar details. (9) The crucifixion of Jesus, as the act of the Jewish nation, especially its rulers, who used the Gentile Pilate as a tool, Acts ii. 23, iii. 13, 17, iv. 10f., v. 30, vii. 52. (10) The choice between Jesus and Barabbas before Pilate, Acts iii. 13f. (11) Herod's participation, Acts iv. 27. (12) The resurrection from the grave, Acts ii. 24–32, iii. 13, 15, iv. 2, 10, v. 30, and that, too, on the third day, x. 40. (13) The appearances of the risen Christ, with whom the apostles ate and drank, Acts x. 41 (cf. i. 4?); this is not actually stated in the Gospels, as Luke xxiv. 41-43 speaks only of Jesus' eating before the disciples, and John xxi. 12 f. only of the disciples' eating before Jesus. It is on the ground of these appearances that they are witnesses to His resurrection, Acts ii. 32, iii. 15, v. 32. (14) The exaltation to heaven, Acts ii. 33-36, iii. 21, v. 31. II. WORDS OF JESUS are not explicitly cited. With regard to the echoes of them in James, see vol. i. 114, 121 f. That the apostles, in particular, transmitted the commands of Jesus also is shown 2 Pet. iii. 2, see above, p. 210. With regard to the reference to John xiii. 36, xxi. 18 f. in 2 Pet. i. 14, see above, p. 214. From Acts x. 42 it seems that the apostles were commissioned by the risen Christ to testify to the nation that Jesus was the divinely appointed judge of the living and the dead (cf. 2 Pet. i. 16, παρουσίαν; i. 4, ἐπαγγέλματα; iii. 9, ἐπαγγελία).

6. (P. 373.) The chief passages to indicate the form in which the gospel tidings were transmitted are 1 Cor. xv. 1-3 (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ὃ εὐηγγελισάμην ὑμῖν, ὃ καὶ παρελάβετε—παρέδωκα γὰρ ὑμῖν ὃ καὶ παρέλαβον) and 1 Cor. xi. 23 (ἐγὼ γὰρ παρέλαβον ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου, ὃ καὶ παρέδωκα ὑμῖν). From these it appears (1) that the παραδιδόναι of the apostle with regard to the gospel facts was included in the εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, as was an oral communication, like this εὐαγγελίζεσθαι and every other παραδιδόναι in the planting of the faith. Cf. on παραδιδόναι, παράδοσις, and the corresponding παραλαμβάνειν, 1 Cor. xi. 2; 1 Thess. ii. 2, 8 (μεταδοῦναι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον), ii. 13 (παραλαβόντες λόγον ἀκοῆς παρ' ἡμῶν), iii. 4, iv. 1 (παρελάβετε παρ' ἡμῶν), iv. 2 (εδόκαμεν ὑμῖν), iv. 11; 2 Thess. ii. 5, iii. 6 (τὴν παράδοσιν ἣν παρελάβοσαν παρ' ἡμῶν); cf. also the distinction between the later written communication and the earlier oral, 2 Thess. ii. 15, iii. 14; further, Rom. vi. 17 (vol. i. 374); Gal. i. 9; Col. ii. 6; Phil. iv. 9. It appears (2) that the earlier παραλαβεῖν on Paul's part was like the subsequent παραλαβεῖν of the Corinthians, that is, the hearing of oral παράδοσις; and (3) that, without prejudice to the correctness of Gal. i. 12, 16, which has to do not with the external details of the gospel history, but with the truth of redemption and the knowledge of Christ (cf. above, p. 352, on Heb. ii. 3), Paul obtained his acquaintance with the individual historical facts (τὰ περὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, see above, p. 377, n. 2), as the Corinthians did, from the narrations of others who knew them before him, and not through any extraordinary revelations from God or Christ, whether once, at his conversion (Gal. i. 16; 2 Cor. iv. 6), or oftener, subsequently (2 Cor. xii. 1 ff.). For, apart from the absurdity of such a superfluous revelation, a communication and instruction received directly from the Lord would necessarily have been expressed by παρέλαβον παρὰ τοῦ κυρίου (cf. 1 Thess. ii. 13, iv. 1; 2 Thess. iii. 6; 2 Tim. i. 13, ii. 2, iii. 14; Gal. i. 12; John i. 41, vi. 45, vii. 51, viii. 26, 40, xv. 15; Acts xx. 24). By ἀπὸ τοῦ κυρίου (which is unquestionably the correct reading in 1 Cor. xi. 23 against D, which alone has παρά, and G, which alone has θεοῦ) Paul means to say neither more nor less than that the tradition which he brought the Corinthians from three to five years before, and of which he now reminds them, is not only identical with that which he himself received after his conversion some twenty-two years earlier, but descended from Jesus Himself to him, or, to put it otherwise, can be traced back to Jesus Himself, with whose acts and words on the night before His death we have here to do. Who were the human media of transmission between Jesus and Paul may be gathered from the story of Paul's life (Acts ix. 17-30, xi. 25-30, xiii. 1; Gal. i. 17-ii. 14).

7. (P. 373.) Marcion probably wrote τὸ εὐαγγέλιον without μοῦ in Rom. ii. 16 (GK, ii. 516), and his disciples in the time of Origen and the centuries following did not emphasise this μοῦ, but the singular in Rom. ii. 16 and the assertion of the oneness of the gospel in Gal. i. 6-8, in order thus to lodge a complaint against the Church, which had not one Gospel, but several (tom. v. 7 in Jo., ed. Preuschen, p. 104. 24; Adamantius, Dial. c. Marc. ed. Bakhuyzen, p. 10 f.; Chrysost. in Gal. i. 6 f., Montf. x. 667). In these passages they thought of a book, and in their dispute with the Catholics now and then asserted, on this ground, that Paul was the author of their Marcionitic Gospel, after their claim that Christ Himself had written it had been disproved (Dial. 808; Caspari, Anc. p. 11 f.). Marcion himself was not responsible for this. On the other hand, Origen was already acquainted with the application of 2 Cor. viii. 18 to Luke as evangelist as an accepted and traditional interpretation (Hom. I. in Luc.: "Unde et ab apostolo merito collaudatur dicente 'cuius laus in evangelio est per omnes ecclesias.' Hoc enim de nullo alio dicitur et nisi de Luca dictum traditur." This is the proper punctuation, and not traditur, as introduction of the following citation from Luke i. 3; Delarue, iii. 933). This tradition is continued by Ephrem, Comm. in Ep. Pauli, 103; Jerome, Vir. Ill. vii.; Præf. Comm. in Matth.; Comm. in Ep. ad Philem. 24. Origen, too, does not dispute the right of the Marcionites to refer Rom. ii. 16 to a book (see above), and has no scruple in calling the Book of Luke "the Gospel praised by Paul" (in Eus. H. E. vi. 25. 6). Eusebius (H. E. iii. 4. 8) reports it as a common opinion that wherever Paul says κατὰ τὸ εὐαγγέλιόν μου, he means the Gospel of Luke. Cf. GK, i. 156, n. 3, 619, 655. This would apply to Rom. ii. 16, xvi. 25, 2 Tim. ii. 8, and logically also to τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἡμῶν, 2 Cor. iv. 3; 1 Thess. i. 5; 2 Thess. ii. 14; and this seems to have been Ephrem's opinion (ThLb, 1893, col. 471). The absurdities to which one would thus be led even in Rom. ii. 16, xvi. 25, hardly need to be stated. The idea that the missionaries immediately after their oral preaching handed the Gospels to their believing hearers may fit the time of Trajan, of which Eus. H. E. iii. 37. 2, speaks. To carry it back into the time of Paul and Peter is an anachronism. On the other hand, what is said of Bartholomew's bringing the Gospel of Matthew into India or South Arabia may be true (§ 54, n. 7).

8. (P. 374.) For a contrast of the one reading the book in the assembly and the many hearers, cf. Rev. i. 3. In 1 Tim. iv. 13, also, ἀνάγνωσις is not to be understood of private study, but of the public reading to the congregation which was included in the teacher's duty. The exhortation and other forms of teaching followed the reading (Luke iv. 20; Acts xiii. 15; Just. Apol. i. 67). Reading aloud in a circle of friends was a preliminary to publication, Plin. Epist. i. 13, ii. 19, iii. 7. 5, 18. 4, v. 3. 7-11, 12 (al. 13), 17, vi. 15, vii. 17. 7, viii. 12; Tac. de Orat. 9; Luc. Hist. Conscr. 9. A public reading, at which those interested gathered in large numbers, often served also to bring into more general notice books already published; cf. August. Retract. ii. 58.

9. (P. 374.) Clem. 1 Cor. xiii. 1, μεμνημένοι τῶν λόγων τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ; cf. xlv. 7; Polyc. ad Phil. ii. 3, cf. GK, i. 841; Orig. Exhort. Mart. 7, μνημονεὐαγγέλιον τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ, “ἐγὼ δὲ λέγω”; Vita Polyg. xxiv. 31, ed. Duchesne, pp. 30, 36. But the Christians are also expressly “reminded” of the contents of the O.T. Scriptures, with which they were well acquainted, Clem. 1 Cor. liii. 1.

§ 49. THE COMMON TRADITION IN THE CHURCH REGARDING THE ORIGIN OF THE GOSPELS.

The history of the Canon shows that by 130 at the latest our four Gospels were read in the Church services throughout the extent of the “Catholic Church” of that time (Ign. Smyrn. viii. 2). A definite opinion regarding the composition of these books by particular authors was equally common, as was also apparently a judgment regarding the time when they were written. We begin at once with a statement of this general tradition, and an estimate of its worth.

I. In the period between 180 and 220, Matthew and John, who were apostles, and Mark and Luke, disciples of apostles, were everywhere regarded as the authors of the four books which, even as early as 150, were commonly called Gospels (Just. Apol. i. 66, ἡ καλεῖται εὐαγγέλια). The occasional designation of the Gospels briefly as writings of the apostles, and of the evangelists as apostles (e.g. Iren. iii. 11. 9; GK, i. 154 ff.), is explained, so far as it requires any explanation at all, in the first place, by the fact that later writers, influenced partly by the analogous usage in the N.T., employed the title apostle, not only for the Twelve and Paul, but also to designate their helpers in preaching, as Barnabas, Luke, and others (Borsch. vi. 6–8). In the second place, it is explained by the fact that even the Gospels written by Mark and Luke were associated more or less intimately with their teachers, Peter and Paul (see below). It was only this tradition of the Church regarding the composition of the Gospels by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John which at that time found embodiment in the Greek MSS., and soon afterwards also in the MSS. of the Latin translation, even in the titles, i.e. the superscriptions, the subscriptions and column-headings of the separate Gospels,—the original form of which in all probability was κατὰ Ματθαῖον, κατὰ Μᾶρκον, etc. (n. 1). To be sure, the Manichean Faustus, who referred this κατὰ Ματθαῖον, etc., to the authors of the Gospels themselves, found in it, at the same time, the admission that the Gospels were not written by the apostles and followers of the apostles, but composed later by unknown persons, on the basis of alleged traditions, from the apostles and their disciples (n. 2). This opinion has been very commonly circulated up to the present time, only with the difference that it is no longer the evangelists themselves, but the Church gathering and circulating the Gospels, which is made to say in this peculiar way that the Gospels were not written by the four persons named, but by others writing in their spirit and under their names. The absurdity of this view is perfectly apparent. For, in the first place, the oldest witnesses for the κατὰ Ματθαῖον, namely, Irenæus, Clement, and the author of the Muratori fragment (n. 3), state as explicitly as do Origen and all the other later authors, that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John wrote the Gospels bearing their respective names. In the second place, the Church teachers of this period had received, and transmitted as trustworthy, the tradition that the ultimate source of Mark's Gospel was Peter's oral preaching (§ 51), and it was a very common supposition that a similar relation existed between Luke's Gospel and Paul. After this tradition regarding Mark's Gospel, which reaches back to the first century, had become general, a title intended to designate not the author of the Gospel, but the person who was its guarantee and final security, could only have read εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Πέτρον, not κατὰ Μᾶρκον. In the same way, κατὰ Παῦλον would have taken the place of κατὰ Λουκᾶν. Nor, on the other hand, is this κατὰ Ματθαῖον a book-title in the usual sense in which the term is used,

i.e. to designate simply the name of the author, but is to be explained, especially in its original form, without εὐαγγέλιον, from the peculiar character of these books and their place in the Church. Sayings of Jesus were cited generally with the formula, "The Lord says" or "said," or "The Lord says in the Gospel," or "It is written in the Gospel," or "The Gospel says." The name used in the apostolic age to designate the oral preaching of salvation was transferred to the documents in which later generations possessed this preaching, without any distinction being made between the separate books in which the one and only gospel of Christ was found. Indeed, the singular τὸ εὐαγγέλιον was probably used before the plural τὰ εὐαγγέλια as a general designation of all such writings. It was not until later that εὐαγγέλιον came to be used of a single writing of this character, and εὐαγγέλια to denote a number of them. When, however, it became necessary to say on what authority the claim was made that the Lord had spoken this or that single word in the Gospel, or that the Gospel testified this or that fact, following common usage, the expression was employed: "According to Matthew, the Lord said"; "According to John, on one occasion Jesus changed water into wine"; "The Gospel testifies, according to Mark, that Jesus was asleep in the ship upon a pillow." The apostolic conception of the uniqueness of the Gospel—a thought which the Church could not give up to the Marcionites (above, p. 385, n. 7)—produced necessarily in the Church the conception of the inseparable unity of the four Gospels. This idea explains not only these formulæ of citation, which were in use early, and which continued current also in the centuries that followed, but also such titles as κατὰ Ματθαῖον κτλ. These last presuppose, as a general title of the collection of Gospel writings, εὐαγγέλιον, in exactly the same way that πρὸς Ῥωμαίους presupposed that the single writing so entitled was part of a collection of Παύλου ἐπιστολαί.

Leaving out of account the denial of the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel, made at a comparatively late date, circa 170, by the Alogi, who declared it to be the work of the heretic Cerinthus, the tradition of the Church embodied in the titles of the Gospels was contradicted by no one in the second century, whether members of the Church or heretics. Justin calls the Gospels regularly "memoirs of the apostles," and remarks incidentally in connection with the account of Jesus' baptism, "The apostles of this our Christ (or His apostles, i.e. apostles of this our Christ) themselves have written this" (Dial. lxxxviii.); and on one occasion, when quoting something a parallel to which is to be found only in Luke xxii. 44, i.e. in a Gospel written by a disciple of one of the apostles, he uses the more exact expression, "It is written in the memoirs which I claim were composed by the apostles and by their disciples" (τῶν ἐκείνοις παρακολουθησάντων, Dial. ciii.). When we take into consideration also that in two other passages, where Justin introduces material peculiar to Luke's writings, he is careful not to say unconditionally that the Gospels were written by the apostles (Apol. i. 33, οἱ ἀπομνημονεύσαντες πάντα τὰ περὶ τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ.; Dial. cv., ὡς ἀπὸ τῶν ἀπομνημονευμάτων ἐμάθομεν), it is practically certain that, like Irenæus and all the later authors, Justin distinguishes between Gospels written by apostles and Gospels which originated from their disciples; and that he knew the third Gospel to be a work of the latter kind, which did not, however, prevent him from speaking generally of the "memoirs of the apostles" (GK, i. 476, 478 ff., 497). Even the Gnostics, the disciples of Valentinus and Marcion, never ascribed the Gospels used in the Church to any other authors than those to whom they were ascribed by the Church itself. The preparation of a collection of Gospel traditions, under the title Evangelium Veritatis, by Valentinus or his disciples (Iren. iii. 11. 9; GK, i. 748 ff.), implied a certain criticism of the Gospels used by the Church. They claim that in their common form the Gospels do not contain the full truth concerning Jesus and without knowledge of the secret tradition, their reports, which are contradictory in many points, cannot be correctly understood. Nevertheless, the Valentinians cite and comment upon the Gospels used in the Church as apostolic writings (GK, i. 732 f., 741 f., 744, n. 1). The Acts of Peter, written circa 170 by a member of the Valentinian school, or by a man in close touch with it (above, p. 73, n. 7), represent the book of the Gospel read in the Church assembly to be an apostolic work in the composition of which Peter also seems to have had a part. John xxi. 25 and 1 John i. 1-4 are adduced to show the need of interpretation and enlargement; but still no fault is found with the book directly, much less is it ascribed to less notable and later authors (Acta Petri, ed. Lipsius, p. 66 f.; GK, ii. 848, n. 2, 849 ff.). Others went further than the Valentinians in their criticism of the Gospels used by the Church, and claimed that much of a Jewish legalistic character was to be found in them. Still, they did not attack the tradition regarding their origin, but charged the apostles, whom they also accepted as authors of the Gospels, with having combined those elements that did not belong in the Gospel with the words of Jesus; and this was explained to be due to Jewish prejudices, by which they were still influenced, and to the misunderstanding of Jesus' manner of teaching, which was to a large extent accommodative (n. 4). Marcion, the boldest of these critics, who did not hesitate to criticise the tradition of the Church in other points, including literary matters (vol. i. p. 481), left the Gospels unassailed as regards their authorship. According to him, the apostles, who were of Jewish origin themselves, went so far as to deliberately falsify the Gospel in the books which they wrote, and this evil work was completed by others of kindred spirit through the insertion of later interpolations (GK, i. 591-594, 656-680). It cannot here be pointed out in detail how Marcion criticised the separate Gospels. The important remnants of his own Gospel extant show very clearly the thoroughgoing criticism which he thought necessary in the case of Luke's Gospel (GK, i. 680–718, ii. 455–494). He was thoroughly dissatisfied, not only with the details of this Gospel, which he could have cut out as later interpolation,—just as he had removed similar elements from the Pauline letters,—but with its whole plan and spirit as well, and so necessarily with its author. It is not, therefore, surprising that, in the single passage of Paul's letters (Col. iv. 14; Marcion rejected 2 Timothy altogether) where Luke is mentioned in a significant manner, he cut out the words ὁ ἰατρός ὁ ἀγαπητός, which expressed the author's esteem of Luke; so that Luke was left in this passage, as in Philemon 24, without any distinguishing characterisation, in the suspicious company of the ill-famed Demas (GK, i. 665, 705 f., ii. 528). Unless we are disposed to assume a very singular coincidence in explanation of this omission, it proves that Marcion knew Luke's Gospel, which he made the principal basis of his own Gospel, to be the work of Luke, the disciple of Paul, and that, far from attempting to dispute this tradition, he calumniated Luke, whom he, too, recognised to be the author of the Gospel current in the Church under his name. An oral tradition which was accepted so early and so universally by friend and foe alike as was the tradition that the Gospels used by the Church were written by the Apostles Matthew and John, and by Mark and Luke, the disciples of the apostles, hardly needs in support of itself a documentary tradition, which was later doubted.

The rise of this tradition from actual facts adequate to explain its origin is all the more necessary, because there is nothing in the books themselves which would necessarily have given rise to the unanimous tradition regarding their authors. In the case of the Gospels which pass under the name of Matthew and Mark, the personality of the authors is nowhere betrayed by the use of an "I." In Matt. ix. 9, x. 3, the name of the apostle to whom the first Gospel is ascribed occurs, but without any hint of the author's special interest in this apostle. The names of Mark, Luke, and John are not found at all in the books bearing their respective names. From the preface to the third Gospel and the "we" which occurs in several passages of Acts, it possibly could be inferred that this work in two parts was written by the disciple of an apostle, and by a man who was for a time a companion of Paul. But there is nothing in the work to lead one to suppose that the author was Luke rather than Titus. From several passages of the Fourth Gospel it is possible to infer that its author belonged to the apostolic circle; but, judging from our present knowledge of exegesis in the ancient Church, the cleverest scholar of that time could not have guessed that the author was John and not James the son of Zebedee, or Alphæus, or Bartholomew, or Simon Zelotes. It follows, therefore, that the tradition associated with the four Gospels from the time when they began to circulate, which was not once attacked during the entire period from 70-170 even by hostile critics, of whom these books had no lack even at this early date, is based not upon learned conjectures, but upon facts which at that time were incontrovertible.

II. Origen claims to have learned as tradition that the four Gospels of the Church were written in the order in which we are accustomed to find them in our Bibles (n. 5). In order to estimate properly this tradition and other statements which possibly could seem to us ambiguous, it must be borne in mind that in the ancient Church the separate parts of the collection of Gospels were arranged in various orders, and that until the third century the Holy Scriptures were not written in book form in our sense of the word book, i.e. in the form of a codex which could contain a large number of writings, but in rolls which were of limited though for the most part of quite uniform size. Books of the average compass of our Gospels, Acts, and Revelation required each a roll. The only way in which it was possible to indicate externally that a number of such writings belonged together was by placing the rolls belonging together in one holder or the same drawer of a bookcase (n. 6). At the time, when this method was in use there could be no question about the order of the Gospels. The transition began to be made from the roll to the codex in Origen's lifetime, and it is probable that he himself saw codices in which all four Gospels were written. But the order in which he found them seems to have been that which prevailed in Egypt for a long time, John, Matthew, Mark, Luke. Neither this nor any other arrangement could have had influence upon the tradition stated above regarding the order in which the Gospels were written, or upon the statements of writers before Origen's time, because the codex did not come into general use until during the course of the third century, and then only gradually. What Origen gives as a tradition, without any thought of a divergent view, is expressed also by Irenæus and the author of the Muratorian fragment without the least indication of uncertainty (n. 7). It continued to be the prevalent view in antiquity (n. 8), and it was this more than anything else which brought it about, that the arrangement of the Gospels familiar to us displaced more and more the other arrangements in the East from the beginning of the fourth century on, and after Jerome also in the West. But Irenæus makes further statements of a more definite character (n. 7). According to him, the time when Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel in Rome, and engaged in laying the foundations of the Church there, Matthew, who lived among the Hebrews, issued a gospel writing in their language. After the death of the two apostles, Mark, the follower and interpreter of Peter, delivered to the Church in written form what Peter had preached. Irenæus makes Luke's Gospel follow that of Mark, but without more exact indication of the time when it was written. So, with reference to the Fourth Gospel, he says merely that John issued the same after the appearance of the other Gospels, during his residence in Ephesus. According to Irenæus' idea of the chronology (above, p. 76), the Hebrew Matthew appeared between 61–66, Mark not long after 66 or 67, and Luke somewhat later; while John, who, according to Irenæus (v. 30. 3), wrote Revelation toward the end of Domitian's reign (died 96), and was still alive in the first years of Trajan's reign, 98–117 (Iren. ii. 22. 5, iii. 3. 4), must have composed his Gospel sometime between 75 and 95. It is to be noticed, further, that Irenæus had read Papias' work (v. 33. 4), which contained notices regarding the origin of Matthew and Mark, and, according to a doubtful report, also of John. With reference to Mark, Papias preserved a statement of his teacher, John, whom Irenæus held to be the apostle of this name, in which Mark is represented as having reproduced faithfully in his Gospel his recollections of Peter's narratives (§ 51). This statement seems to exclude the possibility that Mark wrote his Gospel in the vicinity where his teacher Peter was staying, or it seems to presuppose that Peter was no longer alive when Mark wrote. Since Irenæus uses, among other expressions of the teacher of Papias, the same peculiar phrase which the latter employed to express the relation in which Mark stood to Peter (ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου), it is perfectly clear that Irenæus was aware that his view regarding the time of the composition of Mark's Gospel was in agreement not only with that of Papias, but also with that of his teacher John the presbyter, who, according to Irenæus, was the apostle John. This is to be kept well in mind in considering a statement of Clement of Alexandria, which appears to be directly to the contrary (n. 9). Clement claims to have received from his teachers the tradition that the Gospels containing a genealogy of Christ were written before the others. Inasmuch as Clement reports, also in the same connection, that John wrote last, with the incompleteness or one-sided character of the other Gospels in view, his chronology agrees with the only other tradition handed down in making Matthew write first and John last. But his report varies from the other tradition—if his short statement is to be taken literally—in representing not only Matthew, but also Luke, which likewise has a chronology, to have been written earlier than Mark, which lacks such a chronology. In line with this variation would be the supposition that Clement, following some older source, placed the composition of Mark in the lifetime of Peter, and not, as Irenæus, after the death of Peter and Paul. This last difference would not be very considerable, since, according to the older tradition, Peter's stay in Rome was very brief, lasting at longest only a year (above, p. 165 ff.; above, pp. 68–84); and, on the other hand, Irenæus manifestly means to say that Mark issued his Gospel soon after the death of Peter and Paul. Following Clement, Mark would have to be dated in 63 or 64, while, according to Irenæus, it was written somewhere about 67. Inasmuch, also, as the tradition concerning the time and circumstances in which Luke's Gospel was written was not so definite as that concerning Mark, the opinion that Luke was written before Mark could have been merely an inference from the close of Acts. If it was assumed, as is still done by numerous scholars, that Luke wrote Acts immediately after the close of the two years (Acts xxviii. 30),—which would imply that his Gospel was written somewhat earlier,—and if the fact was also considered that Luke makes no note of Peter's residence in Rome at the time, or if it was known from the tradition that Peter did not come to Rome until after Paul's departure from the city (above, p. 165 f.), the conclusion must have been drawn that Luke wrote earlier than Mark, i.e. if the latter wrote his Gospel in Rome under Peter's supervision. But closer scrutiny of Clement's own words shows that he knows and says nothing of the completion of Mark's Gospel in Peter's lifetime (§ 51). In any case, Clement's isolated statement, which seems to say that Luke was written before Mark, must give way before the tradition which represents the two Gospels as having been written in the order Mark-Luke, not only because the witness for the latter view is incomparably stronger, but also because Clement's view might have been the result of critical reflection, which is inconceivable in the case of the opposing tradition. Learned hypotheses, however, no matter how old they may be, do not deserve the name of tradition; all that they show is the greater or less degree of intelligence possessed by those by whom they are made, regarding which it is not the purpose of this text-book to judge.

1. (P. 387.) Cod. B has as titles of the four Gospels and as headings of the column simply κατὰ Μαθθαῖον κτλ.; so also Σ in the headings of the columns, but in the subscriptions of Mark, Luke, John εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μάρκον κτλ. In the uncials the latter is the rule, only sometimes εὐαγγέλιον is written once instead of twice in succession, e.g. Cod. D, ed. Scrivener, p. 262, εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Λουκᾶν ἐπληρώθη· ἀρχεται κατὰ Μάρκον. So also in the Latin MSS. That the Latins did not originate their secundum Matthæum, but took it at first hand from the Greek MSS., is shown by the Greek form κατὰ Μάρκον, Lucam, etc., in the MSS. of the Old Latin version, Cyprian, Firmicus Maternus, Lucifer, Priscillian (GK, i. 164, n. 5; also the true Victorinus of Pettau, cf. Haussleiter in ThLB, 1895, S. 194; Marius Victorinus, contra Arianos, iv. 4, 8, 18, see note 3 below; Jerome, in Gal. iv. 4, Vall. vii. 449; Onomast., ed. Lagarde, p. 99. 23). The same is true of the Egyptian versions. The Syrians, on the other hand, in all forms of their translation of the Gospel have simply "of Matthew" instead of "according to Matthew." Tertullian also, who did not as yet have a Latin Gospel, avoided κατὰ, secundum.

2. (P. 387.) Faustus, in August. contra Faustum, xxxii. 2, appeals to the criticism which the Catholics also apply to the Mosaic law, and then inquires: "Soli filii putatis testamentum non potuisse corrumpi, solum non habere aliquid, quod in se debeat improbari? Præsertim quod nec ab ipso scriptum constat nec ab eius apostolis, sed longo post tempore a quibusdam incerti nominis viris, qui ne sibi non haberetur fides scribentibus, quæ nescirent, partim apostolorum nomina, partim eorum, qui apostolos scruti viderentur, scriptorum suorum frontibus indiderunt, adserentes secundum eos se scripsisse quæ scripserint. Quo magis mihi videntur injuria gravi affecisse discipulos Christi, quia quæ dissona idem et repugnantia scriberent, ea referrent ad ipsos et secundum eos hæc scribere se profiterentur evangelia, quæ tantis sint repleta erroribus, tantis contrarietatibus narrationum simul ac sententiarum, ut nec sibi prorsus nec inter se ipsa conveniant." Quite similarly again xxxiii. 3. The replies of Augustine, especially xxxii. 16, 19, 21, 22, xxxiii. 6-8, are also worth reading. Even Lagarde (Mittheilungen, iv. 109) could write: "The Gospels in the earliest sources bear the title, Gospels according to Matthew, etc.; except in the interpolated MSS., then, they are not given out as Gospels of Matthew," etc. It is not surprising that Jews like Hamburger, Jesus von Nazareth, 1895, S. 8, go still further in the same direction.

3. (P. 387.) Iren. i. 26. 2, 27. 2, iii. 11. 7, 8, 9, 14. 4; Clem. Pæd. i. 38; Strom. i. 145, 147; Quis Div. v; Hypotyp. on 1 Pet. v. 13; 1 John i. 1; Can. Mur. line 2 (GK, ii. 5. 21 f., 140). For the old formulas of citation, cf. GK, i. 162 f. On those in which the original significance of the κατὰ M. still appears (GK, i. 167, note 2), cf. also Victor. contra Arianos, iv. 18, "Idem (sc. Christus) tamen, ut ostenderet suam præsentiam semper, κατὰ Ματθαῖον sic loquitur" (Matt. xxviii. 19 f. follows); ibid. iv. 4, "colligamus igitur κατὰ Ἰωάννην dictum" (John iv. 24 follows). Also iv. 8, "in evangelio κατὰ Ἰωάννην" (Migne, viii. 1115, 1119, 1126). With regard to the conception of the unity of the Gospels, cf. GK, i. 161 ff., 185 f., 477-481, 842-848, ii. 21 f., 32 f., 40 f. In all transferences of this εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ, followed by name of a person, to other gospels, as κατὰ Πέτρον (Orig. tom. x. 17 in Matt.; Serapion in Eus. H. E. vi. 12), κατὰ τοὺς δώδεκα, κατὰ Θωμᾶν, Βασιλείδην, Μαρθίαν (Orig. Hom. 1 in Lucam, GK, ii. 627), these names denote the supposed writers, not the authorities standing behind them.

4. (P. 390.) Iren. iii. 2. 2, "apostolos enim admiscuisse ea, quæ sunt legalia, salvatoris verbis"; iii. 12. 12, "apostolos quidem adhuc quæ sunt Judæorum sentientes annuntiasse evangelium," have to do formally and primarily with the oral preaching and tradition; but, as the context of both passages shows (iii. 2. 1 before the words quoted, and iii. 12. 12 after), the intention is to show the object of the criticism directed against the Gospels by the heretics, and its justification from their standpoint. When Irenæus (iii. 1. 1) maintains, in opposition to this criticism, that the apostles did not preach and write the Gospel till after the resurrection of Jesus and the gift of the Spirit, he too connects the composition of the Gospels immediately with the oral preaching.

5. (P. 392.) Eus. H. E. vi. 25. 3, says of Origen: ἐν δὲ τῷ πρώτῳ τῶν εἰς τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον (al. add. εὐαγγέλιον), τὸν ἐκκλησιαστικὸν φυλάττων κανόνα, μόνα τέσσαρα εἶδέναι εὐαγγέλια μαρτύρεται ὧδέ πως γράφων 'Ὡς ἐν παραδόσει μαθὼν περὶ τῶν τεσσάρων εὐαγγελίων, ἃ καὶ μόνα ἀναντίρρητά ἐστιν ἐν τῇ ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανὸν ἐκκλησίᾳ τοῦ θεοῦ, ὅτι πρῶτον μὲν γέγραπται τὸ κατὰ τὸν ποτε τελώνην, ὕστερον δὲ ἀπόστολον Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ Ματθαῖον, ἐκδεδωκότα αὐτὸ τοῖς ἀπὸ Ἰουδαϊσμοῦ πιστεύουσι, γράμμασιν ἑβραϊκοῖς συντεταγμένον· δεῦτερον δὲ τὸ κατὰ Μάρκον, ὡς Πέτρος ὑφηγήσατο αὐτῷ, ποιήσαντα, ὃν καὶ υἱὸν ἐν τῇ καθολικῇ ἐπιστολῇ διὰ τούτων ὠμολόγησε φάσκων: "ἀσπάζεται ὑμᾶς ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτὴ καὶ Μάρκος ὁ υἱός μου." καὶ τρίτον τὸ κατὰ Λουκᾶν, τὸ ὑπὸ Παύλου ἐπαινούμενον εὐαγγέλιον τοῖς ἀπὸ τῶν ἐθνῶν πεποιηκότα· ἐπὶ πάνσι τὸ κατὰ Ἰωάννην. Cf. Origen's introduction to the Homilies on Luke in Latin and Greek, GK, ii. 625, 627; also tom. vi. 17 in Jo., ἀρξάμενοι ἀπὸ τοῦ Ματθαίου, ὃς καὶ παραδέδοται πρῶτος τῶν λοιπῶν τοῖς ἑβραίοις ἐκδεδωκέναι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, τοῖς ἐκ περιτομῆς πιστεύουσιν. Cf. tom. i. 6; as ἀπαρχὴ τῶν εὐαγγελίων, John is written not first but last (cf. i. 2), and before it Matt., Mark, Luke write in the order named.

6. (P. 393.) With regard to roll and codex, see GK, i. 60–83; v. Schultze in Greifswalder Studien, 1895, S. 149–158. For the order of the Gospels in the codices, cf. GK, ii. 364–375; for those especially in Egypt, and for Origen's, cf. ii. 371 ff., 1014.

7. (P. 393.) Iren. iii. 1. 1; in Greek, Eus. H. E. v. 8. 2: 'Ο μὲν δὲ Ματθαῖος ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις τῇ ἰδίᾳ αὐτῶν διαλέκτῳ καὶ γραφῇν ἐξήνεγκεν εὐαγγελίου, τοῦ Πέτρου καὶ τοῦ Παύλου ἐν Ῥώμῃ εὐαγγελιζομένων καὶ θεμελιούντων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. Μετὰ δὲ τὴν τούτων ἔξοδον Μάρκος, ὁ μαθητὴς καὶ ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου, καὶ αὐτὸς τὰ ὑπὸ Πέτρου κηρυσσόμενα ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν παραδέδωκεν. Καὶ Λουκᾶς δέ, ὁ ἀκόλουθος Παύλου, τὸ ὑπ' ἐκείνου κηρυσσόμενον εὐαγγέλιον ἐν βεβλίῳ κατέθετο. Ἐπειτα Ἰωάννης, ὁ μαθητὴς τοῦ κυρίου, ὁ καὶ ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος αὐτοῦ ἀναπεσὼν, καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ τῆς Ἀσίας διατρέφων. The differences between this Greek text of Eusebius and the Latin version of Irenæus are unimportant. The Ita Matthæus attaching to the preceding context (οὕτως ὁ Ματθαῖος with or without μέν and δὲ), Eusebius has not unnaturally changed. The Latin translator, on the other hand, has omitted the καὶ before γραφῇν, which is contrasted with the oral preaching of the apostles (cf. GK, ii. 22, n. 1). When later compilers (Cramer, Cat. i. 263, 264), following Irenæus or Eusebius' quotation from Irenæus, spoke of the time of the composition of Mark as μετὰ Ματθαῖον or μετὰ τὴν τοῦ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγελίου ἔκδοσιν, they were right. Very far from right, however, is the attempt to correct in accordance with this the text of Irenæus (see Eus. Hist. Eccles. ed. Heinichen, v. 8. 2, S. 198). The only reading which has been handed down, τὴν τούτων ἔξοδον, without mention of any place or locality which they left (cf. on the other hand, Ps. cxiv. 1; Sir. xl. 1; Heb. iii. 16), can only denote the death of Peter and Paul, cf. Luke ix. 31; 2 Pet. i. 15 (see above, p. 215, n. 5); Wis. iii. 2, vii. 6; Philo, de Carit. iv.; Epist. Lugd. in Eus. H. E. v. 1. 36. It is the same as ἔξοδος τοῦ βίου. Just. Dial. cv., or τοῦ ζῆν, Jos. Ant. iv. 8. 2 (189), or ἐκβάσις τῆς ἀναστροφῆς, Heb. xiii. 7, or ἀνάστασις, which also needs no nearer definition, 2 Tim. iv. 6 (cf. Phil. i. 23; Luke ii. 29 = the Modern Hebrew נָפַשׁ). E. Grabe, on Iren. iii. 1. 1 holds that the departure of Peter and Paul from Rome is meant; but, in the first place, the simple ἔξοδος could not be so understood by any reader (cf. Can. Mur. line 38, profectio Pauli ab urbe in Spaniam, Acts xviii. 1, iv. 15); and, second, so far as we know, Peter never left Rome at all after he had once entered the city (see above, p. 165ff.). For Paul, too, the period of his preaching in Rome, though it was not uninterrupted, came to its final close in his second imprisonment and execution, and not in a departure from the city (above, p. 66). Of other misinterpretations of the passage the present writer would mention only that of A. Camerlynck, St. Irénée et le Canon du NT, Louvain, 1896, pp. 27–31. In Camerlynck's opinion the words τοῦ Πέτρου—ἐκκλησίαν cannot denote the time of composition of Matt., because this construction would require an adverb (p. 31). What adverb we are not told: probably ἔτι, which Camerlynck gratuitously introduces into his paraphrase of the preceding words (Matthæus enonce en Judée, p. 30, which would be ἔτι ὡν ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις). By ἔξοδος he would understand the departure of Peter and Paul to preach in the whole world, instead of which Irenæus mentioned the preaching in Rome by way of example! Whereas (tandis que, not pendant que) Peter and Paul preached the gospel in Rome, i.e. in the wide world, Matthew remained at home and wrote a book; and after they had set out, no one knows where, Mark did the same thing. Few will agree with the conclusion, Cette explication nous paraît très logique. Occasion for such fancies can hardly be found in the circumstance that Clement puts the composition of Mark a little earlier than Irenæus (see above, p. 394 and n. 9), or that Eusebius (H. E. ii. 15), in a very inexact reproduction of statements by Papias and Clement, adopts the latter's view of the composition of Mark during Peter's lifetime, and seems to assign it to the time of Claudius along with the fable of Peter's contest with Simon Magus (cf. above, p. 168 f.). Eusebius, who was conscientious enough to report faithfully traditions concerning the chronological order of the Gospels from Clement (H. E. vi. 14. 5) and Origen (vi. 25. 3 ff.), which were apparently or actually contradictory, also reproduced exactly the testimony of Irenæus as to the composition of Mark after the death of Peter and Paul (H. E. v. 8. 3), though Clement's view appealed to him more strongly (ii. 15, v. 14. 6). Moreover, Irenæus's intention in iii. 1. 1 of giving the chronological order is so evident from the indications of time in connection with Matt., Mark, and John (ἑπετα), that his other enumerations cannot be counted against it. The order in iii. 9. 1–11. 6, Matt., Luke, Mark, John, which is repeated in iii. 11. 7, is occasioned by the desire to emphasise the two Gospels in which Jesus' affirmative attitude towards the O.T. is most apparent. The order in iii. 11. 8, John, Luke, Matt., Mark, depends on the arrangement of the apocalyptic symbols. The distribution of the four animal figures of Ezek. i. 5, 10 and Rev. iv. 6 f., which Irenæus did not invent, but found as a tradition, has of itself nothing to do with the chronological order of the Gospels, nor with their arrangement in the codex; cf. Forsch. ii. 257–275, iii. 222 f.; v. Schultze, Greifswalder Studien, S. 158. The two oldest and commonest arrangements are — (1) Matt.=man, Mark=eagle, Luke=ox, John=lion (so Irenæus and the true Victorinus of Pettau; cf. Haussleiter, ThLB, 1895, Col. 194); (2) Matt.=man, Mark=lion, Luke=ox, John=eagle (so Theophilus Lat., Epiphanius, Jerome).

8. (P. 393.) The chronological succession of the Gospels given by Irenæus without any notice of divergent opinions, and by Origen as an old tradition (see above, p. 397 f.), is clearly indicated in Can. Mur. lines 1–16, in spite of the incompleteness of its beginning (GK, ii. 14 ff.); also Eus. H. E. iii. 24. 6 f.; Epiphan. Har. li. 4 (Ματθαῖος πρῶτος ἀρχεται εὐαγγελίζεσθαι). 6 (εὐθὺς δὲ μετὰ τὸν Ματθαῖον ἀκόλουθος γενόμενος ὁ Μάρκος τῷ ἁγίῳ Πέτρῳ ἐν Ῥώμῃ ἐπιτρέπεται τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἐκθέσθαι καὶ γράψας ἀποστέλλεται ὑπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου Πέτρου εἰς τὴν τῶν Αἰγυπτίων χώραν). 7 (Luke wrote an account of misinterpretations of Mark), xii. 19 (finally, John, when more than ninety years old). Further, Jerome, Præf. Comm. in Matth., Vall. vii. 3 ff.; cf. Vir. Ill. iii.; Ephrem, Erpos. ev. Conc. p. 286; Chrysost. Hom. 4 in Matth., Montfaucon, vii. 46; August. Cons. Evv. i. 2. That John was the last to write is involved in every tradition that has specially to do with the Fourth Gospel. The remark of Tertullian (contra Marc. iv. 2), that the disciples of the apostles among the evangelists wrote “cum apostolis et post apostolos,” and the further words, “ex apostolis Joannes et Matthæus, ex apostolicis Lucas et Marcus,” express no particular opinion as to the chronological order of the Gospels, or at most only the presupposition, which no one in the ancient Church disputed, that the earliest Evangelist was an apostle, not a pupil of the apostles. The old Latin prologues to the Gospels also give the order, Matt., Mark, Luke, John; Prolog. in Luc. (N.T. Lat., ed. Wordsworth, i. 269): "Qui cum iam descripta essent evangelia per Matthæum quidem in Judæa, per Marcum autem in Italia, sancto instigante spiritu in Achaïæ partibus hoc scripsit evangelium, significans etiam ipse, ante alia esse descripta." The improbable opinion of Corssen (Monarchianische Prologe, 1896, S. 37), that the same writer in his prologue to Mark represents that Gospel as written after Luke, rests upon two misunderstandings. The words (Wordsworth, i. 172) "perfecti evangelii opus intrans et a baptismo domini deum prædicare inchoans" evidently refer to Mark i. 9 ff. in distinction from "initio evangelicæ prædicationis," Mark i. 1 ff. The complete Gospel comes first through Christ, in distinction from the Forerunner, whose preaching Mark has termed the beginning of the Gospel. And when it is said of the physical birth, that Mark saw it in prioribus and therefore did not think it worth while to narrate it again, it is very arbitrary to supply evangeliiis (sc. Matt. and Luke). The phrase probably stands for the common ἐν τοῖς πρὸ τούτων, cf. for example, Orig. tom. ii. 1, in Jo. where to be sure but a single tomus has preceded, or ἐν τοῖς ἔμπροσθεν, or similar expressions. The author of the prologues, which are hardly so old as Corssen would have them, had before him the codex in which Matt. i. stands before Mark i.; and he had not forgotten that according to his express statement Matt. indeed, but not Luke, was written before Mark.

9. (P. 394.) Eusebius, H. E. vi. 14. 5 (Forsch. iii. 72), quotes from the Hypotyp.: αὐτὸς δ' ἐν τοῖς αὐτοῖς ὁ Κλήμης βιβλίοις περὶ τῆς τάξεως τῶν εὐαγγελίων παράδοσιν τῶν ἀνάκαθεν πρεσβυτέρων τέθειται, τοῦτον ἔχουσιν τὸν τρόπον "Προγεγράφθαι ἔλεγον (ul. ἔλεγεν) τῶν εὐαγγελίων τὰ περιέχοντα τὰς γενεαλογίας." The less supported reading, ἔλεγον, which has the presbyters for its subject, and in tense is quite in accord with the way in which Clement usually speaks of his teachers (Forsch. iii. 161, A. 1), is to be preferred to ἔλεγεν, instead of which one would sooner expect ἔφη, as indeed one MS. has it, or φησίν, or nothing at all. For τάξις cf. the old chapter title of Eus. H. E. iii. 24, and the writing of Galenus (ed. Kühn, xix. 49), περὶ τῆς τάξεως τῶν ἰδίων βιβλίων; cf. GK, ii. 365, A. 5. Clement means an historical account of the composition of the writings, observing the chronological order. If, in consideration of the general currency of the tradition that the order was Matt., Mark, Luke, John (n. 8), one may assume that it was known to Clement's teachers and to himself, it is noteworthy that their divergent statement is given without any hint of its opposition to the common view. It is not impossible, then, that the presbyters simply meant that Matt. was written before Mark and Luke before John.

§ 50. HISTORY OF THE "SYNOPTIC PROBLEM."

Whoever reads the first three Gospels in order for the first time, with a fair degree of attention, must have been reminded constantly, in going through the second and third, that he had read essentially the same narratives and discourses once or twice before, partly in the same order, and in language which in all cases was very similar, and often exactly the same. Since the authors themselves say nothing of the sources and helps of which they made use, and since, further, the ancient tradition contains no notice of the use of the work of one evangelist by another, we have the so-called "Synoptic Problem," a problem which has been in existence ever since the Gospels were read alongside of each other. The facts have been very often represented to the eye by editions of the text designed to show the similarities and variations of the first three, or of all four Gospels (n. 1). As early as the third century, a certain Ammonius, of whom nothing more definite is known, prepared an edition of Matthew in which the sections of the other Gospels agreeing more or less closely with Matthew were arranged alongside of the Matthew text, which was given in full. Ammonius gave his work the same title—Diatessaron—which the Syrian Tatian used earlier in the second century for his work, though this was of an entirely different character, being, in fact, a Gospel history compiled from the words of the four Gospels: τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων εὐαγγέλιον. Eusebius speaks highly of the careful scholarship of Ammonius' Diatessaron, but felt the breaking up of the text of all the Gospels, except Matthew, into small fragments to be a defect. This led him to invent a new method, which left the text of the Gospels intact, but which divided it into small sections (κεφάλαια, περικοπαί), successively numbered in each Gospel. Then through tables preceding the text, in which the numbers of the corresponding sections were arranged together (κανόνες), and to which references were made by means of figures written in red on the margin of the text, the reader was enabled easily to find the parallels to any passage in any one of the Gospels (n. 1). In spite of the widespread use of this arrangement of the text in the Greek, Syrian, and Latin Churches, the problem under discussion was scarcely realised by the scholars of the ancient Church. The thing which caused surprise was not the similarity of the Gospels in form, but the differences which existed between their contents. Attempts were made to explain and to harmonise these differences, especially where such harmonisation was demanded by ecclesiastical, dogmatic, or even apologetic interests (n. 2). With reference to the origin of the Gospels, no information was sought beyond that furnished by the scanty reports of the oldest traditions. It was only because the tradition reported that John wrote his Gospel later than the other evangelists, with their books in view and for the purpose of supplementing them, that this fact was recalled occasionally in connection with the discussion of single points, regarding which the accounts of the Gospels differed. Only in very isolated cases do we find similar expressions regarding a conscious relation of the other evangelists to their predecessors, made, of course, on the basis of the generally accepted view that the Gospels originated in the order in which they are arranged in our N.T. (n. 3). This was the case with Augustine, who was the first to be led, by the observation of similarities of language in the Gospels, to what was at least the beginning of a definite view regarding the origin of this phenomenon. He thought it could be proved that Mark was consciously dependent upon Matthew, which in part he repeated word for word, in part reproduced in abbreviated form (n. 4). The matter was not pursued further, either in the Middle Ages or at the time of the Reformation, either by the harmonists of the orthodox period or by the pioneers of a critical history of the N.T. It seems to have required the great revolution in the entire way of thinking about Christianity and its original documents, which began with the middle of the eighteenth century, to produce an appreciation of the problem presented by the similarities and differences of the first three Gospels. In what follows the principal attempts made at its solution are described briefly.

1. G. E. Lessing was led, by the strife which the publication of the Wolfenbüttel fragments produced, to propound what was really a "new hypothesis" concerning the manner in which the synoptic Gospels originated (n. 5). Starting with the fact that the earliest Christians were called Nazarenes (Acts xxiv. 5),—a name retained by the Jewish Christians of Berea until Jerome's time,—and the various names which the Gospel, or rather the Gospels, of the Jewish Christians bore in the confused reports of the Church Fathers, he conjectured that the root of the entire Gospel literature, the original Gospel, was the Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes, the kernel of which originated in the time immediately following Jesus' death, and which underwent a number of changes in the early Christian period. By means of a bold interpretation of Eusebius' account of the origin of Matthew (H. E. iii. 24. 6), Lessing arrived at the conclusion that when Matthew left Palestine to preach among the Greeks or Hellenists, he made an abstract of the original Aramaic Gospel in Greek for the benefit of his new hearers, which abstract is our canonical Matthew. That Matthew's name was transferred to the original also should not be considered surprising. By a similar handling of Papias' testimony (§ 54), it was made to appear that numerous individuals translated excerpts from this original Gospel into Greek, just as Matthew had done, always from their own points of view and for different purposes. Among these translators belong the many writers of Luke i. 1,—in particular, Luke himself, and Mark also. "In a word, Matthew, Mark, and Luke are nothing but translations, partly different, partly the same, of the so-called original Hebrew Matthew, which each made as best he could" (Lessing, § 50). We possess only two Gospels,—a Gospel of the flesh in a threefold Greek recension, and a Gospel of the spirit, that according to John. This unelaborated thought of Lessing contained suggestions which were bound to develop.

While Lessing left it to the reader to apply his hypothesis for the explanation of the varied way in which the Gospels agree at one point and then differ from each other again, J. G. Eichhorn in Göttingen (n. 6) reversed the method, beginning with the fact that in forty-four sections the three synoptic Gospels are in essential agreement, in content, form, compass, and point of view. This is not to be explained on the supposition that one Gospel was used in the composition of another, but only on the hypothesis that all are dependent upon a common source. This source he declared to be an Aramaic Gospel, written as early as the year 35 by a disciple of one of the apostles, containing a biography of Jesus which covered the time from the appearance of the Baptist to the resurrection. During the decades which followed, this Gospel was frequently recast, enlarged, and abbreviated, first in Aramaic and then also in Greek. The Gospels which originated in this manner between 35 and 60—practically countless in number—constitute in their manifold combinations the sources from which were drawn the Gospels accepted by the Church, as well as the various Gospels used by Jewish Christians and Gentile Christian heretics, Justin's citations, and Tatian's Diatessaron. On this point Eichhorn accepted in the main the tradition regarding the origin of the Gospels in use by the Church. It was, in fact, through this tradition that he came to suppose, in opposition to it, that the Greek translator of the Aramaic Matthew, compiled as it was by the apostle Matthew from a number of sources, modified the same by important additions of his own, some thirty-five in number, smaller and greater, e.g. chaps. i.-ii., which he prefixed to the Gospel. The artificiality of Eichhorn's hypothesis, and the impossibility of proving the numerous accessory hypotheses upon which it was based, led inevitably to attempts in the opposite direction. It was not Eichhorn's hypothesis, but Lessing's idea, which Eichhorn appropriated without acknowledgment, that continued to live, and that was revived later (see below, No. 7).

2. In 1783 and later, J. J. Griesbach, working in the spirit of Lessing's genuine historical method, and in conscious agreement with him,—in fact, differing from him only in his results,—and in strong opposition to Eichhorn and his followers, advanced a hypothesis the simplicity of which seemed especially to commend it (n. 7). According to this view, the apostle Matthew wrote his Gospel in Greek from his own acquaintance with the facts, and without the use of earlier sources; Luke composed his on the basis of his investigations of the oral tradition still uncrystallised, and with the help of Matthew; Mark's Gospel was made up of excerpts from Luke and Matthew. Mark's own additions—in all not more than twenty-four verses—show that in his home in Jerusalem he had heard much of the history, related with more vividness and in greater detail than he found in the narratives of Matthew, which he made the basis of his work, or in Luke, which he employed as a help. He designed his book to serve as a handy compendium of the Gospel history for readers unacquainted with Jewish conditions and views, and without interest in much that Matthew had recorded. The tradition, according to which a close relation exists between Mark's Gospel and the discourses of Peter, is a conjecture, and simply an invention of Papias. Also the opinion that Matthew wrote in Hebrew is an improbable conjecture, since even Mark had a Greek Matthew before him. While the tradition regarding the authors of the Gospels is to be preferred to all modern hypotheses, all the reports of the ancient Church which go further, and purport to give an account of the origin of the Gospels, are worthless fables.

3. At about the same time G. Chr. Storr and G. Herder declared Mark to be the oldest of the extant Gospels (n. 8)

Starting with the name "Gospel," which as a matter of fact no one of our evangelists gave his own work, but which was applied by the Church to the Gospels in the second century, Herder postulated as the common basis of the entire gospel literature a Gospel existing at first in an unwritten form, which was, nevertheless, quite thoroughly fixed. In content it was limited to a definite series of narratives and discourses, covering the period from the baptism of John to the ascension of Jesus (Acts i. 1 f., 22), and was a compendium of the historical content of the missionary preaching intended especially for the guidance of the missionary preachers of the second order, the evangelists, or "ministers of the word" (Luke i. 2). This Gospel, which originated in Palestine between 35 and 40, and which was thought out and, so to speak, composed in Aramaic, was communicated orally to the helpers engaged in preaching, of whom Mark was one, but committed by them to writing for their own convenience, and probably at once. In this way a multitude of private writings arose. Several decades later Mark published his copy, essentially unchanged, probably in Rome, and accordingly reproduces for us in a Greek form, but nevertheless faithfully, the original unwritten Gospel which originated under the eyes of Peter, James, and John. In 60, or somewhat later, a fuller Gospel in Aramaic was prepared in Palestine on the same basis, and was immediately published. In modified form this Gospel survived in the Hebrew Gospel of the Nazarenes, and in the Greek Matthew, which was not written until after 70. Finally, Luke, who wrote his historical work not for the Church, but for an individual belonging to the upper classes, used this elaborate Aramaic Gospel, which was afterwards recast in the Greek Matthew as an auxiliary source. He also used, in addition, the outline of the apostolic preaching which he had had in hand for the twenty years that he had been engaged in assisting with the preaching work, and also the information which he had gathered from persons who had heard and seen Jesus. While Herder left it undecided whether any one of the three Synoptists had in hand the work of the other two, Storr, who was gifted with less imagination than Herder, confined himself strictly to given data, and explained the similarities among the Gospels on the supposition that the two later evangelists used the work of the earlier one. According to his view, the Gospel of Mark, which was drawn chiefly from Peter's narratives, was written in Jerusalem at a very early date, before Mark became engaged in foreign missionary work. This oldest Gospel the apostle Matthew did not hesitate to make the basis of his own Gospel, which otherwise was based upon independent knowledge of the facts, and was written from a peculiar point of view. Mark was worked over also by Luke, who, however, was unacquainted with Matthew.

Later, Chr. G. Wilke (1838), Bruno Bauer (1841), and G. Volkmar (1870) undertook to prove that Mark was the original Gospel, but in a sense differing entirely from that of Herder and Storr (n. 9). Although Wilke left the tradition entirely untested, and made no attempt whatever to explain and thereby to remove its errors, and although he omitted all discussion of the leading thoughts of the separate Gospels and of the historical conditions under which they were written, he believed that in his voluminous work he had established for all time, from the agreements and variations of the texts of the synoptic Gospels, the fact that our Mark is the original Gospel, except for a number of interpolations, part of which he believed could still be removed by the application of commonly accepted critical principles. This original Gospel was worked over in an arbitrary way in Matthew and Luke, supplemented by the addition of later legends and adapted to serve particular ends. The agreements between Matthew and Luke in passages not derived from Mark is to be explained on the ground that, in addition to his principal source Mark, Matthew also used Luke.

4. Fully recognising that the solution of the synoptic problem is to be sought through a study of the documents in their historical connection, but at the same time making the tradition of the ancient Church regarding the origin of the Gospels and the order in which they were written his starting-point, J. L. Hug (n. 10) undertook to show that Mark had in his possession and made use of Matthew. The same was true of Luke in relation to Mark and Matthew, while John had and used all three Synoptics. In all cases the sources employed were supplemented and corrected by independent information. Regarding the sources used by Matthew, there is no necessity of inquiring; only it was natural that a person so accustomed to writing, as was the tax-collector Matthew, should have noted down at a very early date the discourses and sayings of the Master to aid him in his own work as a teacher, and also that he should have made use of these collections of his own in the elaboration of his Gospel, traces of which are actually to be found in it (*Einl.*³ i. 179). Whether and to what extent Luke used others of the writings which he mentions in Luke i. 1, and the oral tradition in addition to Matthew and Mark, we are no longer able to determine (op. cit. S. 186). Hug accepts the tradition as correct at every point, with the exception that he holds the unanimous tradition of antiquity by which Matthew is represented as having been written in Hebrew to be a scholastic fable.

5. Opposed to Eichhorn's hypothesis of an original written Gospel which originated early in the apostolic age, is that of J. C. L. Gieseler (n. 11), which makes the common basis of all three Synoptics, as well as of numerous apocryphal Gospels of the second century, an original Gospel which was entirely oral. The silence of the other

N.T. writings and of the oldest post-apostolic literature regarding the use of written Gospels, the way in which the words and deeds of Jesus are introduced in this literature, further, the fact that comparatively little writing was done in the apostolic age (S. 35, 60 ff.), and the simple character of the culture possessed by the early Christians in Palestine, render it impossible that records of the Gospel should have been made so soon, also that such documents, after they originated privately, should have been circulated so widely and have had so much influence in the Church. Material for the construction of Gospels was drawn from the oral tradition until within the second century; still more in the apostolic age was the tradition fixed enough to make the use of written helps seem unnecessary. Entirely without design, frequent repetition produced a fixed form of the narrative and an outline of the Gospel history from the appearance of the Baptist on, in which the most important events and sayings were reproduced with the greatest uniformity by all narrators and teachers. The history of the liturgy and of the creed, which were unwritten for so long, anecdotes from the history of the ancient Church, and analogies from the history of heathen religions and of Jewish Rabbinism, should enable us moderns to form a conception of the tenacity of memory which, under conditions of ancient culture, characterised groups of like-minded men, especially in cases where the sayings were regarded as sacred, and where the things recalled were of an historical nature. When the Gospel passed from Palestine to the Greeks, it necessarily took on a Greek form, but continued oral. Though so flexible that the order, emphasis, and application could be changed according to varying necessities, this Gospel was still able, in spite of all these modifications, to survive in its original stereotyped form. Here belong, e.g. among other things, passages quoted freely from the O.T. Comparison of 1 Pet. ii. 6 f. with Rom. ix. 33 proves that the recurrence of such citations in several different writings is not to be explained by supposing that one is dependent upon another, or both of the extant writings upon an original now lost (p. 260, n. 12). It is easy to see that this and many other of Gieseler's proofs are inconclusive; but for all that it is not to be denied that Geiseler made a more serious attempt than did Herder to treat the problem from a thoroughly historical point of view, and that he called attention to facts which deserve more consideration than the doubtful speculations of a critique which does not get beyond counting words, and which does not have even a perverted historical sense. G. Wetzel (n. 11) called his theory an improvement upon Gieseler's "tradition-hypothesis." Unlike Gieseler, who accepted the tradition regarding the origin of the Gospels, Wetzel rejected it altogether; and without any attempt to explain its origin he replaced it with the following imaginary picture. The necessity came to be felt in the mother Church of giving the Hellenists (Acts vi. 1) who came to Jerusalem from outside Palestine, and who were therefore unfamiliar with the Gospel history, regular instruction in the same. This task was entrusted to the former tax-collector, Matthew, who was especially proficient in Greek. After this instruction had been continued for years, it took on a fixed form, which was partly memorised by the hearers, and finally was committed to writing by not a few of them. In this way the numerous books of Luke i. 1 originated, of which three have been preserved to us. This explains the agreements among the Gospels; the differences, on the other hand, are exactly such as exist at the present time among the notes made of academic lectures. Even the most industrious student at times absents himself from lectures, and not every student comprehends with entire correctness what he hears. Recently, K. Veit (n. 11), who rejects Wetzel's "improvement," has supplemented Gieseler's hypothesis in several points

Thus, he brings the analogy of rabbinic methods of teaching to bear with greater definiteness upon the problem as to how the disciples were taught by Jesus Himself, and how the apostles and other missionary preachers and the teachers in the local Church instructed the new converts. Further, he attempts to show, through numerous examples, how the tradition-hypothesis can be applied, not without trenchant critical remarks about current criticism of the Gospels.

6. Fr. Schleiermacher's analysis of Luke (n. 12) was not planned to answer the whole question regarding the origin and relation of the synoptic Gospels, though this work is based upon a complete view of the problem. It made little impression, for the simple reason that Schleiermacher's fundamental idea, which involved a discussion also of Acts, was only incompletely worked out in this first publication upon the subject, and because the exposition of the general theory from the detailed observations, and even a discussion of the same in relation to Luke's preface, was for the time being postponed. According to Schleiermacher, the bond of connection among the Gospels—the basis and the beginning of the entire Gospel literature—was neither an oral nor a written Gospel, nor the use of earlier Gospels in the composition of later ones, but a large number of short written narratives. Schleiermacher's new interpretation of Papias' testimony regarding Matthew and Mark had more effect. That up to the year 1832 no one had doubted that Papias meant our Matthew and Mark, Schleiermacher found incomprehensible. All that Papias knew of Matthew was a collection of Jesus' sayings which Matthew wrote down in Hebrew. Papias says nothing of a translation of Matthew's Gospel into Greek, but speaks only of a number of recensions of this collection of sayings,—the Λόγια, so celebrated later. One of these recensions is preserved in our Matthew, and others, as for example the different Gospels used by the Jewish Christians, are known to some extent from several reports of the Church Fathers. Of Matthew, chaps. v.—vii., x., xiii. 1–52, xviii. 23–25 belong to the collection of sayings. Besides these chapters, there are other scattered fragments not so easy to separate from their context. Nor was Papias acquainted with our Mark, which does not suit his description, but with a writing of Mark much less complete, and showing much less order. This writing of Mark was worked over by a later hand into our Mark, apparently also by another hand into the apocryphal Gospel of Peter. Thus Schleiermacher discovered an original Matthew and an original Mark, which opened the way for new combinations for the solution of the synoptic problem.

7. After the question raised by D. F. Strauss' Leben Jesu (1835–36) as to whether the whole body of traditions gathered in our Gospels was essentially mythical or historical, had awakened wide theological interest, F. Chr. Baur (n. 13), dissatisfied with the dogmatism of Strauss as well as of his opponents, also with the "quantitative method" of Wilke, and all attempts to solve the problem in an artificial manner, undertook "to conceive the relation of the Gospels to one another as something which grew up naturally, the working out of a principle of inner development." So long as the relation of the narrative to the consciousness of the narrators—the dominating idea, the tendenz of each one of the Gospels—is not made clear, "the discussion remains vague and uncertain." Baur began with the Fourth Gospel, which presupposed the historical material of the Synoptists, but which nevertheless was subordinated and accommodated to the new conception of Christ as the eternal Logos by the selection of such parts of the same as were suited to the author's purpose. From John he proceeded to the consideration of Luke, which was certainly older than John. Luke was edited, according to Baur, about 150, on the basis of an original Luke written in the spirit of Paul and retained by Marcion in his Church. Matthew was also used in its preparation, against which Gospel the original Luke was also supposed to have polemicised—the purpose of the redaction being to remove the sharp opposition between the extreme Paulinism of Marcion and the surviving Jewish construction of the Gospel, so far as this was possible from the point of view of a modified Paulinism. The only sources employed by Mark, who proceeds from the opposite, originally Judaistic point of view, and who represents less a harmonising tendency than the disposition to remain actually neutral with reference to the great conflicting tendencies of the apostolic age, were Matthew and Luke, or the original Luke. The small amount of new material which Mark introduces, and the numerous small additions which he scatters here and there throughout his book, are merely amplifications, and have no historical value, being due partly to the author's misunderstanding of his predecessors, and being partly inventions of the author, intended to create the impression of independent knowledge. Of the canonical Gospels, Matthew is the most original. It presents a picture of Christianity as it existed while still under the dominance of national ideas, which is the original form of Christianity as it emerged from Judaism. But the Gospel itself appears not to have been edited until during the Jewish rebellion under Hadrian, between 130 and 134, and is the result of a long process of literary development, the single steps of which can no longer be distinguished. The immediate predecessor of Matthew was a Hebrew Gospel which the Church tradition ascribed to the apostle Matthew, and which in a great variety of forms and under changing names was the only Gospel in existence until toward the middle of the second century. To use a short inaccurate expression, this was the Gospel of the Hebrews. Like Schweigler, Baur declined to refer the particularistic Jewish features of Matthew to the Hebrew Gospel, and to assign the words and narratives universal in tone to the redactor of the Gospel, on the ground that even the Hebrew Gospel may have contained "purer elements" and because the principle by which "the apparently disparate elements of Matthew" could be united was to be found in early Christianity itself (Unters. der kan. Evv. S. 578 f., 613 ff.). Hilgenfeld, on the other hand, undertook to distinguish in our Matthew an original apostolic document written in a thoroughly Jewish spirit, which he supposes to have been worked over in a more universalistic spirit by a Hellenist, apparently in Egypt, after the year 70 (n. 13). At first Hilgenfeld rejected the ancient tradition of a Hebrew Matthew as purely legendary, holding even the original document to have been a Greek work, which was the basis also of the Aramaic Gospel of the Hebrews. Later, however, he became convinced of the original character of the Gospel of the Hebrews, which he then made the real original Gospel. While Mark, which Baur treated so contemptuously, is, to be sure, wholly dependent upon the Greek Matthew, it is nevertheless to be restored to its old place between the Greek Matthew and Luke. This is also the opinion of C. Holsten, who abandoned all effort to determine more exactly the character of the document at the basis of the canonical Matthew, which he also assumed, and attempted to explain the origin of the synoptic Gospels from the conflicting dogmatic tendencies of the apostolic age (n. 13).

8. Without any knowledge of Wilke's work, which appeared at about the same time, Chr. H. Weisse (n. 14), who was influenced by Strauss' Leben Jesu to make a new investigation of the sources of the Gospel history, undertook to show that our Mark is none other than the work commented upon by Papias and the presbyter John. Though at this particular point Weisse rejects entirely Schleiermacher's interpretation of Papias' testimony, and does not leave uncriticised his interpretation of what Papias says regarding Matthew, he appropriates, nevertheless, the essential result of Schleiermacher's critique, namely, his discovery of the collection of Jesus' sayings in Aramaic from Matthew's hand. From these two original works Luke, the disciple of Paul, compiled his Gospel without much independent knowledge of the tradition, while somewhat later the Greek redactor of the original Matthew enlarged the collection of sayings into our Matthew by the use of material borrowed from Mark. After the number of those accepting the originality of Mark and its priority to Matthew had become greater, and after A. Ritschl had broken with his master Baur, in his view of the Gospels, as in other points, and gone over to the Mark hypothesis, H. J. Holtzmann, following up this hypothesis, was courageous enough to describe minutely the sources from which the synoptic Gospels are supposed to have been put together,—their character and compass,—and also to attempt practically a verbal restoration of the same (n. 14). One of the original documents at the basis of all three Gospels, employed by each of the evangelists without the knowledge that the others had used it, is preserved in our Mark in practically complete form and throughout in its proper order. This we may call the original Mark: since the only changes which the author made in his original was to abbreviate the same at the beginning, i. 1–13, and at certain other points, and to omit certain passages, such as the Sermon on the Mount and the account of the centurion (Luke vi. 20–vii. 10) after Mark iii. 19 (no one knows why), and, because of its objectionable character, the narrative found in John vii. 53–viii. 11, which Hitzig places after Mark xii. 17. Also a large part of the material peculiar to Mark, which is not great, is taken from the original Mark—particularly the accounts of healing, Mark vii. 31–37, viii. 22–26, but also many of the little details which enliven Mark's narratives. Unless interpreted too strictly, Papias' testimony regarding Mark suits this original Mark in a general way. Also what Papias says of a collection of sayings by Matthew meets the requirement of the hypothesis, and gives a show of appropriateness to the expression Λόγια, chosen to designate the second principal source, the use of which on the part of Matthew and Luke is supposed to explain agreements between these two Gospels which are not due to their common dependence upon the original Mark. This remarkable book contained only a number of the discourses, for the most part the shorter discourses, of Jesus. Moreover, these discourses, part of which were provided with titles and short historical introductions, belonged exclusively to the later Galilean ministry, and were subsequent to the call of Matthew, and the choosing of the apostles (Holtzmann, Synopt. Evv. 1863, S. 252, cf. S. 365 f.). But the very first long discourse, which is supposed to have followed the choosing of the apostles in the original Mark, was wanting in the Matthew Logia. In contrast to the original Mark, this did not begin with the testimony of the Baptist concerning Jesus, but with his doubting question (Luke vii. 18-35; Matt. xi. 2-19), and ended with a series of parables; at the very close stood probably the saying which we find in Matt. xiii. 52. As in the case of the earlier Galilean ministry, so from the period of Jesus' activity in Jerusalem and the Passion the author preserves no sayings. He is extremely careful in other respects, also, not to repeat anything already contained in the original Mark. Although we are able to form a much better idea of the arrangement and original wording of the Logia from Luke than from Matthew, still, without exception, the apostolic Church transferred Matthew's name from the Logia, of which he was the author, not to Luke's Gospel, but to Matthew. Material in Matthew and Luke, derived neither from the Logia nor from the original Mark, was produced for the most part by the evangelists themselves, being either put into writing by them for the first time from the oral tradition, as Matt. xvii. 24-27, or worked over on the basis of older and shorter documents—as the genealogies and several parts of the Sermon on the Mount—or pure invention—as the sending out of the Seventy (Luke x. 1), which Luke fabricated because he did not want the same commission, which he found in both his sources, to be addressed twice to the same hearers. These are the main features of the hypothesis. Later modifications of details by Holtzmann himself, Weizsäcker, and others cannot be presented here.

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT

9. Finally, the independent view of B. Weiss, which, during an entire generation, its author, with great persistence, has worked out in all its details, deserves notice (n. 15). The original Gospel, so vainly sought since Eichhorn, is a book written by the apostle Matthew in Aramaic, but very soon translated into Greek. Though consisting for the most part of discourses and sayings of Jesus, naturally with the indispensable historical setting, this document contained also a considerable number of narrative pieces, even groups of such, and so in its original form was a work very much like our Gospels, covering the period from the appearance of the Baptist to the beginning of the history of the Passion, concluding somewhere about Matt. xxvi. 2-13. The question arises at once why the history of the Passion, where, so far as we can see, the narratives in Matthew, Mark, and Luke are related to each other in essentially the same way as in the preceding parts of the history, should have been omitted from the original apostolic document. Practically the only answer which Weiss gives to this question is the statement that a presentation of the Passion history, differing so radically from that of the Fourth Gospel as do all three synoptic accounts, could not have originated from an apostle. The original document, already translated into Greek, was one of the sources used by Mark; the others were the oral narratives of Peter. The author of the canonical Matthew used as sources the original Gospel and Mark. Mark had therefore always the choice between two apostolic authorities, one written, the other oral; whereas the author of the canonical Matthew must select between the statements of an apostolic document and the work of a disciple of one of the apostles. The reason for this entire theory is the observation that sometimes Matthew, sometimes Mark, gives the impression of the greater originality; for this is supposed to be explained by assuming that in some cases Matthew preserved the original apostolic document more faithfully than Mark, while in other instances he followed Mark's account. Finally, Luke, who knew nothing of the canonical Matthew, and who, therefore, could not possibly have used the same, made copious use of the original apostolic document in addition to Mark, which he made the basis of his Gospel, and another source, probably written, which can no longer be distinguished with exactness. Particularly in vi. 20–viii. 8, and ix. 51–xviii. 14, large sections of the original documents were adopted by Luke; and, so far as we are able to make comparisons with Matthew, these are reproduced for the most part in a more original form.

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT

Up to the present time no one of the investigations of the synoptic problem can be said to have produced results which have been generally accepted, or that can lay well-grounded claims to such acceptance. In one point only is there agreement, namely, that it is impossible to set forth the history of the origin of the first three Gospels in a satisfactory manner on the basis of reliable reports and trustworthy observations; that, rather, gaps remain in our knowledge based upon these two classes of data, which must be filled up by conjecture. There is no hope that the question as to which one of the conjectures made heretofore or to appear in the future comes nearest to the truth will be decided by a new display of cleverness on the part of representatives of one of these hypotheses in working it out in detail, so that it shall appear to all capable judges to be the simplest solution of the problem. On the other hand, there is no reason to despair of a solution, at least not on the part of one convinced of these two sets of given facts, which can be ascertained without the help of hypotheses, namely, (1) that the tradition regarding the origin of the Gospels goes back to the time of their origin, (2) that the three books in our possession are as yet far from being adequately understood and estimated. With reference to the tradition, the boldest of the critics, with a few unhappy exceptions, have shown enough historical sense to seek support for their hypotheses in the oldest notices regarding the origin of the Gospels, though, to be sure, for the most part selecting arbitrarily what suited their own purposes. Thanks also to fortunate discoveries and the investigations stimulated by such discoveries, we are in possession of more thorough knowledge of the Gospel literature of the second century than was possible for Lessing and Herder, Schleiermacher and Baur, Credner and Bleek. We really know more than did these investigators about Marcion's Gospel, Tatian's Diatessaron, the Gospel "according to the Hebrews," and the Gospel "according to Peter." Nevertheless, it is true that many critics do not seem to have kept abreast of the advances in knowledge indicated above. Besides, very often it has not been appreciated that the tradition is either to be accepted as a whole, or the error of such parts of the same as do not deserve acceptance plausibly shown. With reference to the second point mentioned above, namely, the proper valuation of the Gospels as literary products, it is true that serviceable work in this direction has been done. But little use has been made of these results in the investigation of the origin of the Gospels, because of a one-sided tendency in this investigation to make conjectures regarding the sources supposed to be at the basis of the Gospels, without adequate knowledge of the characteristics of each separate Gospel. On the other hand, the method of a comparative interpretation of the general content of the synoptic Gospels—a method employed in the earlier period by Calvin and Gerhard, and among the pioneers of the new criticism of the Gospels used and recommended especially by Griesbach, and absolutely demanded by Wilke—had a positively harmful effect with reference to this question, tending especially to confuse and to bewilder those beginning the investigation for the first time. How is it possible to understand an author when he is interrupted after every third word! How can one writing be compared with another when each is not known by itself as its author intended, and consequently not understood in its details! Irenæus speaks of teachers who read to their hearers from unwritten books, and calls such a procedure “making ropes out of sand” (i. 8. 1). In our time we have commentaries on books, the existence of which, to express the matter mildly, can be proved only by means of conjecture.

1. (P. 401.) In connection with Burgon's pioneer investigation in The Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark, 1871, pp. 126-131, 295-312, the writer has carefully discussed the Diatessaron of Ammonius, Forsch. i. 31-34, cf. S. 1, 99, 101-104, 293; ThLb, 1896, S. 3 f. Cf. also Schmidtke, Die Evv. eines alten Uebersetzer, 1903, S. xxxii. ff. The only direct source of our knowledge of the work of Ammonius is Eusebius' introduction to his edition of the four Gospels—an introduction composed in the form of a letter to Carpianus, and arranged according to the method developed in the Gospels themselves. This is printed in many editions of the N.T., e.g. the Tischendorf-Gregory edition, Prol. p. 145. The κἀτάς, arranged by Eus.—i.e. catalogues, tabular statements (Grandräs, 6 f.), are ten in number; the first embraces the sections which are common to all four Gospels, 2-4 those which are contained in three Gospels, 5-9 those contained in two Gospels, and 10, in four subdivisions, those which are found in but one Gospel. The κεφάλαια or περικεφαλαί (Eusebius uses both expressions), which were long mistakenly called sections Ammonianæ, are 355 in Matt., 233 in Mark (later increased to 241 or 242 in consideration of the spurious additions), 342 in Luke, and 232 in John, in all 1162—a number which is given also by Epiphanius in his Anchorites, chap. 1, and Casarius in his Dialogue, i. 39; cf. Gregory, 143. Eusebius reckoned 74 sections which were found in all the Gospels, 111 only in Matt., Mark, Luke; 22 in Matt., Luke, John; 25 in Matt.,

Mark, John ; 82 only in Matt., Luke ; 47 only in Matt., Mark ; 7 in Matt. John ; 13 in Mark, Luke ; 21 in Luke, John ; 62 in Matt. ; 19 in Mark . 72 in Luke ; 96 in John alone. The so-called Gospel harmonies, at the head of which stands Tatian's Syriac Diatessaron, were primarily for ecclesiastical use, and not for scholarly purposes, like the works of Ammonius and Eusebius ; cf. *PRF*³, v. 653-661. That of J. Clericus, however (Harmonia Evangeliorum, Amstelod. 1699, reprinted without the Greek text, Lyon, not Leyden, 1700), forms a transition to the synopses, in so far as it prints the text of the four Gospels in parallel columns. The real beginning in this direction was made by J. Griesbach, Synopsis Evangeliorum Matth. Marc. Luc. 1776, which was intended to serve as a basis for exegetical lectures on these three Gospels, which were then called synoptic Gospels. Among many subsequent works should be mentioned the Synopsis Evangelica of Tischendorf, first published in 1851, in which the entire text of the fourth Gospel is again included ; that of Anger (1851), which takes from John only the few real parallels to the text of the first three Gospels, and is, moreover, distinguished by a wealth of citations and parallels from the apocryphal and patristic literature of the second century (a book which deserves as do few to be reissued, with such alterations and extensions as time demands) ; and, finally, the handsomely printed Synopticon, An Exposition of the Common Matter of the Synoptic Gospels, by W. G. Rushbrooke, London, 1880, and a supplementary volume (without mention of the year) with appendices—(a) The Double Tradition of St. Matthew and St. Luke ; (b) The Single Tradition of Matthew ; (c) The Single Tradition of Luke. Finally, A. Wright, The Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek, with various readings and critical notes, 2nd ed., London, 1903.

2. (P. 402.) Famous examples of the harmonistics of the ancient Church are the discussions of the Last Supper in the Easter controversies about 190 ; Africanus' letter to Aristides on the genealogies of Matt. and Luke ; Eusebius' work, de Evangeliorum διαφωνία (Jerome, Vir. Ill. lxxxi. ; Eus. Quest. ad Stephanum, ad Marinum) ; the unfortunate attempts of Epiphanius in many places in his writings, especially in his article on the Alogi (Hær. li.) ; and Augustine, de Consensu Evangeliorum.

3. (P. 402.) When Eusebius remarks that one evangelist supplements another (e.g. in a Syriac fragment in Mai, Nova P. Bibl. iv. 1. 279 : "What Matthew omitted and did not say Luke relates, and what the latter does not tell the former does" ; cf. pp. 229, 265 f.), he simply states the actual conditions, not the conscious procedure of the evangelists. Epiphanius does speak of the supplementing of each Gospel by the one following, but it is the Spirit which "compels" the writers to all their work, and to this connection with their predecessors (Hær. li. 7, 12, cf. 6). Chrysostom, who emphasises the chronological succession of the Gospels, is the first to explain the brevity of Mark as designed in view of the already extant, fuller, and in many ways exhaustive presentation of Matt., though he gives it also as an additional reason that Mark depended on Peter, a man of few words, while Luke reproduced the fuller current of Paul's speech (Hom. iv. in Matt., Montf. vii. 46). He has no thought of an actual use of the earlier Gospel in the composition of the later ; on the contrary, he finds the little discrepancies between them a valuable proof that they were not written according to some questionable agreement, but that each evangelist told the simple truth to the best of his knowledge (Hom. i. p. 5 f.). Augustine (de Consensu Ev. i. 2. 4) goes further: "Et quamvis singuli suum quemdam narrandi ordinem tenuisse videantur, non tamen unusquisque eorum velut alterius præcedentis ignarus voluisse scribere reperitur vel ignorata prætermisisse, quæ scripsisse alius invenitur, sed sicut unicuique inspiratum est, non superfluum cooperationem sui laboris adiunxit. Nam Matthæus suscepisse intelligitur incarnationem domini secundum stirpem regiam et pleraque secundum hominum præsentem vitam facta et dicta eius. Marcus eum subsequutus tamquam pedisequus et breviator eius videtur. Cum solo quippe Ioanne nihil dixit, solus ipse perpauca, cum solo Luca pauciora, cum Matthæo vero plurima, et multa pene totidem atque ipsis verbis, sive cum solo, sive cum ceteris consonante (alter). Lucas autem, etc. § 5: Non autem habuit tamquam breviatorem coniunctum Lucas, sicut Marcum Matthæus. Et hoc fortasse non sine aliquo sacramento," etc. With regard to Matt., Mark, Luke (iii. 4. 13): "Tres igitur isti eandem rem ita narraverunt, sicut etiam unus homo ter posset cum aliquanta veritate, nulla tamen adversitate." Mark's close connection with Matt. is often further mentioned, e.g. iii. 4. 11. For the understanding of this work (written about 400) it is essential to bear in mind that, as Burkitt has shown (The Old Latin and the Itala, 1896, pp. 59, 72-78; cf. ThLb, 1897, col. 374), Augustine had before him Jerome's revision of the text of the Gospels, which was furnished with the Eusebian canons and sections. This arrangement of the Gospels, introduced by Jerome among the Latins, was plainly used by Augustine in his harmonistic work, as in Books II. and III. he compares Matt. with the parallels by means of the double figures noted upon it and Canons i.-vii., and then in Book IV. goes through the portions peculiar to each Gospel according to Canon x. When he says of Mark (see above), cum solo Ioanne nihil dixit, it is not the result of study, but simply of the fact that in Canons v.-ix. Eusebius provided for all possible combinations of two Gospels except Mark-John. Also, the remarks which follow were written with reference to the canons of Eusebius, or rather to a codex of the Gospels in the Vulgate, which lay open before him, and at the beginning of which he found Jerome's letter to Damasus and the canons which it explained. This very circumstance is a new proof that Augustine used the Vulgate as the basis of his de Consensu Evangeliorum.

4. (P. 402.) Calvin in the argument of his commentary on the harmony of the synoptic Gospels (ed. Tholuck, i. p. 6), besides an incorrect statement about Jerome and an unfair judgment of Eusebius, delivers, quite without proof, his own opinion that Mark never saw Matt. and that Luke never saw Matt. or Mark. Much sounder was the judgment of H. Grotius, who wrote of the title of Matt. (ed. Windheim, i. 13): "Sicut autem Marcus usus est Matthæi Ebræo, ni fallor, codice, ita Marci libro Græco usus mihi videtur, quiquis is fuit, Matthæi Græcus interpres." On this R. Simon (Hist. du Texte du NT, 1689, p. 108) remarked that only conjectures were possible.

5. (P. 403.) Lessing, Neue Hypothese über die Evangelisten als bloss menschliche Geschichtschreiber betrachtet, 1778; first published 1781 in Theol. Nachlass. Werke, ed. Lachmann-Maltzahn, xi. 2. 121-140.

6. (P. 404.) Eichhorn first developed his view in 1794 in the Allgemeine Bibliothek der biblischen Literatur, v. 759 ff., then in amended form in his Einleitung, i. 1804, 2te Aufl. 1820. In the latter was included a defence against hypotheses which had appeared meanwhile. Aside from the artificiality and pettiness of the treatment, which contrasts strongly with the broad conception of Lessing's sketch, one is painfully impressed by two particulars—first, the statement of the advantage of “this discovery of the original Gospel” in the “simplification of Christian doctrine for which German theology has been so earnestly striving for fifty years” (Einl. 2te Aufl. i. 445); and, secondly, an absolute silence with regard to Lessing, from whom Eichhorn derived the best of his material. After Herder (Vom Erlöser der Menschen, 1796, S. 174) had explained the true state of the case, it was not so much in order to herald Eichhorn as the founder of modern Gospel criticism, as to lament, with Herder, that Lessing did not work out his hypothesis himself.

7. (P. 405.) J. J. Griesbach first set forth his view briefly at the end of the Jena Easter Program for 1783 (Griesbachii Opusc. Acad., ed. Gabler, ii. 241–256: “Inquisitio in fontes, unde evangelistæ suas de resurrectione domini narrationes hauserint”), and then developed it in detail in two Programs, 1789 and 1790: “Commentatio, qua Marci ev. totum e Matthæi et Lucæ commentariis decerptum esse monstratur.” A revision, with a defence against criticisms which had been made meanwhile, appeared in Velthusen, Kuinoel, Ruperti, Comm. Theol. i. (1794), and was reprinted in Gabler, op. cit. 358–425. For his attitude toward Lessing, cf. S. 425.

8. (P. 405.) G. Herder, Vom Erlöser der Menschen nach den drei ersten Evv. 1796, 4 Abschnitt, S. 149–233; with more detail and definiteness in Von Gottes Sohn, der Welt Heiland nach Johannes' Ev. 1797, S. 303–416 (Herder's Werke, ed. Suphan, xix. S. 194–225, 260 f., 380–424). The theory is presented in brilliant and yet shifting lights, which make a brief and accurate restatement difficult. For instance, it is not clear how Herder could decide so positively against an original writing no longer extant (xix. 417), and yet hold that the primarily oral evangelium commune was at once written down by many, if only for private use (xix. 205, 207 f., 394 f., 408 f.). He seems also not to have determined definitely in his own mind what part was to be assigned to Matthew in the first writing of the original Hebrew Gospel, or of the later Palestinian Gospel, written about 60, which underlay the Greek Matt. and even the last form of our present Matt. (xix. 205, 401). The later discussion no longer speaks of the original unwritten Gospel as a “sacred epic,” as does the earlier (199—in distinction from myth, 2 Pet. i. 16), nor of the evangelists, whose narrations are in part oral, as rhapsodists (214, 217). Herder's protest against the idea of an “apostolic gospel-office” in Jerusalem (209 f.), and much of what he says of the character of the individual Gospels, is excellent. G. Chr. Storr (1746–1805), Ueber den Zweck der ev. Geschichte und der Briefe des Johannes, 1786; De Fonte Evv. Mat. et Luc. 1794. F. Hitzig, Ueber Johannes Marcus und seine Schriften, 1843, should be named here rather than among those mentioned in note 9. Without attempting to solve the synoptic problem, he undertook the defence of Mark against the unfavourable criticism which began with Griesbach, and by means of the supposition that 2 Cor. viii. 18 refers to Mark as the author of a Gospel, and that 1 Cor. vii. 10 presents a citation of Mark x. 1–12, was able to maintain that Mark had already begun to be circulated in 57 A.D., from which it then followed naturally that it served as a source for Matt. and Luke (37-62, 167-173). The chief object of the book was to show that John Mark was the writer not only of the Gospel, but of Rev. also.

9. (P. 407.) Chr. G. Wilke, Der Urevangelist oder evang.-krit. Untersuchung über das Verwandtschaftsverhältnis der drei ersten Evv. 1838. The number of those who have had the patience to read through this large book—almost 700 pages in extent—is probably not great. In its lack of historical perspective and vital ideas, as well as in its crude and self-sufficient spirit, which Wilke first introduced into the Gospel inquiry, it has not been without successors. Its only service is its opposition to Gieseler's hypothesis (26-152). The short sections peculiar to Mark which he wished to excise as later interpolations (672 ff.; cf. 323 ff., 463 ff., 552 f.) are for the most part the very ones which show us the individuality of Mark. Others are set aside in the most violent fashion. In Mark i. 13 the words πειραζόμενος ὑπὸ τοῦ σατανᾶ are an interpolation from Luke iv. 2 and not proper to Mark; the interpolators were "clever enough," however, to write the Markan σατανᾶς instead of the Lucan (e.g. 12) διάβολος (664 f.). "We give our hand and seal for all eternity that our result is correct" (684). Thus Wilke thought "to win the applause of impartial investigators of truth," which he states (694) to be the object of his work. Bruno Bauer, Kritik der ev. Geschichte, Bde. i.-iii. 1841-42, 2te Aufl. 1846. G. Volkmar, Die Evv. oder Marcus und die Synopse, 1870, and a supplement with continuous paging, Die kanon. Synoptiker in Uebersicht mit Randglossen und das Geschichtliche vom Leben Jesu, 1876. "The Gospel books are allegorical narrative elaborations of the one Gospel of Jesus and the apostles" (S. vii). The chronological summary (viii) is quite convenient: (1) Mark, circa 73; (2) Genealogus Hebræorum, circa 80; (3) perhaps Evangelium Pauperum, Essenorum, circa 80; (4) Luke, circa 100; (5) Matt. (the last of the Synoptists, as shown by Wilke, S. xi), circa 110; (6) Gospel of Peter, circa 130; (7) Marcion, 138; (8) Gospel of the Nazarenes according to the Twelve Apostles, circa 150; (9) Gospel of the Logos according to John, circa 155; (10) Gospel of the Egyptians, 160-170. On the other hand, Primitive Matt., Primitive Mark, Primitive Luke, Book of Maxims, etc., are mere fancies.

10. (P. 408.) J. L. Hug (1765-1846), after an uncompleted first attempt which the present writer knows only from the preface of 1808, published his Einleitung entire in that year, 3te Aufl. 1826, on the Gospels, ii. 1-243.

11. (P. 408, 410.) J. C. L. Gieseler, Historisch-kritischer Versuch über die Entstehung und die frühesten Schicksale der schriftlichen Evv. 1818; substantially published in 1817 in Keil and Tzschirner's Analekten, vol. iii. To illustrate the evangelists' accuracy of memory, Gieseler adduces (105 f.) Plato, Phædrus, p. 380; Cæsar, Bell. Gall. vi. 14 (the Druids and their pupils); August. Doctr. Christ. i. 4 (St. Anthony); Gregor. Magn. Dial. iv. 14. He also calls to mind (60) the Rabbinic method of teaching before the writing of the Mishnah; cf. Schurer, ii. 321-325, (Eng. trans.) ii. 1. 323-326. On the possibility of the oral perpetuation of whole books, cf. also Spiegel in ZDMG, ix. 178 ff. Wilke's criticism (see note 9 above) appealed particularly to the Johannine parallels of the synoptic Gospels (John vi. 1-21, xii. 1-xiii. 30, xviii. 1-xx. 23), but also to the materials peculiar to John, which show that neither in the choice of materials nor in the form of their presentation had any such fixed and uniform type of narration been developed among the apostles as a comparison of the three synoptic Gospels on the supposition of their mutual independence would indicate to be their common basis. The Gospel fragments in Paul (1 Cor. xv. 3-7 and xi. 23-25 compared with the corrected text of Luke xxii. 15-20 and with Matt. xxvi. 26-29, Mark xiv. 22-25) afford similar evidence (see above, p. 380 ff.). Wilke was also right in observing (119) that from Papias' comments on the discourses of Peter (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 15) one obtains a very different idea of the Gospel narratives of an apostle from that involved in an unwritten primitive Gospel. G. Wetzel, Die synoptischen Evv. eine Darstellung und Prüfung der wichtigsten über die Entstehung derselben aufgetretenen Hypothesen mit selbständigem Versuch zur Lösung der synopt. Evangelienfrage, 1883. K. Veit, Die synopt. Parallelen und ein alter Versuch ihrer Enträtselung mit neuer Begründung; two parts in one volume, 1897, Part I. the text arranged in an interlinear synopsis, Part II. an elucidation of the synoptic parallels.

12. (P. 411.) Fr. Schleiermacher, Ueber die Schriften des Lucas, ein krit. Versuch, first part (only), 1817; Werke, Zur Theol. vol. ii. 1-220. Schleiermacher began with Hug and Eichhorn, who, in his opinion, admirably refuted each other; before concluding he also noticed Gieseler's work in its earliest form (note 11). He left uncertain especially whether and how far Luke found the single narratives already combined in larger groups, and so used collections which came into existence before our Gospels (S. 13=10). In the lectures on introduction, also (Werke, Zur Theol. iii. 233, 239), we are left in the dark as to how these detached fragments and the incomplete collections arising from them were related to the "combining Gospels," of which, according to his prologue, Luke must already have known several. More important is "Ueber die Zeugnisse des Papias von unsern beiden ersten Evv.," ThStKr, 1832, S. 735-768; Werke, Zur Theol. ii. 361-392.

13. (P. 412, 414.) F. Chr. Baur, Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanon. Evv., ihr Verhältnis zu einander, ihren Charakter und Ursprung, 1847; Das Marcusev. nach seinem Ursprung und Charakter, 1851; Christentum und Kirche der drei ersten Jahrhunderte, 2te Aufl. S. 23 ff., 73 ff. In several respects Baur depended on the preliminary work of his pupils, such as Schwegler, Nachapostol. Zeitalter, 1846; A. Ritschl, Das Ev. Marcions und das kanon. Lucasev. 1846, and various dissertations by E. Zeller. Following Baur, Hilgenfeld (Die Evv. nach ihrer Entstehung und geschichtlichen Bedeutung, 1854) sought to lessen the emphasis on the ecclesiastical and dogmatic tendency of the Gospels, and to push their origin further back, the document underlying Matt. about 50-60 (S. 115), our Matt. about 70-80 (103), Mark shortly before 100 (148), Luke about 100-110 (224). The discussions in which he developed and partly modified his view are indicated in his Eint. 462. While Dr. Fr. Strauss in his new Leben Jesu für das deutsche Volk, 1864, S. 98 ff., and Th. Keim, Gesch. Jesu von Nazara, i. 1867, S. 44-103, agreed substantially with Baur's view and Griesbach's conclusion with regard to Mark, Hilgenfeld did Mark more justice, and also recognised the traditional account in so far as he allowed that Mark was written in Rome "under the influence of Petrine tradition," and even held it possible that, if Mark was still living at the time when the Gospel named for him was written (in the early part of Domitian's reign, say 81-85, Eint. 517), he was, not perhaps its author, but its author's sponsor (Eint. 518). C. Holsten, Die drei ursprünglichen, noch ungeschriebenen

Evv. Zur synopt. Frage, 1883; Die synopt. Evv. nach der Form ihres Inhalts, 1885, again undertook to explain the dissimilarity of the first three Gospels wholly on the basis of the dogmatic principles which dominated the apostolic time, and their agreement in material and form on the theory that Mark remodelled Matt. and that Luke worked over Matt. and Mark together. The three forms of the unwritten Gospel are: (1) the Jewish-Christian, which Peter preached until he lapsed into Judaism, A.D. 52-53; (2) that of Paul; (3) the anti-Pauline Gospel of the Judaisers. Our Matt. corresponds throughout with the first. Only Matt. v. 17-19 comes of a Judaising spirit foreign to that of Matt., perhaps from a Greek adaptation of the Λόγια of which Papias speaks, or from the original Gospel of Matt. or Gospel of the Hebrews, which was written at the time when Judaism was dominant in Jerusalem (53-70 A.D.), perhaps as early as 55, and apparently by the apostle Matthew (op. cit. 1883, S. 63, A. 2; 1885, S. 174 ff.). How and where the original Petrine Gospel maintained its existence after Peter's own lapse, so as to be revived after the destruction of the temple and reduced to writing in our Matt.; how the fertile author of this much more anti-Judaistic than anti-Pauline book could commit the folly of putting crass Judaism and the bluntest condemnation of lawless Paulinism in the mouth of Jesus, in only one passage, to be sure, but so significant a passage as v. 17-19; how the name of Matthew became affixed to a Gospel which with respect to the discourses of Jesus stands in sharp contrast to Matthew's Judaistic collection, and betrays its dependence on such a source in but one passage; how as early as 100 not this Petrine Matt. but Mark was connected with Peter,—these and other questions are not even raised. Matt. would be unacceptable to the Gentile Christian Churches, which would not abandon Paul's Gospel. To leave room for this, Mark is composed about 80 from the material of Matt. In place of the legal Sermon on the Mount appears the διδασχὴ καυρή, Mark i. 27, i.e. the Gospel of Paul, while ix. 30-32 betrays the opinion that by their failure to understand Jesus' death on the cross the first apostles were hampered in any complete understanding of the Gospel as a whole. At the beginning of the second century, when, through the simultaneous use of Matt. and Mark, Jewish Christian as well as Pauline ideas had struck root in the Churches, Paulinism had weakened, and circumstances called for the union of all Christians, a typical representative of these conditions worked Matt. and Mark into one, making use also of the oral tradition, which was not yet quite spent. This is the origin of Luke.

14. (P. 414, 415.) The more important works referred to under No. 8 above (p. 414 f.) are: Chr. H. Weisse, Die ev. Geschichte kritisch und philosophisch bearbeitet, 2 Bde. 1838; Die Evangelienfrage in ihrem gegenwärtigem Stadium, 1856. A. Ritschl, "Ueber den gegenwärtigen Stand der Kritik der synopt. Evv." in the Theol. Jahrbh. of Baur and Zeller, 1851, S. 481-538. H. J. Holtzmann, Die synopt. Evv., ihr Ursprung und geschichtlicher Charakter, 1863; he also pursued the subject in a number of later essays, and gave a convenient summary in his *Hand-Commentar*², i. 1892, S. 1-13. C. Weizsäcker, Untersuchungen über die ev. Geschichte, ihre Quellen und den Gang ihrer Entwicklung, 1864. In independent acceptance of the "two source theory," Wendling, Ueber Markus, Versuch einer Wiederherstellung der ältesten Mittheilungen über das Leben Jesu, 1905, has recently undertaken an analysis of Mark according to which three elements are to be clearly distinguished: (1) M^1 = a collection of sayings of Jesus in a brief but distinct narrative setting, beginning with i. 9, 16 (ἦλθεν Ἰησοῦς ἀπὸ Ναζ. τ. Γαλιλαίας καὶ παράγων κτλ.) and ending with xv. 34, 37 (καὶ τῇ ἐνάτῃ ὥρᾳ ὁ Ἰησοῦς ἀφ' οὗ φωνὴν μεγάλην ἐξέπνευσεν) (2) M^2 = narratives of miracles of Jesus in extended description, which is in part highly poetical, beginning with i. 4, closing with xvi. 8; (3) additions of the editing evangelist, e.g. i. 1-3, 14, 15, iii. 6-30, iv. 10-25, etc., naturally also xiii. 3-27.

15. (P. 417.) B. Weiss first developed his view in ThStKr, 1861, S. 29 ff., "Zur Entstehungsgesch. der drei synopt. Evv."; JhfDTh, 1864, S. 49 ff. "Die Redestücke des apostolischen Mt."; ibid. 1865, S. 319, "Die Erzählungsstücke des apostolischen Mt."; then in his commentaries: Das Marcusev. und seine synopt. Parallelen, 1872; Das Matthäusev. und seine Lucas-Parallelen, 1876, and in his comprehensive works, e.g. in his *Einl.*³ 1897, S. 453-560.

§ 51. THE TRADITION REGARDING MARK AND HIS GOSPEL.

John, with the surname Mark (n. 1), was the child of a Christian household in Jerusalem. In this home a large body of Christians were gathered for prayer at the time of the Passover—probably on the night of the Passover feast in the year 44 (Acts xii. 12). Since Mark's mother, Mary, is mentioned as the owner of this house, it may be regarded as certain that his father, whose name we do not know, was no longer living. Mark must have been grown up at the time and a member of the Church, since Paul and Barnabas, who visited Jerusalem shortly afterward, took him with them to Antioch, evidently with the intention of making use of his services in their work (Acts xii. 25). According to the usage of the apostolic age, the characterisation, "my son," employed by Peter some twenty years later (1 Pet. v. 13), can hardly mean anything else than that Mark was converted through Peter's influence, and possibly also baptized by him (n. 2). With this agrees the express statement of Papias, that Mark did not hear the Lord's preaching, nor accompany Him as a disciple, but that he sustained a relation of this kind only to Peter (see below in text, and n. 14). This proves that the view which appeared in the fourth century, according to which Mark was one of the Seventy (Luke x. 1), is a fable (n. 3). If the statement which Paul makes incidentally, to the effect that Mark was a cousin of Barnabas (Col. iv. 10), is to be taken to mean that they were cousins on their fathers' side, Mark, like Barnabas, was a Levite (Acts iv. 36), and, from this point of view, there would be nothing to prevent us from accepting the ancient tradition that Mark cut off his thumb in order to make himself ineligible to priestly service. The nickname "stump fingered," given Mark on this account, was commonly known at the beginning of the third century in Rome, where we should most naturally expect to find genuine traditions concerning Mark (n. 4). In this same quarter, according to the most probable emendation and interpretation of the beginning of the Canon Muratori, we meet the report that Mark had become acquainted with a number of the facts recorded by him through personal experience, though in general he had not heard Jesus' words nor witnessed his deeds (n. 5). The Fragmentist adds that Mark also presented these facts as he learned them. When we reflect how slightly noticeable the traces of first-hand knowledge in Mark really are,—if indeed they exist at all,—further, how late and with how much uncertainty it came to be suspected that the author was concealed in xiv. 51 (n. 6), and, finally, how little inclination and capability the commentators of the ancient Church showed in following up hints of this character in the N.T., it must be regarded as extremely improbable that the definite statement of the Fragmentist is the result of clever exegesis. It is far more likely to have been a reproduction of a tradition still current in Rome about the year 200. And, then, what is there to prevent the son of a Christian household in Jerusalem, who, in 44, was perhaps thirty or thirty-five years of age, from having witnessed some of the scenes in Jesus' life in the year 30, without his having been at the time one of those who heard and believed Jesus' preaching? According to another tradition (n. 7), the beginnings and development of which are as yet only imperfectly cleared up, Jesus celebrated His last Passover with His disciples (Mark xiv. 14) in the home of Mark and his mother (Acts xii. 12), where also the apostles were gathered with the women on the day of the ascension (Acts i. 13), and where the Spirit was poured out (Acts ii. 2). Without any legendary help concerning the place where these events occurred, this combination might have been made by a comparison of the texts, beginning with Acts xii. 12 and going backwards in the accounts. But this furnishes no occasion for suspecting the tradition of the Canon Muratori or the interpretation of Mark xiv. 51 f., which identifies the individual there mentioned with the evangelist. In the stories about the house of Mark the latter is occasionally identified with the person referred to in xiv. 13, but not with the youth in Mark xiv. 51 (n. 7).

If Mark came to Antioch in 44 with his cousin Barnabas and Paul, and if they took him along on their first missionary journey perhaps in the year 50 (Acts xiii. 5), we may assume that he helped them during the intervening years in their work as missionary preachers and teachers in the Church of Antioch (Acts xi. 26, xiii. 1), just as he did on the first missionary journey. He is not mentioned in Acts xiii. 1 among the teachers and prophets of the Antiochian Church, nor is he characterised in xiii. 5 as a preacher of the gospel having the same rank as Paul and Barnabas, but as one helping these two missionaries in their preaching in a comparatively subordinate position. He had a part in the work of missionary preaching (Acts xv. 38; Philem. 24), but as a servant of the missionaries, who "took him with them" (Acts xv. 37 f.). The representation of Mark's relation to the missionaries in Acts differs manifestly from the manner in which the part taken in Paul's preaching by Silvanus and other helpers is described in Acts xvi. 6, 10, 13, 32, xvii. 4; 2 Cor. i. 19; 1 Thess. i. 5 ff. On the other hand, it is in very striking agreement with what Paul says of Mark shortly before his own death, ἔστιν γάρ μοι εὐχρηστος εἰς διακονίαν (2 Tim. iv. 11, above, p. 371). The best way in which to explain this peculiar relation is to suppose that Mark, the spiritual son of Peter, and the son of a Christian household in Jerusalem in which a part of the mother Church was accustomed to assemble, could supply something which Paul lacked and which Barnabas, who left Jerusalem and entered the foreign missionary work much earlier than Mark, did not possess in the same measure, namely, a treasure of narratives from the lips of Peter and of other disciples of Jesus, who were accustomed to come and go in his mother's house. This knowledge of the details of the Gospel history (τῶν περὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ, above, p. 377, n. 2) must have been an invaluable help to the missionaries. Mark was better suited to be their ὑπηρέτης than were others, but appears to have lacked the dash and courage for the prosecution of the missionary work. When it was decided to press forward from Cyprus into Asia Minor, he separated himself from the missionaries and returned to his mother in Jerusalem (Acts xiii. 13), apparently from Paphos. A year later, however, we find him again in Antioch, though it is not indicated who it was that induced him to return thither (Acts xv. 37-39). Here a separation took place between Paul and Barnabas on Mark's account, Paul holding that his conduct on the first journey showed him to be unfitted for missionary service, and construing Barnabas' milder judgment in the case as due to his partiality for his cousin. In consequence, Paul took Silas and went to Asia Minor, while Barnabas and Mark returned to Cyprus, Barnabas' home. Here we lose trace of them: in fact, we do not hear of Barnabas again (vol. i. 433, n. 5). In the year 62 or 63, Mark appears again in Rome as one of the two Jewish missionaries, the method of whose work gave the apostle joy, in contrast to that of the other Jewish missionaries there (Col. iv. 10 ; vol. i. 450, n. 4). Paul is able to count him among his fellow-workers in Rome (Philem. 24). All traces of a strained relation between the two men has vanished. Since Mark had planned for some time to travel to the East, and on the occasion of this journey to visit also the interior of Asia Minor, Paul had commended him to the kindly reception of the readers of Colossians, to whom Mark had remained personally unknown, even before the letter was despatched in which the commendation is repeated (Col. iv. 10). We have no reason to doubt that Mark actually made this journey. A year or two later he is again in Rome along with Peter (1 Pet. v. 13). The fact that, with the exception of the greeting from the whole Roman Church to the Christians in Asia Minor, Mark's is the only greeting which Peter sends, proves that in the interval between his two residences in Rome, Mark had become acquainted with at least part of the Churches in Asia Minor. Whether he made his second journey to Rome in company with Peter, and whether he left Rome again after Peter's death in consequence of the Neronian persecution, we do not know ; but that he did both it is only natural to conjecture (above, p. 161 f.). At all events he was again in the East, apparently in Asia Minor, in 66, when Paul wrote his last letter to Timothy, in which he commissioned him to bring Mark with him to Rome, thinking that he could make further use of his services, even in his present condition (2 Tim. iv. 11). The tradition, according to which Mark preached the gospel in Egypt and became the first bishop of Alexandria, is ancient and very little contradicted, so that it is to be given a certain amount of credence ; though its date and circumstances cannot be determined with exactness (n. 8).

In two passages of his Hypotyposes which are mutually supplementary, Clement of Alexandria gives us an account of the origin of Mark's Gospel with numerous details, which he had learned, probably, from one of his teachers (n. 9). Although one of these reports is only a Latin translation and the other is preserved only in indirect discourse, still they suffice to show the inaccuracy of an account of Eusebius (n. 10) for which the latter quotes the authority of Clement and also of Papias. According to Clement, during the time that Peter was engaged in publicly preaching the gospel in Rome, persons of equestrian rank belonging to the royal court, who had heard Peter's preaching, requested Mark to write down what Peter had spoken, inasmuch as he had been associated with Peter from an early date, and therefore had his discourses in memory, in order that they too might impress the same upon their memories, and when the Gospel was completed to give the same over to those who had made this request of him. When Peter learned of this he neither hindered nor encouraged Mark in the undertaking. Notwithstanding this attitude of Peter, Mark complied with the request and wrote his Gospel, following Peter's narratives. On the other hand, according to Eusebius' presentation, Peter learned of the matter through a special revelation, whereupon he expressed his gratification at the zeal of those with whose wishes Mark complied, and, finally, approved of the Gospel after its completion, formally appointing it to be read in the Churches (n. 10). In contrast to this account of Eusebius, that of Clement is especially noticeable, on account of the very indifferent attitude which it makes Peter take toward the committing of his Gospel to writing by Mark. Eusebius' presentation belongs to the time when the word "Gospel" suggested at once a book, and when no effort was spared to exalt the authority of the written word; whereas Clement's account is in harmony with the spirit of an age when the unwritten form of the Gospel was dominant, and when the beginnings of a written Gospel in existence at the time were scarcely noticed (§ 48). Further, according to Clement, Peter's judgment did not have reference to the book after its completion, but to Mark's work in its inception. Even if it were possible grammatically to take Clement's account to mean that Peter did not learn of the matter until after Mark had written his Gospel and placed it in the hands of those who had requested its composition (n. 9), what is said of Peter's attitude is entirely against this construction of the passage. After a book has been composed and published it is possible to commend or to blame the person responsible, but not to hinder (κωλύειν) or encourage him (προτρέπεισθαι). What Peter noticed or learned from others were the transactions between those who heard his preaching and his disciple Mark leading up to the composition of a Gospel by Mark, and besides this, at most, the inception of the work by Mark. Then it was possible for Peter either to forbid the writing of such a book, or to add his request to that of his hearers and encourage Mark to compose a Gospel. He did neither, but let things take their own course.

So understood, this account is not in irreconcilable contradiction with the statement of Irenæus, that Mark published or gave his Gospel to the Church after the death of Peter and of Paul (pp. 393 f., 398, n. 7). Although the expression which Irenæus uses with reference to Mark (τὰ ὑπὸ Πέτρου κηρυσσόμενα ἐγγράφως ἡμῖν παραδέδωκεν) does not indicate so clearly as what he says about Matthew (γραφὴν ἐξήνεγκεν εὐαγγελίου) and John (ἐξέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον), the publication of the completed Gospel, still this is in every respect the most natural way in which to understand his words. It may therefore very well be the case that Mark was requested to write his Gospel during Peter's stay in Rome, which possibly did not cover an entire year, and actually began the preparation of the work during this time, and that he did not complete it until three years later, or, if the book was never finished (§ 52), that he did not decide until then to publish it, i.e. did not direct or allow the multiplication of copies for wider circulation. Irenæus does not say expressly that Mark was written in Rome, but he takes for granted that this fact is known; for only on this presupposition can we understand why he sets its date after the death of the two apostles who laboured in Rome. At any rate, the tradition that Mark was written in Rome is not an invention of Clement or of his authorities. Evidently Papias had already borne witness to this fact (above, p. 163, and below, n. 10). This, for good reasons, was accepted generally (n. 11). The same is true of the connection between Mark's Gospel and the narratives of Peter. The earliest witnesses for this connection are not Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, Origen, and later authors (n. 11), but, as will be shown immediately, it is attested as early as the close of the first century. Moreover, it is misleading to judge of this relation from short, incidental references, which because of their fragmentary character are easily misunderstood, instead of from the oldest accounts concerning it. What Clement says is not to the effect that Mark wrote down the sermons which Peter preached in Rome; any attentive hearer, who was able to write, could have done that equally as well as Mark. The reason why the request was made of Mark especially was rather because, unlike the Romans, who had become followers of Peter only recently, he had been his disciple for a long time, i.e. at a much earlier period had been associated with him, and had had abundant opportunity to hear and have impressed upon his memory Peter's narratives. This account is not, therefore, in any way contradictory of Mark's personal history, according to which from 44 on he was constantly in the company of Paul or Barnabas, and, so far as we know, was not again in the constant companionship of Peter until 63 or 64 in Rome. In spite of this separation, he was and continued to be a "son" of Peter, as it is quite possible that for a decade prior to his entrance upon foreign missionary service he had heard Peter's narratives and addresses in his mother's house (Acts xii. 12-17; cf. ii. 42, 46, v. 42). When he was privileged, two decades later, to rejoin Peter in Rome, all these recollections of his earlier years must have been renewed, and of this experience his presentation of the Gospel facts must show traces, if the narrative was written in Rome at that time. The designation of the Gospel specifically as the Gospel of Peter, to be found as early as the time of Justin (n. 12), and employed by numerous writers of Tertullian's time, was an abbreviated expression for this relation of Mark's Gospel to Peter's preaching and narratives. This form of expression did not, however, become established in the usage of the Church, and disagrees entirely with the oldest testimony concerning Mark, namely, that of Papias and of his teacher John, or simply "the Presbyter," as Papias calls him in the passage where he reproduces his opinion concerning Mark.

The question, so long disputed, as to the identity of the presbyter John—whether he is the apostle John, as Irenæus thought, or, as Eusebius claims to have discovered, a person bearing the same name, but to be distinguished from the apostle John—cannot be decided here in this incidental connection (n. 13). Every reader of Papias' fragments, and everyone acquainted with the other traditions regarding the apostle, the author, and the teacher John, may be asked to give unconditional assent to the following statements: (1) Until toward the close of the first century there was living in Ephesus a John, who had attained an extreme old age, and who enjoyed the greatest distinction in the Church of the province of Asia, exercising a decisive influence upon its development. (2) Prominent among the personal disciples of the same were Polycarp, the bishop of Smyrna, who likewise lived to a very great age, and was put to death by burning on the 23rd of February 155; and Papias, the bishop of Hierapolis, who lived at least until Hadrian's time (117-138), and who apparently in his extreme old age, somewhere about the year 125, wrote his work, entitled λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξήγησις, in five volumes. (3) According to the unanimous tradition—whether this be biographical, having relation to his disciples; or of a literary and historical character, dealing with writings attributed to him; or legendary, concerning his own person,—this teacher of Polycarp and of Papias was the only person bearing the name of John who, during the last decades of the first century, was in any way distinguished in the Churches of Asia Minor. Eusebius attempted to prove that, in addition to the apostle and evangelist John, whom with all the older tradition he identifies with the John of Ephesus and the teacher of Polycarp, there lived in Asia Minor a presbyter John, who was not an apostle, but the teacher of Papias. However, he went only half way with his criticism. The single John of Ephesus, whom the tradition knows, cannot be divided into two: the teacher of Polycarp cannot be separated from the teacher of Papias. Whether, on the other hand, the one John of Ephesus was one of the twelve apostles, i.e. the son of Zebedee, or whether, in consequence of the similarity of name, he had been confused with him by the entire tradition before Eusebius' time, cannot be decided merely by the interpretation of a fragment of Papias' preface. The tradition of the Church concerning John of Ephesus is always open to different interpretations, so that it must be left out of consideration, and the question decided primarily from the testimony of the writings themselves which are ascribed to this John (Part X.). (4) As is shown by the very first mention of his name in Papias' preface (ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης, Eus. II. E. iii. 39. 4; twice repeated by Eusebius in this form, §§ 7, 14, not Ἰωάννης ὁ πρεσβύτερος), and still more clearly in Papias' statement concerning Mark (καὶ τοῦτο ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἔλεγε), the John to whom Papias refers was so commonly called "the elder" among his disciples that this expression, used as a title of honour for the aged teacher, could at times be employed instead of his own name. This fact is confirmed by the greetings of 2 John and 3 John; and the case is entirely analogous to that of Clement of Alexandria, who was in the habit of citing one of his teachers—all of whom were dead, and whom he designates collectively as "the Elders"—simply as ὁ πρεσβύτερος or ὁ μακάριος πρεσβύτερος, without name or other definite designation.

(5) The John of Papias, like a certain Aristion whom Papias mentions in the preface together with John, and who is frequently cited with him in the course of the work as authority for various traditions (op. cit. §§ 4, 7, 14), was a μαθητὴς τοῦ κυρίου. As is self-evident, this expression does not mean "a Christian" or "a true Christian," but a personal disciple of Jesus. This is made clear beyond all doubt by the context; for immediately preceding is a list of names, beginning with Andrew and ending with Matthew, the whole concluding with the words ἢ τις ἕτερος τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν. This is the only interpretation which corresponds to the usage of the second century. The reason why Papias does not call even Andrew and Peter apostles, is the fact that their significance for him—namely, their confirmation of the Gospel tradition as those who had heard and seen Jesus—had nothing to do with their apostolic office; for him, Aristion, who was not one of the apostles, was just as important a witness as the apostle Thomas, or indeed more so, since Papias had had no opportunity to see or hear Thomas, as he had Aristion. His point of view is that of one seeking trustworthy tradition concerning Jesus; consequently he makes no distinction between those who were apostles and those who were not apostles, but designates those who had seen and heard Jesus μαθηταὶ τοῦ κυρίου or πρεσβύτεροι respectively, according as he thinks of them in relation to Jesus or in relation to himself and the generation in which he lived.

The individual in question is therefore a Palestinian Jewish Christian settled in Asia Minor, and called John—in other words, according to the unanimous tradition of the second century, the apostle John, whose statements Papias cites in numerous passages of his work, partly as he heard them from John's own lips, partly as they had come to him through other disciples of his.

One of these citations made by Papias reads as follows : “ This also the Presbyter said (or, was accustomed to say), ‘ Mark, who was (or, who became) an interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately all that he remembered of what the Lord had said or done, though this was not (set forth) in order ’ ” (n. 14). Not only the formula with which the words of the Presbyter are introduced (καὶ τοῦτο ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἔλεγε), but also the way in which the Presbyter introduces Mark's name (Μάρκος μὲν), shows that in the preceding account by Papias there were other sayings of the Presbyter, which while dealing with related topics, having reference possibly to earlier records of Jesus' sayings, did not concern Mark in particular. He is introduced in contrast to what precedes. The understanding of the concise opinion of the Presbyter is rendered somewhat easier by the explanatory remarks which Papias adds directly after his teacher's words. These would be of still greater use to us if Eusebius had copied also the passage preceding the citation from the Presbyter, to which Papias refers expressly in this passage. Papias says as follows : “ He (Mark) neither heard the Lord nor followed Him (as a disciple); but later, as remarked (he heard and followed) Peter, who constructed the discourses which he used in teaching as necessity required, but not as he would have done in preparing a written account of the Lord's sayings. So, then, Mark made no mistake when he wrote down some things as he remembered them, since he was concerned only for one thing, namely, to omit nothing that he had heard, and not to say anything in his account that was false." It is clear from the words of John, as well as from the explanation which Papias adds, that unfavourable opinions had been expressed concerning Mark's book in the circle to which Papias and John belonged. Only the purpose to counteract such opinions enables us to understand John's ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν and Papias' οὐδὲν ἡμαρτεν. What had been particularly noticed in John's vicinity, what John himself admitted in the words οὐ μέντοι τάξει, and what Papias apologised for at length, was the lack of order. Variation from the order of another Gospel cannot be here meant; for in this case the point of criticism and defence would have to be the contradiction between Mark and the recognised authority of another evangelist, and not want of order in general, more specifically, as Papias' apology shows even more clearly than John's statement,—want of an order such as might be expected in the case of one who had been a witness of Jesus' words and deeds. The John who spoke with his disciples concerning Mark was such an αὐτόπτης καὶ ἀντήκοος. Whether or not at this time he himself had already written a Gospel, or wrote one later, his disciples at all events were accustomed to hear his narrative concerning Jesus' words and deeds. Judged by this standard, Mark's book seemed to them to lack plan, and to present things out of their proper chronological order. That a personal disciple of Jesus, in speaking of the correct order of Jesus' words and deeds, could mean no other order than that in which he remembered them, is self-evident. If a book were the standard by which a man of letters, ancient or modern, judges another book for himself and his readers, he could not fail to cite such a work, whether it was his own or that of another. The lack in Mark's Gospel, which John and Papias both admit, they explain and condone by pointing out that Mark was not a disciple of Jesus, but a disciple of Peter; on this account he was not able to narrate what he himself had seen and heard, but was bound by Peter's discourses, which from their very nature were not adapted to give a connected and chronological view of Jesus' work as a teacher, consisting as they did always merely of separate stories, intended, as the case might be, for instruction or edification. Even though we do not possess the preceding section of Papias' work, to which he refers in ὡς ἔφη, and in which he had spoken, probably, of the origin of Mark's Gospel in Rome (n. 10), we see that Papias is not thinking here of Mark's relation to Peter as that of a missionary helper, but as that of a disciple under the instruction of his master, as shown by the fact that he does not speak of Peter's preaching, but of the discourses delivered by him in teaching. The memory upon which Mark draws goes back to his youth. He owes it to the relation in which he stood to Peter prior to his entrance upon foreign missionary work, a relation the existence of which we infer from 1 Pet. v. 13 and from Acts xii. 12-17, and which is noticed also in Clement's account (above, p. 431 f.). Now Papias does not say that Mark wrote down Peter's oral Gospel word for word, as might possibly be inferred from Irenæus, Clement, Origen, and Eusebius by a prejudiced interpretation of their statements (above, p. 398; below, n. 11). According to Papias, the responsibility of authorship is entirely Mark's; and this responsibility he is able to bear, if only unreasonable demands be not made of him, and if it be borne in mind that he was not a disciple of Jesus, but only a disciple of Peter.

Papias expressly limits the dependence of Mark's Gospel upon the discourses of Peter to some portions of the Gospel. Papias' judgment, οὐδὲν ἡμαρτε Μάρκος, οὕτως ἔνα γράψας, ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευσεν, has been interpreted to mean that he is attempting to defend Mark against the charge of having reported only part of the Gospel history in his book; but this has against it not only the wording of the passage which emphasises οὕτως—ὥς and not ἐνία, but common sense as well. At the time when John xx. 30, xxi. 25 was written, or shortly afterward, and in the circle of Papias, who, dissatisfied with the information supplied by the Gospel literature already in existence, was constantly searching for traditions that were as yet unwritten, the criticism of a single Gospel on the ground that it was incomplete would have been laughed out of court. What Papias defends is the method of Mark's presentation. It is not the account of one who saw and heard Jesus, but that of a disciple of one of the apostles, dependent upon the discourses of one who was an apostle and an original witness. More than this, the discourses upon which he was dependent were not designed to give an historical survey of Jesus' life, but were intended for an entirely different purpose. With reference to these is to be judged also the one purpose which, in positive and negative form, Papias indicates Mark to have had in view. Under similar circumstances an unscrupulous author might have yielded to the temptation to add to the discourses which he heard all sorts of invention of his own, with a view to rendering the stories more interesting or pleasing, or in order to remove also single features which might make an unfavourable impression. Mark did neither, but reproduced Peter's discourses, naturally in so far as he recorded them at all, accurately, without leaving anything out or making additions of his own. Incidentally, however, we learn that in Papias' opinion this close dependence upon Peter's narratives was to be noticed in some passages of Mark's Gospel. This observation is of a character exactly similar to that of the Canon Muratori (above, p. 428 f.), to the effect that here and there in Mark's account there are passages which might lead one to suppose that he narrated as an eye-witness of certain events, which he had experienced. When Papias claims that Mark was not a disciple of Jesus, but a disciple of Peter, he does not deny this observation and claim of the Fragmentist; quite as little does Papias' opinion that in numerous passages Mark appears to be dependent upon the discourses delivered by Peter in teaching invalidate the observation of later critics that he is largely dependent upon an older document containing an account of the Gospel history. In the light of Papias' full explanation is to be understood also the statement of his teacher John, which is so brief as to be enigmatical. According to John also, Mark drew upon his memory, and in his opinion, as in Papias', this must have been his recollection of Peter's narratives. When John praises the accuracy of all that Mark remembered of what he had heard Peter say, and when in his closing sentence Papias declares with reference to this accuracy that Mark was careful not to omit or arbitrarily to change anything that he heard, their words do not in turn imply that Mark's book contained nothing else than reproductions of Peter's narratives. On the contrary, John hints that where this source of memory failed him Mark's presentation actually shows want of accuracy. For this very reason he fails to reproduce exactly the order of events in the Gospel history. John does not mention expressly whose the account was in dependence upon which Mark wrote his accurate narratives, which would be incomprehensible, if he had not thought that this point was clear to his followers from the words ἐρμηνευτῆς Πέτρου γινόμενος. This very omission on John's part is of itself decisive proof that the expression does not mean that on Peter's missionary tours Mark acted as his interpreter, a misunderstanding which comes to light in a half uncertain way for the first time in Jerome, who is the only writer in antiquity to advocate the view (n. 12 end). Furthermore, if this were the meaning of the words, it would be incomprehensible that Papias, in his comparatively full explanation of the words of his teacher, should not refer in any way to this office of Mark, or say anything about the language in which Peter taught, and the language into which Mark translated the words of Peter, either orally or in writing, but that he should speak only of the close connection between Peter's narratives and Mark's account of the same, and of Mark's relation of discipleship to Peter as explaining this close connection. The same is true of all those who after Papias' time repeat John's expression (ἐρμηνευτής, interpreter), namely, Irenæus, Tertullian, and Jerome (above, p. 398, and below, n. 12). Equally noteworthy is the fact that Clement, Origen, and also Eusebius, to whom we are indebted for John's testimony, never say anything about Mark's being Peter's interpreter, and especially when speaking of the dependence of Mark's Gospel upon Peter, they avoid the word ἐρμηνευτής; and, on the other hand, always emphasise the one fact that Mark's relation to Peter was that of a disciple (n. 12). Ancient scholars were safe against this error, because they knew that, except for his work among the "Hebrews" in Palestine, Peter, like Paul, needed only the Greek language in all the places to which the ancient tradition represents him to have gone—Palestine, Antioch, and Rome. Inasmuch as he was proficient in this language, they knew also that he did not need an interpreter, which was actually the case (vol. i. pp. 34–72, 112 f.; above, p. 112). Even though Mark, who had lived since the year 44, where Greek was the dominant language, may have acquired greater readiness in the use of the Greek idiom than Peter,—of which, however, his Gospel in comparison with 2 Peter shows no evidence,—the idea that Mark performed the office of an interpreter, translating Peter's Aramaic discourses into Greek, or what is still more impossible, his Greek sermons into Latin, cannot be held by anyone having any knowledge at all of language conditions in the apostolic age. For this reason, therefore, this view is not to be attributed to the presbyter John. With his disciples, who did not need to be informed by him, to begin with, what language Peter used in Antioch and Rome, or what the personal relation was in which Mark stood to Peter, John could speak of Mark's reproduction of Peter's narratives figuratively, and say that it was by virtue of the composition of his book he became Peter's interpreter (n. 15). To those who had not heard Peter tell the story concerning Jesus, he supplies these narratives. Herein lay the strength of Mark's Gospel, but likewise its pardonable weakness.

Of greater weight even than this estimate of Mark's writing by a disciple of Jesus is the fact that, between the years 75 and 100, a book dealing with the words and deeds of Jesus, and written by a disciple of Peter, was in existence in the province of Asia, and had attracted the attention of Christians in that region. This is attested also by other facts. Our Fourth Gospel, which originated in this same region, and which is assigned by the unanimous tradition to John of Ephesus, shows clear traces of its author's acquaintance with Mark (§ 66). Furthermore, there is a credible tradition that Mark was the favourite Gospel of the school of Cerinthus, who lived in Ephesus in John's old age (n. 16). Finally, it is self-evident that there was no doubt in Papias' mind as to the identity of Mark's book, of which he had heard his teacher speak, with the one used in the Church of Asia Minor at the time when he wrote (125 A.D. or somewhat later). Papias' testimony and the wide circulation which the above-mentioned facts show that Mark had among the Christians in and about Ephesus even before the close of the first century, exclude the possibility that in the interval between the days of John and the time when his opinion was recorded by his disciple Papias, Mark had been recast into what was practically another book, and the original edition replaced by this modified form of the Gospel after the former had already widely circulated without this change having been noticed. John's judgment has reference, therefore, to the canonical Mark.

1. (P. 427.) Acts xii. 12, Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἐπικαλουμένου Μάρκου, cf. xii. 25, xv. 37, might mean that at the time of the composition of Acts, and in the circle for which Acts was written, Mark regularly bore this Roman prænomen as a cognomen, while at the time of the events here related, and especially in Jerusalem, he was known only as John. In Acts xiii. 5, 13 the Hebrew name corresponding to that early period would be retained, while in Philem. 24, Col. iv. 10, 2 Tim. iv. 11, 1 Pet. v. 13, the Roman name is used which was given him later, and was the only one current among the Gentile Christians. But as ἐπικληθέντα has the weight of evidence in Acts xii. 25, the present in xii. 12, xv. 37 cannot be pressed, but is to be regarded as an imperfect participle. Moreover, the name Mark is too unimportant to receive later an additional name, as in Acts iv. 36. John, then, doubtless bore a Latin name along with his Hebrew name from the beginning, like Joseph Barsabbas, surnamed Justus (Acts i. 23), Jesus—Justus (Col. iv. 11), Silas—Silvanus (vol. i. 31 f., 207 f.), Saul—Paul (vol. i. 69 f.). The attempts to distinguish two Marks in the N.T. hardly need refutation in these days; cf. Schanz' Kom. über Mk. S. 2.

2. (P. 427.) 1 Pet. v. 13, Μάρκος ὁ υἱός μου; cf. 1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2; Tit. i. 4; Philem. 10; 1 Cor. iv. 15, 17.

3. (P. 428.) Adamantius, Dial. contr. Marcion (ed. Bakhuyzen, p. 10, written circa 300–313; ZfKG, ix. 238), in opposition to the Marcionites, includes Mark and Luke among the seventy or seventy-two disciples. So Epiph. Hær. xx. 4 (with Justus, Barnabas, Apelles, Rufus, Niger); with reference to Mark, in particular, cf. Hær. li. 6, with the further embellishment that Mark was one of those disciples who, according to John vi. 66, deserted the Master, but was afterwards reconverted by Peter.

4. (P. 428.) Hippol. Refut. vii. 30, says, in an argument against Marcion: τούτους (τοῖς λόγους) οὔτε Παῦλος ὁ ἀπόστολος οὔτε Μάρκος ὁ κολοβοδάκτυλος ἀνήγγειλαν—τούτων γὰρ οὐδὲν ἐν τῷ κατὰ Μάρκον εὐαγγελίῳ γέγραπται—ἀλλὰ Ἐμπεδοκλῆς. It is not a sufficient explanation of the designation of Mark as κολοβοδάκτυλος to say that by its use Hippolytus indicated the incompleteness of Mark's gospel,—the lack of an introductory history and a proper ending,—and at the same time accounting for the mutilated gospel of Marcion. This is the view of Duncker and Schneidewin ad loc., who also accept a biographical tradition concerning the meaning of the epithet; also of Bartlet (JThS, 1904, Oct. pp. 121–124) in the sense that this passage of Hippolytus was the source of the later legends. Hippolytus assumed that the Gospel of Mark was, like Paul, an authority on which Marcion relied, and so held, mistakenly, that Marcion's Gospel, which depends on Luke, was an adaptation of Mark. So it is not the fact that Marcion, as Wordsworth is inclined to suppose (N.T. Lat. sec. ed. Hieron. i. 173), once called Mark stump-fingered, in order to characterise him as indolent or cowardly; on the contrary, Hippolytus gives him this title, as he gives Paul the title of apostle, as an honour. The incidental way in which this is done presupposes about 230 in Rome a general acquaintance with this epithet of Mark's. This may be read in the old prologue to Mark (Wordsworth, N.T. Lat. sec. ed. S. Hier.

onymi, i. 171; Corssen, Monarchianische Prologue, 1896, S. 9 f.): "Marcus evangelista dei et Petri in baptisinate filius atque in divino sermone discipulus, sacerdotium in Israhel agens, secundum carnem Levita, conversus ad fidem Christi evangelium in Italia scripsit . . ." (p. 172 f.). "Denique amputasse sibi post fidem pollicem dicitur, ut sacerdotio reprobis haberetur, sed tantum consentiens fidei prædestinatæ (Corssen, S. 10, 16, prædestinata) potuit electio, ut nec sic in opere verbi perderet, quod prius meruerat in genere; nam Alexandriae episcopus fuit." According to the Targum on Ps. cxxxvii. 4, to which Nestle calls attention ZfNTW, 1903, S. 347, the Levites tore off their thumbs with their teeth, and said: "How shall we sing a hymn of thanksgiving to Yahweh on foreign soil." The thumb and especially that on the right hand (Ps. cxxxvii. 5) is as essential for playing the accompaniment of a hymn on a harp or zither (Ps. cxxxvii. 2; 1 Sam. xvi. 23; 1 Kings x. 12; Jos. Ant. vii. 12. 3), as is the tongue for singing. Both duties were laid upon the Levites. Moreover, cf. the story of the hermit Ammonius (Hist. Laus. ed. Butler, p. 33), who cut off his left ear in order that, in accordance with the Jewish law, he might incapacitate himself for the office of bishop. The account about Mark, which is found in essentially the same form in Arabic MSS. (ZDMG, viii. 586, xiii. 475) is not incredible. Harnack's appeal (ZfNTW, 1902, S. 165 f.) to ἰερέων Acts vi. 7 (see vol. i. p. 66, n. 12), which is textually doubtful, signifies little. It is, moreover, possible that κολοβοδάκτυλος was originally applied as an epithet to Mark, because of a congenital shortness of the fingers or a finger, which was noticeable, and then later was explained as referring to an intentional mutilation. The matter is thus represented in an old MS. of the Vulgate in Toledo (Wordsworth, p. 171): "Marcus, qui et colobodactylus est nominatus, ideo quod a cetera (ad ceteram) corporis proceritatem digitos minores habuisset." Cf. concerning James "the less" and Barsabbas Justus "with the flatfoot" Forsch. vi. 345 f., 349 f.

5. (P. 428.) The only words which remain of the account of Mark in Can. Mur. (line 1, "quibus tamen interfuit et ita posuit") express the idea above mentioned, if we read [ali]quibus (GK, ii. 5, 15-18, 140). Even without assuming that the words used (line 6) with reference to Luke, "dominum tamen nec ipse vidit in carne," compare him with Mark and not with Paul (cf. per contra, GK, ii. 30), we may infer that the Fragmentist knew the older tradition, according to which Mark was not a disciple of Jesus, and conclude from tamen that he repeated it, and maintained, on the other hand, "ali-quibus tamen interfuit."

6. (P. 428.) With regard to the fleeing youth, Mark xiv. 51 f., various opinions were current even in early times. (1) Some would see in him the apostle John. So, without any justification, Ambrose (on Ps. xxxvi., ed. Bened. i. 891) and Peter Chrysologus (Sermo, 78, 150, 170, Migne, 52, col. 421, 600, 645). That this view originated on Greek soil is evident from the opposition of an anonymous writer in the Calena Patr. Græc., ed. Possinus, p. 327. Epiph. Hær. lxxviii. 13, in a more precise reference, shows that he was acquainted with this view, and accepted it as correct as a matter of course. The lack of clearness in his statement, however, led to a misunderstanding as early as the Middle Ages, and also in the first edition of this Introduction, namely, that he identified the fleeing youth with James, the Lord's brother. His meaning is rather that James, who is said to have worn only linen clothing, is to be compared in this particular with the sons of Zebedee; and he appeals to Mark xiv. 51 for support, assuming as well known that the youth there mentioned was one of these latter; cf. Forsch. vi. 231. This cannot be an original tradition, for it is plain that the young man is not one of the circle of apostles. At the same time the view, in this form, can hardly have arisen through mistaken exegesis; for the old tradition that John was the youngest of the apostles (cf. the writer's Acta Jo. cxxviii., cxxxiv.; also Theod. Mops. In Ev. Jo., ed. Chabot, pp. 3, 15), and a combination of this tradition with the word νεανίσκος, is not a sufficient explanation. On the contrary, we cannot avoid the conjecture that the evangelist John Mark has here been confused with the evangelist and apostle John, as has happened in other cases also (see note 7 below). (2) The original tradition, which is found in Epiphanius and Ambrose, but obscured by this confusion, presents the view that John Mark, who did not belong to the Apostolic circle, was the fleeing youth. The same is presupposed in Can. Mur. (see above, note 5). It is instructive to notice, in this connection, that the Cyprian monk Alexander, of the sixth century, who had access to many old books, in his encomium on Barnabas (Acta SS. Jun. tom. ii. 440, § 13), gives it as an old tradition that Mark was the man with the pitcher of water, Mark xiv. 13, whereas the monk Epiphanius (ed. Dressel, p. 36) states that in the opinion of many the master of the house, Matt. xxvi. 18, was the apostle John. (3) The idea that the young man was James the Just, the Lord's brother, is mentioned by Theophylact and Euthymius (Migne, 123, col. 657; 129, col. 693), and rests, as is particularly plain in Theophylact's case, simply on the misunderstanding of Epiphanius of which we have already spoken. (4) According to Cat. in Ev. sec. Marcum, ed. Possinus, p. 326, Victor of Antioch commented on Mark xiv. 51: ἴσως ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκίας ἐκείνης, ἐν ᾗ τὸ πᾶσχα ἔφαγον, καὶ οὐδὲν ξένον. Casaubon, Essev. ad Baronii Ann. (1663), p. 524, made use of this statement, and argued from the young man's singular costume that he must have risen from his bed, comparing appropriately Dionys. Alex. in Eus. H. E. vi. 40. 7: μένων ἐπὶ τῆς εὐνῆς, ἧς ἤμην γυμνὸς ἐν τῷ λινῷ ἐσθῆματι, τὴν δὲ λοιπὴν ἐσθῆτα παρακειμένην αὐτοῖς ὤρεγον. Cf. Herodotus, ii. 95, ἣν μὲν ἐν ἱματίῳ ἐνειλιζάμενος εὖδῃ (sc. ὁ ἀνὴρ) ἢ σινδόνι.

7. (P. 429.) The complicated tradition concerning the house mentioned in Acts xii. 12 is carefully investigated in the article on "Die Dormitio S. Virginis und das Haus des Johannes Markus" in the NKZ, 1899, S. 377-429 (also published separately, Leipzig, 1899). According to Epiphanius, De Mens. et Pond. 14, a small Christian church stood in the time of Hadrian on the plot of ground before what is now the Zion Gate, a portion of which was presented by the Sultan to Emperor William II., and transferred by him to the German Catholics on October 31, 1898. On its site a larger church was built, probably about 340, which Cyril, about 348, called "the church of the apostles in the upper city" (Catech. xvi. 4), but which by the end of the same century was usually known as ἡ ἀγία Σιών. According to numerous testimonies from the period 380-420, this was regarded as the place, (1) of the institution of the Lord's Supper, the cœnaculum (Mark xiv. 14-25), (2) of the outpouring of the Spirit (Acts ii. 2), (3) of the appearances of the risen Christ in Jerusalem (John xx. 19-28; Luke xxiv. 36 ff.), (4) of the gathering in Acts i. 13 f., and also (5) as the regular meeting-place of the primitive Church under its first bishop, James. Not till the pilgrim Theodosius, about 525 (Itin. Hieros., ed. Geyer, p. 141. 7, "ipse fuit domus sancti Marci evangelistæ"), and the monk Alexander, several decades later (Encom. in Barn. §§ 12, 13; see the preceding note), do we find the identification of the "Holy Zion" with the house of Mary the mother of Mark (Acts xii. 12), but it appears then not as a conjecture, but as an unquestioned tradition. Only after the conquest of Jerusalem by the Persians in 614 was the opinion gradually, and at first quite timidly, advanced among the patriarchs and festival preachers of Jerusalem, that the "Holy Zion" was rather the house of the apostle John, in which he received his adoptive mother, Mary the mother of Jesus (John xix. 26). Apart, too, from the disagreement of older traditions with regard to the dwelling of the mother of Jesus and the house in which she died, it is clear that after 614 the evangelist and apostle John and his adoptive mother began to displace the evangelist John Mark and his own mother.

8. (P. 431.) Eusebius, H. E. ii. 16, notices as a report that Mark was a preacher in Egypt of the Gospel which he had already committed to writing (according to ii. 15, in Rome), and the first to found Churches in Alexandria. Cf. Jerome, Vir. Ill. viii. In Chron. ad anno Abrah. 2057, Eusebius also refrains from calling him bishop outright, though he begins the succession in that city with Mark (anno Abrah. 2077; H. E. ii. 24). Nothing more than this is affirmed by Theophilus in John Malalas, lib. x. p. 252, ed. Bonn., who is perhaps no other than the old Antiochian bishop and apologete about 180 (cf. Forsch. ii. 6 f., iii. 58 f.). According to Eusebius, Theoph. iv. 6, ed. Gressmann, p. 20 Greek, p. 174 according to Syriac; cf. the Hypothesis of Victor or of Cyril in Combefis, Auct. Noviss. i. 436; Cramer, Cat. in Matt. et Marc. p. 265; as well as Epiph. Har. li. 6, Nicetas in Combefis, op. cit. 431, and others, Peter sent Mark as his substitute from Rome to Egypt. The tradition which brings him to Alexandria without touching Rome sounds still less historical (Acta Barnabæ, xxvi., ed. Tisch. 73; Acta Marci, Migne, 115, col. 164 f.; the Armenian Bibles, cf. Conybeare in Exp. 1895, Dec., p. 419).

9. (P. 432, 433.) Clem. Hypotyp. on 1 Pet. v. 13 (Forsch. iii. 82 f.; this portion is unfortunately lacking in the Troyes MS.): "Marcus, Petri sectator, prædicante Petro evangelium palam Romæ coram quibusdam Cesareanis equitibus et multa Christi testimonia proferente, petitus ab eis, ut possent quæ dicebantur memorie commendare, scripsit ex his quæ Petro dicta sunt evangelium quod secundum Marcum vocatur." In immediate connection with the words from Eusebius, H. E. vi. 14. 5, transcribed above, p. 400, note 9 (i.e. if ἡ λέγων is admitted as the correct reading, and we have a statement of the presbyters put by Clement and not first by Eusebius into oratio obliqua), we read further: τὸ δὲ κατὰ Μάρκον (sc. εὐαγγέλιον) ταύτην ἐσχικέιναι τὴν οἰκονομίαν τοῦ Πετροῦ δημοσίᾳ ἐν Ῥώμῃ κηρύξαντος τὸν λόγον καὶ πλείμῃ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον ἐξαπόντος, τοῖς παρόντας πολλοὺς ὄντας παρακαλῆσαι τὸν Μάρκον, ὥσπῃ ἀκολουθήσαντα αὐτῷ πόρρωθεν καὶ μεμνημένον τῶν λεχθέντων, ἀναγράψαι τὰ εἰρημένα, ποιήσαντα δὲ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον μεταδοῦναι τοῖς δεομένοις αὐτοῦ ὑπερῷ ἐπιγράψαντα τὸν Πέτρον προτροπικῶς (Vales. conj. πρῶτον) μήτε ἐοῦσαι μήτε προσημασθῆναι. πόρρωθεν is, of course, to be understood temporally, not spatially (Eufinius, olm.; Niceph. Call. ἐκ πολλοῦ); παῖλαι or ἀνωθεν might be substituted for it. The words ποιήσαντα το αὐτοῦ, which Rufinus omitted are to be construed as subordinate to παρακαλέσαι, and not as a co-ordinate statement of the reporter. Aside from the logical grounds stated above, pp. 432 f., the latter construction is inadmissible, because we ought in that case to have τὸν δὲ Μάρκον or τοῦτον δὲ ποιήσαντα, and instead of the present τοῖς δοιμένοις, something like τοῖς παρακαλέσασιν αὐτόν. The Cæsareani (Καῖσαριάνοι, Epic. Diss. i. 19. 19, iii. 24. 117, iv. 13. 22, or καῖσαρειοί, Dio Cass. ix. 14. 1, 16. 2, 17. 5, 31. 2, lxix. 7. 4) are not in themselves equites also (cf. per contra, Dio Cass. lxxviii. 18. 2 : οἱ χ' ὅτι δοῦλοι καὶ ἐξελεῦθεροι καὶ Καῖσαρειοί, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἱππεῖς, βουλευταὶ τε καὶ γυναῖκες τῶν ἐπιφανεστάτων). But many of these court attendants were raised to equestrian rank. One is reminded of Phil. iv. 22; Act. Pauli, ed. Lipsius, 105. 8 (vol. i. p. 550, n. 1). According to the Acts of Peter, that apostle had to do with much more distinguished company; ed. Lipsius, 54. 33, 73. 33, 84. 15, 86. 2. But aside from this, we are not to think that Clement derived his account from the Acts of Peter, however natural the conjecture may be in some ways. In the Hypotyposes Clement cites the Acts of John (Forsch. iii. 87, 97), which are from the same hand as the Acts of Peter (above, p. 73, note 7), and the cool attitude toward the written Gospel which the Peter of the legend assumes (ed. Lipsius, p. 66 f.; GK, ii. 849) would fit in with Peter's hesitancy with regard to Mark's undertaking in Clement's story. But in the legend the Gospel which the Roman Christians read is already in existence when Peter comes to Rome, and in the unbroken progress of the narrative, from his arrival in Rome to his death, there is no mention of the origin of a Gospel nor of the person of Mark.

10. (Pp. 432, 434, 440.) In connection with the account of Peter's contest with Simon Magus in Rome, Eus. in H. E. ii. 15 (Forsch. iii. 72) writes: Τοσοῦτο δ' ἐπέλαμψεν ταῖς τῶν ἀκροατῶν τοῦ Πέτρου διανοαῖς εὐσεβείας φέγγος, ὥς μὴ τῇ εἰσάπαξ ἱκανῶς ἔχειν ἀρκέισθαι ἀκοῇ, μηδὲ τῇ ἀγράφῳ τοῦ θείου κηρύγματος διδασκαλίᾳ, παρακλήσει δὲ παντοίας Μάρκον, οὗ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον φέρεται, ἀκόλουθον ὄντα Πέτρου, λιπαρῆσαι, ὥς ἂν καὶ διὰ γραφῆς ὑπόμνημα τῆς διὰ λόγου παραδοθείσης αὐτοῖς καταλείψοι διδασκαλίας, μὴ πρότερόν τε ἀνέιναι ἢ κατεργάσασθαι τὸν ἄνδρα, καὶ ταύτῃ αἰτίους γενέσθαι τῆς τοῦ λεγομένου κατὰ Μάρκον εὐαγγελίου γραφῆς. Γινόντα δὲ τὸ πραχθέν φασὶ τὸν ἀπόστολον ὑποκαλύψαντος αὐτῷ τοῦ πνεύματος ἡσθῆναι τῇ τῶν ἀνδρῶν προθυμίᾳ κυρῶσαι τε τὴν γραφὴν εἰς ἔντευξιν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις. Κλήμης ἐν ἑκτῷ τῶν ὑποτυπώσεων παρატέθειται τὴν ἱστορίαν· συνεπιμαρτυρεῖ δ' αὐτῷ καὶ ὁ Ἱεραπολίτης ἐπίσκοπος ὀνόματι Παπίας, τοῦ δὲ Μάρκον μνημονεύειν τὸν Πέτρον ἐν τῇ προτέρᾳ ἐπιστολῇ, ἣν καὶ συντάξαι φασὶν ἐπ' αὐτῆς Ῥώμης, σημαίνειν τε τοῦτ' αὐτόν, τὴν πόλιν τροπικώτερον Βαβυλῶνα προσειπόντα διὰ τούτων· "ἀσπάζεταιται ὑμᾶς ἡ ἐν Βαβυλῶνι συνεκλεκτὴ καὶ Μάρκος ὁ υἱός μου." Rufinus translates the last sentence: "Simile dat testimonium etiam Hieropolites episcopus nomine Papias, qui et hoc dicit, quod Petrus in prima epistola sua, quam de urbe Roma scripsit, meminerit Marci, in qua tropice Romam Babyloniam nominavit." Eusebius did not write very clearly here; but probably Rufinus was right in supposing that everything that follows Papias' name was taken by Eusebius from Papias, for this cannot be discovered in Clement (see above, 163 n. 3). The supposition that the words Κλήμης - Παπίας form a parenthesis, after which the report continues, and that φασὶν following συντάξαι, is a resumption of the first φασίν after πραχθέν, has against it: (1) that there is then no reason why Eusebius broke off his account which was almost finished with an appeal to his two witnesses, instead of placing this appeal at the end of the entire report. (2) That in this case Eusebius would surely have used the second φασίν immediately after he had resumed the account, perhaps after μνημονεύειν, and not in a relative sentence dependent upon it. It therefore remains probable, that following Papias, who gave the tradition in connection with 1 Pet. v. 13, and explained it by a figurative interpretation of the name Babylon, Eusebius reported that this letter which was often cited by him (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16) had been written in Rome. Furthermore, in the same connection he probably in all essentials confirmed (ἐπιμαρτυρεῖ) the account of Clement, also concerning the origin of Mark's Gospel in Rome. Papias, in his testimony with reference to Mark, which has been preserved for us in its general meaning (see below, n. 14) refers to an earlier passage of his work, in which he had already expressed himself concerning the relation of Mark's Gospel to the addresses of Peter. Consequently in that passage which in its wording has not been preserved, he probably stated what according to Eus. ii. 15 he in all probability said concerning 1 Pet. v. 13 and the Roman origin of Mark's Gospel. That Eusebius does not repeat the account of Clement unchanged is shown not only by a comparison with Clement's own words (above, n. 9), but also in the phraseology of Eusebius himself; for at the point where his account begins to go beyond Clement (γνόντα δὲ τὸ πραχθέν . . . ἀποκαλύψαντος κτλ) he introduces a formula (φασί) which points to an uncertain tradition; and, furthermore, he does not make Clement responsible for all the details which are given (as, for example, in ii. 23. 19, iii. 19), but merely in a very general expression says that he included the ιστορία in question in his Hypotyposes. Eusebius' unhistorical account was repeated, and in some respects still further exaggerated, e.g. Jerome (Vir. Ill. viii.): "Quod cum Petrus audisset, probavit et ecclesiis legendum sua auctoritate edidit"; Alexander Mon. Fucom. Barnabae, cap. xx. (Acta SS. Jun. ii. 443). In Liber Pontificalis (ed. Duchesne, i. 50, 118) the influence of Peter on the Gospel of Mark and on the ecclesiastical use of the Gospels in general appears still more noteworthy.

11. (P. 434.) Rome is named as the place of composition by Papias (see preceding note), and in addition to him Clement Alex. expressly (n. 9), Eusebius (H. E. ii. 15), Epiph. (Har. li. 6; see above, p. 400), Jerome (Vir. Ill. viii.), Ephrem Syr. (Expos. Ev. Conc. p. 286, cf. Forsch. i. 54 f.; Prolog. Lat. in Ev. Marci (N.T. Lat., ed. Wordsworth, i. 171, "evangelium in Italia scripsit"); Alexander Mon. op. cit. cap. xx. p. 443. The statement of Chrysostom (Hom. i. in Matt., Montf. vii. 7), that Mark wrote his Gospel in Egypt at the request of hearers there, stands quite alone. The fable that he wrote the Gospel in Latin appears first in Ephrem, Expos. Ev. Conc. p. 286, and elsewhere among the Syrians also, e.g. Wright, Catal. p. 70; in a Peshito MS. of the 6th century; among the Armenians, Forsch. v. 149; also in several Greek minuscules (Tischendorf, i. 410); later in the West; defended by Baronius, Annales, anno 45, xli.

12. (Pp. 435, 442, 443.) After Papias, the first witness to be considered for the relation of Mark to the preaching of Peter is Justin, Dial. cvi: καὶ τὸ αἰεὶν μετ'ωρομάκρην αὐτὸν Πέτρον, ὅρα τῶν ἀκουσέων, καὶ γεργράφου ἐν τοῖς ἀπομνημονεύμασιν αὐτοῦ γεγενημένον καὶ τοῦτο μετὰ τοῦ καὶ ἄλλους δύο ἀδελφούς υἱὸς Ζεβεδαίου ὄντας, μετωνομακέναι ὀνόματι τοῦ Βοανεργές, ὃ ἐστὶν υἱὸς βροντῆς κτλ. According to Justin's regular usage, αὐτοῦ cannot refer to Christ, but only to Peter, cf. GK, i. 510 ff.; and, further on in this note, the phraseology of Eusebius, Dem. iii. 5. 89, 95. Mark iii. 16 f. is the basis of the statement. Connected with this is the representation in the Acts of Peter, according to which Peter was associated with other apostles in the composition of the Gospel book (see above, p. 390). Iren. iii. 1. 1 follows (see above, p. 398), cf. iii. 10. 6: "Quapropter et Marcus, interpres et sectator Petri, initium evangelicæ conscriptionis fecit sic, 'Initium evangelii Jesu Christi,'" etc. Further, Clemens Alexandrinus (see above, p. 449); Tertullian, contra Marc. iv. 5: "Licet et Marcus quod edidit (sc. evangelium) Petri affirmetur, cuius interpres Marcus; nam et Lucæ digestum Paulo adscribere solent." Origen in Eus. vi. 25. 5 (p. 397, above): δεύτερον δὲ τὸ κατὰ Μάρκον, ὡς Πέτρος ἐφήγγισατο αὐτῷ ποιήσαντα. Out of this, later writers like pseudo-Athanasius, Synops. (Montf. ii. 202), made a ὑπαγορεύειν = to dictate. Further, Victorinus of Pettau (circa 300), according to the original text of his commentary (Haussleiter, ThLh, 1895, col. 194): "Marcus interpres Petri ea quæ in munere docebat commemoratus conscripsit, sed non ordine." He had read Papias therefore, for Eusebius' Church History was not yet written. Eusebius, H. E. iii. 24. 14, refers to the information from Clement and Papias, which he had already given and elaborated somewhat (ii. 15; see above, p. 449, n. 10). Quite definite also is Dem. Ev. iii. 5. 89: τούτου Μάρκος γνώριμος καὶ φοιτητῆς γεγονὼς ἀπομνημονεύσαι λέγεται τὰς τοῦ Πέτρου περὶ τῶν πράξεων τοῦ Ἰησοῦ διαλέξεις; cf. §§ 91-94, 95: Μάρκος μὲν ταῦτα γράφει, Πέτρος δὲ ταῦτα περὶ ἑαυτοῦ μαρτυρεῖ πάντα γὰρ τὰ παρὰ Μάρκῳ τῶν Πέτρου διαλέξεων εἶναι λέγεται ἀπομνημονεύματα. Similarly in Theophania Syr. v. 40. Only hints exist in Epiphanius, Har. li. 6; Chrysostom, Hom. i. in Matt. Jerome, Vir. III. i.: "Sed et evangelium iuxta Marcum, qui auditor eius et interpres fuit, huius (sc. Petri) dicitur." A statement regarding the pseudo-Petrine writings follows, as the first of which stands the Gospel of Peter, cf. Vir. III. viii.: "Marcus, discipulus et interpres Petri iuxta quod Petrum referentem audierat, rogatus Romæ a fratribus breve scripsit evangelium." As to what follows, cf. p. 450, above, n. 10. Further, cf. Jerome, Ep. lvii. 9, cxx. 11 (of Paul: "Habeat ergo Titum interpretem, sicut et beatus Petrus Marcum, cuius evangelium Petro narrante et illo scribente compositum est"). With regard to the equivocal use of the term interpres in the latter passage, cf. GK, i. 881 f. It is very significant that in the only place where Eusebius uses the expression "Marcus evangelista, Petri interpres" (Chron. ad anno Abrah. 2057), there is no reference to his activity in Peter's company, for it is his independent activity in Egypt which is reported. Eusebius has no thought of an interpreter's service rendered to Peter. Mark became his interpreter by writing the Gospel, and also by preaching as his representative in Egypt. See below, n. 15.

13. (P. 435.) What the present writer maintained and attempted to prove in a somewhat youthful essay on Papias of Hierapolis (ThStKr, 1866, S. 649-696; 1867, S. 539-542), and occasionally in other connections (Der Hirt des Hermas, S. vi-x; Acta Joannis, pp. cliv-clxxii; Forch. iii. 157 ff.; GK, i. 155, 800, ii. 33), with regard to Papias' "presbyter" named John, he has again set forth briefly in an essay on "Apostel und Apostelschüler in der Provinz Asien" (Forsch. vi. 1-224, especially 112-147), in a wider connection and, he hopes, in a more convincing way. This hypothesis does not at all suit Mommesen, who (ZfNTW, 1902, S. 156 ff.) is of the opinion that Eusebius controverted Irenæus "in his thorough way." Also dissatisfied with Harnack's and Corsen's interpretations, he strikes out (on the basis of the Syriac Version) κυρίων μαθηταί, the inconvenient characterisation of both of Papias' teachers, against all Greek MSS., as also against the testimony of Jerome (Vir. Ill. xviii.) and of Rufinus (who only freely and wrongly translates the words by ceterique discipuli). Concerning the essays by E. Schwartz, see below, § 64, n. 2. To what has been said in the text (p. 435 f.) the present writer will add here but three remarks—(1) the use of οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, which we find in Papias, is the same in form as that which occurs in Irenæus and Clement, and occasionally also in Origen and Hippolytus. The term, which of itself may denote the men of the distant past (Heb. xi. 2, οἱ πρεσβύτεροι=i. 1, οἱ πατέρες=Matt. v. 21, οἱ ἀρχαῖοι), comes to signify the teachers of the next preceding generation only when the speaker characterises those to whom he applies it as his own personal instructors. The succeeding generation calls them the old men or the fathers when their ranks begin to be thinned, and also after they have altogether given place to the younger. In concreto, of course, they are very different persons, according to the period of the respective speakers. (2) That the πρεσβύτεροι, from whom Papias claims personally to have received much information, were themselves personal disciples of Jesus, not only follows from the fact that he calls his teachers, Aristion and John, disciples of the Lord,—just as he does the apostles Andrew, Peter, Thomas, etc.,—but is at once evident to every sound sense of interpretation from the disposition of his sentence: εἰ δέ που καὶ παρηκολουθηκώς τις τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις ἔλθοι, τοὺς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων ἀνέκρινον λόγους: τί Ἀνδρέας ἢ τί Πέτρος εἶπεν, ἢ τί Φίλιππος ἢ τί Θωμᾶς ἢ Ἰάκωβος ἢ τί Ἰωάννης ἢ Ματθαῖος ἢ τις ἕτερος τῶν τοῦ κυρίου μαθητῶν, ἃ τε Ἀριστίων καὶ ὁ πρεσβύτερος Ἰωάννης (αἱ οἱ) τοῦ κυρίου μαθηταί, λέγουσιν. The indirect question (τί εἶπεν) and the co-ordinate relative clause (ἃ τε—λέγουσιν) explain τοῖς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων λόγους. The text was so understood by the early and entirely competent translators, the Syrian about 350, Rufinus about 400, and Jerome (Vir. Ill. xviii.). But the classical witness for the correctness of this interpretation is Eusebius himself, who disputes it. In order to show that Papias was not himself a disciple of the apostles, he says (§ 7): "Papias acknowledges that he received the words of the apostles from their disciples (τοὺς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων λόγους παρὰ τῶν αὐταῖς παρακολουθηκότων), but claims that he was a hearer of Aristion and the presbyter John." That is, he substitutes τοῖς τῶν ἀποστόλων λόγους for the τοὺς τῶν πρεσβυτέρων λόγους of Papias, and αὐταῖς referring back to τῶν ἀποστόλων, for the τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις of Papias. Thus Eusebius suppresses the obvious fact that Papias spoke first of such traditions as he received from the presbyters directly (or from the apostles, as Eusebius puts it)—ἔσα ποτὶ παρὰ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων καλῶς ἔμαθον—before saying that he also inquired concerning the words of the presbyter ("apostles") in case he fell in with others who like him had been their disciples. (3) The mention of a presbyter and disciple of Jesus named John between James and Matthew, and again a presbyter and disciple of Jesus named John after Aristion, on which Eusebius based his self-contradictory interpretation, is indeed remarkable. The conjecture suggested by Renan (L'Antechrist, 1873, p. 562) and ingeniously argued by Haussleiter (ThLh, 1896, col. 467), that the words ἡ τὶ Ἰωάννης in the enumeration of apostles were interpolated in the text of Papias before Eusebius' time, is venturesome and inadmissible since it is needless. The questions which Papias at the time of his investigations in the course of his earlier years was accustomed at every opportunity to ask (ἀνέκρινον) of visiting disciples of the apostles fall into two classes, which are distinguished even in the formation of the sentence. The inquiries, τί εἶπεν, he asked of such as had lived in Palestine for a long time and had had there opportunity to hear many apostles and other disciples of Jesus: the inquiries, ἃ τε λέγουσιν, he made of such, like Papias himself, as had had for a time intercourse with the disciples of Jesus, then living in the province of Asia, or also still had intercourse with them, while it was denied him. The apostle John belonged to both groups of the disciples of Jesus, whose words Papias wished to ascertain from their own disciples. This accounts for the double mention of the name. There remains only a certain clumsiness, rhetorically considered, on Papias' part.

14. (P. 438.) After Eusebius (H. E. iii. 39. 14) has referred the reader to Papias' work for other traditions of Aristion and John the presbyter, he continues: ἀναγκαίως νῦν προσθήσομεν ταῖς προεκτεθείσαις αὐτοῦ φωναῖς παράδοσιν, ἥν περὶ Μάρκου τοῦ τὸ εὐαγγέλιον γεγραφέντος ἐκτίθεται διὰ τούτων· 'καὶ τοῦθ' ὁ πρεσβύτερος ἔλεγεν· Μᾶρκος μὲν ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρου γενόμενος, ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσεν, ἀκριβῶς ἔγραψεν, οὐ μέντοι τάξει τὰ ὑπὸ τοῦ κυρίου (αἰ. Χριστοῦ) ἢ λεχθέντα ἢ πραχθέντα. οὔτε γὰρ ἤκουσε τοῦ κυρίου οὔτε παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὕστερον δὲ ὡς ἔφην Πέτρῳ, ὃς πρὸς τὰς χρείας ἐποιεῖτο τὰς διδασκαλίας, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὥσπερ σύνταξιν τῶν κυριακῶν ποιούμενος λογίων (αἰ. λόγων). ὥστε οὐδὲν ἤμαρτε Μᾶρκος, οὕτως ἔνια γράψας ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευσεν· ἐνὸς γὰρ ἐποιήσατο πρόνοιαν, τοῦ μηδὲν ὧν ἤκουσε παραλιπεῖν ἢ ψεύσασθαι τι ἐν αὐτοῖς.' Ταῦτα μὲν οὖν ἰστορήται τῷ Παπῖᾳ περὶ τοῦ Μάρκου. Only the words Μᾶρκος μὲν . . . πραχθέντα constitute the statement of the presbyter John: what follows (at once distinguished by its fulness from the enigmatical conciseness of the preceding sentence) is from Papias. ὡς ἔφην is decisive on this point. That Eusebius, in his quotation from Papias' book, transcribed these words also, although he does not give his readers the earlier passage to which they refer, simply testifies to the faithfulness of his copy. One need not even call to his support the fact that ii. 15 in all probability alludes to the earlier passage in Papias to which Papias himself here refers (see above, p. 449f., n. 10). On the other hand, it is inconceivable that Papias, who did not have a book by John before him, but drew upon his recollection of John's oral instructions, should have set down a portion of what the presbyter John said about Mark, and should have sought to characterise it as a fragment of some record by a parenthetic ὡς ἔφην. How one can assert, in view of the concluding words of Eusebius (not, "This was the presbyter John's opinion of Mark, according to Papias," but, "This is what Papias reports about Mark"), that he took all of what he transcribes to be the language of the presbyter, the present writer does not understand (Link, ThStKr, 1896, S. 414). The ἔλεγε which introduces the words of the presbyter (not εἶπε or ἔλεξε) shows that Papias is not giving a stenographic report of a discourse delivered at some time by John, but that, from his recollection of his conversations with his teacher, he means to report fully what John used to say about Mark as he had occasion. It is the more certain that this is the meaning of the imperfect here, since no long address follows and no situation is being described. Cf. Kühner-Gerth, i. 143 f.; Blass, N.T. Gr. § 57. 5 (Eng. trans. § 57. 5); more specially a remark of Birt (Das antike Buchwesen, 483; GK, i. 872; and, in general, the whole discussion, 871-889), which is largely dependent on Klostermann, Das Marcusev. 1867,—by far the most important work on this Gospel,—326-336.

15. (P. 444.) The right interpretation of ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρον γενόμενος which almost alone found favour in the early Church (above, pp. 442 f., 450 f., n. 12) is represented by Michaelis, Eind. 1052; Fritzsche, Ev. Marci, xxvi; Thiersch, Versuch, 181; Klostermann, 329, with whom the present writer expressed his agreement; GK, i. 878-882. The older view, again contended for by Th. Mandel, in opposition to the present writer, Vorgeschichte der öffentlichen Wirksamkeit Jesu, 1892, S. 325-332, namely, that Mark, as Peter's interpreter in Rome, translated his sermons into Latin, rests upon untenable premises which cannot be indicated here in passing. What had this office of interpreter on the part of Mark, which lasted for only a few months, to do with his Gospel, concerning which "the presbyter John" speaks? This also has weight against the view of Schlatter (Die Kirche von Jerusalem vom J. 70-130, s. 52) that Mark in Jerusalem, i.e. before the year 44, interpreted into Greek the Aramaic discourses of Peter for the Hellenistic portion of the Jerusalem Church. To the opposition to the writer's view by A. Link, ThStKr, 1896, S. 405-436, it may be briefly replied: (1) Since John, using ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρον γενόμενος without the article, does not say that Mark was the interpreter of Peter, but that he was or became an interpreter, Link's remark (410) that Mark was by no means the only channel of acquaintance with the narratives of Peter, and hence could not be called Peter's interpreter outright in the sense which the present writer maintained, is little to the point. John's statement leaves room for ten other interpreters besides Mark, and also for the fact that in numberless instances Peter spoke in public without the help of any interpreter whatever. One hesitates to refer to such passages as Eph. iii. 7; Col. i. 23, 25; Gal. iv. 16. (2) The remark (411) that on the writer's interpretation the words in question, "become perfectly useless and meaningless," seems of no greater value. For without them the following ὅσα ἐμνημόνευσεν hangs in the air, as no man could guess what or whom Mark remembered in his writing. He might just as well have been a disciple of Jesus, the lack of order (τάξις) would remain unexcused, and the praise which accompanies the admission of this deficiency would be unjustified. Even if one adopts (as does Link, 414) the impossible construction which makes Papias' added explanation the words of John, John's first complete sentence is still meaningless without ἐρμηνευτὴς Πέτρον γενόμενος rightly understood. (3) As to the claim that the words in question, on the writer's interpretation, should follow the main proposition (413), he must decline to discuss the point with a scholar who thinks it necessary (413, note 1) to inform him that in Acts i. 24 (προτερεξάμενοι εἶπαι) the praying is indicated as the medium of the saying! See examples in Kühner-Gerth, i. 197 f., 199, n. 8, and Blass, § 58. 4 (Eng. trans. § 58. 4). (4) When, in GK, i. 879, the writer questioned whether Mark of Jerusalem would have been a suitable interpreter for the Galilean Peter, he intended, of course, that everyone acquainted with the subject should recall that a knowledge of Greek was at least as general, and probably much more general, in Galilee, with its large non-Jewish population, than in Jerusalem and Judæa. To be confuted with the information (Link, 419) that the differences between the Aramaic dialect of Galilee and that of Judea were insignificant, is something of a surprise. (5) The idea that Mark accompanied Peter as interpreter on all his missionary journeys (418, 426 ff.) is inconsistent with the little that we know. Until about the year 63, Peter was, so far as we know (pp. 165–172, above), a preacher of the circumcision in the Holy Land and the neighbouring regions, and certainly went no farther than Antioch, and there only on a visit. Mark, on the other hand, after 44, was a missionary helper in the company, first, of Paul and Barnabas, then of Barnabas alone, and then again of Paul; and it is highly improbable that he was ever long in Peter's company before 63, when Peter came to Rome. The expressions παρηκολουθηκώς τινι (Papias in Eus. iii. 39. 15, in relation to Jesus or Peter; cf. xxxix. 4, 7; Just. Dial. ciii.), or ἀκολουθήσας τινι (Clement in Eus. vi. 14. 6, p. 448, above), or ἀκόλουθός τινος (Eus. ii. 15, p. 449, above), or ἀκόλουθος γενόμενός τινι (Epiph. Hær. li. 6) = sectator (Iren. iii. 1. 1, 10. 6; Clem. (Latin trans.), p. 448, above), denote, not a travelling companion but a disciple, who has for some time enjoyed the instruction of a teacher and lived in familiar intercourse with him, and are occasionally replaced by μαθητής (Iren. iii. 1. 1; Chrysost. Hom. i. in Matt.), ἀκουστής (Iren. v. 33. 4), γνώριμος καὶ φοιτητής γεγονώς (Eus. Dem. iii. 5. 89), and similar expressions. But when such a disciple imparts the instructions of his teacher to others, he becomes his interpreter, because through him the absent or departed teacher addresses those who would otherwise not hear or understand him. This conception, which is presented by the real signification of the word (Xenophon, Anab. ii. 3. 17, ἔλεγε πρῶτος Τιτσαφέρνης δι' ἑρμηνέως), is everywhere adhered to, whether the term is applied to the disciple who hands on the instruction of his teacher, to the poet in relation to the Muse, or the prophet in relation to the Pythia or to Apollo, or to Hermes the messenger and interpreter of the gods, or, as among us, to the musical performer, the actor, and the reciter in relation to the composer and the poet (GK, i. 878 ff.). (6) What Clement, Strom. vii. 106, says of the founders of sects who appeared in the post-apostolic time is undoubtedly instructive: καθάπερ ὁ Βασιλείδης, κἂν Γλαυκίαν ἐπιγράφηται διδάσκαλον, ὡς αὐχοῦσιν αὐτοί, τὸν Πέτρου ἑρμηνέα ὥσαυτως δὲ καὶ Οὐαλεντίνον Θεοδῶ διακηκόνει φέρουσιν, γνώριμος δὲ οὗτος γεγόνει Παῦλον. With regard to the text, cf. Forsch. iii. 125. When Link (432) claims, in opposition to the present writer, that Glaukias is called the interpreter of Peter, not by the Basilidians but by Clement, this also must be considered an error; for after κἂν ἐπιγράφηται, which already shows that Basilides claimed Glaukias as his teacher in order to recommend his doctrines, ὡς αὐχοῦσιν αὐτοί would be quite redundant, if it referred to the same relation. The phrase serves, therefore, to introduce the following τὸν Πέτρου ἑρμηνέα. Moreover, Clement does not omit to show by αὐτοί, which otherwise would be meaningless, that they do indeed boast that this Glaukias was the or an interpreter of Peter, but that he for his part by no means cares to guarantee the claim. Mark, too, is never so designated by Clement (p. 448, above). The Παύλου γνώριμος of the Valentinians with reference to Theodas (Forsch. iii. 122-126) corresponds to the ἐρμηνεύς of the Basilidians regarding Glaukias. Now it is evident that both these alleged disciples of the apostles are brought forward as bearers of a secret tradition, and that this can be brought into rational connection with Glaukias' possible service as interpreter to Peter, even less readily than the composition of a Gospel can be connected with Mark's supposed service in a similar capacity. Here too, then, ἐρμηνεύς is figuratively meant. It cannot be an accident, however, that the term is applied to the medium of the secret tradition between Peter and Basilides, and not to Theodas who stands similarly between Paul and Valentinus. In the school of Basilides, as in that of Valentinus, there was a peculiar Gospel (GK, ii. 748, 771). Neither was ascribed to an apostle, but each school believed that it could appeal to a disciple of Peter, or a disciple of Paul, as the transmitter of Gospel narratives, just as well as the Church could. Theodas corresponded to Luke, and Glaukias to Mark. The Basilidians, who boasted that their Glaukias was the or an interpreter of Peter, knew the Church tradition of Mark's relation to Peter, and imitated it. In another way this was done about 150 A.D. by the author and admirer of the εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Πέτρον, in which Peter does not use an interpreter, but speaks in his own person (Grundriss, S. 30 f.).

16. (P. 444.) Iren. iii. 11. 7: "Qui autem Jesum separant a Christo, et impassibilem perseverasse Christum, passum vero Jesum dicunt, id quod secundum Marcum est præferentes evangelium, cum amore veritatis legentes illud, corrigi possunt." Comparing i. 26. 1 (cf. iii. 11. 1; vol. i. 515, n. 4), there can be no doubt that the Cerinthians are meant; and it is obvious why they preferred the Gospel of Mark, which begins with the baptism. The misunderstandings which have been occasioned by Epiphanius, Hær. xxviii. 5, xxx. 3, and Philaster, Hær. xxxvi., who in this instance depends on Epiphanius, require no discussion here (cf. GK, ii. 730; Hümper, De Errore Christolog. in Epist. Jo., 1897, p. 68 ff.).

§ 52. TITLE, PLAN, AND CONCLUSION OF MARK'S GOSPEL.

The words ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (n. 1), with which the author of the Gospel according to Mark begins his book, are of such a character that they must have given rise to the attempt, even at a very early date, to construe them as the subject or predicate of a sentence concluded in vv. 2-3, or, if ver. 2 was taken parenthetically, in ver. 3, or, in case the whole of vv. 2-3 was treated as a parenthesis, in ver. 4. The very number of such attempts to construe the words argues against them all. Further, while it must be admitted that the Greek of the Gospel is far from classical, it must nevertheless be regarded as improbable that an author, who in the rest of his book does not show any inclination to write periodic sentences, should, without any apparent necessity, begin the same with such an ambiguous and at best extremely clumsy construction. A decisive argument against all these attempts is the fact that they are based upon the impossible presupposition that εὐαγγέλιον can be used to designate the Gospel history, and that not in the sense of "a recording or accounting" of the facts (historia), but of "recorded facts" (res gestæ). The baptism and preaching of John the Baptist might possibly be treated as the beginning of the gospel history in the latter sense, namely, as the first one of the facts which it was the business of the Gospel, i.e. the Christian preaching, to report and to proclaim (Acts x. 37, xiii. 24; cf. § 48). But it could never be considered the beginning of the proclamation of those facts. But the latter is the only sense in which εὐαγγέλιον was used in the apostolic age.

It may therefore be considered as certain that the first five words of the Gospel are to be taken independently, and to be treated as a title prefixed to the book by the author; since to suppose that Mark meant to say, "Herewith I begin the Gospel of Jesus Christ," involves a whole tangle of anachronisms. It is a well-known fact that among the Latins, the Greeks, and the Syrians, it was a habit among the scribes of the Middle Ages to mark the transition from one document to another in the same codex by inserting ἐτελέσθη or ἐπληρώθη (explicit) and ἄρχεται (incipit) before or after the customary title (n. 2). That in this case the ἄρχεται or ἀρχή, which means the same thing, was not the author's own statement, requires no proof. Leaving out of account the fact that these formulæ are not found in the oldest MSS. extant, they presuppose the binding together of separate writings in one codex. In the present case, however, it is not a question of the particular way in which a copyist indicated the fact that a new book was begun at a certain point, but, if we may accept the unanimous tradition, we are dealing with words which were always a part of Mark's Gospel. But to suppose that an author should have begun his book by saying to his readers, "Here my book begins," or "Now I begin," would be an absurd conjecture. Such an idea is also impossible, because then Mark would have called his book not only a Gospel, but the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Even if he had said "a Gospel" it would have been an anachronism, because the name εὐαγγέλιον was not used to designate a writing, or a number of writings, until after the beginning of the second century, certainly not in the apostolic age (above, p. 387 f.). But even granting that here the individual author may have anticipated the general development of ecclesiastical language, or that Mark i. 1 was not written until 120, still, in designating his work "the Gospel," i.e. the only Gospel which exists or has a right to exist, and, more than this, in calling it "the Gospel of Jesus Christ," the author would make himself guilty of a presumption which is incomprehensible. The title which Mark gives his book is not εὐαγγέλιον Ἰ. Χρ., but ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; for it is entirely self-evident that, if the words are to be taken as a title, they have reference to the whole book and not to any one of its chapters, be it longer or shorter. Aside from the fact that the title applies very inappropriately to what follows it immediately (i. 2-13), if the title covered only part of the book, we should expect a number of chapters, each with its own special title; this, however, is not what we find. Accepting the words as a title, they are not to be compared with titles like Bereshith or Γένεσις κόσμου at the beginning of the first book in the O.T., which were invented at a late date by learned editors or ignorant scribes. It is rather to be ascribed to the author himself, or perhaps to the redactor or editor of our Mark, like the titles of the prophetic books of the O.T., of the Proverbs, of Revelation, of the Antiquities of Josephus, and of the work of Irenæus against heresies. In the case of such titles it does not matter at all whether or not the author mentions his own name in the title, or whether a name which may occur in the title be that of the real or only of an alleged author, or whether it is only represented as such. It must be taken for granted that such a title characterises rightly the content of the book, and indicates the subject which the author intended to discuss, at least when he began his work; only, of course, due allowance must be made for the a potiori fit denominatio in a title designed to sum up in a word the varied contents of a comprehensive work.

Mark purposes, therefore, to set forth in his book the beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Since his work is in the form of a narrative, ἀρχή cannot be meant in the sense of "cause, principle, ground" (Prov. i. 7, viii. 22; Sirach xxix. 21; Col. i. 18; Rev. iii. 14), but is to be understood only in the usual sense of "beginning." The conception of origin is, however, involved; for how is it possible to describe the beginning of a thing without indicating its origin? An ἀρχή is always an ἀρχὴ γενέσεως (Wisdom of Solomon vi. 23, vii. 5). In his account he intends to answer the question how the Gospel of Christ began, and therewith also the question how the Gospel of Christ originated. In a certain sense the question is answered at the outset by the very terms which Mark chooses to designate the Gospel, for Gospel of Jesus Christ means in this passage, as everywhere else in the N.T., the message of salvation brought into the world by Jesus, which was preached by Him first, and which now, when it is no longer proclaimed by Jesus Himself but by His ambassadors, bears upon it the seal of its author (above, p. 377 f.). A fuller answer of the same character is to be found in Heb. ii. 3; the Gospel began with its first proclamation by Jesus, the Apostle of God (Heb. iii. 1), and after He ceased to speak to men directly it was continued by those who had heard the preaching of the great original Evangelist. This same idea, which is common to the whole of the N.T., is given noteworthy expression in Acts i. 1, where all of Jesus' work and teaching set forth in the third Gospel is characterised as the beginning of a continuous work. The same thought is to be found in Acts x. 36 f., though presented from a different point of view, —the beginning of the proclamation of the good tidings which God sent to the people of Israel was not through John and his preaching, but after the baptism and preaching of John, through Jesus Christ, the original Evangelist (cf. Eph. ii. 17). This is exactly Mark's thought. In the apostolic preaching there was never wanting some reference to Jesus' forerunner and something showing the relation between Jesus and John, who in his turn was connected with the O.T. revelation. Nor could this backward reference be omitted in an historical account of the beginning of this preaching. It is wanting in no one of our Gospels; but what Mark says about the Baptist in i. 2–8, and his notice, showing the connection between Jesus' history and the work of the Baptist in i. 9–13, is so outlinear and so brief that it cannot possibly be the form in which the tradition was used for the instruction of converts and in the missionary preaching. He makes it so, because what he set out to portray was not the preliminaries, but the beginning of the Gospel of Jesus.

The discussion of the subject proper begins in i. 14 with the sentence, "After John was delivered up, Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the Gospel of God, and saying, 'The time is fulfilled and the kingdom of God is at hand, repent ye and believe the Gospel.'" This sentence, which gives an outline view of Jesus' entire ministry, is in keeping with the title of the book, and goes to confirm the interpretation of the same given above. Jesus' mission is represented to be the proclamation to men of God's good tidings, and He Himself urges upon them faith in this message. While it is true that, according to other traditions, Jesus in quoting from Isa. lxi. 1 makes use of the word translated by the Greek εὐαγγέλιον or of the corresponding verb (Luke iv. 18, vii. 22; Matt. xi. 5), nevertheless, in comparison with similar passages in the other Gospels, Mark's use of the word in his description of Jesus' life-work (ver. 14) and in the summary which he gives of the essential contents of Jesus' preaching (ver. 15), also the comparatively frequent recurrence of the word in the further course of this Gospel (n. 3), all go to prove that in using it Mark had in mind always the purpose of the book indicated in its title. This is to be seen also in the separate narratives which show how the program indicated in i. 14 was carried out. In contrast to the brevity which characterises the sketch that precedes the verse in which Jesus' ministry is outlined,—a brevity which renders single passages in the same so obscure as to be scarcely intelligible (especially i. 13),—from i. 16 on the narratives are remarkable for their graphic clearness and for a fulness of detail which is certainly not essential (n. 4). Even if such a conclusion were not necessary from a comparison of Mark's account with the presentation of the same facts in the other Gospels, the careful reader would still be compelled to admit from a comparison of Mark's style with that of accounts presenting different material—as for instance the Fourth Gospel or Josephus—that Mark has not only a predilection for vivid and clear narrative, but possesses distinguished ability in this direction. His description of the features and movements of those speaking or acting, the constant use of direct discourse in reporting chance remarks and replies, the use of numerous synonyms in the discourses, repetition in full of words repeated in spoken discourse, and the use of elliptical expressions customary in conversation but not in written discourse,—all tend to give Mark's style a dramatic quality. If all this is artificial and not natural, then certainly Mark was an adept at artem arte celare. That this was the case is, however, quite improbable, in view of the thoroughly clumsy way in which Mark uses language. These little touches never make the impression of being designed; to write in this way is the author's second nature. What he did keep clearly before himself, however, was his purpose to set forth the history of the beginning of the gospel.

In the first section (i. 16–45) we see how the preaching which Jesus declared to be His essential vocation (i. 38 f.) was accompanied from the first by miracles which attested the effective power of His word, and which contributed much to the spread of the conviction throughout all Galilee that Jesus was a teacher with full authority from God, and that His teaching, in contrast to the instruction of the rabbis based upon the traditions, was a new and powerful doctrine (i. 22, 27 f.). At first Jesus alone is the preacher; He silences the demons who proclaim Him the Holy One of God (i. 24 f., 34, cf. iii. 11 f.), and forbids the man whom He has healed to publish what had been done for him (i. 44). But just as He Himself discloses, at the very beginning (i. 16–20), His intention of winning helpers in His ministry, so He is totally unable to hinder those who have been helped by Him from becoming at once tireless proclaimers of His deeds (i. 45, cf. vii. 36). Every word in the concluding sentence of this first section is consciously chosen—ἡρξαστο, which is not altogether without significance (cf. v. 20, also i. 1): κηρύσσειν, everywhere else used of the preaching of the gospel (cf. i. 14, 38, 39, iii. 14, v. 20, vi. 12, xiii. 10, xiv. 9, cf. i. 4, 7); the added πολλά, which indicates that when the preaching is begun it is not to end at once; and, finally, τὸν λόγον without any addition, used elsewhere of the gospel (ii. 2, iv. 14–33), to describe the report which the man who had been healed circulated where-ever he went. The second section (ii. 1–iii. 6) shows how Jesus' preaching, attested as it was by His works, especially His proclamation of the forgiveness of sins, and the freedom of His life and teaching from asceticism and slavish observance of the law, induced constant opposition on the part of the religious teachers whose influence had been dominant up to this time, and made Him more and more the object of their deadly hatred. The third section (iii. 7–vi. 13) begins with a general description of the spread of Jesus' fame throughout all Palestine and the adjoining regions, and of the effect which this had in widening the circle of those among whom Jesus had to work (iii. 7–12). This seems to have influenced Jesus to make free choice from among His hearers of twelve, with a view to sending them out as preachers (iii. 13–19). The section thus begun is concluded in a general way with the account of the first mission of these twelve (vi. 7–13). It is noteworthy that in both these accounts the name apostle, which is only used by Mark once (vi. 30), is avoided; also, that the commission of the disciples here described is expressly declared to be the first of its kind, and is called the beginning of the sending out of twelve preachers. Finally, in the account of their choosing, the fact is not to be overlooked that, while its ultimate purpose is indicated to be their later commission to preach, and though they engaged in this work at once (vi. 12), the immediate purpose and the one first mentioned is that they may be constantly with Jesus (iii. 14, ἵνα ᾖσιν μετ' αὐτοῦ καὶ ἵνα ἀποστελλῇ αὐτοὺς κηρύσσειν). Through their intercourse with the first preacher of the gospel they were to be trained for their future vocation as preachers. Thereby Jesus intends to make true in the case of these men the words He had spoken to some at the beginning of His preaching in Galilee (i. 17). What is recorded between the choice of the apostles and their first commission to preach, shows how Jesus trained the Twelve in that independence of judgment and knowledge requisite for the exercise of their calling. When on one occasion His relatives, apparently His nearest kinsmen, expressed the opinion that the immoderate zeal with which He gave Himself to His work was deranging His mind, and His opponents declared Him to be possessed by an evil spirit (iii. 21 f., cf. ver. 30), He declares those to be His true relatives who, notwithstanding these opinions, give heed to His word (iii. 31-35); and, while He preaches the secret of the kingdom of God to the multitude in parables, to His disciples—among whom, as is evident from the peculiar wording of iv. 10, the Twelve primarily are meant—He not only interprets the individual parables spoken to the people (iv. 14-20, 34), but declares them to be those chosen ones to whom this secret is entrusted (iv. 11). This secret they are to learn to understand, even when it is concealed in figurative language (iv. 13), and one day are to reveal it to the world (iv. 21-25).

Of the parables spoken on this particular day, the great number of which is referred to repeatedly (iv. 2, 33), three are recorded, among them one that is peculiar to Mark's Gospel (iv. 26-29). The first parable explains the differing reception which the word—used thus alone, and referring, therefore, to the gospel preached by Jesus and to be preached by the apostles—receives among men as due to the different qualities of heart to be found in the hearers. The second parable shows that the kingdom of God, once it has been brought into the world through Jesus' preaching, has within itself germs which will develop to the harvest, and that, too, without direct intervention on His part. The third parable shows that the small beginnings of this kingdom are no reason for doubting that ultimately it will compass the entire world. In the narratives which follow, iv. 35-vi. 6, the relation to the apostles and their future calling remains in the background, though attention is called repeatedly to their presence or participation in the work (v. 31, 37, vi. 1, otherwise in Matt. ix. 22-26, xiii. 54). Not until the account of the commission and instruction of the Twelve (vi. 7-11) is the reader again reminded that the "being with Jesus," which was their special privilege (iii. 14) and which was denied to others, without their being forbidden on this account to make known the grace that they had received (v. 18-20), was intended primarily to prepare the disciples for their vocation as preachers of the gospel.

This relation of the history to the apostles and their future calling comes out more clearly in the fourth section (vi. 14-x. 52). Jesus appears here not so much engaged in work as a preacher and prophet among the people, as in training His apostles. He avoids the principal scene of His earlier labours, moves frequently, and changes constantly His place of abode, though there are times when His sympathy for the multitudes leads Him to mingle with them, or to help individuals among them who are in need (vi. 34, 45, viii. 2, 10, 13). He removes to the boundaries of Jewish territory and goes beyond the same (vii. 24, 31, viii. 27), not with the intention of preaching to the Gentiles, but in order to escape contact with the crowds and His enemies, that He may devote Himself entirely to the instruction of His disciples, as expressly stated in ix. 30 f. In the accounts of the miraculous feeding the part taken by the disciples is emphasised more strongly than in the parallel accounts, especially those of Matthew and John (vi. 37-39, 41, viii. 6). In vi. 52, which has no parallel in the other Gospels, and the account in viii. 14-21, which is much more detailed and more emphatic than in Matt. xvi. 5-12, these occurrences are treated altogether from the point of view of a practical instruction of the disciples. They are to learn not only to believe in Jesus' miraculous power, but out of what Jesus furnishes them also to satisfy thousands of those who hear the word. Where the superstitious opinions concerning Jesus, produced by His work so far, are mentioned for the first time (vi. 14 f.), the occasion is made use of to introduce an episode about the death of the Baptist (vi. 17-29). When we compare this account, which is very full, with the exceedingly brief notice in i. 2-8, it does not seem that it is inserted for its own sake, but as a prophecy with reference to the death of the mightier preacher (cf. ix. 12 f.). In the second instance where these superstitious opinions are mentioned—this time by the apostles in answer to a question by Jesus (viii. 27 f.)—the design is to bring out strongly the independence of faith and knowledge developed in the disciples under the influence of Jesus' teaching and work.

But progress in this development is slow and painful. Although it was not necessary any longer for Him to ask the reproving question, "Have ye not yet faith?" (iv. 40, cf. per contra, ix. 23 f.), He did, nevertheless, have constantly to lament their lack of insight (vi. 52, viii. 17-21), their failure to understand His purposes (viii. 33, ix. 32), their want of determination and presence of mind (ix. 18 f., 28 f.), and their failure to make unselfish sacrifice of themselves (ix. 33-50, x. 28-31, 35-45). They are still much affected with the hardness of heart, the unbelief, and the superstition that characterised their countrymen (vi. 49-52, viii. 11-15, ix. 19). It is not to be denied, however, that the governing thought, which in the earlier sections is everywhere noticeable, in the whole of the plan, in the details of its elaboration, and especially in the choice of material, becomes less and less prominent as the narrative proceeds. Especially in the fifth section (xi. 1-xvi. 8), where the closing scenes of Jesus' life are described, does interest in the material itself, without which no history of Jesus' public ministry would be possible, predominate over the particular point of view from which this material is handled in Mark's Gospel. A certain parallelism is noticeable between Jesus' work in Galilee and in Jerusalem, which shows itself sometimes in the use of similar language. Jesus begins His work in Jerusalem with deeds (xi. 1-10, 15-18) and teachings (xi. 18 = i. 22, cf. xi. 17, xii. 14, 35, 37, 38, xiv. 49) which arouse the enthusiasm of the people, only to fall back upon the use of parables, of which but one example is recorded. Here, as there, He encounters an alliance between the Pharisees and the Herodians (xii. 13 = iii. 6). Here also in these circles there are those who are drawn to Jesus, and in whom He finds something to commend (xii. 34 = x. 21). And finally, in Jerusalem as in Galilee, He devotes Himself to the instruction of His disciples (xiii. 1 ff.). In this instruction a prominent place is given to a series of statements about the call of the apostles to preach (xiii. 9-13), which are introduced by Matthew—in part also by Luke—in a different connection. Repeatedly notice is taken of the presence of the disciples, or of the impression which something has made upon them (xi. 11, 14, 20 f., xiii. 1-5), and the fact recalled that their task is the commission of Jesus' word to others (xiii. 37), and that the Gospel is for the whole world (xiv. 9). But notwithstanding all this, one observes that the material is not subordinated to the governing thought of the book. Very possibly this thought would have become more prominent again at the close. But the book was never finished.

It may be regarded as one of the most certain of critical conclusions, that the words ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ, xvi. 8, are the last words in the book which were written by the author himself (n. 5). How early and how generally it was felt to be unfortunate that Mark had broken the thread of his narrative with these words in the midst of his account of Jesus' resurrection just as this account was begun, is attested by the existence and circulation of two additions, which were attached to the Gospel in order to supply this lack. The first positive witness for the former of these—xvi. 9-20 in the textus receptus, designated in what follows by A—is that of Irenæus (iii. 10. 6; GK, ii. 924). That it was a part of Mark, however, is presupposed also in Tatian's Diatessaron, in which the substance of the pericope was incorporated (n. 5); for it has not been shown as yet that a passage of any considerable length was taken by Tatian from a source other than one of the canonical Gospels. Apparently Justin also was familiar with the passage (GK, i. 515). It must therefore have been appended to the Gospel as early as the first half of the second century. While there is no trace of the pericope, or of a substitute for it, to be found in Tertullian and Cyprian, Clement of Alexandria and Origen, Cyril of Jerusalem and Athanasius, and numerous other authors who would have had occasion to make use of it had it been known to them, nevertheless from the middle of the fourth century on it became more and more widely circulated. Whereas in Eusebius' time it was to be found in only a few Greek MSS. (GK, ii. 913), in those that have come down from the fifth century (Codd. ACDE, etc.) it is found regularly, also in the different Syriac versions, with the exception of Syr. Sin. and in the Gothic and later Egyptian (Memphitic) translations. It is witnessed, further, by Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Marcus Eremita, and the Apostolic Constitutions. The first to testify to its existence in Alexandria is Didymus; in Latin North Africa, Augustine; in Italy, apart from Justin and Tatian, who in a sense are to be reckoned here, and some doubtful notices (n. 5), Ambrose, the Latin MSS. of the Gospels used by Jerome, and Jerome himself, who gave the A text a fixed place in the West by adopting it in his revision of the Latin N.T.

Besides this addition, there is another much shorter conclusion to the Gospel designated here by B, which was circulated somewhat widely at a comparatively early date (n. 6). This text is found (1) as an integral part of Mark's Gospel in a fifth century MS. (k), which represents the oldest form of the Latin text of the Gospels, showing much agreement with Cyprian's citations. (2) In several Greek uncials of the seventh to ninth centuries (L^TΨ) and several Greek cursives and Ethiopic MSS., only that here as if giving a choice between the two, the A text is added also partly with introductory and interposed remarks which give evidence that these additions are doubtful and circulated only here and there. (3) On the other hand, it appears on the margin of a Greek cursive of the tenth century (Ev. 274), A being inserted in the text. This is the case also in the latest Syriac version made in Alexandria in the seventh century by Thomas of Heraclea, who compared Greek MSS. (GK, ii. 922). (4) Finally, it is probable that the scribe who copied the Codex Vaticanus was familiar with B, not A. There is also a Coptic MS. which seems to depend upon an original having the B text (GK, ii. 912, 921). A third recension (C), namely, that in which Mark's Gospel is concluded with xvi. 8, is found (1) in the two oldest Greek MSS. extant (SB); (2) according to Eusebius' testimony in "almost all," and these the "accurate" MSS. of his time, which Jerome also declares to have been the case still in his time (GK, ii. 919); (3) in one of the two oldest forms of the Syriac translation (Ss). To the above is to be added (4) the silent witness of authors who betray acquaintance with neither A nor B, and (5) the indirect witness of the B recension. From the witnesses cited above under 2, 4, for the B text, it is clear that in the regions where B originated and was circulated A did not become known until later; nor is it hardly conceivable that B should have been invented where A had been handed down by the tradition. The B text cannot be traced back beyond the fourth century, although it may have originated in the third century, and apparently in Egypt, whence it found its way into single MSS. in Latin Africa. The A text, which was the only one known to Irenaeus, originated probably in Asia Minor before the middle of the second century, whence it spread without resistance to Italy and Gaul, whereas in Palestine though known it was rejected by scholars. And in Syria, where its contents were very early made known by its incorporation in the Diatessaron, it had to struggle for its existence.

The way in which both the additions harmonise with the beginning of the book, show that they were written after careful consideration. The statement with which both A and B conclude, namely, that the apostles, authorised by the risen Christ, preached the gospel throughout the world, is a suitable conclusion for a book which, according to its title, was intended to set forth the beginning and origin of the gospel of Christ. In B this is all that is said, and at the same time expressed in ecclesiastical language which has a comparatively modern sound. The only thing it contains in the nature of a conclusion to the interrupted narrative is the brief statement that the women fulfilled the commission given them by the angel. The apparent contradiction with xvi. 8—which, after all, is only apparent—was partly removed, as in codex k, by changes made later in xvi. 8 (GK, ii. 920 f.). The contradiction was, however, little felt, because the passage was written more with reference to xvi. 7 (cf. Luke xxiv. 9 f., 23; John xx. 18). The A text is of an entirely different character. To begin with, it is very easy to see that the text is made up of different elements. In vv. 9–13 and vv. 19–20 there is no narrative such as we find elsewhere in the Gospels, especially in Mark. Compared with these sentences, the meagre sketch in i. 2–13, which precedes the account of Jesus' preaching, shows ample breadth of description, and is full of graphic detail, while the use of direct discourse (i. 7 f., 11) lends it a certain dramatic vigour. In the addition, on the other hand, not a single word spoken by the risen Christ at the time of His appearances to His disciples is reproduced, nor is an account given of a single act. In short, it is not narrated, but chronicled, that Jesus appeared first to Mary Magdalene, and then to two unnamed persons going into the country, with the statement in both cases that their tidings were not credited by the others (xvi. 9–13). At the close, moreover, (xvi. 19–20), in the fewest possible words, the ascension, Jesus' exaltation to the right hand of God, and the entire missionary work of the apostles are outlined. The sources from which these statements are taken are not hard to find: xvi. 9–11 is from John xx. 1–18, with the insertion of a phrase from Luke viii. 2; xvi. 12–13 is from Luke xxiv. 13–35, the dependence being in part verbal (Luke xxiv. 13, δύο ἐξ αὐτῶν . . . πορευόμενοι εἰς κώμην), but with omission of all details. The language of ver. 19 is that of the Apostolic Creed, not of the Gospels, while that of ver. 20 resembles the apostolic teaching (Heb. ii. 3 f.; Rom. x. 14 f., xv. 18 f.; Col. i. 6; 1 Tim. iii. 16; Acts xv. 12).

Vv. 14–18 are strikingly different from the verses between which they stand (vv. 9–13, 19–20). This is a real narrative, being in its substance an address to the apostles by the risen Christ, with a brief statement of the circumstances under which they were spoken. Further, there is nothing in the passage betraying its dependence upon a canonical Gospel; while, on the other hand, its style does not, like that of vv. 19–20, differ from the classic style which characterises the Gospels. xvi. 14 is cited in Latin by Jerome from a Greek MS. with a very original addition (n. 7). When the Lord reproaches the disciples for their unbelief and hardness of heart, they excuse themselves, saying, "This unrighteous and unbelieving world is under Satan (Satan's power), who by the agency of unclean spirits prevents (men) from laying hold of the true power of God. Therefore reveal now thy righteousness." Everyone sees at once that this is not a gloss written by some copyist, but that it is a bit of conversation handed down by the tradition, which is not only in perfect accord with the spirit of that time (Acts i. 6), but which suits also the context in the Textus receptus. Whereas in the latter the account passes very abruptly from reproof of the disciples' unbelief to the commission in which they are bidden to preach the gospel to the whole world, in the passage as cited by Jerome the necessary transition is supplied. In the excuse which they offer, the apostles confess themselves guilty (cf. Mark ix. 24), so that it can be taken for granted without any statement to this effect that the exhortation, "Be not faithless, but believing" (John xx. 27), is already more than half realised. And the request of the apostles that Jesus reveal His righteousness at once, i.e. set up His kingdom, thereby destroying the power of Satan and his emissaries in the world, is followed naturally by the promise with which He sends them out into the wide and wicked world (xvi. 17 f., cf. Mark vi. 7, 13, ix. 1, 28 f.; Luke ix. 1 f., x. 17-20). This fragment, which Jerome preserved but did not incorporate among the variants in his revision of the Latin Bible, restores the original connection of the passage. The words are not, however, original in Mark, and could not have been written by the author of the A text; for then it would be impossible to explain why they have disappeared from all the Greek MSS. and from the Syriac and Latin texts which have A. That Satan and his emissaries have power in the world (John xii. 31, xvi. 11; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Eph. vi. 11 f.; 1 Pet. v. 8), that the world is lying in wickedness (1 John v. 19), and that the apostles longed for the coming of the kingdom of Christ and the future world in which righteousness dwells (Acts i. 6; 2 Tim. iv. 8), were certainly not thoughts so offensive to Bible readers and copyists of the second century that they felt constrained, when they found such thoughts in their copies of the Gospels, to cut them out of the text. Then there is the other difficulty of explaining the incredible thoroughness with which this was done in all quarters. The original form of this narrative which is preserved by Jerome must have been taken from the very source from which the author of A took this part of his compilation. It found its way into the Greek MS. of the Gospel, in which Jerome found it apparently first as a gloss and then as a part of the text. Unless all appearances are greatly deceptive, this source was rediscovered some years ago (n. 8). In an Armenian Evangelistarium belonging to the year 989, and purporting to be copied from MSS. of a much earlier date, after Mark xvi. 8 there is a space left large enough for two lines; then follows the title written with red ink—"Ariston's, the Presbyter's." Since the Armenian translation of Eusebius, H. E. iii. 39. 4, and the Syriac original on which the Armenian translation is dependent, transcribe Ἀριστίων with Ariston, and since this Aristion was one of the presbyters who were Papias' teachers,—from whom also Papias became acquainted with numerous sayings of Jesus which did not become canonical and with other gospel traditions, all of which he preserved in his work,—there is little reason to doubt that this notice has reference to the Aristion whom Papias makes a personal disciple of Jesus (above, p. 452 f.). In so far as it states formally, or seems to imply, that Aristion is the author of the whole A text, the notice is misleading. In the first place, as already shown, the A text is made up of fragments which are totally different in style; but neither Papias' fragments nor the account of Eusebius in which they are incorporated give the impression that Aristion was engaged at all in literary work, and in making compilations from the canonical Gospels. Apart from this, however, if Aristion were the author of A, it would be quite impossible to explain how the original form of the narrative could disappear from all the Greek MSS. having the A text, to turn up again suddenly in a Greek MS. in the hands of Jerome. So the fact of the matter must be, rather, that Mark xvi. 14-18 is one of those narratives and traditions (cf. Luke i. 1) of the disciple Aristion which Papias incorporated in his work (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 7, 14). This is confirmed in the most striking manner by a marginal gloss to Rufinus' translation of Eusebius, H. E. iii. 39. 9, though inserted by a later hand, which connects Aristion's name with the story taken by Eusebius from Papias, that Justus, called Barsabbas (Acts i. 23), once drank a deadly poison, but was preserved by the grace of the Lord from all harmful effects. Here is an actual case where the promise of Jesus in Mark xvi. 18 is fulfilled. This promise and the narrative of its fulfilment are referred independently to the same Aristion by two different persons acquainted with Papias' work. Papias' work is therefore the source from which the author of A took the middle part of this addition, combining it with material from Luke and John into an indifferent unity. The way for the Lord's rebuke of the disciples' unbelief (ver. 14) is prepared by the statement that the reports of Mary Magdalene and of the two going into the country were discredited (vv. 11, 13), while the sketch of the apostolic missionary work (ver. 20) follows naturally the command and promise of the Lord (vv. 15-18). The fact that the redactor of A left out the sentence, of which we gain our first knowledge from Jerome, does not need special explanation; since, in constructing a suitable close for Mark's Gospel, he did not need to copy his sources, but to excerpt and to compile them. The very originality of the sentence, which makes it interesting to everyone who is fond of the antique, may have made it appear to him too peculiar and too obscure to form a part of an epilogue so entirely outlinear in character. These last statements also go to strengthen the conjecture that the A text was appended to Mark's Gospel in Asia Minor, where this Gospel was highly esteemed at an early date (above, p. 444 f.), and that this was done before the middle of the second century, since, outside of Asia Minor, acquaintance with Aristion's oral narratives and Papias' work in which these narratives were recorded cannot be presupposed at such an early date.

After what has been said, further proof that A does not belong to the author of the book is scarcely necessary. Defenders of this view have undertaken to explain the later setting aside of this alleged concluding section, on the ground of objections to the contradictions between its contents and the other Gospels. To be sure, the learned harmonists, from Eusebius on, busied themselves with these differences along with others (GK, ii. 913-918). But, after all, what do they amount to compared with those which exist between the evangelists' narratives in other parts of the gospel history. The attempt was made, from the second century on, to modify or to remove such differences by means of exegesis, more or less artificial, and by small changes in the text, consisting of removals and additions; that, however, a section of this compass, above all this section, to which authors like Irenæus, Epiphanius, Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Augustine made no objection, should have been cut out for such reasons, and the Gospel of Mark thereby simply mutilated in a passage where it would be particularly noticeable to every reader and copyist, is inconceivable, quite as much so as that the work of the mutilator should have been accepted so widely for centuries. To begin with, there are two points in the language which show that Mark could not have been the author of A. (1) Instead of (ἡ) μία (τῶν) σαββάτων, the only usage current in the Apostolic Church (Mark xvi. 2; Matt. xxviii. 1; Luke xxiv. 1; John xx. 1, 19; Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2), we find in Mark xvi. 9, πρώτη σαββάτου.

which is better Greek (vol. i. p. 19, n. 14), but which does not occur elsewhere in the N.T. (2) Jesus is twice called "The Lord" (xvi. 19, 20), an expression which does not occur elsewhere in the book, and which is not to be found in Matthew, and only rarely in Luke and John. Attention has already been called to the fact that the whole character of the narrative is foreign to Mark, certainly that of xvi. 9-13, 19-20 (above, p. 470 f.). That Mark could not have excerpted portions from Luke and John, as the author of A evidently did, will appear when these Gospels are investigated. They are later than Mark. The content of A is, moreover, of such a character that Mark could not have written it as the conclusion of the narrative begun in xvi. 1, and so as the conclusion of his book. After making the angels repeat the promise of Jesus recorded earlier in xiv. 28 so near the close of the Gospel as xvi. 7, he could not have omitted to mention that the risen Jesus appeared to the disciples in Galilee, and to tell how this took place. But in A the reader thus made expectant does not hear a word about Galilee. Cf. per contra, Matt. xxviii. 16 in relation to Matt. xxvi. 32, xxviii. 7. Nor could Mark have omitted to narrate how the women so far recovered from the terror which at first sealed their lips (xvi. 8) as to be able to carry out the angel's commission (xvi. 7), which was undoubtedly the case with Mary Magdalene, whom Mark mentions for the first time in xvi. 1, if we may believe Mark xvi. 10 and all the other traditions.

If it be accepted as proved from what has been said that A is in the same position as B, which no modern scholar is bold enough to claim as original with the author of the book, and that both are later additions, it follows that C is the original text. The same result follows even from the application of the critical canon that, where two mutually exclusive longer texts are opposed to a shorter text from which their origin can be explained, the shorter reading is to be preferred, especially if it has good witnesses

(n. 9). The canon is entirely applicable to the case in hand; for, in the first place, it is perfectly evident that a text breaking off suddenly with the words ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ, as does C, must have given rise to attempts to supply the book, so manifestly incomplete, with a suitable conclusion. Presupposing, therefore, that C is original, the origin of A and B is entirely conceivable. In the second place, C is strongly supported by direct and indirect witnesses (above, p. 469). In the third place, we cannot understand how C could have originated from either A or B. The assumption that originally C was followed by another conclusion—here called X—written by the author, which afterwards disappeared altogether from the tradition (n. 8), is to be rejected as fanciful, because, as shown, it is unnecessary in explanation of the facts. Whatever form it may take, this hypothesis, which we may indicate briefly as C + X, is improbable. Though the N.T. text can be shown to have met with varying treatment, it has never as yet been established from ancient citations, nor made really probable on internal grounds, that a single complete sentence of the original text has disappeared altogether from the text transmitted in the Church, i.e. from all the MSS. of the original and of the ancient translations. Quite as little has the opposite been shown to be the case, namely, that there is a single sentence of the text, transmitted in the Church and witnessed by all existing sources, which did not belong originally to the text (n. 9). Here, however, it is not a question of a short sentence, but the part which is wanting—which must, therefore, have been lost if originally in the text—must have been a narrative of considerable compass (see above, p. 475). Nor is it a case where the section was of such a character that it could disappear without notice, because an intelligible connection remained after it was left out; it is rather the question of the concluding section, which the reader must await with interest after what precedes, and the loss of which must leave the book noticeably incomplete. The most inconceivable supposition of all would be that some one, who was displeased with this alleged genuine conclusion (X), removed the same intentionally, and that this mutilated copy succeeded in entirely replacing the complete exemplars. The mutilation must have been made immediately after the appearance of the book and before it began to circulate, consequently in the region where it was written, and, if the author did not die at the very moment when his work was completed, in the vicinity where he was. Such an intentional setting aside of X would have been a senseless and hopeless undertaking, if the critic who ventured it did not at once furnish a suitable substitute, i.e. if the person who mutilated Mark were not at the same time the author of A, the most widely circulated of the spurious conclusions. But if X was set aside by the author or the redactor of A, how are we to explain the origin of all those exemplars, widely circulated until after the fourth century, which at that time were, and in their existing form are, without either the original conclusion (X) or the conclusion which it is alleged was intentionally substituted for it (A)—in other words, all the witnesses for B and C? It is, of course, conceivable that a recension, C + X, was objected to in various quarters, and that the recension A won friends earlier than we know—before it came into general use in the Church; but it is absurd to assume that entire Church provinces should have adopted the negative part of this new recension—a mutilation of the Mark which they possessed originally—but not the positive part of the same, i.e. the new conclusion. The absurdity is not helped by the assumption (n. 8) that, while the intentional setting aside of X and the appending of xvi. 9–20 took place in the same circles and from similar motives, a period of twenty years or more elapsed between the two processes, during which time the Gospel was widely circulated in its mutilated form, without as yet having been completed again. It is inconceivable that one who had read critically the original in its completed form should have been satisfied with the production of such an unsightly torso, and that persons in possession of the completed book in circulation as early as the first century in Rome, as well as Asia Minor,—certainly also in many other places,—should have exchanged the same for the mutilated work.

The conclusion stands, therefore, that Mark was circulated from the beginning only in its incomplete form C (i. 1—xvi. 8), and the question arises as to the origin of this abnormality. An accident to the original MS. has been suggested, which must have taken place before any copies were made. But if this happened before the book left his hands, why did not the author correct it before he permitted his book to be copied, i.e. before it was issued? More probably death, or some other compelling circumstance, arrested his pen. If he died before the completion of the work, the friends for whom it was originally intended would have felt it their duty to copy and issue the posthumous work without additions. If, however, as the tradition seems to show (above, p. 433), Mark published the book himself, its incompleted form would be incomprehensible only in case that a few lines were wanting which the author and editor could have added at any time. On the other hand, the small compass of the work, in comparison with the other historical books of the N.T., leaves room for the conjecture that Mark intended to add several portions to his work (n. 10). Other things besides the resurrection appearances could have been included. For, carrying out the idea expressed in the title, a mass of material remained which could have been appropriately used, such as we find utilised in Acts (cf. e.g. 1 Pet. i. 12 with Acts ii. 1–14). If he began to write the Gospel before the death of Peter (64), but did not publish the same until after the death of Paul (67), things enough could be mentioned which must have interrupted the pen of this spiritual son of Peter and younger friend of Paul in the city where both the apostles had died as martyrs, and which also in the time immediately following must have prevented him from at once completing his book as he desired. If, in these circumstances, he yielded to the request for its issue, it would not have been something unheard of or irrational. It is perfectly possible also that during the months and years while he and others were hoping for the completion of the interrupted work he had given the unfinished book to friends to read, and that they had made several copies without his being able to prevent it (n. 11). At all events, the incomplete character of the book is proof that it was handed down in the Church in the form in which it came from the author's pen, since the first attempt to recast the work would have been directed toward furnishing it with a conclusion. The varied and slow success of the later attempts in this direction show how difficult it was to change the form of a book after it had once found a circle of readers in the Church. Nor is the result different if we assume that it is not the original work of Mark which has had the misfortune, either by accident or intention, of losing its conclusion, but only a later working over of the same; for how could a new working over of the Gospel, which was never completed, have replaced the original work, which was complete, and which had already come to be highly esteemed by many?

1. (P. 456.) The question whether υἱοῦ Θεοῦ is to be read after Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ in Mark i. 1 need not be raised here. Iren. iii. 10. 6, 11. 8, 16. 3, seems to have construed i. 1 as subject of the predicate contained in ver. 2, as if it read, ἡ ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου Ἰ. Χρ. ἐγένετο κατὰ τὸ γεγραμμένον ἐν τῷ Ἠσαΐᾳ. Origen, however, without expressing himself definitely as to the grammatical construction, interprets the passage (in Jo. tom. i. 13, vi. 24) as if ver. 1 with ἐγένετο of ver. 4 were the predicate and Ἰωάννης the subject. This construction, so popular in later times, was deliberately excluded by 8*, καὶ ἐγένετο, and Copt. ἐγένετο ἐκ in ver. 4. The fundamental error of the still dominant interpretation appears in Bengel's Gnomon, though at the same time he rejects a still more mistaken construction: "Initium tamen appellat Marcus non libri sui, sed rei gestæ." For further details we must refer to the commentaries.

2. (P. 457.) That the indication of the close of a book serves to set off one complete literary production from another writing following it in the same codex is shown as early as Hier. Ep. xxviii. 4: "Ut solemus nos completis opusculis ad distinctionem rei alterius sequentis medium interponere 'explicit' aut 'felicitur' aut aliquid istiusmodi." The same, of course, is true of the corresponding incipit. It may be mere chance that these formulas appear earlier in Latin Gospel books (e.g. in Vercell. sæc. iv., Veron. and Bobb. sæc. v., cf. Bianchini, Ev. Quadr. i. 262 ff., 474; Old Latin Biblical Texts, ed. Wordsworth, ii. 23) than in the Greek. The oldest Greek text of the Gospels in which such formulas are found is that of the Græco-Latin Cantabrigiensis (sæc. vi., ed. Scrivener, p. 95, εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μαθθαίον τετελεσθη, ἀρχεται εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Ἰωάννην; p. 262, ἐπληρώθη, ἀρχεται). That τέλος and ἀρχή were also customary at an earlier period needs first to be proved. With regard to τέλος, cf. GK. ii. 933. The comparison with Hos. i. 2 which has been suggested,—by whom first the present writer does not know,—is not apt. Aside from the fact that the Hebrew ought probably to be translated, "As Yahweh began to speak with Hosea," the ἀρχή λόγον κυρίου προς Ὠσηέ of the LXX is not the beginning or the title of the book, but comes after it (Hos. i. 1), and refers only to the succeeding portion,—say chaps. i. and ii.,—or perhaps only to the command of i. 2 itself.

3. (P. 461.) In the Johannine writings we do not find εὐαγγέλιον and εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, except in Rev. x. 7, xiv. 6—where it is not applied to the Gospel usually so called—and a suggestion of the word in ἀγγελία, 1 John i. 5, iii. 11. Even Luke, who shows most clearly the derivation of the idea from Isa. lxi. 1 (Luke iv. 18, cf. vii. 22; Matt. xi. 5), and who uses the verb with some frequency, putting it in Jesus' own mouth (iv. 43, vii. 22, xvi. 16), besides applying it to the preaching of His disciples (viii. 1, ix. 6, xx. 1; Acts v. 42, viii. 35, x. 36, etc.) and to other announcements connected with it as well (i. 19, ii. 10, iii. 18), does not use the noun in the Gospel, and in Acts only in the mouth of Peter (xv. 7, cf. Mark i. 15) and of Paul (xx. 24, cf. 32) with a designation which is characteristic of his teaching. Matthew uses εὐαγγέλιον four times, twice in words of Jesus (xxiv. 14, xxvi. 13), and twice referring to Jesus (iv. 23, ix. 35), three of these times with the addition, peculiar to him, of τῆς βασιλείας (for in Mark i. 14 τοῦ θεοῦ is certainly to be read instead of τῆς βασιλείας). But Mark in his much shorter Gospel has the word seven times; he alone of the evangelists uses it in connection with Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (i. 1), as is common with Paul, or τοῦ θεοῦ (i. 14); and among the five passages in which he puts the word without addition in Jesus' mouth (i. 15, viii. 35, x. 29, xiii. 10, xiv. 9), there are two where comparison with the parallels (Mark viii. 35 = Matt. x. 39; Mark x. 29 = Matt. xix. 29; Luke xviii. 29) shows that the expression is peculiar to Mark.

4. (P. 461.) We find in Mark's narrative a number of details lacking in Matt., and for the most part in Luke also, which are not indispensable to the understanding of the story, but which describe the situation more exactly or the action more graphically: i. 19 (ὁ δόλγον), 20 ("the hired servants"), 29 (particular designation of the house and of Jesus' companions), 33 ("the whole city was gathered at the door"), 36, ii. 1*b*, 2, 16 (ιδόντες ὅτι ἦσθιεν), 18 (it was a fast-day), iii. 9*f.*, 20*f.*, 34 ("looking about Him at the multitude which surrounded Him," cf. ver. 32), iv. 36, 38 (ἐν τῇ πρὸ μνη ἐπὶ τὸ προσκεφάλαιον), v. 3-vi. 13 (the number of the swine), 15*f.*, 26, 29-33, 40 (Jesus' company), 41 (the exact words), 42 (the age of the girl), vi. 13 (anointing with oil), 20*f.*, 37 (cost of the bread), 38, 39 ("the green grass"), 40, vii. 26, viii. 3*b*, 14 (the one loaf), 27 (ἐν τῇ ὁδῷ, and often besides, ix. 33, x. 17, 32, 52), ix. 3, 14-16 (see § 53), 17*f.*, 21-26, 28 (εἰς οἶκον), 33 (ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ), 34, 35 (καθίσας), 36 (ἐναγκαλισάμενος, so also x. 16), x. 10, 32*a*, 46, 49-51, xi. 4, 13 (first what Jesus saw from a distance, then what He noticed on the spot), xiv. 7*b*, 30 (δύς, τρίς, cf. xiv. 72), 44 (καὶ ἀπάγετε ἀσφαλῶς), 51*f.*, 54 (ἔσω πρὸς τὸ φῶς), xv. 21, 24 (τίς τί ἄρῃ), 29 (οὐά), 44. It is often noted that Jesus looked about Him, noticed objects, or looked at persons, and sometimes the effect is also mentioned, iii. 5, 34, v. 30, 32, x. 21, 23, 27, xi. 11. The feeling and manner, too, of Jesus' words and actions is sometimes noticed by Mark alone, i. 41, iii. 5, x. 14. It is frankly stated that Jesus failed to hear something, inquired about something that He did not know, and looked for something that was not to be found, v. 30-32, 36, vi. 38, xi. 13, cf. xiii. 32; and that His relatives and disciples spoke of or to Him with disrespect or reproach, iii. 21, iv. 38, v. 31 (v. 40), viii. 32. Mark likes to give a precise note of time, sometimes by an addition to the less definite expression found in the other accounts, i. 32, 35, xvi. 2, cf. i. 21, ii. 1, iv. 35, vi. 2, 35, 47, 48, viii. 2, ix. 2, xi. 11, 19, 20, xiv. 12, 17, xv. 1, 25 (hour of the crucifixion, Mark only), 33, 34. He likes strong forms of expression: ἐξέστησαν εὐθὺς ἐκστάσει μεγάλῃ, v. 42; λίαν ἐκ περισσοῦ ἐν ἑαυτοῖς ἐξίσταντο, vi. 51, cf. vii. 37, x. 26; πολλοὶ πλοῦσοι πολλὰ—μία χίρα λεπτὰ δύο, xii. 41*f.* (cf. in comparison with this Luke xxi. 1*f.*). The merely adverbial πολλά, i. 45, iii. 12, iv. 2, v. 10, 23, 38, 43, vi. 20, 34, ix. 26, he alone of the evangelists has; vii. 8, 13 also belongs here, while v. 26, viii. 31, ix. 12, xv. 3 belong in the same category as Matt. xvi. 21, xxvii. 19; Luke ix. 22, xxii. 65. A comparison with the parallels shows that μόρους, ix. 2, πάντων, x. 44, οὕτως, xi. 32, πολύ, xii. 27, are the sharpening of other simpler and sufficient terms. For him πάντα ὅσα εἶχεν is not sufficient, he adds ὅλον τὸν βίον αὐτῆς, xii. 44. The much repeated καὶ εὐθὺς (often amended by transcribers to εὐθέως) and the likewise frequent πάλιν and καὶ πάλιν will perhaps weary a reader attentive to the style, but on the other hand show the vivacity of the narrator. Some proper observations on this point occur in Mandel, Kophas der Evangelist, 2-6. Like other narrators from among the people, Mark seems rather to favour than to avoid the repetition of the same circumstantial expression within the single narrative, instead of an abbreviation of similar meaning, iii. 1, 3, iii. 31, 32, v. 9, 15, v. 30, 31, vi. 14, 16, x. 47, 48, xiv. 13, 72, xv. 37, 39 (ἐξέπνευσεν), xiv. 28, xvi. 7. In the discourses and conversations, moreover, he likes refrain and recapitulation, vii. 8 (even according to the shorter text), 13, vii. 15, 18-20, x. 23, 24, xii. 24, 27 (παλαῖοτε), xii. 29-31, 32-33. Consequently ix. 44, 46 are not to be removed from the text on the ground of tautology. He uses direct discourse even where unspoken thoughts (v. 28, ix. 10), or remarks of several persons, or words spoken on different occasions, are reproduced, i. 37, iii. 11, vi. 14, 16, and also where other narrators do not find it necessary to repeat the words at all, vi. 24, x. 49. Mark is not afraid of ellipsis, iii. 30, (he spoke in view of the fact) "that they said"; ix. 11,

(how is it related with the fact) "that the Pharisees say?" ix. 23, (how can you say) "If thou canst?" ix. 28, "That we could not cast it out" (how is that to be explained?); xiv. 49, "but (it must happen so), in order that the Scriptures might be fulfilled." The impression of accuracy is also heightened by the frequent retention of the Aramaic phrase; see § 53.

5. (Pp. 467, 468.) The most detailed and scholarly arguments for the authenticity of Mark xvi. 9-20 are those of Burgon, The Last Twelve Verses of the Gospel according to St. Mark, 1871; Martin, Introduction à la Critique Textuelle du N.T., Partie Pratique, tome ii. 1884. Among those who dispute the authenticity of these verses, special mention may be made of the critical apparatus of Tischendorf, that of Westcott and Hort, N.T. Appendix, 28-51, the investigation of Klostermann, op. cit. 298-309, and the writer's discussion GK, ii. 910-938, which cannot be fully repeated here. With regard to the evidence for the text which closes with xvi. 8, we might add that the Gospel of Peter (circa 150) should probably be included; cf. the writer's work on the subject, 1893, S. 53. The dependence of this Gospel upon Mark in general, and especially in the account of the resurrection morning, is undeniable. An ἦρ, which is proper only in the mouth of the narrator, Mark xvi. 4, is in Gospel of Peter xii. 54 attributed to the women, on whose lips it is meaningless. From Mark xvi. 5 the Gospel of Peter xiii. 55 takes μανίσκον . . . περιβεβλημένον στολήν κτλ., whereas in xi. 44 it had called the same angel ἄνθρωπος τις; from Mark xvi. 8 it borrows φοβηθείσαι ἔφυγον. But the Gospel of Peter concludes the account of the resurrection day at this point. This coincidence with the original conclusion of Mark would be a very remarkable circumstance if xvi. 9-20 had also been before the author. Lods, L'Ev. de St. Pierre, p. 64, compares Gospel of Peter, vii. 27, πενθοῦντες καὶ κλαίοντες; Conybeare, Expos., Dec. 1895, p. 413; Gospel of Peter, xiv. 59, ἐκλαίωμεν καὶ ἐλυπούμεθα, with Mark xvi. 10, πενθοῦσιν καὶ κλαίουσιν. But the first passage belongs to a different historical connection, and the second is not particularly similar. The combination πενθεῖν καὶ κλαίειν is quite usual, Jas. iv. 9; Luke vi. 25; Rev. xviii. 11, 15, 19; and also John xvi. 20,—a prediction which was not to fail of literal fulfilment. Rohrbach (Der Schluss des Marcusev. 27-33; Die Berichte über d. Auferstehung Christi), following up a conjecture of Harnack's (Bruchstücke des Ev. und der Ap. des Petrus, 2te Aufl. 33), has attempted to show that the Gospel of Peter derived its conclusion from the lost original ending of Mark. But, granted that there was such an ending, how is one to show what it contained? We must assume that Mark, if he had finished his work, would have told of an appearance of the risen Lord in Galilee, as would probably Gospel of Peter, xiv., also—where, however, the name Galilee does not appear, and there is no account of an appearance of Christ. But Matt. xxviii. 16-20 and John xxi. also tell of an appearance in Galilee, and the connection of the Gospel of Peter with the latter chapter is evident. That Levi the son of Alphæus is mentioned there, only shows that the writer knew Mark and used it here as in other passages; cf. Mark ii. 14. Horn, Abfassungszeit, Geschichtlichkeit und Zweck von Jo. xxi. S. 94-156, has given an extended criticism of the Harnack-Rohrbach hypothesis. With regard to the authorities for Mark xvi. 9-20, we must notice also that the fact that the section was worked over by Tatian (Forsch. i. 218 f.; GK, ii. 554) has been still further confirmed; cf. NKZ, 1894, 106. On the other hand, one may not with Harnack (TU, xiii.

4. 51) adduce Novat. Trin. viii., in connection with which Gallandi, *Bibl.*² iii. 292, had inappropriately cited Mark xvi. 15, or the writing Ad Novat. (Cypr., ed. Hartel, App. p. 56) attributed by Harnack (op. cit. xiii. 1) to Pope Sixtus II. and the year 257-258; for evangelizate gentibus, also in an inexact quotation of Matt. xxviii. 19, does not correspond exactly with Mark xvi. 15 (predicare evangelium omni creatura). Conybeare, op. cit. 402, shows that the Armenian Eznik, in his work against heresies (ed. Venet. 89), quotes Mark xvi. 17, 18 verbatim according to the usual Armenian translation, but without attributing the words expressly to Mark. The principal conclusion which Conybeare draws is that Mark xvi. 9-20 always belonged to the Armenian translation of the Gospels, but was afterwards set aside because the addition was known to the Armenians from the beginning as a work of the presbyter Ariston (see n. 8), and so, with stricter views regarding the Canon, could not be permanently admitted as a part of Mark. The history of the Armenian translation of this section, of which Martin, op. cit. 325 ff., gives a different account and opinion than Conybeare, 403 f., 417 f., cannot be followed further here. But see n. 8. For an extended variant of the longer form see Freer MS.

6. (P. 468.) The most important witnesses for the shorter addition B are—(1) L. (sæc. 8, ed. Tischendorf in Monum. sacra inæd. 1846, p. 206); (2) Ψ (sæc. 8 or 9, in Gregory, Tacthritik des NT's, i. 94); (3) T¹ (sæc. 7 or 8, in Gregory, op. cit. 70, a Coptic-Greek fragment); (4) Ol (so called by Schmidtke, Die Evv. eines alten Uncial codex, 1903, the text is given S. 29; it is Miniscule 574, according to Gregory's enumeration = Paris, Bibl. nat. gr. 97, used by the present writer in discussion of the question [GK, ii. 921] following Martin, Description techn. p. 91-94; Nestle, ZfNTW, 1903, S. 255, is mistaken). The text is accordingly as follows: πάντα δὲ τὰ παρηγγελμένα τοῖς περὶ τὸν Πέτρον συντόμως ἐξηγγείλαν· μετὰ δὲ ταῦτα αὐτὸς ὁ (ὁ omitted in Ψ) Ἰησοῦς (ἐφάνη+ΨΓ) ἀπὸ ἀνατολῆς (τοῦ ἡλίου+T) καὶ ἄρχι (μέχρι, Ψ) δόσεως ἐξαπέστειλεν δι' αἰτῶν τὸ ἱερόν καὶ ἄφθαρτον κήρυγμα τῆς αἰωνίου σωτηρίας· ἀμήν (omitted in L). In Ψ this portion is separated from xvi. 8 only by τέλος, which indicates the close of a Church lection, and is followed by ἔστιν καὶ ταῦτα φερόμενα μετὰ τὸ “ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ”. ἀναστὰς δὲ πρῶτῃ κτλ. = xvi. 9-20. Not until this point does the subscription εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μάρκον (without ἀμήν) occur. In L the shorter ending is introduced by φέρεται πον καὶ ταῦτα, then follows the longer ending without an ἀμήν as conclusion of what precedes, introduced by ἔστιν δὲ καὶ ταῦτα κτλ. (except for the δὲ interpolated here as in Ψ, see above) and concluding with ἀμήν. εὐ. κ. Μάρκον. In Ol all intervening remarks are wanting. So also in T¹, where, however, the shorter ending is separated from xvi. 8 as from the following longer ending by lines filled out with flourishes; and at the beginning of the longer ending the words εἶχε γάρ· ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ of xvi. 8 are repeated (cf. the Coptic MSS. concerning which, following Lightfoot, the present writer has made some comments). Only in the Latin Codex k (Vulgoensis, sæc. 5, Old Latin Bibl. texts, ii. 23) is B fully amalgamated with the text of xvi. 8; but in such a way, that the text of xvi. 8 is violently changed, in order to add the shorter ending without producing a contradiction (cf. GK, ii. 920).

7. (P. 471.) Jerome, contra Pelag. ii. 15 (Vallarsi, ii. 758; cf. GK, ii. 919, 935): “In quibusdam exemplaribus et maxime in graecis codicibus iuxta Marcum in fine eius evangelii scribitur : 'Postea quum accubuissent undecim, apparuit eis Jesus et exprobravit incredulitatem et duritiam cordis eorum, quia his, qui viderant eum resurgentem, non crediderunt. Et illi satisfaciebant dicentes : Sæculum istud iniquitatis et incredulitatis sub satana (al. substantia) est, quæ (read qui) non sinit per immundos spiritus veram dei apprehendi virtutem : ideo iam nunc revela iustitiam tuam."

8. (Pp. 473, 477, 478.) With regard to the Gospel of Etchmiadzin artistically considered, see Strzygowski, Byzantinische Denkmäler, i., Vienna, 1891. The statement "of Ariston the presbyter," which it contains, was first published and discussed by Conybeare in the Expos., Oct. 1893, pp. 241-254 ; again, Dec. 1895, pp. 401-421. Cf. the writer's discussion, ThLb, 1893, No. 51. Resch, Ausserkanon. Paralleltexte zu den Evv. ii. 450-456, on the basis of this phrase, argued the probability that Ariston of Pella (circa 135) was not only the author of the conclusion of Mark, but also the editor of the Gospel Canon. Rohrbach (see n. 5, above), who declares (26) the issue and circulation of an unfinished book to be "nonsense,"—in singular contradiction to the literary history of all ages,—and therefore treats the former existence of an original and genuine ending as a matter of course, holds the Gospel to have come to Asia Minor intact, and also to the place where the Gospel of Peter originated, which in all probability, however, is to be looked for elsewhere (p. 483, above). It was of this unmutilated book (C+X) that John the presbyter spoke with his pupils (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 15). One of these pupils, Papias, wrote several decades later of a Gospel of Mark, which had meanwhile been deprived of its closing chapter (X) and furnished with a spurious addition, and wrote under the candid impression that he had in his hands the same book as that on which in his youth he had heard his teacher comment. So Papias did not notice that, in the meantime, the dissatisfaction with X in the circle of his fellow-students had led to its omission ; that the book thus mutilated had been widely circulated in Asia Minor, for example, in the places where Matt. and Luke originated ; and that in Asia Minor again, somewhere about 110-120, the spurious ending (A) had been attached, while at the same time X had been worked over into John xxi. And so we are not to be surprised that about 130 the genuine Mark (C+X) had completely disappeared wherever it had once existed, in Rome where it had originated, in Syria where the Gospel of Peter was probably written, in Palestine where Matt. was composed, in the unknown place of Luke's origin, also, and in Asia Minor itself, where so much had been done with X, and that it had given place partly to recension C, which presupposes B, and partly to recension A. The spurious ending (A) is said to be the concluding portion of a "kerugma" of the presbyter Ariston, that is, a sermon of his concerning the whole life of Jesus from the birth to the ascension. If the marginal gloss of the Oxford MS. of Rufinus on Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 9 is from a late hand (Expos., Dec. 1895, p. 415), it must nevertheless rest upon an older statement which could have come only from one who knew Papias' work. Rohrbach's assertion (17), that every reader of Eus. iii. 39 could have set the name Ariston in the margin of §9, is more bold than obvious. If such a person was setting up conjectures as to the source of the story of Justus Barsabbas and the poisoned drink which proved harmless, he could only think of the daughters of Philip (there mentioned), or of Philip himself, as the authorities. The references to Aristion in §§ 7 and 14 are apart from the question, and in the only passage where Eusebius mentions his communications more particularly it is not stories that he relates, but words of Jesus that he reports (§ 14). Mark xvi. 14-18 is such a διήγησις λόγων τοῦ κυρίου, but not xvi. 9-13 and 19, 20. What is made to show the original unity of A as a whole, namely, the preparation for the main section vv. 14-18 in ἠπίστησαν, ver. 11, and οὐδὲ ἐκείνοις ἐπίστευσαν, ver. 13, only shows that the writer of A proceeded with some reflection. Thus, also, he was led, in the same words which present themselves as a fitting introduction to ver. 14, to go beyond the authority from which vv. 9-11 are derived, namely, John xx. 1-18, where nothing is said of the disciples' unbelieving attitude toward the message of Mary Magdalene, and into inconsistency with the narrative in Luke xxiv. 13-35, from which he also makes excerpts, and especially with its close. That this modification of the materials found support in John xx. 8, Luke xxiv. 11, 22-24, Matt. xxviii. 17, is obvious. But that we have a compilation of excerpts in vv. 9-13 is unquestionably shown by the statement which is inserted from Luke viii. 2, and which is inappropriate in this connection. In opposition to the opinion of Westcott and Hort, N.T. Appendix, 51, that the opening words, ἀναστὰς δὲ πρῶτ' without Ἰησοῦς, indicate that the whole was borrowed from another connection, we may remark that the omission of the name is not rendered more intelligible by this hypothesis. In analogous cases, like John vii. 53, Luke xxi. 38, the interpolators have introduced the foreign material with a sentence of their own which simplifies the connection. In the present instance the compiler has followed the style of Mark. After the proper name has been given in xvi. 6, Jesus is indicated by αὐτόν, αὐτοῦ, and again αὐτόν, while between them stands a προάγει without noun or pronoun. One might just as well require Ἰησοῦς, or a substitute for it, in xvi. 14, as in xvi. 9; but the modern ὁ κύριος does not appear till xvi. 19 (p. 476, above). Mark himself is very sparing in the use of the name Jesus and its equivalents. We miss it in i. 21*b* after 21*a*, and in i. 30-ii. 4 after i. 29, and in the entire section iii. 7-v. 21, with all its change of actors and speakers.

9. (P. 477.) Examples for the canon of textual criticism on p. 477 are: John vi. 47, πιστεύων—additions, εἰς ἐμέ and εἰς θεόν (See Ss); John vii. 39, πνεῦμα—additions, ἅγιον and δεδομένον, both, indeed, in B; Jas. v. 7, πρῶτον—additions, ἑστὸν and καρπὸν. It is without question that many readings which found considerable currency in the second and third centuries, among them some of no little extent and importance, from the fourth century on, were more and more supplanted, and have in part disappeared from the later tradition, and also that interpolations have become established which were not known in the second century. But even now we are always in a position to base our judgment, however it may incline in doubtful cases, on existing sources, e.g. John iv. 9*b*, v. 3*b*, 4, vii. 53-viii. 11; cf. vol. i. 535, above, 124, on Phil. i. 3; 1 Tim. iii. 1. Whoever considers "This day have I begotten thee" in Luke iii. 22 original, need not complain that the true reading has disappeared from the tradition after 300. Of peculiar readings which Marcion did not invent, but found existing in part, as in Luke xi. 2*f*, Gal. iv. 26 (GK, ii. 471, 502, 1015; ZKom. Gal. 298), there are certainly but few, though various traces in the following centuries, and even on internal grounds their genuineness is to be doubted. The variant readings of Cod. D and allied MSS. in Acts do not belong here, for they are part of a comprehensive recension standing over against another which is likewise original. See § 59.

10. (P. 479.) The length of the historical books of the N.T. reckoned according to the ancient stichoi (GK, i. 76, ii. 395) is: Matt., 2480; Mark, 1543; Luke, 2714; John, 1950; Acts, 2610. The difference, then, between Mark and John, the next smallest, is 407 stichoi, about the length of 1 and 2 Pet. together (403), or 1 and 2 Tim. (420); between Mark and Luke, 1171 stichoi, which is considerably more than Rom. (979).

11. (P. 480.) Tertullian, contra Marc. i. 1, relates that the original copy of the second edition of his Antimarcion was borrowed by a friend, who afterward fell away from the Church, transcribed inaccurately, and published (exhibuit frequentior). The subsequent lapse does not affect the matter. Premature publication against the wish of the author was nothing infrequent (Cicero, ad Attic. xiii. 21. 4). Before all, however, one must keep in mind that in ancient times the real editio by the booksellers, with which the earliest Christians were hardly concerned, was often preceded by a private circulation among friends, sometimes for examination and correction, and sometimes by the way of gift, or to satisfy curiosity (cf. Haenny, Schriftsteller u. Buchhändler in Rom, 1884, S. 9 ff., 17 ff.). The history of opera imperfecta, all of which were by no means opera posthuma, gives free play to the imagination (cf. also GK, ii. 930 f.).

§ 53. COMPARISON OF MARK'S GOSPEL WITH THE TRADITION.

According to tradition, the Gospel was written in Rome by the Mark mentioned in Acts xii. 12, 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 37–39; Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 11, after he had been engaged for some twenty years in missionary work outside of Palestine (§ 51). His original name, John, as well as that of his mother, Mary (Mariam), and of his cousin, Joseph, who bore the Aramaic surname Barnabas, make it extremely probable that the family, which was settled in Jerusalem, belonged to the Hebrews, not to the resident Hellenists (Acts vi. 1), although the fact that Barnabas was a native of Cyprus (Acts iv. 36) shows that it had relations to the Diaspora living in regions where Greek predominated. This is in keeping with the fact that Mark reproduces in his Greek book with apparent pleasure the Aramaic form of Jesus' words and those of other persons, although it is always necessary to append a Greek translation for the benefit of his readers. This impression is strengthened by comparison with the longer Gospels of Matthew and Luke, the first of which was written by a Jew, if we may believe the tradition, but is preserved to us only in a translation; the second, however, by a Greek (n. 1). It is also to be noticed that Mark's Greek shows Hebraic colouring more strongly than any other of the Gospels and almost beyond that of any other N.T. writing. Although Mark does not exhibit as many flagrant errors against grammar, conscious or unintentional, as does the Book of Revelation, he has more genuine Semitic idioms (n. 2). Not only is he familiar with the geography and customs of the Holy Land, but he endeavours also to acquaint his readers with them. He portrays, as does no other evangelist, the shrill lamentations for the dead (v. 38, where very probably reference is made to instrumental music, cf. 1 Cor. xiii. 1). He is familiar with the fact that the Jewish fasts were no longer a voluntary exercise of religious earnestness, but that there were certain fast days which the zealous were required to observe, and explains in great detail that the marriage festivities, which lasted for several days, and which on that account could conflict with the two weekly fast days of the Pharisees (Luke xviii. 12), relieved one from every obligation to fast (ii. 18-20). The Jewish conception of "defiled hands" he explains clearly, and makes use of the occasion to inform his readers in detail how the Pharisees and the Jews generally laid weight upon the washing of hands before meals, and upon similar purification of all sorts of vessels, and how all this was regulated by traditional Rabbinic rules (vii. 2-4). Just as he translates Aramaic words and phrases for his readers (n. 1), so he explains Jewish ideas even when expressed (παρασκευή, xv. 42) or transliterated (γένενα, ix. 43, but not in v. 45, 47) in Greek. With Pilate and his office, on the other hand, the readers appear to be entirely familiar (xv. 1, n. 3), likewise with a certain bloody revolt which took place during his term of office (xv. 7).

The fact that Mark uses more Latin technical terms than the other evangelists has only comparative value, since such words were in common use everywhere in the provinces, even among the Jews in Palestine (n. 4). The use of such terms instead of the Greek expressions indicates difference of taste, not the author's nationality. Still it must have been very natural for an author writing in Rome for Romans to employ Latin names for Latin things. It is also conceivable how a Jew, born in Jerusalem, who was repeatedly in Rome, who lived there for considerable periods of time, and wrote his book there, could come to employ Latinisms in his Greek book without necessarily being familiar with the Latin language. The passages in which he explains Greek terms by Latin, or, more accurately, Roman expressions (xii. 42, xv. 16, n. 4), are decisive proof that the book was intended for Western readers. This is still more definitely indicated by Mark xv. 21 (n. 5). Mark agrees here with Matthew (xxvii. 32) and Luke (xxiii. 26) in representing Simon of Cyrene as an unknown person, accidentally met on the way to the Cross; but the phrase which he adds, that this man was the father of Alexander and Rufus, makes it certain (1) that the sons of Simon were known to the readers, just as it renders it clear that the father was unknown; (2) that the only purpose which Mark had in view in this addition peculiar to his account was to render the history more interesting to his readers by connecting it with what was familiar to them, since for the understanding of the development of thought in the passage it is a matter of no consequence whether Simon had sons or not, much less what their names were. Now, from Rom. xvi. 13 we know that in the year 58 there was a Christian by the name of Rufus living in Rome with his mother, both of whom had migrated thither from the East not long before.

In brief, the situation is this: a Gospel which, according to the oldest tradition, was written for Roman readers, between 64 and 70, takes for granted, in a purely incidental way, personal acquaintance on the part of his readers with two brothers, Alexander and Rufus, formerly resident in Jerusalem; and, according to a document of the year 58, there was in the Roman Church a Christian, Rufus by name, living there with his mother, both of whom had come thither from the East. With persons possessing so little judgment as to explain this coincidence as accidental, further discussion is useless. Granted that the tradition that Mark was written in Rome has strong and independent support in many passages of the book, it becomes probable that it was the tendency among the Roman Christians with which we became acquainted in Rom. xiv.—noticed also in Heb. xiii. 9 (above, pp. 332 f., 346 f.)—that influenced Mark to reproduce with such great detail the discourse concerning things clean and unclean (vii. 1–23), and generally to emphasise strongly Jesus' opposition to ceremonialism (above, p. 463).

The author of Mark nowhere speaks in the first person, nor does he make any reference to himself at once intelligible to every reader. It is very noticeable, however, that he calls the apostle John τὸν ἀδελφὸν τοῦ Ἰακώβου both in the list of apostles, iii. 17, and in v. 37, instead of designating him, as in other passages where he is mentioned with James, either as the brother of the preceding (ἀντοῦ, Mark i. 19; Matt. iv. 21, x. 2, xvii. 1), or without any definite characterisation (Mark i. 29, ix. 2, xiv. 33; Luke vi. 14, viii. 51), or both brothers as the sons of Zebedee (Mark x. 35; Luke v. 10; Matt. xx. 20; John xxi. 2). This characterisation does not occur elsewhere in the N.T., and is very noticeable in view of the much greater importance of the apostle John in comparison with his brother James, who died in 44 (n. 5a). It must have been employed by the author to distinguish one John from another, just as the reverse form is used in Acts xii. 2 to distinguish one James from another (Acts xii. 2, 17; cf. Jude 1). It would have been natural for an author himself called John, and standing in close relation to the events which he recorded, occasionally thus to distinguish the apostle of the same name. Though it may be doubtful whether in this case the original readers, when they read the words "John the brother of James," perceived the feeling with which they were written ("John, but not the narrator surnamed Mark"), they were undoubtedly in a better position than later readers to understand that xiv. 51 f. recorded a personal experience of the author (n. 6). After it is narrated that all those who accompanied Jesus, i.e. according to the context (xiv. 17, 26, 32, 47) all the apostles, with the exception of the traitor, forsook Him and fled, we are told the experience of a certain youth who followed Him. The characterisation νεανίσκος τις shows at once that he was not one of the apostles named and partially described in iii. 16-19. It is self-evident that no one of these could have partaken of the Passover and have accompanied Jesus through the city to Gethsemane clad as was this young man. Finally, it could not here be said abruptly of an apostle that he simply accompanied Jesus (συνηκολούθησεν) or followed Him (συνηκολούθει) during the transactions previously described, which, however, is the chief statement in xiv. 51; on the contrary, in making any remark in this connection about the clothing or fate of an apostle, it would have been necessary to say that he was one of those who up to this time had been in Jesus' company (cf. xiv. 37). Whether the σινδών, which was the only clothing that the youth had on, was a garment (Judg. xiv. 12; 1 Macc. x. 64, variant reading) or a large cloth (Matt. xxvii. 59), at all events it should not again be questioned, having been proved by Casaubon (above, p. 447, n. 6) that the youth had got up suddenly out of bed, and, in his curiosity or anxiety to find out whither Jesus would go and what might happen to Him, had not taken time to clothe himself again, but had stealthily followed Jesus and the apostles clad in his night garments or bed blanket. This confirms the ancient conjecture that he was a member of the household where Jesus celebrated the Passover, since in no other house in Jerusalem would it be possible for a person, who had already retired, to know the moment of Jesus' departure, and to be led suddenly to the decision by the breaking up of the Passover gathering to follow the group in his night garments. But why should this event be recorded by Mark, and by him only? It does not add anything to the description of the peril of the situation or even to the fury and madness of those sent to make the arrest, since the picture of a strong and well-armed police force (xiv. 43, 48) getting only the garment of the man whom they design to arrest makes a ludicrous rather than a terrifying impression. The episode explains nothing that precedes or follows, and must have been narrated only because of its interest to the author, and, as he thought, to the readers. The same hesitancy which led him to withhold the youth's name, and his relation to Jesus and the apostles, also kept him from saying anything from which we can infer directly that the youth belonged to the household where Jesus spent His last night with His disciples. This reserve is to be explained only if the narrator was identical with the youth who fled. The house in question was his own home, whose guest-room the author describes with detail in xiv. 17—in striking contrast to Matt. xxvi. 18 f.; John xiii. 1 ff.

That Luke, who practically repeats Mark's description (xxii. 12), here as in other passages, was not independent of our author, we shall show later (§ 61). Luke does not, however, repeat the sentence with which Mark begins the account of the last supper. "And when it was evening, he cometh with the Twelve" (xiv. 17). We have a sudden transition to the present, and Mark describes the approach and arrival of the announced guests as if he were in the house in which the Passover was prepared (n. 7). Involuntarily he reproduces the impression which he had received at the time. Here the opinion of the Muratorian Fragmentist, "aliquibus tamen interfuit et ita posuit," is correct, and the oldest tradition, when rightly understood, offers no contradiction (above, pp. 428, 442 f.). The correct interpretation of Mark xiv. 17, 51 f., finds independent support in the narrative of Acts xii. 12-17. The household in which Mark grew up was well-to-do; it did not lack for servants, and the house had room for a considerable gathering of Christians. The fact that they assembled there for prayer in the middle of the night could possibly be explained on the ground that their solicitude for the imprisoned Peter led them to engage in tireless, united petition on his behalf (xii. 5). When, however, Peter, who knew nothing of this fact, sought out the house of Mary instead of going to his own dwelling,—which he must certainly have had, and indeed, as the narrator clearly indicates (Acts xii. 12), because he knew that there would be a large gathering there on that night,—the most natural explanation is that it was the Passover night (xii. 3 f.), and that the Jerusalem Christians were fond of celebrating the Passover meal in the house and room where Jesus had celebrated it with the apostles just before His death. The interpretation of Acts xii. 12-17 leads to the same result as that of Mark xiv. 17, 51 f. Jesus celebrated His last Passover in the home of Mark, and the son of this household is the author of this Gospel. In spite of the large number of spurious titles of honour gathered about this house in the Church legends (above, pp. 428, 447, n. 7), they must contain a grain of genuine tradition, since it is not conceivable that they should have grown up from exegetical combinations such as those above. The father (Mark xiv. 14; Matt.

xxvi. 18) must have been in sympathy with Jesus even before His death. He regarded Him as a rabbi, and gladly showed Him a favour. Jesus, in His turn, is confident of not being betrayed before His time, either by him or any member of his household. The curiosity which led the half-grown boy to follow the Passover guests of the house is entirely conceivable, and we can also understand how in riper years, when he wrote his Gospel, he should mention briefly his own part in the great events which he narrates. Instead of indicating the ipse feci with a monogram, as do others, he paints a small picture of himself in the corner of his work which contains so many figures. What he narrates of himself is no heroic deed, but only a thoughtless action of his youth.

In case we possessed no tradition regarding the person and relations of the writer, xiv. 17, 51 f. would not be the only passages from which the reader would receive the impression that the narrative of the book is that of an eye-witness. This would be the most natural way in which to explain the above-mentioned peculiarities of style in most of the accounts (above, pp. 461 f., 481 f., n. 4). There are other observations, however, which are against this impression. The barest comparison of Mark ix. 14 with Matt. xvii. 14, Luke ix. 37, is sufficient to show that the former was written not from the point of view of the historian, to whom all the subjects in his narrative have the same interest, nor from the point of view alone of the chief person in the narrative, but according to the reading (ἐλθόντες . . . εἶδον, SBLΔKSs Armenian), which is undoubtedly correct, from the point of view of Jesus and His three most trusted disciples. As they come down from the mountain and draw near to the place where the other apostles are, the first thing which they notice is a large crowd, in the midst of which the apostles are standing engaged in discussion with the scribes. As the four approach they are noticed by several of the crowd surrounding the persons engaged in discussion. The crowd then turns and leaves the scribes and the nine apostles standing, and (some of them) run to greet Jesus, among them the father of the possessed child, whom the disciples had been unable to heal. Before Jesus reaches the scribes and the disciples who had been left behind, He inquires of the crowd the occasion of the animated discussion. Then He suffers the father to tell his story, and as He goes on complains of the wearisomeness of His work in this faithless generation. He commands that the sick child be brought to Him, but does not perform the act of healing until the crowd begins to press about Him on all sides (ver. 25). The original narrator of this incident was evidently one of the three witnesses of the transfiguration upon the mountain, Peter, John, or James (Mark ix. 2; 2 Pet. i. 18). According to the tradition it was Peter, whose narratives Mark reproduced in several parts of his Gospel so accurately that it is possible to recognise his source from the style of his narrative. The attempt was repeatedly made in the common text tradition and also in the ancient versions, for palpable reasons, to eliminate this peculiar style of Mark both in xiii. 3 and ix. 14. If the singular ἐπηρώτα is to be retained in xiii. 3 with SBL, the most natural explanation is to suppose that, in the original account of Peter, the verse ran somewhat as follows: "Then I asked the Lord confidentially, and James, John, and Andrew joined me in the question." It may have been Peter also who earlier called the Lord's attention to the beauty of the temple buildings (xiii. 1, εἰς τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ; cf. xiv. 47). At all events, we have features here not found in Matt. xxiv. 1-3, Luke xxi. 5-7, which are naturally explained by assuming that Mark is reproducing the account of one who took part in the scene. The same observation is forced upon us by xi. 12-14, 20-25 (cf. Matt. xxi. 18-22). The naïve detail of the narrative, the exact indication of the day and hour of the various incidents in the story, and the rabbi with which the master is addressed, have been mentioned above (p. 482). It is especially to be noticed that what is said in xi. 14 appears to be a very independent remark, "His disciples heard Him (make this remark);" but that is followed in xi. 21 by the sentence, "And Peter, calling to remembrance (what was said on the morning of the preceding day), saith unto Him, 'Rabbi,' " etc.

A more remarkable account than that which we have in i. 29 cannot be imagined, "And straightway, when they were come out of the synagogue, they came into the house of Simon and of Andrew, with James and John" (n. 8). The subject is not specifically indicated, but from i. 16-21 is without doubt Jesus, Peter, James, John, and Andrew. But why are the four apostles mentioned again by name, and two of them as accompanying the others, as if they were not already included in the subject? Why is the plural of the verb, so often employed elsewhere to include Jesus and those with Him at the time, not sufficient here (i. 21, vi. 53, ix. 14); or, if the author desired to mention the presence of the disciples expressly after i. 21b-28, where only Jesus is spoken of, why did not an expression like that in ii. 15, iii. 7, viii. 27 suffice? Peter's original account at the basis of the narrative evidently ran somewhat thus: "We came direct from the synagogue to our house, and James and John accompanied us; and my mother-in-law lay sick of a fever, and we spoke with Him at once concerning her." Mark transfers the narrative from Peter's lips into the language of another not very skilfully, but faithfully. Peter must have said "our house," not "my house," because it was the dwelling of his brother and mother-in-law, and possibly belonged to the latter originally; for Peter's own home was in Bethsaida, not Capernaum. Mark translates ἡμῶν by Σίμωνος καὶ Ἀνδρέου, and then returns to Peter's words, and says that James and John accompanied the others, with the resulting awkwardness that it remains unclear who else came into the house, in particular, whether James and John were accompanied by Andrew and Peter. The use of the expression Σίμων καὶ οἱ μετ' αὐτοῦ, i. 36, to designate the disciples, is unparalleled in the other Gospel accounts, and represents a "we" of Peter's discourses. Just as the expression used in iii. 13 (n. 7) shows that the choosing of the Twelve is viewed and narrated from the standpoint of one of their number, so the exceedingly awkward character of the narrative, iii. 16, is very much easier to understand, if we suppose that it is based upon some such words of Peter as follows: "He chose us twelve, and gave me the name Peter" (cf. Klostermann, 72). Otherwise it cannot be said that Peter is noticeably prominent. He is one of the first four to be called to assist Jesus in His work (i. 16-20, 29, xiii. 3), and one of the three with whom He was most intimate (v. 37, ix. 2, xiv. 33). The giving to him of the name Peter (Cephas) is dismissed with a word (iii. 16, cf. per contra, Matt. xvi. 18; John i. 42). His great confession, viii. 29, is reproduced in the shortest possible form (cf. per contra, Matt. xvi. 16-19; John vi. 68 f.; also Luke ix. 20). At the beginning of the resurrection history, xvi. 7, he is no more prominent than in Luke xxiv. 34; John xx. 2-9. His name does not appear in vii. 17, though he is expressly mentioned in Matt. xv. 15; nor is it to be found in xiv. 47 (cf. Matt. xxvi. 51; Luke xxii. 50), in case Peter is here specifically meant (John xviii. 10). The narrative concerning him, which we have in Matt. xiv. 28-31, is wanting in Mark vi. 50. In the account of his denial, however, the close delineation of details reappears; he warms himself by the fire, the reflexion of which enables the maid who sees him standing there, and who looks upon him scrutinisingly, to recognise his features. His asseveration that he does not know Jesus, is reproduced with greater fulness than in the other Gospels. Corresponding to the more pointed way in which Jesus' warning prophecy is given, the narrative indicates that the cock crowed twice (xiv. 29-31, 54, 66, 72). It would not have been natural for Peter, in a narrative concerning Jesus, to represent himself as the chief of the apostles, as the rock upon which Jesus meant to build His Church, as the chief steward in this house, and as the leader who was to strengthen and encourage the company of the brethren (Matt. x. 2, xvi. 16-19; Luke xxii. 32; John i. 42, vi. 68 f., xxi. 15-22). On the other hand, he could not narrate the Passion history without giving strong expression to the inglorious part which he had taken in the same, and which was so indelibly stamped upon his memory. The lament of Jesus over the human weakness of His most faithful disciples in the hour of temptation has in Mark xiv. 37 a pointed reference to Peter which does not appear at all in Luke xxii. 46, and which is much less direct in Matt. xxvi. 40. Only in Mark's account does Jesus call Peter by name, and blame him alone because he could not watch for a single hour (n. 9).

According to the opinion of the disciple John, Mark did not write a narrative which reproduced the order of events (above, p. 439). This agrees with the fact that frequently in Mark a new narrative is introduced by καί, even in cases where the preceding context has no chronological connection. In i. 16, 40, iii. 13, the descriptions which precede are general; in iii. 20 we find ourselves in Capernaum again without statement to this effect, though just before we were upon the mountain (iii. 13), where it is entirely possible that other things besides the choosing of the disciples took place. In other passages the events could not have taken place in the succession indicated, e.g. in i. 21, notwithstanding the εὐθύς after the second καί, since what is narrated in i. 16-20 could not have taken place on a Sabbath. In iv. 26 the hearers are no longer confined to the disciples as in iv. 11, 21, 24, but the words are addressed to the multitude again as in iv. 1–9 (cf. iv. 33 f.); so that the account belongs after iv. 10. In the first half of the book especially, where the influence of the governing idea is strongest (above, p. 462 f.), the content of the separate narratives is throughout the connecting bond among them, which does not prevent occasionally the clear indication of the chronological order of events (i. 29, 32, 35, or iv. 35, v. 1, 21, or xi. 12, 20, and xiv. 12–xvi. 8). When Papias reminds us, in his explanation of the opinion of his teacher John concerning Mark's Gospel, that Peter was under the necessity of arranging his accounts of Jesus' sayings, upon which accounts Mark drew in many passages of his book, in accordance with the practical purpose of his discourses and the necessities of his hearers, he implies that these sayings were reproduced with a certain freedom. Their use for edification and the effort after clearness render impossible a scrupulously exact reproduction of Jesus' words spoken years before under entirely different conditions. This is the case in Mark's Gospel. Comparison of Mark viii. 35, x. 29 with Matt. xvi. 25, xix. 29, Luke ix. 24, xviii. 29, shows that the καὶ ἕνεκεν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, which occurs in both passages, is only an addition due to an intention to make what Jesus had said in language appropriate to that situation (ἕνεκεν ἐμοῦ) applicable to every Christian after Jesus' departure from this world. Likewise the mention of Jesus' words with Jesus Himself in viii. 38 is without support in the nearest parallels, Matt. x. 33 f.; Luke xii. 9. Further, the sharp distinction between the rewards which one has in this world and in the world to come,—which we notice in x. 30 f. when compared with Matt. xix. 29,—suggests the endeavouring of the preacher to guard himself against possible misunderstanding. The comparison of Mark ix. 1 with Matt. xvi. 28, Luke ix. 27, makes it clear that the saying of Jesus about His return in the lifetime of some of His contemporaries (cf. Matt. xxiv. 30; Mark xiii. 30;

Luke xxi. 32),—a saying which was regarded as an unsolved problem in the apostolic age (John xxi. 22 f.),—is reproduced with puzzling abruptness in Matthew, replaced in Luke by a more general idea, but in Mark, on the other hand, is given a definite didactic turn which modifies this more general idea. Standing as it does in immediate connection with a direct prophecy of the second coming of Jesus as the judge of the world (viii. 38), the expression about the coming of the kingdom of God with power cannot have exactly the same meaning, but points to events which, while proving the power of the kingdom of God in the world for the believers who experience them, are only a pledge of the fulfilment of the promise of His personal return. If τὸ βδέλυγμα τῆς ἐρημώσεως ἐστὶν ὅπου οὐ δεῖ is the correct reading in Mark xiii. 14, then, in spite of grammar, the verse contains a definite interpretation of a saying which in its original indefinite form is found in Matt. xxiv. 15, and which was developed in the apostolic age, principally in view of events which took place in the reign of the emperor Caligula (vol. i. pp. 228, 235 ff.). Mark ii. 27 gives a suitable reason for the saying of Jesus which follows, a saying preserved also in Matt. xii. 8; Luke vi. 5. The same general thought we find in John vii. 22, 23; but as the verse stands in Mark is it not the interpretation of a preacher in his narrative? The distinction of the literal from the spiritual temple in xiv. 58 (cf. per contra, Matt. xxvi. 61; John ii. 19; Acts vi. 14) sounds exactly as if the interpretation of the preacher's narrative had been taken over into the account. So far as we know, the expression ὅτι Χριστοῦ ἐστέ (ix. 41), added as an explanation of ἐν τῷ ὀνόματί μου (cf. Matt. x. 42), is not the language of Jesus but of His Church (Rom. viii. 9; 1 Cor. iii. 23; 2 Cor. x. 7). Of itself it is possible that Mark arbitrarily introduced into the tradition which he received all these additions, which in the usage of the Christian Church and in the interpretations of the Church teachers were ascribed to Jesus Himself. But this is against the assumption of scrupulous exactness and conscientiousness in reproducing Peter's discourses, for which Mark is praised by his contemporaries, and of which we have gained an impression from numerous passages of his work. The assumption is also rendered improbable by the fact that other authors, like John and Matthew, who handle their material with perceptibly greater freedom than Mark, who was a disciple of one of the apostles, kept such historical inaccuracies out of the sayings of Jesus. Such free reproduction of Jesus' words is to be ascribed, first of all, to the missionary preacher and Church teacher, Peter, who was conscious of possessing faithful recollections, and who did not make a sharp distinction between the commands of Jesus and their proclamation in the apostolic teaching (2 Pet. iii. 2; cf. Matt. xxviii. 20). When John became acquainted with Mark's Gospel, it seemed to him as if Peter were again alive, and as if he were hearing, as in earlier years, his story about the words and deeds of Jesus; and so he called the evangelist Mark, Peter's interpreter.

The testimony of the disciple John, as correctly interpreted by Papias and the tradition generally, when rightly understood and kept free from later exaggerations, does not exclude the possibility of Mark's having employed other sources and helps besides his recollection of Peter's narratives. He himself indicates here and there that what he gives is selected from a fuller narrative, cf. iv. 2, 33 f., xii. 1, 38. He seems to be excerpting from a longer discourse when, contrary to his habit, he reproduces the instructions to the disciples in vi. 8 f., in indirect discourse, and then in vi. 10 f. gives a single saying in direct form, as if beginning the narrative again. The brief account of the temptation, some of the details of which are unintelligible (i. 13), is not here given in a form in which accounts of such events are wont to pass from mouth to mouth, but is presented in a way that impresses one as being an excerpt taken from a written exemplar. Positive judgment on this point must be reserved, however, until after other accounts employing related material have been investigated.

1. (P. 488.) With regard to Hebrew and Aramaic words in the N.T., see vol. i. 15-22. Mark uses such words (1) in sections which are peculiar to him: Βοανηργες, iii. 17; εφθαθα, vii. 34; (2) in sections to which Matt. and Luke, or one of the two, offer parallels, corresponding more or less closely, but expressed in a purely Greek form: Κανααῖος, iii. 18 (so also Matt. x. 4, but ζηλωτής, Luke vi. 15); ταλιθα κουμ, v. 41; κορβαν, vii. 11 (δῶρον, Matt. xv. 5, but the Aramaic word in xxvii. 6); Βαρτιμαῖος along with υἱὸς Τιμαίου, x. 46; ραββουνι, x. 51 (κύριε, Matt. xx. 33; Luke xviii. 41); ραββι, ix. 5 (κύριε, Matt. xvii. 4; ἐπιστάτα, Luke ix. 33), xi. 21 (not in Matt. xxi. 20); once in xiv. 45, where Matt. xxvi. 49 also has it; twice in Matt. xxiii. 8, xxvi. 25, without parallels in Mark; not at all in Luke, but eight times in John; αββα, xiv. 36; αμην, iii. 28, viii. 12 (not in Matt. xii. 31, 39, xvi. 4), xii. 43 (ἀληθῶς, Luke xxi. 3), xiv. 25 (not in Matt. xxvi. 29; Luke xxii. 18); also (3) in sections where the parallels also give the Hebrew or Aramaic expression: αμην (see under No. 2); γεεννα, ix. 43-47; Βεελζεβουλ, iii. 22; σατανas, iii. 23, 26, viii. 33; ωσαννα, xi. 9, 10 (so Matt. xxi. 9, John xii. 13, but not Luke xix. 38); Γεθσημανει, xiv. 32 (Matt. xxvi. 36; avoided by Luke xxii. 39; John xviii. 1); Γολγοθα, xv. 22 (Matt. xxvii. 33, John xix. 17; only the translation Luke xxiii. 33); ελωϊ, etc., xv. 34 (Matt. xxvii. 46, vol. i. 15; without parallels in Luke or John). The passages in which Matthew gives Hebrew or Aramaic words or names which are lacking in Mark have no parallels at all in the latter Gospel (Matt. v. 22, xvi. 17). Κανααία is hardly to be included here (Matt. xv. 22, cf. Mark vii. 26).

2. (P. 488.) Hitzig, Ueber Johannes Marcus und seine Schriften, oder welcher Johannes hat die Offenbarung verfasst? 1843, S. 29-37, 65 ff., has called attention to the Hebraising style of Mark with special emphasis. Elsewhere in the N.T. a double δο is unheard of; likewise συμπόσια and πρασια doubled in a distributive sense, vi. 7, 39, 40 (cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, 490); also the oath formula with εἰ, viii. 12; elsewhere only in O.T. quotations, as Heb. iii. 11, iv. 3, though perhaps also 1 Cor. xv. 32. Pleonastic use of αὐτοῦ, αὐτῆς κτλ. with the relative i. 7, vii. 25. The use of καί to carry on the narrative, instead of syntactical articulation, is not so noticeable in Mark as, say, in 1 Macc., but decidedly more frequent than in the other Gospels and Acts; cf. for example, Mark iii. 13-19. In Bruder's Konkordanz, under "καί in oratione historica," p. 456 ff., Matt. occupies 4 columns, Luke 6½, John 1½, Acts 2½, while the short Gospel of Mark occupies 6½. Even where the relation is adversative he is satisfied with καί, vi. 19, xii. 12; ἀλλά he hardly uses except after negative clauses.

3. (P. 489.) With the simple Παλάτῳ, xv. 1, cf. Matt. xxvii. 2, Πορτίῳ Παλάτῳ τῷ ἡγεμόνι. The equally simple form in Luke xxiii. 1 is prepared for in iii. 1; cf. xiii. 1. John, writing considerably later, everywhere assumes acquaintance with the main facts, and perhaps his readers already knew Pilate (xviii. 29) from a baptismal confession (1 Tim. vi. 13, above, p. 131, n. 20; cf. the writer's work, Das Apost. Symbolum, 39-41, 68 f.). On the other hand, a title is given to Herod Antipas when he is first introduced, vi. 14, to be sure not the exact title of tetrarch (Luke iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Matt. xiv. 1; Acts xiii. 1), but that of king. If one reflects, however, that Matthew, in spite of his knowledge of the official title (xiv. 1), calls him king in the narrative (xiv. 9=Mark vi. 22; cf. ver. 23, βασιλεία; John iv. 46, βασιλικός), and that Josephus also speaks occasionally of Archelaus, who had likewise received and borne no royal title, although he hoped to receive one from Rome, as king, and of his rule as βασιλεύειν (cf. Matt. ii. 22, and § 56, n. 6), it is evident that one has to do with a usage current among the Palestinians, who, in the interval between the death of Herod the Great (Matt. ii. 1; Luke i. 5) and the designation of Herod Agrippa I. as king (Acts xii. 1), did not cease to speak of "king, kingdom, royal officers," etc. So too Mark, although he knew that this Herod had inherited only a part of the dominion of his father (vi. 21, Γαλιλαίας), and of course, also, that he had not received his full title. On the other hand, it is probable that in Mark vi. 17 there is real ignorance of the complicated family relationships of the Herods; see § 56, n. 6. Only Mark xi. 13, and not Matt. (xxi. 19), who wrote for Palestinians, observes that there are no fresh figs at the Passover time. In Rome they did not know when figs ripened in Palestine.

4. (P. 489.) On the Latin see vol. i. pp. 41 f. 64 ff.; κεντυρίων, Mark xv. 39, 44, 45; in the parallel passages and everywhere else in the N.T. only ἐκατόνταρχος or -χης (Matt. 4 times, Luke 3 times, Acts 14 times, but Gospel of Peter κεντυρίων 4 times, so also the Syrian translators, where the original has the Greek word, e.g. Sc. Matt. viii. 5-13, Luke xxiii. 47; and Ss. Matt. xxvii. 54); σπεκουλάτωρ, vi. 27, not elsewhere in the N.T., but in the Targum and Midrash; similarly λεγιών, v. 9, 15 (also Luke viii. 30; Matt. xxvi. 53, vol. i. 66); δηνάριον, vi. 37, xii. 15, xiv. 5 (also Matt. 6 times, Luke 3 times, John twice, Rev. twice); ξέστης, vii. 4, 8, which is not, as Epiphanius, de Mens. 55 (ed. Lagarde, 199 f.), thought, a Greek word adopted by the Romans, but is deformed from the Latin sextarius, and was also current among the Jews as שסור and שסורס; cf. Krauss, Lehnwörter, ii. 293, 535, only Mark in the N.T.; also φραγελλοῦν, xv. 15=flagellare (also Matt. xxvii. 26, cf. John ii. 15); κῆνσος, xii. 14 (also Matt. xxii. 17, 19; vol. i. p. 66); and κοδράντης, xii. 42 (Matt. v. 26); πραιτώριον, xv. 16 (Matt. xxvii. 27; John xviii. 28, 33, xix. 9; Acts xxiii. 35; Phil. i. 13). On the other hand, κράββατος (Mark 5 times, John 5 times, Acts 5 times) is not the Latin grabatus, but vice versa a Macedonian word (Lobeck, ad Phryn. 62) used in the common Greek speech, but despised by the Atticists, which was adopted by the Latins as well as by the Jews, Krauss, ii. 570. The parallel passages themselves show that, as has been said above, p. 489, the occurrence of these Latin words cannot of itself prove that Mark was written in a Latin-speaking region. They had all (even κεντυρίων, Krauss, ii. 529) gone over into the current speech of Palestine. It might also be a mere matter of taste that Luke preferred the Greek φόρος to the Latin census in xx. 22, and δύο λεπτά to quadrans in xxi. 2. The decisive point is that Mark explains Greek by Latin: xii. 42, λεπτὰ δύο, ὃ ἐστὶν κοδράντης; and xv. 16, ἔσω τῆς αὐλῆς, ὃ ἐστὶν πραιτώριον. As a counterpart to the former, Plutarch (Vita Cic. xxix.) says to his Greek readers, of the Romans, τὸ λεπτότατον (cf. τὸ λεπτόν) τοῦ χαλκοῦ νομίσματος κοναδράντην ἐκάλουν (αἱ. καλοῦσιν, see Blass, ET, x. 186). If ἐκάλουν is the correct reading, the explanation of the imperfect is not, as Blass supposes, that the Quadrans was not minted after Trajan's time (which, moreover, is only Mommsen's conjecture), for Plutarch wrote under Trajan, and even twenty or thirty years after the introduction of the mark and pfennig coinage a German historian would make himself ridiculous by using the imperfect to introduce a bit of archaeological instruction regarding the meaning of thaler and groschen, gulden and kreuzer. It is only because Plutarch's narrative deals with past time that he gives his information in the imperfect (see vol. iii. § 69, n. 6). The discussions between Blass and Ramsay (ET, x. 232, 287, 336) have only made it evident that it could not possibly occur to one who was writing for Greeks to explain the common expression δὲ λεπτά by the word κονδράντης—a word to them at least much less familiar; cf. Ramsay, ET, x. 232. This is just the situation in Mark xv. 16. To support his assertion—which has no support whatever in the tradition—that Mark is a translation of an Aramaic book, Blass (loc. cit.) says that ὁ ἐστὶν πραιτώριον is a mistranslation of αἰλή, which there denotes not palace, but courtyard. The word has the latter meaning only in xiv. 66 ("below in the court," in distinction from the transaction in the hall "above," the scene of the preceding narrative), but not in xiv. 54 (Matt. xxvi. 58). The Sanhedrin does not assemble in the "courtyard of the high priest" (Matt. xxvi. 3), which would be an extraordinary expression in any case, but in the residence of the high priest, consisting of various buildings, courtyards, and so forth. In contrast with Pilate's dealings with the Sanhedrin and people, which took place in the street before his residence (Mark xv. 1–15, cf. John xviii. 28 f.), it is said in xv. 16 that the soldiers led Jesus into the interior of the palace, without specifying whether the following scene took place in an enclosed building or in the courtyard of the palace. The use of ἡ αἰλή to denote the ruler's abode for the time being was common with all Greek writers (cf. Forsch. iv. 276; also, for example, Epist. Aristea, ed. Wendland, p. 48. 12, 21, 80. 15, but p. 50. 9, ἡ ἀκρα, royal residence. On πραιτώριον see vol. i. 551 f. It is difficult to decide whether the peculiar expressions, often altered by copyists, συμβοῦλιον διδόναι, iii. 6 (BL, etc.; Klostermann, 62 f. idere); φαίνεται, xiv. 64 (for δοκέει—the ambiguous videtur ?); ῥαπίσμασιν αὐτὸν ἔλαβον, xiv. 65 (verberibus eum acceperunt); ἐπιβαλόν, xiv. 72; ποῦσαι τὸ ἱκανόν, xv. 15 (satisfacere), are to be considered Latinisms, and what value they have in determining the historical and local circumstances of Mark's Gospel.

5. (P. 489.) Concerning Rufus (Rom. xvi. 13) see vol. i. 392. There is no tradition about him and his brother Alexander, independent of the N.T. Alexander and Rufus are called companions of Andrew and Peter in the Acts of Andrew and Peter (Acta Apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part 2. 117. 5, 118. 9, 119. 13; cf. Lipsius, Apokr. A. G. i. 553, 617, 621, ii. part 2. 77, 79, 83; Papadop. Kerameus, Cat. Bibl. Hieros. ii. 497, No. 8). Other fables in Forbes Robinson, Capt. Apocr. Gospels, p. 50. Epiph. Har. lxxviii. 13, evidently confuses the nameless mother of Rufus (Rom. xvi. 13) with the Mary of Rom. xvi. 6 (vol. i. 430), where he probably read ἡμῶν, and identified these with the women under the cross (John xix. 25). The old tradition used by Epiphanius in his confused way, probably referred to that "other Mary," the mother of James "the less" and a Joseph (Matt. xxvii. 56, xxviii. 1; Mark xv. 40, 47, xvi. 1). The interest in this Mary and her sons, which Mark, in contrast to Matthew, mentions and presupposes on the part of his readers, and other traces of a (Joseph) Barsabbas Justus (Acts i. 23; Papias in Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 9) in the early Roman Church (Acta Apocr., ed. Lipsius, i. 108. 13, 116. 12) in fact makes probable the identity of the Mary of Rom. xvi. 6 with the "other Mary" of Matthew (cf. Forsch. vi. 348-350). If this is so, we would have a companion-piece to "Simon of Cyrene, the father of Alexander and Rufus" (Mark xv. 21). This narrative presupposes that this Simon was known to the Jews as one who esteemed Jesus, and was therefore pointed out to the soldier who had charge of the execution (ZKom. Matt. 703). He was therefore not a festival pilgrim from abroad, but a Jew of Cyrene, dwelling in or near Jerusalem. The ἀγρός from which he was coming into Jerusalem (Mark xv. 21) must have been his country-place outside of the city, cf. Lightfoot's note to Mart. Polyc. chap. v. In any case he cannot be identified with the Simon Niger, Acts xiii. 1 (a conjecture made by Spitta, Die Apostelgesch. S. 134, and not yet abandoned (Untersuch. über den Rm. S. 73)); for, since the Lucius who is named with him is referred to as "of Cyrene," this designation is indirectly denied concerning Simon Niger.

5a. (P. 490.) Acts (iii. 1-iv. 31, viii. 14) gives evidence of the prominence of John, for it mentions James only in connection with his own execution, and, on the other hand, joins John with Peter; cf. also Luke xxii. 8; John xiii. 23 f., xx. 3 ff., xxi. 20-22. Paul also in Gal. i. 18 f. does not name along with Peter, James the son of Zebedee, who was then living, but just as in Gal. ii. 9 in relation to a later incident, he mentions another James in connection with Peter and John.

6. (P. 491.) For the opinions of the ancients with regard to the fleeing youth see p. 446 f. above. Among modern writers the combination presented above was first brought forward as a conjecture by Olshausen, Komm. zum NT³, ii. 474, and then more carefully elaborated by Klostermann, 281 f., 337 f. The reading εἰς τις νεανίσκος (AE, etc., against Σ BCDL Ss S¹, the Egyptian and Latin versions, which have καὶ νεανίσκος [or νεανίσκος δέ] τις) is evidently conformed to ver. 47 with the mistaken idea that another of the apostles' circle is referred to here. The addition οἱ νεανίσκοι after αὐτόν, which has still less support, presupposes that the fleeing youth was not one of the disciples, but one of the δῆμος; cf. Anonymus in Catena in Marc., ed. Possimus, 327.

7. (P. 493.) To be sure, ἐρχεσθαι does not always mean to come, but sometimes also to go, Matt. xvi. 5; Mark xi. 13a (in distinction from 13b), John vi. 17, but also Matt. xix. 1; Mark x. 1 (cf. ZKom. Matt. 579, n. 48), a signification which appears particularly in ἀπέρχεσθαι, διέρχεσθαι, and sometimes also in ἐξέρχεσθαι, e.g. John iv. 30 ("they went out of the city and came to Him"). But it would be hard to point out an ἐρχεσθαι entirely undefined which describes the movement from the standpoint, not of the goal, but of the starting-point. After Mark xiv. 16, if the standpoint of the narrative thus far was to be preserved, Jesus' going to the house could be expressed only by ἀπηλθεν, ἐπορεύθη, or similar terms. It is instructive to compare iii. 13, where it is not said, "Jesus called them and they came" (cf. Luke vii. 8, for example), but "they went to Him," so that one sees that the story is not told from the standpoint of the one who called and awaited the result of his call, but from the standpoint of the disciples who were summoned (cf. Klostermann, 70).

8. (P. 496.) The alterations of i. 29 (B ἐξελθὼν ἡλθεν, D b c e q S¹ practically the same) are not improvements, for by them the presence of Peter and Andrew is actually excluded. Ss is peculiar: "And he went out of the synagogue and came into the house of Simon Cephas—Andrew and James and John were with him—and the mother-in-law," etc.

9. (P. 498.) Eusebius, Demonstr. iii. 5. 89-95, and more explicitly Theoph. (Syriac trans.) v. 40, on the supposition that Peter spoke through Mark, found the omission of the contents of Matt. xvi. 17-19 and Mark's more detailed account of Peter's denial an indication of the apostle's freedom from all self-sufficiency.

§ 54. THE TRADITION REGARDING MATTHEW AND HIS GOSPEL.

The Matthew who occupies the seventh or the eighth place (n. 1) in all the lists of the apostles in the N.T. is the only person who has ever been regarded as the writer of the Gospel which bears this name. In only one passage is he called a tax-gatherer (Matt. x. 3), and here with the narrative of ix. 9-13 in view. We find exactly the same account with all its details in Mark ii. 13-17; Luke v. 27-32 with reference to a tax-gatherer Levi. Since there can be no doubt that the same incident is related in all three cases, this Levi must be identified with the apostle Matthew. This takes for granted, of course, that Matthew is trustworthy, which, however, we have no reason to question in this instance, because there is no conceivable reason why a writer should identify the apostle Matthew, in whom later he shows no particular interest, inasmuch as he is not mentioned again anywhere in his book, with a man of another name, the account of whose call in the other two reports which have come down to us is in no way connected with the apostles. The difference is to be accounted for as follows:—In the account of his calling, Mark and Luke employ the name by which he was commonly known at the time; while in Matthew the name which, according to the four lists of the apostles, was regularly used to designate him as an apostle and member of the Christian community, is employed also in this passage of the history. Whether Jesus gave him a new name as He did other of His disciples, and if so, why the particular name Matthai ("Gift of Yahweh") was chosen, we do not know (n. 1). In view of the way in which the tax-gatherers were hated by the Jews, a person who had given up this calling must have been doubly glad to be known by another name. His father, Alphæus (Mark ii. 14), can hardly be identical with the Alphæus whose son James was also one of the Twelve; since, if Matthew and this James were brothers, it would be so indicated in the lists, as are the brothers Peter-Andrew and the sons of Zebedee, particularly in Matt. x. 3, Acts i. 13, where they are mentioned together.

As a tax-gatherer in Capernaum, in the territory of Herod Antipas, Matthew was not a Roman official, but stood either directly in the service of the reigning prince (cf. John iv. 46; Luke viii. 3), or under the person who had the taxes of the city or a larger district in tenure. In order to fill this office he must have had considerable readiness with the pen, and, in addition to the Aramaic dialect of the land, must without question have been able to use Greek. Judging from the fact that He interrupted him in the midst of his work and also from the result of the call, Jesus must have intended that Matthew, like the fishermen earlier, should give up his former vocation and attach himself to Him as a constant companion and future worker. Such a demand and Matthew's immediate compliance presuppose that he had been acquainted with Jesus for a long time, had been affected by His preaching, and felt the utmost confidence in Him. Consequently, for a considerable time he had been one of those publicans and sinners who more than others in Galilee felt drawn to Jesus (Matt. xi. 19; Luke vii. 34, xv. 1). A large number of persons belonging to the same class as himself, and of like feeling, he invited to a feast in his house, in order to celebrate along with them and with Jesus the decisive change which had taken place in his life (n. 2). Exactly when Matthew became a constant companion of Jesus cannot be determined, at least not here in passing. So much, however, may be said, namely, that according to the accounts in the N.T. he had not been a companion and disciple of John prior to his association with Jesus, as was the case with the first six of the apostolic group; he had no part in the series of events which, according to John i. 19–iv. 54 (or v. 35), preceded the arrest of the Baptist; and after this event and the beginning of Jesus' extensive prophetic work in Galilee considerable time elapsed before the publican became a regular disciple. Others had been for some time constant companions of Jesus. Peter, James, and John are mentioned as already the most trusted of the disciples on the day in which Matthew received his call (Mark v. 37; for the order of events cf. Matt. ix. 11, 14, 18). The battle with the Pharisees was already in full progress. The choosing of the apostles and the Sermon on the Mount were almost at hand. That is all that the N.T. relates concerning the apostle Matthew. The meagreness of the record about him, with the corresponding implication that he was called late, and was one of the less important of the apostles, gives the tradition that he was the author of the first Gospel particular weight. If the name had been chosen arbitrarily, an Andrew or James the son of Zebedee, a Philip or a Thomas, would have been preferred to Matthew. The reports which we have outside the N.T. concerning Matthew are so late, so fantastic, and in part so confused on account of the interchange between the names Matthew and Matthias, that they possess no historical value (n. 3). This also shows that the name Matthew was not one that would be naturally chosen for a Gospel in circulation in the Church, the origin of which Gospel was unknown, or whose real origin one would wish to conceal. That the author himself did not make it a point to be known as the apostle Matthew, or to pass for the same, is perfectly clear.

For the oldest and most important report concerning Matthew's literary activity we are indebted to Papias, just as we have to thank him for the oldest report regarding Mark as a writer of gospel history. What Eusebius preserves is not an opinion of the presbyter John, but what Papias says himself (n. 4). Papias' words read: "Matthew compiled the sayings, to be sure, in the Hebrew language, but everyone translated the same as best he could." The Greek expressions used by Papias show even more clearly than this English translation that the whole emphasis rests upon the contrast between the language in which Matthew wrote and the translation which this rendered necessary, but which not everyone who attempted it could make successfully. The emphasis does not, as has been so often assumed since Schleiermacher (above, p. 411), rest upon the result of Matthew's literary work. He does not begin by saying that among others the apostle Matthew also had written a book, but he speaks in exactly the same manner as does the Presbyter concerning Mark (above, p. 439 ff.), under the presupposition that the readers are aware that Matthew had written, and that they are familiar with his work. He states what possibly is not known to them all, namely, that Matthew did not write in the language of Papias and his readers, but in Hebrew, a language with which they were not familiar. For this reason Papias could use the extremely abbreviated expression τὰ λόγια to designate the subject of Matthew's work. There can be no acceptance of the view that τὰ λόγια was the title of a work known at the time. A Hebrew book could not well have had a Greek title ; but, apart from this, a title translated by the Greek τὰ λόγια, or rather, if it were a title, by λόγια without the article, would have been an incomprehensible puzzle. "Oracles," or, according to the predominating usage, "Divine Oracles," would have been an utterly senseless title for a book which certainly was not a collection of all the words of God's revelation or of single oracles, but which dealt with Jesus. Moreover, if there was a work with this title which at the time of Papias and in his vicinity was assigned without contradiction to the apostle Matthew, it would not have been so easy for every trace of it to disappear from the remaining literature. Papias does not say that the author of the known Logia was the apostle Matthew, but he says that the distinguished apostle Matthew, whom he had already mentioned in his preface as a disciple of Jesus, wrote in Hebrew. Nor does any author of the ancient Church, not even those who are quite at home in the extra-canonical Gospels and kindred literature, as Irenæus, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, and Jerome, ever say anything of a book of this title, much less of such a book from Matthew's hand. This universal silence is conclusive evidence that these persons had never read or heard anything of such a work. Consequently it is also very improbable that such a work existed in Papias' time. On the other hand, the unemphatic position of the τὰ λόγια and the lack of all explanatory definition of the words exclude the possibility of Papias having meant that Matthew, in distinction from other authors who narrated also the deeds of Jesus, limited his account to the words. The only possibility left is to suppose that Papias took it for granted that the content of Matthew's writing was known, and used an abbreviation of the same, which in its connection could not be misunderstood. According to the title, Papias' entire work was devoted to the interpretation of the λόγια κυριακά. He had always been a searcher after "The commands that are given from the Lord to our faith, and that come from the truth itself," as he says in the preface. That is, he was a searcher after the words of Jesus, not His deeds. As to the books, moreover, which dealt with Jesus, those parts which contained the words interested him by far the most. This is indicated by his comment upon John's judgment concerning Mark. John mentions as the subjects which Mark had handled, without giving the exact chronological order, the "words or deeds of Christ"; Papias speaks only of the "words of the Lord," which were without ordered connection in the discourses of Peter, upon which Mark drew. From this we may assume that here also, where he uses the words τὰ λόγια to designate the subject of Matthew's work, he mentions only that part of the book to which his own special interest was directed, without thereby implying that Matthew did not record also deeds of Jesus and the historical occasions of all the words which he preserved.

The idea of a collection of sayings by Matthew, or even of a work bearing the remarkable title λόγια, has therefore no support from the words of Papias. It lacks also internal probability; by far the greater number of Jesus' words which have been preserved to us were spoken in conversation with His disciples and in discussion with His opponents. According to the tradition, upon which we are in any case dependent, even the longer discourses had definite occasion in outward events, without knowledge of which they cannot be understood, and which must have been communicated for their intelligent transmission. They are pictures which could never have existed without frames, in literature any more than in fact (n. 4). When, now, Papias sets in contrast to the fact that Matthew compiled the Logia in Hebrew, the other fact that for this reason a ἐρμηνεύειν was necessary, which everyone exercised according to his ability, it is self-evident (1) that ἐρμηνεύειν here can mean only translating; and (2) that this was a translation into the Greek language, which did not need to be mentioned expressly, because this was the language of Papias and his readers. Those who knew Hebrew required no translation of a Hebrew document, and the Phrygian bishop knew nothing of hearers or readers unfamiliar with both Hebrew and Greek. (3) The fact deserves more attention than has been paid to it heretofore, that Papias does not speak of the translation of Matthew's writing, but of the words of Jesus which it contained. The idea that the words ἡρμήνευσε δ' αὐτὰ (sc. τὰ λόγια) ἕκαστος mean that a number of written translations or revisions of Matthew's Gospel were made, can be arrived at only under the presupposition already shown to be untenable, that τὰ λόγια was the title of a book. Even if this presupposition were as correct as it is palpably false, the construction would be out of harmony with the words; the fact to which they are supposed to attest Papias would have to express in some such way as this: πολλοὶ δὲ τὴν τοῦ Ματθαίου συγγραφὴν ἡρμήνευσαν or ἐρμηνεύειν ἐπεχείρησαν. Then we would have the impossible puzzle to solve, how so many written translations, say five or six, of which Papias still had knowledge in 125, so suddenly disappeared from the life and recollection of the Church, and were replaced by the sixth or seventh translation, which is the only one preserved in all the Greek MSS., and the only one which was made the basis of all the ancient versions. We are freed from all these historical, linguistic, or logical impossibilities as soon as we realise that Papias is talking about oral translation, and, indeed, oral translation such as was made in assemblies of Greek-speaking Churches or congregations whose language was mixed. We cannot recall the fact too often that the oral translation in the religious assembly of books written in a foreign language played an important rôle not only among the Jews, but also in the Christian Church of antiquity (cf. vol. i. 11 f., 23; GK, i. 39-60). For the benefit of Christians who did not know Greek, in Jerusalem and Scythopolis all the Scripture readings, prayers, and discourses were translated orally into Aramaic in 300 as in 400, and certainly very much earlier. Before the preparation of the Latin Bible, such oral translation was the only means employed by Occidental Christians, who were ignorant of Greek, for the transference of the words of the Gospel and of the apostolic letters from Greek into Latin. Among the Africans who knew only Latin, this was the case until Tertullian's time; whereas among the Punic-speaking population of the same province in the time of Augustine, and among the Celts in Gaul, it was never otherwise. From this point of view Papias' statement is very luminous. Then the ἕκαστος, which is out of place when his words are interpreted to refer to a number of Greek translations of Matthew's Gospel, is limited in the nature of the case to Christians who had some knowledge of Hebrew and Greek, and who attempted to make the content of a Hebrew book intelligible to congregations with little or no knowledge of this language. It was necessary for them to translate. There were persons, like the disciples John and Aristion, Philip and his daughters,—to confine ourselves to Papias' vicinity,—who certainly possessed considerable ability in this direction, but not everyone requested to do the work was equally skilled in translation, and it was possible to succeed once and fail the next time. The work was burdensome, and the method of discourse defective. We have a repetition of conditions and occurrences such as are described in 1 Cor. xiv. 11–19, 26–28 in another connection. Now we understand the distributive ἕκαστος (cf. 1 Cor. xiv. 26); on each occasion—and this could recur hundreds of times—the question arose as to how the acting interpreter would succeed in edifying the congregation by his translation. It is also clear why Papias did not think of the translation of the Book of Matthew, but of the sayings of Jesus which it contained. Through Hebrew Christians the existence of a great sermon which Jesus had preached on the mountain became known, which was recorded in the Hebrew Matthew but not in the Gospel of Mark, which was in circulation in the province of Asia at the time (above, pp. 444, 456 n., 16). If this or some other discourse was to be brought to the ears of the congregations in Ephesus or Hierapolis, it must be through the translation of a Hebrew Christian. It was never the Book of Matthew which was translated, but always and only single pericopes from the same, and, what was the chief point for Papias, always a portion of the λόγια κυριακά. Papias' words give us a glimpse into the history of the Christian worship at a time when the Greek Gospel of Matthew did not yet exist in Asia Minor, but while there were still numerous Hebrew Christians who possessed a Hebrew Matthew. Papias does not describe Christian worship as conducted during his younger years; in this case he would have used the imperfect (ἡρμήνευε) to express the fact that the reading of sections of Scripture in Greek was exchanged for the translation of Hebrew pericopes. Neither does he describe a condition of things in existence at the time when he wrote (ἔρμηνεύει), but employs the aorist (ἡρμήνευσε) to indicate that it was something belonging entirely to the past. It was so once; when Papias wrote it was no longer necessary. This statement carries with it the explanation why it was that the earlier state of things of which Papias speaks was no longer in existence when he wrote. It is inconceivable that a Hebrew book made familiar by reiterated translation and doubtless also highly prized should have been forgotten, possibly because the other Gospels were a sufficient substitute, or because the interpreters who knew the language, the emigrants from Palestine, had died out in Asia Minor. In this case there would have been no longer any Matthew, and Papias would no longer have had any interest in speaking of Matthew's literary work. He did have such an interest, however, because when he wrote there was a Greek Gospel whose content purported to be the same as that of the Hebrew Matthew. The same process must have taken place here that we observe elsewhere under similar conditions. Just as the oral translation of the Hebrew Scriptures in the Palestinian and other Oriental synagogues was finally crystallised in the written Targums, and just as Cyprian's Latin Bible grew out of the translation of the Greek Bible in the African Church into which Tertullian gives us a glimpse, so the Greek Matthew is the final outcome of the translation of the Hebrew Matthew, testified to by Papias, in the Greek congregations of Asia Minor, and perhaps also in other regions.

We know also from other sources that when Papias wrote, 125 A.D., or possibly somewhat later, that the Greek Matthew was not only in existence, but already somewhat widely circulated. To mention only the most striking evidence, the Epistle of Barnabas (130 A.D.) cites as Holy Scripture the saying which we find preserved in Matt. xxii. 14, and in the letters of Ignatius and Polycarp (110 A.D.), a friend of Papias (Iren. v. 33. 4), also in the Didache (probably written at the same time), we find several sentences peculiar to Matthew employed as if they were the common property of the Christian Churches (n. 5). The Greek Matthew, which is the only known source to which we can refer these citations, was, however, universally accepted as a work of Matthew (above, p. 386 ff.; below, n. 5). Consequently, the data for the history of Matthew derived from other sources confirms the interpretation of Papias' testimony given above. The latter remains, however, of inestimable value, since Papias gives us no mere literary-historical report of uncertain origin handed on by him, but testifies to a condition which had existed for a long time in his native Church, an unfortunate condition burdening the Church's life, beyond one's imagination. If, during Papias' earlier years, there was a Hebrew Gospel purporting to be the apostle Matthew's, which persons in the province of Asia had long been in the habit of translating into Greek, often orally in the manner which he describes, it is (1) incontrovertible that the original language of the book in question was Hebrew (or Aramaic, see below), and that at this time there was no Greek translation or recasting of the same. (2) The tradition that Matthew wrote this Hebrew book was just as firmly believed as that regarding Mark's authorship of the Gospel bearing his name, since this Hebrew book was much read, translated, and also highly esteemed as a work of the apostle Matthew at a time when personal disciples of Jesus and other "Hebrews" from Palestine were to be found in the Churches of Asia Minor. (3) This shows that the book whose oral translation appeared to be rendered unnecessary by the existence of a Greek book bearing the name of the same author was no unknown work. The transference of Matthew's name from the Hebrew to the Greek Gospel, which took place under the eye of Papias and of others who, like himself, were disciples of apostles, presupposes that in this circle the Greek Gospel was regarded as a complete substitute for the Hebrew book, i.e. as a substantially correct translation of the same.

We are not informed in so many words as to the time and place of this transition. Inasmuch, however, as we have no knowledge of another Greek-speaking province outside of Asia where the Hebrew Matthew was in use, and since we are informed by Papias that this Gospel had been translated orally for a long time in the Churches of Asia, the only natural inference is that the change from the Hebrew to the Greek Matthew was made in this region. In view of the practical advantage to be derived from such a work, it is not likely that it was left until only one or two interpreters were to be found capable of executing the translation. It may, therefore, be considered very probable that the Greek Matthew originated before the close of the first century in the province of Asia, whence it was circulated, and, in view of the witnesses cited, more probably before 90 than after 100. The fact that the name of the translator of this book, like those of all the ancient Bible translators, has disappeared, requires no explanation (n. 6). There are two things, however, that must not be forgotten, first, that Papias' statement to the effect that the oral translation of the Hebrew Matthew was not always made in a manner entirely satisfactory, will hold good also of one of these oral translators who wrote out the Greek Matthew. Then, secondly, we must bear in mind that at least one Greek Gospel, that of Mark, was already in circulation in his vicinity (above, p. 444 f.) when the Greek text of Matthew was prepared.

The report that Matthew wrote his Gospel in Hebrew was often recalled in the ancient Church and never contradicted (n. 7). Undoubtedly, Papias' work and, after 325, the Church History of Eusebius, which was widely read, contributed much to the circulation of this tradition. This is not enough, however, to render Papias entirely responsible for the same. Origen, whose writings betray not the slightest trace of acquaintance with Papias' work, speaks of the original language of Matthew with as much confidence as does Irenæus, who had read Papias' book. The Alexandrians received the information from another, or indeed an additional source. The Alexandrian teacher Pantænus is reported to have found on the occasion of his journey to India, i.e. probably to South Arabia (before 180), a Gospel, written in Hebrew characters and the Hebrew language, in use among the Christians in this region. These Christians, who for this reason are called Hebrews, are reported to have held this Gospel to be a work of Matthew, which they claimed to have received through the apostle Bartholomew, to whose preaching they were said to owe their Christianity (n. 7). Regardless of the correctness or incorrectness of the statements and opinions of these Jewish Christians, they had a tradition that Matthew wrote a Hebrew Gospel, which, in any case, was not derived from the Greek work of the Phrygian bishop. It was at that time at the latest, however, that Pantænus learned this same tradition and brought it to Alexandria. The opinion that the entire tradition of the Hebrew Gospel of Matthew is due to an error of Papias, who had heard of the Aramaic Gospel in use among Jewish Christians in Syria and Palestine, is not only inconsistent with the proper understanding of Papias' testimony concerning the Hebrew Matthew, and unsuited to explain the circulation of the tradition regarding the same, but is in itself also historically improbable. For, to our knowledge, the Jewish Christians in question, the Nazarenes, never called their only Gospel (the so-called Gospel of the Hebrews) after Matthew (GK, ii. 723); and the older scholars who deal with the Gospel of the Hebrews, Clement, Origen, and Eusebius, do not say anything which indicates that it was closely related to Matthew. Only those who, like Irenæus (ii. 7), were unacquainted with the conditions and Scriptures of Jewish Christians in the far East were liable to be led into the error of supposing that the Ebionites, as these Jewish Christians were indiscriminately called, used only the Hebrew Matthew. The tradition that Matthew wrote in Hebrew for the Hebrews, together with the reported existence of a Hebrew Gospel in use among Jewish Christians, and uncertain reports of correspondence between the Greek Matthew and the Gospel of the Hebrews, gave rise to the opinion that the latter was the original upon which the Greek Matthew was based. Jerome, who was exactly informed as to the facts, gave occasional support to the view in order to establish a reputation for being also a N.T. scholar by rediscovering the veritas hebraica. These obscure statements and errors are not the source of the tradition regarding the Hebrew Matthew, but pre-suppose its existence. In reality the relation between the Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes and the Greek Matthew is very close. If, on the other hand, it be accepted as proved that no relation of dependence of the Gospel of the Hebrews on the Greek Matthew exists, or vice versa (GK, ii. 704-723), we have a new proof, entirely independent of the witness of Papias, that the Greek Matthew goes back to a Hebrew original which is also the basis of the Gospel of the Hebrews. In every case where Jerome speaks of the Hebrew original of Matthew as a book in his possession, he means this Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes (GK, ii. 648 ff., 681 f.). It is not impossible that the book shown to Pantænus by Jewish Christians in South Arabia was likewise a copy of the Gospel of the Hebrews. But it is just as possible that at that time copies of the original Matthew were really preserved in this far-off corner of the Christian world. In his account of the incident, Eusebius expresses surprise (n. 7) that the Hebrew Matthew should be still in existence in Pantænus' time (180), as he concluded from the incident which he narrates. This fact shows us that the learned bishop of Casarea, who had the largest Christian library of the fourth century at his disposal, would have sought in vain for the Hebrew Matthew in his age and vicinity. When Epiphanius repeats what he had heard from eye-witnesses about a Hebrew Matthew and also a translation of John's Gospel and of the Acts in the possession of the Jews in Tiberias in 330 (n. 7), and states, further, that this Hebrew Matthew was not a translation but the original, the latter is an incorrect addition of his to the otherwise credible narrative which he had heard. It is possible that here also, as so often by Jerome, the Gospel of the Hebrews was taken to be the original Matthew. It is improbable, however; since, in the first place, as already remarked, the single Gospel used by the Nazarenes was not called by Matthew's name, and, in the second place, the contemporaneous existence of a Hebrew John and Acts indicates rather that the Hebrew Matthew, like the other two books, was a translation from the Greek. These Aramaic translations originated from the oral translation of the Greek N.T. which, according to traditions which come down to us from the time, was still customary in the Churches of these regions in 300. Large portions of the same are preserved for us in the Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum and the accompanying fragments of other N.T. books. This explanation of the origin of the translation is not weakened by the fact that several parts of the same, including the three books mentioned, were in existence as early as 330. There is no doubt that the translation of Matthew, as of the other N.T. writings, goes back to a Greek original. Here we have a new proof that at the beginning of the fourth century the original Hebrew Matthew no longer existed in Palestine. No one would translate Matthew's Gospel from the Greek into the vernacular if the original Gospel written in this language were still in existence. The same is true of the oldest Gospel translations of the East Syrians (Sc, Ss), in which Matthew is also dependent upon the Greek. The Hebrew Matthew has disappeared. And why not? The Nazarenes who retained their native language had their Gospel of the Hebrews not later than 150. Other Jewish Christians in Palestine and Syria had a Greek translation of their own apparently from 170 onwards (GK, ii. 724-742). By 100 at the latest, the Gentile Christian Churches of Asia Minor, perhaps also of other regions, where once the Hebrew Matthew was orally translated with great effort, were in possession of a Greek translation which was considered in every sense a substitute for the original. After the middle of the second century, none of the Churches that we know anything about had any interest in retaining the Hebrew Matthew. The disappearance of the book in no way obscures the clear traces of its earlier existence. Scholars who regard our Matthew as an original Greek work (n. 8) have not succeeded in showing the unanimous tradition against them, which goes back into the first century, to be in error, and therefore have not succeeded in setting it aside. Further, the assumption that Matthew himself wrote his Gospel both in Greek and in Hebrew stands in irreconcilable contradiction with the testimony of Papias, when rightly understood, which rests upon the experience of a large section of the Church, and it finds no support in the tradition. How the theory goes to pieces when the attempt is made to reconcile it with the text itself, we shall show later (§ 56).

The evidence derived from its original language showing that Matthew was written for Hebrews, i.e. for non-Hellenised Jews in Palestine, is frequently stated by the Fathers. No more definite tradition than this appears to be at the basis of the statement occasionally made that the original readers were Jews who had been already converted to Christianity (n. 7). The objection can be made at once on purely external grounds, that James and Judas, as well as Peter in 2 Peter, wrote in Greek to the Jewish Christians of Palestine and the neighbouring regions. If the readers whom Matthew had in mind were of exactly the same character, in using Hebrew he would be departing from the rule which we find otherwise to be observed. Matthew's use of the ἑβραϊς διάλεκτος, like Paul's (Acts xxii. 2), indicates that he has in view compatriots and countrymen in general, and wrote the book in the vernacular because he desired to show also in this outward manner his genuine Israelitish feeling, and to bring its contents as close to their hearts as possible. The choice of the language was one of the means by which he sought to accomplish his apologetic purpose,—a means which, to say the least, would have been unfortunately chosen if it was Hebrew in the strict sense, i.e. the sacred language of the O.T., or the modernised Hebrew of the rabbis. In this case he would have transferred the discourses of Jesus and His conversations with friend and foe out of the language of the common people (Aramaic) into a learned language little understood by the majority, especially the poor, to whom first of all the gospel was to be brought. The assumption may be rejected at once as historically impossible. The language in which Matthew wrote could have been no other than the language of Jesus, "the original language of the gospel" (§ 1), the Aramaic vernacular of Palestine (n. 9).

The only tradition regarding the time of composition which is of sufficient age and definiteness to be of value has been already discussed (above, p. 392 ff.). It is limited to the two points: that (1) of the four evangelists Matthew wrote first, and (2) his gospel was written between 61 and 66. For the latter, Irenæus is, to be sure, the only witness; but he speaks with a definiteness and certainty which indicates dependence upon older sources (n. 10).

1. (Pp. 506, 507.) The position of Matthew in the lists is not always the same; in Mark iii. 18 and Luke vi. 15: 6th Bartholomew, 7th Matthew, 8th Thomas; in Matt. x. 3: 6th Bartholomew, 7th Thomas, 8th Matthew; in Acts i. 13: 6th Thomas, 7th Bartholomew, 8th Matthew. In the fact that Matthew alone in his list calls himself the publican, and puts his name after that of his ἀδελφὸς Thomas, Eus. Demonstr. iii. 5. 81-86; Theophan. v. 38, saw a proof of his humility. Cf. Orig. Schol. in Prov. (Tischendorf, Not. Cod. Sin. pp. 78, 119); Didascalia, ed. Lagarde, p. 44. 9 ff.; Epiph. Hær. li. 6; also Barnabas v. 9. In the Diatesaron, according to the testimony of the Syrian Ischodad of the ninth century (given by Goussen, Stud. Bibl. i. 66, cf. Harris, Fragments of the Comm. of Ephrem on the Diatesaron, p. 101; ThJb. 1895, p. 499), the five apostles invariably placed first were followed by: 6th Bartholomew, 7th Thomas, 8th Matthew the publican, 9th James Lebbeus, son of Alphaeus, 10th Simon Cananæus, 11th Judas, son of James, 12th Judas the traitor. So Ss in Matt. x. 3 f., except that James the son of Alphaeus has not the added name Lebbeus. Tatian seems to have found a δ before καὶ Ἀρββαῖος in Matt. x. 3 (or Mark iii. 18), or to have invented it in the effort to harmonise the lists. This combination presupposes the reading Ἰάκωβον instead of Ἀνδρέαν, Mark ii. 14, which Tatian shared with D and the old Latins according to Ephrem, Exposit. p. 58, and which was also known to many Greeks, and probably was before Origen as well (cf. Forsch. i. 120; Tischend. and Matthai on Mark ii. 14, iii. 18; Matt. x. 3; Ss, Ss on Mark ii. 14 are unfortunately lacking). Ἀνδρέαν, which is written Αἰ3ής in Orig. c. Cels. i. 62, was mistakenly identified with Αἰ33αῖος. Since the same publican who in Luke v. 27 was called Levi, with the addition τὸν τοῦ Ἀλφαίου, according to Cod. D, was called James the son of Alphaeus in Mark ii. 14, according to the same text, it followed that the apostle James the son of Alphaeus was also a publican. Tatian, therefore, found it appropriate to put the two publicans together among the apostles. It cannot be doubted that in Luke v. 27, 29 Levi without addition, in Mark ii. 14 Levi, son of Alphaeus (so also Gospel of Peter, xiv. 60 from Mark), is the original text; and also that in Mark ii. 13-17, Luke v. 27-32 the same event is recorded as in Matt. ix. 9-13. Now, as this publican bears the name Matthew in Matt., and in Matt. x. 3 the apostle is expressly characterised as the publican mentioned shortly before, the identity of Levi and Matthew really followed of necessity in the interpretation of the Church. Nevertheless the distinction between the two publicans, called by Jesus in very similar circumstances, is found not only in the Valentinian Heracleon, which is passed over without criticism by Clement in his report of it (Strom. iv. 73), but also in Orig. c. Cels. i. 62, who says expressly that this Levi did not belong to the number of the apostles, in contradiction to which the preface of his in Epist. ad Rom. (Deharue, iv. 460) is of no consequence, since the whole discussion about the names of the apostles comes from the translator Rufinus. Cf. also Ephrem, Exposit. Ev. Conc. 287; Forsch. i. 130. This distinction was at least more reasonable than that, say, between Peter and Cephas, in so far as Mark iii. 18, Luke vi. 15, Acts i. 13 do not indicate the identity of Levi with an apostle. This follows only from the comparison with Matt. ix. 9, but should not have been overlooked by those who, like Origen, acknowledge the credibility of Matt. The cases where to a Hebrew name is added a Latin one (John—Mark, Saul—Paul, Jesus—Justus) or a Greek one (Judas—Aristobulus, Jonathan—Jannai—Alexander, vol. i. 37) are not wholly analogous to the combination of Levi and Matthew in one person. Nor is the union of the father's name with one's own exactly similar (Joseph Bar-Saba, Acts i. 23; Simon Bar-Jochanan, John i. 42, xxi. 15-17; probably also Nathanael Bar-Tholmai, vol. i. 31). Yet we do also find two independent Hebrew names applied to one person, as Ἰωσήφ ὁ καὶ Καϊάφας, Jos. Ant. xviii. 2. 2. As a rule, one is probably a by-name received later, as Joseph Kabi (Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 11), Simon Kepha, Joseph Barnaba. Just this is to be presumed in the case of Levi—Matthew, and from the analogy of Simon—Kepha (Peter), Joseph—Barnaba, it is probable that the name by which the man was famed among Christians, and by which in his own lifetime he was regularly called, was the later of the two. With historical precision Mark ii. 14, and Luke v. 27, 29 following him, have stated that the publican at the time of his call was known as Levi, while in Matt. ix. 9 the name which he uniformly bore as apostle and in the Church is carried back into the story of the call. This corresponds with the fact that until he has related Peter's change of name (iii. 16) Mark speaks of him only as Simon (i. 16, 29, 36), whereas the second name is introduced at once in Matt. iv. 18, and, except for the solemn moments, x. 2, xvi. 16f., is used exclusively. That tradition tells us nothing of Levi's renaming, and its occasion follows from the fact that tradition leaves him personally altogether in the background. It is only Mark iii. 17 that tells us even of John and James, that Jesus gave them the surname of Boanerges, and then it is simply the fact we learn and not the circumstances and occasion. The same is true of Nathanael as regards double naming. According to John i. 46-51, he was one of the first disciples, and according to John xxi. 2 a permanent member of the most intimate circle, and so certainly one of the apostles (cf. John vi. 66 ff.). And yet he is missing from all the lists of apostles, unless he is identical with Bartholomew, who is the sixth in order in Matt., Mark, and Luke, as Nathanael is the sixth disciple of Jesus according to the correct understanding of John i. 35-51. The formation and meaning of the name Μαθθαῖος (so in the oldest MSS. AB, and also D, instead of Μαρθαῖος of the later MSS. corresponding to the Greek rule) are much debated, but in any case it is to be written מַתְתַּי or מַתַּי. In B. Sanhedr. 43a (omitted in the expurgated editions, printed in Laible-Dalman, Jesus Christus im Talmud, S. 15,* translation, S. 66; Eng. trans. by Streane, text, p. 15,* translation, p. 71 f.) we read: "Jesus had five disciples, Matthai (מַתַּי), Nakai (נָקַי), Nezer (נֶזֶר). Bunai (בִּנְיַי), Thoda (תּוֹדָה). They took Matthai before the court. He said to the judge: Shall Matthai be put to death? It stands written: When (מַתַּי) shall I come and appear before God? (Ps. xlii. 3). They said to him: By all means Matthai shall be put to death, for it is written: When (מַתַּי) will he die, and his name perish? (Ps. xli. 5)." According to frequent analogies (e.g. Ζακχαῖος = נֹכַח, abbreviation of נֹכַחִי, and מַתַּי is probably an abbreviation of מַתְתַּי (2 Kings xxiv. 17; Neh. xi. 17, 22, Μαρθαβίας, gift of Yahweh). Just as the name מַתְתַּי of similar meaning (Neh. viii. 4; 1 Chron. ix. 31, Μαρθαβίας) was customary as a special name, in addition to the other, so we find the abbreviation of the one name (Μαρθαῖος) along with the abbreviation of the other (Μαρθίας, Acts i. 23; מַרְתִּי, Jastrow, 861). Onom., ed. Lagarde, 174. 79, Μαρθαῖος δεδωρημένος, Μαρθίας δόμα θεοῦ. Cf. Dalman, *Gram. des jüd. Aramäisch.*² 178. A discussion of various derivations and explanations by Grimm (ThStKr, 1870, S. 723-729), who for his part would derive מַתַּי from the unused singular מַת (man). Still other views in Schanz, Komm. zu Mt. 1 f. Like Ewald and Hitzig, Nöldeke also, GGA, 1884, S. 1023, takes the name to be an abbreviation of מַתְתַּי or מַתַּי.

2. (P. 508.) What Luke v. 29 says more expressly, that the publican gave a feast in his house in honour of Jesus, and to celebrate the day (cf. Luke xiv. 13, 16; John xii. 2), is also the meaning of Matt. ix. 10; Mark ii. 15; for, aside from the improbability that Jesus was able to entertain a large company in His own lodging, τῷ Ἰησοῦ makes it certain that the αὐτοῦ which Matt. puts forward with strong emphasis, and the αὐτὸν of Mark, do not refer to Jesus, but to the publican, the principal person in the preceding sentence. The account in Matt. as in Mark is brief but perfectly clear. First the publican is sitting at his place of business; at the call of Jesus he leaves it and attaches himself to Him; finally, he sits at table in his own house. Matt. expresses only the difference in the localities, while Mark with αὐτοῦ after ἐν τῇ οἰκίᾳ expressly indicates that which is of itself obvious. Matt. gives the most unassuming form of the story; cf. ZKomm. Matt. 370 f.

3. (P. 508.) Aside from the accounts which refer to the Gospel, the only statement which can be called traditional is that of Clement, Par. ii. 16: Μαρθαῖος μὲν οὖν ὁ ἀπόστολος σπερμάτων καὶ ἀκροδρόων καὶ λαχάρων ἀνεν κρεῶν μετελήβανεν. But there is a suspicion that Clement drew here from the Parables of Matthias or the Gospel of Matthias, and so that Μαρθαῖος is to be emended to Matthias; cf. GK, ii. 751-761. The suggestion concerning Matthew's ascetic manner of life in Martyr. Mathari (Acta Apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part 1. 218) is not contrary to this view: for in this as in other legends (op. cit. pp. 65 ff., xxi, xxxiv) the interchange of the name Matthew and Matthias is so confused, that it is difficult to determine which name is original. The confusion of these two names is in many instances an unintentional error, e.g. in the list of "the sixty books," GK, ii. 292, A. 7, cf. 753, A. 1, 759, A. 2. But it took place designedly when, in an apocryphal variation of the story, Luke xix. 1-10, the name of the chief publican Matthias was substituted for that of Zacchæus, Clem. Strom. iv. 35; cf. Quis Div. xiii.; GK, ii. 752; as it was conscious trifling, also, when a Gospel was ascribed to the last chosen apostle Matthias, whose name was enough like that of the evangelist Matthew in derivation, meaning, and sound to be exchanged with it. In the region of the apocryphal Gospels of the childhood the unaltered name of Matthew had yet once more to suffer, *Ev. Apocr.*² Tischend. 51-112. With regard to the legends concerning him, see Lipsius, Apokr. Apostelgesch. ii. 2. 109-141 et passim. With regard to a copy of Matt., ostensibly from the hand of Barnabas, of which much was said in the sixth century, see ibid. 291 ff.

4. (Pp. 509, 511.) After the quotations from Papias concerning Mark, Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16 continues: περὶ δὲ τοῦ Ματθαίου ταῦτ' εἴρηται (sc. τῷ Παπῖᾳ). "Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν ἐβραΐδι διαλέκτῳ τὰ λόγια συνεγράψατο (al. συνετάξατο), ἡρμήνευσε δ' αὐτὰ ὡς ἦν δυνατός (al. ἡδύνατο), ἕκαστος." For the expression cf. Berl. ägypt. Urk. No. 1002 of 55 A.D. ἀντίγραφον συγγραφῆς πρᾶσεως Αἰγυπτίας, μεθερμηνευομένης κατὰ τὸ δυνατόν. The Syrian translates: "But of Matthew he says this: Matthew wrote a Gospel in the Hebrew language, but everyone (literally "man for man") translated it as well as he could." Rufinus: "Matthæus quidem scripsit hebraeo sermone; interpretatus est autem ea, quæ scripsit, unusquisque sicut potuit." The fact that Rufinus leaves τὰ λόγια untranslated, confirms what was said above (p. 509 f.) as to the unemphatic nature of the object of the verb. The Syrian, on the other hand, corroborates the view that Papias was speaking of nothing else than the Gospel of Matt. already current in his time. Irenæus understood him so when he made acknowledgment to Papias for his information concerning the original language of Matt. (see p. 393 f. above, and note 7 below); and so did Eusebius himself when he added this testimony regarding Matt. to that concerning "the Mark who wrote the Gospel," without finding any further explanation needful. The authorities on biblical introduction, too, long assumed it as a matter of course that Papias was speaking of the Gospel of Matt. Michaelis, Eintl. 951, translated, as Rufinus did, Eichhorn, *Eintl.*² i. 200, 458, like the old Syrian, Hug, *Eintl.*³ ii. 16: "Matthew wrote his history in the Hebrew language." Schleiermacher (see p. 441 above), in 1832, was the first to emphasise τὰ λόγια, and to infer that Papias was discussing a Hebrew book very different in its content from our Matt. Since then the λόγια of Matthew have been constantly spoken of as a lost source of our Gospels. For the idea of λόγια see GK, i. 857 ff., ii. 790 ff. It is, of course, granted that λόγια κυριακᾶ or λόγοι Ἰησοῦ (cf. Amos i. 1) might have been the title of a book containing a collection of extended discourses and short sayings of Jesus. But if one recalls what was said (above, p. 511) with regard to the historical framework of Jesus' discourses, this is most improbable. The Greeks had collections of anecdotes whose real content lay in some brilliant saying, called ἀποφθέγματα a potiori, e.g. Plutarch's various collections (Moralia, pp. 172–236, 240–242). The Jews called an anecdote of this sort rather πῦγος = πρᾶξις. Of the innumerable discussions of Papias' testimony regarding Matt. (and Mark), besides Schleiermacher's famous treatise (see above, p. 425, note 12) and the writer's discussion (GK, i. 889–897), let us mention, further, only Weiffenbach, Das Papiasfragment über Marcus und Matthæus, 1878, and Lipsius, JbfPTh, 1885, S. 174–176, claiming the reference of Papias' evidence to our Gospels of Mark and Matt. Among the unfounded prejudices from which the correct understanding of the few words of Papias has suffered, there is the idea that he was a Jewish Christian. So even Hofmann, ix. 270. The name of a Papias of Seythopolis, but also the name of an Amnia of the same city, which is likewise a Phrygian name (Forsch. v. 94, vi. 364) are found on Sarcophagi, which were recently brought to light in Jerusalem (known to the present writer from the Quartalschrift des Syrischen Waisenhauses of May 1905, and from photographs). Papias is a genuine Phrygian and Gentile name. Forsch. v. 94, vi. 109. One should not infer that he had the Gospel of the Hebrews in his hands from the fact that, according to Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16, he embodied in his work the account of the sinful woman accused before Jesus, which was included in the Gospel of the Hebrews also, and which was probably the same as was inserted later in John viii. 1–11. As Eusebius says, just before, that Papias cited passages from 1 John and 1 Pet. (κέχρηται μαρτυρίας ἀπὸ κτλ.), it follows rather from the form of his statement regarding Papias and the Gospel of the Hebrews that Papias did not name this book, but merely presented matter which Eusebius, who had himself studied the Gospel of the Hebrews, knew to be contained in it as well. For Papias, as for all Asiatic Christians, a Hebrew book was a closed book, unless a Jew was at hand who could translate it for him. The only Hebrew book of which, according to the extant fragments and statements, he made any mention was the Book of Matt. When, in describing the studies on which his work rested, he names Matthew among the other disciples of Jesus from whose oral statement he used to seek information, and when he explains this diligent inquiry by saying that he proceeded on the assumption that he could not derive so much benefit from books as from the spoken words of living witnesses, he does not express any indifference toward books in general which would be inconsistent with his remarks on Mark, Matt., 1 John, 1 Pet., and Rev., nor does he say what was his own opinion of the value of books now that he himself had become an author (he writes ἐπελάμβανον not ἐπέλαβον or ἐπολαμβάνω), but what he thought in earlier years, at the time of this investigation. Mark was not sufficient. The Book of Matt. he could not understand. Interpreters were not always at hand, and did not always understand their business as well as they might have done.

5. (P. 515.) Barn. iv. 14: προσέχωμεν, μήποτε ὡς γέγραπται “πολλοὶ κλητοὶ, ὀλίγοι δὲ ἐκλεκτοὶ” ἀρεθώμεν, Matt. xxii. 14; cf. GK, i. 848, 924. From Barn. v. 9 one must conclude that he always knew the Gospel of Matt. by this name. When he there asserts that, in confirmation of Matt. ix. 13, Christ chose the most sinful men to be His apostles, he has in view primarily the narrative in Matt. ix. 9 (cf. x. 3), the only passage where the publican is designated as the apostle Matthew. The generalisation of this fact and the characterisation of the apostles at the same time as those who were afterward to preach the gospel of Christ, would be unintelligible, if Matthew were not known to the author as one who had a peculiar share in this work, and in general as a prominent apostle fitted to serve as the type of the whole company. But both these statements are true of Matthew only in so far as he was author of a Gospel. With regard to the time of Barnabas, cf. Funk, ThQSc, 1897, S. 617 ff., who assigns him once more to the time of Nerva, or the end of the first century; and A. Schlatter, Die Tage Trajans und Hadrians, 1897, S. 1, 61-67, who comes forward with new arguments for the date which is probably correct, 130-131. With regard to Ignatius, Polycarp, Didache, etc., cf. GK, i. 922-932, 840-848. Nestle, Marginalien und Materialien, ii. 72, calls attention to a passage in the writing of the pseudo-Eusebius on the star of the Magi (preserved in the Syriac), which reads: "In the second year of the coming of our Lord, in the consulate of Cæsar and Capito (? 5 A.D., Klein, Fasti Cons. 17), in the month of Kanun II. (=January), these Magi came from the East and worshipped our Lord. And in the year 430 (Oct. 1, 118-119), in the reign of Hadrian (117-139), in the consulate of Severus and Fulgus (read Fulvus=120), and the episcopate of Xystus, bishop of the city of Rome (circa 115-125), this question was raised among the people who were acquainted with the Holy Scriptures, and through the efforts of great men in various places this history was sought out and found, and written in the language of those who attended to the matter." The exactness of the fourfold dating is surprising. If we change the first figure 430 to 431 (Oct. 1, 119-120 A.D.), all four dates agree, a great rarity in chronological notices of this sort. In the year 120, then, and primarily in Rome, as the manner of dating shows, the question in what year the Magi had come to Bethlehem was actively discussed. We are reminded of discussions like those concerning the census of Quirinius and of the fictitious Acts of Pilate (Justin, Apol. i. 34, 35). If there is anything in this remarkable statement, then in 120, in Rome and "in various places," men were occupied in a scholarly fashion with Matt. ii., that is, of course, with the Greek text of this chapter of our Matt. This agrees with the citations previously mentioned.

6. (P. 517.) The Greek translator of Matt. was a someone, nameless and unknown to Eusebius (see the following note). We cannot conclude with certainty from Jerome, Vir. Ill. iii., that at this time conjectures on the subject had already been advanced. In Greek minuscules (Tischendorf, i. 212) the translator is identified with John (which has a certain justification in older legends, such as may be read in the Acts of Timothy, ed. Usener, p. 9, cf. GK, i. 943), with Bartholomew (which has some connection with the account of the journey of Pantæus to India, Eus. v. 10. 3), and, finally, with James the brother of the Lord. This is also the view of the Synopsis which goes under the name of Athanasius (ed. Montfaucon, ii. 202). According to Epiphanius, Mon., ed. Dressel, p. 44, who finds evidence in Matt. x. 23 that no apostle had travelled far from Palestine before the destruction of Jerusalem, and who in the same passage advances the pseudo-Clementine idea that James was the overseer of the apostles, Matt. would have written his Gospel thirty years after the Ascension at the direction (κατ' ἐπιτροπήν) of this James, who died two years before.

7. (Pp. 517, 518, 519, 521.) That Matt. was written in Hebrew and intended for Hebrews, cf. Iren. iii. 1. 1 (p. 398, above). Also a fragment of a catena in Stieren, p. 842: τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον πρὸς Ἰουδαίους ἐγράφη· οἱτοὶ γὰρ ἐπεθύμουν πᾶν σφόδρα ἐκ σπέρματος Δαβὶδ Χριστὸν, ὁ δὲ Ματθαῖος ἔτι μᾶλλον σφοδροτέραν ἔχων τὴν τοιαύτην ἐπιθυμίαν, παντοίως ἔσπενδε πληροφορίαν παρέχειν αὐτοῖς, ὥς ἔη ἐκ σπέρματος Δαβὶδ ὁ Χριστός· διὸ καὶ ἀπὸ τῆς γενέσεως αὐτοῦ ἤρξατο. Cf. the excerpts from Matt. in Iren. iii. 9 : iii. 11. 8 on the beginning of the book ; iii. 11. 7 : “Ebionæi etenim eo quod est secundum Matthæum solo utentes, ex illo ipso convineuntur, non recte præsumentes de domino.” This statement regarding the Gospel of the Ebionites, to which is added i. 26. 2, et apostolum Paulum recusant, rests on Irenæus’ inexact knowledge of the circumstances of the Jewish Christians ; cf. GK, ii. 664. Eus. H. E. v. 10. 3 : ὁ Πάνταυος καὶ εἰς Ἰνδοὺς ἐλθεῖν λέγεται, ἔνθα λόγος εὐρεῖν αὐτὸν προφθάσαν τὴν αὐτοῦ παρουσίαν τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον παρά τισιν αἰτόθι τὸν Χριστὸν ἐπεγνωκόσιν, οἷς Βαρθολομαῖον τῶν ἀποστόλων ἔνα κηρύξαι αὐτοῖς τὸ Ἑβραίων γράμμασι τὴν τοῦ Ματθαίου καταλείψαι γραφὴν, ἣν καὶ σῶζεσθαι εἰς τὸν δηλούμενον χρόνον. Cf. Forsch. iii. 168–170 ; GK, ii. 666, 680. While Irenæus supposes Matt. to be written for the Jews, and, according to the fragment at least, primarily for the Jews not yet converted to Christianity, Origen (in Eus. H. E. vi. 25. 3, and tom. vi. 17 in Jo., see above, p. 397) says it was meant “for those converted from Judaism” and “for the believing from the circumcision.” Elsewhere, however, he too says (tom. i. 6 in Jo.) : τοῖς προσδοκῶσι τὸν ἐξ Ἀβραάμ καὶ Δαβὶδ Ἑβραίοις. Eus. himself says, H. E. iii. 24. 6 : Ματθαῖος μὲν γὰρ πρότερον Ἑβραίοις κηρύξας, ὥς ἤμελλε καὶ ἐφ’ ἑτέροις ἵεναι, πατρίῳ γλώττῃ γραφῇ παραδοὺς τὸ κατ’ αὐτὸν εὐαγγέλιον, τὸ λείπον τῇ αὐτοῦ παρουσίᾳ τούτοις, ἀφ’ ὧν ἐστέλλετο, διὰ τῆς γραφῆς ἀπεπλήρου. On what grounds Eusebius claims to know this no one can say. It goes beyond Iren. iii. 1. 1 (see above, p. 397), where it is said, to be sure, that Matthew “preached among the Hebrews” and wrote his Gospel, but where it is in no way implied that he ever left Palestine. Of this, too, there is no ancient and credible tradition. The Jewish Christians in “India” (see above) believed that they had received the Gospel not from Matthew himself, but from Bartholomew. Eus. Quæst. ad Marimum (Mai, N. Patr. Bibl. iv. 1. 257 ; cf. Jerome, ad Hedibiam Epist. exx. 4 on Matt. xxviii. 1) : λέλεκται δὲ “ὄψὲ τοῦ σαββάτου” παρὰ τοῦ ἐρμηνεύσαντος τὴν γραφὴν· ὁ μὲν γὰρ εὐαγγελιστὴς Ματθαῖος Ἑβραῖδι γλώττῃ παρέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ὁ δὲ ἐπὶ τὴν Ἑλλήνων φωνὴν μεταβαλὼν αὐτὸ τὴν ἐπιφώσκουσαν ὥραν εἰς τὴν κυριακὴν ἡμέραν “ὄψὲ σαββάτων” προσείπεν. Directly afterward he calls not the Greek translator who is here held responsible for the obscure expression, but the apostle John, ὁ ἑρμηνεύων, referring to John xx. 1 in comparison with Matt. xxviii. 1 ; as immediately before he writes : ὥσπερ διερμηνεύων αὐτὸς ἑαυτὸν ὁ Ματθαῖος. Eus. in Ps. lxxviii. (Montfaucon, Coll. Nova Patr. i. 463) : ἀπὲρ γὰρ τοῦ “φθέγχομαι προβλήματα ἀπ’ ἀρχῆς” Ἑβραῖος ὧν ὁ Ματθαῖος οἰκεία ἐκδόσει κέχρηται εἰπών· “ἐρεύξομαι κεκρυμμένα ἀπὸ καταβολῆς” (Matt. xiii. 35). Here οἰκεία ἔκδοσις, of course, does not mean a particular Greek translation distinguished from the LXX, like those of Aquila and Symmachus which are cited immediately after, but the native, i.e. the Hebrew, text which belonged to Matthew as a Jew. The statement (Eus. H. E. vi. 17, cf. GK, ii. 740 f.) regarding the polemic of Symmachus the Ebionite against the Gospel of Matt. has no importance in this connection. What is handed down (Mai, op. cit. 270) as a declaration of Eusebius (καὶ δὴ συνόρα ἐν τούτοις ὕφος καὶ ἀπολουθίαν ἱστορικῆς διηγήσεως, ἣν ὁ Ματθαῖος ἐκτίθεται, Σύρος ἀνὴρ, τελώνης τὸν βίον, τὴν φωνὴν Ἑβραῖος), but should probably be assigned to Julius Africanus (cf. Spitta, Brief des Africanus an Aristides, 70 ff., 111), presupposes the composition of Matt. in Hebrew. This tradition is repeated by Cyril, Hieros. Cat. xiv. 15; Epiphanius, Hær. xxx. 3 (ἐβραϊστὶ καὶ ἐβραϊκοῖς γράμμασιν), xxx. 6 (τὸ κατὰ Ματθαῖον εὐαγγέλιον ἐβραϊκὸν φύσει ὄν, a gospel said to have been extant as late as 330 along with a Hebrew translation of John and Acts in the possession of Jews in Tiberias; cf. Forsch. i. 345 ff.; GK, i. 411, A. 1, ii. 672); Hær. li. 5 (ἐβραϊκοῖς γράμμασι); Chrysost. Hom. i. 3 in Matt.; Jerome, Vir. Ill. iii. ("evangelium Christi Hebræis litteris verbisque composuit, quod quis postea in Græcum transtulerit, non satis certum est"); Pref. Comm. in Mt. ("qui evangelium in Judæa Hebræo sermone edidit"); Comm. in Oseam (Vall. vi. 123: "Matthæum evangelium Hebræis litteris edidisse, quod non poterant legere, nisi hi qui ex Hebræis erant"). What Jerome meant here and in many other passages by the Hebrew language of the Gospel of Matt. is most plainly shown by the fact that the Aramaic Gospel of the Nazarenes, which he studied with care, copied, and translated into both Latin and Greek, was sometimes considered by him to be the original of Matt.; cf. moreover, vol. i. 23 f., 27. Nothing but absolute ignorance could find in the frequent mention of the Hebrew characters in which Matt. wrote a proof that the Gospel was composed in the ancient Hebrew language. The same statement is made by Jerome regarding the Aramaic sections in Daniel and Ezra, and by him and others as well regarding the Gospel of the Hebrews, the language of which has never been a matter of doubt; cf. GK, ii. 661, 667, 718. The tradition of the Hebrew Matt. came to the Syrians chiefly, if not exclusively, through the Syriac translation of Eusebius' Church History. Ephrem shows his dependence on Eusebius in this as in many matters (Ev. Concord. Exposit. 286). An anonymous Syriac fragment also, which from the excerpt in Wright, Catalogue of Syr. MSS. p. 1016, the present writer took to refer to the Gospel of the Hebrews (GK, ii. 681), is shown by the fuller account given by Barnes in the Academy, 1893, p. 344, to refer to Matt., and repeats only the ἐν τοῖς Ἑβραίοις of Irenæus (see p. 398 above). The Syrian Ischodad in the ninth century (Harris, Fragments of the Comm. of Ephr. Syr. p. 16, cf. ThLB, 1896, col. 2) remarks on Matt. i. 20: "Others (say) that he who translated (this) out of Hebrew into Syriac altered (the expression), and for (the words) is conceived in her substituted is born. But the Diatessaron says, 'The one who is born in her is of the Holy Spirit.'" These exegetes went on the supposition that the Syriac version of Matt. was taken directly from the Hebrew original and not from a Greek translation, a view which in modern times has been revived by W. Cureton for the Sc discovered by him (Preface, p. 76 ff.), and by Minischalehi Erizzo for the Sh (Evang. Hieros. Pref. p. 45) which he published. On the other hand, the Arabian bishop George in the seventh century still knew that the Hebrew Matt. was first translated into Greek, and that errors crept in at this point which the Syriac text shares with the Greek; cf. Georg, Gedichte und Briefe, translated by Ryssel, S. 140.

8. (P. 521.) Erasmus is said to have been the first to dispute the tradition of the composition of Matt. in Hebrew. Several Catholics, like cardinal Cajetan, and the representatives of both Reformed and Lutheran orthodoxy followed him; cf. the counter-argument of R. Simon, Hist. Crit. du Texte du NT, 1689, p. 47 ff., and the excerpts in Credner, Einkl. i. 78 ff. It is significant of Luther's historical insight and freedom that he held to Hebrew as the original language of Matt. In the discussions concerning the institution of the Lord's Supper, according to the report of Gregor Casel in 1525 (Kolde, Anal. Lutherana, 72), he said what still holds true for a hundred other problems, "Si haberemus Hebræum Matthæum, facile expediremus!" Following in Simon's steps, Michaelis, Einkl. 946 ff., defended the older tradition with great thoroughness. Yet theologians of the most various schools have again and again set it aside, e.g. Hug, *Einkl.*² ii. 16-63; Fritzsche, Comm. in Ev. Matthæi, 1826, p. xvii ff.; Harless, Fabula de Matthæo Syrochaldaice Conscripto (Erlanger Programm, 1841). That our Matt. is not a translation, but written in Greek at the beginning, is the prevailing opinion to-day. Bengel's suggestion in the Gnomon (Vorbemerkung zu Mt., ed. Stuttg. 1860, S. 2), that Matt. himself published his Gospel in both Hebrew and Greek, has been seriously adopted by a few, among them men like Thiersch, Versuch, 192 ff., and Hofmann, ix. 326. The self-contradiction in which Thiersch becomes involved is very remarkable. On p. 103, in an explanation of Papias' statement which is otherwise essentially correct (cf. S. 222 f.), he amplifies it to mean that the oral interpretation of the Hebrew Matt. continued "until he (Matt.) himself published the Greek writing which is read in the whole Church as his Gospel"; while, according to p. 197, Matt. gave his two versions to the Churches of Palestine, the Greek to the Hellenistic and the Hebrew to the Hebrew congregations, "at the same time or nearly so." In that case the translating of Matt. would have been superfluous everywhere, and the Hebrew Matt. could not have been brought to Asia Minor in place of the Greek except by an extraordinary confusion.

9. (P. 522.) The only scholar familiar with linguistic conditions in the time of Jesus and the apostles who has declared in favour of Hebrew in the stricter sense as the original language of Matt. is Franz Delitzsch (The Hebrew NT, Leipzig, 1883, p. 30), and he himself previously held that it was Aramaic (Neue Untersuchungen über Entstehung und Anlage der kanon. Evv. 1853, S. i. 7, 45, 49, 50). The long-continued and valuable labour which this distinguished Hebraist devoted to the restoration of a Hebrew version of the N.T. seems to have been the chief influence which led him thus to change his view. In his Brief an die Römer, in das Hebr. übersetzt und aus Talmud und Midrasch erläutert, 1870, S. 16 f., he already showed some uncertainty with regard to the language even of the Gospel of the Hebrews. On other representatives of this view see GK, ii. 718 f.

10. (P. 522.) The statement made by Gila, Die Originalsprache des Mtev. 1887, S. 177, that Eusebius in his Chron. ad Ann. 41 assigned the composition of Matt. to the eighth year after the Ascension, is false in every particular. In anno Abrah. 2057-41 A.D., or according to Jerome's revision anno Abrah. 2058, Eusebius says nothing of Matt., and of Mark only that he went to Egypt to preach (ed. Schoene, pp. 152, 153). The Chronicle has nothing whatever to say about the composition of any Gospel.

§ 55. CONTENTS, PLAN AND PURPOSE OF MATTHEW'S GOSPEL.

The words which stand at the beginning of the book form an introductory title. It would seem as if the fact that these words stand at the beginning of a book in the further course of which there are no other titles were sufficient to make it clear beyond all doubt that βίβλος γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ κτλ. is the title of the entire book, just as we have seen that ἀρχὴ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου κτλ. is the title of Mark's Gospel. On the supposition that it is applicable to only a part of the same, we have great difference of opinion as to how much shall be included in the section. The title has been variously referred—(a) to i. 1–17; (b) to i. 1–25; (c) to i. 1–2, 15; (d) to i. 1–2, 23, the number of which divisions shows that the author never thought of the possibility of so many interpretations. If he had, how could he have omitted to make clear by a new title or in some other way where the first division ended and the second began? The words themselves will bear the translation, “Book of the origin of Jesus Christ,” with corresponding reference to i. 18–25 where the γένεσις or γέννησις τοῦ Χριστοῦ, to follow what is probably the original reading, is described (n. 1). But this applies only to this second paragraph of the book, not to the entire chapter. In the first place, in i. 18a, which reads almost like a title, it is very clearly implied that the discussion of the generation and birth of Jesus begins with this passage, and therefore that it was not the subject of what precedes, i. 2–17. In the second place, it is perfectly self-evident that no informed person could have called the enumeration of a man's ancestors an account of his γέννησις, or even his γένεσις (cf. Luke i. 17). A title with this meaning would not have been in place until after i. 17; and there even it would have been as strange as it was superfluous, since what follows is not properly an account of the beginning of Jesus' life. Neither the time nor the place of the events related is indicated, and the birth is mentioned only in a subordinate sentence, i. 25, as was the case also in i. 16. Not until ii. 1 do we have the statement of the time and place of the birth, and there because both are significant for the narrative which begins with this verse. Reference of the title to i. 2-17 is to be rejected as impossible linguistically until a case is cited where a Greek or Hellenist calls a genealogical table βίβλος γενέσεως (n. 2). On the other hand, the expression was familiar to the Greek Christians, for whom the Greek Matthew was written, from their O.T., and it was certainly not in keeping with the intention of the author, or rather of the translator, that, perhaps at a very early date, in spite of the clear dependence of the words upon very familiar passages in the Greek O.T., the first clause of the book was mistaken for a title of the genealogy of Jesus or of the history of His birth. It was certainly a misunderstanding if the expression was borrowed from the Greek O.T., since in no O.T. passage where this or a similar expression occurs is it employed to introduce a list of the ancestors of the person with whose name it is used, or a narrative of his birth. Where genealogies follow they are those of descendants, not of progenitors. From other passages we see that the etymological meaning of the Hebrew word, "a man's generations," has been widened in usage to the more general conception of the family history beginning with the person mentioned, or of history in general (n. 2). Since descendants of Jesus were out of the question, the translator could take it for granted that this O.T. expression would be understood in the sense in which it was used in the O.T. He gave his writing the title "Book of the History of Jesus." When, however, he adds immediately to the name Jesus the title of His office, Christ, which had come to be used in the Church as a second proper name, and then goes on to indicate that the bearer of the same is a son of David, a son of Abraham, it is clear that he intends to set forth the history of Jesus in such a way that He shall be recognised from the history as the Messiah, and as the fulfilment of the promise made to the house of David and the seed of Abraham. The appositives attached to Χριστοῦ show that here it is not used as in Mark i. 1 and frequently elsewhere as a common expression of the author for his Christian faith, but indicates the point of view from which the author intends to set forth the history of Jesus; and this is confirmed by his usage of ὁ Χριστός, which varies from that of the other Gospels (i. 17, 18 [n. 1], xi. 2). The more exact meaning of the thought expressed in the title of the book is to be derived from the investigation of the fulfilment which he found disclosed in the history.

The first section, i. 2–ii. 23, is not only without parallel in the other Gospels, but is distinguished also for other reasons. The genealogical table at its beginning could hardly be more grossly misunderstood than to construe it as a proof of the Davidic descent of Jesus, and His accompanying natural right to the throne of David. That David was an Israelite and therefore a descendant of Abraham, and that Zerubabel was the offspring of the Davidic house, required no proof. For this supposed purpose two-thirds of the table is superfluous; and in view of the long period which it is made to cover, and the much longer list of names in Luke iii. 23–27, the remaining third is clearly so short that it would have been very poorly adapted for such an alleged purpose. In general, it would have been difficult for anyone to conceive such a purpose. That the carpenter Joseph, who was known to all as Jesus' father (Matt. xiii. 55; Luke iii. 23, iv. 22; John i. 46, vi. 42), and whose line of descent Matthew represents to be that of Jesus, was a "son of David," was not the peculiar belief of the Christian Church, which could have originated from the confession of Jesus as the Messiah (Matt. i. 16, 20 ; Luke i. 27), but was universally known and acknowledged by his countrymen and contemporaries. When all the people called Jesus the son of Joseph, the son of David, and showed themselves inclined to affirm that He was the one expected son of David (Matt. ix. 27, xv. 22, xx. 30, 31, xii. 23, xxi. 9, 15), His opponents, to be sure, denied the latter, but without contesting the presupposition. According to the testimony of the Gospels, which bring before us the greatest variety of objections which the opponents of Jesus raised against Him, they never attempted, not even in their bitterest attacks, to deny Jesus' Davidic descent, i.e. Joseph's, and thereby to remove the entire basis of His claims. The bitterest insults of the Talmud are accompanied by the recognition that Jesus was closely related to the royal house (n. 3). To be sure, His descent was suspected, but not in the direction of the descent of Joseph from David as set forth by Matthew. The legitimacy of His birth was denied. It was claimed that He was a bastard, whom the unfaithful Mary had borne to another man and then passed off as the son of Joseph, and thus as the son of David. It is, therefore, historically impossible that Matt. i. 2-17 should have been intended to prove the descent of Jesus from David and especially from Abraham.

Matthew's object is not proof of any kind, but to bring before his readers in the shortest possible form—in the form of a genealogical table—the whole history of Israel from the founder of the race to the Messiah, in order to express the thought, already hinted at in the title of the book, that the Jesus who received the name Messiah (i. 16) was the goal of the entire history of His people. For this purpose he not only employs a list of names which is incomplete, a fact to which he betrays striking indifference (n. 4), but also gives it an artificial arrangement to which he directs our attention in i. 17 more expressly than in the genealogy itself. He divides the latter into three groups of fourteen members, each indicating the division between the groups within the list itself. In i. 6 he mentions David the king, which marks the end of the first group, and in i. 11, 12 the deportation to Babylon is twice mentioned as the event which separated the line of ruling Davidic kings from the line of dethroned successors of David. The first indicates the highest, the second the lowest point in the historical development from Abraham to Christ. That the names meant to him an outline of the history, is also indicated by the fact that in two cases the brothers are mentioned along with the representative of the line. By this means he indicates in i. 2 the transition from family to national history, and in i. 11 the change brought about in the Davidic house when the unity of the family and the inheritance of the promise was no longer represented in one person who occupied the throne, but when what was once the royal seed continued to exist only as a number of families, with uncertainty as to which one would enter upon the inheritance. In order to express this thought and in this outward way to represent the symmetry of the history in which he believed, Matthew's arrangement of fourteen members in each group of the genealogical table is evidently intentional (n. 4). It is inconceivable that an author who intentionally invited his readers to recount the list of names should have left out from pure carelessness the three kings, Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah, whose names are wanting in ver. 8 after Joram. It is inconceivable also that he should have made a mistake of one figure when he reckoned the whole as 42, i.e. 3×14 , instead of 41, the number actually found (i. 17). Inasmuch as the O.T. gave him fourteen members for the period from Abraham to and including David, he assigned the same number to the two groups that followed. In order to do this he threw out the names of the three kings from the second group, and, as we have seen, made the third list short in proportion to the period which it covered. We get a further insight into the author's purpose from his remarks regarding Tamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba which would have been out of place in a simple genealogical table (i. 3, 5, 6). These four names are not used to adorn the genealogical table in some such way as those of the distinguished ancestresses, Sarah and Rebecca, are employed in the Old and New Testament (cf. 1 Pet. iii. 6; Gal. iv. 23; Rom. ix. 9; Heb. xi. 11; for Rebecca, Rom. ix. 10), but their sole purpose is to point to dark blots in the history. That the first heir of David's throne was the offspring of an unlawful marriage is expressed delicately but clearly when his mother is called not Bathsheba, but the wife of Uriah. Ruth was a Moabitess and therefore a heathen, as was also Rahab, who according to a legend which has no basis in the O.T. was the mother of Boaz, and from Josh. ii. 1 (cf. Jas. ii. 25; Heb. xi. 31) was known as a harlot. The names of Tamar and her twin sons must have recalled to every reader for whom the passage had any meaning at all the incestuous intercourse between her and her father-in-law (Gen. xxxviii. 13-30). Since it is self-evident that the author could not have designed to cast reflections upon the ancestry of the Messiah and so upon Him, his purpose in these references can be only apologetic. In answer to the Jewish slander concerning Mary's adultery (n. 3), Matthew points out the fact that the things which are slanderously charged against the last son of David are actually to be found in the early history of the Davidic house, and, above all, in the history of the birth of David's first son. If these blots on the history of his people and of the royal house do not hinder the Jew from recognising in the same a sacred account of the divine revelation, certainly the evil suspicion cast upon the birth of Jesus by malicious enmity should not prevent him from investigating the facts and from hearing patiently the exposition of the same. Jesus is not a bastard, but a true son of David, inasmuch as He was born of the legitimate wife of a descendant of David, Joseph. That Joseph's paternity was the particular point from which the suspicion of the Jews could originate is suggested already in i. 16 (n. 5), and the explanation which this demands follows in i. 18-25. As a history of the birth these verses would be entirely incomplete (see above, p. 531 f.), but they are perfectly adapted for the purpose indicated in i. 18 α , namely, to show how the conception and the birth of the Messiah had taken place. He was conceived before Mary was married, but not born until she was the wife of a son of David, Joseph. The condition which appeared to him even to be due to sin on the part of his bride, and which he was justified in not enduring until informed of its cause by divine revelation, was a miracle of the Holy Spirit. The very thing which was an offence to the Jewish people because not in accordance with their expectations, corresponded so literally in all its details, notwithstanding, to the prophecy regarding the Immanuel (Isa. vii. 14), that Matthew does not hesitate to say at this point what is often repeated later, namely, that the history of Jesus took place as it did by divine arrangement even in those details which were most objectionable to the Jews, because God designed thereby the fulfilment of the prophecy in which long before His decree was declared. From this agreement between the history of Jesus and the O.T. prophecy it should be recognised that He was the Christ in spite of all appearance to the contrary (i. 22, n. 6).

In significant contrast to this passage, which bears a genuine Israelitish stamp, particularly in the description of Jesus' future vocation as the Saviour of His own people (i. 21), we have the narrative concerning the Magi (ii. 1-12), in the course of which account itself the same contrast comes strongly to the front. Whereas heathen astrologers, incited by an observation in the field of their occult science, and animated with a religious interest, make the long journey to Palestine to pay homage to the newborn King of the Jews, and do not rest until they find Him; the high priests and scribes are satisfied with giving the correct answer to the scholastic question about the place where the Messiah was to be born. The reigning king of the Jews, however, alarmed by the news brought by the strangers and the definite answer of the Sanhedrin to the question which he had put to this body, allows himself to be moved to nothing less than a plan to murder the true King of the Jews, born in Bethlehem in accordance with the prophecy. The wickedness of Herod and the indifference of the guardians of Israel's holy things make it appear as if the King and Saviour of Israel, hailed with joy by the heathen, had been born in vain in so far as His own people were concerned. For this reason He does not grow up in the place out of which, according to prophecy, He was to come forth (ii. 6), but at first found refuge outside the "land of Israel" (ii. 20, 21; vol. i. 24, n. 7) among the Gentiles in Egypt (ii. 15). In this also He appears to be estranged from His people; and this must have been a further occasion for Jewish suspicion (n. 3). Although the flight into Egypt was caused by Jewish wrong-doing, it was none the less of God's ordering. By this also a word of prophecy found fulfilment, not a prophecy with regard to the coming Messiah, but a passage in which Hosea recalls historically Israel's departure from Egypt (ii. 15). The fact that the child Jesus fled to Egypt and not to Damascus, for example, the author regards as a significant ordering of events on the part of God from which we should recognise the repetition of the history of Israel in the history of Jesus; He was no more unfitted for the fulfilment of His vocation by His residence in Egypt than was Israel by theirs. The slaughter of the innocents in Bethlehem, viewed from one side, was a lamentable misfortune which overtook the innocent; from another point of view it was gruesome folly. For this reason Matthew could not say that the horror was ordered of God for the fulfilment of His word. Nevertheless it did fulfil a part of Israel's history experienced by Jeremiah, and expressed by him in impressive words (ii. 17 f.). After Herod's death the child Jesus was able to return to the "land of Israel," but not to Judea and Bethlehem, out of which, according to prophecy (ii. 6) and the popular expectation, the Messiah was to come (John vii. 42). On the contrary, he came to the half-Gentile Galilee, out of which no prophet ariseth (John vii. 52), and to the village of Nazareth, which is not once mentioned in the O.T., and which appears to have been despised by its neighbours (John i. 47). This, in turn, was another consequence of the wickedness which had become hereditary in the Jewish kings. This, however, was so ordered by God that thereby not merely a single word of an individual prophet, but the prophetic word in general should be fulfilled in Jesus, inasmuch as He was to be called the Nazarene, from Nazareth, where He grew up and whence He made His appearance among the people. This name was employed to express the complete repugnance felt by the Jewish people toward Him and His Church (ii. 23, cf. xxvi. 71; John i. 46 f.; Acts vi. 14, xxiv. 5, xxvi. 9, and n. 7). This points at the same time to the history of the man Jesus among His people, which we expect to find set forth from the same apologetic point of view evidenced by every line of the first section.

Before this, however, we have a second section (iii. 1-iv. 11) devoted to the account of preparatory events. Just as in Ex. ii. 11, whole decades are passed by with an "in those days," and the figure of the Baptist and the preacher, John, is introduced as the prophesied forerunner of the Lord. It is especially noticeable that the kingdom of God, whose coming John announced, is characterised as the kingdom of heaven in the short summary of the Baptist's preaching (iii. 2), as generally in Matthew (n. 8). Without the earth's ceasing to be the scene of the action (cf. v. 4 al. 5, vi. 10, xiii. 24, 38, 41), the expression indicates that it is a rule of God over the world which comes down from heaven, i.e. by God's act. This conception of the Baptist stands in contrast to the expectation of a Messianic kingdom which is a purely earthly product. The masses accepted John's testimony; also representatives of the two parties, the Pharisees and the Sadducees, who in general stood for the two classes, the scribes and the high priests, in the Sanhedrin (ii. 4), visited the place where he baptised. It was just this appearance of the leaders of the people, however, that furnished the Baptist with an occasion to deliver a scathing denunciation, in which the work of the coming founder of the kingdom is described as predominantly that of the judge of His own people and in which God's freedom to receive the Gentiles into His Church in place of the unworthy Israelites is maintained. Jesus also visits the scene of baptism in order Himself to be baptised. In the case of all others it is a confession of sin (iii. 6); with Him, however, it is only an exemplification of the principle that it was fitting for Him to fulfil the entire legal economy of God (iii. 15). This self-humiliation on the part of Jesus, God answered from heaven by the impartation of His Spirit, an inner experience, which was externalised for Jesus Himself in a visible form as well as in the audible message that Jesus was the beloved or the only Son of God whom He had chosen as the instrument for His approaching work (iii. 17, cf. xxi. 37). In what spirit Jesus would carry out the commission thus entrusted to Him is indicated in the Temptation history (iv. 1-11). As a humble, pious man, and an Israelite who believed in the Scriptures, He overcomes every temptation to win the world-rule which belonged to Him by any means other than that which God had appointed,—the way of patient faith and self-denying obedience.

The third section (iv. 12–xi. 1) sets forth by general descriptions and selected examples Jesus' public work in Galilee which followed the arrest of the Baptist. All that follows the second section is appended to the announcement made to Jesus of John's arrest, without bringing this event into any chronological connection with the narratives that precede, and without narrating the story, well known to the author, of the way in which he came to be cast into prison (xiv. 3–5). The return of Jesus (John v. 35) to Galilee from Judea, where at the time He seems to have been residing, is a second retreat (iv. 12, ἀνεχώρησεν, cf. ii. 22), naturally not in the sense that He sought thereby to escape the danger of a fate like John's, for Herod Antipas, who had put an end to the Baptist's work, was also the ruler of Galilee. But Judea and the Holy City (iv. 5, xxvii. 53), "the city of the great King" (v. 35), seemed the appropriate place for the public appearance (John vii. 3 f.) of the anointed King who was born in Bethlehem. It denoted self-denial on Jesus' part when He withdrew to the despised Galilee. In keeping with this is the fact that He began His preaching there (iv. 17) with exactly the same sentence that the Baptist employed (iii. 2). He does not appear as the King whom the Baptist had announced, but as the prophet continuing the Baptist's work, and, indeed, in Galilee, where the latter had never worked. The fact, however, that He did not make Nazareth, where He grew up, His headquarters, but Capernaum, where He settled later, and whence He planned to make tours in all directions in Galilee, appeared to Matthew to be a remarkably literal fulfilment of the prophecy to be found in Isa. viii. 23–ix. 1. He quotes it not as Jesus' motive, but in order to justify this feature in the history of Jesus which was offensive to orthodox Jews (iv. 14–16). The lack of connection between the account of the call of the fishermen to become fishers of men and what precedes and follows, only shows more clearly that it is merely a part of the introductory portion of this section (iv. 18–22). The Prophet of Galilee was accompanied from the beginning by countrymen who were to share His work. In iv. 23–25 we have a general description of this period of Jesus' work in Galilee, ending with the climax where Jesus is represented as surrounded by persons seeking His help, who come from all parts of Palestine and even from the neighbouring Gentile regions. Three additional points are brought out: (1) The constant moving from place to place throughout Galilee; (2) the teaching and preaching; and (3) the healing of all sorts of diseases. Thus we have in iv. 12–25 a sketch of Jesus' entire work in Galilee, which, according to ver. 24 f., must have occupied at least several months. The elaboration of this sketch proposed in the plan begins with an example of His teaching (chaps. v.–vii.). This great discourse is not, however, what we should expect from iv. 17, 23. It was not delivered in a synagogue (iv. 23), but under the open sky; nor was it a sermon directed to the people sitting in darkness in Galilee, but instruction (v. 1 f.) intended for the disciples, who are the light of the world (v. 14). Not until toward the close of the discourse does Jesus direct His attention to the crowd (vii. 24, 28 f.), in the presence of whom the disciples had received the preceding instruction, with its constant reference to their particular religious condition, their deeper relation to Him, and their special vocation in the world. The Sermon on the Mount in Matthew is not the preaching of repentance (iv. 17) nor the gospel of the kingdom (iv. 23), but a setting forth of the moral conduct which the disciples of Jesus are to exhibit before the world as His disciples and as children of God (v. 16; ii. 9).

Why Matthew chose as an example of Jesus' teaching this instruction of His disciples, which presupposes throughout faith in Himself and His gospel, we must learn from the elaboration of the theme (v. 16). First of all, He warns them against the folly of supposing that it was their Master's mission to set aside the O.T., and, as the further context shows, its authoritative content. It is not His mission to destroy anything whatever that is divine in its origin, and that exists for the sake of what is right, but rather to fulfil the sacred forms which He found existing, to put into them the content which they themselves demanded (v. 17, cf. iii. 15). As long as this world stands, not even the smallest portion of the O.T. law can pass away unfulfilled (18). The same reverence for the law in word and deed, which He here confesses and Himself always exhibited, He demands in His disciples (19). Far from allowing the exact interpretation and fulfilment of the law to remain solely the distinction of the rabbinic guild and the party of the Pharisees, He makes actual righteousness, which exceeds by far that of the scribes and Pharisees, a condition of blessedness on the part of His disciples (20). Thus by the standard of Jesus' favourable attitude toward the O.T. law, and His condemnation of the rabbinic interpretation and Pharisaic observance of it, shall the good works be measured by which His disciples are to demonstrate that they are children of God. The theme thus more closely defined is now elaborated in such a way as to show first of all (v. 21-48) by a series of examples, and in contrast to the superficial and, in part, even foolish rabbinic interpretation of the law, how the Israelitish laws, written and unwritten, are to be treated in order to discover in them the will of the divine Law-giver concerning the moral conduct of the individual. In the light of this exposition, in vi. 1-18, He sets forth the kind of alms, prayer, and fasting which becomes the children of God, in contrast to the Pharisaic externalisa-tion of the principal acts in which piety finds expression. Rabbinic interpretation of the law and Pharisaic piety do not take us beyond the standard of heathen morality and piety (v. 46 f., vi. 7). In relation to the things of this world also, children of the heavenly Father may not, as do many of the Pharisees, sink to the level of the Gentiles (vi. 32), but, free from inordinate covetousness and unbelieving anxiety, the two principal forms in which slavery to mammon exhibits itself, they are to make the kingdom and the righteousness of God first and last the only goal of their life (vi. 19-34). Opposition to the Pharisees, which is already less prominent in this part of the discourse, recurs only once in what follows (vii. 5). For our purpose we do not need to investigate the last part of the discourse (chap. vii.). It is clear that the choice of the Sermon on the Mount as an illustration of Jesus' teaching was due to Matthew's apologetic, and at the same time polemic, purpose, and that, in so far as this discourse is his composition, its form is the result of his work.

Three examples of healing follow. That viii. 1-17 is to be taken as an independent unit, is shown not only by the fact that we have, beginning with viii. 18, a series of narratives which cannot be included under this title, but also by the citation with which the whole is solemnly concluded by the author in viii. 17. The first example is that of a leprous Jew whom Jesus enjoins to observe the prescriptions of the law. Here we have actual evidence that Jesus was not a revolter against the Mosaic law (viii. 1-4, cf. v. 17-20). The second example is that of a Gentile whose importunate faith puts the Jews to shame and opens a vista into the future, when in the place of the unworthy Jews the Gentiles of the entire world shall have part in the blessings of the kingdom of God (viii. 5-13). These two narratives bear the same relation to each other as i. 21b to ii. 1-12, or iv. 23 (ἐν τῷ λαῷ) to iv. 24 (ὅλην τὴν Συρίαν). The third example forms the introduction to a scene in which Jesus is pictured as engaged with multitudes of the sick until the day begins to fade. Such work as this shows Him to be the Servant of God who bore as His own all the infirmities of His people, even in the form of physical disease (viii. 14–17). The series of narratives which follows, viii. 18–ix. 34, is made up of a variety of very different incidents which, taken together, serve to expand a third feature of the programme laid down in iv. 12–25 (above, p. 541 f). It is the restless wandering life of the teacher and physician which is here pictured in a long series of very brief but chronologically inseparable narratives. The saying of Jesus in viii. 20 serves as an introduction for the whole. At first glance it might seem as if iv. 23 and ix. 35, which contain practically the same words, formed a sort of frame for what stands between; but closer observation shows at once that in the latter case the tireless journeying through all the cities and villages is recalled primarily for the sake of what follows in ix. 36 f., which seems to give the motive for the sending out of the apostles (x. 1 ff.). Jesus' own work is not sufficient; the harvest requires many labourers. Moved by sympathy for the neglected multitudes, He sends out His apostles to do a work of preaching and healing similar to His own. Not until now does the reader learn that twelve disciples had been chosen earlier for this purpose, and what their names are. The special injunction to confine the work of their preaching journeys to the Jews (x. 5 f., 23) is in accord with Jesus' sympathy for His people (ix. 36) and Matthew's apologetic purpose (cf. i. 21, iv. 23, ἐν τῷ λαῷ; also xv. 31 end); what follows, namely, ix. 36–x. 42, is an elaboration of the fourth point of the introductory programme. Jesus designed to carry on His prophetic work in Galilee supported by regular helpers (iv. 18–22). The third section is concluded by the notice that Jesus did not on this account cease His own work of preaching in different places (xi. 1).

The fourth section, xi. 2–xx. 34, brings before us the different impressions which the work of Jesus previously described made upon the different individuals and classes who were affected by it. This is done in such a way, however, as to bring out at the same time the particular actions and discourses of Jesus occasioned by it. The words which we find in xi. 6 may serve as a title for the whole section. It is conceivable that men should be offended in Jesus, but deeper reflection as to what creates objection to Him helps to remove the offence. Happy the man for whom this is true! Even the great prophet in imprisonment, the prophet who surpasses all others, who in his original greatness is inferior to no man, since he ushered in the great epoch of the approaching kingdom of God steadfastly and without fear,—even he cannot understand the work of Jesus of which he hears. The works which Matthew describes as the works of the Messiah, because they distinguish Jesus as the Messiah (xi. 2), the Baptist cannot understand as the fulfilment of his own proclamation. By means of the fresh impression which the Baptist's messengers carried back, and the warning with which this answer was concluded, Jesus hopes to save His impatient friend from a fall. He strives also to ward off the possible injurious effect of John's inquiries upon the crowd (xi. 2–15). The frivolous multitude is totally incapable of comprehending the significance of the times. Like whimsical children, they find fault with the Divine wisdom manifested differently in its different personal agents, in one way in John, in another way in Jesus (16–19). The cities of Galilee, distinguished above measure by the works of Jesus, exhibit a worse blindness than the heathen cities whose sins and destruction made them a proverb (20–24). But Jesus does not allow Himself to be disturbed by such experiences. In that hour He praises

His Father, the God who rules the world, that He has so determined the revelation of the Divine counsel of salvation through Him, the Son, that it is intelligible to babes, but misunderstood by the wise and understanding. He is not weary of calling to Himself those who are burdened with a heavy yoke (25-30). The wise ones and those who lay the yoke of their precepts upon others are the Pharisees and scribes (cf. xxiii. 4). When Jesus is attacked by these on the ground of supposed profanation of the Sabbath, He proves to them from the sacred history, the temple worship prescribed by the Torah, and their own daily practice, that He is not a transgressor of the Law, but that they accuse Him without justification on the ground of a Law which they themselves have misunderstood (xii. 1-13). Jesus retires before the hostile attempts which are thereupon planned (14), but continues to minister to the suffering. The absence of all display which characterised this work, as well as the fact that Jesus refrained from all violence in the conflict with His enemies, led Matthew to bring forward again from Second Isaiah, as he had done in viii. 17, the picture of the Servant of Yahweh, who works with perfect quietness, and yet through the power of the Spirit wins victory for all peoples, as a prophecy fulfilled and to be fulfilled in Jesus (15-21). When, however, the Pharisees blaspheme the Spirit by whose power He worked His deeds of healing, calling the same a satanic power, He does not remain silent, but shows them the self-contradiction in their charge, and, more than this, warns them against committing the unpardonable sin (22-37). When, thereupon, they seek a sign from Him which will render it unnecessary for them to exercise faith, He gives them the sign of His resurrection, represented by the sign of Jonah, which, in turn, will be of use only to the believing. In spite of temporary improvements in their condition, He sees the multitude of His compatriots and contemporaries facing an incurable state (38-45). From this generation, however, involved as it is in destruction, is gathered the company of Jesus' followers; these are not His kinsmen, but those who hear and do His words (46-50). The same distinction appears also in the fact that, in order to punish the multitude for their indifference to the truth, Jesus conceals it from them entirely by the use of parables, while He interprets these to His disciples, and teaches them to grasp the truth even in this form (xiii. 1-52). The account of the impression which Jesus made in His native city,—characterised by the word ἐσκανδαλίζοντο, xiii. 57, cf. xi. 6,—and of the superstitious utterances of the ruling prince when he heard of the miracles of Jesus (xiv. 1-2), serve also to complete further the series of incidents begun in xi. 2. In order to explain the latter, he formally narrates the account of the Baptist's execution and the cause of his arrest, already presupposed in iv. 12, xi. 2. Although this is only an episode, it determines the further trend of the narrative, which from xiv. 13 to xvii. 21 appears to retain a chronological order, as in viii. 18-ix. 34. Constant change of residence is noted (cf. ἀναχωρεῖν, xiv. 13, xv. 21; also other passages where Matthew does not use just this word). Jesus constantly avoids contact with the crowds and with His opponents, and devotes Himself to the training of His disciples, as we have seen already in the corresponding part of Mark (vi. 14-ix. 32; cf. above, p. 465 f.). This suits Matthew's plan also, only he makes the separation between the disciples and the multitude with their religious leaders much sharper. It does not appear for the first time in this section of the Gospel, but the way is prepared for these statements by what is said earlier in v. 10-12, x. 16-39. From chap. xiii. onwards, Matthew does not say anything more about the preaching of Jesus to the people of Galilee (cf. Matt. xiv. 14 with Mark vi. 34). Matthew alone (xv. 12-14, not in Mark vii. 17 f.) narrates how the disciples called Jesus' attention to the fact that His severe condemnation of the Pharisaic overvaluation of the rabbinic statutes was offensive to the Pharisees. Likewise peculiar to him is the severe judgment with which Jesus replies : they are a foreign growth which God has not planted in His garden, and which deserves no care ; as is also the injunction of Jesus to His disciples to leave these blind leaders of the blind multitude to their inevitable fate. Only in Matt. xvi. 6, 11, 12 (not in Luke xii. 1 ; cf. Mark viii. 15), are the Sadducees included also in the warning against the leaven of the Pharisees ; and this warning itself repeated three times, and its meaning expressly stated. No concealment is made of the incurable divisions which Jesus made among His people by His testimony concerning the true law of God (xv. 3, 6, 9 ; cf. xxiii. 2 ff., 23, v. 17-48, xii. 1-11, xix. 3-9). On the other hand, the same section discloses clearly the author's apologetic purpose. The agonising struggle of the Gentile woman with Jesus, who disregarded her cries and went on His way in silence, is impressively described (xv. 22 ff., cf. per contra, Mark vii. 25 ff.). The sympathetic Jesus appears to be severer than His disciples, who, for the sake of being rid of her cries, are willing to be a little inconsistent. Only in Matthew does Jesus state the principle that His lifework is limited to Israel (xv. 24, cf. i. 21, x. 5 f.). To this principle He remains true even to the extent of harshness toward the Gentile woman. Not until she recognises to the full Israel's prior rights does He give her help. When in another region—from Mark vii. 31 we know that it was the half-Gentile Decapolis—we find Him scattering the gifts of His mercy with free hand, the gratitude of all the people finds expression in praise of the "God of Israel" (xv. 31). Those, therefore, who say that Jesus is disloyal, an enemy and a disgrace to His people, and a blasphemer of the God of Israel, are condemned as liars.

In the description of the intercourse between Jesus and His disciples there is less emphasis than in Mark upon the slowness with which they progressed in knowledge. Severe judgments concerning them, such as we have in Mark vi. 52, viii. 17 f., are either wanting altogether or less bluntly expressed (Matt. xvi. 9). On the other hand, the way for Peter's great confession (xvi. 16) is prepared by the account of his experience on the sea with the confession which it called out (xiv. 28-33). His later confession is more fully reproduced than in Mark, and is solemnly acknowledged by Jesus; it is declared to be due to God's revelation (xvi. 17, cf. xi. 25), and rewarded by a great promise. The separation between the disciples and the Jewish people had been mentioned before; now we hear that the company of disciples, who hitherto had been gathered about Jesus like a family (x. 25, xii. 49 f., cf. ix. 15),—one of a number of groups within the same national bounds,—is to become a Church which is to exist alongside of the Israelitish Church and outlast all hostile attacks. The ἐκκλησία is not yet in existence; Jesus will build it in the future, and He will rear it upon the man of rock-like character, who in the name of the other disciples has given utterance to the true confession, and who is to exercise the office of a steward in the house of this Church, with the power accompanying this office to institute rules for the ordering of the house (n. 10). What is said primarily to Peter as the first confessor is on that account none the less applicable to the companions of his calling, who have received a similar office not from him, but like him and with him from Jesus (xix. 28, x. 1-5). As to the right to establish ordinances in this future household of Christ upon earth, to enforce their observance, and to punish their transgression, that belongs to the whole Church (xviii. 15-20), i.e. the Church separated from the Jewish people by their confession of Jesus as the Christ. It is this idea of the Christian Church which distinguishes the entire fourth section of Matthew's Gospel from the parallel sections in Mark, which in other respects are so similar. By the latter the disciples are represented as preachers of the gospel in course of training for their future calling. In Matthew, on the other hand, we are taught to look upon them as the foundation and leaders of the Church of Jesus in process of formation. When, however, this confession of Peter and Jesus' answer is followed by the first express announcement of the sufferings and death in Jerusalem (xvi. 21); and when, further, the instruction of the disciples with reference to the future conditions of the Church is interrupted repeatedly by the announcement of His sufferings (xvii. 12, 22 f., xx. 17, 22, 28), we infer that the two conceptions are intimately connected. It is because Jesus is condemned to death by the heads of the people and delivered over to the Gentiles for the carrying out of their sentence (xvi. 21, xx. 18 f.) that the kingdom of God is to be stayed in its sweeping onward progress (cf. xi. 12), and a period intervene between its beginning through the word of Jesus and its completion with His parousia, during which the kingdom of heaven shall have its preliminary realisation in a Church of the Christian confession by no means free from foreign elements, in which even the best members are still tainted with sin (xiii. 36-43, 48, xviii. 7-35, xxii. 11, xxiv. 12). This Christian Church and the Jewish people are represented as two sharply distinguished bodies. The teaching concerning discipline within the Church (xviii. 15-35), marriage (xix. 3-12), the relation of children to Jesus and so to His Church (xix. 13, 14), the attitude toward earthly possessions (xix. 16-26), the Divine reward in relation to human labour (xix. 27-xx. 16), ruling and serving (xx. 20-28, cf. xxiii. 8-12, xxiv. 45-51),—all these presuppose a Church of Jesus, which, whatever its organisation, was certainly separate from the Jewish people, and regulated by a different law from that which prevailed among the Jews. Still, these two groups are not without relation to each other. The twelve apostles are never to forget their relation to the people of the twelve tribes (xix. 28, cf. x. 23), and the disciples in general are to follow Jesus' example, and from pure love are to cherish their relation to Israel. This we learn from the profound narrative preserved in xvii. 24-27 (peculiar to Matthew). Though fundamentally separated from the Jewish cultus, and though freed by sonship of the "great King," whose dwelling is not in Jerusalem but in heaven (cf. v. 34 f.), from every obligation to observe the ceremonial law, as long as the temple stands they are still to pay the temple tax, i.e. to fulfil the cultus duties incumbent upon an Israelite, as Jesus had done (iii. 15, v. 17-20, 23 f., xxiii. 3, 23). The words, "in order that we may not offend them," contain the entire programme of the politics of the Israelitish Church of Jesus before the year 70. Jesus intended to make the distinction between the Jewish people as represented officially in the high priests and rabbis, further in the Pharisees who were beyond all hope of improvement, and the blind multitude that followed them, on the one hand (xv. 12-14), and the house of Israel, the people of the twelve tribes, on the other, many of whom had erred but could yet be brought back to the fold (x. 6, xv. 24). The former may be offended if they will (xv. 12); no one is to place a stumbling-block in the way of the others which can keep them from the truth (xvii. 27, cf. xi. 6). The last narrative of the fourth section (xx. 29-34) has the appearance of an allegory, because it stands without any practical connection with what precedes and what follows. Besides the blind who fall into the ditch (xv. 14, xxiii. 16), there are also those blind persons in Israel who appeal to the mercy of the Son of David, and who become His followers after He has healed them. The localities of the single narratives in this section are for the most part very indefinitely indicated (xiv. 13, 22, xv. 29, xvi. 5, xvii. 1, 22, xx. 17). The reader is able to form no idea of the journey to Jerusalem. Similarly, the change from Galilee to Perea in xix. 1 is marked by no break in the narrative, since the arrangement of the material is determined by the contents.

In the fifth section we have the description of Jesus' work in Jerusalem (xxi. 1–xxv. 46), where the same material is employed throughout that we find in Mark. Still even here the features that distinguish Matthew are not wanting. It is the prophet of Galilee (xxi. 11) who as King enters the royal city, and it is prophecy which He fulfils in the choice of the method of entrance (xxi. 5), designing thereby to show that while He gives up none of the claims which belong to Him, He will not make use of force. The enthusiasm of the people, which is caught up even by the children, is more offensive to the members of the Sanhedrin than the cleansing of the temple and the severe condemnation, that its guardians who are responsible for its sacredness, have allowed it to become a den of thieves (xxi. 15 f.). The parable in xxi. 28–32 brings the resistance of the ruling classes to the testimony of Jesus into stronger relief than the discussion (recorded also by Mark and Luke) which precedes. Only in Matthew is the parable of the husbandmen followed immediately by the unmistakable declaration that the kingdom of God shall be taken from the Jewish people as a nation and given to another people, i.e. to a people independent of every nationality (xxi. 43). In the parable which follows (xxii. 1–14, Luke xiv. 16–24 is only remotely parallel) we have a sentence, not an essential part of the picture, pointing clearly to the destruction of Jerusalem as the punishment of the Jewish people for their refusal to accept the invitation to enter the kingdom of God (xxii. 7). The teaching discourses, which arouse the astonishment of the crowd here as in Galilee (xxi. 46, xxii. 33), and the discussions in which Jesus overcomes the Pharisees and Sadducees are followed (chap. xxiii.) by a comprehensive discourse addressed alike to the undecided multitude and the disciples, in which He condemns the scribes and Pharisees occupying Moses' seat, who will not be satisfied until they have made full the sin of Israel and of Jerusalem against the bearers of all God's revelation. The rejection of Jesus' witness is not the last step in this direction. There remains still the persecution of the prophets, the wise men, and the scribes whom Jesus will send to His people (xxiii. 34). The present generation, however, shall live to see the judgment upon Jerusalem. The decisive cause of the catastrophe lies in the rejection of the repeated efforts of Jesus to shelter the inhabitants from the coming storm. This condemnation, and at the same time the public testimony of Jesus, are brought to a close with an outlook toward the day when this unfortunate people shall hail Jesus as their Messiah with more sincerity than they had shown on the preceding Sabbath. Connecting itself directly with the words concerning the destruction of Jerusalem, we have in what follows Jesus' instruction of His disciples with regard to the end of the world (chaps. xxiv.; xxv.).

The sixth section (chaps. xxvi.—xxviii.) covers the history of the Passion and the Resurrection. The following features are peculiar to Matthew :—(1) A sharp portrayal of the betrayer and his history. Only Matthew records the bargain with the high priest about the price of the betrayal and the sum agreed upon (xxvi. 15), the conversation between him and Jesus while they were still at table (xxvi. 25), the remark which Jesus made to him at the arrest (xxvi. 50), and the account of his end (xxvii. 3–10). (2) Only Matthew emphasises the way in which Jesus, in obedience to the will of God as He found it indicated in the Scriptures, refused to call the Divine help to His aid in order to deliver Himself from His enemies (xxvi. 52–54, cf. xxi. 5).

The evidence for Jesus' innocence, to which, according to all the records, Pilate testified several times, is rendered still stronger in Matt. xxvii. 19, 24 by the accounts of his wife's dream and of the washing of his hands. Responsibility for the blood of this man, whom the Gentile judge more than once declared to be innocent, is assumed by the whole people, in so far as they have a part in the transactions (xxvii. 25). If Barabbas was also called Jesus, as possibly may have been the case in the original text of Matthew (n. 11), the narrative of the choice between Barabbas and Jesus would be more pointed than anywhere else. In any case, it is made clear that the people delivered up their Messiah (xxvii. 22), and that it was the king of the Jews upon whom the Roman soldiers heaped every mockery (xxvii. 27-30, simpler in Mark xv. 16-19). To the account of the rending of the veil of the temple, found also in Mark xv. 38, Matthew (xxvii. 51-53) adds notice of the earthquake and of the opening of the graves of departed saints, who after the resurrection of Jesus appeared to many in the "Holy City." This is also witness against the Jewish people, but they will not be convinced. The sealing and guarding of the tomb, arranged between the Sanhedrin and Pilate (xxvii. 62-66), was due to a sincere disbelief in Jesus' prophecy of His resurrection. When, however, unsuspected witnesses informed the Sanhedrin that the grave had been opened by other than human hands, the highest officials took refuge in intentional falsehood, and circulated the report which still existed "among the Jews" at the time when Matthew was written, that Jesus' friends had stolen His body (xxviii. 11-15). But the one thus declared to be dead appears alive to His friends in Jerusalem as well as in Galilee (xxviii. 9, 17). The same person who refused to call either the power of God or that of the devil to His aid in order to disarm His foes and to gain dominion over the world (iv. 8, xxvi. 53), speaks as a Lord of heaven and earth. The Messiah of Israel who longed to save His people from sin, and who remained loyal to this His first duty, even unto death (i. 21, x. 5 f., 23, xv. 24), commissions the Eleven to make all peoples without distinction His disciples through baptism and teaching. With this Church, which shall increase constantly as the majestic command is carried out, His invisible presence shall abide until the end of the world, i.e. until His visible return (xxviii. 18-20, xxiv. 3, 14). Thus ends "The Book of the History of Jesus Christ, the Son of David, the Son of Abraham."

If the preceding summary of the principal thoughts of the book is in the main correct, we must admit that the work is exceedingly rich in its content, that it is constructed according to a plan, and that this plan is carried out to the smallest detail. In greatness of conception, and in the power with which a mass of material is subordinated to great ideas, no writing in either Testament, dealing with a historical theme, is to be compared with Matthew. In this respect the present writer would be at a loss to find its equal also in the other literature of antiquity. On the presupposition—which is justified—that the author believed the incidents which he recorded to be real facts, and sharing with him the conviction that history is governed by God and not by blind chance, we need only a little historical imagination to discover in Matthew a genuine Jewish book, that is, in so far as the method of exposition is concerned. It would not pass for history in the Greek sense. Matthew makes little effort to give us what is called historical narrative. What he gives as a history of Jesus' birth is in no sense narrative (above, pp. 531 f., 537). He records the sending out of the apostles, and indicates by an introduction (ix. 35-38) and the communication of a long preparatory discourse that it is an event of great importance. But he says nothing whatever as to how the apostles fulfilled the commission, and whether they returned to Jesus. When and from what quarter Jesus came to His native city, and whither He went upon leaving (xiii. 54), are questions to which he seems entirely indifferent. Evidently he finds no difficulty in giving us Jesus' words in which Chorazin and Bethsaida are said to be the chief scenes of His miraculous work (xi. 21), without himself mentioning the two cities in any passage of his history of Jesus. The book is concluded, not with words appropriate for a work which began as a narrative, but with a saying of Jesus. Even in the case of those actions and discourses which have great weight for him, the outward circumstances are treated with great carelessness. Without the help of other accounts, no reader could form a picture of the situation in v. 1, vii. 28, or ix. 10-14, or explain wherein Jesus "saw" the faith of the bearers in ix. 2, or whether Jesus entered Jerusalem riding upon the ass, or the foal, or upon each alternately, xxi. 7, or why the sick did not besiege the house of Peter until after sundown (viii. 16, cf. Mark i. 32 with i. 21). Matthew disdains all external pragmatism. In a passage where he gives us a series of closely connected events (viii. 18-ix. 34, xiv. 13-xvii. 21), the reasons for this arrangement have nothing to do with the chronology. The charge that Matthew transferred the Sermon on the Mount to the beginning of the Galilean ministry, and the choice of the apostles to a later time, was a misunderstanding for which the author is not responsible, since he does not narrate the latter incident at all (x. 1 ff.), and, moreover, the Sermon on the Mount is introduced without connection with any other single event, after he had brought the readers to the climax of Jesus' work in Galilee.

Far greater weight is laid upon the discourses of Jesus than upon the clearness of the narratives and the external connection of events. Matthew closes his book with words of Jesus (xxviii. 18-20), and often represents Him as speaking at length. Five times discourses of considerable length or series of discourses are concluded with the formula, καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτέλεσεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους τούτους (vii. 28, xi. 1, xiii. 53, xix. 1, xxvi. 1). That he used a large amount of freedom in the composition of these discourses is clear even without comparison with the parallels in Mark and Luke. The connected and well-arranged discourse of chap. x., which is associated with a definite occasion, could not have been spoken on the occasion there indicated. While the ἰδοὺ ἀποστέλλω (not ἀποστελῶ) ὑμᾶς (x. 16) cannot be referred to any other sending out of the apostles than that which is narrated in x. 5, every intelligent reader says to himself that on this preaching tour the apostles could not possibly have been in a position where they would be brought before kings and rulers, and where they would flee from city to city in expectation of Jesus' return (x. 16-23). In x. 38 it is taken for granted that Jesus has already spoken of His death as a death on the cross. Comparison with Matt. xvi. 21-27, John xvi. 4, and the parallels, Mark xiii. 8-13, Luke xii. 2-9, 51-53, xxi. 12-17, shows beyond doubt that Matthew connected the commission which Jesus gave His disciples when He sent them out for the first time with other sayings relative to their later work, weaving the whole into an ordered discourse. The same is true of the Sermon on the Mount (chaps. v.-vii.). Comparison with the discourse in Luke vi. 12-49 proves that in both the same historical fact is related. Luke's account has the same beginning and conclusion as that of Matthew; all the parts of the discourse are to be found in Matthew, and with the single exception of Luke vi. 31 (=Matt. vii. 12) in the same order. There is no reason to doubt that v. 16-48, vi. 1-6, 16-18, which are essential for Matthew's extended plan of the Sermon on the Mount, and of importance for the apologetic purpose of his Gospel, were in their essentials a part of the original discourse, and that Luke omitted these sentences which related to the O.T. and Judaism, retaining only the main principles of Christian morality (vi. 27-36). Still even here the work of Matthew's free hand is undeniable. The Lord's Prayer, with its introduction and the application at the end (vi. 7-15), spoils the perfect symmetry of the three parts of the discourse concerning alms, prayer, and fasting. To this must be added the fact that the historical occasion for the Lord's Prayer, given in Luke xi. 1-4, has every appearance of genuineness, and that a second impartation of the same prayer, without any reference to a previous giving of the same, is extremely improbable. Matthew must therefore have taken it out of its historical connection and incorporated it in the Sermon on the Mount, with the fundamental thought of which it thoroughly agrees. This prayer, which every Jew could use, and which even in Luke is given in answer to the request for a specific formula for Christian prayer, shows, on the one hand, that Jesus did not desire to replace Jewish forms by new forms, but to fill the same with genuine content. On the other hand, it serves to throw a glaring light upon prayer as practised by the Pharisees, which had sunk to the level of the heathen abuse of this office. The same is possible and probable with reference to other parts of the Sermon on the Mount. In chap. x. the historical foundation of a great discourse is reproduced along with a disproportionate amount of material borrowed from elsewhere, but the reverse is true in the case of the Sermon on the Mount, chaps. v.-vii.; the parable discourses, chap. xiii.; the great sermon against the scribes, chap. xxiii.; and the eschatological discourses, chaps. xxiv.-xxv. That, however, in the last three groups of discourses also the author has handled the historical material with freedom, is not only rendered probable from the analogy of the discourses in chaps. v.-vii. and chap. x., but is proved by comparison with the parallels; cf. e.g.

Luke xi. 37-53, xiii. 31-35 with Matt. xxiii. 23-39, or Luke xvii. 20-37 with Matt. xxiv. 26-28, 38-41.

When we survey the entire book, its material and method of exposition, its aim and the means by which its aim was accomplished, the purpose of the whole is no longer obscure. It is an historical apology of the Nazarene and His Church over against Judaism. The book takes for granted that the Jewish people to whom Jesus was sent as a Saviour from sin had rejected Him, had been offended in Him, and had crucified Him as a revolter against the Law and its authentic interpretation, as a false Messiah and a blasphemer against God, by which act they had made Him all the more a σκάνδαλον to themselves (cf. 1 Cor. i. 23 f.; 1 Pet. ii. 7). It is further presupposed that the spiteful slanders of this people, whom Jesus had loved so deeply and so faithfully, followed Him after His death (pp. 536 f., 555), and that up to the time when the Gospel was written false aspersions rendered faith in Him difficult for the "Jews" (xxviii. 15), also that now a Church bound together by Christian confession exists as an independent body alongside of the Jewish people, identifying themselves with their rulers (xvi. 18, xvii. 24-27, xviii. 17, xxi. 41-43), and that this Church, whose nucleus was gathered from the lost sheep of Israel (x. 6, xv. 24, xix. 28), was nevertheless hated and persecuted by the Jews (v. 10-12, x. 17-26, xxiii. 34-36), whereas it opened its doors more and more to the Gentiles (viii. 10-12, xxi. 43, xxii. 8-10, xxiv. 14, xxv. 32, xxvi. 13, xxviii. 19, 20, cf. ii. 1-12, iii. 9, v. 13, 14, xiii. 38). None of these facts are concealed or apologised for, but all are clearly brought out and defended. It is admitted that Jesus and His Church have appearances strongly against them. Joseph, a son of David, was offended at the son of David yet to be born, the greatest of the prophets at the prophet Jesus, and the chief of the apostles at the Messiah who chose the cross (i. 19, xi. 6, xvi. 22 f., xxvi. 31–35). Still the true Israelite does not need to be offended in Jesus, and for those who have been thus offended there remains always only one choice, that between the fate of a Judas (above, p. 554 f.) and the blessedness of a Peter, since in spite of all Jesus is the Messiah. Those very features in His history which appear to be against His Messianic claims when rightly understood, will be found to be in harmony with prophecy; all charges of infraction of the law are set aside by Jesus' words and deeds, and what is really strange and objectionable to the Jew who judges the matter superficially, the flight into Egypt, His bringing up in Nazareth, the choice of Galilee as the scene of His labours, and His crucifixion,—all were brought about by the sin of the Jewish people which will not remain unpunished. His blood is upon this entire "people and their children" (xxvii. 25), and indeed upon the same generation that would not believe His testimony (xii. 38–45, xxiii. 36–38, xxiv. 34).

A book of this character must have been written by a Jew for Jewish readers. In keeping with the usage of the Hebrew Paul (1 Thess. ii. 14; 2 Cor. xi. 24; Rom. ii. 17, cf. Gal. i. 13 f.) is the author's employment in one instance of the name Ἰουδαῖοι to designate those of his contemporaries who had not become disciples of Jesus (xxviii. 15), whereas in Mark vii. 3 the name is used only to describe the Jewish nationality in contrast to those who are not Jews. Matthew's language is in general that of a Jewish Christian. On the one hand, he makes use of conceptions which of themselves could not be understood by a Gentile (e.g. v. 22, xvi. 19, xviii. 18). He takes for granted that his readers understand the difference between the Galilean and Judæan dialects (xxvi. 73), as is not the case in Mark xiv. 70 in the genuine text. Matthew never explains Jewish words and customs as something strange to his readers (ii. 12), as is the case with Mark (above, p.

488 f.). On the other hand, from the title onwards, he does not hesitate to avow his Christian confession. For this reason the book could have been written for the Jewish-Christian Churches of Palestine; it was adopted by them, and afterward recast in the Gospel of the Hebrews. But the prominent apologetic and polemic character of the book as well as the choice of the language (above, p. 521) makes it extremely probable that Matthew desired to see his book read primarily by Jews who were not yet Christians. It was always possible to find in the Jewish-Christian Church persons enough who were almost more Jewish than Christian (Acts xv. 5), and others who were open to the influence of Jewish insinuations; but the Churches of Palestine as a whole as they are known to us from the Greek Epistles directed to them, the hints of the Acts, and the occasional remarks of Paul, were not in need of such an apology for Christ and of such a defence of the right of His Church to exist, nor of such a sharp attack upon Judaism as governed and misled by Sadducaic high priests and Pharisaic rabbis. The book was suited for Jewish Christians who were still open to Jewish influences, or who had again become so after conversion, also for Jews who still resisted the Gospel. And for such readers it was probably intended (n. 13).

1. (Pp. 531, 533.) More detailed proof of many points can be found in the writer's commentary on Matthew (Komm. zum NT unter Mitwirkung anderer herausgeg. von Th. Zahn, Bd. i. 2te Aufl. 1905), cited in this work as ZKomm. Matt. With regard to the text of i. 18, observe first of all that Origen (Scholion in Migne, xvii. col. 289, cf. Delarue, iii. 965) knew no other reading than γέννησις, and on that basis discussed the difference between it and γένεσις, i. 1; also that Ss Sc S¹ use different words in i. 1 and i. 18; and, finally, that the important D is defective at this point. Furthermore, with Iren. iii. 11. 8, Sc Ss, etc., we are probably to read τοῦ δὲ Χριστοῦ without Ἰησοῦ.

2. (P. 532.) We find the usual designation of a genealogy, γενεαλογία, in 1 Tim. i. 4; Tit. iii. 9; cf. γενεαλογεῖσθαι, Heb. vii. 6, cf. ver. 3; 1 Chron. v. 1. No Hellenist would have translated the Jewish words עֲדָנָהּ אֲבֹתָא, with or without אֲבֹתָא (Jerusalem Targum, Gen. v. 1; 1 Chron. v. 1; 2 Chron. xii. 15) or אֲבֹתָא (Jerusalem Targum, Tannith, 68a; Bab. Jeham. 49b) otherwise than by γενεαλογία. The earlier Syriac translators, Ss Sc, have in Matt. i. 1 כתבא דחולדתא, like the O.T. Peshito, Gen. v. 1 (except ספר for כתבא); only S¹ ventured to reproduce γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ more exactly by וילידותה דישוע. The LXX has αὕτη ἡ βίβλος γενέσεως not only for ספר חולדתא, Gen. v. 1, but for ספר חולדתא, Gen. ii. 4, while in Gen. vi. 9, x. 1 the latter phrase is more accurately represented by αὗται αἱ γενέσεις, which is the rendering of Aquila and Symmachus in Gen. ii. 4 also. On the ground both of content and of form, Gen. v. 1 must be regarded as the basis of Matt. i. 1, for here the Hebrew text, both Targums, the LXX, and Aquila (βιβλίον γεννημάτων) all agree. There the creation of the first man is briefly recalled, and then the successive generations from Adam to Noah are enumerated. Gen. xxv. 12, 19 are the only other instances in which the birth of the person named in the heading is so much as mentioned; everywhere else either the history of the man in question, without reference to his own birth, or else the history of his descendants is entitled his "Toledoth," Gen. vi. 9, x. 1 (32), xi. 10, 27, xxxvi. 1, 9, xxxvii. 2—nowhere an enumeration of his ancestors. According to O.T. usage, therefore (and we can refer to no other for βίβλος γενέσεως), Matt. i. 1 could not in any case be the heading of a genealogy, but rather that of an account of Jesus which, like Mark and John, made no mention of His parentage and birth. It is possible that this phrase, borrowed from the LXX, seemed to the translator less unsuitable for Greek readers than it does to us, because he had also in mind the wider sense of γένεσις, "being in its activity—life" (cf. Jas. i. 23, iii. 6).

3. (Pp. 534, 536, 538.) Sanhedr. 43a, דקדוב למלכות הוא (Cod. Mon. add. חנוכ'י) "Jesus (the Nazarene), who was connected or related with the royal house"; cf. Laible-Dalman, Jesus im Talmud, S. 79 and 15*; Delitzsch, Jesus und Hillel, 2te Aufl. S. 13; Dérenbourg, Hist. et géogr. de la Pal. p. 349; ZKorn. Matt. 43 f. A. 6. As long as the temple stood the Davidic family claimed to be able to prove their descent, as appears from the table of the days on which the different families were to provide wood for the altar of burnt-offering. Mishnah, Taanith iv. 5 (cf. Schürer, ii. 260 [Eng. trans. ii. i. p. 252]); on the 20th of Tammuz the house of David. In the N.T. cf. Luke i. 5, ii. 36; Rom. xi. 1; Phil. iii. 5. The great concern which the Jews, and the priests in particular, felt in establishing their descent (Jos. c. Ap. i. 7; Vita, i.; Jul. Afric. in Eus. H. E. i. 7) was invariably satisfied by proving the links between the latest admittedly legitimate member of the family and the one whose legitimacy was in question; cf. Schürer, ii. 229 [Eng. trans. ii. i. 210]. The accusation that Jesus was born out of wedlock, through an adulterous relation between His mother Mary, the wife of Joseph, and a soldier named Panthera or Pandera, is brought forward by the Jew whom the pagan Celsus introduces into his polemic against Christianity, circa 170 (Orig. c. Celsum, i. 28, 32; cf. Eus. Ecol. Proph. iii. 10, ed. Gaisford, p. 111). But the ramifications of this fable in the Talmudic literature show that its kernel is still older; cf. Laible-Dalman, S. 9-39, 5*-8*; Dérenbourg, pp. 203 f., 468 ff. Justin also seems to have it in mind, Dial. xxiii. (δίχα ἀμαρτίας), lxxviii. (Joseph's suspicion, ἐγκυμονεῖν αὐτὴν ἀπὸ συνουσίας ἀνδρός, τουτέστιν ἀπὸ πορνείας, cf. xxxv. cxvii.); cf. Forsch. vi. 266-269. Nor did Celsus invent for his Jew the story that Jesus spent part of His youth in Egypt, and there learned magic arts by means of which He imposed on the people when He returned to His own land (Orig. c. Celsum, i. 28, 38, 46). It is a much older Jewish fable; cf. Laible-Dalman, S. 40-48, 8*ff.; Dérenbourg, 203, note 2; 361, note 1; 471.

4. (Pp. 534, 535.) Except for insignificant variations in the spelling of individual names, the text of Matt. i. 1-15 is certain. When Sc—but not Ss Sh S¹ S³—inserts the three missing kings in ver. 8 (as does D in the arbitrarily arranged genealogy which it inserts at Luke iii. 23) without altering the figures in ver. 17, the interpolation is self-evident. If the genealogy in Matt. were Greek to begin with, and constructed on the basis of the LXX, the omission of the three kings might be explained, perhaps, as an error due to the similarity of Ὁχοζίας (2 Kings viii. 24-29; 2 Chron. xxii. 1) and Ὀζίας (Isa. i. 1; 2 Chron. xxvi. 2), especially in view of the mistakes which this similarity had already occasioned in the LXX itself (1 Chron. iii. 11, Ὀζίας wrongly for Ahaziah; 2 Chron. xxvi. 1, Ὁχοζίας wrongly for Uzziah). But the premise does not hold; see § 56, n. 11. If it is probable, further, that the author took the names of the kings from the list in 1 Chron. iii. 10 ff., instead of collecting them laboriously from the narrative (cf. what Africanus says of the genealogical inquiries of Jesus' relatives, Eus. H. E. i. 7. 14; Spitta, Brief des Africanus, 102), the text there gave no occasion for confusion. In that passage Uzziah bears the name עוזיהו, LXX Ἀζαπίας, which bears no marked resemblance to אהזיהו, LXX Ὀζίας (wrongly for Ὁχοζίας). Matthew, then, must have excluded the three kings intentionally, among them Joash, who reigned forty years, and Amaziah, who reigned twenty-nine. Any particular reason for omitting just these names is not to be sought or found; but, on the other hand, it is quite conceivable that Matthew did not care to dispense with the names from Uzziah onwards, made famous by Isa. i. 1, vi. 1, vii. 1, xxxvi.-xxxix.; Hos. i. 1; Amos i. 1. The fact that Jehoiakim is also lacking before Jeconiah in Matt. i. 11 cannot be independent of the further fact that one of the 42 (3 × 14) vouched for by ver. 17 is missing. We cannot here appraise the various attempts (ingenious attempts in part) to show that this defect is only apparent (Hilarius (?) in Florileg. Biblioth. Casin. ii. 66; Hofmann, Weissag. u. Erf. ii. 42). It is clear that the insertion of the name Jehoiakim in ver. 11 (so as early as Iren. iii. 21. 9, which, according to *ZKom. Matt.*² 58, A. 18 is rather to be denied) does not relieve the difficulty. By that means the second section is made to contain fifteen names; for, according to the analogy of the first section, Jeconiah is the concluding member of the second, and the third section still lacks one. If one recognises the mistake, and holds it inconceivable that the writer of the table and of ver. 17 should have miscounted, the most natural supposition is that which Jerome was the first to put forward, distinctly, at least (on Matt. i. 11, Vallarsi, vii. 11; cf. Eus. Quaest. ad. Steph., in Mai, Nova P. Bibl. iv. 1. 243), namely, that Ἰεχονίας in ver. 11 is an erroneous rendering of יְהוֹשָׁפָט, while in ver. 12 the same form stands for יְהוֹשָׁפָט. If the LXX represents both these names by Ἰωακίμ in a single sentence (2 Kings xxiv. 6; cf. xxiii. 36, xxiv. 1, 5 = Jehoiakim; xxiv. 8, 12, 15, Jehoiachin—which led Eusebius, loc. cit., into very inapt comments), the Greek translator of Matthew may equally well have obliterated the distinction made in the original. In that case Matthew himself meant Jehoiakim, son of Josiah, eleven years on the throne, and in καὶ τοὺς ἀδελφοὺς αὐτοῦ grouped the other princes with him, his brother Jehoahaz who reigned for three months before him, his brother Zedekiah who came to the throne later, and also his son Jehoiachin or Jeconiah who was king only three months. He does not refer to the latter by name till ver. 12, but he mentions him as the one who maintained the succession (1 Chron. iii. 17).

5. (P. 537.) The text of Matt. i. 16 has been handed down in the three forms which follow, designated by the present writer as A, B, C. (A) Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἄνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός. So all Greek uncials, and all MSS. and versions except those named under B and C. (B) Ἰακώβ δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ, ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα παρθένος Μαρίαμ ἐγέννησεν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν. So (1) the minuscules 346, 543 (Scrivener's, 556), 826, 828 (cf. Ferrar, Collation of four MSS. 1877, p. 2; Scrivener, Adversaria Critica Sacra, 1893, p. 1; Lake, JThS, i. (1899) p. 119; Harris, Further Researches in the History of the Ferrar-group, 1900, p. 7). (2) This text forms the basis of the old Latin version. The Codex k, which is considered the truest witness for its oldest form, gives: "Et Jacob genuit Joseph, cui desponsata virgo Maria genuit Jesum Christum" (Old Latin Bibl. Texts, ed. Wordsworth, ii. 24). Essentially the same is found in other old Latin MSS. (op. cit. i. 5, iii. 1; Bianchini, Ev. Quadruplex, i. 4, 5; also in d [D is defective]) and in Latin writers, cf. for example, Chron. Min., ed. Frick, i. 60. 24, 100. 7, 102. 1. This text also underlies (3) Sc: "Jacob begat Joseph, to whom was betrothed Mary the virgin, who bare Jesus Christ." (4) The Armenian version presents a conflation of texts A and B (according to Robinson, Euthaliana, p. 82): "Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, to whom being betrothed Mary the virgin, from whom was born Jesus, who was named Christ." The words in italics have been introduced very awkwardly from B into A. In the same way, moreover, only without παρθένος, the citation of the Christian, Timothy, is given in his dialogue with the Jew Aquila, concerning the Christ (ed. Fr. Conybeare, Anecd. Oxon., Class. Ser. viii. 76): Ἰακώβ δὲ (sc. ἐγέννησεν) τὸν Ἰωσήφ, ᾧ μνηστευθεῖσα Μαρία, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός. Similarly, but still more freely, on p. 88 [C] Ss: "Jacob begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom Mary the virgin was betrothed, begat Jesus, who is called Christ." A trace of this text appears, as it seems, in a sentence of Dionysius Barsalibi on Matt. i. 18, perhaps copied from an older source, which Burkitt, Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ii. 266, gives, following the MSS.: "And when he (the Evangelist in his genealogy) comes to Joseph, he says, 'Who begat the Messiah,' and for that reason afterwards he says, 'The birth of Jesus the Messiah was thus,' etc." On the other hand, as Burkitt shows on p. 265, one has no right to discover in a passage of the dialogue of Timothy with Aquila (viii. 76, line 11 f.) a Greek witness for the text C. The Jew cites from the Gospel of Matt. (κατὰ Ματθαῖα!) exactly the text A, and adds to it: καὶ Ἰωσήφ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰησοῦν τὸν λεγόμενον Χριστόν, περὶ οὗ νῦν ὁ λόγος, φησὶν, ἐγέννησεν ἐκ τῆς Μαρίας. Although the text does not appear to be entirely in order, still it is clear that these words are not a second citation added to the first, but a Jewish interpretation of the A text. It is easy to understand that before the discovery of Ss no especial attention was paid to the variant readings of Matt. i. 16 (see Tischendorf and Westcott-Hort, 1881, i. 4; Appendix, p. 7); for it was and is evident that A did not arise from B, but B from A, and from the necessity to obtain a text which corresponded better with the belief of the Church. That the designation of Joseph as the husband of Mary (A) was found objectionable, is proved also by the fact that Sc, which is also a principal witness for B, i. 19, has omitted τὸν ἄνδρα, and in i. 20 has translated τὴν ἐμνηστευμένην σου instead of τὴν γυναῖκά σου. Even more necessary appeared a change of i. 16, since the relative sentence in that verse hints at the condition of affairs presented in i. 18 ff., but in no way clearly expresses it. Accordingly the meaning of Matthew would be made sure against any danger of misunderstanding by μνηστευθεῖσα and παρθένος, and at the same time, through a change of construction, an ἐγέννησεν substituted for ἐγεννήθη, and thereby an external harmony would be obtained with the form of the preceding sentences, which occurs thirty-nine times. In this last instance, however, ἐγέννησεν does not mean "begat" but "bare." Moreover, τὸν λεγόμενον was in all probability struck out by the originator of the B text; for the agreement of the old Latin witnesses (and, judging by d, also D) with Sc outweighs the evidence of the Greek min., which in this passage have accommodated themselves to the reading of the A text. τὸν λεγόμενον corresponds to the style of Matt. (iv. 18, ix. 9, xxvi. 3, 14, xxvii. 16, 17, 22), and is therefore surely genuine; however, not original to B, but omitted because of its indifferent tone. Consequently the B text in comparison with A is proved to be a secondary transformation, and the peculiar C text, which is found only on Syrian soil, a tertiary form. C shares with B, the μνηστευθεῖσα and παρθένος, changes of the A text, prompted by dogmatic caution, and only in respect of the unimportant ὁ λεγόμενος does it show dependence on the A text, as do the Greek MSS. mentioned above under B, No. 1, and the mixed texts under B, No. 4. These last disprove the assumption of Burkitt (p. 263), that on Syrian soil Ss represents the original (appearing essentially in the B text), and Sc an emended form of the first Syriac translation. To be sure, Sc with its double relative sentence is an awkward rendering of the B text, but yet inexact only in so far as B, accurately translated, would read: "to whom being betrothed, a virgin (named) Mary," etc., and Sc translates as though it had found ἡ παρθένος before or after Μαριάμ. This inexactness is also found in Ss; and even if Burkitt were correct in his opinion that Ss connected the φ found in B, both with ἐγέννησε and μνηστευθείση (i.e. would perhaps read: "to whom the Virgin Mary, betrothed to him, bare Jesus, who is called the Christ"), would not this have been a very awkward and in the highest degree erroneous translation? And how then could the second Joseph peculiar to Ss be explained? For every uncritical reader would have understood it to be the subject of ἐγέννησεν. Why did Ss not write like Sc a ἦ, instead of repeating the name, in order to have the relative sentence depend upon it? The emendation of the reading of the B text, supported by a prevalent tradition, which was in essentials correctly rendered by the first Syriac translation, lacks support from any other tradition. The reason for the change is that he made Joseph the subject of ἐγέννησεν. His intention cannot have been to represent Joseph as the physical father of Jesus, for it is impossible that one who had this purpose should at the same time and in the same sentence speak even more clearly than the A text of Mary's virginity; exclude the existence of marital relations between her and Joseph; and in i. 18-25 emphasise as strongly as does the catholic text that Jesus was begotten through the agency of the Holy Spirit. Moreover, Ss does not show elsewhere either in respect of this or any other writer an especially dogmatic bias. Presumably the translator stumbled unawares into his strangely self-contradictory reading through the comparison of a Greek text with the form of the Syriac version which lay before him. As he took from this τὸν λεγόμενον, so also the ἐγέννησεν. The Greek MS. compared by him was similar to those mentioned under B, No. 1. Of this ἐγέννησεν, which, just as in the thirty-nine preceding instances, he thought, must be understood to designate the connection between father and son, only Joseph could be the subject. He must therefore repeat his name as subject of a new sentence. He could do this unhesitatingly, since also in many of the preceding sentences (e.g. ver. 8) the same word in no sense expresses physical fatherhood. He wished by this to designate Jesus as Joseph's son only in the same way as in i. 1 He was called David's son. The zeal with which many have seized upon the reading of Ss as a bit of the primitive Gospel, without looking to right or left, is explained by the old prejudgment that the genealogy of Jesus, leading as it does to Joseph, could have been prepared only by one who took him to be the actual father of Jesus. But the alleged contradiction between the genealogy and the following narrative is found equally in Luke—and so in both of the only old Christian writings extant which trace the Davidic descent of Jesus in a genealogy. That His Davidic descent was ever understood in the Christian community in any other sense is an hypothesis without support in the existing literature; cf. with regard to the Gospel of the Hebrews, GK, ii. 670 f., 686 f., 690; and on the whole question, the writer's Das apos. Symbol, 2te Aufl. S. 54-68. The hope of finding indications in old MSS. and versions that the authors of lost Gospels or brief writings which may have been worked over in our Matt. and Luke regarded Joseph as the physical father of Jesus, should at last be dismissed. An author who knew how to make even the dry material of a genealogy to its least detail contribute to the purpose of his thought regarding the slandered miracle of the Messiah's birth (see p. 534 ff. above), cannot at the same time have taken over statements from a genealogy of Joseph or Jesus used by him which directly contradicted his conception of this fact. Any text of Matthew which contained such statements would be condemned in advance as one altered against the author's intent.

6. (P. 537.) The formula used nine times by Matthew, ἵνα or ὅπως πληρωθῇ κτλ. (to which the similar expressions in ii. 17, xxvi. 54, xxvii. 9 should be added), appears elsewhere only in Mark xiv. 49 (a parallel to Matt. xxvi. 54), and seven times in John, referring to O.T. predictions and prophetic words of Jesus; it does not occur in Paul or in either of Luke's books, and Jas. ii. 23 is the only further passage to be brought into comparison. This is not the place to defend against unintelligent fault-finding the thoughtful conception of history which is set forth in these words. For a proper appreciation of the Gospel of Matthew in this regard, the point which is before all else decisive is the fact that the author, who in i. 23, ii. 6, xii. 18-21, xv. 8 f., xxvii. 9 (also probably xiii. 13-15, see ZKom. Matt. 474) shaped the O.T. texts to his purpose with entire freedom, makes not the slightest attempt to transform historical statements, like those cited in i. 15, 18, viii. 17, into predictions of future events.

7. (P. 539.) We must reject every interpretation of Matt. ii. 23 which disregards the fact that the passage differs from i. 22 f. (ii. 5), ii. 15, 17, iii. 3, iv. 14, viii. 17, xii. 17, xiii. 35 (xv. 7), xxi. 4 (xxii. 31, 43), xxvii. 9, first, in that it mentions not an individual prophet, but the prophets in general; and, secondly, in the omission of the λέγοντος or λεγόντων of citation. These facts make it impossible to look here for a quotation from either a canonical or an apocryphal book. Moreover, ὅτι cannot introduce, in indirect quotation, a summary of the whole prophetic teaching with regard to the lowliness of the Messiah and the possibility of misjudging Him (so practically Hofmann, Weiss. u. Erf. ii. 63–66, in an otherwise admirable discussion), nor yet a composite of passages like Isa. xi. 1; Jer. xxiii. 5, xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8, vi. 12; for it is not said in any of these passages that the Messiah is to bear any name approaching that of Ναζωραῖος, but He is spoken of figuratively by the prophets themselves as a נָצַר or נָצַח. The appeal to the prophets collectively is not followed by any sort of citation, exact or inexact, any more than in xxvi. 56 or the other passages that might be compared (Mark xiv. 49; John xvii. 12). ὅτι, then, instead of which γάρ would be plainer and better (Greek, is to be understood causally, as in Matt. xxvi. 54; Acts i. 17. In justification of his view that the settlement of the Holy Family in Nazareth, a city unnamed in promise, was not a mere accident, but a fulfilment of the whole tenor of prophecy, Matt. recalls that the Child who there grew to manhood was one day to receive from His people the opprobrious title of the Nazarene. The Promised One was to enter upon His mission misunderstood and misjudged. The harshness of the construction, which lies in the fact that κληθήσεται must be understood from the standpoint of a moment already past at the author's time (= ἤμελλε γὰρ Ναζωραῖος κληθῆναι), is paralleled in Rom. iv. 24, and for that matter also in Matt. xvii. 11, cf. 12, and is not without support in the best Greek; cf. Kühner-Gerth, i. 173 f. The translation is obscure and liable to misunderstanding, perhaps in consequence of a too anxiously exact fidelity to the Aramaic original. It might also be doubted whether the translator himself understood the original correctly.

8. (P. 540.) In Matt. ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν occurs thirty-three or thirty-four times; elsewhere in the N.T. only once (namely, John iii. 5), according to the correct text. The conception is thoroughly Jewish, and very common in the Mishnah and allied literature (cf. Schürer, JhJPTh, 1876, S. 166 ff.); but it is there quite colourless and divested of its eschatological character. The root of the idea, to speak briefly, lies in Dan. ii. 34 f., 44 f., and its authentic interpretation in John xviii. 36; cf. ZKom. Matt. 124 ff.

9. (P. 542.) On the 25th of April 1868, in Göttingen, the present writer publicly defended this thesis among others: "Orationis montanae a Mattheo evangelista traditae summa in cap. v. 16 proposita est," i.e. not in v. 17; for the latter statement covers only the discussion through v. 48; and even if one takes v. 17–20 as the theme, it is impossible to bring the whole content of the discourse within it. Moreover, while vii. 12 may appear to be a summing up of the whole with v. 17 in mind, it is only apparently so. Concern lest the accentuation of v. 16 should result in a contradiction of vi. 1 is needless, for the discrepancy is not increased by taking v. 16 as the fundamental thought of the discourse. As a matter of fact, there is no contradiction. The only possible query is whether opposition to the Pharisees still exists in vi. 19-vii. 5; cf. xxiii. (14 ?) 25; Mark xii. 40; Luke xii. (1) 22-31, 34, xvi. 13-31. ὑποκριτά, vii. 5, would indicate that the contrast was still in mind.

10. (P. 550.) We cannot introduce here an exposition of the passage xvi. 16-20, which, on account of the practical ecclesiastical interest which attaches to it, has been so variously misinterpreted. The present writer confines himself to the following suggestions: (1) The attempt to show from Tatian's Diatessaron that even past the middle of the second century xvi. 18 f. was lacking in many or all manuscripts of Matt., and so that what we have before us is a later catholic interpolation, has been futile (Forsch. i. 163 f., 243 f., 290 f.; GK, ii. 546). How essential the statements about the Church are in the construction of Matthew's Gospel appears above. (2) ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν does not signify here, any more than elsewhere, the kingdom of God to be found in heaven, the other-world abode of the exalted Christ and the blessed who wait for the resurrection (2 Tim. iv. 18; John xiv. 2), but the kingdom of God from heaven set up on earth. Between Hades below and heaven above is the kingdom of God on earth. This kingdom is not represented here, however, in its future completion after the parousia (xvi. 28), but in its preparatory, still imperfect form. Such a form the kingdom—in its essence invisible, and established in men's hearts through God's Word (xiii. 18 ff., 37) and His Spirit (iii. 11)—already before its completion possesses in the Church of Jesus. This conception, so clear in xiii. 41, is demanded by the connection of thought in the present passage. The keys, ver. 19, belong to the house, ver. 18; the house, therefore, is identical with the kingdom, cf. xxi. 42, 43 and also xii. 25-29. (3) The key or keys are the symbol of the steward's office, cf. Isa. xxii. 22 (in Rev. iii. 7 the master of the house himself carries them). Peter is the (chief) οἰκονόμος in the administration of the Church; cf. Matt. xxiv. 45-51; Luke xii. 42-48; 1 Cor. iv. 1, ix. 17; and, to the point, John xxi. 15-17. (4) To the administrative authority thus announced ver. 19b adds legislative power; for δεῖν and λύειν correspond to the Rabbinic פקד "declare forbidden," and היתר "declare permitted." The reference, as a rule, is to courses with regard to whose permissibility different opinions might be entertained, but never to past actions, sins committed. Matt. xvi. 19 has absolutely no connection with John xx. 23.

11. (P. 555.) Origen (Gallandi, xiv., Appendix, p. 81; Comm. in Matt., Delarue, iii. 642, 918) found Jesus as the real name of Barabbas, Matt. xxvii. 16 ff., "in very old manuscripts." So also Ss (Sc is defective), Arm., Sh (which is entirely independent of the other Syriac versions), and also a few Greek minuscules and scholia. Tatian probably did not have it, for Bar-Bahlul refers to it expressly as a reading of the Gospel of the Separated (Forsch. i. 105; cf. 108, 211). Nor can it be established in the Gospel of the Hebrews; GK, ii. 697-700. Still, the reading, which could easily give offence, and may for that very reason have been set aside by the redactor of the Gospel of the Hebrews also, is early and well enough attested to permit the conjecture stated on p. 555 above; cf. ZKom. Matt. 702; Burkitt, Evangelion da-Mepharreshe, ii. 178, 277.

12. (P. 561.) If the reading of the later MSS., οἱ λέγοντες, were authentic, Matt. xxii. 23, like Mark xii. 18, Luke xx. 27, Acts xxiii. 8, it would be an instance of information to the readers with regard to the doctrines of the Sadducees. According to the original text without of, the meaning is rather that the Sadducees disputed with Jesus concerning the Resurrection, which they denied, and in the course of a discussion of this sort laid before Him the captious question about the woman seven times married.

13. (P. 562.) Among the many characterisations of the Gospel of Matt., the following are worthy of special attention :—Hofmann, Vermischte Aufsätze (1878, written in 1856), S. 15–33 (cf. also his N.T. ix. 297–317), and Aberle, ThQSc. 1859, S. 567–588 (cf. his Einl. ins N.T., published by Schanz, 1877, S. 20–32). Aberle brought out the apologetic and polemic aim of the Gospel more clearly than others have done ; but his idea that it was written as a reply to a document traducing Christ and His Church, circulated by the Sanhedrin and known to Justin (Dial. xvii. 108, 117) and even to Origen (c. Cels. i. 38, vi. 27), has met with little acceptance. Neither Matt. (xxviii. 15, ἐφημίσθη ὁ λόγος οὗτος) nor Justin nor Origen refers to such a document. Eusebius (on Isa. xviii. 1 f. ; Montfaucon, Coll. Nova Patr. ii. 424 f.) was the first to conceive of these Jewish slanders as taking the form of official communications from the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem to the Jews of all the world ; and, while Eusebius appealed to older authorities, he wrote under the influence of the text upon which he was commenting, and for the purpose of contrasting the apostles of Christ, who were also letter-writers, with the “apostles” of the Jewish “patriarch.” This, then, is not old tradition, but learned invention. The passages in the N.T. which refer to Jewish calumnies and Jewish opposition to Christianity outside of Palestine (Rom. iii. 8, cf. Rom. as a whole, and vol. i. 424 ; 1 Thess. ii. 15 f. ; Gal. iv. 29 ; Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9 ; and the narratives in Acts, perhaps with the exception of ix. 2), convey no hint of any action of the Sanhedrin to that end, and Acts xxviii. 21 f. is evidence to the contrary. It is true that the Jewish slanders, in oral circulation, to which Matt. has reference, were still current to some extent in Justin’s time ; but the very ones which are most clearly indicated by the apologetic attitude of Matt. i. and ii. are hardly hinted at in Justin (see p. 563. n. 3). The alleged theft of Christ’s body by the disciples is known to Justin (Dial. cviii) from Matt. xxviii. 13.

§ 56. COMPARISON OF THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW WITH THE TRADITION REGARDING IT.

It has been established by the preceding investigation that Matthew was written for Jews and Jewish Christians in Palestine, as the tradition reports (above, pp. 521, 560 f.). The fact that in spite of this it was circulated as early as the first century even in Churches predominantly Gentile, was orally translated, and then finally translated into Greek (above, p. 513 ff.), is easily explained by the richness of its contents, and by the absence of all such Jewish ideas as were out of harmony with the Christian confession in general, or with the views which prevailed in the Gentile Christian Churches at the beginning. Paul would have no objection to this Gospel, which represented Jesus as "a servant of the circumcision" under the law, and yet at the same time the King of heaven and earth, who bestows the gospel upon all peoples (Gal. iv. 4 ; Rom. xv. 8). Not until the true historical picture of Jesus and of the situation of His first Church had faded out, did critical questionings arise among Gentile Christians as to the truth of Matthew's peculiar setting forth of the history and his new uncritical interpretations of it (n. 1).

There is nothing in the Gospel which contradicts the tradition that it was written between 61 and 66. If the "to this day" (xxvii. 8, xxviii. 15) were after the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, we would expect that an author who values so highly as does Matthew proof based upon the concurrence of prophecy and its fulfilment for the justification of Christ over against Judaism, would indicate somewhere and in some manner that the prophecy of Jesus had been fulfilled in this judgment (xxii. 7, xxiii. 35-xxiv. 2, xxvi. 61, xxvii. 40). Matthew makes no attempt whatever to separate the prophecy concerning the parousia from the prophecy concerning the judgment upon Jerusalem and the Jewish contemporaries of Christ (xvi. 28, xxiv. 3, 34, xxvi. 64 ; see above, p. 449 f.). There are sayings which make it appear as if the apostolic preaching was to continue in Israel until the parousia of Christ, and as if the spread of the gospel among the Gentiles was not to begin until after the destruction of Jerusalem (x. 23, xxii. 7-10, xxiii. 34-36), standing alongside of other sayings in which the completion of the preaching among all peoples is made the condition of the parousia (xxiv. 14, cf. v. 14, viii. 11, xii. 18-21, xiii. 38, xxiv. 31, xxv. 32, xxvi. 13, xxviii. 19). The author makes no attempt to harmonise these differences. Because when Matthew was written there was as yet no sign of fulfilment, the relation in which the predicted setting up of the idolatrous abomination in the temple, with the accompanying desolation, i.e. desecration of the temple (xxiv. 15), stood to the other event prophesied at the same time, namely, the destruction of the temple and of the city (xxii. 7, xxiii. 38–xxiv. 4), is left obscure. It is evidence of the faithfulness with which this particular prophecy is recorded in Matthew, that the author, unlike Mark (xiii. 14; above, p. 500 f.), does not employ the language in keeping with the later understanding of apostolic Christianity which was the result of actual experience (n. 2). In the prophecy of the fall of Jerusalem itself we do not find such features in Matthew as appear in Luke's account (xix. 41–44, xxi. 20, xxiii. 28–30), which could be judged a reflection of the event after its fulfilment. The attempt has been made to derive from Matt. xix. 1 the idea that, from the point of view of the author, Judæa lay on the other side of the Jordan, and that accordingly the book, or this portion of it, was written on the east side of the Jordan, about the time when the Christian refugees from Jerusalem found a place of safety in Pella. This would bring us down a little beyond the time limits drawn by Irenæus, since the departure from Jerusalem certainly did not take place before the year 66 (n. 3). It is, however, inconceivable that merely in consequence of a change of residence to the other side of the river, which had taken place shortly before, and against the regular Jewish usage and the usage which he himself follows in other passages of his book, a Jew, who up to this time had lived west of the Jordan, should have characterised the latter region πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου in a narrative the scene of which up to this point had been Galilee. The words themselves do not forbid, but favour the interpretation that on this occasion Jesus made the journey from Galilee to Judæa through Perea instead of Samaria (n. 4). Equally erroneous is the opinion that in Matt. xxiii. 35 Jesus is made to refer to an event which took place in the year 67 or 68, not prophetically, but in historical reminiscence (n. 5). If this were an unintentional error, the composition of Matthew would have to be brought down at least to the year 100, a date which, as has been shown, does not agree with the other contents of the book. If, on the other hand, it were an intentional modification of a word of Jesus in the tradition (Luke xi. 51), it would represent an inconceivable mixture of thoughtlessness and perverseness. In reality the occurrence of the name Barachiah instead of Jehoiada is only one of those oversights on the part of Matthew which the learned redactor of the Gospel of the Hebrews saw fit to correct (n. 5). There are no critical reasons why we should not accept the tradition according to which Matthew wrote his Gospel in Palestine between the years 61 and 66 (n. 6).

Likewise the supposition that he wrote in the common language of Palestine, and that our Greek Matthew is a translation from the Hebrew, i.e. Aramaic, made considerably later (above, pp. 506–522), finds support in the text. In the discussion of this question it is first of all to be kept in mind that Jesus made use of Aramaic (§ 1) in His preaching to the people and in instructing His disciples, as well as in all His intercourse with His contemporaries, so that all the discourses of Jesus and the words spoken by Him to the Jews, who had intercourse with Him, preserved to us in Greek books, are only translations. And we are not the first to be dependent on such translations; but this was likewise true for the Christians in Antioch, Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome in the days of the unwritten Gospel (§ 48). The possibility or the necessity of referring one of Jesus' words to an Aramaic original in order to understand it fully or to explain the different forms in which it occurs in the tradition, proves nothing as to whether the writings in which it is found were originally Greek or translations from the Aramaic. The material which an evangelist like Luke, who knew little or no Aramaic, took from the oral or written tradition must have been already in Greek, and the Hebrew or Aramaic idioms which are observable in his accounts may be regarded as in so far proof of the faithfulness with which he reproduces what he received from the tradition. It does not, however, establish anything with reference to his linguistic ability, nor prove that one of his sources was in Aramaic, since the oral account or writing at the basis of his narrative can go back either directly or indirectly to a Jewish Christian who knew Greek enough to be able to give an oral or written account of Jesus in this language, and who at the same time was still "Hebrew" enough to betray himself in his language either intentionally or unintentionally. Even an evangelist like Mark, whose native language was Aramaic, but who for decades had been in the service of missionary work outside of his native land, and had finally come to know Greek well enough to undertake composition in this language, did not have to construct the Greek form of his Gospel entirely new. He was influenced by the manner in which the words and deeds of Jesus were customarily related in Greek in connection with the missionary work. This would be even more true in the case of a translator who put the Aramaic Matthew into Greek after it had been translated orally for a number of years, especially if the work was done at a time when Greek Gospels were already in existence and circulated in the circle to which the translator belonged. In the case before us, however, this is at least very probable. Besides Mark (above, pp. 444, 516 f.), still other Greek Gospel writings could have been in existence in the vicinity of the Greek translator of Matthew, as the Gospel of Luke or one of the writings mentioned in Luke i. 1 which have not come down to us. Besides being influenced by the ecclesiastical language of the Greek Churches, it was unavoidable that the author should be affected also by the oral translation of the Aramaic Matthew, which had been practised for years, and from which, finally, the written translation originated, as well as by Greek Gospels like that of Mark. We must also remember that translations made in ancient times varied greatly in character. We find a disposition to translate a text which was already regarded as Holy Scripture with slavish literalness. For this reason the LXX is on the whole a very literal translation which everywhere does violence to the genius of the Greek language, a particular in which Aquila's translation is even a greater offender (vol. i. p. 56). The Old Latin translation, particularly that of the N.T., which was not made until the N.T. had long been accepted as Holy Scripture by the Church, was designed to be literal. In this point the revisers had few changes to make; they simply freed it from its slavish dependence upon the original, and made the Latin smoother. The translation of the Gospels among the Syrians exhibits the reverse process. From the Diatessaron or Syrus Sinaiticus to the work of Thomas of Heraclea we notice a constant development away from great freedom to slavish literalness; a tolerably good manipulation of the native language gives place to a handling of the same which grows constantly worse and worse as the attempt is made to render the original more and more faithfully. When the Greek Matthew was produced (above, p. 516), the development in the direction of treating the original upon which it is based as Holy Scripture could not yet have gone very far. The translator could not have been a pure Hellenist, since as such he would not have understood the original, but was simply one of those "Hebrews" who, like Paul, was not only proficient in his own language, but master also of Greek (vol. i. p. 48 ff.). He must have been born or have grown up among the Hebrews, and therefore have been accustomed to the oral translation of the Hebrew original into Aramaic as it was practised in the synagogues of the Hebrews. Here literal exactness was not regarded as essential even in relation to the O.T. Much less, then, could it have appeared to the translator to be his first and only duty with reference to Matthew,—a writing not yet old enough to be regarded as sacred. Finally, it is to be remembered that the language of a translator does not always show stronger traces of dependence upon the original language than that of an independent author who is under the necessity of using a language other than his own. A German writing in English and for English readers about conditions in his native land would be far less careful to avoid Germanisms than a German translating a work of Goethe or Ranke into English.

The style of Matthew shows throughout fewer Hebraisms than that of Mark and Revelation. Constructions entirely foreign to Greek idiom do not occur, and the use of καί in the narrative is much less frequent (n. 7, and above, p. 502, n. 2). Indeed, the question arises whether the painful frequency of certain formulæ and constructions which take the place of the Semitic form of narrative are not due to the translator's effort to avoid the latter (n. 7). That Matthew is a translation from a Semitic original is proved primarily on other grounds. An author writing originally in Greek could not have written i. 21. A Greek reader unfamiliar with the etymological meaning of Ἰησοῦς could not see the logical force of the explanation of the choice of the name here given, and, therefore, for such the sentence is simply unintelligible. The Aramaic-speaking Jews, among whom the Hebrew proper name Jesus was very common, and to whom the meaning of the stem must have been generally familiar from the liturgical use of hosanna, understood the sentence at once even if the σῶζω of the Greek Matthew did not represent the corresponding Hebrew verb, but the purely Aramaic פִּרַק (n. 8). The Greek translator could or should have helped his reader out of the difficulty by a ὁ ἐστὶν μεθερμηνεύμενον σωτήρ or σωτηρία κυρίου, which would have rendered the following αὐτὸς γὰρ σώσει intelligible. Justin (Apol. i. 33) did so. That the author of the Greek Matthew omits this explanation, is proof of the exactness of his translation, but not of his skill as a translator. The case is similar in Matt. x. 25, where the connection between the literal meaning of the name Beelzebub and the figure of the οἰκοδεσπότης and the οἰκιακοί (vol. i. p. 20) is lost to the Greek reader, and therewith the point of the discourse. If they had recorded this saying at all, Mark, and certainly Luke, would not have omitted an explanation of the word. A simple explanation of the content such as we have in Matt. xii. 24 (cf. Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15), would not have been sufficient. The absence of an explanation of the word κορβανᾶς, xxvii. 6, is all the more striking, because in xv. 5 the Hebrew and Aramaic word, which was unintelligible to Greek readers, is replaced by the Greek translation which Mark found it necessary to add in vii. 11. Here and in other places the Greek Matthew not only makes less effort than does Mark to retain the form of the original language, but rather betrays a purpose to furnish his Greek readers with a text at once intelligible, with the fewest possible foreign expressions (n. 9). This fact makes the other cases where Hebrew and Aramaic words and names are left unexplained, as in Ἰησοῦς, i. 21; Βεελζεβούλ, x. 26; ῥαχά, v. 22; κορβανᾶς, xxvii. 6, seem to be due to dependence upon the Aramaic original, and to a lack of courage on the translator's part to render this freely. In the same way is to be explained the obscurity of the expression in ii. 23 (above, p. 568, n. 7); further, the use of πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου as a substantive without the article in iv. 25, which is contrary to Greek idiom, and also the occurrence of genitives like Γαλιλαίας and Ἰουδαίας governed by ἀπό (iv. 25, cf. iv. 15), likewise the translation of Jewish scholastic terms by δέειν and λύειν (xvi. 19, xviii. 18; above, p. 569, n. 10), which is literal but unintelligible to Greek readers. If, according to John i. 42, xxi. 15–17, and the Gospel of the Hebrews, Peter's father was called Jochanan, the Bar-Jonah of Matt. xvi. 17 is a mistake more likely to have been made by a translator than by the author (vol. i. 17). The retention of the Aramaic bar without an added translation seems to be without purpose, and its employment along with the Greek form Πέτρος (cf. per contra, John i. 42) is inconsistent, and exhibits poor style. Καναναῖος (x. 4), which an ignorant scribe changed to Κανανίτης, and Χαναναία (xv. 22), are correct transcriptions of כְּנַנְיָא (Dalmán, *Gr.*¹ 138, better than 2te Aufl. 174) and כְּנַנְיָאָה; but it would have been better for his Greek readers if the author of the Greek Matthew had given the translation of the first, which is customary in Luke and Josephus, ζηλωτής, and if he had substituted for the latter the specification which we find in Mark vii. 26. Perhaps if we could compare the original with the translation, we should be able to make the same definite claim with regard to other passages where now we must be content with modest conjectures (n. 10). The omissions of things it was incumbent upon a translator to say, which are noted above, lose none of their force as proof because in other places the translator is more careful to make himself intelligible to his readers. In xxvii. 46 he himself must have felt that a translation of the Aramaic words was quite as indispensable as the translation of the Hebrew name Immanuel in i. 23 (n. 9). Familiarity of his readers with Mark xv. 22, 34 (cf. John xix. 17) may have induced him to retain the original in xxvii. 46, and to add the translation of the Hebrew name in xxvii. 33, which was not absolutely necessary.

Stronger proof that Matthew is a translation is to be derived from a consideration of the form of its citations from the O.T. When a Hebrew like Paul makes only very moderate use of his knowledge of the Hebrew O.T., and when the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who was likewise learned in the Scriptures, takes his citations wholly from the LXX, it is inconceivable that an evangelist writing originally in Greek for Greek or Hellenistic readers, whose knowledge of the Scripture was inferior to that of the persons mentioned (n. 11), should, while following the LXX in many instances, still, wherever he felt it necessary, give a translation of the Hebrew text entirely independent of the LXX. On the basis of the differences observable in Matthew in this respect, the attempt has been made to distinguish two elements in our Gospel, and to prove, on this ground, that it is a compilation. Where the redactor cites the O.T. on his own responsibility, he takes his quotations direct from the Hebrew original, without paying much regard to the LXX, and reproduces them in free translation. On the other hand, citations which occur in the discourses of Jesus, and such as are made by other persons represented in the narrative as speaking, he takes from a Greek book before him in which all the citations were quoted from the LXX (n. 12). The rôles here assigned are impossible. Since Jesus spoke Aramaic, it is extremely improbable that His own quotations from the O.T. were influenced by the LXX. The same must have been true of the oral tradition of the discourses among the Hebrews in Palestine, and of the supposed record of these discourses by Matthew. Therefore the person who translated into Greek the Hebrew or Aramaic Λόγια, discovered by Schleiermacher, must have obliterated all traces of his original's independence of the LXX, looked up all the passages cited in the LXX, and have copied them from this source; while, on the contrary, the author of Matthew, who wrote in Greek, to begin with, for Greek readers, ignored the existence of an O.T. in Greek, and everywhere paraded his Hebrew learning. The real state of the case was different, and is very easily explained if we recognise what is not only handed down by the tradition, but also sufficiently proved from what precedes, namely, that our Greek Matthew is the result of an effort to give a literal translation of a uniformly Aramaic original document. Since the translator was proficient in Greek, he must have been familiar also with the LXX, which was industriously read by those about him. In the translation of an Aramaic book he used the LXX as one of his models. He made use of its expressions where it was not easy to produce better ones of his own (i. 1; above, p. 532). Sayings such as must have been often employed in preaching the gospel in Greek, and in instruction within the Church, in part also to be found in the Greek Gospels which existed in his vicinity (e.g. iii. 3), he reproduced as he found them in the LXX, especially if no violence was done to the sense of his original. In other passages it must have seemed to him that the substitution of the text of the LXX would obscure the sense of his original and the purpose of the citation. In such cases he translated the O.T. quotations of his original in exactly the same way that he did the rest of the Aramaic book. Familiarity with the LXX, and with the language employed in the Church in his vicinity, made it inevitable that expressions which we find in the LXX should flow from his pen, especially in such passages as were often read in Christian circles. That he looked up the quotations and allusions regularly in the LXX, and translated them with this before him, is extremely improbable, otherwise he would have corrected a number of mistakes in his original, as the learned redactor of the Gospel of the Hebrews did in at least one case (n. 11).

The question remains still as to whether or not the unanimous tradition which assigns the authorship of our Gospel to the apostle Matthew is borne out by the book itself. Scholars who deny this claim base their opinion partly upon the content,—which, it is claimed, is inconsistent with authorship by one of the twelve apostles,—partly upon the dependence of the account upon older documents of similar content, either still extant or to be assumed. With regard to the latter point, the real relation that exists between Matthew and Mark deserves special investigation (§ 57). Particularly, certain repetitions of the same or similar words and actions—the so-called doublets—have played an important rôle in proving Matthew's dependence upon various written sources. Evidence, convincing to one who does not already believe the point to be proved, has not been produced (n. 13). Granted, however, that it is possible to prove—a possibility which is here contested—that the original Matthew is dependent upon our Mark or a similar document, it would not follow that it was not written by an apostle. It must always be borne in mind that Matthew became a disciple and companion of Jesus comparatively late. It cannot be proved at this point, but simply claimed on the assumption that the order of events accepted as correct by the present writer is, that Matthew was no more an eye-witness of what is recorded in Mark i. 4–39, ii. 1–12, iii. 20–v. 20 (Matt. iii. 1–iv. 25, viii. 14–ix. 8, xii. 22–xiii. 52, possibly xiii. 58) than he was of the events narrated in Matt. i.–ii. or John i. 19–v. 47. With reference to such portions of the history, Matthew was less favoured than Mark, if the latter was able to draw upon the narratives of Peter, who became a disciple of Jesus so much earlier. Further, it is hard to understand why an apostle should have hesitated to make use of the record by a disciple of one of the apostles for such parts of his book. But even in connection with the narration of such events as he may have witnessed, an intelligent author is always glad to make use of existing records in preparation for his own work, no matter from whom they may have originated. In his own recollection he has a certain standard by which to estimate its worth and to correct its errors.

With reference to the content of the book and Matthew's method of exposition, apart from the question of its dependence upon older written sources which cannot be demonstrated, it cannot be considered the task of a text-book like this to combat the dogmatic prejudices of those who conclude, from the miraculous character of the events recorded in Matthew, as in all the Gospels, that none of these books could have been written by a companion of Jesus and an eye-witness of even a part of the history here recorded. It was necessary to touch upon this question earlier in connection with 2 Pet. i. 16-18, and it will recur again more pointedly in the consideration of the Fourth Gospel. Whoever finds one miracle of feeding a difficulty to begin with, will be under the necessity of regarding the feeding of the 4000 (Matt. xv. 32; Mark viii. 1), and that of the 5000 (Matt. xiv. 15-21; Mark vi. 34; Luke ix. 12; John vi. 5), as a double form of one and the same fact, exaggerated by legend. In the same way he must regard the conversation connected with the two events (Matt. xvi. 5-11; Mark viii. 14-21) as the patchwork of a compiler whose attitude toward the traditions, already varying widely from the truth, was uncritical and generally helpless. This judgment would apply in the same way to Mark, and finally to all Gospel tradition. Hypothetical reference of the existing Gospels to written sources which are now lost, the content and form of which each constructs according to his own liking, puts us in a position where we can neither answer nor escape the great dilemma whether the Gospel history is unconscious and conscious mythologising, or whether it goes back to actual facts.

Criticism of the Gospel literature, and the counter criticisms, can render at best only preliminary service. For this end it is, to be sure, important to observe that Matthew's narrative lacks the clearness which characterises that of the eye-witness. It must be admitted that we cannot make such observations in connection with this Gospel as led us to refer Mark's account to an eye-witness (above, p. 491 ff.). The theological thought which dominates Matthew, determining the choice as well as the form of the subject-matter, does not admit ample breadth of narrative, depiction of the scene, and delineation of the characters. But we must remember, in the first place, that the purpose of the writing, as developed in § 55, gave little occasion for the features which we miss in Matthew. The Roman Christians for whom Mark wrote desired a narrative concerning Jesus, whom they had not seen, but whom they nevertheless loved (1 Pet. i. 8). To the Jews and Jewish Christians for whom Matthew wrote, it needed to be proved that, in spite of all Jewish prejudices to the contrary, Jesus was the promised Messiah. For this purpose the appropriate material was a few characteristic actions and detailed discourses. In the second place, it betrays ignorance of real life to decide a question of this character by reference to a common standard, instead of by the actual diversity of individual inclination and capacity. It is possible for everyone to find, in his daily experience, examples of such difference between a fact and the same as reported by two different persons, when exactly similar conditions had existed for both. In the third place, in the criticism of Matthew we must take into consideration also the fact that narratives which, in comparison with those of Mark, make the impression of unelaborated sketches, e.g. Matt. viii. 18–ix. 8, could have been reproduced by Matthew in part only from extraneous accounts. Further, he purposed in this whole section,—viii. 18–ix. 34,—by a rapid succession of chronologically connected events, and by constant change of scene, to give us a picture of the restless activity with which Jesus performed His lifework (n. 14). Is it to be considered a coincidence that Matthew, who follows the Jewish method and reckons the day from evening to evening, chooses for this purpose the particular day in the middle of which his own call took place, and that an apostle selects, as an example of Jesus' teaching, the great discourse which followed directly upon the choosing of the apostles, perhaps the first longer discourse which Matthew, who had been called shortly before from the stall of the tax-gatherer to be a disciple, had heard from Jesus' lips? Most of the objections to the apostolic authorship of Matthew are due either to a failure to recognise its plan and method of exposition, or to opinions about the history, which, in their turn, lack sufficient basis; or, finally, to preconceived opinions with reference to the uncertain beginnings of literary activity in connection with the Gospel. If the outline of the plan and character of the book given above, pp. 531-562, is relatively correct, the complaints about the lack of chronological order in Matt. iii. 1-xiv. 12, and the contradictions between the arrangement of material in this part of the book and the more trustworthy accounts in Mark and Luke, are without purpose. The requirement that a historian, in close touch with the events which he narrates, must maintain a chronological order in all details, is not met even by Luke in either his Gospel or in Acts, though in the former this appears to be promised, i. 3 (καθεξῆς). It is entirely inapplicable to Matthew, who is in no sense primarily a historian, but an apologetic preacher in Israel of the Nazarene denied by His own people. The freedom with which Matthew handles the form of the great discourses (above, p. 558 f.) is much more conceivable in case of an apostle, who is not called to write history, but to publish the commandments of Jesus to others (Matt.

xxviii. 20; cf. 2 Pet. iii. 2),—and who, moreover, felt confidence on account of his own recollection,—than in that of a younger contemporary who constructed his work from the narratives of those who heard the discourses, or from documents in which the same could have been recorded, part of them not without historical setting. The idea that the first records of the words and deeds of Jesus must have been simply collections of material, with no other purpose than to preserve the memory of them, and that for this reason a book so thoroughly planned as is Matthew, so rich in thought, and written with such a clear purpose, could not have originated except upon the basis of such purposeless collections of material, is a pre-judgment. Of course, lack of knowledge on the author's part with regard to important facts in the Gospel history, especially with regard to events which took place when the apostles were present, would be proof that the book was not written by an apostle. Apart, however, from the consideration that, as far as this point is concerned, it does not make any essential difference whether the book was written by an apostle or some other Palestinian Christian in the year 65, or even 75, such ignorance on Matthew's part remains to be demonstrated (n. 15). The older criticism of Matthew, which in many instances proceeded upon the presupposition of the apostolic origin and essential trustworthiness of the Fourth Gospel, is inconsistent, to the extent that objections to the apostolic origin and historicity of this Gospel are as strong as those against Matthew. The more important points of difference will not be considered until we discuss the Fourth Gospel. Also the question as to why Matthew and Mark begin the account of Jesus' public work with the arrest of the Baptist, thereby limiting their narrative practically to Galilee, must be postponed, in order to avoid repetition (§ 63).

1. (P. 571.) Marcion contended that Matt. v. 17 was not spoken by Jesus (Tert. c. Marc. iv. 7, 9, 12, 36, v. 14), that either He Himself spoke it direct opposite or His disciples after Him (and before the fourth century) substituted it for this saying, which was alleged to have been smuggled into the Gospel by the Judaists (GK, i. 609, 666-669). Holsten (Die drei ursprüngl. Evv. 61 ff.) and Holtzmann (*HK*², i. 5) still take practically the same position with regard to Matt. v. 17-19, and the latter with regard to xxiii. 3, xxiv. 20 also. According to Weizsäcker, also (Unters. über d. ev. Gesch. 125), xxiv. 20 contradicts "the whole gospel tradition concerning Jesus' attitude in regard to this day." But the fundamental principle on which all depends is preserved besides in Luke xvi. 17, and also in Matt. iii. 15, only in a still more general form. Nothing is gained by the excision of xxiii. 3 as long as xxiii. 23 (ταῦτα ἔδει ποιῆσαι) remains. That Jesus assumed and required the observance of the ceremonial law by His disciples, and consequently also that xxiv. 20 is in entire accord with the historical conditions in which Jesus and His disciples moved, is one of those facts which can be disputed only by a dogmatism, whether orthodox or heterodox, which is absolutely devoid of historical insight. According to John, as well as according to Matthew and the other Synoptists, Jesus never conceded to His accusers that He had annulled one jot or tittle of the law, and never claimed for Himself a peculiar position either above or outside the law. On the contrary, He repeatedly proved from the law and the prophets, from the recognised requirements of the temple service, and from His opponents' own practice, that His attitude toward ceremonial regulations—so much freer, as compared with Pharisaism—was the only fulfilment of the law which answered to the will of the divine lawgiver, the idea of the regulations themselves, and the patterns of O.T. history. It was rather His opponents who made empty the law, who nullified and evaded it (Matt. v. 20-48, xii. 1-13, xv. 1-20, xix. 3-12, xxi. 30, xxiii. 1-33; John v. 16-18, 42, 45, vii. 19-24). Matt. ix. 14-17 (cf. xv. 2, 7-20) has nothing to do with the law, which prescribed fasting only on the Day of Atonement, and neither there (ix. 15) nor elsewhere (vi. 16-18, xvii. 21) does Jesus belittle the pious observance of voluntary fasting. On the other hand, also, Jesus never taught that the law given to the people of Israel (Mark xii. 29), to His own and His disciples' forefathers (Matt. v. 21, τοῖς ἀρχαίοις), was to be extended to all nations. Yet His Jewish disciples were not to imagine that the nearness of the kingdom of heaven and of the accompanying collapse of the hitherto existing order, released them from their duty toward the God-given though nationally limited appointments of the O.T. Jesus did not touch upon the question of the Gentile Christians' position with regard to the law. Only in regard to His own commands is it His will that they be communicated to all peoples (xxviii. 20). Even according to Matthew no details of the future form of life in His Church, composed as it was of Jews and Gentiles together, were legally prescribed by Jesus. Rather was it left to the Church and its leaders to institute such rules of administration as might be required (xvi. 19, xviii. 18; above, p. 550 f.). Intimations are not lacking that in the course of the historical development even essential portions of the law would be set aside (xvii. 24-27; cf. John iv. 21; above, p. 552). In the two ideas, namely, that Jesus Himself recognised it as His calling to bring the law to its fulfilment, and that so long as the world stands no element of the law can perish unfulfilled, lie the fruitful germs of thought which were to be developed later. Hilgenfeld attempted (above, p. 414) to distinguish in Matt. between a Jewish particularistic tendency derived from the primitive Matt. in Aramaic or from the Gospel of the Hebrews, and a universalistic tendency attributable to the Greek redactor, and to sort out the inserted sections. In this he could not possibly succeed; for, as (pp. 531-556) has been shown, the whole book is built up upon the antithesis which he would thus explain. The supposed redactor speaks of Jesus' redemptive mission in i. 21 as if it were confined to Israel, while the supposedly Jewish writer of the Sermon on the Mount points (v. 13-16) to the whole world as the sphere of the disciples' labour and the field of the Gospel, as clearly as does the universalistic editor in xiii. 38, xxiv. 14, xxvi. 13, xxviii. 19. If vii. 6 were a prohibition of preaching among the Gentiles, Matthew would reduce Jesus to a standpoint lower not only than that of the O.T., but lower than that of the Pharisees (Matt. xxiii. 15) and the narrow-minded Jewish Christians, who never doubted that the Gospel was intended for all mankind, but simply disagreed with Paul and others as to the conditions upon which this was to be realised. Indeed, that group of Jewish Christians which made use of the Gospel of the Hebrews, alleged to be the primitive Matt., fully recognised Paul's Gentile mission (GK, ii. 669). But Matthew has nothing to say about these conditions for the reception of the Gentiles; there is simply a certain obscurity as to when and how the Gospel is to pass from Israel to them, which, however, is only a proof that Matthew has preserved the words of Jesus with remarkable fidelity uncoloured by later conceptions (above, p. 571). Jesus Himself knew that for the period of His earthly life He was confined to Israel (xv. 24); it would have been unfair to the privilege which rightly belonged to that nation if He had withdrawn from it and turned at once to the Gentiles (xv. 26). This is quite in accord with Rom. xv. 8 and with the Fourth Gospel, which represents Jesus' death and exaltation as the indispensable precondition of the extension of His work to the Gentiles (iii. 14-16, x. 16-18, xi. 51 f., xii. 20, 23, 32; cf. per contra, vii. 35). From this followed naturally the similar restriction of the apostles; primarily for the like period (Matt. x. 5 f.). But in accord also with the actual situation until after 60 A.D., which Paul himself acknowledged to be justified (Gal. ii. 7-10), and with another report of Jesus' words (Luke xi. 49, xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8), it is intimated that even after His departure the disciples were to preach first in Israel (Matt. xxiii. 34, xxii. 4). Neither the promise of x. 23, nor the expectation it presupposed, namely, that the Twelve would preach in Israel until the time referred to (the destruction of Jerusalem), failed of fulfilment. It was only when the signs of the approaching end were multiplying that Peter went to Rome. The other apostles remained still longer at their posts, and not till about 70 and from then onwards do we find John and others of the early apostolic circle, like Philip and Aristion, at work among the Gentile Churches of Asia Minor. With this corresponds the representation of Matt. xxii. 7-9, that the Gospel is to turn from Israel to the Gentiles only after the destruction of Jerusalem, and it is not at variance with the missionary command, xxviii. 19; cf. Luke xxiv. 47, and all the similar sayings recorded in Matthew. For (1) Israel also belongs among "all the nations" (vol. i. 370, n. 2). (2) The allegorical language of the parable, xxii. 1-14, makes it necessary to represent the call of Israel and the call of the Gentiles as two absolutely distinct acts, the latter taking the place of the first. (3) According to Matthew, Jesus represents His future Church as a community separated from the Jewish nation and open to non-Israelites, which comes into independent existence immediately after His rejection by the Jewish authorities (xxi. 40-43; above, p. 550 ff.). (4) Only a part of this Church is to be found in Judea at the time of the parousia (xxiv. 16); others are scattered among the Gentile nations of the world (xxiv. 9, 31). One who, with the fullest recognition of Israel's prior claim upon its Messiah, repeatedly noticed the call of the Gentiles to salvation and the universal significance of Christ and His Church (ii. 1-12, iii. 9, iv. 24, v. 13-16, viii. 11, 12, x. 18, xii. 18-21, xiii. 31-33, 38, xxii. 7-14, xxiv. 14, 31, xxv. 32, xxvi. 13, xxviii. 19), certainly did not look askance at the mission to the Gentiles which was undertaken before the fall of Jerusalem and independently of the twelve apostles of the twelve tribes of Israel. He found in it no violation of a single command or prohibition of Christ's which he reported, and no unfaithfulness, furthermore, to Jesus' example. For Jesus marvelled at the faith of a Gentile man and a Gentile woman (viii. 10, xv. 28), granted His assistance to them both; and though He in neither case permitted the great faith which He found among Gentiles to draw Him away from Israel and His primary calling, He did not conceal from the Canaanitish woman that after the children were satisfied the dogs should have their turn. It is the more impossible to find a contradiction between the two narratives if one recognises what Fritzsche pointed out as long ago as 1826 (Comm. in Mt. p. 311), that ἐγὼ ἐλθὼν θεραπεύσω αὐτόν, viii. 7, is to be taken interrogatively (cf. ZKom. Matt. 335). Astonished at the implied request of the centurion, and hesitating to comply with it, Jesus asks, "I am to come and heal him?" Only so can we understand the emphatic ἐγὼ and the centurion's second remark. He divined the Jew's hesitation to enter a Gentile house (cf. Luke vii. 3 ff.), and, by the opposition it at first met from Jesus, his faith was roused to unexpected earnestness, to which Jesus yielded in this instance as in xv. 28.

2. (P. 572.) Whereas Colani, Jésus-Christ et les Croquances Messianiques de son Temps, 1864, p. 201 ff., explained the whole eschatological discourse (Matt. xxiv., Mark xiii.) as an apocalypse from the later apostolic period, Weizsäcker, Unters. d. ev. Gesch. 124 ff., would find in Matt. xxiv. 6 ff. and Mark xiii. 7 ff. a Jewish apocalypse under the name of Enoch, referred to also in Barn. iv., and dating from the time immediately before the destruction of Jerusalem, just as he considers also that Luke xi. 49 (= Matt. xxiii. 34) points to the use of a Jewish writing. It follows next from this that there is nothing to be said for the Petrine origin of Mark (127), and—though not on this account alone, to be sure—that Matt. was not written till soon after 70 (201 ff.). Similar conjectures, which cannot be supported at any point by valid proofs, were put forward by Renan, L'Antéchrist, 3me ed. pp. 289-300.

3. (P. 572.) Eus. H. E. iii. 5. 3. After the death of the bishop, James, and the expulsion of the apostles from Judea, and before the outbreak of the Jewish war, the Jerusalem Church removed to Pella in Perea, in accordance with the revelation made to its leading members (κατά τινὰ χρησμένον τοῖς αὐτοῖσι δοκίμοις ὡς ἀποκαλύψεως ἐκδοθέντα). Epiphanius, de Mens. xv: ἡρίκα γὰρ ἔαλλεν ἡ πόλις ἀλίσσασθαι ὑπὸ τῶν Ῥωμαίων καὶ ἐρημονοῦναι, προσχρηματίσθισαν ὑπὸ ἀγγέλου πάντες οἱ μαθηταὶ μετασθῆναι ἀπὸ τῆς πόλεως, μελλούσης ἄρῃν ἀπόλλυσθαι· οὕτως μετανάσται γινόμενοι ὤκησαν ἐν Πέλλῃ κτλ. (cf. Hier.

xxix. 7, xxx. 2). These accounts probably go back to Hegesippus, cf. Forsch. vi. 269 f. The time was the year 66 at the earliest, 69 at the latest. Josephus (Bell. ii. 20. 1, iv. 6. 3; Ant. xx. 11. 1) also says that many Jews fled from Jerusalem for fear of Zealot rule and of siege; and in Bell. iv. 6. 3 end, vi. 5. 3, tells of prophecies old and new announcing the city's fall.

4. (P. 573.) It is needless to say that under certain circumstances πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου = עבר הירדן can denote the west side of the Jordan, namely, when it is clear from the connection of a narrative, or from an express statement, that the speaker's standpoint is east of the Jordan (Deut. iii. 25). But it is just this condition which Matt. xix. 1 does not present. The term can be understood, therefore, only in its invariable, technically geographical sense, a fully established usage in the N.T. period, especially where two other sections of the Holy Land are mentioned at the same time; cf. Mishnah, Baba Bathra iii. 2; Shebi'ith ix. 2, יְהוּדָה וְעֵבֶר הַיַּרְדֵּן וְהַגָּלִילִי. So Pliny, H. N. v. 14. 70, Perea along with Galilee and religiosa Judaea, from which Perea is separated by the Jordan. In Josephus, regularly ἡ Περαια, Bell. i. 30. 3, iii. 3. 3, and less frequently ἡ πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου, Ant. xii. 4. 9 end. So, also, unquestionably the substantive adverbial phrase Matt. iv. 25 (iv. 15) and the simple adverbial phrase everywhere in those Gospels which were written neither east nor west of the Jordan (Mark iii. 8, x. 1; John i. 28, iii. 26, x. 40). The idea that Matt. departed here from his own usage and set πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου as an attribute to τὰ ὅρια τῆς Ἰουδαίας, thereby indicating his east-of-the-Jordan standpoint, is to be dismissed for this further reason also, that he nowhere else found it necessary to give his Palestinian readers such information with regard to the divisions of the country. Again, it would be impossible to speak of a part of Judea as situated across the Jordan, for this would require the article before πέραν, and would be an incomprehensible error, not to be explained by Ptolem. Geogr. v. 16. 9. Ptolemy did not know the term Perea at all, but divided Palestine, or Judea in the wider sense (v. 9. 1), exclusive of the coast towns (§ 2), into the districts of Galilee, Samaria, Judea (including Perea), and Idumea. Everyone knows that designations of locality with εἰς by no means denote invariably the place into which, but very often the point toward which the motion is directed (Matt. xvi. 21, xvii. 27, xx. 17, xxi. 1), and everyone might know that in such connections ἐρχεσθαι means "go" as well as "come" (cf. Matt. xvi. 5, and above, p. 505, n. 7). What Matthew says, then, is this: Jesus left Galilee and journeyed to Judea (choosing of the two possible routes the one) east of the Jordan. Mark x. 1 means the same thing, but expresses it still more clumsily, mentioning first the main goal of the journey, and then connecting the nearer and less important objective with the other by means of καί ("and, indeed, first of all").

5. (P. 573.) Acting upon a suggestion of Grotius (i. 454) with regard to Matt. xxiii. 35 (already Lightfoot, Opp., ed. Rotterdam, 1686, ii. 361, had rejected this view which had been widely accepted), many even down to the present time have ventured the assertion that the author or redactor or translator of Matt. made the Zachariah here intended—the son of Jehoiada (2 Chron. xxiv. 20–22), as he is correctly called in the corresponding passage in the Gospel of the Hebrews (Jerome in Matt. xxiii. 35, Vall. vii. 190; cf. GK, ii. 695)—into a son of Baruchiah, in order to identify him with the Zachariah who, according to Jos. Bell. iv. 5. 4, was murdered by the Zealots. This is attributing a senseless piece of folly to the editor, who must have said to himself that at most Jesus might have foretold this deed. The name of the father of that Zachariah, mentioned by Josephus, is very uncertainly reported. Niese writes it Βάρεις, and we find besides, Βαρισκαίου and Βαρούχου, but not Βαραχίου. The scene of the event is given merely as ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ ἱεροῦ. The designation of the place in Matt. xxiii. 35 points to 2 Chron. xxiv. 21 (LXX, ἐν αὐτῇ οἴκῳ κυρίου). The martyr death of a righteous man and a prophet, recorded in the last historical book of the O.T., corresponds with the murder of Abel reported in its first book; cf. Gen. iv. 10 with 2 Chron. xxiv. 22. The mistake of our Matt. in calling him the son of Barachiah is due to a confusion of the martyr of 2 Chron. xxiv. 20 ff. with the prophet Zechariah, i. 1 (cf. Isa. viii. 2?; 2 Chron. xxvi. 5?) as it also appears in the Targum to Lam. ii. 20; cf. ZKom. Matt. 649; Lightfoot, ii. 362; and concerning other instances of confusion in respect of these persons, Fürst, Kanon des AT's, S. 44; Hamburger, RE, i. 887. For the fable identifying the Zachariah of Matt. xxiii. 35 with that of Luke i. 5 ff. (Protev. of James, xxiii. xxiv.), cf. GK, ii. 695, 711 f., 776 f. Berendts, Studien über Zacharias-apokryphen u. Zachariaslegenden, 1895, gives a more detailed account, not all of which, however, is beyond dispute.

6. (P. 573.) F. L. Sieffert, Ueber den Ursprung des ersten kanon. Ev. 1832, and M. Schneckenburger under the same title, 1834, have already stated with measurable fulness what seems to weigh against the apostolic authorship of Matt. Mistakes with regard to the political history, at points where it comes in contact with the Gospel story, would not furnish sufficient ground for assuming that the author must have been somewhat widely removed in time or place from the events recorded. The historical trustworthiness of the narratives in Matt. ii. 1-18, xvii. 1-13 (cf. Mark ix. 2-10; 2 Pet. i. 16-18), xvii. 24-27, xxvii. 51-53, xxviii. 11-15, cannot be investigated here. It is unthinkable that a Christian in Palestine should have invented the Jewish explanation of Jesus' resurrection (xxviii. 15) and the Jewish insinuations to which he replies in chaps. i. ii.; and it will be impossible also to discover any middle ground between the Jewish and the Christian estimate of the beginning and the close of Jesus' life. If the word βασιλεύς is used of Archelaus in ii. 22, although he had simply the rank of ethnarch and the royal title in expectation only (Jos. Ant. xvii. 11. 4; Bell. ii. 6. 3), Josephus himself, notwithstanding that he is the source of this very information, does the same thing (Vita, 1); in fact, he calls him βασιλεύς outright, Ant. xviii. 4. 3; cf. above, p. 503, n. 3. If the name Philip were authentic in Matt. xiv. 3, we should have there the same confusion with another brother of Herod Antipas named Herod that actually occurs in Mark vi. 17 (cf. Schürer, i. 435 [Eng. transl. i. 401 f.]); but it is most improbable that the MSS. (D and important Latin witnesses) which left the name unquestioned in Mark vi. 17 should have erased it in Matt. xiv. 3 for reasons of historical erudition. Rather have they preserved the original, while the great body of MSS. and versions (also Ss) have interpolated the mistaken name here (and many of them in Luke iii. 19 also) from Mark vi. 17. Mark alone is open to the charge of being somewhat less familiar than Josephus with the complicated relationships and scandals of the Herodian family. Matt. xvii. 24-27 is intelligible only in a work written before the year 70, see above, p. 552 f. The gist of the narrative in xxvii. 51-53 is confirmed by the statements of two Jewish contemporaries of Matthew, independent of each other and of him; cf. the writer's article, "Der zerrissene Tempelvorhang," NKZ, 1902, S. 729-756. It has been argued against the authenticity of Matt. xxviii. 19 and against the apostolic authorship of the first Gospel, that according to Acts ii. 38, viii. 16, x. 48, xix. 5, cf. 1 Cor. i. 13-15, vi. 11, believers in the early apostolic times were baptized into or in the name of Christ, not into the name of the Father, Son, and Spirit. But these passages do not give a formula used in Church baptism any more than Gal. iii. 27 or Rom. vi. 3 (cf. 1 Cor. x. 2, xii. 13), and, on the other hand, in Matt. xxviii. 19 the use of the threefold name in administering baptism is not commanded. In the Didache we find a reference to Christians as οἱ βαπτισθέντες εἰς ὄνομα κυρίου (ix. 5) along with the trinitarian formula (vii. 1, 3). Why should the occurrence of this phrase of the Didache in the time of Paul or Acts disprove the use of the trinitarian formula, or its origin from a saying of Jesus in reference to baptism? That arbitrary assumption deprives us of an explanation for the other trinitarian formulas in the N.T. (2 Cor. xiii. 13 [Eng. 14]; Rev. i. 4 f.). Nor is it strange (cf. John xvii. 3) that precisely in such a formula as this Jesus should have spoken of Himself thus objectively as the Son without qualification (cf. Matt. xi. 27). Against the attempt of Conybeare, ZfNTTh, S. 275 ff., to prove that the trinitarian formula is a late interpolation in the text of Matt. xxviii. 19, cf. ZKom. Matt. 713.

7. (P. 576.) Such sentences as xix. 1-3, καὶ ἐγένετο, ὅτε . . . μετῆρην . . . καὶ ἦλθεν . . . καὶ ἡκολούθησαν . . . καὶ ἐθεράπευσεν . . . καὶ προσ-ἦλθον, are not common in Matt. According to the Concordance, the use of δέ is about as frequent as in Luke, and twice as frequent as in Mark, and μέν—δέ considerably more common than in Luke, and decidedly more so than in Mark. It is quite noteworthy that the asyndetic use of λέγει, λέγουσιν, so frequent all through John, does not occur at all in Matt. i.-xviii. (for in viii. 7, as also in viii. 4, 20, 26, ix. 9, καὶ λέγει has quite the preponderance of evidence), whereas it is found in rapid succession in xix. 7, 8, 10, 20, 21 (ἐφη), xx. 7 (twice), 23, 33, xxi. 31 (twice), 41, xxii. 21, 43; also in xxvi. 25, 64, xxvii. 22. The construction and order, ἐγερθεῖς δέ Ἰωσήφ . . . ἐποίησεν, occurs repeatedly, i. 24, ii. 3, viii. 8, 10, 14, 18, etc. (cf. Gersdorf, Beiträge zur Sprachcharakteristik, 90 f.); also without mentioning the subject by name, ii. 10-12, 22, iv. 12, 18, v. 1, and in other cases than the nominative, καταβάντι δέ αὐτῷ . . . ἡκολούθησαν αὐτῷ, viii. 1, 23; εἰσελθόντος δέ αὐτοῦ . . . προσ-ἦλθεν αὐτῷ, viii. 5, 28. Cases of the genitives absolute followed by ἰδοὺ are not infrequent, i. 20, ii. 1, 13, 19, ix. 10, 18, 32, xii. 46, xvii. 5, xxviii. 11, and it is noticeable that the formula occurs repeatedly in some passages and then again is quite absent. The commonest formula for the continuation of the narrative is τότε, which is used in Matt. some ninety times in all. This usage is quite unknown to Mark, nor is it exactly paralleled in Luke and John, for in Luke xi. 26, xiv. 21, xxi. 10, xxiv. 15, τότε signifies "at that moment," immediately after the occurrence of what has just been related, i.e. in reality, "thereupon"; so also τότε οὖν in John xix. 1, 16, xx. 8. Matt. also, to be sure, uses the word sometimes to denote immediate sequence, ii. 7, 16, iii. 15, iv. 1, 5, 10, 11, ix. 6, 14, but very often, also, as an indefinite term for approximate correspondence in time, where there is no single preceding incident which leads up to the account that follows, iii. 5, 13, xii. 22, xv. 1, xx. 20, xxiii. 1, xxvi. 3, 14, so that the phrase does not differ appreciably from ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ, xi. 25, xii. 1, xiv. 1. This latter expression, which is not found elsewhere in the N.T. (cf., however, Acts xii. 1), is confined in Matt. itself within narrow limits. Semitic scholars may decide whether the Aramaic ḥay, with and without ḥ or ḥ, does not after all underlie τότε and ἀπὸ τότε (iv. 17, xvi. 21, xxvi. 16; elsewhere in the N.T. only Luke xvi. 16), as in the LXX, for example, Ezra v. 16; cf. Dalman, *Gr.*² S. 213 (different from Ite Aufl. S. 169) and the lexicons under ḥay, ḥay. The participial constructions just mentioned give the style a more pleasing effect as compared with that of Mark, but may also create the impression of a closer connection in time and occurrence than was intended by the original. If in viii. 5, 14, xii. 9, for example, the narrative were carried forward simply in independent clauses connected by καί, as in xix. 1-3, it would not seem that the last incident related was immediately connected with that mentioned just before, or even fell on the same day.

8. (P. 577.) With regard to Hosanna and the root ḥsh see vol. i. 21. Delitzsch translates Matt. i. 21, ḥsh ḥsh ḥsh. Cf. the explanation of the change of name Hoshea-Joshua, Num. xiii. 16, in Sota, 34^b (ḥsh ḥsh), and also in the Midrash on the passage (translated by Wünsche, S. 418). Cf. still other passages in Jastrow, 601^b, 751^b. The fact that in the Talmud the name of Jesus of Nazareth is constantly given in the mutilated form ḥsh, while others of the same name are always written ḥsh, serves to mar that καλὸν ὄνομα (Jas. ii. 7) whose literal meaning was understood by every Jew; cf. ZKom. Matt. 76, A. 48, 49.

9. (Pp. 577, 578.) Matthew contents himself with the Greek term where Mark has attached it as a translation to the Aramaic original; Matt. xv. 5, cf. Mark vii. 11; Matt. xxvi. 39, cf. Mark xiv. 36. Mark vii. 34 has no parallel in Matt., and Matt. ix. 25 corresponds but partially to Mark v. 41. Here, too, we note that Matt. uses ὁ διάβολος, iv. 1, 5, 8, 11, xiii. 39, xxv. 41; ὁ πειράζων, iv. 3; ὁ πονηρός, xiii. 19, 38, where Mark in the parallel passages, so far as there are such, has ῥατανᾶς, i. 13, iv. 15. Inconsistently, the latter appears also in Matt. xii. 26, xvi. 23. In this case the Greek translation was not needed. On the other hand, the necessary Greek interpretations, which cannot have been found in the original, are introduced in Matt. xxvii. 46 just as in Mark xv. 34. Perhaps also xxvii. 33=Mark xv. 22. The explanation in i. 23 might also be an addition by the Greek translator, although the corresponding statement may equally well have stood in the Aramaic original, since Immanuel was a Hebrew name whose Aramaic interpretation would not sound absolutely tautological. The name of the city Jerusalem must also be mentioned here. Like Strabo, pp. 759-762; Ptolem. v. 16. 8, viii. 20. 18; Josephus, Tacitus, and others, Mark (ten times—also xi. 1) and John (twelve times) use only (τὰ) Ἱερουσόλυμα, and never Ἱερουσαλήμ. The latter genuinely national form, which seemed to Aristotle (in Jos. c. Apion. i. 22. 7) an ὄνομα πᾶσι σκολιόν, is used by Paul, Gal. iv. 25, 26, in elevated theological discourse, alongside of the Hellenised form in the simple narrative, Gal. i. 17, 18, ii. 1. Similar is the use of -λημ in Rev. along with -λυμα in John. In the discourses of Jesus and others, Luke writes always -λημ (xiii. 33, 34, xxiii. 28, xxiv. 18, 47; also certainly xviii. 31), and so also in Acts, with the exception of Paul's addresses before a Gentile audience in Caesarea, xxv. 15, 24, xxvi. 4, 10, 20. It should be noted in this connection that in Mark the name does not occur in a discourse of Jesus and in John only once (iv. 21), and that with Luke, as with Paul, -λημ is much commoner than -λυμα, the latter occurring in Luke only four times, and -λημ twenty-six or twenty-seven times, and irregularly interchanged (cf. Luke ii. 22, 43, xix. 11, 28). Matt., on the other hand, has ἱεροσόλυμα throughout (eleven times, including words of Jesus, v. 35, xx. 18), except in xxiii. 37 = Luke xiii. 34, ἱεροσολήμ. Whoever traces this exception to a source used by Matthew here, but not in v. 35, xx. 18, ought also to divide Gal. between two writers, and would have to refer the alternation of terms in Luke's two books to similar causes. The real reason, however, for the change is easy to understand; even in Matt. -λημ was better suited to the solemn declaration of xxiii. 37; and, besides, in this address to a personified Jerusalem (ἡ ἀποκτείνουσα . . . τὰ τέκνα σου), the form (τὰ) ἱεροσόλυμα would have been very inconvenient rhetorically; likewise for Paul, where he represents Jerusalem as mother. The translator would not care needlessly to repeat the awkward treatment of the Greek form as a feminine singular, ii. 3 (along with neuter plural, ii. 1) and perhaps iii. 5 (where, however, πᾶσα is a spurious addition). He might have used -λημ everywhere in Jesus' discourses, as Luke did. But the Greek form is more easily declined (v. 35), and directly after xx. 17 -λημ in xx. 18 would have been forced. And, finally, what translator is ever consistent in such matters?

10. (P. 578.) The traces of Hebrew or Aramaic originals in Matt. and in the Gospels generally were investigated as early as Michaelis, Einkl. 982-1003, and Eichhorn, *Einkl.*² i. 510-530. Cf. the bibliography, vol. i. 14 f. It requires a better knowledge of the Aramaic dialect than the present writer possesses, and more caution than others have shown, to arrive at trustworthy conclusions in this matter. Merely by way of example, and without claiming originality for the observations, the following illustrations are adduced in addition to the remarks above, p. 577 ff., and in nn. 7-9, 12: (1) iii. 15, πᾶσαν δικαιοσύνην, can mean nothing else than πᾶν δικαίωμα = every legal requirement or ordinance. Now, as the LXX translates צדקה and משפט without fixed distinction by δικαιοσύνη (which stands, besides, also for צדק, צדק, Aram. ܥܕܩܐ, Dan. vi. 23, etc.), as well as by δικαίωμα (which also represents צד, צדק, etc.), it would seem that משפט, or rather one of its Aramaic equivalents, underlay Matt. iii. 15. As such equivalents we may mention ܥܕܩܐ, Targ. Onk. Ex. xxi. 1, 31; Num. xv. 16; Deut. vii. 11, 12; also Targ. 1 Sam. viii. 3; Isa. xlii. 1, 2 (LXX and Matt. xii. 18, 20, κρίσις), or נפוסא (νόμος), 1 Sam. ii. 13, viii. 9, 11; Ezek. xx. 25; especially, however, הלכות, Onk. Ec. xxi. 9. (2) Since δικαιοσύνη in the LXX not infrequently stands for אמת (Redpath's Concordance gives seven instances), to which קשט, קשטא corresponds in Aramaic, the phrase ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης, xxi. 32, which is unnatural as Greek, and unusual in conception as well, is to be explained as a literal translation of קשט באמת, Onk. Gen. xxiv. 48 (LXX, ἐν ὁδῷ ἀληθείας); cf. Matt. xxi. 16; but cf. also Prov. viii. 20 in original, Targ., and LXX. (3) Since קרא and קראא, like the Syr. ܩܪܐ also, acquired the meaning of charity, alms, which led even the LXX to translate the first-named nine or ten times by ἐλεημοσύνη (cf. also Clem. Strom. vii. 69, ἡ ἔξις ἡ παρ' ἡμῶν μεταδοτικὴ δικαιοσύνη λέγεται, and Acts x. 2 with x. 35), we have constantly to consider whether δικαιοσύνην (vi. 1), if it is the true reading, may not represent this Aramaic word in the sense of ἐλεημοσύνην, and whether the very early variants of this saying do not finally go back to the time when the Aramaic Matt. was still translated orally in these various ways: S*BD Ss (this latter, also, distinguishing clearly between vi. 1 and vi. 2), τὴν δικαιοσύνην ὑμῶν. See "your gifts," cf. Ephr. in Epist. Pauli, p. 74, donu vestra; S^a τὴν δόσιν ὑμῶν, S^l and the later Greek authorities, τὴν ἐλεημοσύνην ὑμῶν. (4) In Aramaic, ܫܪܕܝܐ means servant; ܫܪܕܝܐ (ܫܪܕܝܐ, ܫܪܕܝܐ, ܫܪܕܝܐ fem.), work, act. Consequently the Syriac translator of Clem. 1 Cor. xxxix., or one of his copyists, has rendered ܫܪܕܝܐ by ἔργων instead of παίδων (Lightfoot, St. Clement, i. 138, ii. 119). Lagarde, in his Agathangelos (Abh. der gött. Ak. 1889, xxxv. 128), commenting upon the variants, Matt. xi. 19, ἔργων; Luke vii. 35, τέκνων, recalls Orig. Hom. xiv. 5 in Jerem. (Delarue, iii. 211; an earlier commentator, he says, understood by the "mother" in Jer. xv. 10, Wisdom, τὰ δὲ τέκνα τῆς σοφίας καὶ ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ ἀναγέγραπται "καὶ ἀποστέλλει ἡ σοφία τὰ τέκνα αὐτῆς," cf. Luke xi. 49). If ἔργων is the original reading in Matt. xi. 19, it is then the correct rendering of the Aramaic word spoken by Jesus (see ZKom. Matt. 431 f. in contradiction of the 1st and 2nd editions of the Einleitung). Luke, or rather the earliest authority for the tradition, which Luke followed, heard and spoke abdeh (your servants), instead of abadeh (your works). He thought of wisdom as a person; cf. Luke xi. 49, and found in this passage the children of the divine wisdom contrasted with the capricious children of that generation. Instead of the more exact παῖδες (servants, cf. Matt. xiv. 2; Luke i. 54, xii. 45), he chose τέκνα, having in mind, doubtless, such Wisdom passages as Prov. i. 8, ii. 1, xxxi. 2; Sir. ii. 1. He might equally well have said νιοί (cf. John xii. 36 with Eph. v. 8). (5) If the Gospel of the Hebrews has preserved the original form of the fourth petition of the Lord's Prayer as it was offered from the beginning by Aramaic-speaking Christians (Lat. "panem nostrum crastinum da nobis hodie," GK, ii. 693, 709 f., recently confirmed anew, Anecd. Maredsol. iii. 2. 262), we have a substantially correct translation of it in Matt. vi. 11; ἐπιούσιος is derived from ἡ ἐπιούσα, sc. ἡμέρα. But Matthew's phrase is not a natural one, for the proper antithesis to σήμερον is αὔριον, not ἡ ἐπιούσα. The latter denotes the day next following, as reckoned from whatever day may have been previously mentioned (Acts xvi. 11, xx. 15, xxi. 18; cf. vii. 26, xxiii. 11). Hence it is approximately used in Luke xi. 3 in contrast with τὸ καθ' ἡμέραν, but inappropriately by Matthew, who might more properly have written τὸν τῆς αὔριου or αἰς τὴν αὔριον instead of τὸν ἐπιούσιον. Observe that Greek, like German (and English), has no proper equivalent for crastinus (but cf. Pape under aὔριος, and Heyne, Deutsche Wörterbuch, ii. 867, under "morgend"). Cf. ZKom. Matt. 275 ff. The wording of the Greek Matt. can be explained only on the supposition that the translation was influenced, not directly by the Gospel of Luke, but by the Church usage of those regions where the Lord's Prayer was customarily spoken in the form which Luke has preserved. Here, then, we have strong evidence that our Greek Matt. is (a) a translation; (b) a translation made in the Greek Gentile Church; (c) a translation not always felicitous, but in its intent exceedingly faithful. It has not sub stituted traditions of a later time or other localities for the original, but has translated the Lord's Prayer just as the Jewish Christians said it in Jerusalem, Kokaba, or Berea about 60-70 A.D., and even down to about 400. (6) The saying, Matt. v. 34-37, yields no other meaning than: "Instead of using all manner of oaths, let your speech be confined to a double Yea or Nay." One might compare the reduplicated ἀμήν of Jesus Himself in the Fourth Gospel, and the vai, amēn of Rev. i. 7, cf. xxii. 20. It would be less strange that Christians should thus emphasise their affirmations and denials than that, in spite of the Sermon on the Mount, they should take oaths and, as in Paul's case, use other strong forms of assertion as well; yet it is hardly thinkable that, in the very connection where he declared all περισσόν in the attestation of truth to be a consequence of evil, and therefore unworthy of the sons of God, Jesus should have recommended a reduplication of the Yea and Nay which in itself is needless. If we compare the saying in Jas. v. 12 (which can hardly be independent of Matt. v. 37, if the latter really originated with Jesus) and other citations of Jesus' words which correspond with Jas. v. 12 (Just. Apol. i. 16; Clem. Strom. v. 99 [al. 100], vii. 67; Clem. Hom. xix. 2; Epiph. Har. xix. 6), we must give the preference to the form ἔστω ὑμῶν τὸ ναὶ ναὶ, καὶ τὸ οὐ οὐ. This seems the more certain, since it accords with an actual Jewish idiom. Jesus had cited Lev. xix. 12; on Lev. xix. 36 the Talmud (Baba Mezia, 49a) makes the exegetically impossible comment, "That thy yea may be a true (yea) and thy nay a true (nay)." Cf. Midrash on Ruth iii. 18 (Wünsche's trans. S. 53), and several similar passages in Levy, i. 465; Jastrow, 348, 365, under ין, ין=yes. Jesus doubtless said נא, cf. Levy i. 67; Dalman, *Gr.*² 223; also Paul, the Pharisee, assumes in 2 Cor. i. 17-20 that the yea must be a real yea, and not nay at the same time. The original of Matt. v. 37 need not have been absolutely identical with the original of Jas. v. 12; ὁ λόγος ὑμῶν suggests some such form as "let your yea-saying be a yea," etc. Jas. v. 12 may have had an influence in spreading the uncanonical form of the saying (GK, i. 323, A. 2). But we must reckon also here with the possibility that forms of much-quoted sayings which date from the time of the oral translation of Matt. were preserved in Church use till Justin's time or beyond it. (7) With regard to the use of participles in the N.T., it must always be remembered that in Aramaic, as in Hebrew, these forms are entirely timeless. A noteworthy example is Matt. v. 10, where the context makes it impossible that those should be called blessed who have survived a persecution, so that δεδιωγμένοι stands for διωκόμενοι. Polycarp (baptized in 69), who writes the latter form (ad Phil. ii.), might have heard in his youth some interpreter who did his work better than the Greek Matt. Perhaps a participle underlies the ἄρτι ἐτελεύτησεν of ix. 18, which Luke's character rendered more satisfactorily by the imperfect ἀπέθνησκεν (viii. 42); cf. Matt. v. 23. We might point also to ζητούντες for ζητήσαντες, ii. 20, and the uncertain interchange of παραδοῖς and παραδιδούς, x. 4, xxvi. 25, 46, xxvii. 3, 4. If the very common use of the participial constructions (see above, n. 7) seems on superficial observation to give to the style of Matthew a more distinctively Greek impress, in comparison with the stronger Hebraistic character of Mark and also John, then the hand of a translator, who seeks to avoid the monotony of the Semitic narrative style by employing the correct Greek expression, is betrayed in the immoderate use of this construction in the resultant awkwardness of expression (concerning xiv. 6, see ZKom. Matt 504, A. 79), and in the consequent obscuring of the facts. In ὁψὲ σαββάτων, xxviii. 1, which appears strange to us, Eus. Quest. ad Marin (Mai, Nova Patr. Bibl. iv. 1. 255 ff.), and Jerome, Epist. cxx. 4 ad Hedib., think they have discovered a mistake of the translator; but it corresponds to later Greek usage (cf. ZKom. Matt. 710, A. 1). For possible Hebrew or Aramaic equivalents, cf. Lightfoot, Opp. ii. 389; on the other hand, however, Dalman, *Gr.*¹ 197, and positively *Gr.*² 247.

11. (Pp. 579, 580.) As to the pardonable error in xxiii. 35, see above, p. 589, n. 5. Matt. ii. 23 is not an error on the part of the evangelist (see above, p. 568, n. 7). The Gospel of the Hebrews, or, as Jerome calls it in Vir. Ill. iii. and elsewhere, the ipsium Hebraicum of Matt., also contained the words quoniam Nazaraeus vocabitur, and, as one must infer from Jerome's silence in the passage where this is mentioned, introduced the alleged citation with no different formula. The learned but mistaken conjecture of certain Hebrew Christians, whose guidance Jerome followed (Comm. in Jes. xi. 1, Vallarsi, iv. 155; cf. Comm. in Mt. ii. 23, Vall. vii. 17), that the passage presents a citation from Isa. xi. 1, is not to be imputed to the redactor of the Gospel of the Hebrews some 250 years earlier. There is a mistake in Matt. xiii. 35, in that Ps. lxxviii. 2 (entitled a psalm of Asaph) is cited as τὸ ῥηθὲν διὰ Ἡσαΐου τοῦ προφήτου. The genuineness of Ἡσαΐου (wrongly placed in Tisch. ed. 8) is attested by *ℵ min. 1, 13, 124 (these two belonging to the Ferrar group), 33, 253; and, further, many MSS. seen by Eusebius (Montf. Coll. nova, i. 462) and Jerome (in Mt. xiii. 35, Vall. vii. 94), and especially by its offensiveness, which would be the more keenly felt because Porphyry had made use of it to prove Matthew's ignorance (as shown by the Breviar. in Psalmos under Jerome's name, which is now proved to be genuine in this portion; see Anecd. Maredsol. iii. 2. 60). When Eus. loc. cit. maintains that in the accurate MSS., and Jerome in Mt. that in the vulgata editio, the name Isaiah is wanting, it only indicates the early date of the emendation, which is apparent also from its wide attestation (add Ss, Sc, and Clem. Hom. xviii. 15). Jerome conjectured (Comm. in Mt.) that "Asaph" was originally written, then exchanged by an early copyist for the better known name of the prophet Isaiah, and finally that the mistaken emendation was set aside again by the deletion of the name. This supposition is valueless, but still it is better than the bold assertion in Breviar. p. 59 f., that all the old MSS. of Matt. read in Asaph propheta, which was altered by stupid persons. Since Jerome nowhere appeals to the Gospel of the Hebrews to establish the original text of Matt. xiii. 35, we must infer that the error was found there also, and, furthermore, that the reading which in substance is incorrect was the original one. The same is true of Matt. xxvii. 9, where one would look for a reference to Zechariah rather than to Jeremiah. If the former had appeared in the Gospel of the Hebrews, it would be hard to explain not only the silence of those familiar with that book, who discussed the problem of Matt. xxvii. 9, namely, Orig. Comm. in Mt. (Lat.), Delarue, iii. 916; Eus. Demonstr. x. 4. 13; Jerome in Mt. p. 228; Breviar. p. 60 f., but especially the appearance of an apocryphal Hebrew or Aramaic Book of Jeremiah, containing word for word the quotation which is not to be found in the canonical Jer. Because the Gospel of the Hebrews also assigned the words in Matt. xxvii. 9 to Jeremiah, the Nazarenes fabricated the apocryphal book, or booklet, which they showed to Jerome; cf. his Comm. in Mt. xxvii. 9, and GK, ii. 696f. The only instance in which the Gospel of the Hebrews evidently corrects a mistake due to imperfect knowledge of the O.T. is Matt. xxiii. 35; see above, p. 589, n. 5; GK, ii. 711f. The incorrect forms of the names in i. 5, 7, 8 (see following note) are due probably to the translator, not to the author.

12. (P. 579.) Eusebius (on Ps. lxxviii.—cf. above, p. 528) explained the variation of citations in Matt. from the text of the LXX on the ground that the Hebrew Matthew made use of the Hebrew O.T. Jerome's opinion was that both Matthew and John in their Gospels quoted directly from the Hebrew original without reference to the LXX (Comm. in Osee xi. 1; in Isaiam vi. 9, ix. 1; Prol. in Pentat., Vall. iv. 97, 128, vi. 123, ix. 3), and he appealed in proof of his opinion to the supposed Hebrew original of Matt. in the library at Caesarea, i.e. to the Gospel of the Hebrews (Vir. Ill. iii.; cf. GK, ii. 697f.). The view to which exception is taken on p. 579 was first developed by Bleek, Beiträge zur Evangelienkritik, 1846, S. 57f. Since then the matter has been repeatedly discussed without convincing results. Anger, "Ratio qua loci VTi in ev. Matt. laudantur, quid valeat ad illustrandam huius ev. originem," parts i.—iii., Leipziger Programme of 1861 and 1862, collated the material most thoroughly. The hypothesis defended by Böhl (Forschungen nach einer Volksbibel zur Zeit Jesu, 1873; cf. his Atl Citate im NT, 1878), that in Jesus's time there was an Aramaic translation of the O.T. dependent on the Greek LXX, and that this was used by Jesus and the apostles (by the latter in conjunction with the LXX), would have thrown everything into confusion, if anyone had accepted it. The comparison of Matthew's quotations with the LXX is made more difficult by the fact that in those MSS. of the latter which were transcribed by Christian hands, especially the Cod. Alex., the O.T. text has frequently been altered to correspond with the wording of the citation in the N.T. Moreover, also, the text of the citations in Matt. is in many passages by no means certain. It remains to be proved whether it be allowed, as the present writer has sought to prove in detail (ZKom. Matt. 474 ff.), that the citation in xiii. 14b–15 originally consisted only of the words: πάχυνε τὴν καρδίαν τοῦ λαοῦ τούτου καὶ τὰ ὄτα αὐτῶν βάρυνε καὶ τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς αὐτῶν κάμυνε, or that the incorrect forms of the names Ιωβηδ (for Ωβηδ), i. 5, Αβιουδ (Αβια), i. 7, Ασαφ (Ασα), i. 7 f., Αμωρ (Αμων), i. 10, were original in the Greek Matt. (see ZKom. Matt. 57–61). The familiarity of the one, who gave Matt. its present Greek form, with the LXX is very evident. Just as clear, however, is his relation to the Hebrew text of the O.T.—a relation which was not brought about by the LXX or by any other known Greek translation whatsoever. This double relation, which can be accurately determined in a single instance, is also on that account an extremely complicated task, since Matthew gives many and especially the more extended citations with great freedom, in order to make the text serve the purpose of its use, for example, ii. 6, iv. 15 f., xi. 10, xii. 18–21, xiii. 14–15 (see above), xxii. 24, xxvi. 31, xxvii. 9. The erroneous reference of the citation in xiii. 35 to Isaiah instead of to Asaph—the composer of Ps. lxxviii.—as of that in xxvii. 9 to Jeremiah instead of to Zechariah (see above, No. 11), proves that the author, at least in these cases, had consulted neither a Greek nor a Hebrew Bible, but had trusted his memory. Accordingly, it is probable that in many other, if not in all instances, the author's memory of Bible passages, frequently heard or read, was the source of his citations. The present writer feels that he must here forego a complete presentation of the list of citations, and a comparison of them with the Hebrew text, the LXX, and the Targum, as he gave in the first and second editions of his Einleitung. A specific difference in respect of their relation to the original text and to the LXX cannot be shown between those citations through which the author desires to prove the agreement of prophecy with fulfilment (Class A), and the citations given in the sayings of Jesus and other persons (Class B). To Class A belong, in their contents, i. 23 and ii. 5, although, according to their form, an angel speaks in i. 23, and the Sanhedrin in ii. 5. Translations, made independently of the LXX from the Hebrew, or an Aramaic original, are found not only in Class A (ii. 15, viii. 17, xxvii. 9), but also in Class B (xi. 10, xxvi. 31; cf. also x. 36=Mic. vii. 6); furthermore, clear traces of a consideration of a Hebrew or Aramaic text appear in Class A (ii. 5, 18, xii. 18-20, xiii. 35); but also in Class B (xi. 29=Jer. vi. 16; and in the order of the Decalogue, xix. 18, cf. v. 21, 27; ZKom. Matt. 590, A. 65). Likewise, essential dependence upon the LXX is shown in Class B (e.g. iv. 6, 7, 10), but also in Class A (i. 23, iii. 2). As translator of a Hebrew or Aramaic original, Matt. is characterised by several transcriptions of Hebrew personal names at variance with the Greek tradition; for example, Παχαβ, i. 5 (παρ=Paaβ in LXX, everywhere, and without variants, Jas. ii. 25; Heb. xi. 31; Clem. 1 Cor. xii.; in Jos. Ant. v. 1, 2, 5, 7, Paaβη, here, to be sure, with the variant reading Παχαβη). Further discussion of this subject, and consideration of the absolutely incorrect forms of names, which are possible only on the part of a translator, are to be found ZKom. Matt. 57-61. All the facts in the case are most easily explained by the presupposition, which is offered by the tradition and confirmed by a series of observations independent of it (above, pp. 573 f., 593), that our Matt. is a translation of an Aramaic writing, in which latter the O.T. citations and allusions were often given in a very free Aramaic form; and that the Greek translator was guided partly by an effort to give a true rendering of his text, and partly by his memory of the LXX, especially of the sayings most frequently used by the Christians about him, or already introduced into Greek Gospels which were known to him. He freed himself more or less from the influence of the LXX familiar to him: (1) in passages where, through dependence on it, the thought of the Aram. Matt., expressed in a free form of the citation, would be obliterated, or the purpose of the citation made of none effect; (2) where, on account of a lacking, or unclear, or incorrect statement of the source, the passage cited could not easily have been found, even if he had looked for it.

13. (P. 581.) With regard to doublets, we have first to notice that Matthew is fond of repeating the same formula like a refrain: five times, καὶ ἐγένετο ὅτε ἐτίθειεν ὁ Ἰησοῦς τοὺς λόγους ταύτους, vii. 28, xi. 1, xiii. 53, xix. 1, xxvi. 1; five or six times, ἡκούσατε ὅτι ἐρρήθη τοῖς ἀρχαίοις, v. 21, 27, (31), 33, 38, 43; the opening and conclusion of the Beatitudes with the same phrase, "for theirs is the kingdom of heaven," v. 3, 10; the repetition of the words xix. 30 and xx. 16 at the beginning and end of the parables (Mark x. 31; Luke xiii. 30—once each, but in an entirely different connection in Luke); also xxiv. 42, xxv. 13; cf., further, above, p. 567, note 6. Moreover, the repetition of a maxim, whether it be original or derived from the O.T. or from the popular proverbial philosophy, is not of itself a sign that discourses are not trustworthily recorded. As Paul repeatedly made use of such sayings in letters separated by some interval of time (Gal. v. 9=1 Cor. v. 6; 1 Cor. i. 31=2 Cor. x. 17; 1 Cor. ix. 9, 14=1 Tim. v. 18; 1 Cor. vi. 9 f.=Gal. v. 19-21), so, too, Jesus may have used quotations like that in Matt. ix. 13 and xii. 7 (without parallels), or sayings like Luke xiv. 11, xviii. 14, and in another connection, Matt. xxiii. 12, not only three but twenty times. The same applies to Matt. xiii. 12 (=Mark iv. 25) and xxv. 29, to Matt. xvii. 20 and xxi. 21 (=Mark xi. 23—Luke xvii. 6 is only related), and would apply to Matt. xx. 16b and xxii. 14 if xx. 16b were not to be omitted, with NBLZ, Orig. and the Egyptian versions; cf. ZKom. Matt. 600. As for the narrative sections, it is not in the least improbable that Matt. xii. 38-40 (=Luke xi. 29-30) and xvi. 1-4 (=Mark viii. 11-12) are different occurrences; the request for a sign came up more than once, according to other reports as well (John ii. 18, vi. 30, cf. vii. 3 f.; Mark xv. 29 f.; Matt. xxvii. 42 f.; 1 Cor. i. 22). According to Matt., the request is made by different persons in the two instances, and in the second it is more precisely defined by ἐκ τοῦ οὐρανοῦ. Only the answer is in both instances the same, if the sentences of vv. 2b-3, which are connected with the word "heaven," but are otherwise most original, are accepted. They are, to be sure, not to be considered as an interpolation from Luke xii. 54-56 because of a merely remote similarity to that passage, but rather as an early gloss, taken from a good source. Accordingly, if the narrative Mark viii. 11 ff. is to be considered more historically exact than Matt. xvi. 1-4, then the complete similarity of Matt. xii. 39 and xvi. 4 is not only a new proof of the great freedom with which Matthew shapes the discourses of Jesus, but especially also an example of his preference for the refrain (see beginning of this note). Also in content the answer of Jesus to the similar demand (John ii. 19) is related to Matt. xvi. 1-4, and in form also in so far as Jesus uses in both the enigmatic saying (Mashal). With Matt. ix. 33 f.=xii. 22 f. the case is not quite the same. Since there is no chronological connection between chap. ix. and chap. x., and between chap. xi. and chap. xii., it would not be inconceivable (so the present writer judged in the first and second edition) that Matthew should, in passing, touch upon a single event as a conclusion of the sketches, viii. 18-ix. 34 (see n. 14), which are in time very closely connected, and then, moreover, should once again narrate the same event with more precision and detail (xii. 22 f.) in a connection where it was of importance for describing the conflict with the Pharisees. The fact that in ix. 32 f. the author tells about a dumb man, and in xii. 22 about a blind man who is also dumb, gives no warrant for distinguishing the narratives; but just as little also for identifying them. If ix. 34 is to be omitted with D a k Ss, every reason for this disappears; for the words of the people, ix. 33, have nothing in common with xii. 23, and do not refer to the one deed of healing last mentioned, but to the entire chain of varied deeds and words in viii. 18-ix. 32; cf. ZKom. Matt. 385, 451 f. If the discourses Matt. v.-vii. and x. are in part free compositions of the author (above, p. 558 f., then v. 29 f. can be historically identical with xviii. 8 f., v. 32 with xix. 9, x. 38 f. with xvi. 24 f. If, furthermore, one compares the sentences x. 17-22, which do not suit the historical situation described in x. 5 (above, p. 558), with Mark xiii. 9-13 and Luke xxi. 12-19, where they are found in an historically probable connection, it can hardly be doubted that, when Matthew came to the passage (xxiv. 9-13) where these sentences historically belonged, he deliberately abbreviated them, in order not to repeat too much. There is no trace anywhere of an unconscious procedure based upon mechanical use of sources; such a procedure, also, would be inconsistent with the thoughtful care to be observed in all parts of the book and the unity of just this Gospel. The remaining instance in which it might at first be suspected that a single incident had been doubled through ignorance of the facts and dependence on two varying narratives—the feeding of the five thousand and the feeding of the four thousand—is safeguarded against such suspicion by the occurrence of the same phenomenon in Mark, and by those discourses of Jesus, reported by Matthew and Mark, which refer to both occasions (see above, p. 582).

14. (P. 584.) On the place of viii. 18-ix. 34 in the plan of the Gospel, see above, p. 545. Cf. Hofmann, "Zwei Tage des Menschensohnes," ZfPuk, xxii. (1851), S. 331 ff. Assuming the credibility of the express and careful statements of time and place in this section of Matt., the events make up a definitely ordered series, which may be extended from the accounts of Mark and Luke, but not corrected. According to Matt. xiii. 1, Jesus spoke the succeeding parables on the same day upon which the discourses and conversations of xii. 23-50 fall. The change of place, xiii. 53, with which xiii. 54 is but loosely connected, is, according to Mark iv. 35, the same crossing of the Sea of Galilee at evening with which Matt. viii. 18 opens a new section. In Luke viii. 22, also, it has no immediate connection with anything that precedes. Further, the connection of Mark ii. 1-22, Luke v. 17-39 (= Matt. ix. 1-17), with the preceding and following context, is so entirely free that it argues nothing against the concatenation of the incidents in Matt. The passage viii. 18-ix. 34, then, is an account of a single day from one evening to the next, which followed immediately the day of the events and addresses in xii. 23-xiii. 53; cf. ZKom. Matt. 344, A. 3.

15. (P. 585.) Mention has already been made (above, p. 590, n. 6) of individual instances of alleged lack of knowledge on Matthew's part. Other criticisms have been based on a misunderstanding of his presentation of the subject. It is said that Matthew did not know what we learn, indeed only from Luke i. 26, ii. 4 (cf. John i. 45), that Joseph and Mary lived in Nazareth before Jesus' birth. But there is no mention in i. 18-24 of the place of any of the events there recorded; and even the place of Christ's birth (first referred to in i. 25) is not given there, but in ii. 1, where it leads up to the questions and answers ii. 2, 4-5. It is true no narrator proceeds in this fashion, whether the clumsy compiler of a "curriculum vitae" which is to be presented to the examiners or read at a memorial service, or a master of the biographic art. But what this proves is only that Matthew had no intention of writing either a good or a poor account of Jesus' life for those who were not acquainted with it. The reader unfamiliar with the facts first discovers from ii. 23 that the Holy Family had close relations with Nazareth even before Jesus' birth. This is presupposed by the choice of Nazareth as a residence from among the many villages of Galilee; for the angels commanded only the return from Egypt to the "land of Israel." Joseph's reflection on the political situation prompted the choice of Galilee rather than Judæa, and the reason for the choice of Nazareth remains unstated. The reference to a fulfilment of prophecy is no substitute for it, for the divine counsel which is realised by the settlement in Nazareth is not announced to Joseph by man or by angel, but only by Matthew to his readers.

§ 57. THE RELATION OF MARK'S GOSPEL TO THE GOSPEL OF MATTHEW.

The oldest tradition concerning the origin of the Gospels which we have found heretofore to be a trustworthy guide shall be considered first, with reference also to the question of their relation to each other. According to the tradition, Matthew wrote before Mark, but there was no great interval intervening (above, p. 392 ff.). In this case, if one used the work of the other, it must have been Mark who employed Matthew, not, however, the Greek translation, which was made considerably later than the time when Mark composed his Gospel (above, p. 516 f.), but the Aramaic original. Of all the conjectures with regard to the relation between Mark and Matthew, only those of H. Grotius agree with the tradition (above, p. 422, n. 4). If it was possible for it to come into his possession, the Gospel of Matthew, written in his mother tongue, must have had the greatest interest for Mark, who was a native of Jerusalem. And it is inconceivable that he should have left it unread and made no use of it, if he had become acquainted with it before he had begun the composition of his own book. If the journey to Asia Minor, which Mark had in view at the time of Col. iv. 10, was made in the interval between his first residence in Rome, of which we learn in this passage and in Philem. 24, and the second sojourn there, witnessed to by 1 Pet. v. 13 and the traditions as to the origin of his Gospel (above, p. 427 f.), there is nothing in the way of supposing that this journey to the East was extended to include a visit to his native city, and it is very probable that he returned from Jerusalem, or some other point in Palestine, to Rome in company with Peter in the autumn of 63 or the spring of 64. Since the tradition gives us nothing further with reference to the date of Matthew's Gospel than that it was written earlier than Mark—which was begun at the earliest in the year 64—and that Matthew wrote his Gospel between 61 and 66; and since, moreover, nothing has appeared in either of the Gospels which proves that Matthew was composed after 61–63, or Mark before 64–70, there is no reason why Mark, on the occasion of his eastern journey in 62–63, should not have learned in Palestine of Matthew's Gospel, which had been written shortly before. He might, therefore, have brought it back with him to Rome, and have used it shortly afterwards in the composition of his own Gospel. This conjecture would be raised to probability bordering on certainty, if it should appear that Mark is dependent upon an older document, which only resembles our Matthew. But it is at least equally probable that the Greek translator of Matthew was acquainted with Mark, which had appeared in the meantime, and used it, along with other helps, in the execution of his difficult task (above, p. 575 f.). Following the tradition, it is possible and probable, from the order in which the books in question originated (Aram. Matthew, Mark, Greek Matthew), that a relation of mutual dependence exists between our Matthew and our Mark. Mark could have used the Aramaic Matthew, and the person who translated Matthew into Greek could have used Mark. The first would necessarily show itself chiefly in traces of dependence in content, the second in traces of dependence in form.

Before entering upon the discussion of details, with regard to which there has been so much dispute, and with reference to which endless strife is possible, it may be advantageous to make several general statements, some of which have been proved already, others of which are self-evident. (1) The employment of an older writing by Mark is not excluded either by the tradition concerning the relation of Mark to Peter or the special occasion and purpose of his Gospel (above, pp. 440 f., 501 f.). (2) Entire ignorance on the part of a later author regarding earlier writings dealing with the same theme is rendered improbable by the constant intercourse which, in the apostolic age, bound all parts of the Church together, and by the difficulty of constructing a history of Jesus from the oral tradition alone, which would be in any degree systematic and free from contradiction. This would have been, of course, unlikely in the case of a disciple of one of the apostles like Mark, and entirely so, if a rumour had reached him that shortly before an apostle had written a comprehensive book concerning the deeds and sayings of Jesus. (3) The number of those who believe that the extensive agreement between Matthew and Mark in single narratives and in whole series of narratives (n. 1) can be explained by the uniformity of the oral tradition, upon which both are dependent, will always be small. Comparison of Matthew with Luke proves that widely differing traditions existed together in the apostolic Church regarding the most important parts of the Gospel history. Notwithstanding the fact that the Lord's Prayer was employed in the second century in parts of the Church most widely separated—by the Aramaic-speaking Jewish Christians as well as by Marcionitic congregations and the catholic Church—certainly also frequently used as early as the apostolic age, it is reproduced in Matt. vi. 9 ff. and Luke xi. 2 ff. in two widely variant forms. The account of the institution of the Lord's Supper which was recalled to the Church by every celebration, is given very differently in Matt. xxvi. 26 ff., 1 Cor. xi. 23 ff., and in the corrected text of Luke xxii. 17–20. Further, a comparison of Matt. i. 1–17 with Luke iii. 23–38, or of Matt. v.—

vii. with Luke vi. 20-49, or Matt. xxvi. 57-68 with Luke xxii. 54, 63-71, will show the impossibility of the existence of a stereotyped tradition circulated throughout the entire apostolic Church, even regarding the most important facts of the Gospel history. The assumption of literary dependence in order to explain the agreement between Matthew and Mark is rendered all the more necessary by the fact that the two books were written under entirely different conditions and for entirely different readers. In this respect the disparity between Matthew and Mark is incalculably greater than that between Mark and Luke, and scarcely less than that between Matthew and Luke. (4) So long as the impossibility of a relation of direct dependence between two extant documents remains undemonstrated, it is arbitrary or unscientific to explain the agreements between them by supposing that both are dependent upon documents no longer extant and without witnesses. But if one of these Gospels is dependent upon the other, an historical consideration of the relation existing between them will be enough to render impossible the belief that a Gospel written for Jews and Jewish Christians in Palestine, the form and content of which is determined in detail by this purpose, is dependent upon a Gospel written for Christians outside of Palestine. (5) It does not follow because important parts are wanting in one Gospel that the author did not have before him another Gospel containing these portions; since neither of these books supplies a basis for presupposing that their authors intended to record all that was in itself comm memorable, or all that they themselves regarded as trustworthy. Mark, as well as Matthew, exhibits proof to the contrary. We have already seen, in considering the title of the book, that Mark's plan permitted only a sketch of the work of the Baptist, and of the baptism and temptation of Jesus, which could not have been the original form of the oral or written tradition concerning these facts (above, p. 460). The same reason accounts also for the absence of a narrative regarding the origin, birth, and childhood of Jesus. To conclude that Mark had not read the narrative in Matt. i.-ii. is quite as inadmissible as to assume that it was known to him but rejected as untrustworthy, or, moreover, to suppose that all the traditions or fictions preserved in Matt. i.-ii. and Luke i.-ii. originated later than the time when Mark wrote. It is absurd to imagine that more than thirty years elapsed after the death of Jesus before the Christians began to make inquiries and to construct narratives about His origin, birth, and childhood. If Mark could leave unnoticed these narratives, which he certainly must have known, he could have done so notwithstanding his knowledge of Matt. i.-ii. The Sermon on the Mount, which is found in Matt. v.-vii. and Luke vi. 20-49 in two very different recensions, must, for this reason, as well as on account of its significance in each of the recensions, be regarded as an important part of the Gospel tradition. Mark, however, could not use it as an example of Jesus' preaching characterised in i. 14 f., since it does not come under this head. The Sermon on the Mount is not the Gospel (above, p. 542 f.). In the form in which it occurs in Matthew, he could not have used it at all. Sentences like those in Matt. v. 17-20, which have a very important place there, could have produced only confusion among the Roman Christians as we know them from the Epistle to the Romans (vol. i. 421 ff.). To say the least, a commentary would have been necessary—a commentary of an entirely different character from that which we find in Jesus' discourse itself (Matt. v. 21-48)—in order to render the words intelligible and profitable to the Roman Christians for whom Mark wrote. So Mark himself must have thought, provided that Paul's judgment regarding his work as a missionary in Rome was at all just (Col. iv. 11; vol. i. 450, n. 4). The omission of the Sermon on the Mount in Mark is no proof that the author had not read Matthew. (6) Nor does the lack of τάξις in Mark, of which notice had been taken already by those in the neighbourhood of John in Ephesus, argue against Mark's dependence on Matthew. We were under necessity of admitting earlier that Matthew made no attempt in most parts of his book to reproduce the events in chronological order. This must have been especially evident to a person like Mark, who knew from the narratives of an eye-witness the historical place of many incidents which Matthew took out of their historical connection and arranged again after the order of content (above, p. 556 ff.). Matthew was not suited to serve as a guide for the arrangement of the historical material in Mark. If Mark had followed Matthew entirely, the result could have been what John sums up in the words—οὐ μέντοι τάξει.

With these prefatory remarks we pass to the comparison of the two Gospels. Here weight is to be given, first of all, to the total impression which they produce. Matthew appears as a work of large proportion, cast in one mould; Mark is a mosaic, carefully constructed out of numerous pieces. In Matthew we notice the freedom with which the author handles a mass of material, the arrangement of which, from beginning to end, is determined by his theological conception and apologetic purpose, and at the same time his frequent carelessness with regard to the narrator's literary task, and the lack of all effort to fulfil the duties which to us seem incumbent upon the accurate historian. While Mark made a similar effort to follow a leading thought, we notice that this is much less definite and more neutral than the controlling idea in Matthew; and more than this, that he is unable to carry the idea through. The material stifles the thought. On the other hand, in spite of numerous infelicities of expression, Mark shows himself a master in clear narrative, in his ability to portray a situation and to reproduce with exactness trivial details, which, in the memory of an eye-witness, are inseparably connected with the kernel of the event. If this is true, it follows that Matthew is more original. That Matthew should show deficiency as a narrator is in keeping with the peculiarity of the author, which appears uniformly in every part of his book. It would, however, be inconceivable that with the narratives of Mark before him, which for the most part are very clearly drawn and accurate in details, he should have obliterated or otherwise destroyed these characteristics without intending either to correct errors or to make considerable abridgement. Matthew could not have been influenced by the effort to secure convenient brevity of narrative, in case the short Gospel of Mark was before him when he wrote, since his own Gospel is much more elaborate. Matthew's narratives do not exhibit the character of excerpts, as do sentences like Mark xvi. 9-13, but give the impression of unfinished sketches. Moreover, the universal rule will apply here, that the unfinished sketch precedes the completed drawing and the highly coloured painting. Nothing was more natural than for Mark, in the narratives which he both found in Matthew, and also had often heard from Peter, to pick out such touches as would render the pictures more accurate, richer in colour, and clearer. A writing constructed as was Matthew (above, p. 556 f.) must have made every later narrator who had it in his hand desire to add explanatory additions. That such a document was before Mark, and that he followed it, has been proved beyond all question, particularly by Klostermann. The entire Gospel of Mark furnishes evidence that, with all his independent knowledge of details, resting as it did upon the eye-witness of Peter, Mark had a written exemplar from which he sometimes made excerpts and to which he sometimes added glosses (n. 2). In some passages this is evident at once from the expressions used, which can be explained only under this presupposition.

Although designing to record only a single parable in xii. 1, Mark writes, "He began to speak to them in parables," because an account lay before him according to which Jesus spoke three parables in succession on the same day in the temple (Matt. xxi. 28-31, 33-41, xxii. 1-14). In the parallel narrative of Matthew (xxi. 33), the words, "Hear another parable," indicate to the reader expressly that this parable is only one in a series of such discourses (cf. xxi. 45, xxii. 1). Further, this occurs in a passage having an extended context (Mark xi. 27-xii. 37 = Matt. xxi. 23-xxii. 46, n. 1), which, with the exception of the two parables that are intentionally cut out by Mark, is practically without variation in both Matthew and Mark. Therefore the book employed by Mark was not some work which simply resembled our Matthew, but, as far as content and arrangement go, our Matthew itself. The fact that here, as in most other cases, the expression is more awkward in Mark than in Matthew, is accounted for when we remember that it was the Aramaic Matthew which Mark had before him. On the other hand, the numerous agreements between Matthew and Mark in the choice of words is explained, if the person who translated Matthew into Greek was familiar with Mark, and if he followed this in cases where he found an expression that suited him, without, however, abating his effort to find expressions that were more pleasing (n. 3). It is entirely contrary to Mark's habit to reproduce the discourses of Jesus and of other persons in indirect discourse. Even discourses which are really summaries of repeated and much more elaborate utterances are thrown into direct form (Mark i. 15, vi. 14-16, x. 33 f.). When he departs from this rule in vi. 7-8, then passes to the direct form in ver. 9 without notice, and, finally, in vv. 10-11 introduces a single independent saying with a special introduction (καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς), the inconsistency is explained if, in the first place, he made a summary of the elaborate discourse in Matt. x. 5 ff., which was before him, but afterwards saw fit to excerpt parts with greater accuracy. The same is true of Mark i. 4, 7-8 in relation to Matt. iii. 2, 7-12, and of several other passages in which the discourse of Jesus is interrupted by a καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς, not called for by the context of the discourse in Mark (ii. 27, vii. 9 ; cf. i. 7, n. 2).

The use of the O.T. in the two cases deserves special notice. No great weight can be laid upon the fact that at least in one instance (xiv. 49) Mark reproduces the ἵνα πληρωθῶσιν αἱ γραφαί, which occurs so frequently in Matthew, and is of so much importance for his purpose ; since it is not used to express his own thought, but is put into the mouth of Jesus, who is represented in Matt. xxvi. 56, cf. 54, as speaking similar words on the same occasion. Moreover, the words are in keeping with Jesus' attitude to O.T. prophecy. It is, however, significant that Mark quotes no O.T. passages not also cited by Matthew (n. 4). Only in one instance does Mark cite the O.T. on his own responsibility (i. 2 f.). All other citations from the O.T. are put into the mouth of the speakers in the narrative, particularly the Lord, and, what is more striking, always in the same connection in which the same O.T. words are employed by Matthew, whose book is so much richer in quotations, both direct and indirect. This not only furnishes new evidence that Mark and Matthew are very intimately related, in a way that cannot be explained except by the assumption that one is dependent upon the other, but it also shows that it is Mark which is dependent upon Matthew. The poor borrows from the rich, not the reverse. In the case before us this would necessarily appear doubtful, if it were the Greek Matthew upon which Mark drew ; for then the numerous variations from Matthew shown by Mark in the citations, which for the most part affect the sense very little, and which are by no means always improvements, must be regarded as particular caprices of the author. In this connection, also, the tradition, according to which Mark could have had only the Aramaic Matthew before him, proves to be the thread of Ariadne. In Mark's exemplar, also, the words taken from the O.T. were in Aramaic; that is, his native language. It was just as easy for him to translate these citations into Greek as words like Abba, Rabboni, Talitha kumi, etc. (n. 5). On the other hand, it is conceivable and self-evident that after twenty years of intercourse with the Greek Churches, where it was customary to study the LXX to determine "whether these things were so" (Acts xvii. 11), Mark was very familiar with this text, particularly in passages that were often quoted in Christian circles, and that in his book intended for Greek-speaking Christians he would make use of the LXX where it was convenient. Whether for this purpose he ever found it necessary to unrol the LXX may be considered doubtful. Mark was in the same position in relation to the Aramaic Matthew as was the person who translated the whole of Matthew into Greek some fifteen or twenty-five years later (above, p. 579 f.). The fact that in many instances the text is the same, or practically the same, in both, is satisfactorily explained by the assumption of the dependence of both Mark and the Greek Matthew upon the same Aramaic original, the LXX, and the language current in the Church of their time. The fact, however, that they vary in numerous details, which for the most part do not affect the sense, is just as simply accounted for by the supposition that Mark was not as yet acquainted with the Greek Matthew, and that the translator of Matthew into Greek was bound, first of all, to follow his original, and in other respects was under even less obligation to take into consideration the form of the citations in Mark than he was to pay attention to the LXX and the language of the Church (n. 6). The dependence of Mark upon the Aramaic Matthew is shown also by the relation of the citations in both to the Hebrew text. While we are able to recognise, even in the Greek form in which we possess his work, that the author of Matthew used the Hebrew text of the O.T., though the citations which he took from this source are freely handled, and while we observe that the Greek translator retained this relation to the Hebrew text in many decisive passages in spite of his frequent dependence upon the LXX, Mark is much more strongly under the influence of the LXX, and gives us a translation which is independent of the LXX only where Matthew does the same. This he was able to do, not by reason of his independent knowledge of the Hebrew text, of which he nowhere shows a clear example, but from his acquaintance with Matthew in its original Aramaic form. We have decisive proof of this in the citations in Mark i. 2 f. and xiv. 27 (n. 6). In the first passage, Mark quotes a combination of Mal. iii. 1 and Isa. xl. 3 as a single connected saying of Isaiah. All the efforts made by the early Church to defend the evangelist against the censures of the Neoplatonist Porphyry, by means of emendations of the text and apologetic interpretations of the only trustworthy text, were not enough to explain away the fact that at the very beginning of his book, and in the single passage where he quotes an author by name, Mark makes a mistake in citing his source. This would have been avoidable, if he had drawn upon the O.T. directly. If he had cited the passage freely from memory, it could be explained as a mere slip; but since both fragments of which the quotation is made up show clear traces of Mark's dependence upon Matthew (n. 6), the incorrect reference of the combined passages to Isaiah is to be explained as due to the same cause. Mark found both passages used in Matthew in connection with the Baptist, the one correctly referred to Isaiah (Matt. iii. 3), the other, however, quoted as Scripture without the name of a prophet (Matt. xi. 10). More than this, the latter was produced in Matthew freely, and for this reason, possibly, was not to be found at once in the Hebrew or Greek Bible. Accordingly, Mark, who wished to connect these words with those of Isaiah, took them also as the words of the prophet.

1. (P. 603.) In the first part of both Gospels the similarity of substance and form appears chiefly in single sentences (Mark i. 3, 5 = Matt. iii. 3, 5) and short narratives (Mark i. 16-20 = Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark i. 40-44 = Matt. viii. 1-4); farther on it is rather in whole series of sections (Mark x. 1-xi. 17 = Matt. xix. 1-xxi. 13, interrupted only by the parable in xx. 1-16; Mark xi. 27-xii. 37 = Matt. xxi. 23-xxii. 46, interrupted only by the parables xxi. 28-32, xxii. 1-13; Mark xiv. 1-xv. 47 = Matt. xxvi. 1-xxvii. 61, interrupted only by xxvi. 52-54, xxvii. 3-10, 51b-53). Single rare words or forms deserve less stress than is sometimes laid upon them. In the first place, every argument for literary dependence, based upon such resemblances, is confronted by the fact that no form of textual corruption is more frequent in the Gospels than the assimilation of one Gospel with another. Thus, for example, in Luke v. 20, 23, ἀφίονται is undoubtedly the correct reading, whereas, taking the parallels in Matt. ix. 2, 5, the weight of evidence is for ἀφίονται or ἀφίενται, and in Mark ii. 5, 9 the external evidence leaves us undecided. This Doric form of the perf. ind. (Kühner-Blass, Gram. i. 2. 201) is clearly supported in Luke vii. 47, 48; John xx. 23; 1 John ii. 12, which shows its general currency. The form ἀφίονται also meets the case in Matt. ix. 2, 5 and parallels (against Winer-Schmiedel, § 14. 6), though not in these other passages. In the second place, much that has been represented as remarkable is not so to a connoisseur, as ἀπεκατέστη, Matt. xii. 13; Luke vi. 10; Mark iii. 5; cf. ἀπεκατέστη, Mark viii. 25. Besides the instances in Winer-Schmiedel, § 12. 7, note 12, cf. Ign. Smyrn. xi. 2. It is entirely out of place to adduce in evidence ἀπεκρίναι (for ἀπεκρίθη) in Matt. xxvii. 12; Mark xiv. 61; Luke xxiii. 9; for these three passages deal with three different occurrences, while in the actual parallels, Matt. xxvi. 63; Mark xiv. 61; Luke xxii. 66, or Matt. xxvii. 12; Mark xv. 5; Luke xxiii. 3, both content and form are very different; cf. Veit, ii. 125. Moreover, in Matt. xxvii. 12 we are probably to read ἀπεκρίναι alongside of ἀπεκρίθη, xxvii. 14 (= Mark xv. 5). The Attic ἀπεκρίναι is attested beyond question only in Luke iii. 16; Acts iii. 12; per contra, Mark xiv. 61; Luke xxiii. 9 (only L, to be sure, has -ναι, but correctly; cf. Blass, *Ntl. Gram.*² § 20. 1 [Eng. trans. p. 44]; John v. 17, 19, it is uncertain, and in John xii. 23, decidedly so. In the third place, every proof of the dependence of one author upon the other, based upon such phenomena, comes to nothing in the case of Matt. and Mark, if Mark was familiar with the Aramaic Matt., and the Greek translator of Matt. was familiar with Mark.

2. (Pp. 607, 609.) Mark i. 2-13 makes the impression not of a freely drawn sketch, but of an excerpt. Now excerpts are commonly made from books, not from oral traditions. Mark found the materials in Matt. iii. 1-6,

iii. 13-iv. 11, and also Matt. xi. 10 (see note 6 below). The only traces that Mark shows of an individual conception or tradition are that he represents Jesus alone as the recipient of the divine witness at the baptism (ver. 10 f.), and that he mentions the beasts (ver. 13). But that the narrative from which he made his extracts was wholly or substantially identical with Matt. iv. 1-11, must be inferred from the fact that Mark concludes his account with the ministry of the angels. This is intelligible only in Matt., where this διακονεῖν (serving at table, care for all physical needs, cf. viii. 15, xxv. 45, xxvii. 55) corresponds with the opening of the narrative iv. 2-4. Mark i. 16-20 = Matt. iv. 18-22. Matthew omits ὀλίγον, which in Mark i. 19 presents the situation more vividly, and μετὰ τῶν μισθωτῶν, which in Mark i. 20 renders the brothers' immediate decision more comprehensible, and saves it to some extent from the appearance of being unfilial. These omissions certainly could not be explained in Matt. on the ground of an effort to secure brevity, for Matthew's account is on the whole a trifle more extended than Mark's (89 words against 82), nor yet in any other way. It is Mark that contributed these illuminating details. Mark i. 40-45 = Matt. viii. 1-4. The principal difference lies in Mark's representation of the charge to the leper as a very emphatic one, for the sake of contrasting with it the uninterrupted spread of the report of Jesus' mighty deeds (vv. 43, 45). This idea would have been entirely to Matthew's purpose, and very suitable as an example in connection with xii. 15-21. By the place to which he assigned the narrative, he gave it quite another significance (see p. 544 f.), and in the phrase εἰς μαρτύριον αὐτοῖς gave characteristic expression to his conception. As Mark, who shows no anxiety here, or elsewhere, to defend Jesus from the charge of annulling the law, preserves this detail, he is seen to be the dependent author. Mark ii. 1-12 = Matt. ix. 1-8. Mark's additions throughout serve to illuminate Matthew's less perspicuous account. The unintelligible ἰδὼν, Matt. ix. 2, is made clear by the account in Mark ii. 4, and with this in view the situation is already carefully described in vv. 1, 2. It would have been better to mention the presence of the scribes at this point, also, as Luke does in introducing the story, v. 17. But as Mark has Matthew's account before him, he first alludes to their presence at that point in the narrative (ver. 6) where Matthew assumes but does not expressly state it. The complaint οὗτος βλασφημεῖ, Matt. ix. 3, which would be obscure to readers unfamiliar with Jewish modes of thought, is explained in detail in Mark ii. 6-8, as is the way that Jesus "saw" the thoughts of the fault-finders. In Mark ii. 27 the separation by καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς of two sayings of Jesus occasioned by similar circumstances, shows that Mark had before him a narrative in which the two were either separated by other matter or at least differently arranged. That is, Mark excerpts from Matt. xii. 1-8, passing over the sentences, xii. 5-7, between those two sayings. Of itself, it would be conceivable that Matthew, who, in accordance with his plan, sought in viii. 18-ix. 34 to present as rapid a succession as possible of changing scenes (above, pp. 544, 583 f.), was thus led to condense extended accounts from Mark, if he had them before him, by the omission of unessential details. For example, Mark iv. 36-41 (108 words) = Matt. viii. 23-27 (76 words), where Luke viii. 23-25, also (69 words from καὶ ἀνέχθησαν, ver. 22), has abridged decidedly. But this is incapable of proof. In any case, the striking οἱ ἄνθρωποι, Matt. viii. 27, cannot be derived from Mark iv. 41, where the reference is plainly to the disciples, whom Matthew everywhere designates as μαθηταί, never ἄνθρωποι (x. 35, 36 cannot be used in evidence, nor can xiv. 33 also be compared with it, where the disciples who remain in the ship, in distinction from Peter and Jesus, are called οἱ ἐν τῷ πλοίῳ). Also the people in general cannot be intended, who later heard of the act of Jesus, for whom Matthew commonly uses a different form of expression (ix. 8, 33, xii. 23, xiv. 13, xv. 37, xxii. 33). Finally, Matthew did not refer to other persons who were with Jesus and the disciples in the same boat, for the practised fishermen did not need the help of sailors, and the company of strangers was not in place when Jesus desired to withdraw from the people, and had dismissed all who were not entirely suited to accompany Him (viii. 20) in order to cross the lake alone with the disciples (ver. 23). A solution of this difficulty, as well as of the use of ἰδών in Matt. ix. 2, cannot be found in Matt., but, on the other hand, is found in Mark, in the statement iv. 36, that yet other ships alongside of or following the boat which held Jesus and His disciples, crossed the sea with them. This is one of the fine strokes of the brush which correctly reproduces the recollection of Mark's authority, Peter, and, without any intention on the part of Mark, it serves us as an historical explanation of the enigmatical ἄνθρωποι in Matt. It would be entirely incomprehensible, however, that Matthew, when Mark's Gospel was before him, should have omitted this remark, which was essential for the understanding of his narrative; and also why he placed the exclamation of astonishment in the mouths of the puzzling "men," instead of the disciples, as is the case in Mark. Mark vi. 14-32 = Matt. xiv. 1-13. It is self-evident that Mark vi. 14-16 is not spontaneous narration, but an explanation of a received account by means of glosses (by φανερόν—αὐτοῦ in ver. 14, and then by ver. 15; cf. viii. 28), and that in consequence of these glosses the author is obliged to return to the beginning of the story as he had received it, in altered form, with ver. 16. Even those who are not sensitive to stylistic impressions must recognise this on comparing the passage with Luke ix. 7-9. It is equally clear, however, that Luke's smooth account is not the basis of the awkward narrative in Mark, especially as everything added in Mark vi. 17 ff. is found in Luke, not in this connection, but in a partial and most condensed form at iii. 18-20. On the other hand, Matt. xiv. 1 ff. presents the original text which Mark glosses. If Mark did not find Herod's brother designated by name in Matt. xiv. 3, the mistaken Φιλίππου of Mark vi. 17 is his addition (above, pp. 503, note 3, and 590). The omission of the name cannot be viewed reversely as a correction made by Matthew in material drawn from Mark, for a critical reader working upon Mark and, with more exact historical knowledge, noticing the error, would not simply have deleted the mistaken name, but have put the right one in its place, as the redactor of the Gospel of the Hebrews did in Matt. xxiii. 35 (above, p. 589, n. 5). But here, also, Mark is not simply a compiler of extracts. The lively and graphic treatment, richer in every way as compared with Matthew, cannot be the product of the free artistic fancy of this Mark, who yet showed himself so painfully bound to the written source before him. It can only have come from the accounts of those who stood nearer the events themselves, and in this connection—besides Peter—we are to bear in mind Luke viii. 3; John iv. 46; Acts xiii. 1. From Peter, too, he would have known, what did not appear from Matt., that the feeding of the five thousand was connected with the return of the apostles from their preaching tour. The champions of Mark's priority over Matthew have with singular unanimity found a leading proof of Matthew's dependence in the comparison of Matt. xiv. 12-13 and Mark vi. 30-33. Matthew, they say, thoughtlessly failed to observe that xiv. 3-11 was an episode growing out of what preceded xiv. 1 f., and connects the continuing narrative immediately with the close of the episode, and he transformed the returning apostles (Mark vi. 30 ; Luke ix. 10) into John's disciples informing Jesus of their master's death, because in his story the apostles had long since returned from their wanderings, being present with Jesus as early as xii. 1. In reply, let us note—(1) That Mark could not have betrayed Matthew into confusing Jesus' disciples with the Baptist's, for in Mark vi. 29 the disciples of the Baptist are plainly distinguished, even to the dullest comprehension, from the disciples of Jesus, who are spoken of as apostles, vi. 30. So if Matthew made the ἀπὸ ἀγγέλων of Mark vi. 30 the predicate of μαθηταί in vi. 29, it was not a case of confusion, but of wanton change. (2) There could be no occasion for Matthew to do this, in the fact that he had already recorded the sending out of the apostles in chap. x., for he had said nothing of their return, and he might mention that incidentally here as an introduction to something further. For by the whole arrangement of v. 1-xiv. 12 (above, pp. 542 ff., 558) he had precluded the readers' finding in the succession of the narratives any reflection of the chronological order of the events. Therefore xii. 22-24 may be identical with ix. 32-34 (above, p. 599), and xiii. 54-58 may precede 5-7. If a mere repetition of Mark vi. 30-33 had still seemed to him inconvenient, he could have omitted these statements and substituted a general note of time like iii. 1, xii. 1, xiv. 1. (3) If Matt. v. 1-xiv. 12 is not continuous narrative at all, but a series of narrative fragments, connected chronologically only here and there (viii. 1, viii. 18-ix. 34, xii. 46, xiii. 1—above, pp. 557 f., 584 f.), it must be considered a misunderstanding of the peculiarity of the Gospel to infer from the connection of xiv. 12 that what is related in xiv. 12 ff. followed the remarks of Herod in xiv. 2, which would then be incompatible with the immediate connection of these same events with the Baptist's execution. (4) As a matter of fact, there is nothing more likely than that Herod should have been visited by these superstitious fancies directly after the commission of his miserable deed. All that is related in Matt. xiv. 1-36, and also, with some additions, in Mark vi. 14-56, may easily have occurred in the space of a few weeks. Mark vii. 1-23 = Matt. xv. 1-20. Matthew's smoothly flowing account, which assumes acquaintance with Jewish customs, cannot be dependent on Mark's, which is broken by glosses intended to explain these customs to extra-Palestinian and non-Jewish readers, and so made very awkward at the very beginning. Here again, too, as in ii. 27, vi. 10, cf. i. 7, the interruption of the discourse by καὶ ἔλεγεν αὐτοῖς, vii. 9, shows that Mark was drawing upon a book in which the several parts of the discourse in question were differently arranged, or given in a more extended form. The former is the case in Matt. xv. 3-9. Mark found it more satisfactory to put first Isaiah's condemnation of externalism in worship, which had an immediate relation to the question in dispute, and then follow with the proof, which in Matt. precedes, that the Pharisees in other matters also over-esteemed the Rabbinic precepts, in that they even set them above the explicit law of God.

3. (P. 608.) The correctness of the above remarks on Matt. xxi. 23-xxii. 46=Mark xi. 27-xii. 37 will appear to everyone from any sort of a synopsis. Notice how Matthew reduces to bearable proportions the constant repetition of καί in Mark xi. 27, 28, 31, 33, xii. 2, 12, 13, 23, 28, 35, 38, cf. above, pp. 502, n. 2, 591, n. 7; also the smoother sentence-structure, Matt. xxi. 26, as compared with Mark xi. 32, and the apt παγιδεύειν, Matt. xxii. 15, instead of ἀγρεύειν, Mark xii. 13. The same consideration which led Mark to cut down the series of parables directed against the Pharisees moved him also to abridge Matt. xxi. 40-44, although Mark xii. 10 is thereby deprived of its natural connection.

4. (P. 609.) Mark xv. 28 is recognised to be an interpolation; cf. Luke xxii. 37. Mark ix. 48 (and, according to the later authorities, ix. 44 also) is not so much a quotation as a free adaptation of Isa. lxvi. 24, only with such divergences from the LXX as its introduction into Jesus' discourse required. Mark xii. 29, where Deut. vi. 4 (exactly after the LXX) is prefixed to the words from Deut. vi. 5, which Matthew also quotes (chap. xxii. 37), is not to be regarded as a citation of Mark's own; nor yet Mark xi. 17, where the quotation from Isa. lvi. 7, abridged in Matt. xxi. 13, is filled out in harmony with the LXX.

5. (P. 610.) On the Aramaic words in Mark see above, p. 502, n. 1. On Mark xv. 34=Matt. xxvii. 46=Ps. xxii. 2, cf. vol. i. 15 f. This short ejaculation of the crucified Christ, as well as the other words of Jesus which Mark gives in Aramaic, might have been known to him from oral narratives before he read Matt. xxvii. 46. In the translation his ὁ θεός μου approaches the LXX more nearly than Matthew's θεέ μου, but εἰς τί departs from the LXX and from the Greek Matt. (ἰνατί).

6. (Pp. 610, 611.) Certain citations call for more particular discussion. (1) Mark xiv. 27=Matt. xxvi. 31=Zech. xiii. 7. Mark's independence of the LXX here is beyond doubt, and on the other hand, also, he gives a far from exact translation of the Hebrew. He is, therefore, following a document in which the Hebrew text was indeed the basis, but was very freely handled, that is to say, Matt., which like Mark gives παράγω instead of πάραγον against the original text and LXX. But even here we see that it was not the Greek Matt. that Mark had before him; for what should have prompted him to turn about καὶ διασκορπισθήσονται τὰ πρόβατα (τῆς ποιμνῆς) into τὰ πρόβατα διασκορπισθήσονται? Elsewhere Mark shows no aversion to a Semitic word-order; in comparison with the Greek Matt., he is throughout the less elegant stylist. This is a mere chance, then, explained only by the supposition that the same Aramaic original was before them both; whereas Mark chose the order natural in Greek, the translator of Matt. preserved the order of the original. For the rest, there is no such agreement as would compel us to assume that Mark had the Greek Matt. before him, or that Matthew was influenced by Mark. The word παράσσω is usual, and offered by the LXX; besides, ποιμήν and πρόβατα were inevitable, and διασκορπισθήσονται was in use in similar connections; cf. Jer. xxiii. 1, 2; John xi. 52; Acts v. 37. It may still be a matter of discussion whether the addition of τῆς ποιμνῆς (cf. Ps. lxxiv. 1, v. 3; Ex. xxxiv. 31), by means of which the contrast of shepherd and flock is made more noticeable to the ear, was already contained in the Aram. Matt., and was omitted by Mark, or whether it is an addition of the Greek Matt. (2) Mark i. 2=Matt. xi. 10=Luke vii. 27=Mal. iii. 1. It cannot be doubted that the bold alteration of this verse independently of the LXX goes back to someone acquainted with the Hebrew. But if in Mark i. 2 ἐγώ is to be omitted, with BD, etc., and ἔμπροσθέν σου according to all good authorities, Mark cannot have been the model for Matthew, who took this ἐγώ from Ex. xxiii. 20, and through conflation with this passage came to his twofold "before thee." But neither can Mark's reading be based on the Greek Matt., for why should he drop the ἐγώ? If, on the other hand, he had in the Aramaic Matt. some such phrase as we find in the Targum Mal. iii. 1, כִּי אֲנִי שָׁמָּה, he might take the pronoun to be unemphatic (as it is in the Targum=Hebrew, אֲנִי), and unnecessary to be expressed in Greek. If, furthermore, he found without doubt in both parts of the clauses, supposing that his original was an Aramaic book, a קִרְבָּה with or without ל prefixed (=Hebrew לִפְנֵי), it was very natural to omit the second. On the other hand, the writer of the Greek Matt. appears here, too, as a translator intent at once upon exactness and upon a certain elegance. He does not leave the אֲנִי (Hebrew אֲנִי in the underlying passage, Ex. xxiii. 20) untranslated, but renders the double לִקְרִבָּה first by πρὸ προσώπου σου and then by the synonymous ἔμπροσθέν σου, to avoid monotony. (3) Mark i. 3=Isa. xl. 3=Matt. iii. 3; Luke iii. 4. As all three Synoptists, unlike John i. 23 (abridged form of the quotation), have no word that does not appear in the LXX, anyone might equally well pass as the exemplar of the other two. Luke, indeed, might seem to be entitled to this precedence, as it is evident from iii. 5-6 that he consulted the LXX, and from it extended the quotation. But if for other reasons Luke's priority is not to be thought of, Mark, too, can lay no claim to it; for, first, by the mistaken combination of Mal. iii. 1 and Isa. xl. 3 he shows here his dependence on Matt. (above, 611); and, secondly, it is unlikely that he was affected by those apologetic considerations which prompted Matthew—who aimed to present Jesus primarily as the king veiled in the form of the lowly servant of God, and the guise of a prophet—not to set Him forth to begin with as the God of Israel, and led him accordingly to reduce the concluding τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν to αὐτοῦ.

ADDENDUM.

VOL. II., PAGE 185, LINE 10.

Concerning Christianos or Chrestianos, it should be said that, according to Andresen, Wochenschrift f. Klass. Philol., 1902, S. 780 f. (cf. Codd. graeci et lat. fotogr. depicti, tom. vii., pars. post. fol. 38r; also Harnack, *Mission des Christentums*², i. 348), in the only MS. of this portion of the Annals of Tacitus, Chrestianos was written by the first copyist, and subsequently was corrected into Christianos, whereas the Christus which follows was written in this form by the first hand.

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT.

IX.—Continued.

THE WRITINGS OF LUKE.

§ 58. THE TRADITION CONCERNING LUKE AND HIS WORK.

THE Luke to whom the composition of the third Gospel and of Acts was unanimously ascribed by the ancient Church (n. 1), is first mentioned by Paul in the Epistles of the first and second Roman imprisonments. Since he is characterised in Col. iv. 14 as "the beloved physician," and mentioned in Philem. 24 last in the list of Paul's helpers, we are justified in assuming that he was in some way connected with the missionary work in Rome, without, however, having given up his professional calling, which might open the way for him to many homes and hearts that remained closed to others. It is also possible that he rendered valuable services as a physician to the apostle himself, who was often severely ill. While Demas, who is mentioned in both these passages along with Luke, deserted the apostle from sordid motives in 66, after the apostle's second arrest, and when his life was in constant danger, Luke remained faithfully with him (2 Tim.

iv. 10 f.). The only other thing indicated by Col. iv. 10-14 and its context is the fact that Luke was a Gentile by birth (n. 2). Further facts with regard to Luke's life history have always been derived from the two parts of the work ascribed to him, under the pre-supposition that he is the author of both, and that the "we," which occurs repeatedly in Acts, includes the "I" of the author who mentions himself in Luke i. 3; Acts i. 1.

In the original recension of Acts (§ 59) this "we" occurs for the first time in Acts xi. 27 (n. 3). Inasmuch as the narrative in this passage dates back to a time preceding the first year of the joint work of Paul and Barnabas in Antioch (43-44), before the Emperor Claudius came to the throne (Jan. 41; for both dates cf. Part XI.), the narrator must have become a member of the Antiochian Church at the latest by the year 40, so that his conversion cannot have been due to Paul, who did not come to Antioch until 43. Nor is this statement confirmed by Luke. The tradition that Luke was a native of Antioch was always so definite, that it is extremely unlikely that it is the result of scholarly reflection upon Acts xi. 27 (n. 4), and we are unable to prove that the oldest witnesses for this tradition, Eusebius and Julius Africanus, who wrote probably a hundred years before Eusebius, were not in possession of other information besides Acts xi. 27. There must be taken into account here the further tradition, likewise old, according to which there was a rich Antiochian by the name of Theophilus who became a Christian in the apostolic age, and who later was expressly identified with the Theophilus of Luke i. 3; Acts i. 1; but not in any way contradictory of the original story (n. 5). Everything else that is said and narrated about Luke impresses us as being of the nature either of uncertain conjecture or inference from the "we" passages of Acts and from the hints of the prologue to the Gospel, which were in part misunderstood, in part exaggerated (n. 6).

In the same way, the ancient Church possessed no tradition regarding the time and place of the composition of the two books, but depended altogether upon conjectures (n. 7). Only one point seems to go back to a very ancient recollection, namely, that Luke wrote later than Matthew and Mark, and before John, i.e. somewhere between the years 67 and 90 (vol. ii. 392–400).

1. (P. 1.) Concerning Luke as the author of the third Gospel, so acknowledged even by Marcion, see vol. ii. 389 f. That he wrote Acts was equally taken for granted by the earliest writers who discuss the book or cite it formally: Iren. iii. 13. 3, after extracts from Acts i.–xv. (ex sermonibus et actibus apostolorum, iii. 12. 11; ex actibus apostolorum, iii. 13. 3), speaks of the book as Lucæ de apostolis testificatio, and similarly in iii. 15. 1 as the testificatio following his Gospel. Canon Murat. line 34, “acta autem omnium apostolorum sub uno libro scripta sunt. Lucas optime Theophile,” etc. Clem. Strom. v. 83: Καθὸ καὶ ὁ Λουκᾶς ἐν ταῖς πράξεσι τῶν ἀποστόλων ἀπομνημονεύει τὸν Παῦλον λέγοντα (Acts xvii. 22); Hypot. (Lat. version) on 1 Pet. v. 13: “Sicut Lucas quoque et actus apostolorum stylo exsecutus agnoscitur et Pauli ad Hebræos interpretatus epistolam.” Tert. de Jejunio, x., after citations from Acts, in eodem commentario Lucæ. The fact that the book is seldom ascribed explicitly to Luke, even by those who mention its rejection by Marcion (Tert. c. Marc. v. 1. 2; Præscr. xxii; pseudo-Tert. Har. xvi.; also, indirectly, Iren. iii. 14. 4–15. 1), and that it is constantly cited simply as αἱ πράξεις with or without τῶν ἀποστόλων, Lat. actu (so Tertullian always, and also Cyprian GK, ii. 52, A. 1) or actus, likewise with or without apostolorum, shows that no other opinion concerning its authorship had been expressed in any quarter. With regard to the claim that Clement of Alexandria (Scholia of Maximus on Dionys. Areop. Opera, ed. Corderius, ii. 242) asserts that the Dialogue of Jason and Papiscus was written not by Ariston of Pella, but by Luke, the present writer believes that in Forsch. iii. 74 enough has been said for anyone who knows what ἀναγράφειν means, as distinguished from γράφειν and συγγράφειν (cf. e.g. Eus. H. E. iii. 4. 11). Following Grabe’s necessary emendation, Ἰάσωνος ὄν (instead of ἡν) Κλήμης . . . τὸν ἅγιον Λουκᾶν φησὶν ἀναγράψαι—we find that Clement simply said that the Jason of the dialogue was the same one that Luke mentioned in Acts xvii. 5. It was doubtless this passage, and not Acts xxi. 16 (Σ Copt. Ἰάσωνι) that Clement had in mind. In Hom. in Ascens. Chr. et in Principium Actorum, ii., which Montfaucon (Opp. Chrysost. iii. 757 ff.) includes with the “Spuria” as only partly genuine, it is said (p. 761) that some considered Clement of Rome the author of Acts, others Barnabas, and still others the evangelist Luke: the preacher himself decides for Luke (cf. also iii. 774). This is repeated verbatim by Photius in Quæst. cxxiii. ad Amphil. (Migne, ci. col. 716), which, like Quæst. cxxiv., is simply an excerpt from the homily. Plainly the preacher, speaking extemporaneously, was led by mistaken recollection or careless reading of Eus. H. E. vi. 11. 2, 25. 14, to confuse the tradition concerning the author of Heb. with that concerning the author of Acts, which could happen the more easily since, in mentioning the former, Clem. Alex. and Orig. allude also to Luke's authorship of Acts (vol. ii. 308 f., notes 5, 7).

2. (P. 2.) From Col. iv. 10-14 it follows that Luke was not only a Gentile by birth, but also remained uncircumcised; cf. vol. i. 450 f. This was also the opinion of the early writers. When Jerome, Quæst. Hebr. in Gen. (ed. Lagarde, 64), writes "licet plerique tradant Lucam evangelistam ut proselytum hebræas literas ignorasse," he can hardly mean that he was first converted from heathendom to Judaism, and afterward from Judaism to Christianity, but only that, unlike the other N.T. writers, who were Hebrews, he came to Christianity out of heathendom; cf. Just. Dial. cxxii. When, in another place, he credits Luke with only a better knowledge of Greek than of Hebrew, and so with some knowledge at least of the latter (on Isa. vi. and xxviii., Vall. iv. 97, 378), he doubtless has in mind merely such explanations of proper names as are given in Acts i. 19, iv. 36.

3. (P. 2.) Underlying the usual text of Acts xi. 27, D—with which several Latin authorities are in substantial agreement—gives: ἦν δὲ πολλὰ ἀγαλλίασις. συνεστραμμένων δὲ ἡμῶν, ἔφη εἰς ἐξ αὐτῶν ὀνόματι Ἀγαθος σημαίνων διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος κτλ. As to text and style, see § 59, n. 6. Harnack (Berl. Sitzungsberichte, 1899, S. 316-327) has extended his depreciating judgment concerning the β text to cover this passage also, and, besides, has explained the ἡμῶν as a later interpolation, not even originating with the author of the text, instead of an original αὐτῶν. In view of the agreement of the numerous witnesses from Augustine (from 394 A.D.) onwards for β in this passage, this last statement should, however, need stronger proofs. The solitary position of the ἡμῶν is not strange, since, except perhaps for xiii. 2, this is the only place where a single scene taken from the Church life of Antioch is portrayed. In xiii. 2—especially according to β (see n. 6)—only the prophets, not all the Church members, are the participants, and Luke has there expressed in another way his especial interest in Antioch. The charge that the description lacks the vividness which would be expected of an eye-witness, is based upon arbitrary assumptions, as, e.g., that σημαίνων points to a symbolical act (S. 319, A. 1; cf. per contra, with the exception of διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος, which is rather against it, John xii. 33, xviii. 32, xxi. 19; Rev. i. 1), and that ver. 29, where the "disciples" are again mentioned quite objectively, refers to the gathering described in vv. 27-28, whereas it has to do with decisions and economic deliberations of individuals who are without official position. If Luke had said that he also was one of these more or less affluent and charitable Church members, no one would have commended him for such a statement. The agreement of the β text of this passage with Luke, and especially also with the peculiarities in style of the β text in general (Harnack, S. 321 f.), is no proof against the originality of the entire β text, but is a witness only to its integrity.

4. (P. 2.) The episcopate of Timothy at Ephesus and of Titus in Crete (iii. 4, 6), the distribution of countries among the apostles (iii. 1), and the composition of The Shepherd by the Hermas named in Rom. xvi. 14 (iii. 2, 6), are plainly mentioned by Eusebius as uncertain traditions. Other matters, such as the identity of the Roman bishops Linus and Clement with the N.T. personages of the same names, are supported by the citation of the N.T. passages (iii. 2, 4, 9 f., 15; cf. iii. 4, 11 on Dionysius the Areopagite). On the other hand, iii. 4. 7: Λουκᾶς δὲ τὸ μὲν γένος ὦν τῶν ἀπ' Ἀντιοχείας, τῇ ἐπιστήμῃ δὲ ἰατρός κτλ. It is probably not Eusebius but Africanus (cf. Spitta, Brief des Afr. an Aristides, S. 70, 111) who, being himself a physician, writes of the physician Luke (Mai, Nova. P. Bibl. iv. 1. 270): ὁ δὲ Λουκᾶς τὸ μὲν γένος ἀπὸ τῆς βοιωμένης Ἀντιοχείας ἦν, ἐν ᾗ δὴ οἱ πάντες λογιώτατοι τοὺς Ἰωῆας προγόνους αὐχοῦσιν· οὐ μὴν ἀλλὰ πρὸς τῷ κατὰ φύσιν ἐλληνικῷ τῶν ἀνδρῶν ἐπήγετό τι πλεον ὁ Λουκᾶς ἐν λόγοις, ἅτε ἱατρικῆς ἔμπειρος ὦν ἐπιστήμης. The true Euthalius depends on Eusebius (Zacagni, 410; cf. 529); hardly, however, the old prologue (N.T. ed. Wordsworth, i. 269; cf. the prologue on Acts ii. 1-4): "Lucas Syrus natione Antiochensis, arte medicus, discipulus apostolorum, postea Paulum secutus," etc. In this and in other particulars Jerome's Præf. Comm. in Matt. (Vall. vii. 3) accords more exactly with this prologue than do Vir. Ill. vii. and other passages. Origen, iv. 686, on Rom. xvi. 21, mentions, without approving, the view that Luke was the Lucius there referred to; which is impossible, if for no other reason, because Paul speaks of the latter, as of Jason and Sosipater, as Jews (vol. i. 417, n. 22). This view was known also in another form, namely, that the Luke supposed to be mentioned in Rom., i.e. Lucius, became bishop of Laodicea in Syria (Dorotheus on the 70 disciples, Chronicon Paschale, Bonn ed. ii. 126). Modern scholars (Wettstein, N.T. ii. 532; Bengel, Gnomon on Luke i. 1, 3, ed. Stuttgart, 1860, pp. 204, 205) were the first to undertake the identification of Luke with Lucius of Cyrene (Acts xiii. 1), explaining thus the tradition that he was an Antiochian. But (1) no one of the early writers thought that Luke was mentioned in that passage, and the text tradition of Acts xiii. 1 shows no trace of this identification. It cannot, therefore, be the source of the very old tradition in question. (2) The idea that Luke was a native of Antioch, or even Syria, could not arise from a passage in which a Lucius living in Antioch is called a Cyrenian. (3) Luke (Lucas) has nothing to do with the name Lucius, or Λεύκιος, as it is commonly written in Greek, but is an abbreviation of Lucanus (perhaps also Lucilius, Lucillus, Lucinus, Lucinius, but certainly not Lucianus). It may be due to authentic tradition that in the Old Latin Bible, along with the thoroughly Greek cata Lucan (Evang. Palat. ed. Tisch. 232), we find not infrequently secundum Lucanum, which is probably the original form. So Cod. Vindobon. ed. Belsheim, 1885, p. 1 ff.; Vere., Ambrosian., Corbei. in Bianchini, Evang. Quadrupl. ii. 2, 208; Old Latin Bible Texts, ii. 85; further—as Turner (JThS, 1905, June, p. 256 f.) has recently proved by use of new material—in Cyprian's Testimonia, also in Priscillian, ed. Schepps, 47. 4, and on a sarcophagus of the fifth century at Arles; cf. Schultze, Greifswalder Stud. S. 157; Mercati, JThS, 1905, April, p. 435. The present writer finds a Lucanus in Cypr. Ep. lxxvii. 3, lxxviii. 1, lxxix.; a Lucas in August. Ep. clxxix. 1. He knows of no one bearing the name earlier than our evangelist. Cf. C. I. G. Nos. 4700k (in the add. vol. iii. 1189) and 4759 from Egypt. In Eus. H. E. iv. 2. 3 the reading handed down is Λουκούα (in gen.), but Rufinus has Luca, Syr. Lukia.

5. (P. 2.) Clem. Recogn. x. 71 says in describing the great success of Peter's preaching in Antioch: "Ita ut omni aviditatis desiderio Theophilus, qui erat cunctis potentibus in civitate sublimior, domus suæ ingentem basilicam ecclesiæ nomine consecraret, in qua Petro apostolo constituta est ab omni populo cathedra," etc. Later writers, spinning out this thread, made the Theophilus of Luke a bishop of Antioch (pseudo-Hippol. at the close of the Const. Ap. ed. Lagarde, p. 284; cf. min. 293 in Tischend. N.T. i. 738), and finally identified him with the well-known bishop and apologete, circa 180; cf. Cotelier on Recogn. x. 71. For this, however, the author of the Recogn. is not to be held responsible. Nor can his graphic account be compared with the colourless statement in Const. Ap. vii. 46 to the effect that, after Zacchæus (Luke xix. 2) and Cornelius (Acts x. 1), a Theophilus was appointed third bishop of Cæsarea by the apostles. Along with the N.T., Eusebius' Church History is the main source of Const. Ap. vii. 46, and this Theophilus of Cæsarea is identical with the one (circa 190) mentioned in Eus. H. E. v. 22. Whether the Theophilus mentioned as joint addressee in the seventh letter of Seneca to Paul (ed. Hase, iii. 478) is the same as Luke's, cannot be decided. Without absolutely disputing the historicity of the person outright, Origen, Hom. i. in Luc. applied the name, Theophilus, to everyone who is loved by God—which is not even linguistically correct (better Jerome, amicus vel amator dei, see Morin, Anecd. Maredsol. iii. 3. 20). Salvianus, Ep. ix. 18, goes so far as to say that Luke addressed the two books ad amorem dei. A preacher under the name of Chrysostom (Montfaucon, iii. 765 f., see above, p. 3, n. 1) infers, no doubt, simply from the title κράτιστε in Luke i. 3—which in Luke's time meant just what λαμπρότατε did later—that Theophilus was an imperial governor, and, like Sergius Paulus (Acts xiii. 7), had become a Christian while in that office. As to this it may be remarked that the prefects of Egypt had the title κράτιστος till about 160, and after that λαμπρότατος, but that senatorial rank need not be inferred from the latter; cf. Wilcken in Hermes, 1885, S. 469 f., 1893, S. 237; Berl. Ägypt. Urkunden, i. 373, ii. 373.

6. (P. 2.) With regard to Luke as the brother referred to in 2 Cor. viii. 18 and his Gospel as that of Paul's, see vol. ii. 385. The contradiction between this exegetical "discovery" and the much older tradition that Luke was written after Mark, and, consequently, after Paul's death, was not noticed. Still, if Luke was occupied for some time in Philippi as an evangelist in the N.T. sense of the word, it may be that he is really intended in 2 Cor. viii. 18, in an allusion to this work; for 2 Cor. was written in Macedonia, and in the interval between the we-sections of Acts xvi. 10 ff. and Acts xx. 5 ff. (§ 60). Even Iren. iii. 14. 1 began to exaggerate somewhat when he inferred from Acts xvi. 8 ff. (for he allowed the "we" to begin in xvi. 8) in contrast to xv. 39, as also from 2 Tim. iv. 11, that Luke was inseparably associated with Paul. This again was further pressed into an assertion that in the entire book of Acts he recorded only what he himself had experienced (Eus. H. E. iii. 4. 7; Jerome, Vit. Ill. vii.; not yet true of Canon Mur. lines 34 f., see GK, ii. 54, and cf. ii. 28). That Luke had been a disciple of other apostles also (Iren. iii. 10. 1, 14. 2) was the more easily inferred from Luke i. 2, if one saw in the παρηκαλουθηκότι ἀναθεῖν πάντες of ver. 3 a reference to his accompanying the eye-witnesses as a disciple or a travelling-companion; so probably Justin (Dial. ciii., see vol. ii. 389), and clearly Eus. H. E. iii. 4. 7; Epiph. Har. li. 7; pseudo-Euthalius (Zacagni, 421). This is not impossible linguistically (see vol. ii. 455), but is forbidden by the context. Luke, like Mark (vol. ii. 145, n. 3), was declared in the fourth century to have been one of the seventy, or seventy-two, disciples, Luke x. 1 (Adamantius, Dial. c. Marc. ed. Bakhuyzen, p. 10. 14 ; Epiph. Hær. li. 11 ; Anaceph. ed. Pet. 138). The identification with the unnamed companion of Cleopas, Luke xxiv. 13-18, is much later (cf. Forsch. vi. 350). In the Acts of Paul (ed. Lipsius, p. 104. 2, 117. 5), Luke is joined with Titus, and instead of Crescens (2 Tim. iv. 10), is sent to Gaul, which explains the confused statements of Epiph. Hær. li. 11. His work as evangelist came naturally to be regarded as a higher counterpart of his medical work, Eus. H. E. iii. 4. 7 ; Jerome, Epist. liii. 8 ; Paulinus Nol. Carm. xxvii. 424 ; Prologue to Acts in Wordsworth, N.T. Lat. ii. 2. 9, 3. 1. The passages, 1 Cor. ix. 9, 1 Tim. v. 18, 2 Tim. ii. 6, were the more readily applied to the evangelist among Paul's disciples (cf. Aug. Doctr. Christ. ii. 10. 15 ; Prol. to Gospels, N.T. Lat. ed. Wordsworth, i. 271. 5) because the bos was made his symbol from early times (see vol. ii. 399, n. 7),—in better taste, at least, than when Baronius, Annales ad a. 58, n. 34, put forward the conjecture that the symbol was chosen in allusion to his name and the bos Luca or Lucanus, i.e. the elephant. A Greek legend appears to be the source of the tradition that Luke was unmarried, that he wrote his Gospel in Achaia and later than Matt. and Mark, and that he died in Bithynia at the age of seventy-four or eighty-four ; cf. Prol. Wordsworth, i. 269. 4 ff., 271. 3 ff., ii. 1. 4. Niceph. Call. ii. 43 says he died at eighty, in Hellas, where he had previously sojourned, first meeting Paul at seven-gated Thebes, that is to say, in Bœotia. A glance at Acts xvi. 7-10 and a comparison of the Latin prologues shows that Bœotia has arisen from Bithynia. Jerome combines the two statements of the Latin prologues, and says, provided that he is the author of the Præf. Comm. in Mat. (Vall. vii. 3 ; Wordsworth, i. 12, 13) in Achaia Bœotiaque (al. Bithyniaque) partibus volumen condidit ; cf. Paulin. Carm. xix. 83, Creta Titum sumpsit, medicum Bœotia Lucam. In 357 A.D. the remains of Andrew and Luke were brought from Achaia, and Timothy's from Ephesus, to Constantinople (Jerome, Vir. Ill. vii. contra Vigilant. ed. Vall. ii. 391 ; Chron. Anno 2372 ; Philost. H. E. iii. 2 ; Theodorus Lector, ii. 61 ; Niceph. Call. ii. 43). The origin of the tradition that Luke was a painter has not yet been made clear, even by E. v. Dobschütz, Christusbilder, ii. 267--280. According to Theodorus Lector, i. 1—if this is not an addition made by the compiler of the extracts (v. Dobschütz, 271)—a picture of Mary supposed to have been painted by Luke was sent from Jerusalem to Constantinople by the empress Eudocia about 440. Cf. J. A. Schmid, De Imagin. Mariæ a Luka Pictis, Helmstedt, 1714, n. 2. Since the word ιστορίαι was used of paintings as early as Nilus, Ep. iv. 61, and ιστορεῖν with the Byzantians was equivalent to ζωγραφεῖν, Theodore's words (τὴν εἰκόνα τῆς θεοτόκου, ἣν ὁ ἀπόστολος Λουκᾶς καθιστόρησεν) certainly cannot be understood otherwise. But may not the whole myth go back originally to an early misunderstanding of the word καθιστορεῖν ? It is not Luke, to be sure, but Leucius, who repeatedly reports (καθιστόρησεν ?) concerning contemporary portraits of Christ and the apostle John, and it is he also who reports legends concerning Mary ; cf. the present writer—Acta Jo. pp. 214. 7, 215. 13, 223 f.

7. (P. 3.) Though Iren. iii. 1. 1 (vol. ii. 398) gives the time and place of the other Gospels with more or less exactness, all he knows with regard to Luke is that it is the third in the order of composition. Perhaps Clement (vol. ii. 394 f.), or his teachers, had already inferred from the conclusion of Acts that it, and the Gospel with it, were written just after the expiration of the two years mentioned, Acts xxviii. 30. Euthalius (Zacagni, 531) makes this same affirmation with regard to Acts. Jerome (Vir. Ill. vii.) concludes from the ending of Acts that it was written in Rome, and so intimates indirectly that it was written at the close of those two years. In Greek minuscules, at times Rome, also, however, the "Attica belonging to Boeotia," are mentioned as the place where Luke's Gospel was written (Tischendorf, 8th ed. i. 738; cf. the meaningless combination Achaïæ Boeotiæque in n. 6 above, as if Boeotia did not belong to Achaia). Macedonia also was sometimes spoken of as the place of composition of both Luke and Acts (Doctrine of the Apostles in Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents, p. 32; an Arabic authority in Tischendorf, N.T. i. 738), a view which is easily explained by the early interpretation of 2 Cor. viii. 18, see above, n. 6. Ephrem (Ev. Concord. Expos. p. 286) probably gave Antioch as the place of the composition of the Gospel; cf. Forsch. i. 54 f. The later Syrian tradition, quoted on the same pages, gave Alexandria. This view grew on Greek soil, for according to Tisch. loc. cit. it is found in seven Greek minuscules. Consequently it is probable that it arose from Const. Ap. vii. 46, where, after Mark has been named as consecrator of Annianus, the first bishop of Alexandria, Luke is said to have ordained Abilius, the successor of Annianus. Since it could not be an apostle, a second evangelist was named along with the first from sheer perplexity. In short, nothing was known about it. In a later liturgical fragment (in Grenfell and Hunt, Greek Papyri, Series ii. p. 170), Luke as apostle and archbishop of Alexandria is even placed before the apostle and archbishop Mark. Also the Syriac Martyrdom of Luke (edited by Nau, Revue de L'Orient Chrét. [1898] iii. 151 ff.) contains nothing of historical tradition.

§ 59. THE TWOFOLD RECENSION OF THE TEXT OF ACTS.

In the preceding investigations it has been possible to proceed without entering, except incidentally, into questions of text criticism. Here, however, the case is different, and the investigation of both of Luke's books depends at essential points—as, for example, in connection with the question of the author's witness to himself in Acts—to a considerable extent upon the answer to the question in which of the records we possess the original form of the text.

Recently Fr. Blass, following several earlier attempts in the same direction (n. 1), which were for the most part, however, barren of results, has energetically attempted to prove that two recensions of Acts are to be distinguished, exhibiting characteristic differences in contents and style, both of which go back to very early times, and neither of which could have originated from the other by the ordinary processes of text tradition, i.e. through unrelated interpolations, emendations, glosses, and scribal errors, but must have come—both of them—from the author himself. According to his view, Luke, who wrote Acts in Rome shortly after the two years mentioned in Acts xxviii. 30, revised the first draft of his book before he let it pass into Theophilus' hands. The first copy (recension β or editio Romana) remained in the possession of Luke and his Roman friends, and naturally circulated chiefly in the West, while the second copy or improved edition (recension α or editio Antiochena) predominated in the East. Blass limited his hypothesis, at the outset, strictly to Acts (ThStKr, 1894, S. 118), later, however, he broadened it to include the Gospel, but without making his case any stronger. According to Blass, the Gospel, which was written as early as Paul's imprisonment in Cæsarea, was afterwards revised and re-edited by Luke in Rome, so that the case here is the reverse of what we find in Acts, and recension β is the improved second edition, recension α the first draft. For the present we confine our attention to Acts.

To begin with, we must rid ourselves of the idea that we possess β only in one Greek MS.—perhaps the codex Bezae Cantabrigiensis (D)—which originally suggested these observations, or only in one complete translation. On the contrary, there is a large amount of material at our disposal (n. 3), on the basis of which it is possible to claim that for centuries a form of the text (β) was prevalent in different parts of the Church, varying widely throughout in contents and language from the text of Acts dominant later (α). This was the case in the West from Irenæus to Jerome. The fragments of the Old

Latin translation and the citations of a writer like Cyprian are sufficient to prove that this version, at least in its original form, which goes back to between 200 and 240 A.D., is derived from a Greek text which is related to the text of our oldest Greek MSS. (α ABC, etc.) in the way indicated above. It is possible that the latter text existed in the West in numerous exemplars long before Jerome's time, but we cannot prove it. On the other hand, we know that Western readers, who were confined to their Latin versions, as the Roman interpreter of the Pauline Epistles, known as Ambrosiaster (370 A.D.), rejected the α text on the ground that it was interpolated by the Greeks (nn. 3, 5). So far as we know, it was not until a later date that the α text influenced appreciably the Latin texts of the West. The Græco-Latin text of Codex D, written in the sixth century, is the outcome of very complicated developments, mixtures, and corruptions, but nevertheless retains in its Greek portion important features of the form of Acts known to Irenæus, and to the first, unknown interpres Latinus. The Alexandrian scholars, Clement and Origen, seem to have used a text practically identical with α (n. 2); but there must have been also a β text which circulated in Egypt in their time, and which was highly esteemed, otherwise we are at a loss to understand why it was that the Sahidic, presumably the oldest Egyptian version, written possibly during Origen's lifetime, while not adopting β in its entirety, did take over important elements of it. These were afterwards removed in the later Egyptian version, the Coptic proper. It is possible that at this time texts existed in Egypt which represented a mixture of α and β . Such a text was found by the Syrian, Thomas of Heraclea, as late as the year 616, in the Anthony cloister in Alexandria, and he borrowed from it a number of readings belonging to β , adopting some of them into his revision of the Philoxenian version, putting others on the margin as noteworthy variant readings. In this way Syrian scholars of the Middle Ages afterwards became acquainted with the fragments of a text which—in how pure a form we do not know—was at the basis of the oldest Syriac translation of Acts. Meanwhile, however, the a recension triumphed in the Syrian Church also, and in the Bible which was used in the Syrian Church, the Peshito, only scattered traces remain, showing affinity with the original text of the Syriac Acts, and these would not be noticed now save by a few (n. 3). Wherever we find traces of β, whether in the West, in Egypt, or in Syria, it seems to represent the earlier form of the text, while a represents the later form. With those to whose historical sense these facts do not appeal further discussion is useless.

The β text is not in our possession, but evidences that it existed at an early date in parts of the Church, widely separated from one another, put us under obligation to discover it. Gratitude is due to the philologist who has devoted so much energy and shown so much acumen in restoring it as far as was possible. The main difficulty in all the investigation arises from the fact that, with the exception of a number of fragments, β is preserved to us only in texts which are strongly mixed with a, or represent a predominantly. Since undoubtedly a also dates back to a very early time, we are unable to say how early the process of mixing began at various points in the Church. Furthermore, it is to be remembered that β, which possibly Irenæus and the first Syrian and also the first Latin translator had before them in an unmixed form, could and presumably did undergo numerous changes through internal developments, apart from the influence of a, before it came into the hands of these writers. By no means all the variants from a which we find it necessary to class with β, because of difference from a, and similarity to β, are at once to be regarded as necessarily an original part of β . As was natural, and as is proved by numerous examples, the most radical changes in the text of the N.T. were made as early as in the second century.

Assuming then the existence of a β recension, in order to answer the question concerning the origin and relation of α and β it is necessary to enter into details. In and of itself it is quite conceivable: (1) that β is a modification of α , and that either this took place suddenly or developed gradually, appearing in the West some time between 120 and 150. After gaining a certain currency and authority there, it circulated in Syria and in Egypt. It is also possible: (2) that β is the original form of the text which was deliberately worked over into the form α by recensionists, more or less learned, who improved the style, and removed much that was unnecessary. This revised Acts, which necessarily commended itself to scholars and to the heads of the Church, circulated under their patronage and finally replaced β almost completely. It is further possible: (3) that α and β are both original, if, as Blass assumes, the author issued two editions of his work, as was very frequently done in ancient times (n. 4). In favour of the first possibility is the undeniable fact that texts which are undoubtedly spurious, e.g. Mark xvi. 9–20, or the apocryphal additions to Matt. xx. 28, were in circulation from Lyons to Edessa as early as the second and third centuries (vol. ii. 486, n. 9). In favour of the second possibility is the equally undoubted fact that from an early date changes were made in the N.T. text, partly for dogmatic, partly for stylistic, and partly for liturgical reasons. In many passages this caused either the complete or the almost complete disappearance of the original text from the Church (n. 5). Only here, as in every other instance of the kind, it is necessary to understand this revision of the text as independent of the myth of a canonisation of the N.T. writings in connection with the equally mythical rise of the Catholic Church about the year 170. For, while Rome, Lyons, and Carthage were parts of the Catholic Church, they retained β after as before the revision, and knew little of α until sometime in the fourth century, and to some extent refused to recognise it. It must also be borne in mind that, while Origen lamented the confusion of the N.T. text, and was the first to think of remedying it, he never became the text critic of the N.T. (GK, i. 74, A.). But, according to this second hypothesis, the revision in question was thoroughgoing and carefully planned, affecting contents as well as style, and indeed of such a character that it must have been made long before Origen's time. The first hypothesis mentioned, namely, that of a gradual or sudden rise of β on the basis of α , is likewise out of harmony with the facts. If this were its origin, we should not have in β simply single interesting sayings or narratives added, designed to enrich the book, nor should we have simply single instances where the narrative is rendered awkward by such additions, but we should have a systematic recasting of the text without essential enrichment of the contents, showing a general deterioration in the style. Only the third possibility remains. Decisive proof of the essential correctness of Blass' hypothesis is to be found in the following considerations: (1) The facts to be found in β and not in α are neutral in character. They are not such as would be excised, nor are they important enough to call for insertion. (2) Notwithstanding the difference in their contents, α and β never really contradict each other. (3) Both recensions exhibit throughout the style characteristic of the larger part of the book, which is the same in both recensions.

A few examples will suffice to make this clear. It has been previously remarked (above, p. 2) that the tradition which makes Luke a native of Antioch is in agreement with the β text of Acts xi. 27, but could not well have originated from this text. Still less can β be a gloss suggested by that tradition. An interpreter or scribe who wanted to insert a marginal note in connection with a passage of Acts to the effect that Luke was a member of the Church in Antioch, or who wanted to incorporate this remark in the text, would have selected some other passage like xiii. 1, and would have written, καὶ ἐγὼ Λουκᾶς ὁ Ἀντιοχεύς (§ 60, n. 11). What follows in the β text after xi. 27, "And there was great rejoicing. And when we were assembled, one of them by the name of Agabus spoke," etc., certainly does not sound as if it were an intentional addition, designed to indicate that the narrator was a member of this assembly. It seems to us rather to be the involuntary impression of the memory of the exalted state of feeling produced in the infant Church by the visit and messages of the Jewish prophets. The originality of the words is further proved by the genuine Lucan character of the language (n. 6). On the other hand, α could not have been produced from β by a corrector, since correctors who did not object to the sudden and repeated appearance and disappearance of "we" from xvi. 10 onwards could not well have rejected the "we" in this passage. Nor is the description of the joyful state of feeling that prevailed in the Christian assemblies something exceptional in Acts (ii. 46, xv. 3, xvi. 34); it certainly was not objectionable to later readers. The only other hypothesis possible is to suppose that the author himself, when he revised the first draft (β) of his work, found the description of the gathering where he had been present not only unnecessary, but even out of keeping with the style of his outline sketch of conditions in the Church at Antioch during the early years of its history (xi. 19-30). In this manner α arose from β . In chap. xii. we find in β a whole series of additions, part of which it would have been entirely impossible for a corrector to invent without the aid of knowledge derived from sources other than a, e.g. the seven steps which led down from the castle of Antonia to the street (xii. 10). Other of these additions are so harmless and so unnecessary, that they could not have arisen from the necessity of explaining the text (n. 7). On the other hand, they do not contain anything of a character which might have led a corrector to omit them. Since, however, there is nothing, either in contents or style, contradictory to a, it follows that this is another case where the author, in revising his book, cut out unnecessary details. The especial interest of the author in the continuance and condition of the Church of Antioch, which is apparent even in the common text of xiii. 1, has, unless all the facts are deceptive, found in β an especially vivid expression in the statement that Lucius of Cyrene was still living when Acts was written, whereas the other teachers of the Church of the years 43–50 were already dead (n. 6). The statement of Acts xviii. 22 in a has often been taken to mean that Paul, after his first short visit in Ephesus and his landing in Cæsarea, visited Jerusalem. But this interpretation is to be rejected as being quite unsupported by the text, to say nothing of the surprise which one must feel at the entire lack of information concerning this visit to Jerusalem (n. 8). Luke says simply that Paul landed in Cæsarea, greeted the Church in that city, and journeyed to Antioch. If the goal of this journey were Syria (ver. 18), that is to say Palestine (cf. xx. 3), it remains unexplained why he went no farther than Cæsarea; or, if his objective point were Antioch, where he made a stay of some length (ver. 23), it is not clear why he went to Cæsarea at all, instead of journeying directly to Seleucia, and thence to Antioch. We have also elsewhere similar cursory sketches of journeys, e.g. xx. 1–4 (n. 9), and, formally considered, the account in question lacks nothing; however, it leaves the reader, who seeks a clear conception of what took place, unsatisfied. From β alone we learn that Paul actually intended, when he left Corinth, to journey to Jerusalem, there to take part in the approaching feast, and that he urged the importance of this journey as an excuse for the brevity of his first visit in Ephesus (ver. 21). Afterwards, however, we learn (xix. 1) that Paul was prevented from carrying out this plan by an exhortation of the Spirit, by which he was directed to turn back to Ephesus (without continuing his journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem). The intention to go to Jerusalem suggests xx. 16, but not a single word in xviii. 21 suggests that the addition in β is borrowed from this passage. Similar cases where Paul's own plans were set aside by a warning of the Spirit are to be found in xvi. 6 f., according to β also in xvii. 15 (vol. i. 214, n. 7; Harris, Four Lectures, p. 47), and again later in xx. 3. Comparable also is the almost reverse case, where Paul refuses to be hindered by prophetic utterances from continuing his last journey to Jerusalem (xx. 23, xxi. 4, 11-14). But here again it will be observed that the expression in xix. 1 is entirely original (n. 8 end). If there be no question that this revelation took place in Caesarea, then it cannot be regarded purely as a coincidence that at this time Paul was among those who cultivated the gift of prophecy (xxi. 9), and that in one other passage, in which an account of such a revelation of the Spirit is given (xvii. 15, here again only in β), he was journeying in company with a prophet. The injunction of the Spirit to Paul, "Return to Asia," i.e. "Do not proceed further on the journey to Jerusalem," is to be regarded as a prophetic utterance of the Church spoken by someone near the apostle (vol. i. 207, 227 f., 237, n. 6; vol. ii. 110 f.), as is true in all analogous cases, especially where direct address is used (xiii. 2, xxi. 11; but cf. β , xx. 3). Possibly it was the prophetically gifted daughters of Philip (xxi. 9) who "spoke to Paul through the Spirit" (cf. xxi. 4), or, in other words, through whom the Spirit spoke to Paul (cf. xiii. 2, xxi. 11); just as it was the prophet Silas through whom the Spirit spoke in xvi. 6, 7, and, according to β , in xvii. 15 also. Is it conceivable that one whose only sources were α and his inkstand, should introduce these transactions into the narrative just in those passages where it can be proved historically that they are possible and really presupposed? And if, like ourselves, he had reached this conclusion by a process of combination, could he have failed to mention Silas and the prophetesses in Caesarea? The only other thing which it is possible to suppose is that out of the fulness of his knowledge the author wrote down much in his first draft (β) which he cut out again in the revision (α), because it was unnecessary and in parts might even be misunderstood. An improvement in style is shown in α , as compared with β , by connecting xix. 1 with the episode in xviii. 24-28 and by resuming in the same verse the account of the journey interrupted in xviii. 23. But anyone who has had occasion to correct his own work, with a view to cutting out whatever seems superfluous and otherwise awkward, knows that in this process it is easy to lose some of the original freshness, and that not everything designed as an improvement is really such. In Acts xx. 12 a picture is spoiled in the α text with no corresponding gain, a picture which, to be sure, is only imperfectly developed in β . Paul leaves the house where he had talked to the assembled congregation until the break of day. The narrator, with the greater part of the company of travellers, departs to the harbour and goes on board the ship, while Paul plans to follow by land somewhat later. The last glimpse which Luke had, as the ship departed, was that of the Christians beckoning and calling good-bye to him and his companions, and in their midst Paul holding by the hand the young man whom he had restored to life (n. 10).

It has been supposed that, according to the common text of xxi. 16, the house of Mnason, where Paul and his numerous travelling companions (n. 9) were entertained, was in Jerusalem. It is peculiar, of course, that no mention of the arrival in Jerusalem is made until ver. 17. It is equally strange that Christians from Cæsarea should accompany Paul and his companions all the way to Jerusalem in order to secure lodging for him in the house of Mnason, notwithstanding the fact that in the large congregation in Jerusalem, where now, as earlier, Paul received a most cordial welcome (xxi. 17, cf. xv. 4), there must certainly have been several houses where entertainment would have been most gladly furnished him, and where assistance would have been rendered in caring for the numerous strangers. All these difficulties are cleared up by β . Mnason lived in a village on the way from Cæsarea to Jerusalem. Paul and his companions were accompanied to this point by Christians from Cæsarea, who provided him with entertainment for the one night with a good and aged Christian—perhaps the only well-to-do Christian—in a little congregation in Samaria or Sharon (Acts viii. 4–17, ix. 31–43, xv. 4). This is what is meant in α ; but the abbreviation of the narrative produced a certain lack of clearness.

The text relations of Acts xv. —a chapter naturally much considered from the earliest times—are peculiar. Even in the early verses of the chapter (vv. 1–5) the witnesses from which our knowledge of β is derived show variations from α which at once give rise to the suspicion that originally they were not a part of β (n. 11). Even more in the case of vv. 15, 20, 29—from which xxi. 25 cannot be separated—readings occur which it is impossible to reconcile with α , if this variant form be correctly transmitted in our oldest MSS. and in the majority of citations and versions—readings, therefore, which certainly cannot have the same author as a. Particularly but not exclusively in connection with the decree, xv. 29, the following peculiarities are to be noticed: (A) The omission of καὶ πνικτῶν or καὶ τοῦ πνικτοῦ; (B) the famous saying: καὶ ὅσα μὴ θέλουσιν (θέλετε) ἑαυτοῖς γενέσθαι, ἑτέροις (ἐτέρῳ) μὴ ποιεῖν (ποιεῖτε), which is frequently found after the enumeration of the four or three things from which the Gentiles were to abstain; (C) the addition φερόμενοι ἐν (τῷ) ἀγίῳ πνεύματι after εὖ πράξετε (n. 12). A is clearly a mutilation, since if καὶ πνικτῶν were a spurious addition, the most natural place for its insertion would be in the decree itself, xv. 29, then in xv. 20, and least natural of all in xxi. 25. But as a matter of fact it is in xxi. 25 that evidence for this fourth item is strongest. Since, moreover, it is inconceivable that the author should have recorded the decree more fully in an incidental reference (xxi. 25) than in the passage where he gives its original form (xv. 29), and in the discourse of the mover of the resolution (xv. 20), it follows that καὶ πνικτῶν is genuine in all the cases where it occurs. While always retained in the East, before the time of Irenæus and Tertullian it disappeared from the text commonly used in the Western Church. But that it belonged originally in the Western text is proved also by the custom of the Church in abstaining from the use of the flesh of animals which had been strangled, or which had died a natural death, as is witnessed by Tertullian; although he no longer found this passage in the text (n. 12). Nor is A to be regarded as a defect due merely to accident. It connects itself with a tendency variously manifested in other parts of the Church also. Only after the word “strangled” had been removed was it possible to make “blood” refer to human blood, and to find here, as Tertullian did, a commandment against murder. In accordance with this interpretation, the use of flesh offered to idols was made to refer to idolatrous worship itself (n. 13), and unchastity was narrowed to mean adultery. Thus we get the three mortal sins: Idololatria, mœchia, homicidium. The apostolic enactment, which had reference only to certain phases of moral life emphasised by the conditions of the time, became thus a sort of elementary moral catechism. C is of the same general character, and like A was confined to the West, being the only text possessed by Irenæus (who also gives A and B), and by Tertullian (who also gives A). It is true that in the East also the conclusion of the apostolic communication, which had a secular sound (εὖ πράξετε. ἔρρωσθε, "So shall it be well with you. Farewell"), was given a moral and religious turn—the former phrase being taken as a general injunction to good conduct, and the latter being enlarged into a Christian formula (n. 14). But this process was carried further in the West, and good conduct in general, which was left undefined, was referred to the power of the Holy Spirit in the sense of Phil. iii. 15 (D, Irenæus, Tertullian), which opened the way for an extension of Church morality. The secular valet was also stricken out (n. 14). How widely C was circulated in the West it is impossible to say; in the East it did not make headway. On the other hand, the East was the home of B. While this text was not known to Tertullian, unless all appearances fail this locus communis was accepted as a part of the apostolic decree by the apologist Aristides of Athens in 140, and by the apologist Theophilus of Antioch in 180. Moreover, in B alone (without A and C) xv. 20 and 29 are witnessed to by Origen, the Sahidic version, the Neoplatonist Porphyry, and Greek cursives, and in xv. 29 by Thomas of Heraclea (n. 12).

The spuriousness of the saying is proved by the fact that its omission is entirely inconceivable in view of the general tendency to construe the decree as a moral catechism for those "turning from the Gentiles to God" (xv. 19), especially where this tendency had already exerted a strong influence upon the text (Tertullian). On the other hand, the addition of this "simple, true, and beautiful law, without question applicable to Christians," as it is called in the Didascalia (Syriac ed. p. 2. 7), is fully explained by just this tendency. Direct occasion for its addition among the Greeks in the East was given by the Didache, which was much prized by them. In the first part of this document, which was intended "for the Gentiles" and appointed to be read to candidates for baptism (chaps. i.-vi., cf. vii. 1), this commandment stands at the very beginning (i. 2) along with the commandment to love God and one's neighbour, while at the conclusion of the same part (vi. 3) restrictions regarding the use of food are mentioned, only one of which, however, is unconditional, namely that relating to things offered to idols. Since this writing was regarded as a teaching of the apostles, it was deemed all the more permissible to enrich from this source the apostolic decree, parts of which had become obsolete (§ 62). That this was the origin of the insertion is betrayed also by the fact that the sentence structure is not always smooth where these words are incorporated in the text (n. 15). The insertion was made in the East between 110 and 140, soon after which B began to circulate in the West, though its acceptance was by no means general. Tertullian does not have B, although it is found in Irenæus, Cyprian, and many later Latin writers, also in D. But only in Irenæus and D is it demonstrably fused with the two Western variants, A and C. It may be considered certain that the author of Acts was not responsible for this mixtum compositum, nor for any one of its three elements, all of which give an interpretation unhistorical in character. The only reason why A and C can be regarded as deteriorations of the original β text is the fact that they originated and circulated in the region where the β recension predominated; while B could just as easily have been inserted first in an exemplar of the α text, from which it found its way into copies of α as also of β .

Although in this important point and in many others less important, readings, which Blass explains as part of the original text, prove to be only deteriorations of it dating back to an early time, the essential correctness of his hypothesis remains unaffected. On the other hand, his extension of the theory to the Gospel of Luke is untenable. The text which Blass gives us as the second or Roman edition of the Gospel, prepared by Luke himself, is substantially nothing but a bold attempt to restore what is known as the Western text (n. 16). The question which has been answered in so many ways as to the value of this form of the text—it can hardly be called a recension—is by no means confined to the third Gospel, but arises also in connection with the other Gospels and the Epistles of Paul. The only difference in this regard between the Gospels on the one hand, and the Epistles and Acts on the other, is occasioned by the existence of Tatian's Diatessaron. While it is true that this work of Tatian's is as yet far from being fully restored, it is nevertheless a valuable source, which, taken together with the Western witnesses, enables us to determine accurately the age of many Western readings, and also to explain the circulation of this form of the text from the Rhone to the Tigris. In addition, we have for the Gospel of Luke, and for this Gospel alone, the Gospel edited by Marcion in Rome about 145, our knowledge of which is far from complete, but much more accurate than it once was (GK, i. 585–718, ii. 409–529). It is not strange, therefore, that in the case of Luke the variation of the so-called Western text—which here also may be designated as β —from the text (α) preserved in our oldest MSS. and the majority of Greek witnesses comes more clearly to view than in the case of the other Gospels, and particularly the Epistles. But throughout the question is essentially the same. There must be made a much more extended study of β —in the widest sense in which β is used—before a unanimous conclusion can be reached by the critics. There are as yet no definite results, the statement of which would properly find place in a text-book. But those who hold that our oldest MSS. ($\aleph B$) are to be dated about 200 years later than Marcion, Tatian, and Irenæus, and who have some feeling for the difference between originality which is naïve and uniformity due to liturgical, dogmatic, and stylistic considerations, must in a general way agree on the following points: (1) Very much that is original both as regards contents and form is preserved in β , which was of a character that, for the reasons indicated above, early led to changes, and after the close of the third century to excision by learned recensionists of the text (Lucian, Hesychius, and Pamphilus). (2) A large number of arbitrary additions and verbal modifications were made in β throughout the whole of the period during which the text of the N.T. remained without systematic revision, and when it developed without the regular control either of the Church or of scholars. More of these additions and modifications were made in the more naïve period from 150 to 200 than later, and in the Gospels much more than in the other N.T. books. This was natural, in the first place because the recollection of parallel texts led to the enrichment of each of the Gospels from the parallels, and, in the second place, because there were reports concerning words and deeds of Jesus which had not found their way into the four Gospels, but which were retained in the oral tradition until the beginning of the second century, and then continued to survive in writings like the five books of Papias. (3) The difficult problem will be solved to be sure only approximately, at any rate, however, only as two extremes are avoided: on the one hand, superstitious reverence for our so-called best MSS., which is often accompanied by a corresponding contempt for much older traditions, is to be laid aside; on the other hand, the critic must beware of an unhealthy fondness for all the interesting products and excrescences of the wild tradition of the second and third centuries, and of the feeling that goes with it that the learned recensionists from 300 onwards were simple destroyers of the text, to be compared, if not as regards orthodoxy, at least in matters of taste, to the enlightened revisers of German Church hymns in the rationalistic period. Applying these principles, we shall find in the case of Luke and of other N.T. writings in the β text, of which here also D may be regarded as our clearest witness: (1) a number of apocryphal additions (n. 17), and (2) many cases where words are substituted and transposed, often for very trivial reasons (n. 18). (3) We shall find also a number of texts, giving material for the most part important, and exhibiting an originality such as could not have been invented, which were wrongly set aside by the tradition of the third and fourth centuries (n. 19). This complicated relation between β and α is to be observed in all the Gospels, being more marked in Luke than in the others for the reasons indicated above. But we are not confronted in Luke as in Acts with parallels which make equal claims to acceptance, but the question is always an alternative between what Luke did write and what he could have written. This conclusion with regard to the texts of Luke does not in any way weaken the other conclusion that in Acts we have a twofold form of the text. This fact, however, is of importance in connection with the question as to the origin of Luke's work. In determining his witness concerning himself in Acts, α and β are to be treated as of equal value. Whether the author who edited the second part of his work twice was what he claims to be, or only a compiler and fabricator of a somewhat later period, does not enter into the question here under discussion.

1. (P. 8.) According to Semler (Wetstenii libelli ad crisin NTi. 1766, p. 8), JO. CLERICUS (in what writing?) under the pseudonym of Critobulus Hierapolitanus was of opinion that Luke published Acts twice; and Hemsterhuis (where?) expressed a similar opinion in regard to still other N.T. writings. Deserving of mention here is also Acta apost. ad codicis Cantabrig. fidem ita rec. Bornemann, ut nunc demum divini libri primordia eluceant, Pars I, Grossenhain and London, 1848. In the winter of 1885-86, in the New Testament seminar in Erlangen the present writer proposed as subject for the prize competition: "Untersuchung der sachlich bedeutsamen Eigentümlichkeiten des cod. D in der AG" (Investigation of the essentially significant peculiarities of Cod. D in Acts), and required that the spread of these variants among Latin, Greek, Egyptian (Sahidic), and Syrian writers should be taken into account as far as this was possible for a student, using Tischendorf's apparatus. According to the purpose of the present writer at that time, the objective point which he hoped to see the investigation reach, and which Fr. Gleiss, now pastor in Westerland on the island of Sylt, in some measure approached, was: (That there is presented in this recension) "either the first draft of the author before publication, or the copy which the author used with his supplementary marginal notes." Further than this the present writer had not advanced, but was not surprised when FR. BLASS, without knowing his view, came forward with his more definitely conceived and more thoroughly elaborated hypothesis in the following publications: "Die Textüberlieferung in der AG" (ThStKr, 1894, S. 86-119); Acta apostolorum sive Lucae ad Theophilum liber alter, Ed. philol., Göttingen, 1895; "Über die verschiedenen Textesformen in den Schriften des Lc" (NKZ, 1895, S. 712-725; cf. NKZ, 1896, S. 964-971); "De duplici forma actorum Lucae" (Hermathena, 1895, ix. 121-143, as against Chase in the Critical Review, 1894, p. 300 ff.); ThStKr, 1896, S. 436-471; Acta ap. secundum formam quae videtur Romanam, Lips. 1896; Ev. sec. Lc. secundum f. R., Lips. 1897, with an extensive introduction; and, again, recently in ThStKr, 1900, 1 Heft. Those who expressed themselves as substantially in favour of this view were E. NESTLE, ChW, 1895, Nos. 13-15; cf., by the same author, Philologica sacra, 1896; ThStKr, 1896, S. 102-113; ZÖCKLER (Greifswalder Studien, 1895, S. 129-142); BELSER, Die Selbstverteidigung des Pl im Gl (Bibl. Stud. ed. Bardenhewer, Bd. i. 3. 189); Beiträge zur Erkl. der AG auf Grund der Lesearten des cod. D und seiner Genossen, 1897. Against Blass there have written, among others, P. CORSEN in GGA, 1896, S. 425 ff., and B. WEISS, Der cod. D in der AG, 1897. Of recent literature are mentioned: POTT, Der abendl. Text der AG und die Wirquelle, 1900; COPPIETERS, De historia textus actor. ap., Louvain, 1902; ERNST, "Die Blass'sche Hypothese und die Textgeschichte," ZfNTW, 1903, S. 310-320.

2. (P. 10.) Cf. Griesbach, Symbol. crit. ii. 457-468. On the addition to Acts xv. 20, which, as has been recently attested, Origen also used, see n. 11.

3. (Pp. 10, 11.) A survey of the sources of recension β seems necessary: I. The Greek witnesses with which we are concerned are (1) the Greek and Latin Cod. D sæc. vi., of which, until recently, Bezae Cod. Cantabrigiensis, ed. Scrivener, Cambridge, 1864 (now in the phototype edition, 2 vols. Cantabrig. 1899), has been the best edition to use. Cf. also the collation in NTi Supplementum, ed. Nestle, 1896. For criticism, cf. D. Schulz, Disputatio de cod. D, 1827; Credner, Beitr. zur Einl. (1832) i. 452-518; Rendel Harris, cod. Bezae Cantabr. 1891 (Texts and Stud. ii. 1); by the same author, Four Lectures on the Western Text, 1894; Chase, The Syriac element in the text of Cod. Bezae, 1893; furthermore the literature in n. 1. The Greek text of Acts viii. 29-x. 14, xxi. 2-10, xxi. 15-18, xxii. 10-20, xxii. 29-xxviii. 31 is wanting in D, and the defects of the Latin text do not coincide fully with these, inasmuch as the latter is written on the front of the leaf to the right of the Greek text which is upon the back of the preceding leaf. In addition, but only here and there of significance, are (2) Cod. E Laudianus, Oxon. (sæc. vi.), Greek and Latin, ed. Tischendorf, 1870, in Monumenta Sacra, ix.; (3) cod. min. 137, sæc. xi. (al. xiii.) in Milan; for the last four chapters newly compared by Blass, cf. Acta, ed. minor, p. xxi; fully compared by Mercati for Hilgenfeld; Actus apost. gr. et lat. 1899, p. ix. The collation of Min. 58 (Bodlei. Clarke, 9) in Pott (Der abendl. Text der AG und die Wirquelle, 1900, S. 78-88) offers only a little that is of value. Presumably there lies still in the minuscules, as well as in the Greek writers, a great deal of undiscovered material. To the latter belongs especially Irenæus, although he speaks to us almost entirely through a Latin translation; to a certain extent Tertullian also, inasmuch as he read the N.T. not in the Latin translation, but in the original. Traces of recension β in Chrysostom, perhaps due to dependence upon an older commentary, have been proved by Harris, Four Lect. pp. 91-96, and Conybeare, "On the Western text of the Acts as evidenced by Chrysostom" in AJPh, xvii. 2. A trace of the β text is contained in Pionius, Vita Polyc. chap. ii. (of the fourth century, see GGA, 1882, S. 289 ff.); for if the journey of Acts xviii. 23, xix. 1 through Galatia to Asia is there intended (cf. Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, Part I. vol. i. Ign. Polyc. 447), then the words $\mu\acute{\epsilon}\lambda\lambda\omega\nu \lambda\omicron\upsilon\pi\omicron\nu\nu \acute{\alpha}\pi\epsilon\iota\nu\alpha\iota \epsilon\iota\varsigma \text{ } \tau\epsilon\rho\omicron\sigma\sigma\acute{\omicron}\lambda\upsilon\mu\alpha$ would be based upon an inexact recollection of β xix. 1. II. The Latin witnesses all go back to the old Latin translation. This seems to be preserved in an almost uncorrupted form (1) in the fragments of a Paris palimpsest (Acts iii. 2-iv. 18, v. 23-viii. 2, ix. 4-23, xiv. 5-23, xvii. 34-xviii. 19, xxiii. 8-24, xxvi. 20-xxvii. 13), edited by Berger, Le palimpseste de Fleury, Paris, 1889; cf. JThS, 1906, p. 454 f. (designated in Tischendorf as reg. in Wordsworth, ii. p. ix as h); (2) in the citations in the writings of Cyprian (cf. Corssen, Der cypr. Text der Acta ap. 1892). Portions also in the works of Augustine, Ambrosiaster (see below, n. 5, and vol. i. 553 f.), Lucifer, and others; e.g. in a writing, de prophetis et prophetiis (from Cod. 133 of St. Gall, published in Miscell. Casinese, parte ii. No. iv. p. 21 ff.), and in the Martyrologium of Ado; cf. Quentin in Revue Bénédict. 1906, p. 4 ff. Mixed texts are exhibited in many Bibles which give the Vulgate in other books of the N.T., namely, (3) the so-called Gigas in Stockholm (ed. Belsheim, AG und Ap. aus dem Gigas, Christiana, 1879; (4) Cod. Paris, Lat. 321, especially important for chaps. i. xiii., edited in part by Berger in Notices et extraits des mss. xxxv. 1, 169-208, fully collated by Blass (ed. min. p. xxv); cf. Hausleiter, ThLb. 1896, No. 9; Blass, ThStKr, 1896, S. 436 ff.; cf. both of the above for (5) Cod. Wernigerodensis Z^a 81, collated by Blass; (6) Paris

Lat. 6 (Bible of Rosas, see Wordsworth, ii. p. vii ; Berger, Hist. de la Vulg. p. 24f.), partly in text, partly on margin ; (7) a Provençal N.T. ed. Clédar, Paris, 1887. III. The Sahidic translation, almost entire (i. 1-xxiv. 19, xxvii. 27-38) in Woide-Ford, Append. cod. Alex. 1799, pp. 106-167 ; the lacunæ filled out in part by Amélineau, Zf. ÄgSp. 1886, pp. 112-114, and by other as yet unedited fragments ; see Scrivener-Miller, *Introd. to the crit. of the N.T.*⁴ ii. 135 f. IV. It has been shown from the commentary of Ephrem on Acts, for the most part preserved in an Armenian catena, and from several passages in his commentary on the Pauline Epistles, that the oldest Syriac version of Acts coincides in many decisive points with Cod. D (Harris, Four lectures, pp. 22-51). The later Peshito has retained, as in the Pauline Epistles, many remnants of this oldest Syriac version (GK, ii. 556-564). Very little light has been cast upon them. At all events, Thomas of Heraclea, who in the year 616, in the monastery of St. Anthony in Alexandria, revised the so-called Philoxenian version of the N.T. which arose in the year 508, and who employed for Acts and the catholic Epistles one (for the Gospels two or three) Greek MS. of that monastery, gathered from this MS. and translated into Syriac a considerable number of readings which agree in substance with β . Some of them he introduced into the text, calling attention to them, however, by means of asterisks ; some he placed in the margin beside the reading given in the text. This indicates evidently that both sorts of readings were foreign to the older Philoxeniana. Still the question requires renewed investigation ; cf. e.g. Gwynn, Hermathena (1890), vii. 294 f. 301. In what follows, these Syriac readings, as elsewhere the whole text of Thomas of Heraclea, have been designated for the sake of brevity as S^3 .

4. (P. 12.) Blass, ed. maj. p. 32 ; ed. min. p. vi, gives as examples of works which were twice edited by their authors :—Demosthenes, Philipp. iii. ; Appolodorus, Chron. ; Longinus, Nom. Attica ; Cicero, Academ. ; and, in addition, a remark of Galen (ed. Kuhn, xvii. l. 79) concerning the marginal notes of his own writings. Zöckler, Greifswalder Stud. 132 f., adds the three editions of Tertullian, c. Marc. i. (also adv. Judæos) ; a double edition of Lactantius, Inst. ; Eusebius, de Mart. Pal. ; and other instances from the Middle Ages. Cf. also what Sedulius (ed. Huemer, p. 172) says concerning triple editions of the writings of Origen and the jurist Hermogenianus originating with the authors themselves.

5. (Pp. 10, 12.) Ambrosiaster on Gal. ii. 1 ff. (Ambrosii Opera, ed. Bened. ii. app. p. 214 ; Souter, Study of Ambros. p. 199 f.) cites the decree to all appearances substantially complete, "Non molestari eos, qui ex gentibus credebant, sed ut ab his tantum observarent, id est a sanguine et fornicatione, et idololatria." Thereupon he attacks the sophistæ Græcorum, who imagine that they are able to observe these articles by their own reason and strength. Then he rejects the interpretation of a sanguine as homicidium, and wishes to have this understood correctly according to Gen. ix. 4, a sanguine edendo cum carne. Then, p. 215 : "Denique tria hæc mandata ab apostolis et senioribus data reperiuntur, quæ ignorant leges Romanæ, id est ut observent se ab idololatria, et sanguine, sicut Noë, et a fornicatione. Quæ sophistæ Græcorum non intelligentes, scientes tamen a sanguine abstinendum, adulterarunt scripturam, quantum mandatum addentes 'et a suffocato observandum,' quod puto nunc Dei metu intellecturi sunt, quia jam supra dictum erat, quod addiderunt." On the use of recension β by Ambrosiaster see vol. i. 553 f. On his attitude to the Greek text, see GK, i. 34. Even impartial Greeks like Origen (in Osee; tom. xxxii. 32 in Jo. Delarue, iii. 438, iv. 455), and even an Epiphanius (Ancor. 31), recognised that not only stylistic, but dogmatic scruples of the orthodox had altered to a great extent the biblical text of the Church.

6. (Pp. 14, 15.) Acts xi. 27 β shows the linguistic character of Luke. Aside from Jude 24 and a citation in Heb. i. 9 we find ἀγαλλίασις only in Luke i. 14, 44; Acts ii. 46. He employs the verb also in Luke i. 47, x. 21; Acts xvi. 34. He alone, following the classical usage, has, Acts xxviii. 3, συστρέφειν = "gather together" ("zusammenraffen"); xix. 40, xxiii. 12, συστροφή, "mob" ("Zusammenrottung"). With the same meaning, the verb, according to β , Acts xvi. 39, xvii. 5; textually uncertain, and with another meaning is συστρέφεισθαι (= συναναστρέφεισθαι), Matt. xvii. 22; Acts x. 41, Cod. D. The word gives a graphic picture of the way in which the crowds collect about and press upon the prophets. The text of D is confirmed in essentials by d, Paris, 321, the Bibles of Rosas and Wernigerode; by Augustine, de Sermone Dom. in Monte, lib. ii. 17, § 57; Ado on Ides of Febr. (Quentin, Revue Bénédicte, 1906, p. 4), and the writing de Prophetis, p. 21. In the last writing xi. 27–28 is quoted with the introduction: "et in actibus apostolorum sic legimus." Immediately connected, however, with this citation is the following: "Et alium in locum: 'Erant etiam in ecclesia prophetae et doctores Barnabas et Saulus (read Saulus), quibus manus imposuerunt prophetae, Symeon qui appellatus est Niger, et Lucius Cirinensis, qui manet usque adhuc, et Ticius conlactaneus, qui acciperunt responsum ab spiritu sancto, unde dixit: 'segregate mihi Barnabam et Saulum,' etc.'" Also in this citation there must be some trace of β . That α and β vary widely from each other in this passage appears from the remarkable variants of D (ἐν οἷς after διδάσκαλοι [this also in Vulgate] Ἡρώδου καὶ τετράρχου) and Paris, 321 (secundum unamquamque ecclesiam). In the text given above, before or after conlactaneus, which would otherwise be unintelligible, a genitive belonging to it, either eius or Herodis tetrarchis, has at all events dropped out, in addition, however, probably also Manan before conlactaneus. This last omission could perhaps have arisen mechanically from the similarity of MAN-EN to MANET, which stands a few words before it. But the entire citation, in all its original variations, could never be explained from a false reading of the name Manan. Ticius is for Titus; cf. the variants Τίτου, Τετίου, Acts xviii. 7, a difference which the Latins did not express in the genitive Titi; see Wordsworth, ad loc. Since Paul, a few years later, took Titus (Gal. ii. 1) with him from Antioch to Jerusalem, Luke could have mentioned him very naturally in this passage. How the name Ticius or Titus in this passage could be otherwise explained, is unknown to the present writer. The most remarkable variant, however, is the addition to the name of Lucius of Cyrene: qui manet usque ad huc, i.e. ὅς μένει ἕως ἄρτι; cf. 1 Cor. xv. 6. All must acknowledge that this cannot be an arbitrary addition of a writer citing Acts, or the gloss of a later copyist. It can have been written only at the time when Lucius of Cyrene was still alive, and indeed by the same man, who, in this passage, according to all recensions of the text, by the enumeration of the teachers and prophets of Antioch, — persons who, with the exception of Paul and Barnabas, are wholly unimportant for the further narrative,—has shown his especial interest in this Church, and according to β (Acts xi. 27) has made himself known as a member of this Church about 40 A.D. It is Luke, then, who allowed these and other remarks of interest for his friend Theophilus to appear in his first edition. In the revision of his work preparatory to a second edition, he might have thought of a larger circle of readers, and a longer continuing circulation of his book, and therefore struck out the statement concerning Lucius, which after a short time might not agree with the fact. Luke wrote at a time when there was living at least one of the men who about 43–50 had been busy as teachers and prophets in Antioch, while others, at all events, the Simon Niger mentioned above, probably also Paul and Barnabas, were already dead. The especial interest of Luke in Antioch is also confirmed by the fact that in vi. 5 the home of only one of the seven men, i.e. of Nicolāus of Antioch, is given.

7. (P. 15.) The clause ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ, xii. 1 (β), is not, as though τῆς stood in its place, a nearer definition of τῆς ἐκκλησίας which might have appeared necessary to a later reader, but indicates the scene of the story, xii. 1–20, in contrast to Antioch, the scene of xi. 19–30. Οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς ἐκκλησίας is good Greek (Kuhner-Gerth, i. 457) = Church members (cf. xv. 5 a) = οἱ πιστοί, ver. 3 (β), entirely without regard to any particular place or the congregation of any locality. That it is a question concerning such persons in Jerusalem and Judea and not in Antioch follows clearly enough from the personal and other particulars of the account. A reader who felt the loss of an expressed subject of ἀρεστών ἐστίν in ver. 3 would have introduced τοῦτο, as several translators (e.g. Lucifer) have done. The text β, ἡ ἐπιχείρησις αὐτοῦ ἐπὶ τοὺς πιστοὺς, is too original in its manner of expression to be ranked as a gloss. In the N.T. ἐπιχείρησις does not occur elsewhere, and ἐπιχειρεῖν only in Luke i. 1; Acts ix. 29, xix. 13. Moreover, the feminine subject following the neuter predicate (Matt. vi. 34; 2 Cor. ii. 6) does not look like the work of a glossarist. Such a one would have supplied the need in ver. 5 of completing ἐτηρέετο ἐν τῇ φυλακῇ by mention of the guards, with words taken from ver. 4. The ὑπὸ τῆς σπείρης τοῦ βασιλέως extends beyond ver. 4, and does not indicate the 4 × 4 soldiers entrusted with the guarding of Peter's person, but the whole cohort (cf. x. 1, xxi. 31, xxvii. 1) which served as a garrison for the building, —probably the Antonia,—and whose duty it was to station the various sentries (ver. 10) in continuous relays. The words κατέβησαν τοὺς ἑπτὰ βαθμοὺς καὶ which β (ver. 10) offers between ἐξελθόντες and προήλθον can only have been written by one who knew the locality. In xxi. 35, 40, where the stairs are mentioned which connected the Antonia not with the street, but directly with the Temple Area, no one could hit upon these seven steps by guess and then introduce them with the article as if well known to the reader. The seven and eight steps at the Temple gate in Ezek. xl. 22, 26, 31, in which Jerome found great mysteries (Morin, Anecd. Marculf. iii. 2. 18, 111; cf. Origen, Fragm. in Jo. xi. 18, ed. Preuschen, 547. 21), explain nothing. On the contrary, it is quite plausible that Luke, who at first introduced at this point, unchanged, the story which evidently arose in Jerusalem, and was probably found by him in an older writing, upon looking over what he had written removed these words as being ill adapted to foreign readers.

8. (P. 15.) Belser has recently (Bibl. Stud. i. 3. 141 ff.; Ausführlicher Beiträge, S. 8, 89 ff.) not only maintained the formerly prevalent interpretation of xviii. 22 of the a text, but introduced it into β also. Paul is supposed to have journeyed from Caesarea to Jerusalem, and, after he had wandered from Antioch through Galatia and Phrygia, according to xix. 1 β, once more to have entertained the thought of returning to Jerusalem, instead of going finally to Ephesus, as he had promised. The Spirit, however, prevents him from carrying out this strange plan, and compels him to keep his promise. In the first place, as far as a is concerned, (1) the bare ἀναβάς (ver. 22) cannot indicate a journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem. The 18 passages in the N.T. (3, Luke; 7, Acts) where ἀναβαίνειν εἰς Ἱερ. occurs, prove that this qualification is indispensable, as well as εἰς Ἀντιόχειαν, xiv. 26, xv. 30, xviii. 22. An absolute ἀναβαίνειν, John vii. 10, near the thrice recurring ἀναβ. εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν, or John xii. 20, where Jerusalem is the scene of the previous events, and where, in addition, attendance upon the feast is given as the purpose in view, can scarcely be used for comparison; for, according to a, Jerusalem, in Acts xviii., has not yet been named at all as the destination (ver. 18=Syria; ver. 21=only that Paul must make one more journey before his permanent settlement). The meaning of ἀναβαίνειν here is either "to go ashore" (cf. Matt. iii. 16), or, according to the Greek notion, to go up from the harbour into the city, i.e. from the shore inland. Cf. καταβαίνειν (Cod. D, κατελθεῖν Textus rec.), Acts xiii. 4 of the wandering from Antioch to the seaport; xx. 13 D and elsewhere κατελθόντες from the land to the harbour and ship. (2) The Church in Jerusalem is nowhere called simply ἡ ἐκκλησία, cf. rather viii. 1, xi. 22. On xii. 1, see n. 7. Chap. viii. 3, following viii. 1, proves nothing aside from the fact that at the time of the events of viii. 1-3 the local Church of Jerusalem (v. 11) was still essentially identical with the Christendom which Paul had persecuted (cf. Acts ix. 1, 31; 1 Cor. xv. 9; Gal. i. 22 f.). Only the Church, therefore, of the place which is mentioned (xi. 26, xv. 3 Antioch; xv. 4 Jerusalem) can be meant: in this instance the Church of Caesarea. It is not easy to see why the Church of Caesarea, which at that time had been so long in existence, might not have been called ἐκκλησία as well as those which were much younger (Acts xiv. 23, xv. 41, xvi. 5; 1 Thess. i. 1; Rom. xvi. 1, 4). But as for xix. 1 β, it is unthinkable that Paul, just after he had, as alleged, visited Jerusalem, and had made the long journey from that place viâ Antioch and through Asia Minor as far as the neighbourhood of Ephesus, suddenly decided to journey again to Jerusalem, and in doing so, after having almost reached the end of a month's journey, to return again to its starting-point. This would be exactly an ὑποστρέφειν, and, on the other hand, the continuation of his journey to Ephesus would be merely the completion of a journey already nearly finished. The β text reads rather the opposite. And what then would be the τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη which Paul would have had to wander through, after he had already traversed the land of the Galatians and Phrygia (ver. 23), in order to reach Ephesus? He is indeed, according to xviii. 23, already on the border of Asia in the narrowest sense of the term (as used by Luke, vol. i. 186 f.), and only a few days distant from Ephesus, and the short journey thither leads through ἡ κάτω Ἀσία (vol. i. 187, line 16: Aristides, Epist. de Smyrna, ed. Dindorf, i. 766; Pausan. i. 4. 6). It cannot be doubted, then, that Luke in xix. 1 β refers to what precedes xviii. 23, or rather that in xviii. 23 he anticipates the journey of Paul, and has so far described it that in xix. 1 ἔρχεται εἰς Ἐφεσον could immediately follow. Even in xviii. 24, Luke goes back in time before the point reached in ver. 23; for what is related in xviii. 24-28 did not take place after Paul had come to Phrygia viâ Cæsarea and Antioch, and so had arrived in the vicinity of Ephesus, but occupies a great part of the time intervening between the first visit of Paul in Ephesus (xviii. 19-21) and his return thither (xix. 1). After this episode, and before resuming the narrative of the journey, interrupted in xviii. 23 (xix. 1, διελθὼν = xviii. 23, διερχόμενος), and before giving an account of Paul's settlement in Ephesus, Luke turns back to an earlier point in the narrative (xix. 1a), and explains how it happened that Paul had not carried out his purpose to visit Jerusalem on this journey. According to the marginal reading of Thomas of Heraclea, from which D differs only in the matter of the weaker ὑποστρέφειν, instead of ὑπόστρεψε, xix. 1 reads: θέλοντος δὲ τοῦ Πάουλου κατὰ τὴν ἰδίαν βουλὴν πορεύεσθαι εἰς Ἱεροσόλυμα, εἶπεν αὐτῷ τὸ πνεῦμα· "ὑπόστρεψε εἰς τὴν Ἀσίαν." Cf. above, p. 26, line 30 f.; further, Ephrem, in Harris, Four Lectures, p. 48; marginal reading of the Bible of Rosas, and Ado (Quentin, p. 7), which describes the Journey of Acts xviii. 18-xix. 1 as follows: "Et inde (from Corinth) navigavit in Syriam et venit Ephesum et inde Cæsaream et (therefore not to Jerusalem) Antiochiam et Galatiam regionem et Frigiam. Hinc, cum vellet ire Hierosolimam, dixit ei spiritus sanctus, ut reverteretur in Asiam; et cum peragrasset superiores partes, Ephesum venit." The hinc at the beginning of the second sentence, which is due to the misunderstanding explained above, is evidently an addition of Ado's, just as the et inde, which often occurs. Ado naturally had also the stopping-place Trogyllium, xx. 15.

9. (Pp. 15, 18.) On Acts xx. 3 see above in text and Harris, Four Lectures, 49. On xx. 4 f. see in part vol. i. 209, n. 2. The uncorrupted text of a has been transmitted by AB, the Coptic version, the Vulgate (and substantially by the Sahidic version): συνέπειτο δὲ αὐτῷ Σώπατρος . . . καὶ Τιμόθεος, Ἀσιανοὶ δὲ Τυχικὸς καὶ Τρόφιμος. οὗτοι δὲ προελθόντες ἔμενον ἡμᾶς ἐν Τρωάδι. Inasmuch as ver. 3 pictures the moment in which Paul formed the resolution in Corinth to make the journey to Syria by way of Macedonia, instead of by the sea route, and since συνέπειτο, not συνέποντο, is the reading established for a, it is stated at first only regarding Sopater that he accompanied Paul from Corinth on this journey. This agrees with the fact that, as far as we know, Sopater was the only one of those mentioned, aside from Timothy, who was present with Paul at the time of his sojourn in Corinth (Rom. xvi. 21; vol. i. 209, 213, 417, n. 22). Timothy may have gone on ahead of Paul and Sopater from Corinth to Macedonia and even as far as Troas, and the rest, among whom were two persons of Thessalonica, Aristarchus and Secundus, would have joined him en route, possibly in Thessalonica, so that Θεσσαλονικέων δέ is really in respect of them equivalent to saying "from Thessalonica onwards." The narrator himself does not join the company until they reach Philippi. All the persons named were fellow-travellers of Paul's, so that συνέπειτο could be placed at the beginning of the sentence, and be connected zeugmatically with all of them. Only in this way can the present writer understand the prominent position which is assigned to Sopater, and the explanatory phrase, οὗτοι δὲ κτλ, designed to prevent any misunderstanding. If this does not refer to all the persons named, besides Sopater, we cannot know which of these are to be distinguished from others. The β text in d and D is at all events mutilated in different ways, and in S³ it is preserved in a not altogether unmixed condition. Instead of inserting, as Blass does, an unwarranted προήρχοντο, συνέπειντο αὐτῷ might be inserted according to d (comitari [a mistake for comitati]eum) and S³. The eye of the copyist of D wandered from αὐτοῦ to αὐτῷ. It reads therefore: μέλλοντος οὖν ἐξίέναι αὐτοῦ συνέπειντο αὐτῷ μέχρι τῆς Ἀσίας Σώπατρος . . . καὶ Τιμόθεος, Ἐφέσιοι δὲ Τυχικὸς καὶ Τρόφιμος, οἵτοι προελθόντες ἔμενον αὐτὸν ἐν Τρωάδι. This text also was not intended to be different from α . The Textus receptus is made really insufferable by the conflation with the α text (AEHL^P) of the reading: ἄχρι (or μέχρι) τῆς Ἀσίας, which is genuine only in β . As Luke wished to give the particulars of what had taken place in Asia, namely, in Troas and Miletus, he brought the journey of Paul and his companions (according to β) for the time being only "as far as Asia," without wishing to say that it came to an end there (cf. Rom. v. 14). Again, since he wished to cover rapidly the journey as far as Troas, he did not take pains to avoid the expression which makes it appear as if the whole company remained together from Corinth to Troas, although he has to add the remark that they arrived in Troas, at least in part, before Paul. One can understand that Luke found it advantageous in revising to smooth down these inequalities; but not how one, who had α before him, might produce β from it.

10. (P. 18.) Acts xx. 12 reads, according to D, ἀσπαζομένων δὲ αὐτῶν ἤγαγεν (not ἤγαγον, as d has it) τὸν νεανίσκον ζῶντα. This ἤγαγεν occurs in three minuscules and apparently also in the Armenian version, which has retained to a large extent traces of the oldest Syriac version; cf. Robinson, Euthaliana, 76-92, according to which Paul leads the youth whom he has saved, and the latter does not let go his hand. In this case the greetings will apply not to Paul, or at least not to him alone, but especially to the "we" who departed before him. That these persons take leave before Paul does (προελθόντες according to α) is, however, also stated by β in ὥς μέλλων αὐτὸς περῆναι, in spite of the κατελθόντες, which he uses in its place. Of the β text here only fragments are extant. Perhaps such are embedded in the Peshito, where, instead of οὕτως ἐξῆλθεν in ver. 11, we read: "and then he went out, to travel by land," and ver. 13: "But we went aboard the ship and sailed as far as the neighbourhood (?) of Thesos (for Assos), because we were to take Paul on board there, for so he had appointed when he set out by land."

11. (P. 18.) In respect of Acts xv. 1-5 the present writer cannot admit a text β : (1) the addition after Ἰουδαίας, ver. 1, of τῶν πεπιστευκότων ἀπὸ τῆς αἰρέσεως τῶν Φαρισαίων, and the omission of the corresponding words in ver. 5; for aside from the fact that no witness (DS³ min. 8, 137) presents this text unmixed and complete, and that there exists no Latin witness for it (see also Iren. iii. 12. 14), it seems incredible that Luke should have taken this characteristic of the disturbers of the peace from its natural place in ver. 1 and placed it as an afterthought in ver. 5. (2) The unwonted expression in α , ver. 1, περιτμηθῆτε τῷ ἔθει τῷ Μωϋσάων, as well as the comparison in ver. 5 or xxi. 21, caused in DS³ and the Sahidic version the change καὶ τῷ ε. M. περιπατῆτε. But this is not characteristic of β. It is found verbatim, only with further additions, in Didasc. (syr. version), p. 102. 26, where in the main (on vv. 2, 5, 20, 29 see n. 12) not β, but α is presupposed. Moreover, the still further altered form in Const. Ap. vi. 12, which is based upon Didasc., could not be introduced into the text by Blass in the face of his own chief witnesses. But the better accredited text of β also betrays itself as being an interpolation, in the singular τῷ ἔθει which is retained from α, and which does not construe with περιπατεῖν. Cf. on the contrary vi. 14, xxi. 21. (3) The addition in ver. 2, ἔλεγεν, γὰρ ὁ Παῦλος μένειν (al. αὐτοῖς, al. ἕκαστον) οὕτως καθὼς ἐπίστευσαν δισχυριζόμενος, has a much wider currency in β and only in such witnesses as represent β largely in other respects also. Against its originality stand the facts: (a) that not a single earlier witness has the corresponding construction which Blass is obliged to create in order to use; (b) that the language is Paul's as hardly anywhere else in the Acts (1 Cor. vii. 17, 20, 24, 40). On the other hand, it must be admitted that δισχυρίζεσθαι occurs in the N.T. only in Luke xxii. 59; Acts xii. 15. (4) The following, ver. 2, οἱ δὲ ἐληλυθότες ἀπὸ Ἱερουσαλὴμ παρήγγειλαν αὐτοῖς (αὐ. D, τότε S⁹) τῷ Παύλῳ καὶ Βαρνάβᾳ καὶ τισιν ἄλλοις ἀναβαίνειν πρὸς . . . ὅπως κριθῶσιν ἐπ' αὐτῶν, in β in itself might be genuine. In α also, only the newly arrived strangers could be the subject of ἔταξαν, since if it were otherwise another subject (perhaps the Church) would have had to be named. β would conform to the correct text in Gal. ii. 5 without οἷς οὐδέ and to the correct interpretation put forward by Jerome, according to which Paul's journey to Jerusalem signifies a temporary yielding to the Judaizers. It is quite comprehensible also that Luke in α should have softened the harsh expression. But all is again made more than doubtful by the fact that the corresponding words in ver. 5, οἱ δὲ παραγγείλαντες αὐτοῖς ἀναβαίνειν πρὸς τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους, are incompatible with the characterisation of the people as Pharisees (see above, under 1), which is genuine there, and which is retained by D.

12. (Pp. 19, 20.) Of the variants indicated above on p. 19 by A, B and C, (I.) A and B are to be found in D for xv. 29 (where C could have no place); and in Iren. iii. 12. 14, now preserved also in Greek in a scholion (on xv. 20) of the Athos MS. (von der Goltz, TU, n.f. ii. 4a, S. 41, see vol. i. 396, n. 3). According to the Bible text of this MS. (here without, but in xv. 29 and xxi. 25 with καὶ τοῦ πικτοῦ) which, according to the statement of the copyist (S. 7 f.), is said to agree with the text used by Origen as the basis of his commentary, it could appear as if Origen also had had both the defect A and the addition B. Since, however, Origen neither here nor in the scholion on xv. 29 (S. 43), as so often elsewhere, is expressly mentioned, he may not be adduced either for A or for B and C in any passage whatsoever. Since, furthermore, the critical marks, which point to the scholion on xv. 20, refer only to B, not to A, Porphyry also, whom the scholiast adduces with an appeal to Eusebius as advocate of the text of Irenæus, may be made responsible only for B. The scholiast on xv. 20, where he omits καὶ τοῦ πικ., and on xv. 29, where he has it, takes no notice whatever of A in the scholia on the two passages. Like Porphyry, also the Sahidic version and many Greek min. witness in xv. 20 only to B without A; on the contrary, Gigas witnesses to A without B in xv. 20. (II.) For xv. 29 we find A, B, and C united in

Irenæus (in Greek scholion in v. d. Goltz, TU, S. 43; cf. S. 41) and D; only A and B in Cyprian, Test. iii. 119 (perhaps cited incompletely); only A and C in Tertullian, Pud. xii. (differing in the arrangement: a fornicationibus [d has this plural also, in stupris] et sanguine); only A in Ambrosiaster (see n. 5), Pacianus, and others, known to Jerome as the ordinary Latin text (Vall. vii. 478, “ab idolothytis et sanguine et fornicatione” sive, ut in nonnullis exemplaribus scriptum est, “et a suffocatis”). The text of the Vulgate, which has no trace of A, B, C in xv. 20, xxi. 15, is uncertain. One can agree with the judgment of Wordsworth and White, who place suffocato without et in brackets as a gloss, only in the sense that the MSS., which offer sanguine suffocato, go back to older MSS., in which the text of the Vulgate in this decisive passage (not, however, in xv. 20, xxi. 25) had been conformed to the Occidental tradition by striking out et suffocatis (or—to) found in the text, and that later copyists had again introduced into the text the fourth portion, which meanwhile had also in the Occident obtained the ascendancy, in the form suffocato as attribute to sanguine. Jerome himself, who had taken notice of the variants, is to be credited neither with the inconsequence, of which he would have made himself guilty in his treatment of xv. 21 and xv. 29, nor with the adoption of a reading like sanguine suffocato, which, to say the least, is very erroneous. For this last reading one may not appeal to Cyril of Jerusalem, for, according to the MSS. (ed. Reischl and Rupp, i. 120, ii. 286), he cites (Catech. iv. 28, xvii. 29) καὶ πνικτοῦ in the second passage with the variant καὶ πνικτῶν. Only the B of xv. 29 is found in S³, the Sahidic version, nine of the minuscules in Tischendorf, and the Latin Bibles pw, which Blass was the first to compare. In addition to these we are to take as evidence for B the letter of a Pelagian, circa 415 in Caspari, Briefe, Abhandlungen, etc., 1890, S. 18, cap. 4; cf. p. 9 (see other material in GK, i. 367, A. 1, ii. 589, A. 6), probably also Theop. ad Autol. ii. 34, and the Latin Theophilus, i. 31, ii. 4; cf. Forsch. ii. 140 f., and quite certainly Aristides, Apol. xv. 5; cf. Seeberg, Forsch. v. 213, 397. From many others which cite the passage thus or similarly, e.g. Aphraates, ed. Wright, 498, Ephrem, Com. in epist. Pauli, pp. 9, 26, its likelihood is not to be established. It is very doubtful whether Marcion was acquainted at all with the passage (GK, ii. 462). Tertullian knew it (contra Marc. iv. 16, ed. Kroymann, p. 472), but, as Pud. xii. shows, not as an element of the Apostolic Decree. The oldest Christian writing in which it is found is the Didache; but in this the passage (i. 2) is widely separated from the place where it touches upon the Decree (vi. 3). So also in the Didascalia (Syr. p. 2. 8—Lat. ed. Hauler, 2. 12), while the Decree, according to the ordinary text, does not follow until much later (Syr. 104. 23; Lat. 45. 1). (III.) For xxi. 25 the defective reading A is to be found only in D and the Gigas. It cannot be concluded (so also again Wordsworth White, ii. 139), from Tert. Apol. ix., that he had in this earlier writing, in distinction from the later, de Pud. xii., a text with καὶ πνικτῶν. In Apol. ix. he cites no text at all, but mentions the Christian custom of abstaining from every use of the blood of animals, in consequence of which they abstain also from the flesh of animals which have been strangled, or which have died (qui propter suffocatis quoque et morticinis abstinemus). If this custom was so general in Africa also, as Tertullian here represents it to have been, this presupposes that the unmutated Decree was known and operative there. As far as Tertullian himself is concerned there exists between Apol. ix. and Pud. xii. only this difference: that in the former instance he assumes the interpretation of the "blood" in the Decree as the blood of animals, to be the natural and only one; and merely draws the conclusion that it would be wholly impossible for the Christians to drink human blood; and that, on the contrary, in Pud. xii., without excluding the other interpretation, he prefers to make the word refer to human blood and more particularly to the shedding of blood in murder (homicidium). Moreover, a more detailed treatment of the history and the original meaning of the Decree cannot be given in this place; cf., however, § 62, n. 10. New literature on the subject: Bückenhoff, Das Apostol. Speisegesetz, 1903, and the very venturesome writing of Gotthold Resch (son of A. Resch), Das Aposteldekret nach seiner ausserkanonischen Textgestalt, 1905.

13. (P. 20.) Tertullian, Pud. xii., translates εἰδωλοθύτων accurately by sacrificiis, but interprets it as idololatria. The Latin Bible in Cyprian has already the translation ab idololatriis. What is to be understood by φαγεῖν εἰδωλόθυστα can be seen from 1 Cor. viii.-x. It refers merely to an indirect participation in idol worship, a dangerous approach to idolatry. The command is φεύγετε ἀπὸ τῆς εἰδωλολατρείας, 1 Cor. x. 14, not τὴν εἰδωλολατρείαν as in 1 Cor. vi. 18, where the reference is to πορνεία. Only for the purpose of sharpening the conscience is it said (Didache, vi. 3; cf. Col. iii. 5) that even the partaking of sacrificial meat, or participation in festivities and banquets whose background is one of idol worship, is in itself idolatry.

14. (P. 20.) In the Didascalia, Syriac ed., p. 104. 23, the conclusion reads: "And ye shall abstain from necessary (things), from sacrifices, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from unchastity. And from these (things) guard your souls, and ye will (shall) do good (=εὖ πράξετε), and ye will be sound in health" (ἔρρωσθε). The reading πράξατε (CDHL, Didasc., Latin ed. bene agite) or πράξητε (E) expresses the same conception; but the future πράξετε might also, as in the Decalogue, be taken as an imperative, and bene (Irenæus, Pacian) or recte (Tertullian) agetis was not intended to mean anything else. The ἔρρωσθε is wanting in Irenæus and Tertullian, which is hardly accidental, inasmuch as Irenæus at least gives in other instances the writing in complete form. D, which contains it, must have here also a mixed text. Cf. also Clem. Al. Ped. ii. 56, without ἔρρωσθε, S¹: "be strong in the Lord."

15. (P. 21.) Didache, i. 2: πάντα δὲ ὅσα ἐὰν θελήσης μὴ γίνεσθαι σοι, καὶ σὺ ἄλλῳ μὴ ποίει. Cod. D xv. 20, where the Gentile Christians are spoken of in the third person; but καὶ ὅσα μὴ θέλουσιν ἑαυτοῖς γίνεσθαι (written γεινεσθαι), ἑτέροις μὴ ποιεῖτε (d. faciatis, Irenæus faciant), and per contra xv. 29, where the address would be possible because of what follows, D has θέλετε ἑαυτοῖς . . . ποιεῖν; d. Irenæus (Lat. text), Cyprian, vultis fieri vobis . . . faciatis or feceritis; Iren. (Greek text) (v. d. Goltz, TU, S. 41), here as in xv. 20, καὶ ὅσα ἂν μὴ θέλωσιν αὐτοῖς γενέσθαι, ἄλλοις μὴ ποιεῖν. The singular ἑτέρῳ, xv. 29 (D, d, Cyprian; pseudo-Aug. Sermo 265, ed. Bass. xvi. 1367; the Pelagian letter [see n. 12] alii and nullo alii), which other Greek and Latin writers felt to be unsuitable alongside of ἑαυτοῖς, vobis, and ποιεῖτε, is also an echo of the form ἄλλῳ in the Didache.

16. (P. 22.) Blass in Luke i. 26 gives, instead of the definite statement of time, ἐν αὐτῷ δὲ τῷ χαρῶ, only according to Latin witnesses. Why does he not, therefore, give the same formula in Acts v. 1 according to E, and in Acts iii. 1 according to D—ἐν δὲ ταῖς ἡμέραις ταύταις? The first formula is, however, a solemn introduction of the pericopes in the Greek as in the Latin lectionaries; see, e.g., Scholz, N.T. ii. 455 ff.; Liber Comicus, ed. Morin, pp. 7, 13, 15, etc. It is found also countless times in the Ev. Hierosol. in the half-Greek form קרסא (=καρῶ) וביה, in most cases standing outside the construction, and even where the statements of time contained and retained in the text itself make it superfluous (Matt. iv. 1, 17, xxiii. 1; John vii. 1, 33, ed. Lagarde, p. 282. 1, 19, 302. 18, 370. 15, 371. 21), but also amalgamated with the text, where it contains no determination of time (John viii. 1, p. 372. 7; in pure Syriac, Matt. xv. 21, p. 292. 25, "at this time came Jesus"). In other passages, as Matt. iii. 1, p. 281. 10, 19, the formula arising out of the system of pericopes displaces that contained in the text. Acts iii. 1, v. 1 were the beginnings of Church pericopes (Scrivener, Introd. 4 i. 80 and the marginal readings of Cod. 104 in Tischendorf on Acts iii. 1). Although the later Greek system had Luke i. 24–38 for Annunciation-day (Scrivener, p. 88; Ev. Hierosol., ed. Lagarde, pp. 273, 329), i. 26 is, however, the natural beginning. The fact that already Iren. iii. 10. 2, or, at least, his Latin translator, had in i. 26 the liturgical formula, may be of weight for the history of lectionaries, but cannot make the source of the reading doubtful. Cod. D, however, which does not here follow the Latins, stands in other passages under the influence of a pericope-system; cf. Scrivener, Introd. p. li. Blass (with D Ss) has not only placed the words διὰ τὸ εἶναι κτλ., taken from Luke ii. 4, after ver. 5, but also by adopting αὐτοῖς for αὐτὸν has burdened Luke himself, in spite of Luke i. 36, with the fable of the Davidic descent of Mary, which arose in the second century. The only direct witness for this is the Lat. Palat. (ed. Tischendorf, p. 245, quod essent de domo, etc.). Since, however, this is the ordinary position of the sentences, according to which up to this point Mary has not been mentioned at all, essent is accordingly an evident mistake for esset. The Syrians, however, who read here "since both of them were of the house of David," depend upon Tatian, who had allowed himself this insertion (Forsch. i. 88, 118, 265; cf. the apocryphal 3te Korintherbrief, ed. Vetter, S. 54, ver. 4; GK, ii. 561; in addition, Ephrem, Comm. in ep. Paul., p. 260; ThLb, 1893, S. 471; 1895, S. 19); also a Dutch Harmony of the Middle Ages, which offers the same statement in Luke i. 27 (Academy, 1894, March 24). This interpolation brought about the transposition of the sentences; since it, however, can be considered an improvement of the style, and since it is to be found in D without the interpolation, Tatian may have found the transposition already present in his Luke.

17. (P. 24.) It is beyond dispute, that in the genealogical scheme of Luke iii. 23 ff., D has introduced the names from Matt. i. 10–16; cf. compilations such as are given in Cod. Fuld., ed. Ranke, p. 33. D has a large harmonising interpolation in Luke v. 14, taken from Mark i. 45, a liturgical gloss at the beginning of a pericope, Luke xvi. 19, see Tischendorf, ad loc., and also on xvi. 1. D alone has after Luke vi. 4 the following: τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ θεασάμενός τετα ἐργαζόμενον τῷ σαββάτῳ εἶπεν αὐτῷ "ἄνθρωπε, εἰ μὲν οἶδας, τί ποτεῖς, μακάριος εἶ, εἰ δὲ ἢ μὴ οἶδας, ἐπισκάρματος καὶ παραβύτης εἶ τοῦ νόμου." This is followed, vi. 6, by the following recasting of the text: καὶ εἰσελθόντος αὐτοῦ πάλιν εἰς τὴν συναγωγὴν σαββάτω, ἐν ᾗ ἦν ἄνθρωπος κτλ. On the other hand, ver. 5 does not follow until after ver. 10. That all of these changes are arbitrary, appears (1) from the fact that the disappearance from the whole tradition except D of the clever anecdote, at which no Gentile Christian could have taken offence, would otherwise be incomprehensible. (2) It should not be disputed that the teaching in ver. 5 is deduced neither from this anecdote nor from the following Sabbath story, vv. 6-10, but only from the incident related in vv. 1-4. This same closing sentence of the incident is found Matt. xii. 8; Mark ii. 28, and, according to all witnesses except D, also in Luke vi. 5. (3) The anecdote betrays by τῷ σαββάτῳ, which is intolerable after τῇ αὐτῇ ἡμέρᾳ,—since, according to vi. 1, this day is a Sabbath,—that the second statement of time originally belonged to the anecdote; the first statement, however, was added to help in fitting it into the present connection. (4) The awkward position, also, which σαββάτῳ has been given by D in ver. 6, betrays the interpolator. Since two other long interpolations in D, namely, John vii. 53-viii. 11 and Mark xvi. 9-20 (these at least in substance, see vol. ii. 471 f., and below, § 69, n. 3) were taken from Papias, it is probable that this apocryphal Sabbath story was taken from the same source. It can, of course, be historically true: Jesus can have said, that he acts well who, like the priests in the temple (Matt. xii. 5, cf. John vii. 19-23), breaks the letter of the commandment concerning the Sabbath in the consciousness that he is fulfilling a higher duty. The obligatoriness of the law, when rightly understood, he did not by this saying dispute.

18. (P. 24.) Whereas the additions discussed in n. 17 are peculiar to D, it shares with many Latin and partly also Syrian texts a large number of changes of words and inversions which are no more to be understood as actual improvements—perhaps from the author correcting his first edition—than as belonging to the original form from which the a text could have arisen. Examples: according to a, i. 63, all are astonished that the dumb Zacharias in spite of the general protest gives the child the same name, John, which Elisabeth had given it. It appeared much more astonishing that suddenly he could speak again. Therefore β transfers καὶ ἐθαύμασαν πάντες to a position after ἐλίθη ἡ γλῶσσα αὐτοῦ. In β this is followed by “his mouth, however, was opened”; then first comes the statement, “he spoke, praising God.” By what means, however, before he opened his mouth and spoke, could the people have known that his tongue was loosed? It was a necessary improvement of this laughable “improvement,” when Ss, and, in view of this one witness, Blass also, transposed the astonishment to a position after the speaking. But how, then, is the much stronger witnessed reading of D abg¹ to be explained? Concerning the commonplace change of xii. 38 (which Marcion found in existence, but which D and most MSS. offer mixed with the genuine text), see GK, i. 682 f., ii. 476. In view of the fact that, as a rule, the mother herself is not able at once to attend to her newborn child, the Lat. Palat. (c) has written in ii. 7 the plurals obvoluerunt . . . collucaverunt. The noticeable brevity of the introductory formula in a, xxiii. 42 f., and the form of address with the bare Ἰησοῦ, not found elsewhere in the N.T. (cf., however, Mark i. 24, x. 47; Luke viii. 28 [also here omitted from D], xvii. 13, xviii. 38 [omitted in AE, etc.]), must have stimulated copyists to corrections. But the great multiplicity of the variants, several of which may be very early, is evidence against all of them. Especially the $\tau\phi$ $\epsilon\pi\iota\pi\lambda\eta\sigma\sigma\alpha\sigma\iota$ along with $\alpha\upsilon\tau\phi$ in D characterises itself by its very superfluousness as a gloss to $\alpha\upsilon\tau\phi$. A preacher, who contrasted the two malefactors with each other, might have so designated the remorseful one in view of $\epsilon\pi\iota\tau\iota\mu\omega\upsilon\upsilon$, ver. 40; and to a man of this kind all variants of D in this passage are to be credited, e.g. $\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\upsilon\sigma\iota\varsigma$ (also xxi. 7 D), $\theta\acute{\alpha}\rho\sigma\epsilon\iota$ (also viii. 48 inserted by others). The expression of Luke, in part peculiar but also varied in manifold ways according to the object and the sources used, incited to changes in order to make his Gospel agree partly with the other Gospels and partly with the common usage. In this respect D, and its satellites especially, have gone to great lengths. The inconsistency of β proves that the variants which have arisen in this way have not been brought about by a systematic working over either of β into α , or of α into β , but by sporadic changes in β . The word $\pi\lambda\eta\sigma\theta\eta\eta\alpha\iota$ (the verb 13 times in Luke, 9 times in Acts, only 3 times elsewhere), used to designate the passing of a period of time, i. 23, 57, ii. 6, 21, 22 (found only here in N.T.), is retained 3 times in D, however, ii. 6 $\tau\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\sigma\theta\eta\eta\alpha\iota$ (cf. Rev. xx. 3-5), ii. 21 $\sigma\upsilon\upsilon\upsilon\tau\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\sigma\theta\eta\eta\alpha\iota$ (cf. Luke iv. 2; Acts xxi. 27). D has replaced $\kappa\alpha\lambda\epsilon\acute{\iota}\nu$ $\delta\upsilon\omicron\mu\alpha$, i. 13, 31, ii. 21 (Matt. i. 21-25) only in ii. 21 by the preferable $\delta\omicron\mu\alpha\acute{\zeta}\epsilon\iota\nu$ $\delta\upsilon\omicron\mu\alpha$ (cf. Acts xix. 13; Eph. i. 21), and, on the other hand, has replaced the latter in vi. 13 by $\kappa\alpha\lambda\epsilon\acute{\iota}\nu$, used more commonly in the choice of the apostles, and in vi. 14 by $\epsilon\pi\omicron\mu\alpha\acute{\zeta}\epsilon\iota\nu$, which is more suited in giving a person a surname. For $\epsilon\pi\iota\sigma\tau\acute{\alpha}\tau\eta\varsigma$, which is used only by Luke, D has in v. 5 $\delta\iota\delta\acute{\alpha}\sigma\kappa\alpha\lambda\epsilon$, viii. 24 $\kappa\acute{\iota}\rho\iota\epsilon$, per contra in viii. 45 (one min. omits), ix. 33 (the min. 157, which otherwise agrees with D and Marcion, has $\delta\iota\delta\acute{\alpha}\sigma\kappa\alpha\lambda\epsilon$), ix. 49 (many $\delta\iota\delta\acute{\alpha}\sigma\kappa\alpha\lambda\epsilon$), and xvii. 13 has retained it. For $\eta\chi\omicron\varsigma$ (only Luke iv. 37; Acts ii. 2, also $\kappa\alpha\tau\eta\chi\epsilon\acute{\iota}\nu$, in the Gospels only Luke i. 4; Acts xviii. 25, xxi. 21, 24) D has iv. 37 $\acute{\alpha}\kappa\omicron\eta$, as Matt. and Mark everywhere, Luke never in this meaning. For $\alpha\iota\omega\varsigma$, xviii. 43 (cf. $\alpha\iota\omega\epsilon\acute{\iota}\nu$ 4 times in Luke, 3 times in Acts, only twice elsewhere in N.T.), D has the common $\delta\acute{\omicron}\xi\alpha$; for $\acute{\alpha}\tau\omicron\sigma\omicron\upsilon$, xxiii. 41 (elsewhere only Acts xxv. 5, xxviii. 6; entirely different 2 Thess. iii. 2), the trivial $\pi\omicron\upsilon\eta\rho\acute{\omicron}\nu$.

19. (P. 24.) The present writer mentions as genuine texts which D and its satellites have preserved: (1) iii. 22: $\nu\acute{\iota}\omicron\varsigma$ $\mu\omicron\upsilon$ $\epsilon\acute{\iota}$ $\sigma\acute{\upsilon}$, $\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega$ $\sigma\acute{\eta}\mu\epsilon\rho\omicron\upsilon$ $\gamma\epsilon\gamma\epsilon\upsilon\eta\kappa\acute{\alpha}$ $\sigma\epsilon$. So D and a large number of Latin witnesses. Augustine, who throughout his work, de Cons. Evv., uses the Vulgate as the basis of his discussion (Burkitt, The Old Latin and the Itala, 1896), mentions (ii. 19. 31) only the older Greek MSS., which have the common text. In the Latin Bilde, β was at all events predominating and original. The fact that the Syriac versions do not have this form is explained by their dependence upon Tatian, who naturally could use only one form of the words spoken by the heavenly voice, for which, however, he did not choose Luke iii. 22, but Matt. iii. 17 (Forch. i. 124). If it is established that the Gospel of the Ebionites (circa 170) is a compilation from the canonical Gospels, and has made especial use of Luke, — also in the account of the baptism ($\acute{\epsilon}\nu$ $\acute{\epsilon}\delta\delta\alpha$), — it cannot be well doubted, that of the three heavenly voices which this Gospel contains, the first is taken from Mark i. 11, the second from Luke iii. 22 (in the form β), and the third from Matt. iii. 17 (GK, ii. 726, 732 f.). It may further be considered as settled that Justin, Dial. lxxxviii. ciii., to whom this text was evidently embarrassing, had read it in Luke (GK, i. 541). According to the creed of the Church, Jesus, on account of His wonderful entrance into human life, was already looked upon as the Son of God; further, as early as in Heb. i. 5, Ps. ii. 7 was interpreted as referring to this event, and this seems better to suit Luke i. 32, 35. The variation from Matt. and Mark must have also appeared objectionable, and finally an extreme emphasis was laid upon the baptism of Jesus by many heretics. In view of all these facts, therefore, the β text must have become more and more intolerable to the consciousness of the Church, and at the same time to those who, like Justin, in addition to the wonderful generation of the man Jesus, taught also a pretemporal generation of the Logos. The rise and wide circulation of β , on the basis of α , in the Church of the second century appears incomprehensible; on the other hand, the gradual supplanting of β by α seems almost unavoidable. It is inconceivable that one and the same Luke in the two editions of his work should have changed from one to the other of the mutually exclusive traditions. There is, however, no evidence against the fact that β originated with Luke himself. If Ps. ii. 7 could have been connected with the resurrection in Acts xiii. 32-34, and in Heb. i. 5 f. with the incarnation, so also could it have been connected with the baptism. Luke iii. 22 β is just as consistent with Luke i. 35 as Acts ii. 36 with Luke ii. 11, iv. 18, Acts x. 36, 38, or as Rom. i. 4 with Rom. i. 3, viii. 3. God begat Jesus as His Son, since He was born; and again in the figurative meaning of the Psalm passage made Him His Chosen Christ, since He furnished Him in the baptism with the spirit of His office (Luke xxiii. 35; John i. 34 according to \aleph Ss Sc et al). (2) From fear that they might be utilised by the Marcionites, the words, ix. 54, "even as Elijah did," and ver. 55, "ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," were struck out, the former by some (\aleph , of the Latin MSS. e vg), the latter by others (AC), both by still others (\aleph BL Ss). These facts prove that an antinomistic text produced by Marcion has not here found the most extensive circulation in the Catholic Church (D, most Latin MSS. S¹ S³, Chrysost. etc.), but that Marcion found this, and that Luke had written it (GK, ii. 468). (3) The history of the text of xxii. 17-20 is very involved. I. The α text is found with some variants in \aleph ABCL, etc., and accordingly in Tischendorf as in the Text. receptus. II. The present writer considers as belonging to β the text of the two most important old Latin MSS. b e (k lacks this passage). In this text ver. 16 is immediately followed by ver. 19a, καὶ λαβὼν ἄρτον—τὸ σῶμά μου, then comes vv. 17, 18 as in Tischendorf. There is lacking, therefore, vv. 19b-20 (τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν διδόμενον—τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐκχυννόμενον). How Marcion's text is related to this text has not yet been determined with entire certainty. At all events he has nothing of vv. 16, 18, 19b (on this point GK, ii. 490, is not fully exact); further, he has the cup after the bread, i.e. immediately after 19a, and only one cup. He agrees, therefore, in decisive points with β against α . The sentence about the cup contains, however, the word διαθήκη. It was accordingly formed, not as in β =ver. 17 of α , but probably after 1 Cor. xi. 25, as to a certain extent also in α , ver. 20. In another way Ss and Sc in this passage (concerning S¹=Peshito at the present writing there is nothing certain to be said) show that β is their basis which they have interpolated in various ways from the parallels. At the same time one must consider that they are influenced by Tatian, who, as may easily be conceived, had in his harmony a mixed text from the different accounts of the Gospels, probably also from 1 Cor. xi. (Forsch. i. 204; GK, ii. 551 ff.). That the Syriac versions have attempted many times to improve this passage is shown by the fact that γέννημα is rendered by three different words in Sc Ss S¹. Sc Ss agree with β in that they have the order vv. 16, 19, 17, 18, 21, and so only one cup. However, ver. 19 f. reads in these texts: "And he took bread, and gave thanks over it, and brake it, and gave it to them, and said: This is My body, which (Ss+is given) for you; this do in remembrance of Me. And (Ss+after they had eaten) He took a cup, and gave thanks over it, and said: Take this, divide it among yourselves (Ss+this is My blood of the new covenant). I say to you that from henceforth I will not drink of the fruit of the vine (Ss of this fruit) until the Kingdom of God comes" (ver. 21 follows). It is evident to everyone that all that Ss has additional to Sc is interpolation; no Syrian who had 1 Cor. xi. and the other Gospels, or the Diatessaron (cf. Aphraates, p. 221), in his Bible, could take offence at it. Therefore, if Sc offers the relatively or absolutely original Syriac text of the "separate" Gospels, then this differs from β only by the acceptance of ver. 19b. This addition does not come, however, from a Greek text of Luke, but, since διδόμενον is lacking, from 1 Cor. xi. 24. III. D and four old Latin MSS. have vv. 16-19a (as far as τὸ σῶμά μου) in the order of a, but without vs. 19b-20. This text, which is here called γ , can neither in itself nor in relation to II. be original. For (1) the ancient character of the Latin witnesses for β (b e) in comparison with the Latin witnesses for γ (a ff² i l), as also the essential agreement of the former with the oldest Syriac text (see above), proves that β is the more original form in the Latin Bible, from which at a later time γ developed. This change is explained if we presuppose on the part of the author of the γ text a regard for the a text, which also in the Occident gradually gained the ascendancy. This arrangement (of the account of the Supper) was adopted more easily, since thereby a seemingly suitable parallelismus membrorum between vv. 15-16 and 17-18 would be secured. On the other hand, the wording of the old Occidental, and at the same time Syriac text β itself was retained even in details, such as the omission of the second καί, ver. 17. (2) Consequently γ cannot be original, since in this text the one cup, which β and γ have, is placed before the bread. This, however, contradicts all tradition, both of the N.T. (1 Cor. xi. 24 f., cf. x. 3 f.; Matt. xxvi. 26 f.; Mark xiv. 22 f.; also Marcion and Tatian, GK, ii. 490, 509; Forsch. i. 204) and of the liturgical usage. Against this one cannot adduce as evidence to the contrary the mention of the cup before the bread, 1 Cor. x. 16 f., or even before the table, i.e. before the entire meal, ver. 21; for it is inconceivable that Paul should contradict himself in so brief a passage. The Didache also recognises the order, food and drink (Didache, x. 3, cf. 1 Cor. x. 3 f.), while the prayers (Didache, ix. 2 f.) at first over the cup, then over the bread, do not belong to the Eucharist in the narrower meaning, but to the introductory Agape (Forsch. iii. 293 ff.). There remains accordingly only the question whether a or β was written by Luke. For β there are decisive: (1) the age of its attestation, (2) that the origin of β from a is just as easily understood as the origin of a from β is inconceivable. No Christian of earlier or later times could take offence at the words in vv. 19¹, 20, known in part from Matt. and Mark and in part from 1 Cor. xi. On the other hand, everyone must take offence at the fact that the cup of Luke is not likened to the blood, and was not in any way characterised in its sacramental significance. Inasmuch as the Gospel of Luke in earlier times was held to be the Gospel of Paul (vol. ii. 385, n. 7), nothing was more natural than to add to his meagre text from 1 Cor. xi. Since, however, according to a very effective Canon of the text criticism of the early Church, anything that had been handed down in the tradition, and was suited to the taste of the Church, might not be relinquished (cf. Eusebius in Mai, Nova p. bibl. iv. 1. 255), the original account of the cup, in no way characterised as a sacrament, was transferred to a position before the account of the institution of the sacrament, i.e. immediately following ver. 16, after it had been displaced by an interpolation from its original position. Along with the eating of the pass-over, ver. 15 f., stood now as seemingly suitable a drinking of the cup, which belonged just as little as the former to the sacrament, but as well as that constituted an act preparatory to the institution of the sacrament. (3) That α grew out of β in such an artificial way, is betrayed also by the fact that τὸ ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν ἐκχυρόμενον, ver. 20, does not in its content suit τὸ ποτήριον nor in its wording τῷ αἵματι as apposition. Neither a solecism so bad, and in no way necessary, is to be credited to a Luke, nor the impossible thought that the cup which Jesus hands to the disciples was poured out or shed in their behalf. The genuineness of β appears from all these facts to the present writer to be without doubt. The peculiarity of the account of Luke, which, to be sure, is noticeable, is due to the purpose of this Gospel, cf. § 60. The present writer must content himself with these examples out of the textual history of Luke's Gospel, and add only the assertion, that also in other important passages it must first be determined what is the original of the group of Western and Eastern witnesses, designated by β , before one can decide anything as to what is the original. The present writer is of the opinion that D has preserved also at xxii. 43 f., xxiv. 51, what was written by Luke; on the other hand, the false additions, xxiii. 38, 53; omissions, xxiii. 34; false changes, xi. 53 f.

§ 60. PREFACE, PLAN, AND PURPOSE OF LUKE'S HISTORICAL WORK.

Unlike Matthew and Mark, the third Gospel has no title given to it by the author, in which respect it resembles the Fourth Gospel and Acts. Nor is there evidence to show that Luke, whom we may assume to be the author, ever provided either of his two books with a common title, or each of them with individual titles, which were subsequently lost (n. 1). In fact, such a title was quite unnecessary, if Luke did not design his work for circulation among the reading public through the ordinary channels, and if he did not intend it to be read in the services of the Church, as John did Revelation, but wrote it primarily for the use of an individual. That this was the case is proved by the dedication prefixed to the work. In this Luke is the only one of the historical authors of the N.T. to follow a custom much in vogue among the Greek and Roman writers of that time. Although in classic usage the dedication frequently was only a polite expression of personal regard or of servile appeal, having no intimate connection with the contents and purpose of the writing, there are numerous cases where the address shows that the writer dedicated his work to a friend and patron because he had suggested its composition, or because, from his interest in the subject of the work or in the person of the author, the latter hoped to secure a wider circulation of his work, or because such a person seemed to him appropriately to represent the class of readers whom he desired his book to reach (n. 2).

In general, this characterises the dedication of Luke's work to Theophilus, as is clear from the specific statement of the author's purpose with which the dedication concludes. The address, κράτιστε Θεόφιλε, not only shows that Theophilus was a man of high position (n. 3), but also proves that, at the time, he was not a member of the Christian Church; since there is no instance in the Christian literature of the first two centuries where a Christian uses a secular title in addressing another Christian, to say nothing of a title of this character, which may be said to correspond in a general way to "Your Excellency" (n. 3). Theophilus is a Gentile interested in Christianity. The word κατηχήθης cannot be interpreted to mean that he was a "catechumen" in the technical sense, i.e. a person under instruction by the Church preparatory to baptism. For, in the first place, we do not find this technical meaning of κατηχεῖν, κατηχεῖσθαι in use until a later time, and, in particular, it is not to be found in this sense elsewhere in Luke's writings. In the second place, the use of the aorist would indicate that Theophilus had previously received this instruction, and had been already baptized. This, however, is not only out of harmony with the title by which Luke addresses him, as already indicated, but even more so with the statement of the result which Luke hoped to accomplish in the case of Theophilus by his historical account. The work is designed to give Theophilus his first real knowledge, fundamental insight, and conviction regarding the "trustworthiness of the words concerning which he had heard" (ver. 4, n. 4). Assuming as self-evident that the λόγους, about the trustworthiness of which the author is here speaking, were words, discourses, or teachings relating to the πράγματα which Luke was about to set forth in their historical order, it is perfectly clear that one who had been instructed by the Church and baptized into its membership would not need to be convinced of the trustworthiness of these λόγους. Moreover, from Luke's language it is certain that the information which Theophilus had received about the facts of Christianity and the Christian doctrines based upon these facts, had not afforded a certainty which satisfied his critical understanding (n. 4). On the other hand, the fact that Luke's book is dedicated to him, and the tone of the dedication, prove that it was not mere curiosity that led Theophilus to enter into relation with the Christians and with Luke, but that he was favourably inclined toward the Christian faith, only all his doubts had not yet been overcome. The fact that Luke dedicated a second book to him may be taken as proof that the first had met a kindly reception, while from the absence of the polite form of address in Acts i. 1 we are possibly to conclude that in the meantime he had ceased to be the man of distinction, and had become a brother. One of the Greek preachers (above, p. 6, n. 5) fittingly compares Theophilus with the pro-consul Sergius Paulus (Acts xiii. 6-12). In view of his social position, it is very natural to suppose that Luke may have written for him primarily, as he says (σοὶ γράψαι). But Theophilus' position was also a guarantee that when the work had accomplished its immediate end it would find a wider circulation.

If such was Luke's purpose, it follows at once that vv. 1-2 are not designed to give the reasons which led him to the decision to write this work. In the first place, the contents of vv. 1-2 are not at all suited to express such a purpose (n. 5). Moreover, it is self-evident that the only adequate and generally intelligent reason for literary work of any sort is always and only the purpose which the author believes can be accomplished in this way, and only in this way. Therefore, vv. 1-2 must have been written solely in order to justify Luke's undertaking by citing the case of others who had undertaken similar work before him, whose historical position gave them no more right to do so than he possessed, and whose information was no greater than his own. The structure of the sentence (ἐπειδήπερ πολλοὶ ἐπεχείρησαν . . . ἔδοξε καὶ μοι) shows at once that Luke places himself on quite the same level with these earlier writers, in order to show that his undertaking is not unheard of or presumptuous. If, as Origen thought (n. 6), criticism of his predecessors were implied in ἐπεχείρησαν, then he chose the means least adapted to accomplish this end. Writing of this kind is here simply described as a difficult task, both in the case of the "many" and in his own case. It is possible that he means at the same time that one or another of the many, or all of them, had failed to accomplish their purpose. Nevertheless, the "I also" (ver. 3) shows that all which he says of his predecessors is equally applicable to himself. On the other hand, all that he says of his own work, in vv. 3-4, except ἔδοξε καὶ μοι γράψαι, namely, the dedication to Theophilus, what he hoped to accomplish with him, the preparatory investigations which he made, and the method of his exposition, refers exclusively to Luke. Since all these are things not touched upon in the characterisation of the older writers and their work, we may assume that Luke means to imply that these features of his own work are not to be found in these earlier writers. While it is not expressly stated what it was that was lacking in the earlier writings, the fact that Luke does not recommend to Theophilus any one of them, proves that no one of them was adapted to Luke's particular purpose.

"Many," says Luke, "have taken in hand to draw up a narrative concerning those matters which have been fulfilled among us." In contrast to Theophilus, who is still outside the Church, Luke here, as in ver. 2, associates himself not only with the earlier writers, but also with the entire group of those occupying the same position and seeking the same ends, to which both he and these writers belonged. This is the Christian Church, and, in particular, the Christian Church of Luke's own time as distinguished from the eye-witnesses of the gospel history (ver. 2; cf. John i. 14), many of whom were perhaps no longer living. Taking πληροφορεῖν in the only sense in which it occurs with an impersonal object (n. 6), it may mean either that the things in question have been accomplished, i.e. reached their consummation, in the Christian Church of Luke's time, or τὰ ἐν ἡμῖν πράγματα,—instead of which τὰ καθ' ἡμᾶς, or τὰ παρ' ἡμῖν, or τὰ ἡμέτερα πράγματα could have been used equally well,—may be used to distinguish the facts in question from all other historical facts, and the facts thus carefully limited would then be said to have been to a certain extent accomplished in the writer's lifetime. The latter interpretation is favoured not only by the position of ἐν ἡμῖν after πεπληροφορημένων, but also by the fact that, according to the other construction, the indication of the subject of the proposed historical work would be very obscurely designated. Accordingly, the sentence may be taken to mean that many have undertaken to set forth the distinctively Christian facts, in other words the history of Christianity, and that Luke intends to make a similar attempt, since πράγματα is certainly to be supplied as the object of παρέδσαν in ver. 2, and of παρηκολουθηκότι πᾶσιν and γράφαι, ver. 3.

The norm by which the earlier writers and Luke also were guided, and, consequently, the principal source upon which they depended, was the reports of those who from the beginning had been eye-witnesses (of these πράγματα), and ministers of the word (n. 7). It follows at once that the writers with whom Luke here compares himself were not αὐτόπται καὶ ὑπηρέται τοῦ λόγου from the beginning, but became such later. Such a contrast as this, which is left unexpressed elsewhere also (1 John i. 1-4, iv. 14; John i. 14; 1 Pet. v. 1; 2 Pet. i. 16), is necessary in order to explain the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, since the trustworthiness of a witness and the value of his testimony is by no means conditioned upon his having had a personal connection with the details of the history from the beginning. The centurion at the cross, a member of the Sanhedrin like Nicodemus, Lazarus in Bethany, a travelling companion of Paul's, were the really classic witnesses for the portions of the history in which they took part. But those from whom the tradition was received, the persons to whom the Christian Church owed its knowledge of the facts of Christian history and the faith which was based upon these facts, were of a different class. Although no one of them could have experienced every detail which Luke designs to set forth, taken together they may be considered witnesses of the whole series of events in question, and recipients of a call which made it their duty to communicate their knowledge of these facts to others.

As to the second phrase, the ministry of the word, ἀπ' ἀρχῆς clearly means "from the beginning of the Christian preaching after the resurrection of Jesus," and possibly Acts i. 22, x. 37, John xv. 27, cf. vi. 64, xvi. 4, indicate that this is the meaning of the same phrase in relation to the eye-witnesses. It is to be observed, in the first place, that Luke has chosen an expression to describe the call of the original witnesses which cannot be limited to the apostles, but which, leaving the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς out of account, includes all who had taken part in the διακονία τοῦ λόγου (Acts vi. 4, xiii. 5, xx. 24, xxvi. 16; 1 Cor. iii. 5, iv. 1; Col. i. 7, 25; 1 Tim. i. 12, v. 17; 2 Tim. ii. 15, iv. 2, 5). Even if this circle is limited by the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς to those who had been engaged in this work ever since the first years of the gospel preaching, if not from the Day of Pentecost, it is not confined to the apostles, but includes persons like Philip (Acts viii. 4 ff.), the brothers of Jesus (Acts i. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5, xv. 7), and other ἀρχαῖοι μαθηταί (Acts xxi. 16). In the second place, this is true also of the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς αὐτόπται. Even where the latter expression is limited to the apostles, it is not possible to make it refer with equal literalness to the same point of time for all; since Matthew, for example, became a companion of Jesus much later than did Peter and John. Moreover, since the apostles were chosen still later, on this assumption important parts of the gospel history would be excluded from the realm covered by the testimony of eye-witnesses. Of all the gospel writers, Luke in particular could not have regarded either the choosing of the apostles or the baptism of John as the beginning of Christian history, from which point of time the Church had received an account based upon the testimony of eye-witnesses; for both in i. 3 and in the carrying out of his plan he places the beginning of the history which he is about to set forth at a point very far back. Account must be taken also of the contents of Luke i. 5–ii. 52. What was the length of Mary's life, who is not mentioned in the N.T. after the events recorded in Acts i. 14, and who is not referred to at all outside the historical books, except in Gal. iv. 4, and here not by name, we do not know. The brothers of Jesus also were "ministers of the word," and the fact that they retained a critical attitude towards Jesus until the last makes them none the less eye-witnesses of the history of His early life (vol. i. 104 f.).

Reverting now to the question as to the way in which this entire circle of the original witnesses of the history of Christianity transmitted the facts to the growing Church (παρέδοσαν ἡμῖν), we infer, more from the context of the prologue than from the language used in it (n. 8), that it must have been by oral narratives. For, in the first place, it was the chief business of the "ministers of the word" not to write books, but to proclaim the unwritten gospel (§ 48). In the second place, παρέδοσαν ἡμῖν can refer to the composition of one or more Gospels only in case all the eye-witnesses and the ministers of the word edited a single Gospel together, or each one of them prepared a separate Gospel. But both suppositions are equally absurd. The only thing in which all of these witnesses could have had part was the oral transmission of the facts, and that in a great variety of ways. In the third place, the work of the writers with whom Luke classifies himself could not be called an ἀνατάξασθαι διήγησιν if they had possessed the facts, which they designed to set forth before them, in several writings prepared by the original witnesses, i.e. in the form of written narrative (διηγήσεις); for such narratives must have had some plan, and the work of these writers would necessarily have consisted in some sort of a rearrangement of the plan and exposition of the material found in these books. The expression in ver. 1 means that Luke's numerous predecessors collected and themselves arranged for the first time into a connected and continuous narrative, facts which up to that time had been testified to and narrated in detail only as occasion demanded. In the fourth place, if, in ver. 2, Luke was thinking of written records of the original witnesses, it would not have been sufficient justification of his undertaking to call attention to the example of many before him who, without being eye-witnesses, had undertaken work similar to his own. On the contrary, it would have been necessary for him to show that the writings of the original witnesses did not render superfluous those of others writing in the second generation and dependent upon the original witnesses, and to indicate how this was so. The presupposition which lies behind this entire justification of his undertaking seems to be that the original witnesses of the history of Christianity were the ones originally called to be its historians, but that they did not undertake this task; so that now it was necessary for others, who were apparently much less suited to its accomplishment, to venture upon this work. It is clear, therefore, that Luke knew nothing of a Gospel written by one of the apostles and personal disciples of Jesus.

With regard to the numerous gospel writings, however, of which he did have some knowledge, there is at least one with which we have already become acquainted that exactly suits his description, namely, the Gospel of Mark. This was written by a man who was not among the original eye-witnesses and ministers of the word, but who became both in the later course of the history of Christianity. He was dependent, consequently, upon the testimony of these original witnesses, especially upon that of Peter, for the most important part of the gospel history. Their narratives were the norm to which Mark conformed, and, at the same time, the principal source from which he drew. We say principal source, because Luke does not say more of his predecessors—if we have correctly interpreted him to mean that the “many” actually became eye-witnesses during the course of the history which it was their task to set forth, so that they were not dependent upon the tradition of those who were eye-witnesses from the beginning for everything they wrote. The reference of Luke's description to the Gospel of Mark is not excluded by the fact that Mark is dependent in many places upon the Aramaic Matthew, since Luke did not necessarily know that this relation existed. Moreover, an Aramaic book, so long as it remained untranslated into Greek, was outside of the range of the knowledge of a Greek like Luke, even if he had heard of its existence; while it was entirely outside Theophilus' range of vision. Nor can the applicability of the description to Mark be denied, because the subjects with which these histories deal are described as πεπληροφορημένα. For, in the first place, Luke could speak of them from the point of view of his own time without implying that they were known to his predecessors in the same completed form in which they were known to him. In the second place, Luke does not say that his predecessors set forth the entire history of Christianity, but that they undertook to construct a narrative dealing with it. When we recall, on the one hand, that Mark's work was never completed, and, on the other hand, that it was probably designed to reach down to and include the history of the apostolic preaching (vol. ii. 479), it would seem that Mark was just the kind of a work that Luke had in mind when he wrote the description in i. 1-2.

Inasmuch as a Mark and many others, whose names we do not know, had undertaken to write concerning the history of Christianity, Luke also, overcoming the doubts betrayed in his preface, decided on the basis of careful investigation, which went back to the beginning, to set forth for Theophilus' benefit in order and in writing all the facts in question, having in view the purpose which has already been discussed (n. 9). The language Luke uses does not give the impression that he made the investigations upon which his narrative is based after his decision to write, nor that these investigations were carried on as the plan was developed. It would seem rather that, for other reasons, and because of his own interest in the facts, he had already investigated all the facts in question carefully from the beginning, and that now he had decided to set them forth because of the opportunity to do Theophilus a service which the latter had probably requested. Inasmuch as Luke implies at the outset in ver. 2 that he, like the other gospel writers, did not belong to the company of those who had been eye-witnesses and ministers of the word from the beginning, but was able to give an account of the earlier events only from the oral traditions of those who were such, it follows that his investigations must have been inquiries into these oral traditions, and that these inquiries were made of persons who handed these traditions down. This does not necessarily imply that it was possible for Luke to inquire of the original witnesses themselves concerning all the details, for it will be observed that the "we," which is used twice at the beginning (vv. 1, 2), identifies Luke not only with the writers with whom he compares himself, but likewise with the Christian Church, which owed to these original witnesses the knowledge of its origin and early history. It is possible, therefore, that Luke received the tradition from the original witnesses indirectly. If, however, the investigations to which Luke refers were as comprehensive and as careful as he assures us they were, he must have made every effort to secure the testimony of the most trustworthy and oldest possessors of the tradition in proportion as he was able to consult such persons. If the author was a member of the Church in Antioch as early as the year 40 (above, p. 2), and if he is identical with the narrator in the "we" sections of Acts, and with the Luke of the Pauline letters, he had abundant opportunity to secure information directly from prominent first-hand witnesses of the Christian tradition. Although he does not say in so many words that he made use of the writings of his predecessors, he does not deny it. So far as the Gospel is concerned, the καθὼς παρέδωσαν ἡμῖν means that he made the testimony of these original witnesses alone his authority in matters pertaining to the history of the Christian tradition. But this does not preclude the possibility of his having appreciated and used the work of earlier writers, who used practically the same sources as himself, but who in special points drew from sources no longer at Luke's command, or which had never been accessible to him. A man of the literary training which the style of the dedication shows the author to have possessed, could not have been indifferent to writings, known to him, which dealt with the same topics as his own (cf. § 61), even if his own investigations among the sources of the oral tradition, the particular purpose for which he wrote, and the corresponding arrangement of his book made him independent of his predecessors.

Since his preparatory studies took him back to the beginning of the history which he was to set forth (ἀνωθεν), this was also the natural point at which to begin his account. Comparison of Luke i. 5–iv. 15 with Mark i. 1–15 will show what is meant. This was one of the means by which a man like Theophilus might be impressed with the trustworthiness of the history of Christianity. A further means is suggested by καθεξῆς. For inasmuch as the facts in question were historical, it is self-evident that the order in which they were to be set forth must in a general way correspond to the order in which they took place. But we do not know definitely how far Luke, notwithstanding the carefulness of his investigations, was in a position to give the exact chronology. Moreover, by the use of this expression he does not mean to say that chronological accuracy is the main point in his narrative, but that he intends to give a logically connected historical account in which what precedes prepares for and explains what follows, in contrast to the disconnected narratives to which Theophilus had been heretofore accustomed.

There remains to be discussed the question as to how much ground Luke intended his account to cover—in other words, to what work and to what sort of a work the dedication refers. The fact that the Gospel of Luke was early united with the other Gospels, which were generally considered a unit even after the codex form of manuscript came into use (GK, i. 61 ff.), with the consequent separation of Luke from Acts, is not sufficient reason for denying, as is frequently done, that these two books belonged together, being parts of one work, and that both are covered by the prologue (n. 10). The prologue itself shows that ~~the~~ work which it introduces is not to be limited to the Gospel. If Luke meant the prologue to cover only the history of Jesus up to the time of His ascension, the statement of the theme, namely, τὰ πεπληροφορημένα ἐν ἡμῖν πράγματα, is inexplicable. Why did not Luke use some such expression as that in Acts i. 1, or such an expression as John used in his testimony regarding Mark (vol. ii. 453, n. 14), or τὰ περὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ so frequently employed by himself (vol. ii. 377, n. 2), which would serve as a general description of writings covering the gospel history and likewise of his own? If he had a general conception of the history of Christianity, and if he thought of this history as reaching a definite consummation in his own time, he must have intended in the nature of the case to set it forth in its completeness. Just as he planned to begin at the very beginning (ἀνωθεν), so he must have purposed to carry the narrative down to its conclusion. This historical period was, however, by no means concluded with the promise of the Spirit and the command to convert all peoples (Luke xxiv. 44–49); and even if a Christian had regarded these events as the practical conclusion of the τὰ ἐν ἡμῖν πράγματα, there is no conceivable reason why it should be expressly stated that they were completed, when no more was meant than that they had happened. Furthermore, we found it suggested in ver. 2 that Luke, like some of his predecessors, e.g. Mark, became an eye-witness and a minister of the word during the course of events which he was attempting to set forth. Since, however, both according to his own testimony and that of the tradition, he was not one of the personal disciples of Jesus, he must have included among the events to be set forth those that took place in the apostolic age, in which other eye-witnesses and ministers of the word were added to those who had been such from the beginning. We should expect also that in the course of the work the writer would at least indicate the point where he passes to the account of events in which he himself took part.

If the third Gospel were all we had from Luke's hand, we should certainly infer from the prologue that only the first part of his work is preserved to us. But we have also Acts, which is ascribed to Luke quite as unanimously as is the Gospel. Acts is likewise dedicated to Theophilus, and is, moreover, represented to be the second part of a larger work, the first part of which set forth the deeds and teachings of Jesus. And as if this were not sufficient to establish the connection between the two, the deeds and teachings of Jesus set forth in the first book are declared to be the beginning of a work continued after His departure (Acts i. 1 ; n. 10). This is the authenticated interpretation of the πεπληροφορημένων in Luke i. 1. If all that Jesus did and taught before His ascension was a beginning which required to be continued and completed, the Gospel was not planned without reference to Acts, and the two together constitute a single work, the introduction to which is Luke i. 1-4. So in Acts we find confirmation of the preliminary reference in ἀπ' ἀρχῆς. The "we" of Acts xi. 27 f. (above, p. 4, n. 3), xvi.

10-17, xx. 5 (or xx. 6)-xxi. 18, xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16 corresponds to the "I" of the prologue and of Acts i. 1. The author permits us to recognise him as an eye-witness of events which he describes in his history. At the beginning of each book, where, as the author, he contrasts himself to Theophilus, he unconsciously uses "I." Where he appears as an actor in the narrative he does not use this designation, nor does he employ his name, which possibly could have been taken to refer to some person other than the author, but uses "we," thus choosing the middle course between the two tendencies of ancient historians in setting forth events in which the narrator had part. These manifested themselves, on the one hand, in the effort to secure objectivity in the narrative, which seemed to be sacrificed when the personality of the author was introduced; and, on the other hand, in the desire to make it clear that the things recorded were not mere hearsay, but based on the author's own experience (n. 11). According to xi. 27 f., the author was not one of the prophets who came from Jerusalem to Antioch in the year 40 (see Part XI.), but was a member of the Church in Antioch; and, since he clearly was not a Jew, he must have been one of the Greeks converted before Paul's or even Barnabas' arrival in Antioch, through the influence of persons from Cyprus and Cyrene who had fled originally from Jerusalem (Acts xi. 20 f.). Since the narrative preceding Acts xvi. 10, where the "we" is introduced for the second time, is of a very summary character, it is impossible to determine exactly the moment when Luke joined Paul. He is the fourth member of Paul's party when, with Silas and Timothy, the latter reached Troas on the second missionary journey, and he was with them during the journey to Macedonia, and during their stay in Philippi (n. 12). Inasmuch as the "we" does not appear again until the passage in which Paul is represented as setting out on a journey from Philippi, about the time of the Passover in the year 58 (xx. 5 ; n. 13), it appears that Luke was in Philippi during the five or six years intervening, after which he accompanied Paul to Jerusalem (xx. 7, 13-15, xxi. 1-18). According to the prologue, his interest in the tradition was not entirely new when this was written ; and if he began to feel this interest as early as this journey to Jerusalem, he could not have failed to make use of the opportunity to satisfy it which was afforded him by intercourse with early disciples (Acts xxi. 16), with a certain James (xxi. 18), and with others who had been eye-witnesses from the beginning. Since he accompanied Paul on his journey to Rome in the autumn of the year 60 (xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16), it is probable that he remained in Palestine, in the vicinity of Cæsarea, during the whole of the two years and a quarter during which Paul was compelled to remain in that city. If Luke is the author, we have information concerning him for a considerable time longer. He was with Paul during both the first and second Roman imprisonments (Col. iv. 14 ; Philem. 24 ; 2 Tim. iv. 11). He seems to have remained in Rome from his arrival in the spring of the year 61 until after the year 66.

The statement of the prologue about the ministry of the word likewise receives confirmation in the N.T. Not only does Paul call Luke one of his fellow-workers (Philem. 24), but the author of Acts describes himself in xvi. 10, 13, 17 as being engaged with Paul, Silas, and Timothy in preaching the gospel in Philippi. If he remained here for a number of years (see above), it is not unlikely that he performed the work of an evangelist in addition to his regular medical calling, and it is possible that the ancient tradition which makes Luke the brother referred to in 2 Cor. viii. 18 may have a basis in fact (above, p. 6, n. 6).

If from what has been said it follows that Acts is an integral part of the historical work introduced by Luke i. 1-4, this does not in any sense imply that the work which Luke planned to write reached its intended conclusion with Acts xxviii. 31. It is certainly a significant point in the history of Christianity which is reached at the close of the second book. After having overcome difficulties which seemed to multiply themselves, Paul has at last reached Rome, which for so many years has been the longed-for goal of his plans (Acts xix. 21, xxiii. 11, xxv. 11, 21, 25, xxvii. 24, xxviii. 14-16; cf. Rom. i. 10-15, xv. 22-29), and although under arrest the apostle is able to preach the gospel without hindrance in the capital of the empire. But not a single detail of his preaching during these two years is recorded; much less is said about it even than about his three weeks' preaching in Thessalonica, xvii. 1-9. The reader, whose attention has been kept fixed upon this goal since xix. 21, is bitterly disappointed, not only because of the meagreness of the sketch in Acts xxviii. 30 f., but particularly because nothing is said about the outcome of Paul's trial, which has been in view ever since xxv. 10 f., xxvii. 24. A more awkward conclusion of the work could scarcely be imagined. This is not explained by the assumption, which was made in early times, but is incapable of being proved, that Luke wrote or concluded his book immediately after the close of the two years (above, p. 7 f., n. 7). The fact that he writes διετίαν ὅλην proves that he knew what event brought to an end the condition described, which had lasted for two years. Furthermore, the fact that he uses the imperfect tense in describing Paul's situation and activity, instead of saying that both continued for two years and lasted up to the time when he wrote, shows clearly that the change in Paul's condition, with which the author was familiar, put an end also to his abiding in his own hired house, and to the preaching which he had carried on unhindered during this residence (vol. ii. 58 f.). Consequently, at the very earliest, Luke could not have written these lines before Philippians was written, i.e. before the summer of 63 (vol. i. 539 ff.). But why does not Luke tell us what it was which brought the two years' residence to an end, and what the situation was at the time when he wrote? In order to explain this difficulty, it has been supposed that Theophilus had been for some time in Rome with Luke and Paul, and hence was thoroughly informed about the facts of which Luke here says nothing, although he indicates that he was acquainted with them. In that case xxviii. 30 f. is superfluous, and the form of the sentence is as unnatural as it could well be. In fact, a very common custom (n. 10) made the end of the work a most fitting place in which to explain to Theophilus in a second address why the author thought it appropriate to break off at this point and to conclude his work in so peculiar a manner (cf. 2 Tim. i. 18). All that is strange entirely disappears, however, if Luke, having reached an important turning-point in the history of Christianity, appropriately brought to a close the second book of his work, at the same time intending to continue or to complete it in a third book. It will be remembered that at the close of the Gospel, after the account of the resurrection, there is added a short sketch of what happened up to the time of Jesus' ascension, and of what took place immediately thereafter (Luke xxiv. 44-53; n. 14), and then the author begins the second book by going back again to the time between the resurrection and the end of the period during which the disciples waited for "the promise of the Father," in order to set forth these events in greater detail (Acts i. 1-26), telling us here for the first time how the period of waiting was brought to a close (Acts ii. 1-47). In the same way, in Acts xxviii. 30, 31, he adds to the narrative, which up to this point has been very detailed, a short sketch of the situation which followed the events last narrated, intending to take up the account at this point in his third book. The only inappropriateness in the comparison is the fact that Paul does not take the place in Acts which both in reality and according to the testimony of Acts i. 1 Jesus has in the Gospel.

Although the title πράξεις τῶν ἀποστόλων cannot be traced to Luke, it is, notwithstanding, of very ancient date, as is evidenced by the fact that it is the only title which we have in the tradition (n. 15). Moreover, it reproduces correctly the impression which every reader gets from Acts of the author's purpose. Beginning with Acts i. 1, it is his purpose to set forth the continuation, through the apostles and the apostolic Church, of the work and teaching begun by Jesus. From chap. xiii. onwards, however, Acts is simply a history of missionary work among the Gentiles under the leadership of Paul. The little which is said of the other apostles and of the mother Church is incidental, and is found only in connections where Paul and the missionary work among the Gentiles come into contact with Jerusalem (Acts xv. 21). Nothing is said of the missionary preaching of the earlier apostles and the brothers of Jesus (Acts xii. 17; Gal. ii. 9; 1 Cor. ix. 5; 2 Pet. i. 16). It is unnecessary to prove that this silence on Luke's part is not due to lack of appreciation of those who were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word from the beginning. Rather does Luke exhibit the character of a genuine historian when he gives a continuous treatment of the history of missionary work among the Gentiles in chaps. xiii.–xxviii., proving that he did not feel it necessary, in view of the καθεξῆς of Luke i. 3, to write a chronicle or a journal of the nature of an historical calendar. But this one-sided development of a single thread of the narrative is incomprehensible unless it was Luke's intention in a third book to go back and take up again the history of the original apostles.

A third book is demanded also by the prologue. If Luke intended to set forth the history of Christianity to the point of development which it had reached up to his time (above, pp. 45, 53), this plan is by no means carried out, if the work is complete in the two books before us. Ingenious speculations have been made about the interesting contrast between the message of the angels in the Temple in Jerusalem and in Mary's chamber in Nazareth (Luke i. 11, 28) and the unhindered preaching of the gospel in the capital of the world (xxviii. 31). But the gospel had been preached in Rome and a large Church organised there long before Paul's arrival. Furthermore, the meagre sketch in Acts xxviii. 30 f. is no fitting parallel to the exalted poetical narratives of Luke i. 5-56, and, what is even more to the point, the close of Acts does not conclude even the history of Paul or of the missionary work among the Gentiles, to say nothing of the history of Christianity. The author who wrote Luke xxiv. 47 and Acts i. 8, and the Luke who was with the imprisoned apostle when he wrote 2 Tim. iv. 7, 17, could not have regarded the Christian preaching as practically at an end before Paul so regarded it. Moreover, anyone giving such a repeated and full account as Luke gives of Jesus' prophecy concerning the judgment of Jerusalem (Luke xxi. 32; cf. xix. 41-44, xxi. 20-24, xxiii. 28-31) could not well, before the year 70, have thought of the history of Christianity as having reached its conclusion even temporarily.

But if the events recorded in 2 Tim., the death of Peter and Paul, and the fall of Jerusalem, had already taken place (§ 62), the writer had abundant material for a third book. And that he actually intended to add a τρίτος λόγος when he began the second book, or at least when he revised it after it was completed, he himself indicates in Acts i. 1; since it is not conceivable that one who could write the finished sentences which we have in Luke i. 1-4 should have made the mistake of writing τὸν μὲν πρῶτον for the more correct τὸν μὲν πρότερον λόγοι in Acts i. 1, if he intended to say that the Gospel was the first of two books only and not one of a number of books (n. 16). For, in this passage, he is not following an older source in which there were Hebraisms, and the style of which was otherwise inferior, but is freely expressing his own thoughts at the beginning of a book. It is painful to reflect what we have lost, either because of Luke's failure to write this third book, or, what is less probable, because of its disappearance immediately after it was written. This opened the way for the petty fabricators of the second century, who were fond of treating the material which Luke had reserved for his third book. In all the apocryphal literature dealing with the history of the apostles which is preserved to us, we notice dependence upon Luke's second book and imitation of his style, but there is not a single page of it even remotely comparable to one of the chapters of our Acts (n. 17).

Even before the particular material which Luke worked over, the sources which he employed, and the trustworthiness of his accounts, are investigated, it is possible to affirm that he kept in view throughout his work the purposes expressed and suggested in his dedication. He does not, like Matthew, write an apology on behalf of Christ and His Church in order to meet objections of a national character. Nor does he, like Mark, present, from a single point of view, narratives which have been impressed upon his memory by frequent hearing and repetition. His design is rather, as a Greek historian, to set forth the history of Christianity from its beginnings to the completion which it had reached in his own time, and he aims to do this in such a way that his exposition, based upon thorough investigation and presenting the whole development of Christianity connectedly, shall impress, with a sense of the trustworthiness of the Christian traditions, a cultured Gentile who has heard much about the facts which are current in the Christian Church and held to be the basis of its faith, who has become interested in this history, and whose relations to individual Christians, like the author, are friendly.

One of the first things which impresses us when we compare Luke with the other Gospels is the effort to show how one thing develops out of another. If the περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης (Luke i. 4) means anything, Theophilus must already have heard something about John, the forerunner of Jesus, possibly no more than what is said about him in Mark i. 2-8 or Matt. iii. 1-12. Luke gives an account of the messages which indicated the future significance of the Baptist even before his birth, of the hopes awakened by his birth, of his hermit life (i. 80), and of his call to be a prophet (iii. 2; cf. Jer. i. 4). The unusual character of the circumstances of John's birth helped to render faith in the greater miracle of Jesus' birth easier, not only for Jesus' own mother (i. 36 f.), but also for the reader of Luke's Gospel. The kinship and friendly relation between the two families, and the mingling of their hopes in connection with the children, make more comprehensible the subsequent relations between John and Jesus. If, as was undoubtedly the case, Theophilus had heard that the Christ whom the Christians followed was called Jesus of Nazareth, and if, as was probable, he had heard also that He was born in Bethlehem, it was natural for Luke to explain to him the combination of circumstances by which it came about that the parents of Jesus, who lived in Nazareth, journeyed to Bethlehem shortly before His birth (ii. 1-5, i. 26 f.). In keeping with the brief account of the development of the child John into the type of man that he afterwards became (i. 80), is the story concerning the twelve-year-old Jesus, which, in its setting (ii. 40, 51-52), is meant to serve as a clear proof of the extremely happy but entirely natural and thoroughly human development of the child Jesus.

While the effort to treat the material "pragmatically" generally involves the retention of the proper chronological order, it is nevertheless evident from the outset that this order is not observed at the expense of this desired "pragmatism." In i. 80 the history of John's life is told up to the point where it is taken up again in iii. 2, while ii. 1 goes back to a much earlier date, a few months later than the events recorded in i. 57-79. The history of the Baptist's public work is developed in iii. 19, 20 to its conclusion, which must have been at least several months after its beginning (iii. 2). But in iii. 21, when he takes up again the history of the man Jesus, he begins with an event which took place long before the arrest of the Baptist, and gives Jesus' genealogical descent at this point instead of in connection with i. 27. The contrast between the divine sonship of Jesus revealed from heaven and His supposed and outwardly valid descent from Joseph (iii. 22, 23), is of much more importance in the mind of the author than the mere mechanical arrangement of the material in its chronological order. No specific mention is made of the fact that John was in prison when Jesus began His work in Galilee, described from iv. 14 onwards, and when John sent two of his disciples to ask the now famous question (vii. 19; cf. per contra Matt. iv. 12, xi. 2; Mark i. 14). Nor can the reader infer this from the order of events in iii. 18-23. Even if he could, it is a question whether this would enable him to understand the author's meaning in all the narratives that follow iii. 23. What is true of Luke iii. 21, which goes back to a point of time prior to iii. 20, and of the account of the temptation (iv. 1-13), which precedes the arrest of the Baptist, as is shown by its immediate connection with the account of the baptism and is confirmed by all the other traditions, can very well be true also of more than one of the narratives following iv. 13. The history of John is evidently concluded with iii. 20. Not even his execution is narrated later, though knowledge of it is assumed in ix. 7-9.

It is apparent, not only in the account of John but everywhere, how little Luke intended to reproduce all the events in their exact chronological order. In the account of Jesus' work in Galilee he begins after a general description (iv. 14, 15), by relating His visit to His native village, although he does not conceal from the reader that Jesus had already done many remarkable works in Capernaum (iv. 23). After this account of the visit to Nazareth there follow several chronologically connected incidents describing Jesus' work in Capernaum, the city of Galilee most honoured by Jesus with His works (iv. 31-42; cf. iv. 23, vii. 1, x. 15). Finally, he shows how the other cities of Palestine were at the same time not neglected (iv. 43 f.). The logical arrangement of the material which here takes the place of the chronological order is not due to dogmatic considerations, as in the case of Matthew, but arises from Luke's historical method. If we accept the reading τῆς Ἰουδαίας in iv. 44, which is the better attested reading, and which is to be considered genuine also, because its character is such that it could not well have been invented (n. 18), there is no doubt that Luke intends his first description of Jesus' work in Galilee to be concluded at iv. 43 with Jesus' explanation that the nature of His calling made it necessary for Him to preach also to the other cities, i.e. to all the cities of the people and land to which He was sent. Although this statement makes it quite impossible to limit Jesus' work to Galilee, in the general statement that follows (iv. 44), which may apply to many of the separate narratives which follow, Luke goes on to say that Jesus, true to His word, did not limit Himself to Capernaum, or Nazareth, or even Galilee, but preached in the synagogues of Judea, i.e. throughout the whole of the Holy Land

(n. 18). The general description of iv. 14 f. is not, therefore, repeated in ver. 43 f., but there is substituted for it a description of a very different and much more comprehensive character, which may even be contrasted to iv. 14 f. Consequently the reader, having only Luke's account, is at a loss to know in what part of Palestine to look for the places which the author sometimes groups together in a summary fashion (viii. 1, 4, ix. 6, x. 1), sometimes mentions separately, but without names or any other indication of their geographical location (v. 12, vii. 11, 37, x. 38, xiii. 10), especially since he sometimes mentions all the villages of Judea together (v. 17). If it were not known from other sources where Nain was situated (vii. 11), one might be led by Luke's account to seek it in Judea. On the other hand, the village mentioned in x. 38, the name of which is given in John xi. 1, 18, together with the fact that it was situated near Jerusalem, so far as Luke's account is concerned, could have been in Galilee. There are occasional statements which throw light upon the situation of separate localities (viii. 27, cf. ver. 26, ix. 51, 52, 56, xiii. 22). But these are of no great importance, since by far the greater part of the narratives follow each other without any indication as to time order (v. 1, 12, 17, viii. 4, 19, 22, ix. 1, 7, xi. 1, 14, etc.). It is seldom even remarked that an event recorded after another occurred in this order (v. 27, viii. 1, ix. 28, x. 1). The use of such expressions as "on one of the days" (v. 17, viii. 22, xx. 1), which does not occur in the other Gospels, and the rarity of definite indications as to time relations (vi. 1, vii. 1, 11, ix. 28, 37, x. 21, xiii. 1, 31), show that Luke's investigations had not enabled him to obtain an exact idea of the order in which the gospel events took place, and also that he was conscious of this fact.

Although Luke shows an interest, not to be observed in the other Gospels, in supplying the history of Jesus' life with chronological notices (i. 36, ii. 21, 22, 42, iii. 23) and in connecting it chronologically with facts of universal and national history (i. 5, ii. 1 f., iii. 1 f.; Acts xi. 28, xviii. 2, 12), he does not assume a knowledge of the details of the chronology of Jesus' public ministry which it was beyond his power to obtain. This is evidenced even in connection with the last days in Jerusalem, both by the absence of connection between single events in the section, the setting of which is marked by the general descriptions of xix. 47 f. and xxi. 37 f., and by the use in xx. 1 of the same ἐν μιᾷ τῶν ἡμερῶν which occurs earlier. What seems to be the account of a journey from Galilee to Jerusalem in ix. 51–xix. 46 is, therefore, to be regarded as only apparently such. It may be that the scattered notices of this journey in Luke, while not giving the order of events with entire correctness, are for the most part accurate (n. 19). But it was not the intention of the author to be understood as giving such a chronology. For, in the first place, there is no discernible relation among these scattered notices. There is nothing here which resembles a list of stations, as in the accounts of the journeys in Acts (xiii.–xxviii.). No mention is made even of the journey through Perea (Matt. xix. 1; Mark x. 1). In the second place, in this section of the book there is the same lack of connection between the single narratives which occurs earlier (e.g. xi. 1, 14, 29, xii. 13, 22, 54, xiii. 6, 10, xiv. 1, xv. 1, xvi. 1, xvii. 1, 20, xviii. 1, 9, 15, 18), so that the reader cannot tell when and where the separate events took place. If we know that what is narrated in Luke x. 38–42 took place in a village near Jerusalem, our information is not derived from Luke, and it would be a misunderstanding of his account to infer from it that this unnamed village (Bethany) was on the way from Galilee to Jerusalem, and farther removed from the city than the places indicated in xiii. 22, xvii. 11, xviii. 31, 35. In the third place, it is apparent that the first notice regarding the journey to Jerusalem (ix. 51), which is given with a special solemnity, was not intended to mark an important transition in the narrative. There is a close connection with what precedes. This is, however, so throughout. While these scattered notices of movements from place to place have no connection and are too few to enable us to form any clear conception of the journey to Jerusalem, there is everywhere evident a connection between the contents of the single narratives quite independent of the chronological relations. In the fourth place, even where places are clearly indicated, as in ix. 51, xiii. 22, xvii. 11, it is evident that this is done in order to make clear events immediately connected with them, and is not designed to furnish the outlines of a journey. The fact that in the history of the Passion and in most parts of Acts the chronological order is more apparent and more strictly adhered to, is due, in the first place, to the more exact knowledge which the writer had regarding these parts of the history from the tradition and his own recollection. In the second place, while it was quite possible to record single deeds, discourses, and conversations which took place during Jesus' Galilean tours, without knowing the order in which they took place, this could not be done in the history of the Passion and Resurrection, or in an account of the extension of missionary work from Antioch to Rome. The narrative in Acts does not, however, resemble a chronicle. Acts ix. 1 refers back to viii. 3, and what is recorded in ix. 1-17 can have taken place before the events recorded in viii. 5-40. In xi. 19 the narrative is taken up where it had been left off in viii. 1-4, and what is recorded in xi. 22 may have occurred before chap. x. The episode of chap. xii. belongs before the point in the narrative where it is recorded, and apparently the same is true of xi. 27 (Part XI.). Attention has already been called to the order of xviii. 23 and xix. 1 (above, p. 30, n. 8). If Luke designed his proposed third book to continue to its completion the history of the apostles (above, p. 53 f.), it would have been necessary for him to take up the narrative again at Acts xii. 17. Just such a fact as this, and Luke's carefulness about his chronological statements in the Gospel, show how conscious he was that his task was that of a historian.

Another means which Luke uses to impress Theophilus with the trustworthiness of Christian historical tradition is the frequent connection of this history with the events of political history. No N.T. writer except Luke mentions a Roman emperor by name. He mentions Augustus, Tiberius, and Claudius (Luke ii. 1, iii. 1; Acts xi. 28, xviii. 2), and when he says that the famine prophesied in the Church in Antioch took place under Claudius (Acts xi. 28), he implies that the prophecy was made in the time of Caligula, Claudius' predecessor (Part XI.). The decrees of Augustus (Luke ii. 1) and of Claudius (Acts xviii. 2) affect the history of Christianity. This is not something existing only in the realm of pious fancy. It connects itself chronologically with a definite year in the reign of Tiberius (Luke iii. 1). This impression of the thoroughly real character of Christianity is strengthened by the mention of all the rulers throughout the region which was the scene of the gospel history (Luke iii. 1-2), and which after the fall of Jerusalem was ruled by Agrippa II. (Schürer, i. 594 [Eng. trans. i. ii. 201]). The reader must have known that Quirinius was the governor of Syria (Luke ii. 2) and Gallio the governor of Achaia (Acts xviii. 12), since their governorships are mentioned in order to fix dates, which is not true in the case of Sergius Paulus (xiii. 7). In general it will be noticed that the number of proper names in Luke is much larger than in the other Gospels, and that these names include not only those of persons in political life and of actors in the narrative, but also of numerous persons whose position is entirely subordinate (n. 20). This reveals the investigator who has taken great pains to inform himself regarding the details of the history he records, and also the story-teller who strove to bring his characters out of the shadows of uncertain tradition into the clear light of reality.

The author's purpose fully to win over to Christianity a Gentile who was still outside the Church but favourably inclined to Christianity, shows itself in various ways. Such a purpose imposed upon the Christian historian a certain reserve. He could not use throughout the sonorous language of the Church, but was under the necessity of handling the material objectively, as it were, and retaining in his narrative a certain secular tone. Luke does, however, employ the language of the Church when frequently in his narrative he calls Jesus ὁ κύριος, a usage not to be found in Matthew and Mark (n. 21). But this simply shows that Luke was not one of the eye-witnesses of the gospel history who was in daily intercourse with Jesus, but that through their preaching he became one of the members of the Church which accepted Jesus as its Lord. On the other hand, he represents persons in personal intercourse with Jesus as addressing Him by His name, Ἰησοῦ (above, p. 37 f.), and in six instances he uses ἐπιστάτα, which does not occur in the other Gospels, and which is not an ecclesiastical word (v. 5, viii. 24, 45, ix. 33, 49, xvii. 13). This replaces the Hebrew Rabbi, which Luke statedly avoids, and is used in addition to διδάσκαλε, which occurs very frequently, and κύριε, which is only sparingly used.

Luke's very meagre account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, which early led to the introduction of wholesale interpolations in Luke xxii. 16-20 (above, p. 39 f.), is to be explained only by the assumption that the narrative was intended for a non-Christian. The word spoken in connection with the distribution of the bread, "This is My body," could impress such a person only as a profound figure. The single word which, according to the genuine text of Luke, Jesus spoke as He distributed the cup, contained no reference to His blood, and consequently suggested no mystery. Heathen slanders associated with the Christian teaching concerning the Lord's Supper are very ancient. Pliny, in his report to Trajan, speaks as if such slanders were common, but not confirmed by his judicial inquiries. Although we cannot prove that these slanders were current as early as the time when Luke was written, it may be assumed that this was the case, or rather it may be inferred from Luke's account. But even if this were not so, it is entirely conceivable that Luke should hesitate to unveil this deepest mystery of Christian worship before the eyes of one who was uninitiated, and that he should hesitate to make a remark about eating the body and drinking the blood of Jesus which might arouse the suspicion of one who was still outside the Church. In thus guarding the mystery Luke betrays his Greek character, and the fact that he is writing for Greeks. This shows itself also in very many other directions.

Without in any way eliminating the Israelitish character of the beginnings of the history of Christianity (n. 22), Luke emphasises strongly from the very first the universal significance of Jesus. That Jesus was born in the city of David was brought about by a decree of the emperor, who, however, had no thought of this result, so that it was really due to the overruling providence of God (ii. 1). Angels proclaim the glory of God, who through His Anointed One is to establish peace over the whole earth among men of good-will (ii. 14). Simeon, wholly under the dominance of thoroughly Jewish ideas and forms, prophesies for the child a saving and enlightening influence upon all peoples (ii. 31 f.). Only in Luke iii. 4-6 is the quotation of the prophecy of Isaiah, which is always associated with the Baptist, continued so as to include the verse in which the salvation announced by John is described as a salvation for all flesh (iii. 6, cf. John xvii. 2). The descent of the Son of David and Son of God is carried back beyond Abraham to Adam and even to God Himself. The coming of Jesus marks not only the consummation of the history of Israel, but the consummation of the history of the race, and the divine sonship of men established in creation finds its consummation in the divine sonship of Jesus (iii. 23-38, cf. Acts xvii. 28, 31). The account in iv. 1-13, which is thus introduced, shows how Jesus as the second Adam overcame the temptation by which the first Adam fell. With manifest fondness he writes of the Gentile whose faith was great (vii. 2-10), and of the merciful and grateful Samaritans (x. 33, xvii. 16). Pilate is presented in a light which is in no way more favourable than that in which he is portrayed in the other Gospels (cf. xiii. 1, xxiii. 25; Acts ii. 23, iv. 27), but the thrice repeated witness of this Gentile to Jesus' innocence is much more strongly emphasised than in Matthew and Mark (xxiii. 4, 14, 15, 22; Acts iii. 13). Besides this we have the testimony of the Gentile centurion in xxiii. 47, which seems to be told here in a form more historically probable than in Matt. xxvii. 54; Mark xv. 39. In Acts viii. 5-xi. 18, Luke describes at length how the natural hesitation of the older apostles to turn to the Samaritans and then to the Gentiles was overcome by the providence of God, and in Acts xv. he shows how the freedom of the Gentile Christians from the law was championed by the Gentile missionaries and acknowledged by the original apostles and the mother Church. Jesus' command to preach the gospel to all peoples upon earth (Luke xxiv. 47; Acts i. 8, ix. 15, cf. ii. 39, iii. 25) is not here obscured by words which are open to misinterpretation and harsh in tone, as we find in Matt. x. 5, xv. 21-28; Mark vii. 24-30. Frequently practical piety, honesty, and charitableness are declared to be preparations for greater blessing among the Gentiles (Luke vii. 2-5; Acts x. 2-4, 35, xiii. 7) as well as among the Jews (Luke i. 6, ii. 25, 36 f., xix. 8, xxiii. 50, cf. Acts xvii. 11), and the humane disposition even of those who have no close relation to the gospel is recognised (Acts xix. 31, xxvii. 3, 43, xxviii. 2, 7). Sometimes also the official integrity of individuals is simply related without special attention being called to it (Acts xviii. 12-17, xix. 35-41, xxv. 1-26, 32, as distinguished from xxiv. 24-27).

On the other hand, Luke, in much stronger colours than any other evangelist, depicts Jesus as the friend and Saviour of those most deeply sunk in sin and farthest astray, and represents penitent humility as the way of salvation (Luke v. 8, 29-32, vii. 29, 34, 37-50, xv. 1-33, xviii. 9-14, xix. 7-10, xxiii. 39-43). A Greek who read the parables in chap. xv. would necessarily apply them to men like himself rather than to the Jews. While such a reader might be astonished, he would nevertheless be impressed by the fact that the great ascetic and mighty prophet John preached an almost trivial morality (iii. 10-14), and that Jesus, who was free from any gloomy asceticism (v. 33-39, vii. 34, xiii. 26), manifested deep sympathy with all human sufferings even when the sufferer was guilty (vii. 13, xiii. 15 f., xix. 41-44, xxiii. 28, cf. ver. 34), avoided all narrow and violent fanaticism (ix. 49 f., 54 f., xxii. 50 f.), and always in word and deed preached a brotherly love which transcended the ceremonial scruples of Judaism and went beyond the national bounds (vi. 6-11, 27-36, x. 25-37, xi. 41-46, xiii. 10-17, xiv. 1-6, xvii. 11-19, xix. 7-10). There are also instances where Jesus enjoins good manners and refinement in social intercourse (vii. 44-46, x. 5-11, xiv. 7-10, 12-14, xx. 46 f., cf. xii. 37, but also xvii. 7-10). The choice and arrangement of material suggests a writer of kindred spirit with the man who wrote Phil. iv. 8 (n. 23).

No single moral obligation is so richly and variously illustrated as that indicated by the words poverty and wealth. In addition to the account of the rich young man, the story of the widow with the mites, and several sayings about benevolence which are to be found also in Matthew and Mark (Luke vi. 30-36, xii. 33, xviii. 18-30, xxi. 1-4), the instances recorded in vi. 24, xi. 41, xii. 13-21, xiv. 12-14, 16-24 (as regards this point not to be compared with Matt. xxii. 2-10), xvi. 1-31, xix. 2-10, are found only in Luke. Only in Luke xvi. 9, 11 is the Aramaic word mamona, which was current in Antioch (vol. i. 18), modified by the adjective unrighteous, and in xix. 8 an example is given to show by how great unrighteousness many riches are accumulated. Jesus refuses to have anything to do with the legal side of questions about property (xii. 13-15), in order that He may lay greater weight upon the moral use of earthly possessions, especially when these are great. Luke has portrayed for all time in a striking and incomparable manner that confidence in riches devoted solely to one's own service which is so foolish because of the uncertainty of human life (xii. 16-21); the complete absorption of the rich in luxurious living with their accompanying heartlessness towards the poor and sorely afflicted brother at their door (xvi. 19-31); the power of riches even over men of noble spirit and men who strive after eternal things (xviii. 18-30); a magic influence which can be broken only by the power of God. "Woe to the rich," he says, who find their satisfaction in this life, who give themselves up to the quiet enjoyment of life's comfort, and who are always sure of being treated with deference on every side (vi. 24-26). But through God's power it is possible even for these (xviii. 27, cf. iii. 8) not only to realise the fact that man's life does not consist in riches (xii. 15), and that possessions are only an unimportant good, bestowed for a short time and not really belonging to the possessor (xvi. 9-12), but also to be freed from the bondage of mammon (xvi. 13). The use of money for the benefit of one's neighbour is proof that a man possesses the state of mind which leads into the kingdom of God (xviii. 22, xvi. 9); it sanctifies also his earthly life (xi. 41). This generosity is not one of the works of which the Pharisees boast (xviii. 12, cf. xi. 42, xvi. 14, xx. 47), but is found in the wealthy tax-gatherer (xix. 8) and the poverty-stricken widow (xxi. 1-4). Love to Jesus is manifested in the same way (viii. 3, cf. xxiii. 50-53). This very spirit was exercised on a large scale by the early Church (Acts ii. 44 f., iv. 32-37, vi. 1-6, ix. 36-39). It was also a bond of union between the Gentile Church and the mother Church (xi. 28-30, xii. 25, xxiv. 17). It is commended in the case of the Gentile Cornelius (x. 2-4, 31, 35, cf. Luke vii. 5). The love of money, of which a fearful example was not wanting in the early Church (Acts v. 1-11), had no influence on the first preachers of the gospel (viii. 20, xx. 31-34). Possessing no money, they were yet rich in God (Acts iii. 6, cf. Luke xii. 21), and observed the word of their Master, "To give is more blessed than to receive" (Acts xx. 35). Instead of scenting in this social morality which pervades both the books of Paul's disciple, Luke, a residuum of Ebionism (n. 24), it is more natural to assume that here also Luke has in mind the fact that his work is intended for Theophilus, a Gentile of high position, and also, according to trustworthy tradition the owner of a large house in Antioch (above, p. 5, n. 5), before the gate of which it is very possible that a Lazarus may sometimes have lingered.

It was also important in writing to men, of whom Luke chose Theophilus as a type, to point out that Christ and Christianity stood in no hostile relation to the State. In striking contrast to Jesus' recognition of the obligation to pay taxes (xx. 20-26), stand the false accusations of the Sanhedrin that Jesus refused to pay tribute and was rebellious against the authority of the State (xxiii. 2, 5, 14), which are related by no other evangelist with so much fulness as by Luke, to which also he alone refers at an earlier point in the narrative (xx. 20). But the falsity of these particular charges is proved by the thrice repeated acknowledgment of His innocence by Pilate, an acknowledgment which is based upon the testimony of king Herod (xxiii. 4, 14-15, 22). It was only the weakness of this Roman official's character, whose attitude was sometimes that of violence against the Jews (xiii. 1) and sometimes that of false compliance with their will, which led him to give over to their fanaticism the Jesus who, by his own confession as well as by the confession of other Gentiles (xxiii. 47), was righteous, while he released a robber and murderer in His place (xxiii. 25). But even among the "transgressors with whom He was reckoned" (xxii. 37),—the criminals between whom He was crucified,—there was one to confess that Jesus was innocent of all offence against the civil law and to acknowledge His future kingship (xxiii. 39-43). Personal interests led the rulers of the Jews (Acts iv. 1-7, 13, v. 28) first to reprimand the apostles, then to imprison and scourge them. The first martyr's blood was shed through the testimony of a false witness and by a tumultuous proceeding which violated (John xviii. 31) existing laws (see Acts vi. 11-14, vii. 54-60). In order to win the favour of the Jews by posing as a protector of their religion, the bigoted Agrippa I., who shortly thereafter lost his life in an attempt to deify himself in heathen fashion, murdered James the son of Zebedee, while Peter escaped his hand only by a miracle (chap. xii.). On several occasions Paul was accused and unjustly treated on the ground that he taught doctrines hostile to the Roman government (xvi. 21-23, 35-39, xvii. 7-9, xviii. 13). Likewise his opposition to heathen idolatry (xix. 26 ff.) and his alleged hostility to Judaism and Jewish ceremonials (xxi. 28, xxiv. 1-9) often involved him in danger, and finally led to a long imprisonment. Repeatedly he saved himself from worse treatment by appeal to his Roman citizenship, and compelled the officials to apologise for their encroachments upon the law (xvi. 37, 38), or to seek escape from the consequences of their action by perverting their official reports (xxii. 24-29, xxiii. 25-30). It was the unworthy dependence upon his Jewish wife and the Jewish people of the procurator Felix, who was as base as he was low born, and to whose infamous immorality and unrighteousness Luke calls attention (xxiv. 25; cf. Schürer, i. 571 f. [Eng. trans. I. ii. 174]), which led him unjustly to prolong Paul's case (xxiv. 24-26). On the other hand, where Paul had to do with honourable officials, who were of more distinguished birth and more noble culture, such as Gallio (xviii. 12-17) and Porcius Festus (xxv. 11-xxvi. 32), he was treated with impartiality and was protected against the fanaticism of the Jews. Several Asiarchs in Ephesus, representatives of the emperor cult, even showed him favour (xix. 31). While king Agrippa II., in pure irony, declares himself inclined to accept Christianity (xxvi. 28), the "intelligent" proconsul of Cyprus, who bore the same name as the apostle, really received a deep impression of the truth, although we cannot say how lasting this impression was (xiii. 7-12).

After all the cheering experiences, all the divine interpositions and deliverances of the second book, the reader would expect nothing else than to find in a third book the account of new victories for the good cause of the gospel in Rome and in the Roman empire. There is to be no escape from persecution (xiv. 22). As regards this point the prophecy at the beginning (Luke ii. 34) corresponds literally to the historical statement at the close (Acts xxviii. 22). Opposition is not to be confined to words. The blood of martyrs will also be shed, as it has been from the beginning, but the true minister of the word does not allow this to hinder his course or to dishearten him (xx. 24, xxi. 13), but with every new station reached he gains new courage (xxviii. 15). It has often been remarked that Acts is pervaded by a joyful spirit; but this is just as true of the Gospel (n. 25). This work also was of a character to make a favourable impression upon an educated Greek whose keen interest in the gospel has been already awakened.

Although enough has been said to prove the symmetry of the plan and the unity of the entire work, as regards the latter point we have independent evidence from the agreement as to the manner in which the material is handled in Luke and in Acts. If Luke iii. 2 gives the impression that in Pilate's procuratorship Annas shared the high-priesthood with Caiaphas, and was the more influential of the two, the same is true of Acts iv. 6. The ἀπογραφὴ of Luke ii. 1-3 is referred to again in Acts v. 37 by the same name. The identity of the two is not affected by the fact that in the latter passage the taxing is described as the one famous taxing, and hence as the only one of its kind, whereas in Luke ii. 2 it is spoken of as if it were a first taxing; for the expression in Luke does not necessarily mean more than that such a taxing had never before taken place in Palestine. There was no occasion in Luke ii. 2 to mention the insurrection headed by Judas. But Luke shows that he was familiar with the then existing party of the Zealots, not only in Acts i. 13 but also in Luke vi. 15, and he is the only one of the gospel writers to designate them by their Greek name which is found in both books (n. 26). The story of how the tetrarch Herod took part in Jesus' trial, and especially of how he and Pilate were made friends through their common relation to Jesus, found only in Luke xxiii. 6-12, 15, prepares the way for Acts iv. 27, a passage which would be quite unintelligible without this preceding narrative. Other references in Acts to the gospel history agree entirely with the accounts in the Gospel (Acts iii. 13 f. = Luke xxiii. 16; Acts x. 41 = Luke xxiv. 41 f.). Although Luke does not in any way represent the work of Jesus as confined to Galilee (above, p. 64 and § 63), yet in both books he emphasises the fact that the whole gospel movement had its beginning in Galilee, spreading thence over the whole of Judea, i.e. Palestine (Luke xxiii. 5; Acts x. 37; cf. Luke iv. 14, xxii. 59, xxiii. 49; Acts i. 11, ii. 7, xiii. 31). In the two lists of the apostles (Luke vi. 14-16; Acts i. 13) the names are not given in exactly the same order, but both agree, as against Matthew and Mark, in mentioning a Ἰούδας Ἰακώβου (Judas [the son] of James), who does not appear at all in Matthew or Mark under this name (but cf. John xiv. 22). They also agree in placing this name after that of Simon, whom Luke alone calls a Zealot, using the Greek name of the party in both passages. Luke is the only evangelist who says explicitly that Jesus called the Twelve, apostles (vi. 13), but it is also Luke who teaches in various ways that Jesus did not intend the preaching of the gospel to be confined to those especially called to be preachers. As at the beginning we find the angels (i. 19, ii. 10) and the Baptist (iii. 18) preachers of the gospel, so the apostles are told not to forbid anyone to preach who is working in Jesus' name, even though he is not of their own number (ix. 49 f.). Jesus Himself commands others also to proclaim the kingdom of God (ix. 60), and sends before Him into all cities and places as heralds of His preaching "other seventy," who afterwards return rejoicing because of the success of their work (x. 1-20; n. 27). This may partially explain the fact that in Luke i. 2, where another would have used simply οἱ ἀπόστολοι even at the risk of inaccuracy, Luke chooses an expression which includes persons not apostles, and calls to mind those who did not become ministers of the word until well on in the course of the history which he is setting forth. All this is preparatory to the account of how, in fact, men who did not belong to the apostolic circle, and who had received no special commission to preach, opened the way for missionary work, becoming the forerunners of the apostles just as the Seventy were of the Lord (Acts viii. 5-40, xi. 19-21, cf. vi. 5, xxi. 8). It is also preparatory to the account of the rise of a new apostolate coexistent with that of the Twelve, whose number was kept intact (Acts i. 15-26), by which the gospel was rapidly carried beyond the limits within which the Twelve were confined by their immediate calling (Acts ix. 3-30, xiii. 2 ff., xiv. 4, 14).

Luke's work shows great variety in regard to language and style; but these are not differences as between the two books, of which the work consists, but are to be observed just as much in the Gospel as in Acts. Since these differences are probably to be explained, partly from the character of the language in the sources used, partly from the different character of the subjects treated, they may be appropriately discussed in connection with the investigations which follow (§§ 61, 62). It hardly needs to be proved in detail that, notwithstanding the differences of style which exist between separate parts of the work, there is a large number of peculiar words and phrases to be found throughout both books, so that from the point of view of the language also the unity of the work is demonstrated (n. 28).

Against all the discussions of the purpose of Acts, which take into consideration only the second book of Luke's work,—assuming that a somewhat external connection exists between it and the first book,—stand first of all the prologue, when this is correctly interpreted, and likewise many of the considerations, some of them old, others new, which have been adduced above. In particular, there is no longer any necessity of disproving in detail the hypothesis of the school of Baur, by which it is assumed that the writer of Acts set out with the intention of harmonising the unreconciled and irreconcilable differences in the apostolic Church, by perverting facts in his narrative and intentionally adding fictitious elements (n. 29). One could wish, however, that those who admit that this hypothesis cannot be accepted in its entirety would purge out the remnants of the old leaven that remain. Whatever details in the premises of this interpretation may require refutation will be discussed in §§ 62, 63. On the other hand, points in which the hypothesis is correct are explained by the purpose which the author actually claimed to have had in view throughout the entire work. A polemical writing produced in the midst of a heated contest and under great stress like Galatians, naturally employs language different from that used in an historical work designed to set forth the same facts perhaps twenty years later. If Luke had introduced into his account of the great struggle for the independence of the Gentile Church, and for its freedom from the law, the excited moods of those who actually participated in the struggle, he would simply have betrayed his unfitness to be an historian of Christianity. In a work intended for a man like Theophilus, who was still outside the Church, this would have been particularly unwise, and calculated to defeat the very end for which the work was intended. There are occasions when Luke does not conceal the fact that good Christians could differ with Paul (Acts xv. 37-39), and reserves his own judgment as to who was the more to blame. But with regard to the burning question of the age, Luke reports more clearly than is done in any of the Pauline letters, how the opponents of the apostle, whose Pharasaic origin Luke alone records (Acts xv. 5), were severely and clearly rebuked by all the authorities of the Church (Acts xv. 10, 19, 24). Luke understands better than does the Roman who declared this to be his purpose (Tacitus, Ann. i. 1), the meaning of tradere sine ira et studio.

1. (P. 41.) Zeller (Die AG nach Inhalt und Ursprung krit. unters., 1854, S. 460, 516) declares it to be practically beyond question that "the greeting" of this entire work, which consists of two parts, contained "the name of the author," i.e. of the alleged author, "Luke." But he says nothing further of the form and content of this title. Blass (Acta ap., ed. maj., 1895, p. 2) proposes as the title of Acts, Λουκᾶ Ἀντιοχείως πρὸς Θεόφιλον λόγος β', and for the Gospel a similar title only with λόγος α'. But is it conceivable that Luke should have given a work dealing with so great a subject such a meaningless title as this, which deserved to be lost? On the other hand, if he actually chose a better one, why has it not been preserved, like the titles of Matt., Mark, and Rev.? In antiquity the title was not such an essential and unalterable part of a book as in later times, especially since the invention of printing. The fact that the titulus or index was attached to the outside of the closed roll (Birt, Das Antike Buchwesen, S. 66) rendered its fate all the more precarious. Our ignorance as to what title Josephus gave or meant to give his Bellum jud. is not due to the loss of the original title. Josephus himself quotes the work under different titles in Ant. i. 11. 4, xiii. 3. 3, 5. 9, 10. 6; Vita, 74, as do also the ancient writers and the MSS. of Josephus' work (cf. Niese, ed. maj. vi. præf. § 1 and p. 3). We are familiar with the correspondence between Augustine and Jerome concerning the title of the Vir. Ill., which was still unsettled ten or twelve years after the appearance of the work (Jerome, Ep. lxvii. 2, cxii. 3; Vall. i. 403, 738). Least of all was a formal title necessary in the case of a writing which was designed and given out by the author as a private document, with no expectation that it would have wider circulation. The writing of another Antiochian, which in this respect was similar to Luke's work, was given in the tradition the meaningless title Θεοφίλου πρὸς Αὐτόλυκον, α' β' γ'.

2. (P. 42.) Cf. the present writer's lecture, "Der Geschichtschreiber und sein Stoff im NT.," ZfKW, 1888, S. 581-596, especially S. 590 f. Josephus wrote his Antiquities at the instigation of his fellow historians, one of whom was Epaphroditus (Ant. i. proœm. 1, mentioned in the third person), to whom the completed work is dedicated in the closing words of the Appendix (Vita, 76, κράτιστε ἀνδρῶν Ἐπαφρόδιτε), as are also the two books, c. Apion, i. 1, ii. 1. At the close of the latter work, ii. 41, the writing is declared to be intended also for those who, like Epaphroditus, desire to ascertain the truth concerning Judaism. Cf. the dedications and prefaces of Irenæus, especially i. præf. § 2-3, iii. præf. § 1; Melito in Eus. H. E. iv. 26. 13; Artemidorus, Interpretation of dreams [Ὀνειροκριτικά], iv., with reference to the books i.-iii., dedicated to a certain Cassius Maximus who is called κράτιστος.

3. (P. 42.) Κράτιστος is used as a title of the governor of Palestine (Acts xxiii. 26, xxiv. 3, xxvi. 25), of the proconsuls of the large provinces (C. I. Gr. Nos. 1072, 1073; Wood, Discoveries at Ephesus, Inscr. of the Odeum, Nos. 3, 4; Dioscorides, Mat. Med. i. proœm. ed. Sprengel, p. 4) and other high officials (Berl. ägypt. Urk., Bd. i. 373, ii. 373 in the index under δικαιοδότης, διοικητής, ἑπαρχος, ἐπιστράτηγος ἐπίτροπος, and above, p. 6, n. 5), but it is also used to designate other men of distinction (cf. n. 2). Josephus uses interchangeably, in addressing Epaphroditus, κράτιστε ἀνδρῶν (Vita, 76; c. Apion, i. 1), τιμωτάτῃ μοι, ii. 1 (cf. Ant. xx. 1. 2), and simply Ἐπαφρόδιτε, ii. 41. In Christian literature we find in Epist. ad Diognetum, κράτιστε Διόγνητε addressed to a pagan, according to the older view the teacher of Marcus Aurelius; and in the dialogue of Methodius, de Resurr. 33, 54 (Bonwetsch, pp. 122, 166) we have κράτιστε Θεόφιλε addressed to the judge of a debate. In addressing one another, the early Christians used either the simple name as in 1 Tim. vi. 20; Iren. Ep. ad Florinum in Eus. H. E. v. 20, or employed distinctively Christian attributives, such as ἀδελφέ (Philem. 20), γνήσι σίζυγε (Phil. iv. 3) Ὁνησίμω τῷ ἀδελφῷ (Melito in Eus. H. E. iv. 26. 13), ἀγαπητέ (Iren. i. præf. § 2, and in the prefaces of all the books that follow), ἀγαπητέ μου ἀδελφὲ Θεόφιλε (Hippol. de Antichr. i.). By the beginning of the third century, secular titles, such as κύριε and the like, had come into use also among Christians; Alex. Hieros. in Eus. H. E. vi. 11. 6; pseudo-Petr. ad Jac., greeting and conclusion; Afric. ad Orig. (Delarue, i. 10), although in the reply (p. 12) Origen uses the Christian form of address.

4. (P. 43.) Since Luke construes κατηχέσθαι (Acts xxi. 21, 24) and ἦχος (Luke iv. 37) with περὶ τινος, there is no reason for construing i. 4 in any other way than: τὴν ἀσφάλειαν τῶν λόγων περὶ ὧν κατηχήθης, nor for understanding the verb otherwise than to mean a report, rumour, which one has heard; cf. Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xxx. The word in itself does not mean formal instruction, but the hearing or telling of something which the hearer has not previously known (cf. Jos. Vita, 65). Thus in Acts xviii. 25 the word does not, as in Gal. vi. 6; 1 Cor. xiv. 19 (cf. Rom. ii. 18), mean catechetical instruction, since, at that time, Apollos had not received the baptism of the Church, nor had he as yet come into any contact with the organised Church, but indicates only the fact that he had become acquainted with Christianity in a general way. On the other hand, his introduction by Aquila into the knowledge of Christianity as held by the Church, is called an ἀκριβέστερον ἐκτίθεσθαι, Acts xviii. 26. The relation which the communication of Luke to Theophilus bore to the latter's previous knowledge is the same. The latter use of the word to mean the instruction which had conversion in view, and was preparatory to baptism, which is found in 2 Clem. xvii. 1; Acta Thecla, xxxix., may have been suggested by passages like Luke i. 4; Acts xviii. 25. Eus. Ecclogæ Proph. (ed. Gaisford, p. 3) construes Luke i. 4 in this sense, which is as yet foreign to the N.T.

5. (P. 44.) Lagarde (Psalterium Hieronymi, 1874, p. 165) felt the statement of Luke's reasons for writing in Luke i. 1 to be so awkward that he made this the main reason for his hypothesis, that Luke is here imitating the preface of the physician Dioscorides (circa, 40 to 70 A.D.) to his work περὶ ὧν ἰατρικῆς, in which he attempts to show that, notwithstanding the numerous writers, ancient and modern, on the same subject, his own work is not superfluous, because the work of the former was not complete, while the latter drew largely from mere hearsay, not from their own experience (ed. Sprengel, i. 1 f.). It is, of course, possible that Luke had read this work by a contemporary and a member of the same profession. But the resemblance between the two dedications is slight. Words like αἰσφύα, ἀκριβής, and their derivatives are not so distinctive in character as to prove familiarity on Luke's part with Dioscorides in particular. It is, however, true that, throughout his entire work, Luke's language does show the most striking resemblance to that of the medical writers from Hippocrates to Galen, as has been conclusively shown by Holart (see n. 28 and § 62, n. 5). This is noticeably true in the prologue. Hippocrates and Galen use, like Luke, the thoroughly medical word ἐπιχαράιν (found in the N.T. only in Luke i. 1; Acts ix. 29, xix. 13) with γράφειν, and Galen construes it with ἀνέλεον exactly as in Acts ix. 29 (Holart, 87, 210). This verb occurs 21 times in Luke, and elsewhere in the N.T. only thrice (not including the use of the derivative ἀναίρεσις in Acts viii. 1). Hobart (87-90, 229, 250 f.) cites from Galen not less than 11 instances of αὐτόπτης γενόμενος, γίνεσθαι, γενέσθαι, 2 instances of ἀκριβῶς παρακολουθεῖν, and numerous instances of διήγησις, both from medical essays and historical works. One of Galen's dedications (ed. Kühn, xiv. 210, τοῦτόν σοι τὸν περὶ τῆς θηριακῆς λόγον ἀκριβῶς ἐξετάσας ἅπαντα, ἄριστε Πίσων, στουδαίως ἐποίησα), Hobart (251) compares to the prologue of Luke (cf. also Acts i. 1). For the structure of the sentence, cf. Jos. Bell. i. proœm. 1, ἐπειδὴ . . . ἀναγράφουσιν . . . προυθέμην ἐγὼ . . . ἀφηγγήσασθαι; § 6 ἐπειδὴ περ καὶ Ἰουδαίων πολλοὶ κτλ., but especially Acts xv. 24 f. ἐπειδὴ ἠκούσαμεν . . . ἔδοξεν ἡμῖν. Christians of a later period very often imitated the Prologue of Luke; e.g. Athanasius in his 39th Easter Epistle (see Epist. fest. 39 in the writer's edition, Grundriss, S. 87. 9 ff.), to a certain extent also Palladius, Hist. Lausiaca (Texts and Studies), ed. Butler, p. 9. 1, 10; Epiphan. Mon., ed. Dressel, p. 45, in the life of Andrea.

6. (Pp. 44, 45.) Origen, in Hom. i. in Luc. (Delarue, iii. 933, cf. the Greek text GK, ii. 627), followed by Eus. H. E. iii. 24. 15 and Athan. Epist. fest. 39, in misinterpreting ἐπεχείρησαν, understands πεπληροφορημένων as a stronger form of πεπιστευμένων, but neither of them explains adequately the transference of the word from its association with the person of Luke (πεπληροφορήτο καὶ οὐδὲν ἐδίσταξε) to the things of which he was convinced. This, moreover, cannot be explained. With πιστεύεσθαι, παραδίδοσθαι, ἐπιτρέπεσθαι, and similar words only the reverse transfer of the passive construction occurs, namely, from the thing which is entrusted, delivered, committed, to the person to whom something is entrusted, committed, or permitted, who is charged with something, etc. (e.g. Rom. vi. 17; vol. i. 374, n. 8). Even more impossible is the interpretation first advocated by Lessing (ed. Maltzahn, xi. 2. 135), which he endeavoured to support by the assumption of a Hebraism. According to this view, Luke would have called the facts of the gospel history "Things which have been fulfilled," because in them O.T. prophecies were fulfilled, instead of saying that the prophecies had been fulfilled by these facts. With reference to this interpretation it may be remarked: (1) Luke does not use Hebraisms in the prologue. (2) When speaking of the fulfilment of prophecy he uses regularly the usual πληροῦν (i. 20, iv. 21, xxiv. 44; Acts i. 16, iii. 18, xiii. 27), occasionally τελεῖν (xviii. 31, xxii. 37; Acts xiii. 29), once πλησθῆναι (Luke xxi. 22). (3) The thought that the O.T. prophecy is fulfilled in the gospel history is not at all fundamental in Luke. (4) Leaving out of account the illogical substitution of the facts fulfilling the prophecies for the prophecies being fulfilled, it would be difficult for any reader to understand the expression standing at the beginning of the book, where as yet no mention has been made of prophetic prediction, while to a Gentile like Theophilus it would be entirely unintelligible. If it is impossible to construe the verb πληροφορεῖν with a personal object (or πληροφορεῖσθαι with a personal subject, Rom. iv. 21, xiv. 5; Col. iv. 12; Eccles. viii. 11; Berl. ägypt. Urk. No. 665, whence the word πληροφορία), the only other construction possible is πληροφορεῖν with an impersonal object, the same as in 2 Tim. iv. 5 (= Acts xii. 25, xiv. 26); 2 Tim. iv. 17 (= Col. i. 25; Rom. xv. 19); also Herm. Mand. ix. 2. It is to be taken as a rhetorical synonym for πληροῦν (Luke vii. 1, "after he had finished speaking"; Acts xiii. 25, xix. 21; 2 Cor. x. 6; Rev. iii. 2). Luke is fond of such formations, e.g. τελεσφορεῖν, Luke viii. 14; τροποφορεῖν, Acts xiii. 13; εὐφορεῖν, Luke xii. 16 (used only by Luke); καρποφορεῖν, Luke viii. 15. Used in this connection, πληροφορεῖν, like πληροῦν, always means "to carry through to the end," "to bring to an end," not as Wuttig affirms (Das joh. Ev. und seine Abfassungszeit, 1897, S. 60), "to make complete" in the sense of "to supplement." Wuttig introduces a manifest change in the sense when he substitutes (S. 61) the meaning "to complete by the addition of a supplement"; for, while the object of πληροῦν or πληροφορεῖν may be the things incomplete without this act or transaction (service, vocation, life, discourse, preaching of the gospel, and the like), it can never be these things, words, acts, etc., which are added to those already existent in order to make them complete. Wuttig's desire in this way to derive the idea that the traditions which Luke and the πολλοί worked over into literary form were "added as a supplement to complete" the facts which had already been earlier reduced to literary form in the Fourth Gospel, is impossible of fulfilment; for it could never be said of past events which are here spoken of as the object of literary work on the part of many, and indirectly of Luke, that they were added as a supplement to the already existing Gospel of the eye-witnesses or of one eye-witness; but only of the oral accounts concerning these events by the eye-witnesses and the written records made by their disciples. But Luke says nothing about an existing written Gospel of the eye-witnesses, nor of its completion by oral accounts of the same witnesses and by the writings of the πολλοί.

7. (P. 46.) The adverbial ἀπ' ἀρχῆς must be taken with the γενόμενοι which concludes the characterisation of the original witnesses. It is likewise impossible to construe the phrase with αὐτόπται alone and not also with ὑπὲρταί.

8. (P. 48.) There is nothing in the words παραδιδόται and παράδοσις themselves which determines whether the communication is in oral or written form. It is the function of history to transmit facts to posterity (cf. Polyb. ii. 35. 5, εἰς μνήμην ἄγειν καὶ παράδοσιν τοῖς ἐπιγινόμενοις). Concerning the historian Jos. remarks (c. Apion, i. 10), δεῖ τὸν ἄλλους παράδοσιν πράξεων ἀληθινῶν ὑπισχνούμενον αὐτὸν ἐπίστασθαι τὰ ταῦτα πρότερον ἀκριβῶς, ἢ παρηκολοθηκότα τοῖς γεγονόσιν ἢ παρὰ τῶν εἰδόντων πυνθανόμενον; cf. Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 2; Dioskor. Mat. Med. in the prefaces to books ii. iii. iv.; in Book v. he uses instead ἀποδιδόται. Hence παραδιδόται (Acts vi. 14) as well as διδόται (John i. 17, vii. 19) can be used of the giving of the law by Moses, who is regarded as the author of the written Law (Luke xx. 28; John v. 45-47; Rom. x. 5). To what has been said above (p. 48) in the light of the context of the prologue the following remarks may be added: (1) In Jewish usage there is a contrast between the written law and παραδιδόται, παράδοσις, teachings and regulations transmitted orally (Matt. xv. 2, 3, 6; Mark vii. 3-13; Gal. i. 14; Col. ii. 8, 22). Such tradition is "heard" (Matt. v. 21; John xii. 34). (2) Moreover, where the word is used of apostolic teaching and advice, this is always oral (1 Cor. xi. 2, 23, xv. 3; Rom. vi. 17; 2 Thess. iii. 6; vol. ii. 372 f., 381), where it is not expressly added that this is given in written form (2 Thess. ii. 15). (3) Quite apart from the dogmatic contrast between Holy Scripture and the less thoroughly authenticated tradition, the idea suggested by παραδιδόναι is always so entirely that of an oral communication, that Clement, e.g. in Eclog. Proph. 27, could write: οὐκ ἔγραφον δὲ οἱ πρεσβύτεροι μήτε ἀπασχολεῖν βουλόμενοι τὴν διδασκαλικὴν τῆς παραδόσεως φροντίδα τῇ περὶ τὸ γράφειν ἄλλῃ φροντίδι; μήδὲ μὴν κτλ.

9. (P. 50.) The mistaken interpretation of παρακολουθηζοῦσι πᾶσιν by early writers (above, p. 6 f.), which made Luke a disciple in companionship with all the apostles, requires no refutation. Equally impossible is the interpretation which makes Luke an active witness of all the events which he is about to set forth, although this is linguistically possible, when πράγμασι is supplied with the correct addition (cf. Jos. c. Apion, i. 10, see n. 8; or what Philo, de Decal. xviii., says about the false witness, that he speaks ὡς παρακολουθηκὼς ἅπασιν). This would make Luke an eye-witness from the beginning, which he emphatically declares not to have been the case. Further, παρακολουθεῖν means to pursue and follow with the critical and apprehending intelligence (Epict. Diss. i. 5. 5, vi. 12, 18, ix. 4, xxvi. 13 and 14), also with the purpose of historical investigation and exposition (Polyb. i. 13. 7, iii. 32. 2). This is the only meaning which suits ἀκριβῶς. By μετὰ πάσης ἀκρίβειας τοῖς ἡμετέροις γράμμασι παρακολουθεῖν, Josephus, c. Apion, i. 23, means an intelligent study of the O.T. Scriptures. If, when Luke expressed his purpose with reference to Theophilus, his plan had included the investigations as well as the statement of the results, he would have written παρακολουθήσαντι or -σάντα; cf. Acts xv. 25.

10. (Pp. 53, 54, 58.) Of the Fathers, Augustine in particular (Cons. Evv. iv. 8. 9) claims that the prologue has reference to both of Luke's books. Among the arguments urged against this position the most incomprehensible is that Acts would not then begin with another address to Theophilus, which was necessary in order to co-ordinate the beginnings of the two books. This is practically the position of Overbeck, Introduction to the revision of de Wette's Komm. zur AG, p. xxi anm. (1) Acts i. 1 does not contain a second prologue, much less an independent prologue, but simply a reference to the first part of the author's work, which serves to connect the second book with the first. (2) It is indeed the rule at the beginning of the successive books of a large work to insert a short reference to the dedication of the first book, or a new prologue, without the prologue of the first book thereby ceasing to be the introduction to the entire work. Examples from the years between 60 and 200 are Dioscorides, Materia Medica, libri i.-v.; Jos. c. Apion, i. and ii.; Artemidorus, Interpretation of Dreams [Ονειροκριτικά], i.-iii., dedicated to a different person than are iv.-v.; Iren. i.-v. Very frequently an address is also found at the conclusion of separate books or of the entire work, Diosc. v. p. 828; Jos. c. Apion, ii. 41; Artemid. i. 82, iii. 66, iv. 84; Iren. i. 31. 3, iv. 14. 4; cf. also the present writer's "Studien zu Justin," ZfKG, viii. 45 f. (3) Luke does not say, Acts i. 1, that he has set forth the gospel history, ἐν ἐτέρῳ (βιβλίῳ, συγγράμματι, or perhaps λόγῳ) or ἐν ἐτέροις, but he calls the Gospel ὁ πρῶτος λόγος, to which Acts is added as ὁ δεύτερος λόγος. Cf. Birt, Das antike Buchwesen, S. 28: "A large work is composed of a number of λόγοι." Of course, it is possible that each one of a number of independent writings might be called a λόγος, but such independent writings could not be enumerated and called "the first book" and the "second book." Whether or not, when he wrote Luke i. 1-4, Luke knew that the working out of his plan would require a work of several parts, certainly when he wrote Acts i. 1 he was aware that his plan had been only partially carried out, and therefore at this point he added what followed as a second part of a larger work. He betrays this same consciousness where he gives as the subject of the first book, περὶ πάντων ὧν ἤρξατο ὁ Ἰησοῦς ποιεῖν τε καὶ διδάσκειν. This a fourth proof (4) of the scope of the prologue. On the basis simply of single passages, like Acts ix. 4, or in view of the tendency to consider all gospel preaching as the gospel of Christ and the word of the Lord (vol. ii. 377), it would be wrong to interpret this phrase to mean that Jesus was the actual subject of all that the Apostles did and suffered and taught. On the other hand, the use of ἤρξατο in Acts is not to be considered entirely purposeless, especially in this passage where Luke is speaking with his further writing in mind. All that Jesus did and said, as set forth in the Gospel, is only the beginning of a wider activity (cf. Heb. ii. 3). This ἤρξατο stands in contrast to the πεπληροφορημένα πράγματα of Luke i. 1, which is intended to cover the subject of all Luke's literary work. In this way the proofs derived from Acts i. 1 connect themselves naturally with those derived from the preface to the Gospel (above, p. 53 f.).

11. (P. 55.) Xenophon in the Anabasis, like Caesar in the Gullic War and Matthew in his Gospel, always speaks of himself in the third person (Anab. i. 8. 15, ii. 5. 40, iii. 1. 4, 10, 47. The only paragraph in which a "we" occurs, vii. 8. 25, is regarded as spurious). In the Memorabilia, on the other hand, the author's "I" occurs from the beginning (i. 1. 1, 3. 1, 4. 2). But in the account of a dialogue in which he took part, 1. 3, 8-13, he uses Ξενοφῶν. Thucydides uses his name from the outset, employing the personal pronoun; so always in speaking of himself in the capacity of a narrator and of the source of his knowledge of the events which he records (i. 20. 1, 22. 1, ii. 48. 3, v. 26. 4). But when referring to himself as a general, he uses consistently the third person, only indicating the identity of the general with the author of the book at the first introduction of the name (iv. 104. 4). Polybius is familiar with the two forms, but does not maintain the distinction strictly. Besides "I" he frequently uses an equivalent "we" (i. 1. 1, 3 f., ii. 40. 5, iii. 5. 8, 48. 12); sometimes he uses "I" when speaking of himself as one of the actors (xxxix. 6); also remarks about his intentional change of "Polybius" to "I" or "we" (xxxvii. 1 f.). In the preface of the Jewish War, § 1, Josephus says, "I, Josephus, the son of Matthias, a priest of Jerusalem." And universally, in speaking of himself as an author, he uses "I" or "we" (Bell. v. 4. 1, 5. 4, 5. 7, vii. 11. 5; Ant. i. proem.; x. 11. 7, xii. 5. 2, xvi. 7. 1). But in the same work, when speaking of himself as an actor in the history, he introduces himself impersonally as "Josephus," first in ii. 20. 4, and regularly from that point onward. It is only in the autobiography that he employs "I" throughout without adding the name. On the other hand, Porphyrius in the Vita Plotini writes, cc. iv.-vi., ἐγὼ Πορφύριος, ἐμοῦ Πορφυρίου, προσ-ῆλθον ὁ Π. For the imitations of Luke's "we" see n. 17.

12. (P. 55.) In Acts xvi. 17, according to recension β also in xvi. 10, "we" is found where Paul is expressly excepted: therefore the "we" includes Silas, who has been with Paul since xv. 40, and Timothy, introduced into the narrative in xvi. 13. That the unnamed person designated by "I" and included in the "we" cannot be identified with Silas or Timothy, who are mentioned by name, is self-evident. That it was not Silas is clear from the following combinations: "Paul and us" (xvi. 17), "Paul" (xvi. 18), "Paul and Silas" (xvi. 19). In both recensions (above, p. 31, n. 9) Timothy is excluded by xx. 4-6. He is one of those who on the journey to Troas preceded Paul and those associated with him who are included in the "we."

13. (P. 56.) Concerning the text of Acts xx. 3 ff., see above, p. 31, n. 9, and vol. i. 209 f. According to this passage, the companions of Paul's journey mentioned, with the exception of Sopater who accompanied him from Corinth, and the writer of the narrative who found him at Philippi, went on ahead from Macedonia to Troas before the Passover. But too much is not to be inferred from the absence of the "we." In narratives where Paul alone, or Paul and Silas, are represented as actors or sufferers (xvi. 18-40), the "we" is omitted without the absence of the narrator or of Timothy being thereby implied. According to xxi. 18, the narrator was in the party that met James; but in what follows there is no occasion to use the "we" again. The same is true of xx. 16-38, where the account concerns only Paul's decision and a transaction between himself and the Ephesian elders. "We" might have been used in xx. 36 (ἡμῶν instead of αὐτοῖς), although it is possible, but not definitely proved by the recurrence of the "we" in xxi. 1, that part of Paul's company—among them the narrator—remained on shipboard while Paul and his other companions went on shore. Since the elders accompanied Paul to the ship (in a boat), and certainly went on board (xx. 38), those of the company who remained on the ship could have participated in the leave-taking of the elders (xxi. 1). Irenæus' statement in iii. 14. 1 (GK, ii. 54, A. 2), according to which Luke accompanied the apostle from Antioch, apparently immediately after the separation between Paul and Barnabas, is not absolutely precluded by the absence of "we" in the very sketchy narrative of xv. 40-xvi. 8. But Luke may have followed Paul from Antioch to Troas as Agathopus did Ignatius (Ign. Philadel. xi.; Smyrn. x.; cf. the present writer's work on Ignatius, 263 f.).

14. (P. 58.) Quite independently of the question concerning the correctness of the text in Luke xxiv. 51, and of the harmonistic difficulties suggested by a comparison of Luke xxiv. 44-53 and Acts i. 1-14, it is shown by Acts i. 2 that the author is conscious of having already given an account of the ἀνάληψις in Luke xxiv. 51.

15. (P. 59.) Concerning the title πράξεις τῶν ἀποστόλων see above, p. 3, n. 1. Even in the Coptic and Syriac versions the Greek word is adopted into the text, although in the latter version a Syriac equivalent is also used (GK, i. 377 f.; for other variants, ii. 52, A. 2). The use of πράξεις in a legal sense as a translation of Actio = "suit, proceedings of a court, synod," etc., is out of the question, also the use of actum, acta, which when used by the Greeks is left untranslated (Just. Apol. i. 35, 48; Acta Thecle, xxxviii.). It can mean only historical facts as in Polybius (cf. Raphelii Annot. in N.T., ed. Hemsterhuis, 1747, ii. 2). The present writer is not familiar with any other ancient historical work in the title of which the word is used. The titles of the apocryphal πράξεις Παύλου, Πέτρου κτλ. are imitations of the canonical Acts (see n. 17). On the other hand, one is easily reminded of the late Hebrew מעשׂה (Mishnah, Meg. iv. 8; Chag. ii. 1; also in the title of the Aramaic Book of Tobit, ed. Neubauer, 1878, pp. 3, 17). Dependence upon this usage would argue for the very early date of the title of Acts.

16. (P. 61.) Josephus writes at the beginning of the second and last book contra Apion, διὰ μὲν οὖν τοῦ προτέρου βιβλίου κτλ. Philo says in Quod omn. probus, liber i., speaking of a companion work now lost, ὁ μὲν πρότερος λόγος ἦν ἡμῖν, ὃ Θεόδοτε, περὶ τοῦ κτλ. Also Vita Mos. ii. 1, which is correct, since as yet a third book was not in view. This is supplementary (iii. 1, τρίτον δὲ προσασποδέον). The genuine Euthalius (Zacagni, 410) writes in the same way of Luke: δύο βιβλούς συνεγράψατο, μίαν μὲν καὶ προτέραν τὴν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, δευτέραν δὲ τάντην κτλ. So Origen regularly in quotations from 1 Cor., 1 Tim., etc., in Matt. tom. xiv. 22, xv. 27, xvii. 29. The careless use of πρώτος for πρότερος is not once to be found in Luke's writings, where he could have been dependent on his sources. Acts xii. 10 "a first watch and a second watch" is not a case in point, nor is the adverbial πρώτον in Luke xiv. 28, 31. Bunsen's Anal. Antenic. i. 130 f., calls attention to the use of πρώτον, Acts i. 1, as distinguished from πρότερον.

17. (P. 61.) The not ungifted author of the Acts of John and the Acts of Peter, whom we now know to have been a member of one branch of the Valentinian School, introduces himself in the former work by a "we," as Luke does in Acts, making himself a witness of the history of John which he fabricates. He also uses occasionally an "I," and once at least the name Leucius Charinus; cf. the present writer's Acta Jo. lxxviii., lxx., xcvii.; GK, ii. 860. In his Acts of Peter the same author clearly imitates and borrows from Acts (GK, ii. 854 f.). It is not likely that the author meant to identify himself with the Lucius in Acts xiii. 1, still less with Luke. Equally improbable is the conjecture of James (Apocr. Anecd. ii. p. xi), that the author of the Muratorian fragment regarded the stories of Leucius as a work of Luke, implying by the use of semote, line 37, that this work was a non-canonical, unpublished writing by the author of the canonical Acts. The Catholic author of the Acts of Paul, and, as we now know, of the Acts of Thecla, which are a part of it, has followed Acts even more closely than has Leucius. The much later biographer of the Apostle John, Prochorus, took his name from Acts vi. 5, and derived much of his material from this source (Acta Jo. liv.).

18. (P. 64.) In Luke iv. 44 the reading τῆς Ἰουδαίας is very strongly attested both as to age and currency by SBCLQ (fifth century) R (sixth century), Ss S³, copt. and a large number of cursives, so that it is not to be compared with the τῆς Ἰουδαίας in i. 26, for which there is only one witness (S³). Furthermore, the entire context after iv. 14 suggests no objection to Γαλιλαίας, whereas Ἰουδαίας would necessarily have raised questions. Moreover, the variants τῶν Ἰουδαίων (cf. vii. 3), τοῖς Ἰουδαίαις (the Jewish population of Galilee in contrast to numerous persons in this country who were not Jews) and αὐτῶν (according to iv. 15), which have only a single MS. in their support, prove that there stood here originally a reading which created difficulty, namely, τῆς Ἰουδαίας. Unfortunately Marcion's text has not come down to us (GK, ii. 478). But, according to a statement of an anonymous Syrian writer, Marcion made his Christ appear first between Jerusalem and Jericho (Mus. Brit. Add. 17215, fol. 30; cf. Academy, 1893, October 21); and although it has not yet been possible to bring this statement into agreement with that of Tertullian (ThLb, 1896, col. 19), it argues in favour of the assumption that Marcion, who constructed the beginning of his Gospel in the most arbitrary fashion out of Luke iii. 1, iv. 31-35 (or 39?), iv. 16-43 (or 44?), found Ἰουδαίας in this passage. If Luke wrote the word, he certainly did not employ it in the narrower sense, implying complete exclusion of Galilee (v. 17, xxiv. 8), but in the broader sense according to which it includes Galilee, as in i. 5, vi. 17, xxiii. 5; Acts x. 37 (cf. vol. i. 186). This is in keeping with the context; for after the mention of Galilee in general (iv. 14) and of Nazareth (iv. 16-30), and of the "Galilean city, Capernaum" (iv. 31-42), in particular, ταῖς ἐτέραις πόλεσιν (iv. 43), without any modifying words, means all the other cities in Jesus' sphere of labour, exclusive of those already mentioned. Among these not the least important was Jerusalem (ii. 38, xiii. 33 f.), but all the other Jewish cities of the Holy Land are included (cf. Matt. x. 23). It is, therefore, possible that in v. 12 a city in South Palestine is meant, as Tatian assumed,—possibly influenced by the original text of Luke iv. 44 (Forsch. i. 251 f.; GK, ii. 545), just as in x. 38 a village near Jerusalem is meant, although it is not expressly said that this is the location.

19. (P. 66.) In ix. 18-x. 42 we seem to have a series of events closely connected in time and place. The temporal connection is directly indicated in ix. 28, 37, x. 1, 21, also to some extent in x. 17, and possible in x. 25 by καὶ ἰδοὺ. The way is prepared for the journey to Jerusalem, ix. 51, by ix. 22, 31. Evidently in ix. 57 the same πορεύεσθαι is referred to as in ix. 56. This seems also to be the case in x. 1, 38. If it could be assumed that Luke knew Caesarea Philippi to be the scene of what is narrated in ix. 18-27 (Mark viii. 27-38), and that he knew the location of the village referred to in x. 38 (John xi. 1, 18), and its name, Bethany, we would have here a journey from the extreme northern part of Palestine to Jerusalem, and it would be natural to assume that the material of the parable in x. 30 ff. was suggested by Jesus' journey through Jericho to Bethany and Jerusalem. But Luke does not make such combinations. He mentions neither Caesarea nor Bethany; he would not have mentioned the fact that the city in ix. 52 was Samaritan if it were not necessary for understanding what took place. This is true also of the statement that Jerusalem was the goal of His journey, as is shown by a comparison of ix. 51 with ix. 53. There must have been an interval of a considerable number of days between x. 1-16 and x. 17, and nothing is said of Jesus' progress. The ἀνέστη, x. 25, seems to presuppose that Jesus was surrounded by a crowd of seated listeners (Mark iii. 34), although immediately before Jesus is represented as being alone with His disciples (Luke x. 23). Throughout the book there is no external connection between events. On the other hand, the logical connection is very clear—particularly between ix. 49 f. and ix. 51-56. Everything from ix. 22 onward is designed to show how the disciples—even those of them who were most trusted—needed to be brought, contrary to their natural inclinations, to the state of mind necessary for experiencing the sufferings and death of their Master. The conclusion of this train of thought is reached at x. 24, and at this point we have the beginning of a new series of events which likewise are related logically, not locally or in respect of time. If in x. 38 we are in the vicinity of Jerusalem, the supposed account of the journey to Jerusalem can go no farther. In xiii. 1, Jesus is certainly not in Jerusalem, and it is not until xiii. 22-35 that we find Him on His way hither, and then He seems to be at a considerable distance away, in the domain of Herod Antipas (xiii. 31-33), i.e. either in Galilee or Perea. An examination of xiii. 33-35 shows that Jerusalem is mentioned in xiii. 22, not in order to begin or to continue the account of a journey, but in order to make intelligible a word of Jesus' spoken at this particular time (xiii. 31). In xiv. 1-xvii. 10 the references to time and place are vague, as is also the reference to a journey in xiv. 25. Again, in xvii. 11 the place is mentioned only in order to make clear the passage xvii. 12-19. It is not until xviii. 31, 35, xix. 1, 11, 28, 41, 45 that we have a continuous development of the course of events. Nevertheless, it is possible that we have here scattered statements concerning a journey to Jerusalem, or, as we may say in view of ix. 51, the last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem. Since quarters were refused Jesus in a Samaritan city (ix. 52), we may infer that the village in ix. 56 was Jewish, and assume that Jesus gave up his intention to go to Jerusalem through Samaria, taking instead the route through Perea (Mark x. 1; Matt. xix. 1; vol. ii. 589, n. 4). With this xvii. 11 may be connected. That the reference in this passage is not to a journey through the midst of Samaria and Galilee is self-evident, because, in this case, it would necessarily be a journey from Judea to the northern boundary of Galilee, because of the order in which the countries are mentioned, and because the readings διὰ μέσης or διὰ τῆς, by which this meaning is expressed, are practically unsupported. Probably the most original reading is μέσον, without a preposition (D, cf. viii. 7, x. 3). This was replaced by ἀναμέσον (Ferrar group), which was not a bad conjecture, by διὰ μέσον (AX, etc.), which, on the other hand, was worse, and by διὰ μέσον (SBL), which is very bad. Jesus travelled along the border between Samaria and Galilee naturally from west to east with the intention in the neighbourhood of Scythopolis of crossing the Jordan into Perea, and thence to journey to Jerusalem. So it happened that in one of the border villages nine Jewish and one Samaritan leper met Jesus. Here could have followed what is recorded in xiii. 22-35, if these events occurred in Perea (see above), although Luke records them at an earlier point in the narrative. In xviii. 31, 35, xix. 11, 28, 41, 45 we follow Jesus through Jericho to the Temple in Jerusalem without again being carried back in time or place.

20. (P. 68.) Of the proper names that are found in Matt. or Mark only Archelaus (Matt. ii. 22), Bartimeus (Mark x. 46), and the names of Jesus' brothers are lacking in Luke. On the other hand, omitting the genealogy and O.T. names, the following are peculiar to Luke: Zacharias and Elisabeth, with very explicit statements about them, i. 5, cf. 36; Augustus and Quirinius, ii. 1, 2; Simeon and Anna, with explicit statements regarding them, ii. 25, 36; Tiberius and Lysanias, iii. 1; Annas, iii. 2, Acts iv. 6 (also John xviii. 13); Simon the Pharisee, vii. 40; Joanna and Chuza, viii. 3, cf. xxiv. 10; Susanna, viii. 3; Mary and Martha, x. 39 (also John xi.); Zacchaeus, xix. 1; Cleopas, xxiv. 18. A proper name is found even in one of the parables (xvi. 20). It will also be observed that in Acts a number of persons are mentioned who play only a subordinate rôle in the narrative, or none at all, and who, if we may judge from analogy, would not have been mentioned in Matt. or Mark; e.g. in iv. 6, v. 1, vi. 5 (altogether seven persons, only two of whom are mentioned again); ix. 10, 11, 23, 36, x. 1, 32 (Peter's host);

xi. 28, cf. xxi. 10, xii. 12, 13 (the maid); xii. 20, xiii. 1 (three obscure persons with very explicit statements about them, still more in text β , see above, p. 28 f., n. 6); xiii. 6-8, xvii. 6, xviii. 7, 8, 17, xix. 9, 14, 22, 24, 29, 33, xx. 4, 9, xxi. 16, xxiv. 1, 24, xxvii. 1, xxviii. 7.

21. (P. 69.) In some of the passages of Luke's narrative, where he calls Jesus \acute{o} $\kappa\upsilon\pi\iota\omicron\varsigma$, the text is uncertain as regards this particular point. The present writer regards the following passages as genuine: vii. 13 (not vii. 31); x. 1, xi. 39, xii. 42, xiii. 15, xvii. 5, 6, xviii. 6, xix. 8, xxii. 31, 61 (twice); (xxiv. 3²); altogether twelve or thirteen times. In John it is found only four times (iv. 1, vi. 23, xi. 2, xx. 20). But in the only passage really comparable with it (John iv. 1), possibly \acute{o} $\text{'I}\eta\sigma\omega\upsilon\varsigma$ is the correct reading. In xx. 20 the author speaks from the point of view of the disciples. In vi. 23, xi. 2 we have the evangelist's own words, which have no connection with the narrative. This usage is not found in Matt. or Mark. On Mark xvi. 19 see vol. ii. 476. With reference to the reticence of Luke in the account of the Last Supper, cf. the present writer's essay: Brod und Wein im Abendmahl, 1892, S. 14 f.

22. (P. 70.) The Israelitish tone is strongly marked in chs. i.-ii. (i. 6, 32 f., 54 f., 68-79, ii. 4, 11, 21-24, 25, 31 f., 34, 37 f., 41 f.). The man Jesus, however, is represented as loving His people (xiii. 16, xix. 9), and as, therefore, very deeply pained both by their sins and misfortune (x. 31 ff., xiii. 34, xvii. 18, xix. 41-44, xxiii. 28-31). He acknowledges not only the prophetic and doctrinal significance of the O.T. (iv. 4-12, 17-21, x. 25-28, xiii. 28, xvi. 16, 29-31, xviii. 19 f., xx. 37, 41-44, xxii. 37, xxiv. 27, 44-46), but also the inviolability of the law (xvi. 17). He Himself was submissive to the law to which as a child He was made subject (ii. 21-24), and remained loyal to the religious customs (iv. 16, 31, xxii. 7-16) under which He was brought up (ii. 41 f.). He made no objection even to the painfully literal fulfilment of the law by the Pharisees, so long as they kept also the fundamental moral law (xi. 42, cf. v. 34 ff.). In relation to the Sabbath He takes the same liberal-conservative attitude as in the other Gospels (vi. 1-11, xiii. 10-17, xiv. 1-6); see vol. ii. 585 ff. His disciples also live according to the law (xxiii. 56). His Church retains its connection with the Temple, and is full of zeal for the law (xxiv. 53; Acts ii. 46, v. 12, 42, xxi. 20). The significance of Israel is not destroyed by the rejection of the Messiah and of the apostolic preaching. The times of the Gentiles shall pass away (Luke xxi. 24). The nation which it was Jesus' first mission to redeem (i. 54, 68-79, ii. 34, 38, xxiv. 21; Acts ii. 39, iii. 25) shall finally acknowledge and enthrone Him (xiii. 35, xxii. 30; Acts iii. 20 f.). No man can know, nor is any man privileged to know, the time (Acts i. 6 f.). But the fact is certain.

23. (P. 72.) Cf. E. Curtius, SBAW, 1893, S. 928 f., on Phil. iv. 8, and similar statements of Paul. Cf. also what Herder says (Vom Erlöser der Menschen, 1796, S. 218): "He (Luke) might be called the evangelist of Philanthropy, if this word had not been desecrated. Such a Gospel is in keeping with the character of a man who had made numerous journeys among the Greeks and Romans with Paul, and who dedicated his writings to a Theophilus."

24. (P. 74.) With regard to the alleged Ebionitic doctrine of the meritorious, or God-pleasing character of voluntary poverty, see vol. i. 147 f.

There is no reason why anyone should have been misled, as has repeatedly been the case, by Origen's scholastic play on words (Princ. iv. 22 ; c. Cels. ii. 1 ; cf. Eus. H. E. iii. 27. 6) into the very remarkable opinion that the Ebionites were so called because of the poverty of their thought, or that they called themselves by this name because of their extreme poverty (Epiph. Hær. xxx. 17).

25. (P. 77.) No other Gospel emphasises so strongly the joy, the pleasure, the enthusiastic admiration occasioned by Jesus : ii. 10, 20, 47, 52, iv. 22, v. 26, vii. 16, 35, ix. 43, xi. 27, xiii. 17, xvii. 15, xviii. 43, xix. 37 ff., 48, xxi. 38, xxiii. 8, xxiv. 52, cf. i. 14, 46 ff., 68, ii. 29 ff., x. 17 ff., xv. 7, 10, 23, 32. Only a few of these passages have parallels in the other Gospels.

26. (P. 77.) Instead of ζηλωτής, Luke vi. 15, Acts i. 13, Matt. x. 4, and Mark iii. 18, we find the Hebrew term. Josephus speaks of them as a party in the account which he gives of their origin, but mentions no name (Bell. ii. 8. 1 ; Ant. xviii. 1. 1 and 6) ; elsewhere he calls them ζηλωταί (Bell. iv. 5. 1, 6. 1). For the ἡ ἀπογραφὴ and ἀπογράφεσθαι of Luke, Jos. uses various terms : ἀποτιμᾶν, ἀποτιμᾶσθαι, ἀποδίδοσθαι, αἱ ἀποτιμήσεις, also αἱ ἀπογραφαί, Ant. xvii. 13. 5, xviii. 1. 1, 2. 1, Bell. vii. 8. 1, but never ἡ ἀπογραφὴ.

27. (P. 78.) The number 70 or (according to BD, Tatian, ancient Syriac and Latin versions, see Forsch. i. 148) 72 disciples in x. 1 has no more connection with the 70 Gentile nations and their languages and angels, as the Jews recorded them (Schürer, ii. 343, iii. 198 [Eng. trans. ii. i. 344, iii. 64]), than it does with the 70 members of the Sanhedrin or the 70 translators of the O.T. or any other number 70. The 70 were not sent to the Gentiles, and there is nothing to indicate that Luke meant it to be taken in this symbolical sense. Luke and Theophilus were not Jews, and could not have expressed or understood such a thought simply by the use of the number 70. On the other hand, the contrast between the 70 and the 12 (Luke ix. 1) is clearly expressed, and, as shown above (p. 78), the way was prepared by ix. 49 f., 60 (cf. also viii. 39), for the transfer of the preaching office to those who were not apostles. According to an ancient tradition, accepted as true by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 25), and probably derived from the Gospel of Philip, it was Philip who was addressed in Luke ix. 60 ; and since the person here spoken to must be one who was not an apostle, the evangelist Philip must be meant (cf. Forsch. vi. 26, 158 f.).

28. (P. 79.) Concerning the linguistic unity of Luke's work, cf. ZELLER, S. 415-425, 442-446, 498 ff. ; LEKEBUSCH, Komposition und Entstehung der AG, 1854, S. 37-81 ; KLOSTERMANN, Vind. Lucanæ seu de itinerariis in libro actorum asservati auctore, 1866, pp. 46-63 ; HOBART, The Medical Language of St. Luke, a proof from internal evidence that the Gospel according to St. Luke and the Act. of the Apostles were written by the same person, and that the writer was a medical man, Dublin, 1882 ; VOGEL, Zur Charakteristik des Lucæ nach Sprache und Stil, eine philologische Laienstudie, 2te Aufl. 1899. For details see above, pp. 28 f., nn. 6, 7 ; 37 f., n. 18 ; 82 f., nn. 4-6 ; below, § 61, nn. 10-12, 26 ; § 62, n. 5.

29. (P. 79.) M. SCHNECKENBURGER (Über den Zweck der AG, 1841) made the first important investigation in the direction indicated by the title. He takes no account of the prologue, which he thinks belongs only to the Gospel, nor of the dedication to Theophilus, but argues from Acts xviii.-xxviii. that the purpose of the entire second book, which he thinks was written in Rome by Luke the disciple of Paul after the death of the apostle and before the fall of Jerusalem, is to give an apologetic portrayal of the apostolic labours of Paul in answer to all the accusations and misinterpretations of the Judaisers which come to light in the Pauline letters. The principal means by which this is accomplished is the constant contrast between Paul and Peter. He defends the consistency of this irenic tendency of Luke with his trustworthiness and familiarity with the facts against the criticism, which was even then being made by Schrader and Baur, that in many instances the history was deliberately falsified by Luke. Starting with the hypothesis of Schneckenburger, who had only half worked it out, but at the same time developing principles that he himself had already laid down, Baur (*Paulus*², i. 7-16; *Christentum und Kirche der 3 ersten Jahrh.*² S. 50, 125 ff., and in many other passages) showed that Acts was a partisan work, dating from about the middle of the second century. It is attributed with some hesitancy to Luke, the disciple of Paul, who, as a representative of the modified Paulinism of his time, recasts in this work the entire history of the Apostolic Church in the most arbitrary manner, in order to bring about an adjustment with Jewish Christianity, which it is alleged was still powerful at that time, and in order to effect a catholic union. This view was so thoroughly worked out by E. ZELLER (Die AG nach Inhalt und Ursprung krit. unters. 1854), who dated the work between 110 and 130 (S. 466-481), that Baur felt that this could be called simply "the critical view," in contrast to which any view which differed from it essentially was "uncritical." A similar point of view is represented by Overbeck (in the introduction of his revision of de Wette's Komm. zur AG, 1870). However, according to Overbeck, Luke's purpose was not conciliatory in the Tübingen sense, i.e. in the sense that it is designed primarily for Jewish Christians, but it is apologetic from the point of view of Gentile Christianity, which had become estranged from genuine Paulinism, and which was practically dominant in the Church in Trajan's time (98-117). Besides the emphasis laid upon a "national anti-Judaism," Overbeck calls special attention to a "secondary, political aim," namely, to show that Christianity is in harmony with the Roman government. From this it follows that Acts "could not well have been directed to any one save to Gentiles outside the Church" (p. xxxiii). More recently J. WEISS (Über die Absicht und den literarischen Charakter der AG, 1897), in opposition to one-sided efforts to determine the sources of Acts, and with full recognition of Overbeck's services, has made an investigation with the following result: "Acts is an apology for Christianity to the Gentiles against the charges of the Jews; it shows how Judaism was supplanted by Christianity in its world mission." In order to obtain what is correct in the views of Overbeck and Weiss, namely, the fact that Acts was designed for Gentile readers, it is not necessary to have recourse to highly questionable interpretations and forced inferences. It follows as a matter of course from the prologue and the dedication of the work to the Gentile, Theophilus (above, pp. 61-80). Of works in opposition to the "tendenz criticism" special mention may be made of those by E. LEKEBUSCH (Komposition und Entstehung der AG, 1854); A. KLOSTERMANN (Vindiciæ Lucanæ, 1866); C. SCHMIDT (Die AG unter dem Hauptgesichtspunkt ihrer Glaubwürdigkeit, i., 1882, unfinished). Still worth reading is HOFMANN'S unpretending essay, "Das Geschichtswerk des Lucas," Verwischte Aufs., 1878, S. 153-176).

§ 61. THE SOURCES USED BY LUKE.

From the language of the dedication we might infer that Luke derived all the material which he used, either from his own recollection of what he had experienced, or from the oral reports of older Christians, especially of the disciples of Jesus. But it is hardly probable that one who was conscious that his task was that of an investigator and an historian, as Luke shows himself to have been, would have confined himself to these sources, and have made no use whatever of the large body of literature dealing with his subject, of which he himself speaks. We should expect, further, that he would have used documents where it was possible for him to obtain them, and since it was part of his purpose to connect the history of Christianity with the history of the outside world, it would not be surprising if he consulted some of the accounts of contemporary history.

Taking up this last point, it has been thought possible to prove that Luke took numerous facts from the works of JOSEPHUS, also that he modelled his style after this writer (n. 1). The latter is a priori improbable. A Greek who could write such a periodic sentence as Luke i. 1-4 would not have copied a Jew, who, by his own confession, talked more or less of a jargon all his life and who was not able to publish his Greek writings without the help of men who were masters of this language (n. 2). Dependence of Luke upon Josephus is also improbable from chronological reasons. The work on the Jewish War appeared in its Greek form between the years 75 and 79 (Schurer, i. 79 [Eng. trans. i. i. 83]); the Antiquities, in 93 or 94; the Vita, either at the same time as an appendix to the Antiquities, or, according to others, not until after 100; and the books contra Apion, later than 94. Since the question here does not in any way concern the use of the Jewish War alone, but quite as much, and even more, the use of the later works of Josephus, Luke's writings, if dependent upon Josephus, would have to be dated at the very earliest in the year 100. Against this, however, is, first, the unanimous tradition which, up to the present time, has not been successfully controverted, that the author of the Gospel and Acts was Luke, the friend of Paul, and the eye-witness in the "we" passages of Acts. If he was a member of the Antiochian Church in the year 40, though he may have been not more than twenty years of age at the time, it is very improbable that he should have elaborated as late as the year 100 this great work, which certainly does not give the impression of being the effort of an aged man, using the recent writings of his younger contemporary, Josephus (born 37 A.D.). It is also unlikely that he would have entertained at this late date the purpose of further continuing the work (above, p. 56 ff.). In the second place, quite aside from the confirmation which the tradition regarding the author receives from Luke's writings themselves, strong proof is to be found in them that they could not well have been written later than 80 (§ 62). This makes the use even of the earliest writings of Josephus improbable, while employment of his later works is entirely out of the question; and, if striking resemblances should be found to exist between the two writings, it must have been Josephus who used Luke's work, which appeared some ten or twenty years before the publication of the Antiquities, and not the reverse.

Dependence of the Christian upon the Jewish historian would most naturally betray itself in statements regarding political conditions. But the very opposite is what we actually find. Both Luke (ii. 1-3; Acts v. 37) and Josephus know of a "taxing" carried out in Palestine at the beginning of our era, which was the first and, for a long time, the only one of its kind, and to which was due the bloody insurrection of Judas the Galilean (n. 3). But here the resemblance ends. Luke refers the taxing to a decree of Augustus, in which it was commanded that the whole world—naturally the world under the Roman dominion—should be taxed. In the Jewish War and the passages of the Antiquities where the matter is treated in detail, Josephus speaks only of an order which covered the territory of Archelaus, which did not include even the whole of Palestine (Ant. xviii. 1. 1, 2. 1; Bell. vii. 8. 1; cf. ii. 8. 1, 17. 8). In one passage only, where the matter is mentioned incidentally (Ant. xvii. 13. 5), it is made to cover Syria. This, however, is connected with an idea which first appears in the Antiquities. In the Jewish War, Quirinius nowhere appears as the governor of Syria, but is a high official, who, after the deposition of Archelaus, was sent thither with the extraordinary commission to organise the territory of Archelaus, which was now taken directly under Roman control. On the other hand, in the passages where Quirinius is mentioned in the Antiquities, the very inaccurate, or rather erroneous, assertion is twice made, that the territory of Archelaus was at this time added to the province of Syria (xvii. 13. 5, xviii. 1. 1). But neither in this passage nor anywhere else does Josephus call Quirinius the governor of Syria. The reader of the Jewish War would never guess that he had at any time occupied this position, nor could it be inferred from the unclear hints of the Antiquities. We have, therefore, a second statement of Luke's which is independent of Josephus, namely, that the taxing took place while Quirinius was governor of Syria. On this point the Antiochian, Luke, is better informed than Josephus, since, as a matter of fact, P. Sulpicius Quirinius, who was consul in the year 12 B.C., was governor of Syria from autumn of the year 4 (B.C.) to the year 1 (B.C.). According to an inscription, the genuineness of which was long questioned, but which was proved to be correct by a discovery of the year 1880, a certain Q. Æmilius Secundus, by order of the royal governor of Syria, Quirinius, had a census taken in the Syrian city, Apamea (n. 4).

A third point in which Luke proves himself to be independent of Josephus, and where he shows a knowledge of the facts which is certainly closer to the historical truth than Josephus', is the chronology. The latter writer, whose information for the four decades between the death of Herod (4 B.C.) and his own birth (37 A.D.) is extremely meagre (Schürer, i. 84 f. [Eng. trans. i. i. 88 f.]), dates both the taxing by Quirinius and the insurrection of Judas in the year after the deposition of Archelaus (6-7 A.D.). But it is inconceivable that Judas, who was a native of Gamala, in Gaulanitis, and who was called the "Galilean"—not because Galilee was his home, but because it was the scene of the insurrection which he led (Acts v. 37; Jos. Bell. ii. 8. 1, 17. 8, Ant. xviii. 1. 6)—should have raised the banner of revolt in a year when there was no political change of any kind in Galilee. That Josephus is in error is very clear from the fact that, in addition to this insurrection, he tells of still another revolt led by one Judas in Galilee, which took place in the year of Herod's death (4 B.C., Bell. ii. 4. 1; Ant. xvii. 10. 5), and which is really identical with the one already mentioned. His error is further shown by the fact that, without any explanation, he repeats again in the year 6-7 (A.D.) the short high-priesthood of Joazar, who sought to quiet this disturbance, and who held office in the year 4 B.C. (cf. on the one hand, Ant. xvii. 6. 4, 9. 1, 13. 1; Bell. ii. 1. 2; on the other, Ant. xviii. 1. 1, 2. 1). This tendency of Josephus to repeat events is quite surpassed by the modern historians, who, in order to save Josephus from inaccuracy, assume still a second Syrian governorship of Quirinius covering the year 6-7, in addition to the historically attested governorship of the year (circa 4-1 B.C.); although as a matter of fact Josephus does not anywhere say that Quirinius was ever governor of Syria. The insurrection of Judas, the rise of the party of the Zealots (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13, v. 37), the deposition of the high priest Joazar, who had been installed in office a few months before, and the taxing under the direction of Quirinius, took place in the first year after Herod's death (March 4-3 B.C.). Josephus, who places these events in the year 6-7 A.D., although he reproduces them in part in the year 4-3 B.C., has made a mistake of a decade, and, in other respects as well, displays a serious lack of critical judgment. Even if Luke was mistaken, it is certain that he does not copy his errors from Josephus, and his chronology is independent of the Jewish writer. The reader, who knows from Luke i. 36 that Jesus' birth took place a few months after that of the Baptist, cannot very well assume that the events recorded in Luke ii. 1-39 occurred later than the reign of Herod I., mentioned in i. 5 (n. 5), especially since no conflicting dates are mentioned in ii. 1, and it is not until iii. 1 that we find a new and thoroughly detailed chronological notice. This unavoidable impression is fully confirmed by Matt. ii. 1-22, from which we know that, according to the tradition of Palestinian Christians in 60-70, Jesus was born shortly before the death of Herod I. When, therefore, Luke makes the birth of Jesus contemporaneous with the taxing which took place during the Syrian governorship of Quirinius (ii. 2), it does not mean that, in unconscious contradiction to the Christian tradition, he places the birth of Jesus shortly after, instead of shortly before, the death of Herod, but that he dates the governorship of Quirinius, together with the taxing which took place under his direction and the insurrection of Judas, shortly before, instead of shortly after, Herod's death, thus making a mistake of at least several months—possibly of from one to two years. For it is certain, not only from Josephus, but also from coins, that the governor of Syria, during the last year of Herod's reign and after his death—from the autumn of 6 B.C. at the latest until the summer of 4 B.C.—was Varus, not Quirinius (Schürer, i. 322 f. [Eng. trans. i. i. 351]). In view of the result of the discussion of this one example, which at the same time gives us an insight into the characteristics of the two historians, detailed discussion of the other accounts of Luke and Josephus which have been compared may be omitted. There is not a single historical notice of Luke, whether correct, inaccurate, or questionable, which can be explained on the supposition that he had read Josephus. On the other hand, in many instances he shows an acquaintance with contemporary events and with more or less distinguished persons outside the Church which can be shown to be quite independent of Josephus. The slaughter of the Galileans in the temple as they were offering sacrifices (Luke xiii. 1); the estrangement between Pilate and Antipas, and their reconciliation (Luke xxiii. 12); the names of the distinguished priests, Alexander and (if the correct reading be not Jonathan, cf. Jos. Ant. xviii. 4. 3) John (Acts iv. 6); the imposing figure of Gamaliel (Acts v. 34, xxii. 3), mentioned by Josephus only as the father of the younger Gamaliel (Bell. iv. 3. 9; Vita, 38, 60); the Samaritan Simon (Acts viii. 9); the officers of Herod, Chuza (Luke viii. 3) and Blastus (Acts xii. 20, cf. also xiii. 1); the chiliarch, Claudius Lysias (Acts xxiii. 26); the centurions, Cornelius and Julius (Acts x. 1, xxvii. 1); and the orator, Tertullus (xxiv. 1)—all these statements and names could not have been taken by Luke from Josephus. In the instances where their accounts cover the same ground, we find traces of independent and variant traditions (n. 6). In the case of the Antiquities and Vita, which, according to all indications, are considerably later than Luke's work, it is more natural to suppose that Josephus is dependent upon Luke than that the reverse relation holds; and it does not seem to the present writer entirely creditable to those who feel that the agreements between Josephus and Luke call for explanation, that they have not seriously considered this possibility. This is not the place in which to discuss the question at length (n. 7). It is sufficient to have shown that Luke could not have followed Josephus as an authority in historical matters, nor have copied the Greek style of this writer.

At first glance, the genealogy (Luke iii. 23-38), the communication of the apostles and elders in Jerusalem (Acts xv. 23-29), and the letter of Lysias (xxiii. 26-30) give the impression of being reproduced from original documents. If the second of these was a communication actually sent from Jerusalem, delivered in Antioch with the solemnity which Luke describes, and communicated also to other Churches (xvi. 4), it is impossible to suppose that so important a document was immediately lost. If Luke was a member of the Antiochian Church at the time when the communication was delivered there (above, p. 2), he probably heard it read, but this is no evidence at all against the possibility of his having had a copy of it when he wrote his history. The style is not that of Luke, and the secular tone of the introductory and concluding formulæ is against the assumption that the author composed the document, either from his imagination, or from indistinct recollections (n. 8). This could more easily have been the case with the letter in xxiii. 26-30, but it cannot be proved. In the proceedings before Felix (xxiv. 1-23) and Festus (xxv. 1-12) the report of Lysias would almost certainly have been read, and, if written in Latin, translated into Greek. The situation in which Paul found himself in Caesarea (xxiv. 23), and the friendly relations which always existed between him and the military officers to whose charge he was committed (xxvii. 3, xxviii. 16, 30 f.; Phil. i. 13), make it quite conceivable that he and his friends may have secured a copy of this report, which, though brief, was of fundamental importance in his trial. Against the assumption that the language of the report is entirely Luke's, which, according to methods of historical composition in antiquity, might very well be possible, is, first of all, the fact that, although there is no stylistic necessity for it, Luke makes the chiliarch, who has not been mentioned by name up to this time (xxi. 31–xxiii. 22), and who afterwards is called simply Lysias (xxiv. 7, recension β ; xxiv. 22), write his name Claudius Lysias. In the second place, Lysias' report shows marked variations from the facts as previously recorded. If the author of Acts was inventing this report, only partially true, he would have directed special attention to the effort of the chiliarch to obscure the law in the case, and to conceal his own mistake. The connection in which the genealogy is recorded, and its conclusion (iii. 23–38), indicate that it is an expression of Luke's own peculiar thought (above, p. 70 f.); but this does not explain its independence not only of Matt. i., but also of the O.T., in so far as the latter could be used for a source. Since it was impossible for Luke himself personally to investigate the contents of vv. 24–31, and inasmuch as the tradition here presupposed could have been transmitted only in written form, he must have made use of an older record. We know that the relatives of Jesus and their descendants interested themselves in these matters (n. 9).

Since Luke was familiar with a number of attempts to write the history of Christianity, and since his characterisation of these efforts perfectly suits Mark's Gospel (above, p. 49), it is natural to suppose that he used this writing. He was acquainted with Mark and knew his relation to Peter, who was a prominent eye-witness of the gospel events. He was in Rome in company with Mark about the year 62 (Col. iv. 10, 14), and possibly again in 66 (2 Tim. iv. 11), consequently at the time when Mark wrote his Gospel. A comparison of the two Gospels gives for the various portions a greatly varying picture. With reference to the order of single narratives, not much is to be concluded from Mark i. 1-13 = Luke iii. 1-iv. 13, since the order of these events—the preaching and baptism of John, the baptism and temptation of Jesus—is determined by their very nature. Moreover, Mark's account here is nothing more than a brief sketch. Leaving these passages out of account, therefore, the first notable parallel is that between Luke iv. 31-vi. 19 and Mark i. 21-iii. 19; Luke viii. 4-ix. 17 = Mark iv. 1-vi. 44 is a second; Luke ix. 18-50 = Mark viii. 27-ix. 40 is a third; Luke xviii. 15-43 = Mark x. 13-52 a fourth; and Luke xix. 29-xxiv. 8 = Mark xi. 1-xvi. 8 a fifth. In the case of these five series of passages the parallelism is by no means complete. Luke interrupts the first series with a narrative, v. 1-11, only remotely similar to Mark i. 16-20. In the second series Luke inserts a passage, viii. 19-21, which is found in Mark iii. 31-35, while Mark iv. 26-29, 30-32, and vi. 1-6 are omitted. There is nothing at all in Luke corresponding to the first passage, the second is found in Luke xiii. 18-19, closely connected with a narrative peculiar to him, while in place of the third we find a much fuller account in the early part of Luke's Gospel, iv. 16-30. In the fourth series, between xviii. 34 and 35, Luke omits the narrative found in Mark x. 35-45, giving only a meagre substitute for it in Luke xxii. 24-27. In the fifth series, the cursing of the fig-tree, Mark xi. 12-14, 20-25, the question about the greatest of the commandments, Mark xii. 28-34, and the anointing in Bethany, Mark xiv. 3-9, are not found in Luke. For the last, Luke vii. 36-50 is substituted; for the second, Luke x.

25-37; while in a measure Luke xiii. 6-9 takes the place of the first (cf. § 63); and for a single saying in this same passage, Mark xi. 23 (Matt. xxi. 21, xvii. 20), we find a similar saying in Luke xvii. 6. Since these equivalents for such material as Mark retains and Luke omits are all peculiar to Luke, it is clear that, although Luke consciously omitted some things found in Mark, he endeavoured to find substitutes for the omissions. On the other hand, in the last series of parallels, Luke substitutes a number of brief accounts which are peculiar to himself (xix. 41-44 [xxi. 20-24], xxii. 35-38, xxiii. 6-12, 39-43). In all five series, however, Mark's order is, without exception, retained throughout. This of itself is sufficient to render necessary some explanation of the dependence of one of the Gospels upon the other—particularly since, in many instances, the order followed is not a reproduction of the real succession of events. This lack of chronological order does not escape the attention of the careful reader of Mark (vol. ii. 499 f.), and Luke betrays a clear consciousness of it. There is evidence that Luke made an effort to fix more definitely the time of events, as, e.g., when he gives a more definite date to a Sabbath which Mark leaves undetermined—following the Jewish calendar (Luke vi. 1)—and distinguishes it expressly from another Sabbath (vi. 6), whereas the ordinary reader might infer from Mark iii. 1 (cf. Matt. xii. 9) that the transactions which Luke assigns to two different Sabbaths happened on the same day; cf. also other occasional instances where he gives the time more accurately (e.g. vi. 1, 6, vii. 11). In many instances, however, he either did not do this at all or did it ineffectively, as is proved by the use of formulæ such as are found in v. 12, 17, viii. 4, 22, ix. 18, xx. 1. These occur in the sections parallel to Mark, as well as in other parts of Luke's Gospel (v. 1, x. 38, xi. 1, 29, xiii. 10, xiv. 1; cf. above, p. 66). When, however, notwithstanding this formal disavowal of all attempt to give an exact chronology where this is not attainable, he nevertheless follows in these five series exactly the same order as Mark, the coincidence can be explained as due neither to a stereotyped oral tradition, nor to accident.

But if one of these Gospels is dependent upon the other, Mark must be considered the earlier of the two. Leaving out of account the tradition, according to which Mark wrote before Luke (vol. ii. 392 ff.), and the proofs which we have from Luke's own work that it was written later than 70 (§ 62), this conclusion follows from a comparison of the details of the parallels. Combinations of words, such as κηρύσσουν βάπτισμα μετανοίας εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν, which are found in Mark i. 4 following καθὼς γέγραπται ἐν τῷ Ἑσαΐα τῷ προφήτῃ, in Luke iii. 3 before ὡς γέγραπται ἐν βίβλῳ λόγων Ἑσαίου τοῦ προφήτου, do not originate independently of each other. Luke appears here, however, as the stylist smoothing down the awkward expressions which Mark uses in making his citations (n. 10). In fact this is everywhere the case. It is not to be assumed that Luke undertook to remove all the Hebraisms which he found in the accounts he used, and to produce an historical work uniform in style, modelled after the language of Polybius or the periods of his own preface. As regards style, Luke's work is as varied as it could well be. The narratives in Luke i.-ii. and the psalm-like discourses of these chapters read like sections out of the O.T.; while the style and language of the discourses of Paul on the Areopagus (Acts xvii. 22-31) and before the noble lords and ladies in Caesarea (xxiv. 10-21, xxvi. 2-23) are more like those of the orator Tertullus (xxiv. 2-8), and of the procurator Festus (xxv. 14-21), than the discourses in Acts i.-x. Luke uses a few Hebraisms, not only in the narratives probably, or certainly, taken from older sources, but in connective phrases and summaries, which are of his own composition (n. 11). He shows a feeling for the special style corresponding to the sacred character of his theme, and does not allow the spirit in which the eye-witnesses and ministers of the word were wont to speak from the beginning to be replaced by a secular tone. He does, nevertheless, soften somewhat the Semitic colouring, setting aside expressions unnecessarily harsh, and striving to make the narrative more lucid. Not only are the most marked Hebraisms and the Aramaic words of Mark removed, but also such characteristic expressions as Mark's εὐθὺς (n. 12), also such peculiarities as are due to Mark's personal relations and the fact that his Gospel was designed for Roman readers (Mark xii. 42, xiv. 17, 51 f., xv. 21; see vol. ii. 487 f.; cf. Luke xxi. 2, xxii. 14, 53, xxiii. 26), and imperfections in the presentation due to Mark's very exact reproduction of the narratives of Peter (Mark i. 29 = Luke iv. 38; Mark iii. 26 = Luke vi. 14; Mark ix. 14 f. = Luke ix. 37 f.; Mark xiii. 1-3 = Luke xxi. 5). He avoids also other redundancies and awkwardnesses which occur in Mark (e.g. Mark i. 32 = Luke iv. 40), and in countless instances selects words which are more pleasing or more expressive (n. 13). Since some of these words and phrases are hapaxlegomena in the N.T., and inasmuch as others of them are used in the same way elsewhere in Luke's work, and only in Luke's work, they are to be considered as peculiarities of his style, and are not to be explained as derived from one of the sources which Luke and Mark may have used in common. This, like the other assumption that Mark had Luke before him, would compel us to assume that Mark intentionally and regularly replaced the better language of Luke, or of the common source, by more awkward expressions. But this is incredible. Consequently a comparison of the style of Mark and Luke shows that, in the five sections of his Gospel mentioned, Luke made use of Mark in preparing his own work.

While Luke recasts the style of Mark with considerable thoroughness, very little change is to be noted in the contents of such portions as he adopts, and which he does not replace in other parts of his work by similar and sometimes fuller narratives (above, p. 102). Only in one important point does Luke consciously vary his account from that of Mark. Mark i. 14, like Matt. iv. 12, connects the beginning of the Galilean ministry with the arrest of the Baptist, and associates it with the account of the temptation in such a way as to lead the reader readily to infer that the arrest of the Baptist follows immediately upon the temptation. Luke, however, varies this order of events. On the one hand, he, alone of the Synoptists, connects the beginning of the Galilean ministry of Jesus definitely and closely with His baptism (iv. 15, ἐν τῇ δυνάμει τοῦ πνεύματος; cf. iii. 22, iv. 1), and describes the journey to Galilee, which introduces His ministry there, as a return (iv. 14, ὑπέστρεψεν; cf. iv. 1) from the journey which had taken Jesus to the place of His baptism and temptation. On the other hand, he wholly separates this journey from the arrest of the Baptist (above, p. 63 f.), a later incident which here he anticipates in the form of an episode in iii. 19-20. The journey to Galilee, which Luke places after the baptism and temptation, is not the same as the journey to Galilee, which in Mark follows the arrest of the Baptist. It must be assumed that the apparent succession of events in Mark is replaced in Luke by another, which is the result of the author's investigations, and which is adopted in view of καθεξῆς in i. 3. This conclusion is not affected by the fact that thereafter Luke introduces immediately and chiefly events, which Mark and Matthew place in Galilee after the arrest of the Baptist; since it is apparent that throughout his Gospel, in the sections following iv. 14-15, Luke consciously abandons the attempt to arrange the single narratives chronologically (above, p. 64). It is also clear that, according to him, the work of Jesus between His baptism and temptation is by no means confined to Galilee (iv. 44, x. 38-42; above, p. 88 f., n. 18). It may be remarked here, that through his investigations Luke made marked advances on the form of such an historical work as Mark's Gospel in the direction of what we find in John. He is no mere imitator of written models which he has before him, nor is he satisfied simply to recast the style of his sources; he is rather an historian who handles his material critically. We may assume that, in addition to Mark, he made use of other attempts at a gospel history, working them over in the same way that he did this Gospel.

We have already seen from the prologue that Luke did not have access to any gospel writings that originated with an apostle or disciple of Jesus (above, p. 49); it is, therefore, equally improbable that he used Matthew; for the latter was never attributed to a disciple of an apostle, but was from the first assigned to the apostle Matthew (vol. ii. 177 ff.). This statement would be true of an "original apostolic document" or the "logia," if these books ever existed; since, if their existence be assumed, all the traditions denied with reference to Matthew must be transferred to them. One of these mythical books, from which the author of our Matthew is supposed to have drawn, must have passed as the work of the apostle Matthew, otherwise we are unable to understand why, from the very first and uniformly in the tradition, the Greek Matthew was ascribed to this apostle. Moreover, we have seen the correctness of the position, according to which Matthew is the translation of an Aramaic book, the contents of which were for a long time accessible only through oral interpretation to those who were unfamiliar with this language. The same would be true of the "logia." But it may be doubted whether Luke, who was a Greek, was able to read an Aramaic book. His citations from the O.T. betray no knowledge whatever of the original text, or of a Targum. Not all of the four translations of Aramaic names which we find in Luke's work (Acts i. 19, iv. 36, ix. 36, xiii. 8) are beyond question, and if they were it is perfectly possible that Luke may have taken his translations from others, without himself possessing even a superficial knowledge of Aramaic. There are several Aramaic words with which, as a native of Antioch, he may always have been familiar, and others, together with several Hebrew termini, with which he became acquainted in the common life of the Church (n. 14). On the other hand, if, as is probable, the Greek Matthew was not written before the year 80 (vol. ii. 516 f.), it is unlikely, for chronological reasons, that Luke read it before writing his own Gospel (§ 62). This improbability is strengthened into impossibility by a comparison of the two Gospels. One who had read Matt. i.-ii.—especially in a work which purported to be that of an apostle—could not have written Luke i.-ii. in its present form, which is practically without resemblance to the narrative in Matthew (it is only necessary to compare Luke i. 31*b* and Matt. i. 21*a*), notwithstanding the fact that there is much that is common in the subject-matter. Moreover, the later writer would certainly have betrayed his attempt at correction or improvement, where he believed that the contents and form of Matt. i.-ii. could be improved. In particular, it would have been impossible for an historian of the character Luke shows himself to be, as compared with Mark, to pass by practically unnoticed material so important as that in Matt. ii.—really excluding it as he does by Luke ii. 39. It may after a fashion be possible in a Gospel harmony to reconcile the contents of the opening chapters of the two Gospels, including Luke iii. 23-38, but a synoptic presentation is out of the question. Not until Matt. iii. 1 = Luke iii. 1 is this possible, and then only here and there.

The proof derived from a comparison of the opening chapters of the Gospel and confirmed by the hints of Luke's prologue, that Luke did not use our Matthew as a source, is so strong, that the only question which can be seriously discussed is whether Luke and Matthew drew from common sources. We know that Luke made use of written sources, and the relation which has been proved to exist between Luke and Mark leads us to assume that, in addition to Mark, he used other similar documents. It is, however, a priori improbable that he used documents which earlier or later were employed in the composition of Matthew; since our investigation of Matthew gave no occasion for the assumption that this author made any use whatever of written sources (vol. ii. 581 f.). In the investigation of this question the five sections of Luke, which we saw were taken over by Luke from Mark with certain modifications, are to be excepted at the outset (above, p. 102 f.); since whatever agreements between Luke and Matthew appear in these passages, all go back to Mark, and are to be explained on the ground of the relation of Mark to Matthew (see vol. ii. 601 f.), and the connection which has been shown to exist between Luke and Mark (see above, p. 101 f.). In these five sections there is not a single sentence from which a direct relation between Luke and Matthew, or the relation of Luke to a source used in Matthew, can be proved (n. 15). In the second place, in the critical comparison of Matthew and Luke, the following passages peculiar to Luke are to be left out of consideration—passages to which there is a remote parallel are placed in parentheses: i. 1–3, ii. 10–15, 23–38 (iv. 16–30, v. 1–10), vii. 11–17, 36–50, viii. 1–3, ix. 51–56, 61–62, x. 1–20 (with the exception of a few sayings), x. 29–42 (xi. 1–4), xi. 5–8, 27–28, 37–41, xii. 13–21 (32–57), xiii. 1–17, 31–33, xiv. 1–16, 31 (with the exception of xiv. 11, 17, xv. 4–7), xvii. 7–22, xviii. 1–14, xix. 1–27, 41–44 (xxi. 20–24), xxiii. 5–12, 27–31, 39-43, xxiv. (1-11) 12-53. Comparatively little remains, and, with the exception of short disconnected sentences, this consists of only the following passages [parallels of Matthew in parentheses]: iii. 7-9, 17 (iii. 7-12), iv. 1-13 (iv. 1-11), vi. 20-49 (5-7), vii. 1-10 (viii. 5-10, 13), vii. 18-35 (xi. 2-19), ix. 57-60 (viii. 19-22), x. 13-15, 21-24 (xi. 20-27, xiii. 16-17), xi. 24-26, 29-36 (xii. 38-45, v. 15, vi. 22-23), xi. 42-52 (xxiii. 4-35), xii. 2-12 (x. 17-33), xii. 22-31 (vi. 25-33), xii. 41-48 (xxiv. 45-51), xii. 54-56 (xvi. 2-3 ?), xii. 57-59 (v. 25-26), xiii. 24-30 (vii. 13-14, 21-23, viii. 11-12), xiii. 34-35 (xxiii. 37-39), xvii. 23-37 (xxiv. 23-28, 37-42), xix. 12-28 (xxv. 14-30). In order accurately to compare these parallels, even more than in other critical investigations, it would be necessary to have a text of both Gospels, but especially of Luke, and this reliable even in smallest details, since nothing contributed so much to the degeneration of the Gospel text as the tendency to supplement and correct one Gospel from the parallels in the others, and in fact especially the text of Mark and Luke on the basis of Matthew. In the Textus receptus the Gospels are very much more alike than in any even moderately critically corrected text; and the difference would be even greater, if text criticism were more advanced than it is at present. Few narratives are to be found among the parallels cited, though, on the other hand, there are numerous sayings, which are generally reported with an historical setting. As regards the narrative sections, it is impossible to form an intelligent conception of a single written source from which, e.g., the two differing narratives in Luke vii. 1-10 and Matt. viii. 5-10, 13 could both have been derived through a process of revision on the part of the authors. What Luke adds (vv. 3-5) has the marks of genuine tradition, and the effort to secure brevity, to be seen in some parts of Matthew (vol. ii. 583 f., 607) could not have brought it about that in this passage the narrative should be of the character of an excerpt; since the account is enlarged by the insertion of a saying of Jesus, probably spoken on another occasion (Matt. viii. 11-12, cf. Luke xiii. 28-29). Even if Luke made use of an earlier account in this passage—as is perfectly possible—in the last analysis the divergence of his narrative from Matthew goes back to variations in the historical material, which appear whenever what has happened and been experienced is repeatedly related by different persons, even when there are eye-witnesses among the narrators. The accounts of the temptation are very similar in Matthew and Luke; but the differing order in which the second and third temptations are narrated is most naturally explained by the assumption that those who had heard Jesus give an account of them (n. 16) repeated what they heard from memory in different ways. It is inconceivable that Luke should have deliberately chosen the reversed order, if he had had before him Matt. iv. 1-11, or any other document having the order of Matthew's account; since the close of Luke's account, which leaves Jesus standing upon the pinnacle of the temple instead of upon a mountain in the wilderness, cannot be said to be an improvement on Matthew.

Some of the discourses and sayings common to Matthew and Luke show striking similarity, but others vary widely from each other in form, though having essentially the same content and showing the same progress of thought. The best example of the former is the denunciatory address of the Baptist (Luke iii. 7-9, cf. also x. 21-22, xiii. 34-35), of the latter, the Sermon on the Mount (vi. 20-49, cf. xiii. 24-40). Elements of the tradition similar to those which appear in Luke iii. 7-9, etc., could be easily preserved and strongly impressed upon the memory quite without the help of writing. On the other hand, when sayings like Luke iii. 7-9, Matt.

iii. 7-10 came to be written, it was necessary at least to intimate who the persons were whom John called a "generation of vipers." Here, however, the accounts of Matthew and Luke vary widely from each other. The Sermon on the Mount in Luke (vi. 20-49) cannot be regarded as an excerpt from Matthew (v.-vii.), nor can the latter be explained as a remodelling of the material in Luke. Even granting that Luke may have left out statements of great importance for the first evangelist, such as are found in Matt. v. 17-43, because they did not suit his purpose,—assuming, of course, that he found them in one of his sources, and granting that Matthew incorporated into his account of the Sermon on the Mount more passages belonging in a different historical connection than we are able at present to prove (vol. ii. 558 f.),—in those parts which are parallel we find differences in the language which cannot be explained as due to necessity for modification in style, or rearrangement of material. These differences are, however, natural, if the discourse was heard by numerous persons and variously reproduced in the oral tradition. It is more than likely that Luke found this and other discourses in one or more of the records of the "many" of whom he speaks (i. 1). In view of Luke's handling of Mark's Gospel, we are justified in assuming that the greater elegance of style, e.g. Luke vi. 47-49 = Matt. vii. 24-27, is due to him. But we are not able to go much beyond such assumptions in ascertaining what other sources, besides Mark, Luke used in his Gospel (n. 17).

Passages like Luke i.-ii., the poetical charm and true Israelitish spirit of which in the narrative portions and the inserted psalms is comparable only to the finest parts of the books of Samuel, could not have been written by a Greek like Luke. They must have originated in Palestine, where men and women of prophetic temperament and prophetic gifts were closely associated with the beginnings and progress of Christianity (i. 41, 46–55, 67–71, ii. 25, 36 ; Acts ii. 17, xi. 27 f., xv. 32, xxi. 9 f.).

Luke twice points out (ii. 19, 51, cf. i. 66) that Mary kept in memory and pondered significant sayings associated with the childhood and youth of her son. This is said only of Mary, not of Joseph, though at this time he must have been still alive. In this way Luke indicates that the traditions in Luke i.–ii. were transmitted through her. Who first wrote them down and when they were written we do not know. Nor can any intelligent critic regard the other narrative sections peculiar to Luke as his own fabrications, or as legends which originated outside of Palestine in the second or third generation after Christ. Their striking originality, which could not have been invented, has impressed them upon the mind of the Christian world to an extent scarcely true of any other portion of the whole body of gospel literature. In the distinctively historical portions we find indications of locality (vii. 11, xvii. 11, xix. 1, xxiv. 13), names of persons (vii. 40, viii. 3, x. 38 f., xix. 2, xxiv. 18), and delineations of character difficult to invent (x. 40, xiii. 32, xix. 3 f.), also references to current events otherwise unknown (xiii. 1, 4, xxiii. 12), and a genuine Israelitish colouring (xi. 27, xiii. 11, 14, 16, xiv. 15, xix. 9, xxiii. 28–31, 42 f., xxiv. 21)—all of which is proof against the suspicion of later invention. The same is true of the parables and kindred sayings of Jesus (x. 30–37, xii. 16–21, xiii. 6–9, xiv. 16–24, xv. 1–xvi. 31, xviii. 1–14). When on one occasion Luke says, in flat contradiction to Mark x. 46, which he had before him, that Jesus healed a blind man as He drew near to Jericho (xviii. 35), not as He was leaving the city, it must be because he has before him still another account of the incident, from which he does not wish to vary ; and the more unimportant the detail the more likely is this to have been the case. The passage xix. 1–10 shows that he had at his disposal independent traditions regarding the events of this particular day. Whether this information was derived from Zacchæus, or from a book, no one is able to say (n. 18). The two narratives concerning Herod Antipas peculiar to Luke (xiii. 31-33, xxiii. 6-12, 15)—the way for the second of which is prepared as early as in ix. 9 by an addition peculiar to Luke, which is also referred to again in Acts iv. 27—naturally recalls the fact that the wife of an official under this prince was one of those who accompanied Jesus (Luke viii. 3, cf. John iv. 46 ?), also that, according to Acts xiii. 1, a foster-brother, or youthful companion of the tetrarch, was one of the teachers of the Church in Antioch at the time when the narrator in Acts was a member of that congregation (according to xi. 27 f., above, p. 2). But the existence of such oral sources, upon which Luke could draw in making his investigations, does not preclude the possibility of his having used, in addition to Mark, one or more of the numerous written accounts which are mentioned in Luke i. 1. The fact that Luke modified materially the style of the documents which he used, as proved by his relation to Mark and by a comparison of his Gospel with Matthew (above, p. 104, and below, nn. 9-12), deprives us almost entirely of one favourite means of determining sources, namely, by comparison of language. Here and there we find narratives which more than others show genuine Jewish conception and modes of expression, or greater elegance of Greek style ; but on the whole the narratives are uniform. The differences for the most part are to be easily explained by the variety of the material and of the setting (above, p. 104, and below, n. 19).

With reference to most of the accounts in Acts, the author was in a different situation than he was in regard to the contents of his first book—provided our interpretation of the prologue be correct (above, p. 41 f.). In much of the history which he here records he had been a participant, as he indicates by the introduction of a "we" in parts where this was the case (above, p. 54 f.). Among these "we" passages there are two long sections. xx. 5-xxi. 17 and xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16, which stand out as peculiar in character. While in xi. 27 (above, p. 4, n. 3), xvi. 10-17 the only practical purpose which the "we" seems to serve is to call attention to the presence of the narrator, without the narrative on this account assuming a character different from that of chaps. xiii.-xv., xviii.-xix., in the two passages (xx. 5-xxi. 17, xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16) we have connected accounts of journeys which are totally distinct from all other parts of Acts, the contents of which admit of comparison. The journey from Antioch to Philippi, and thence to Thessalonica, and from Berea by way of Athens to Corinth (xv. 40-xvi. 12, xvi. 40-xviii. 1) is so briefly sketched that for the most part we must conjecture the route selected, the places touched on the way, the length of the stops, and the time of the year (vol. i. § 13). Only when the author records what happened in the cities of Philippi, Thessalonica, Athens, and Corinth does the account become more detailed; practically nothing is said concerning the journey itself. Essentially the same is true in the case of the first missionary journey, Acts xiii.-xiv. Other journeys, e.g., in Acts xi. 30-xii. 25, xviii. 18-xix. 1, xx. 1-4, are dismissed with a few words; but in xx. 5-xxi. 17 and xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16 we have practically a daily record of the journey with numerous exact statements as to the time of the year (xx. 6, 16, xxvii. 9, 12), the various stopping places on the way—even those where nothing of any special importance took place (xx. 13-15, xxi. 1-8, xxvii. 3-8, 16, xxviii. 12-15)—the time occupied by different parts of the journey and by the stops, the change of ships, the nationality, destination, and names of ships in which the journey was made (xxi. 2, xxvii. 2, 6, xxviii. 11), changes from travel by land to travel by sea and vice versa (xx. 13, xxi. 7), conditions of weather and the minute details of the sea voyages. In not a single instance can the indications of time be said to be designed to make the history clear. After what is said in Acts xx. 6, 16, the reader is interested to know whether Paul succeeded in reaching Jerusalem before or after Pentecost, but he is destined to be disappointed. There is no clear indication of the time when the end of the journey was reached, and, from the notices of the daily journey which precede, we are unable to estimate the length of time occupied between Philippi and Jerusalem, since the length of the stay in Miletus and Cæsarea (xx. 15-xxi. 1, 8-15) and the length of the voyage from Rhodes to Tyre (xxi. 1-3) and of the land journey from Tyre to Ptolemais and from Cæsarea to Jerusalem are not given by days. It is true that the elaborateness of these two accounts does impress the reader with a strong sense of the situation. He receives a vivid impression of the care exercised by divine providence over the life of the apostle who was destined to do more great things. But most of the details mentioned have no bearing on this point. They are out of relation to the main historical idea that is being developed to an extent not paralleled anywhere else in Luke's work.

Luke's interest in minute details, proper names, etc., which are not absolutely necessary in the narrative, is to be observed elsewhere also (Acts ix. 25, xii. 13, 20, xiii. 1, xxi. 29, 37 f., xxii. 2, xxiii. 16, 19, xxiii. 31 f., xxiv. 1, 11), and it would be arbitrary to infer from the absence of "we" in xx. 16-38, xxi. 19-26, 32, that the narrator was less familiar with the facts which he records in these passages than he is with the facts recorded in the "we" passages. For it will be observed that the sections where the "we" is omitted deal in every instance with some action or suffering of Paul's which could not be shared by another in the same way that a journey in company with him from Philippi to Jerusalem and from Caesarea to Rome could be shared (cf. above, pp. 55 f., 87, n. 13). In connection with the meeting with James, where the narrator was present (xxi. 18), it was necessary to omit the "we," because Paul alone had to do with the elders in Jerusalem. As yet no evidence has been advanced which proves that the person who wrote the entire section, xx. 4-xxviii. 31, was not always in close touch with the events which he records. Nevertheless, the accounts of the two journeys mentioned—to which possibly xvi. 10-18 may be added as a remnant of a third—are distinct in character. They could not have been written for the first time when the author composed his history; rather he must have had them in his possession and have inserted them in his book, retaining all the details which were not necessary, either for the sake of the narrative or for the readers' understanding of the history. There may be difference of opinion as to how many changes Luke made in the form and contents of these journey-narratives, whether he inserted passages from his memory of events that had happened elsewhere, or narratives of his own invention. But, apart from all these conjectures, there is no doubt as to the fact that these portions are distinct in character from the rest of the book.

Repeated examination of chap. xxvii. by experts has shown that, while it could not have been written by a mariner, it must have been written by some gifted man who accompanied Paul on the journey, and who had an appreciation of nature and of the incidents of a sea voyage (n. 20). If, without recourse to the tradition, we were to ask which one of Paul's travelling companions was most likely to have been the author of the accounts of these journeys, the most probable answer would be Luke, the physician. If he is, at the same time, the author of the entire work, it was his own notes, which he had written down in the form of a journal during the voyage, that he incorporated in his history. Even the best memory will not retain for decades all such details as changes in the weather and the movements of the sailors in a voyage lasting for months, and no historian would record in a large work such recollections as he might have, simply because he had not forgotten them. The incorporation by the author in the work of these accounts, which in their details are so out of proportion to the other narratives in the book, is most conceivable, if they were recorded by him years before. In addition to the purpose which he had accomplished in an earlier passage by the introduction of "we"—namely, to prove that he had been an eye-witness of the events recorded—he secured by this means vividness in the narrative which could be obtained in no other way. The fact that Luke incorporates into his work only accounts of travels, is easily explained by the common experience that persons who do not regularly keep a journal do so with the greatest precision when they travel. However uninteresting and meagre such notes may be in themselves, for the person who afterwards has to relate the history of travels in which he was one of the party, they are invaluable and become more and more so as the years pass.

A further point to be noted—self-evident, but at first thought strange—is the fact that Luke did not use as sources the letters of Paul, which in our estimation are authorities of the first importance for the history which Luke records (n. 21). When Luther expresses the opinion that Acts may well be called "a gloss to the Epistles of St. Paul" (in a preface of the year 1534), he means that Acts furnishes historical illustrations of Pauline doctrine. Acts may be so designated also because it furnishes the reader of Paul's letters with an historical guide, without which even those who question its genuineness could not make their way through the Epistles. If, on other grounds, it were conceivable that Luke had never heard of Paul's letters, this unaccountable ignorance on his part would be quite confirmed by the entire silence of Acts concerning the Epistles of Paul (n. 22), and by the absence of points of formal resemblance between Acts and the letters, where both handle the same facts. Of course there are points of similarity between the contents of an early account of Paul's missionary work and the letters which Paul wrote in the midst of this work : if the case were otherwise, it would be necessary to assume, either that the Epistles are pure forgeries or the historical accounts pure inventions. Since neither can reasonably be accepted as true, it is not surprising that the Epistles and Acts agree as to numerous facts. But the fact that the narratives of Acts are uniformly independent of the Epistles, both as regards the form and the compass of historical material handled, is of great significance in the criticism of Acts. Exactly the same relation exists as between Luke i.-ii. and Matt. i. ii. (above, p. 108 f.). It is altogether inconceivable that an author, who read the letters of Paul for the sake of the historical information in them, and who intended to use them as sources, should have made no use of the wealth of interesting historical matter which they contained, particularly if he were short of material. Such a procedure would be inexplicable, even if the author were so devoid of conscience as to esteem his own theological or ecclesiastical opinion and purpose above historical truth as contained in such ancient documents as the Pauline letters. For he was under obligation, not simply to pass by the things which he desired to set in different light from that in which they had been represented by Paul, in fact he had no right to do so, but he was able, and was in duty bound, to reconstruct Paul's statements to suit his own unhistorical purpose.

Taking up first the gospel history, if the opinion regarding the text of Luke xxii. 17-20 expressed above, p. 39 f., be correct, Luke did not utilise in any way the account in 1 Cor. xi. 23-25. If the text, as it stands proves to be the right one, significant differences still remain, and the agreement may be very simply explained as due to the fact that Luke belonged to the Church in Antioch at the time when Paul was a teacher there (above, pp. 39 f., 28 f.), so that his idea of the institution of the Lord's Supper was derived from the same oral tradition as that of Paul. It may be for the same reason that Luke x. 7 agrees with 1 Tim. v. 18 (μισθοῦ), as against Matt. x. 10 (τροφῆς). Luke makes no use whatever of the account in 1 Cor. xv. 5-7, which, in our estimation, is so important. During the forty days mentioned in Acts i. 3 there was ample time for the appearance to the "more than five hundred brethren," and to James. There is no evidence of a disposition on Luke's part to emphasise the exclusive authority of the twelve apostles (but cf. above, p. 49 f.), or to minimise James' position in the Church. The fact that he mentions an appearance to Peter alone, but without giving any account of it (Luke xxiv. 34 = 1 Cor. xv. 5), and the fact that he records an appearance to the group of apostles on Easter evening, and still another appearance to the same circle at the close of the forty days (xxiv. 36; Acts i. 4 ff.)—seeming in these points to agree with 1 Cor. xv. 5b, 7b—do not lessen at all his manifest independence of Paul. Luke makes no use of Paul's autobiographical statements. A statement of the apostle's descent from the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. iii. 5) would have been just as much in place in Acts xxii. 3 as is the remark in Luke ii. 36 (cf. also Acts xiii. 21). No mention is made in Acts of "the contest with wild beasts" in Ephesus (1 Cor. xv. 32), which in the Acts of Paul is enlarged into an adventurous story (GK, ii. 880). Nor is anything said about the five times thirty-nine stripes which Paul received from the Jews, the three shipwrecks prior to the voyage to Rome, dangers by rivers and perils by robbers (2 Cor. xi. 23-26). Luke mentions only one instance when the apostle was stoned (Acts xiv. 19 = 2 Cor. xi. 25 ; cf. 2 Tim. iii. 11), and of the three scourgings with rods he gives an account of only one, and records only one of the numerous imprisonments which Paul suffered prior to his long imprisonment (Acts xvi. 22-40 ; 2 Cor. xi. 23, 25). From all this it appears that Acts gives us anything but a complete history of Paul ; at the same time, it is evident that its reports are derived from independent and trustworthy sources. As regards Paul's history before his conversion, at the time of it, and shortly afterwards, one acquainted with the Epistles, who had formed his conception of the scene near Damascus from 1 Cor. ix. 1, xv. 8 ; cf. Gal. i. 12, 16 ; 2 Cor. iv. 6, would hardly have obscured so completely as in Acts ix. 4-7, xxii. 6-11, xxvi. 12-19, the fact that Paul saw the form of Jesus, nor would the testimony to this fact be so indirect as in Acts ix. 17, 27, xxii. 14, 15 ; cf. ix. 7*b*. There is no reason why, if Luke used Paul's letters, he should have passed over the journey to Arabia, which is mentioned in Gal. i. 17, as a merely temporary absence from Damascus, and which, therefore, could very well have taken place during the ἡμέραι ἱκαναί of Acts ix. 23 ; nor is it easy to see why he should have omitted all reference to the part taken by the ethnarch Aretas in the plot against Paul's life (2 Cor. xi. 32)—which does not in any way exclude the possibility of the plans having originated with the Jews (Acts ix. 23 ; see n. 23)—nor why he should have replaced the notice of the personal contact of Paul with Peter and James (Gal. i. 18 f.) by the colourless statement that Paul had intercourse with the apostles (Acts ix. 27 f.), nor why the exact statement that Paul's stay in Jerusalem lasted but fifteen days should have been exchanged for a brief sketch which leaves the reader to guess whether this sojourn lasted ten days or several months. Even where Luke and Paul do agree, no striking similarity of expression is to be observed (n. 23). In the account of the first missionary journey (xiii. 2-xiv. 28) besides the similarities in the story of the stoning in Lystra, which has been already mentioned. Luke's narrative has points of resemblance to 2 Tim. iii. 11, and to various hints and presuppositions in Galatians (vol. i. § 11). While, on the one hand, it would be impossible to form a definite idea of the course of events from the hints of Galatians—for example, from the reference in Gal. iv. 14 f. to the event described in Acts xiv. 11-18 (vol. i. 180)—without aid from the vivid narrative of Acts, on the other hand, it is just as impossible to suppose that Luke's account, which is so full of details, was derived from this source. The very clear statement of Paul (Gal. iv. 13; vol. i. 165, 181), that his sojourn in the cities of Lycaonia was due to an illness, is not found in Acts at all.

The relation of this account of Luke to Paul's letters may be summarised in a word, by saying that it is such as would naturally exist between the account of a well-informed and truthful historian and original sources which he had not seen. This is the case also with reference to the second missionary journey (Acts xv. 40-xviii. 17). Silas was the elder of Paul's two helpers, and Paul always places his name before that of Timothy (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; 2 Cor. i. 19), but Luke never calls him by his Roman name, Silvanus, as does Paul uniformly (vol. i. 31 f., 207). Luke's statement that Timothy's mother was a Jewess and his father a Greek (xvi. 1), is confirmed by what is said and left unsaid in 2 Tim. i. 5 (vol. ii. 22, n. 4), but Luke does not mention the name Eunice. The hints with reference to the ordination of Timothy in 1 Tim. i. 18, iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6 (1 Tim. vi. 12), harmonise with Acts xvi. 2 (vol. ii. 23, n. 5, 94), but there is no evidence of dependence. We know from Phil. iii. 3 (vol. i. 538, n. 7) that Timothy was circumcised (Acts xvi. 3); and that this was done in Timothy's home, the province of Galatia, is confirmed by Gal. v. 11

(vol. i. 182). But if these facts are overlooked or denied by our clever critics, notwithstanding the fact that they have the "gloss to the Epistles of St. Paul," how could Luke have constructed his concrete narrative from such obscure hints? No notice is taken in Acts of the names of the persons who are prominent in the organisation of the Church in Philippi, Phil. iv. 2-3 (vol. i. 529 f., 532 f.), or the remittances of money from the Philippians, Phil. iv. 15-16, and of the hints in 1 and 2 Thess. concerning the circumstances under which the Church in Thessalonica was organised. The only point directly confirmed in Acts is the fact that Paul went to Thessalonica from Philippi after he had been maltreated in the latter city (1 Thess. ii. 2). In Acts xvii. 15 f., xviii. 5, Luke leads the reader to infer that Paul remained in Athens alone without his two helpers, and that these did not join him again until after his arrival in Corinth (vol. i. 205, 210 f.), which is directly opposed to 1 Thess. ii. 17-iii. 6,—a contradiction for which there is no conceivable reason, while there is no contradiction between Paul and Acts with regard to the history of the Corinthian Church (vol. i. 265); their statements are as mutually independent of each other as they could well be. What we learn from 1 Cor. i. 1, 14, xvi. 19, regarding Sosthenes, Crispus, Aquila, and Priscilla does not in any way resemble what is said of these persons in Acts xviii. 1-17. The names Chloe, Gaius (it is not the Corinthian Gaius who is referred to in Acts xix. 29, xx. 4), Stephanas, Achaicus, and Fortunatus do not occur in Acts (cf. 1 Cor. i. 11, 14-16, xvi. 15-17). The description of Apollos in Acts xviii. 24-28 in every way supplements what may be inferred concerning him from 1 Cor. i. 12-iv. 6, xvi. 12, but there is nothing to indicate that Luke had read Paul's opinions concerning him and the results of his work. From the character of Luke's book, which is intended to set forth the progress of missionary work—from chap. xiii. onwards, particularly Paul's missionary labours—we should not expect an account of the internal development of the various Churches, nor of the heated conflicts concerning which we learn in 1 and 2 Cor., nor of Paul's journey from Ephesus to Corinth (vol. i. 271), nor of the important journeys of Titus spoken of in 2 Cor. ii. 13, vii. 6–16, viii. 16–24, xii. 17 f., nor of the stay of Paul in Antioch (Gal. ii. 11). But even when the development of missionary work led to transactions within the Church of such a nature that Luke does not leave them unnoticed, there is no evidence that he was influenced by Paul's accounts of the same events.

This is not the place in which to discuss the question whether, in view of Gal. ii. 1–10, Acts xv. 1–33 is to be regarded as historical. All that needs to be shown is that Luke had never read Gal. ii. 1–10, or, at least, did not recall it when writing his own account. Here again the proof is to be found in the omission of features for the intentional suppression of which there is no conceivable motive, as well as in the absence of all traces of formal imitation, or of conscious denial, of what Paul had written. There is room enough in Acts xv. 2 for the statement that Paul made the journey to Jerusalem in consequence of a revelation (Gal. ii. 1), and this would be in perfect harmony with the spirit of Acts, where the co-operation of human reflection and effort with divine suggestion is frequently mentioned (cf. xvi. 6–10, xx. 16 with xx. 22, xix. 21 and xxv. 10 with xxiii. 11 and xxvii. 24; see above, p. 16 f.). It could not have been Gal. ii. 1–3 which influenced Luke to let Titus—whom he had mentioned, according to the β text, in xiii. 1 (above, p. 28, n. 6)—disappear among the τινὲς ἄλλοι in Acts xv. 2. In Acts xv. 5 he himself relates how the demand that all Gentile Christians be circumcised was made in Jerusalem as in Antioch, and even if Luke, like some modern writers, misunderstood Paul—supposing him to mean that Titus was circumcised out of deference to the Judaisers—in view of what is said in xvi. 3, Luke could not have objected to it. There was nothing about the Gentile missionaries' recognition of their duty to care for the poor in Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 10) that could displease him (cf. xi. 29 f., xii. 25, xxiv. 17); and if he had wanted to mention still other stipulations not mentioned by Paul, he needed only to omit the μόνον in Gal. ii. 10. No writer who had read Galatians with a view to informing himself from this first-hand source regarding these matters, could disregard altogether the impressive words, Gal. ii. 7–9, in which Paul expressed the recognition received from Peter, John, and James of the standing and independence of his apostolic work. With regard to the apostolic decree, see above, p. 18 f., and below, § 62.

The undeniable fact that Luke did not feel it necessary to draw from Paul's letters as sources, or in any way to take account of them, is decisive proof of his close relation to the events recorded in Acts xiii.–xxviii. Whether the author of Acts was a friend of Paul's, or someone who wrote between 100 and 120, it is inconceivable that a Christian so deeply interested in Paul as was the author of Acts should have been ignorant of his letters, and, if they had come into his possession, that he should have left them unread. They made a deep impression, and attracted attention even among contemporaries outside the circle of those to whom they were originally addressed (2 Cor. x. 10 f.; 2 Pet. iii. 15 f.; vol. ii. 276 ff.). From the close of the first century onwards, the letters of Paul came to be more and more the means by which the apostle's memory was kept fresh in the mind of later generations (n. 24). The relation of Acts to the Pauline letters proves not only that the former was written before the close of the first century (§ 62), but also that its author was so close to the apostle, and had been associated with him so long, that it was not necessary for him to study his letters in order to enlarge his own knowledge of the history. While, on any other hypothesis, the relation of the author of the Lucan history to the Pauline letters is an anomaly, the relation is perfectly natural, if it was written by Luke (or Timothy or Titus). The only source which a man like Luke required for the composition of Acts xiii.-xxviii., and also of Acts vi. 8-viii. 3, ix. 1-30, was his remembrance of what he had heard from Paul, and of events in which he had participated. Naturally, in the course of conversation Paul must frequently have spoken of his earlier experiences, and this is abundantly confirmed by his letters (1 Cor. ix. 1-6, xv. 3, 8, 32; 2 Cor. i. 8-10, xi. 22-xii. 9; Gal. i. 11-ii. 14; Eph. iii. 8; Phil. iii. 3-7, iv. 3, 15-16; 1 Tim. i. 12-16, ii. 7; 2 Tim. i. 3, iii. 10-11, iv. 16-17; Rom. xv. 16-32, xvi. 7). Especially, in times of enforced idleness when Luke was with him, as, for example, during the second captivity in Rome (2 Tim. iv. 11), and during the winter months spent on the island of Malta, perhaps also during the two years' imprisonment in Cæsarea (above, p. 56), we cannot think of a more natural subject of conversation between the apostle and his friends than the experiences of the years when he had been fully occupied with his labours. Upon returning from missionary journeys, and on many other occasions, Paul and his companions must often have given before an assembled congregation a connected and detailed account of their experiences (Acts xiv. 27, xv. 3, 12, 26, xxi. 19 καθ' ἐν ἑκαστον; Gal. ii. 3, 7-9). It is just as conceivable that some of those who heard these narratives, or that Luke, after such conversations, made notes of them, as that a Timothy or Silvanus kept a sort of daily journal during their travels, as did the author of the "we" passages, though, of course, it cannot be proved.

Throughout Acts, as in xiii. xxviii., we note the absence of variations in the narrative, such as are naturally explained by the use of different sources imperfectly worked over. It may seem peculiar that Agabus is introduced in xxi. 10 as if entirely unknown, although he has been introduced earlier in an exactly similar manner, xi. 28. But both notices (the first in the recension β) are in "we" sections (above, p. 4, n. 3). It is, therefore, necessary to assume that in xxi. 10 the author either did not recall the cursory mention of Agabus which he had made earlier, or did not venture to assume that the reader still remembered it. Where this could be assumed, as in the case of Philip, xxi. 8, such references to earlier passages are to be found—in this particular instance to vi. 5 and viii. 5–40. The substitution of the name Paul for Saul, in xiii. 9, cannot be explained by supposing that at this point a new source, in which the apostle is called by his Roman name, takes the place of an earlier source in which he is called Saul. Such a new source could not well begin in the middle of an account of Paul's sojourn in Paphos. A new account does begin with xiii. 1, or perhaps xii. 25, but here we find the name Saul also, xii. 25, xiii. 1, 2, 7 (n. 25). Luke exchanges one name for the other, for reasons similar to those which led to the substitution of Peter for Simon (vol. ii. 219, n. 9). As the apostle to the Gentiles, Paul had always been known by his Roman name, Paul. Hence it was appropriate that he should be so designated in Luke's narrative at the point where he ceased to appear in the synagogues (xiii. 5, ix. 20–xxii. 29) and in the rôle of a teacher in congregations composed of Jews and Gentiles (xiii. 1, xi. 25–30), and became a teacher in the home of a Gentile in opposition to unbelieving Judaism (Acts xiii. 8–12).

If some of the events narrated in Acts vi. 8–viii. 3, ix. 1–30, xi. 19–30, xii. 25–xxviii. 31 were experienced by Luke, and if he had such abundant opportunity to hear the account of others from those who were participants, so that, as seems to be the case, he felt no necessity for using written sources or literary helps in the preparation of these parts of his work, the question arises whether he was dependent at all upon earlier written sources in the preparation of his second book. If he was a guest of Philip for several days (xxi. 8-12), and if, during Paul's two years' imprisonment, he was with him even occasionally, he had in Philip the best possible witness for the events recorded in viii. 4-40, also in vi. 1-viii. 3 and x. 1-xi. 18. What he relates in ix. 31-43 may have been learned from Mnason, who lived midway between Cæsarea and Jerusalem, and who had been a disciple from the very earliest times, Acts xxi. 16 (above, p. 18). If Luke was a member of the Church in Antioch when Barnabas came hither from Jerusalem and settled there, he had for a number of years the opportunity of hearing from him the story of the mother Church. That Barnabas would have occasion to relate this history is self-evident. It would also be a strange coincidence if, among the men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who in the year 35 fled from Jerusalem to Antioch, and there proclaimed the gospel for the first time to the Gentiles, there were not also those who had been baptized on the first Christian Pentecost (Acts xi. 19 f., xiii. 1; cf. ii. 10, 41). Indeed, these men must have related to the younger Christians all they knew. And one of them, Lucius of Cyrene, was still alive when Luke wrote (above, p. 28, n. 6). So there were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word from the beginning for the events narrated in Acts ii.-v., from whom Luke could have obtained his information directly. It is possible that some one of these, or Barnabas, noted down at a comparatively early date recollections of what had taken place during the early years of the Church's history. If Mark planned to extend his work to cover apostolic times (vol. ii. 479, above, p. 50), he may have left behind notes which he had gathered for the part of his book that was never written, and possibly these fell into Luke's hand. But neither of these things can be proved. In order to explain the fact that there are more Hebraisms in i.-xii. than in xiii.-xxviii. (n. 26), it is not necessary to assume the use of written sources showing this characteristic, if Luke heard these narratives from Jewish Christians who were Palestinians, and had been in Palestine, and if he had sufficient literary sense in the narratives to retain their native colouring (above, p. 104 f.). The assumption that the history of the early apostolic age was written in Hebrew or Aramaic (n. 27) is not only incapable of proof, but also extremely improbable; since the "Hebrews" would have had very little occasion to use such a book, and the reasons which influenced Matthew to write in Aramaic (vol. ii. 521) would not apply in this case. A Greek like Luke would certainly not have been in a position to make use of such a book. Notwithstanding numerous attempts to distinguish different sources in Acts, this has never been shown to be even remotely probable (n. 28). The general outcome of such attempts is the conclusion that the author of the Lucan history, who was in reality a man of fine literary training, and an intelligent, thoughtful, and systematic writer, was a miserable bungler. They fail also to explain the tradition according to which Luke was the author of these writings, or to weaken the proofs of the correctness of this tradition which are to be found in the writings themselves.

1. (P. 94.) M. Krenkel (Josephus und Lucas, 1894, S. 1 ff.) discusses at length the sources upon which Luke depended. His method is not to be commended. In the section on "Josephus' influence upon the language of Luke," S. 283 ff., the comparison, arbitrarily limited to these two writers and the LXX (with the exclusion of 1 and 2 Macc., books so very essential just at this point), is put in tabular form. But what value has the comparison when such words as αἰσθάνομαι, γῆρας, δῆμος are found in a table purporting to give the vocabulary which the three works have in common, or when words like δορκάς, δοχή, ἐρείδω, στείρος are included in a list of words supposed to give the vocabulary of Luke and the LXX, not found in Josephus. More than this, the citation of the first of these words, δορκάς, is incorrect (cf. Bell.

iv. 3. 5 with Acts ix. 36). The only list of words which really belongs here is that of the words common to Luke and Josephus, not found in the LXX (S. 304-309). And this would be significant (1) only if very familiar words were excluded, such as are found quite universally in literature since Homer—as ἄγνωστος, ἀνατρέφω, ἐκείσε, μόγισ, περαινέω, πλοῦς κτλ. In this class belongs also αὐτόπτης, Luke i. 2, upon which Krenkel (S. 55, 56, 305) lays weight; whereas it is used by Herodotus, iv. 16; Polybius, i. 4. 7, iii. 4. 13, and frequently—generally with γίνεσθαι, as in Luke. The last passage cited from Polybius (διὰ τὸ τῶν πλείστων μὴ μόνον αὐτόπτης, ἀλλ' ὦν μὲν συνεργός, ὦν δὲ καὶ χειριστὴς γεγονέναι) can just as well as Jos. c. Apion, i. 10, be compared to Luke (see above, p. 82 f., n. 5). (2) It would also be necessary to omit all words, the use of which time or circumstance rendered impossible in the LXX, e.g. ἀνθύπατος, κολωνία, νεωκόρος, ρήτωρ, Σεβαστός, σικάριος, στρατοπεδάρχης. (3) It would also be necessary to compare other authors known not to be dependent upon Josephus, who might show points of resemblance to Luke in content and form: the O.T. Apocrypha, especially those portions of it which are of a narrative character, Philo, the other N.T. writers, the historians from Polybius to Herodian, also the medical writers whom Luke may have read (see above, pp. 32 f., 92, nn. 5, 28). It would be particularly necessary to make comparisons with Polybius, from whom such a writer as G. Raphelius, Annotat. in. s. script. ex Xenophonte, Polybio, etc., 1747, tom. i. 431-602; ii. 1-209, has collected much material. If this extended investigation should show a special resemblance between Luke and Josephus in language and style, it would naturally be explained by the fact that both are in a sense writers of Jewish history and contemporaries. Cf. A. Harnack, Lucas der Arzt als Verfasser des 3. Ev. und der AG, 1906 [Eng. trans. 1907] (Beiträge zur Einl. in d. NT., 1 Heft) received too late for consideration.

2. (P. 94.) In the matter of Josephus' imperfect command of Greek, cf. Ant. xx. 12 (cf. also proöm. § 2); as to literary assistance rendered him, cf. c. Ap. i. 9, cf. vol. i. 63, n. 9. On the other hand, regarding the style of Luke i. 1-4, cf. the conclusions of Blass, Ntl. Gr. § 79. 6 (Eng. trans. § 79. 6); Vogel, S. 18.

3. (P. 96.) The present writer's extended discussion of the Syrian governorship of Quirinius (NKZ, 1893, S. 633-654) cannot here be quoted at length. When Schürer, i. 542 (new, not in Eng. trans.), has nothing more to say against the writer's "fascinating" argument than that, even if it be valid, "nothing of apologetic value would be gained," his criticism is evidence of a lack of regard for an historical investigation, carried out without consideration of desired conclusions. The investigations of Ramsay, embodied in his book Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 1898, have not as yet resulted in a perfectly clear conclusion. Cf. Grenfell and Hunt, The Oxyrhynchos Papyri, ii. (1899) p. 207 ff., among others in Schürer, i. 514, A. 21 (new, not in Eng. trans.). Worthy of note is Origen's exposition of the matter, tom. xvii. 25 in Matt., which is probably dependent on Philo (cf. Forsch. vi. 304 f.). Krenkel discusses the question without any attempt at a criticism of Josephus (S. 61-75). The vain effort to prove that πᾶσα or ὅλη ἡ οἰκουμένη, Luke ii. 1, Act. xi. 28, cf. Matt. xxiv. 14, Rev. iii. 10, xii. 9, xvi. 14, can mean Judea in Luke's writings need not be here considered, since Krenkel does not think that Luke uses it in this sense. All examples of the use of the word cited prove that, in order to mean anything other than the whole world, ἡ οἰκουμένη must have a modifier (Luke iv. 5; Acts xvii. 6, 31, xix. 27, xxiv. 5) such as ἡ ὑπ' αὐτοῦ βασιλευομένη, Jos. Ant. xi. 6. 5 (a modification of the exaggerated expression in xi. 6. 2), or ἡς ἐπῆρχεν, Ant. xix. 1. 2, or ἡς ἐβουλήθη, sc. κρατῆσαι, Ant. xi. 6. 6. The word itself is used with a single general limitation—in other words, it is customary to treat the parts of the world which are civilised and ruled by the Romans as the world proper, and simply to designate them as such (Philo, Leg. ad Cai. ii.), except where the context makes it necessary to say more accurately ἡ καθ' ἡμᾶς οἰκουμένη, Ptolem. Geogr. ii. 1. 1, cf. § 2; Jos. Bell. ii. 16. 4 (Niese, 378), as contrasted with another ἑτέρα or ἄλλη οἰκουμένη, Bell. ii. 16. 4 (363), Ant. iv. 6. 8. Cf. the distinction made by us between the old world and the new world, i.e. the more recently discovered world—a distinction which is disappearing. The limitation of the meaning in Luke ii. 1 to the world ruled by the Romans is clear from the very character of the statement made; similarly in Acts ii. 28 it is expressed by the name of the Emperor. The same exaggeration of statement is to be found in Paul's writings, Col. i. 6; Rom. x. 18; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 17. This, however, is to be said with reference to the alleged unhistorical character of the statement in Acts xi. 28: the scarcity of food, and the consequent rise in its price in Rome in 41–43 A.D., and again in 51 (Dio Cass. lx. 11; Tac. Ann. xii. 43; cf. Anger, De temp. in Actis ratione, 42), must have been due to repeated failure of crops in Egypt, which would increase the price of grain in other lands. There is also to be considered in this connection the reports regarding conditions in Palestine (Jos. Ant. iii. 15. 3, xx. 2. 5, 5. 2) and Greece (Eus. Chron. Anno Abr. 2064, cf. ad 2057). In a metrical inscription from Apollonia in the province of Galatia (Le Bas-Waddington, Asie min. No. 1192 = C. I. G. 3973), dating possibly from the year 57 A.D. (Ramsay, Stud. Oecon. iv. 1896, p. 52 ff.), is found the following: ὅτε βούβρωστις κατὰ γαίαν σαρκοβόρος δεινὴ τε, φόνον βρεῖθουσα ἄλυστον, κόσμον ἐπέσχεε πάντα. Even if the date of the inscription be considered uncertain, because of the impossibility of determining exactly the period to which it belongs, the text does show how educated people in imperial times were accustomed to speak of such calamities. The carping critic must also admit that Luke uses the language to which exception is taken only in reproducing the prophecy of Agabus, he himself adding merely the brief remark that this was fulfilled under Claudius. No details are added, which show how nearly the events corresponded to the letter of the prophecy. This fact Theophilus and every contemporary knew better than Overbeck and Krenkel. How one-sided Krenkel is in his treatment of this problem appears on S. 281, where the frequently noticed parallelism between Josephus (Vita, 3) and Paul's voyage to Rome (Acts xxvii.-xxviii.) is passed over without further discussion, and the dependence of Luke upon Josephus in this passage is denied, on the ground that Acts xxvii. and xxviii. are the report of an eye-witness. Both authors agree in the following points: (1) The dangerous journey by sea from Palestine to Italy; (2) the extreme dangers in the Adriatic Sea, and by night (Acts xxvii. 27); (3) the loss of the ship (Acts xxvii. 27, 41–44); (4) the transfer from one ship to another during the journey (Acts xxvii. 6, to an Alexandrian ship; Josephus, to a Cyrenean ship); (5) landing at Puteoli. It is an unimportant difference in the accounts that Paul made his journey in the autumn of 60, Josephus in the autumn of 64. Nor is the resemblance rendered less striking by other differences, such as that in the size of the crews, Paul's sojourn in Malta, etc.

4. (P. 97.) C. I. L. v. i. No. 136*: de Rossi, Bull. di arch. Christ. 1880, p. 174 and plate ix.; Mommsen, Ephem. Epigr. iv. (1881) S. 537-542; also the present writer's essay quoted above, n. 3, NKZ, 1893, S. 647 f.

5. (P. 98.) It is hardly necessary to prove that the Herod referred to in Luke i. 5 can be no other than Herod the Great, who died in March of 4 B.C. (Matt. ii. 1-19). Agrippa I. (37-44 A.D.), who is also called Herod in Acts xii. 1-23, and Agrippa II. (Acts xxv. 13 [50 to 93 or 100 A.D.]) are entirely out of the question. It is also inconceivable that Luke should have called by the title "King Herod" the Archelaus, who governed a part of Palestine from 4 B.C. to 6 A.D. under the title of ethnarch. For, in the first place, Luke always employs exact titles in designating the rulers of this house, iii. 1, 19, ix. 7; Acts xii. 1, xxv. 13 (cf. per contra vol. ii. 503, n. 3); in the second place, the name Herod is never substituted for that of Archelaus either by Josephus or in the N.T. (cf. Matt. ii. 22) (Schürer, i. 450 [Eng. trans. i. ii. 39]).

6. (P. 99.) The more noticeable resemblances between Jos. and Acts in points of detail are the following: (1) Theudas, Acts v. 36, Ant. xx. 5. 1. The question cannot be here discussed whether the same individual is referred to in both passages, or whether, as Wieseler (Chronol. Synopse, 103 f.; Beiträge, 101 f.) endeavours to show, the Theudas of Luke is identical with the Matthias in Jos. Ant. xvii. 6; Bell. i. 33. Whether Luke himself composed the speech of Gamaliel, or took it from some older writing, he certainly was of the opinion that the insurrection under Theudas took place a long time before the speech in question, namely, before the insurrection of Judas and the one famous taxing, which in Luke ii. 2 he places between 4 and 1 B.C. (above, p. 94 ff.). According to Josephus, the insurrection under Theudas was put down by the procurator Fadus in 45 A.D.—a date considerably later than Gamaliel's speech, and from forty to fifty years later than the insurrection under Judas. The account in Josephus cannot be accepted as of unquestionable trustworthiness. Josephus was at the time a child between seven and nine years of age. Moreover, his reports of the history of this period are extremely meagre; the story about Theudas is a very isolated supplement to the description of Fadus' procuratorship in xx. 1, and is separated from it by the long episode in xx. 2. 1-4. 4. If Josephus is right and Luke wrong, at all events it could not have been Josephus that misled Luke into this chronological error of half a century. No credence is to be given Krenkel's hypothesis (163 ff.) that the mention of the sons of this Judas in the following paragraph of Josephus (xx. 5. 2) caused the confusion of father and sons in Luke's mind,—leading him to suppose that the insurrection of Judas followed that of Theudas. For in this case Luke must have overlooked or forgotten the fact that Josephus, a few lines before, had mentioned the great famine—which, as Luke knew, took place under Claudius (Acts xi. 28)—as well as the names of the procurators, Cuspius, Fadus, Tiberius Alexander, Cumanus, and the name of the Emperor Claudius in Ant. xx. 5. 1-2. Furthermore, the agreement between the two narratives is so slight as to leave it only probable that Josephus and Luke are referring to the same event. According to Josephus, Theudas is a juggler, who pretends to be a prophet, leads his followers to the Jordan, and promises by a miracle to render easy the passage of the river. He is beheaded by a company of cavalry, who destroy part of his company and take the rest prisoners, and his head is sent to Jerusalem. It will be seen that much is wanting in Luke's account besides the name of Fadus. The number of followers which Luke gives (400) could not have been suggested by Joseph ὁ πλείστος ὄχλος, and only frequently used words are common to the two accounts (Luke ἀνηρέθη, Jos. ἀνείλεν, Luke ἐπείθοντο, Jos. ἐπειθε). (2) The death of King Agrippa I., Acts xii. 19-23; Jos. Ant. xix. 1, 2. In passages that precede and follow, Josephus calls him Agrippa. In this passage he calls him simply "the King"; Luke says "Herod." According to Josephus, the occasion of his death was a feast of several days in honour of the saving of the Emperor, at which the distinguished persons of the region were gathered; according to Luke, it was the presence of a number of Tyrians and Sidonians, who, on account of their dependence upon the King's country for their supply of grain, through the chief chamberlain, Blastus, begged peace of the enraged monarch. According to Josephus, the King appeared in the theatre on the second day of the feast; according to Luke, he delivered an oration to the ambassadors before all the people, on a day appointed with the Tyrians for the discussion of the matter. While Josephus describes in detail the splendid garments of the King, and the reflection of the morning sun upon them (cf. per contra Luke, ver. 21), and represents the flatterers of the court as proposing in well-turned phrases an apotheosis of the King, Luke produces a greater effect by the use of five words, in which he gives the exclamations of the people. In place of Luke's impressive conclusion of the scene in ver. 23, Josephus gives the following account: Suddenly Agrippa saw an owl sitting upon a rope, and, because of an earlier experience with an owl which he had had in Rome, recognised at once that it was a messenger (ἄγγελον) of death (Ant. xviii. 6, 7). He was seized with severe pains in the abdomen, delivered a philosophical discourse to his friends, was carried into the palace, was deeply moved by the sympathy of the people, and died five days later. It is perfectly clear to everyone that each story has as its basis an entirely independent tradition, and it requires no great exercise of one's historical sense to understand that Luke has reproduced more successfully than Josephus the spirit in which the event was recounted by those who witnessed it. The "Angel of the Lord," which the Gentile Luke represents as acting, is more natural in the story of the death of a Jewish King in Palestine than the discourses about mortal nature and fate which the Jew Josephus represents the King as delivering. The very fact that Josephus calls the owl an "ἄγγελος" in a different sense from which it is used in Luke's account, would seem to indicate familiarity with the popular account of Jewish contemporaries. Christian writers have transformed the owl again into what it was originally, a real angel (cf. Eus. H. E. ii. 10. 6). (3) The Egyptian, Acts xxi. 38; Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 6, Bell. ii. 13. 5. It is possible that Luke may have taken his short notice, which, however, is connected with another event in a manner hardly to be considered as invented, from the longer accounts of Josephus; but there is nothing to prove it. Nothing in Jos. indicates that the followers of the Egyptian were Sicarii. Indeed, Josephus describes the activity of this body in an entirely different way (Ant. xx. 13. 3, Bell. ii. 8. 10), and does not connect them at all with the Egyptian. Their number in Luke, 4000, agrees neither with the 400+200 of Ant. xx. 8. 6, nor with the 30,000 of Bell. ii. 13. 5. The other points in which the accounts agree prove nothing as to the dependence of one author upon another. Luke cannot win the favour of the critics. When he differs from Josephus, he errs or fabricates; when he agrees with him, he copies; what he omits or adds is due to arbitrariness or misunderstanding; but Josephus is always infallible.

7. (P. 100.) The question whether, before completing his Antiquities and writing his Vita, Josephus read Luke's work, cannot be answered without entering at length into Josephus' attitude toward the religious life of his people, the Messianic expectation, and the Christian movement. He did not understand this movement any more than would the rich, worldly, and heartless Jew of our own time. But he knew ten times more about it than he says. The famous testimony to Christ is put into his mouth by someone else, and there is a suspicion that the same is true of the statement about James, the brother of the so-called Christ; cf. Forsch. vi. 301-305. A convenient starting-point for the discussion of this question is the chapter on John, Ant. xviii. 5. 2, which Grätz (*Gesch. d. Juden*³, iii. 294) declares to be a forgery, while Ranke (*Weltgesch.*¹ iii. 1. 161, 2. 39) uses it as a principal source, instead of the gospel account. It is an episode at the beginning and end, of which regard is had for the popular way of treating history, characteristic of certain Jews. It is senseless to suppose that Antipas feared that John would create a popular uprising, if at the same time he exhorted the people only to righteousness and piety, because this leaves out of account altogether the preaching of the nearness of the Kingdom of God and the fire of judgment. When Josephus makes John teach that men ought to be baptized, "not in order to apologise for certain offences," there is implied a direct rejection of the Christian tradition, according to which he preached a βάπτισμα μετανόας εἰς ἄφεσιν ἁμαρτιῶν (Luke iii. 3; Mark i. 4 f.). If Josephus had read Luke iii. 10-14, it explains the very moderate moral teaching which he puts into the mouth of the Baptist. The variation in the statements about Quirinius in the Antiquities from the earlier account in Bell. (above, p. 96) is explained, if between these writings Josephus had read Luke ii. 2. It is noteworthy, moreover, that the two important parallels between Jos. and Acts are to be found only in the Antiquities, not in Bell.; see n. 6. The story (Vita, 2) of the fourteen years old Josephus, whose advice was sought by the high priests on questions of the law, has the appearance of being a grotesque imitation of the incomparable story in Luke ii. 41-52. The present writer has no desire to argue with one whose taste permits him to regard the reverse relation as possible.

8. (P. 100.) Concerning the secular χαίρειν, Acts xv. 23 and Jas. i. 1, which is almost contemporaneous, see vol. i. 119, n. 7. To this corresponds ἔρρωτα, xv. 29—the verb is not found in the N.T. (in xxiii. 30 it is probably spurious). Leaving out of account expressions required by the subject under discussion, this short message contains the following words not found elsewhere in the writings of Luke or the N.T. (the latter are indicated by ), ἀνασκευάζειν, διασπένδασθαι (only five times in the writings of Mark, a native of Jerusalem); ἐπάναγκες, εὐπράττειν*, οἱ ἀγαπῆτοί ἡμῶν, without ἀδελφοί;

the appositional ἀδελφοί* after πρεσβύτεροι, undoubtedly the correct reading. On the other hand, ὁμοθυμαδόν, which is used 8 or 9 times in Acts, but never with γίνεσθαι; διατηρεῖν, not as used in Luke ii. 51, but in an essentially different sense, and ἐπειδὴ ἡκούσαμεν—ἔδοξεν ἡμῖν, ver. 24 f. (cf. Luke i. 1-3), need hardly be taken into account.

9. (P. 101.) Julius Africanus in Eus. H. E. i. 7. 7-15. The δεσπόσυνοι drew partly from family traditions, partly from chronicles; see ZKom. Matt. 44 f. A. 7.

10. (P. 104.) To Luke the use of the article, with both the name and the title of Isaiah in Mark i. 2, seemed harsh, as did also the bare phrase, "in Isaiah" (cf. Rom. ix. 25, xi. 2). One reads "Isaiah" (Acts viii. 28, 30; cf. xv. 21) as he does "Homer," but "the book of the prophet Isaiah" (Luke iv. 17) is handed to him, and when this and other books are quoted, reference is made to the book (Luke iii. 4, xx. 42; Acts i. 20, vii. 42). Because Theophilus is not entirely familiar with the work, it is remarked, in connection with the first quotation from it, that the book is a collection of the sayings of the prophet mentioned (Luke iii. 4).

11. (P. 104.) Outside of chaps. i.-ii. in the narratives peculiar to Luke, but certainly not created by him, we find such expressions as ὁ οἰκονόμος τῆς ἀδικίας, xvi. 8; ὁ μαμωνᾶς τῆς ἀδ., xvi. 9 (ver. 11 is different); ὁ κριτὴς τῆς ἀδ., xviii. 6; ἐν τοῖς ὥσιν, εἰς τὰ ᾧτα, Luke iv. 21, ix. 44; Acts xi. 22; ἰδοὺ or καὶ ἰδοὺ (apart from quotation) 56 times in the Gospel, 23 times in Acts, often where it is not found in the parallels in Mark (found in this Gospel only 8 or 10 times), frequently wanting also in Matt., Luke v. 12 (= Matt. viii. 2, not Mark i. 40); v. 18 (= Matt. ix. 2, not in Mark ii. 3); vi. 23 (not in Matt. v. 12); ix. 30 (= Matt. xvii. 3, not in Mark ix. 4); ix. 38, 39 (not in Matt. xvii. 15; Mark ix. 15). Passages without parallel: vii. 12, 37, x. 19, 25, xi. 41, xiii. 7, 11, etc. Noticeable is the frequent occurrence of καὶ ἐγένετο or ἐγένετο δέ (often with ἐν τῷ, followed by the infinitive or ὡς ἤκουσεν and similar expressions, or with a statement of time). This is found in a number of different constructions: (a) followed by the principal verb, without καί, i. 8, 23, 41, 59, ii. 1, 15, 46, vii. 11, viii. 40, ix. 18, 33, 37, xi. 1, 14, 27, xvii. 14, xviii. 35, xix. 29, xx. 1; (b) with καί, v. 1, 12, 17, viii. 1, 22, ix. 51, x. 38, xvii. 11, xxiv. 4, 15; (c) followed by the infinitive with the accusative, iii. 21, vi. 1, 6, 12, xvi. 22. Of these constructions only the third, which is (in the first place) found in vulgar Greek, also occurs in Acts and very frequently (iv. 5, ix. 3, 32, 37, 43, xiv. 1, xvi. 16, xix. 1, xxi. 1, 5, xxii. 6, 17, xxvii. 44, xxviii. 8, 17; about xi. 26 there may be a question). The second construction (b) is the most Hebraistic of the three, especially in constructions like Luke xiv. 1, καὶ ἐγένετο, ἐν-τῷ ἐλθεῖν αὐτόν . . . καὶ αὐτοὶ ἦσαν . . . καὶ ἰδοὺ; cf. vi. 1, 2, xxiv. 4. It is avoided altogether by Mark and Matt. The only one of the constructions used by Matt. is (a) vii. 28, ix. 10 (where the correct reading is ἰδοὺ without καί), xi. 1, xiii. 53, xix. 1, xxvi. 1; Mark uses it twice, i. 9, iv. 4; also (b) ii. 15, 23, twice.

12. (P. 105.) For the use of εὐθύς in Mark see vol. ii. 482. Luke uses εὐθέως appropriately, also παραχρῆμα, which is found outside of Luke's writings (Gospel 10 times, Acts 6 times) only in Matt. xxi. 19 f. The strong Hebraism in Mark vi. 39 is removed in Luke ix. 14, as are also the Aramaic words and names, Mark iii. 16, 18, v. 41, ix. 5, x. 46, 51, xi. 10, xii. 43, xiv. 32, 36, 45, xv. 22, 34. In some cases translations are substituted: ζηλωτής, Luke vi. 15 (Acts i. 13); ἡ παῖς ἐγείρου, viii. 54; ἐπιστάτα, ix. 33 (v. 5, viii. 45, ix. 49, xvii. 13, where there are no parallels; viii. 24 for διδάσκαλε); κύριε, xviii. 41 (for ῥαββουνί), ἀληθῶς, xxi. 3 (for ἀμήν removed in xxii. 18 altogether, used only 6 or 7 times in the Gospel). In other cases the Hebrew or Aramaic word, or name, is simply stricken out, xix. 38, xxii. 40, 42, 47, xxiii. 33. In Luke's writings are found the following Hebrew words: ἀμήν, iv. 24, xii. 37, etc. (used by Jesus only in connection with λέγω ὑμῖν, hence not found in Acts); Βεελζεβούλ, xi. 15-19 (with explanation); γένενα, xii. 5 (but in xvi. 23 ᾄδης); πάσχα, ii. 41 (ἡ ἑορτὴ τοῦ π., as in Matt. and Mark); xxii. 1 (with detailed explanation), cf. Acts xii. 3, 4, xxii. 7-15; σάββατον and σάββατα, often in the sense of week, xviii. 12, xxiv. 1; Acts xvii. 2, xx. 7, vol. i. 212, n. 5; Σατανᾶς 5 times in the Gospel, twice in Acts (also διάβολος from 4 to 6 times in the Gospel; twice in Acts); σίκερα indeclinable, Luke i. 15 (Isa. xxiv. 9 nom. Num. vi. 3 gen., Deut. xiv. 26, Cod. AF dat., Lev. x. 9 acc.). Luke and Theophilus, who lived in Antioch, were probably familiar with the Syriac words μαμωνᾶς, xvi. 9-13, and βάτος, xvi. 6 (more correctly written βάδους, SLX, Epiph. Mens. xxii. 4. 10, which is the source of the reading in D κάδους), cf. vol. i. 18; regarding the use of Syriac in and about Antioch see Forsch. i. 40 ff.

13. (P. 104.) The expression ἄνθρ. ἐν πνεύματι ἀκαθάρτῳ in Mark i. 23, v. 2 is improved in Luke iv. 33, viii. 27. In two instances ἐξ αὐτοῦ following ἐξελθεῖν, Mark i. 25 f., is changed into ἀπ' αὐτοῦ, iv. 35 (cf. iv. 41, v. 8, viii. 29, 33, 35, 38, 46; Acts xvi. 18, xix. 12); ἡ ἀκοὴ αὐτοῦ, Mark i. 28, is replaced by ἡχος περὶ αὐτοῦ, Luke iv. 37; in two cases κράβατος, Mark ii. 4, 11, is replaced by κλινίδιον in Luke v. 19, 24, left out altogether in v. 23 (Mark ii. 9) and reproduced by a circumlocution in v. 25 (Mark ii. 12), while the word is tolerated in Acts v. 15 (along with κλινάρια) and ix. 33. For words and phrases in parallels in Mark, not altogether polished in character, Luke substitutes the following (those not occurring elsewhere in the N.T. are marked with an *): *παράδοξα, v. 26; δοχή, v. 29 (also xiv. 13), ὕγιαίνοντες, v. 31 (also vii. 10, xv. 27); *ἰκμάς, viii. 6; δέχεσθαι, viii. 13; ἀποδέχεσθαι, viii. 40, ix. 11 (used similarly 3 or 4 times in Acts); *τελεσφορεῖν, viii. 14; δοκεῖ ἔχειν, viii. 18; *συντυχεῖν τινι, viii. 19; λίμνη, viii. 22, 23 (also v. 1, 2, viii. 33 always instead of θάλασσα in Mark and Matt. and John, of the sea of Gennesaret); διηγέσθαι, viii. 39, ix. 10 (Acts ix. 27, xii. 17, διήγησις, Luke i. 1); προσαναλάσασα ὄλον τὸν βίον, viii. 43; διαπορεῖν, ix. 7 (Acts v. 24, x. 17; in the middle voice in ii. 12); βρέφη for παῖδια, xviii. 15 (i. 41, 44, ii. 12, 16; Acts vii. 19); *ἐξεκρέμετο αὐτοῦ ἀκούων, xix. 48; *ἀναθήμασι κεκόσμηται, xxi. 5; *προμελετᾶν, xxi. 14; ἀπολογεῖσθαι, xxi. 14 (xii. 11, 6 times in Acts). For medical terms cf. § 62. While Luke does not avoid altogether Latin terms, such as ἀσάρπιον, xii. 6; δηνάριον, vii. 41, x. 35; λεγιών, viii. 30; Καῦσαν (in the Gospel 6 times, in Acts 10 times), which are found also in the other Gospels, he does avoid κεντυρίων (Mark, Luke has instead ἐκατόνταρχος, vii. 2, 6, xxiii. 47, 13 or 14 times in Acts) κουστωδία (Matt., but cf. Acts xii. 4); κῆρυκος (Matt., Mark for which Luke xx. 22, xxiii. 2 has φῶρος); κοδράντης (Matt., Mark for which Luke xxi. 2 has δύο λεπτά, which in Mark xii. 42 is given as the equivalent of one quadrans, vol. ii. 504; ξίστης (Mark); σπεκουλάτωρ (Mark); τίτλος (John): φραγελλοῦν (Matt., Mark), see vol. ii. 504. In Luke xx. 24 probably the correct reading is νόμισμα instead of δηνάριον. Neither does Luke use πραιτώριον designating the guard in the passion history (Matt., Mark, John), but only in Acts xxiii. 35. In Acts we have coloniā (xvi. 12) and sicariū (xxi. 38). Otherwise Luke uses Greek names for everything Roman (officials, the military, etc.): ἀνθύπατος, ἡγεμών, ἡγεμονεύειν, ἡγεμονία, στρατοπέδον, στρατοπεδάρχης, στρατεύεσθαι (στρατιά, Luke ii. 13; Acts vii. 42 applied to the world of spirits), χιλίαρχος (so used elsewhere only in John xviii. 12; in Mark vi. 21, Rev. vi. 15 more indefinite); σπεῖρα (of cohorts, Acts x. 1, xxvii. 1, also in Matt., Mark, John); τετράδιον στρατιωτῶν (Acts xii. 4); δεξιολάβος (Acts xxiii. 23); παρεμβολή (elsewhere only in Heb. and Rev.). Likewise for Jewish officials and authorities Luke uses only Greek titles: στρατηγός (xxii. 4, 52; Acts iv. 1, v. 24, 26); γερουσία (Acts v. 21); νομικός (6 times elsewhere, only in Matt. xxii. 35); νομοδιδάσκαλος (Luke v. 17; Acts v. 34).

14. (P. 108.) For the Hebrew and Aramaic words in Luke's writings see n. 12. On Akeldama see vol. i. 28; on Barnabas, vol. i. 30. The translation of the word Tabitha only (Acts ix. 36) is unquestionably correct (cf. Jos. Bell. iv. 3. 5). In xiii. 8 the text is obscure, cf., however, NKZ, xv. 195 ff. To the mind of the present writer, Klostermann (Probleme im Apostelt. S. 18) has, with great probability, proved that μεγάλη, Acts viii. 10, was originally גלגל or גלגל ("The Revealer"), which Luke has misunderstood.

15. (P. 109.) In the parallels between Matt., Mark, Luke there are a few words in which Luke agrees with Matt. against Mark. But in the case of the more important of these there is a suspicion about the correctness of the text, e.g. ὡς ἡ ἄλλη, Luke vi. 10 (omitted by SBL, Old Lat. and Copt.) = Matt. xii. 13, not found in Mark iii. 5; like the preceding ἐγμῆς, which likewise is genuine only in Matt., it has crept into the text of Luke, only at an earlier date, and, therefore, is found more generally in the MSS. Other agreements may be due to the fact that the translator of Matt. and Luke both made the same changes in the clumsy language of Mark; in which process the former may have been influenced by the latter; cf. vol. ii. 574 f., 594.

16. (P. 111.) Matt. iv. 1-11 and Luke iv. 1-13 must be based upon a report by Jesus to His disciples, and this is confirmed by Matt. xii. 29; Mark iii. 27; Luke xi. 21 f.; also by Luke x. 18, when this saying is rightly understood; cf. ZKom. Matt. 147 f.

17. (P. 112.) Feine (Eine vorkanonische Überlieferung des Lc. 1891) constructs, on the basis of material found only in Luke, a Jewish Christian "source," i.e. a source which originated in the Christian Church in Palestine before 70, peculiar to Luke. This fourth source Luke used in addition to the other sources, which in learned fashion he adopted, namely, (1) Mark; (2) "The original synoptic document" (following B. Weiss); (3) "Sayings" (Logia). But, according to Feine, Luke probably found this fourth source already combined with the third. In Acts i. 1-viii. 24, ix. 31-xi. 23, xii. 1-24 he finds essentially unaltered a writing closely related to this fourth source, "possibly" (S. 236, 244) in some way combined with it into a whole.

18. (P. 114.) It is to be assumed that the subordinate characters in the gospel history, who are mentioned by name in the Gospels (Jairus, Bartimæus, Simon of Cyrene, Alexander, Rufus, Nicodemus, Lazarus) were more or less widely known in the apostolic age as members of the Church, as was also the rich, small statured chief publican of Jericho. According to Clement, Hom. iii. 64-71; Recogn. iii. 65-68; cf. Hom. ii. 1, xvii. 1. 6; Recogn. ii. 1, he became bishop of Cæsarea. Of the fifteen Jewish Christian bishops of Jerusalem before 132 or 135 the fourth to be mentioned is a Zacchæus (Eus. H. E. iv. 5. 3), or, according to Epiph. Hær. lxvi. 20, Zacharias, which, however, is only the full Hebrew form for the Aramaic abbreviation; cf. Dalman, *Aram. Gr.*² 178. For further discussion of the subject see Forsch. vi. 291 f., 300 f.

19. (P. 114.) Luke x. 30-37 is freer from Semiticisms than other passages peculiar to this Gospel. In xv.-xvi., xviii. 1-14 also, notwithstanding thoroughly Jewish expressions and ideas (xv. 18, 21, 24, 32, xvi. 8, 9 [n. 11], 22, xviii. 6), a fairly good style is to be observed. Naturally one speaks of heaven and hell (xvi. 22 f., xxiii. 43) in a different way than of the happenings of a journey and of inns (x. 30-35).

20. (P. 117.) J. Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul, 1848, 3rd ed. 1866; A. Breusing, director of the naval academy in Bremen (Die Nautik der Alten, 1886, S. 142-205). In his introduction, p. xiii, Breusing says: "The most valuable nautical document preserved to us from antiquity is the description of the sea journey and shipwreck of the apostle Paul. Every seaman recognises at once that it must have been written by an eye-witness." Th. Mommsen (Sitzungsber. d. berl. Ak. 1895, S. 503) has not increased his reputation by his scornful remark, that "Luke speaks of the Adriatic Sea in the vicinity of Crete, and of the Barbarians on the island of Malta." Even Strabo (pp. 123, 317) knows Ἀδρίας to be the common name of the Adriatic proper and of the Ionian sea; and in Ptolemæus (iii. 4. 1, cf. Pausan. viii. 54. 2) it includes also the Sicilian (or Ausonian) sea. Just as Strabo (p. 123) remarks that the Sicilian sea reaches to the western end of Crete and to the Peloponnesus, so Ptolemæus says (iii. 17. 1) that Crete is bounded on the west by the Adriatic sea. Luke, whose chronological position is between Strabo and Ptolemæus, had no more occasion than did Josephus (Vita, 3) to make an accurate geographical statement regarding the scope of the term Ἀδρίας, but, like Ptolemæus and Josephus, he seems to have made it include the entire sea lying between Crete and Sicily (Acts xxvii. 27); for during the fourteen days (xxvii. 27, 33) after land was lost sight of on the south-west coast of Crete, namely, the island Gauda (xxvii. 16 B vg, also S¹ not Clauda, called now Gavdos or Gozzo), until shortly before the stranding of the ship on Malta it was tossed about in the Adriatic sea. Mommsen's mocking remark deserves even less credence than the claim that Luke included Malta in the Adriatic sea, upon which W. Falconer (Dissertation on St. Paul's Voyage and on the Apostle's Shipwreck on the Island of Melite, 1817, 2nd ed., by Th. Falconer, 1870) based the hypothesis that Melite is to be identified with the modern Melida, on the Illyricum coast. But the inference would be wrong in any case (cf. Breusing, S. 150). Procopius (de Bell. Vand. i. 14) makes the islands of Gaulos and Malta the boundary between the Adriatic and Tyrrhenian seas. That Luke's view was the same cannot be proved. It would be pedantic, in order to make Luke agree with Ptolemæus (iii. 4. 1, cf. iv. 3. 47), to require him to say that during the last of the fourteen days the ship passed the longitude of Cape Pachynos, so that when Paul landed on Malta he was no longer in the Adriatic (Siculum) sea, but in the African sea. With reference to the βάββαροι on the island of Melita (Acts xxviii. 1, 4), it is difficult to understand how Mommsen knows that in the year 60 the Punic language had died out on this island, which was long a part of the dominions of Carthage—its name Melita being in fact a Punic name—and was also an old Phœnician colony (Movers, Die Phönizier, ii. 2. 347–358; cf. the inscriptions in Schröder, Die phön. Sprache, S. 232–235), especially in view of the fact that on the mainland opposite there were extensive regions where it remained the dominant language until within the fifth century (GK, i. 40–42; Movers in Ersch and Gruber, Encyc., article “Phönizien,” 433 f.). Of the twelve existing coins which were struck on the island of Malta between the time of Roman annexation (218 B.C.) and Augustus (A. Mayr, Die antiken Münzen der Inseln Malta, Gozzo, and Pantelleria, München, 1894, especially S. 18 f.), numbers 1 to 4 are Punic, from 5 to 10 are Greek and Latin, and 12 is Latin. Punic and Greek coins were struck contemporaneously. All that Luke says is that the fishermen, sailors, and peasants whom those who were shipwrecked first met did not know Greek. On account of the close connection between Punic and ancient Hebrew, it is quite possible that Paul understood at once the words of the Barbarians (xxviii. 4). The landed proprietor Publius, with whom those who were shipwrecked, or at least part of them,—among these the three Christians in the company,—spent three days as guests, and most of the inhabitants of the city where they spent three months (xxviii. 11) may have understood and spoken Latin, or Greek, or both. Luke shows his knowledge of actual conditions in Malta by the use of the title ὁ πρῶτος τῆς νήσου, xxviii. 7, which is attested for this island by C. I. G. No. 5754=Kaibel I. G. Siciliæ, No. 601: ἱππεὺς Ῥωμαίων, πρῶτος Μελιταίων καὶ πάντων. C. I. L. x. No. 7495, municipii Melitensium primus omnium, according to the addenda to this inscription, p. 994, dating from the first or second century.

21. (P. 118.) The literary relation of Acts to the letters of Paul is not carefully investigated by those critics, who are most under obligation to do so, because of the late date which they assign to Acts, and because of the conscious modification of the Pauline history which they assume. ZELLER speaks very incidentally (S. 518 f.) of “the Pauline letters,” and especially of Gal., as sources of Acts. OVERBECK (p. lix) claims in a mere remark—as if this question were not of fundamental importance in any critical estimate of Acts, that while as a matter of course Luke was acquainted with the genuine Epistles of Paul, as evidenced by ix. 19–30, xv. 1–33, xviii. 24–28, these Epistles were “not among the sources of Acts.” There is, however, nothing added to explain this, which Overbeck calls “a characteristic fact.” JACOBSEN (Quellen der AG, 1885, S. 8 ff.), on the other hand, represents the author of Acts as elaborating the most important statements and narratives even of chaps. i.–xii. from the hints in Paul's letters, while STECK (Gal. 1888, S. 78–151) thinks that he is able to show that the author of the four “chief Epistles" presupposed and utilised Acts and perhaps even the Gospel of Luke (S. 191-211).

22. (P. 119.) The reading ἐπιστολήν for ἐντολήν (Acts xvii. 15 ES¹ "And when they parted from him they received from him a letter to Silas and Timothy") is untrustworthy, and, if genuine, would refer to a lost letter.

23. (P. 121.) Paul refers to his Pharisaism in the description of his condition before conversion, Phil. iii. 5 f.; Gal. i. 14; Luke does not refer to this until much later, and then in a different connection, Acts xxiii. 6, xxvi. 5, and the expression ζηλωτής ὑπάρχων, Gal. i. 14 = Acts xxii. 3, is not at all striking; cf. Acts xxi. 20. There is nothing in Luke which reminds us of the bold figure in 1 Cor. xv. 8. The fact that besides the more common δῶκεν (1 Cor. xv. 9; Gal. i. 13, 23; Phil. iii. 6; 1 Tim. i. 13) πορθεῖν is used twice by Paul (Gal. i. 13, 23) and once by Luke (Acts ix. 21) proves nothing; Philo also, c. Flacc. viii., calls the Jew baiting in Alexandria πορθεῖν Ἰουδαίους. In the description of the flight from Damascus in Acts ix. 24 f. and 2 Cor. xi. 32 all the words are different, until the designation of the city wall, which it was necessary for both to mention, and except χαλᾶν, which is used by Luke elsewhere (Luke v. 4, 5; Acts xxvii. 17, 30); Paul: ἐφρούρει τὴν πόλιν . . . πιάσαι με. διὰ θυρίδος ἐν σαργάνῃ. διὰ τοῦ τείχους; Luke: παρετηροῦντο τὰς πύλας ἡμέρας τε καὶ νυκτός, ὅπως αὐτὸν ἀνέλωσιν, λαβόντες δὲ . . . νυκτός διὰ τοῦ τείχους καθῆσαν αὐτὸν χαλάσαντες ἐν σπυρίδι. (On this point cf. NKZ, xv. 34-41.)

24. (P. 125.) Clement of Rome possesses independent knowledge about the end of Paul's life (1 Cor. v.; vol. ii. 68 f.), but nevertheless refers the Corinthians in chap. xlvii. to 1 Cor., as if it were the first letter in a collection of Pauline letters (cf. GK, i. 812 f.). Ignatius (Eph. xii. 2; Rom. iv. 3) and Polycarp (Phil. iii. 2, xi. 3) uniformly treat Paul as the author of the letters that pass under his name (vol. i. 535, n. 3; GK, i. 811-822), although they were not unfamiliar with Acts (GK, i. 923). Marcion confines himself entirely to the letters, and leaves Acts out of account altogether. The schools of Basilides and Valentinus made large use of the Epistles, while it is impossible to prove certainly that they utilised Acts (GK, ii. 751-763, 773). In the Acts of Paul, including the Acts of Thecla and in the Gnostic Acts of Peter, we find the Epistles of Paul just as much noticed or imitated as Acts (GK, ii. 854 f., 887-889, 903-909, i. 783, 787-789).

25. (P. 127.) On p. 127 above, in xii. 25-xiii. 9, the a text is presupposed. S³ and p have ὁ ἐπικαλούμενος Παῦλος after Σαῦλος in xii. 25, and the latter alone, Παῖλος instead of Σαῦλος in xiii. i, 2 also, but see p. 28, n. 6 above. If, in view of xi. 25, 30, it is probable that Σαῦλος was used in Antioch when Paul first came to the city, the scantily attested Παῖλος in xiii. 1, 2 is improbable, and for the recurrence of Σαῦλος in xiii. 7 there is no sufficient reason, and the addition in xii. 25 is superfluous. For the two names see vol. i. 69 f. It is very possible that Paul's own companions, Barnabas and Mark, up to this time had used Aramaic in conversing with him, hence had called him Σαῦλος. From the time, however, when they found it necessary to use Greek they called him Παῦλος.

26. (P. 129.) The following are Hebraistic expressions in Acts i.-xii. :

διὰ χειρὸς (χειρῶν), ii. 23, v. 12, vii. 25, xi. 30; cf. ἐν or σὺν χειρί, vii. 35, also xiv. 3, xv. 23, xix. 11; ἐκ χειρός, xii. 11; Luke i. 71, 74, also xxiv. 7; ἡν χεὶρ κυρίου μετ' αὐτῶν, xi. 21, elsewhere only in Luke i. 66, but cf. also Acts iv. 28, 30, xiii. 11; διὰ στόματος, i. 16, iii. 18, 21, iv. 25 (Luke i. 70), also xv. 7, cf. xxii. 14; Luke xi. 54, xix. 22, xxi. 71; ἀνοίξας τὸ στόμα, viii. 35, x. 34 (viii. 32 quotation), cf. xviii. 14; ἠκούσθη εἰς τὰ ὦτα, xi. 22, cf. Luke i. 44; Matt. x. 27; Jas. v. 4; ἰδοὺ, 16 times in chaps. i.-xii., only 7 times in chaps. xiii.-xxviii.: see above, p. 135, n. 11.

27. (P. 129.) E. NESTLE has repeatedly attempted to explain the variations of Cod. D and the allied MSS. from the commonly accepted text in Acts, on the supposition that they are different translations of the same Hebrew (or Aramaic) original, or due to variations in this original (ThW, 1895, off print, S. 6; Philol. sacra, 1896, S. 39 ff.; ThStKr, 1896, S. 102 ff.). This is conceivable, if, with D. Schultz (De cod. Cantabrig. 1827, p. 16), we may regard the text of D as a later form of the text, dependent upon a Syriac translation of Acts; but this theory is irreconcilable with the view that both α and β originated with the author, and that β represents his original draft of the book. For, in view of the language conditions of the time, it is impossible to believe that one so thoroughly Greek in character as the Antiochian physician Luke, the author of the prologue, and the author or redactor of the entire Lucan work, could have read a Hebrew book. To every thousand Jews (Syrians, Copts) who at that time were able to read, write, and speak Greek, there could not at most have been more than one Greek who had obtained a corresponding knowledge of Hebrew or Aramaic. And the present writer confesses that he has sought this rara avis in vain. A few words and expressions were occasionally picked up from the natives (Forsch. i. 41), but it occurred to no educated Greek or Roman to learn their language in a systematic way (vol. i. 34 ff.). Except in cases where a Greek pastor was assigned to a region where only Syriac was used (Forsch. i. 43), this was not done until Christians, such as Origen and Jerome, studied Hebrew in the interest of theology. Among these Aquila would be included, if he were actually a native Gentile and a Greek.

28. (P. 129.) SCHWANBECK, Über die Quellen der Schriften des Lc., vol. i. (the only vol.); der AG, 1847; ZELLER, S. 489-524. JACOBSEN, Quellen der AG, 1885; SOROF, Entstehung der AG, 1890; SPITTA, Die AG, ihre Quellen und deren geschichtl. Wert, 1891; GERCKE, Hermes, 1894, S. 373-392; Der δεύτερος λόγος des Lc. und die AG; FEINE, Eine vorkanonische Überlieferung des Lc. 1891; JÜNGST, Quellen der AG, 1895. Cf. the review by Zöckler, Greifswalder Stud. 1895, S. 107-145: "Die AG als Gegenstand höherer und niederer Kritik." It would be useless to undertake to review the separate hypotheses of the scholars mentioned. It will be sufficient to illustrate the conception of the redactor of the entire work, if attention be called to Spitta's idea of his work in writing down Acts ii. 1 (S. 23, 51). In the A source the outpouring of the Spirit was connected with the choice of an apostle by the words καὶ ἐν τῷ συμπληροῦσθαι, to which the indulgent reader was left to supply αὐτοῖς or τὸν ἀριθμὸν, sc. τῶν ἀποστόλων. At the moment when the number of the apostles was complete they were all filled with the Holy Spirit. In the B source the story began with the words,

"But when the day of Pentecost was now come, they were all together." The redactor, however, misunderstood A, and out of A and B constructed the alleged bungling construction of ii. 1. The only conceivable motive for the retention of συνπληροῦσθαι, which was misunderstood,—also entirely unintelligible in A,—would be the childish fondness of the redactor for this word, which is found elsewhere only in Luke viii. 23, ix. 51, and used here inaccurately, as in Luke ix. 51. For also in Luke ix. 51 it is not the time until the taking up, which is said to be fulfilled,—the natural expression,—but the time at which the taking up occurs. It is the same common shifting of the idea that we have in the πεπλήρωται ὁ καιρὸς of Mark i. 15; John vii. 8, and other similar combinations (cf. Luke ix. 31; John iii. 29). In this way it comes about that a point of time or an event which really marks the conclusion of a period at the end of which these are expected, is itself said to be fulfilled.

§ 62. THE AUTHOR OF THE WORK ATTRIBUTED TO LUKE AND THE TIME OF ITS COMPOSITION.

Assuming that the "we" passages, Acts xvi. 10–18, xx. 5–xxi. 18, xxvii. 1–xxviii. 16, were written by a travelling companion of Paul's, either in the form in which we now possess them, or at least in substance (above, p. 115 f.), it is entirely arbitrary to attribute their composition to some person other than Luke, to whom they are assigned by the tradition, whether it be to TIMOTHY or SILAS (Silvanus) or TITUS (n. 1).

The first two names are excluded because both are mentioned in the third person and by name in xv. 22–xviii. 5, directly before and directly after the first long "we" passage. Timothy is mentioned again in xix. 22 and once more in xx. 4, directly before the "we" reappears. The sudden transition from the impersonal designation of one of these persons, "Silas or Timothy," to "I," which is implied by the use of "we," and especially the contrast between one group of individuals, which includes Timothy, and a second group, which includes Paul and the narrator speaking in the first person (Acts xx. 4–6), would not only make the narrative incredibly awkward, or introduce into it a needless element of mystery, but would be positively meaningless (above, p. 86 f., nn. 11-13). Moreover, if the "we" in xi. 27 is original (above, p. 4, n. 3; 28, n. 6), Silas and Timothy are excluded. Silas was not at this time a resident of Antioch, but of Jerusalem (xv. 22), and Timothy had not yet become a Christian; for it was not until very much later that the gospel reached the province where he lived (xiv. 6; xvi. 1).

Furthermore, Silas is not mentioned as one of Paul's companions in any of the letters written from Rome. But, according to Acts xxvii. 1-xxviii. 16, the narrator accompanied Paul to Rome, and, unless we assume that a strange accident took place, he was, like Aristarchus (xxvii. 2), whom we meet again in Col. iv. 10, Philem. 24, one of the persons mentioned in Col. i. 1, iv. 7-14; Philem. 1, 23 f.

Since Paul took Titus with him from Antioch to the apostolic council after the first missionary journey (Gal. ii. 1), possibly he may be concealed behind the "we" of Acts xi. 27. Since, moreover, he is not mentioned at all in the prevailing text of Acts (see, however, above, p. 28, n. 6), some of the difficulties disappear in which we are involved when we assume that the "we" passages were written by Silas or Timothy. But Titus could not have been the author of the "we" passages, because there is nothing to indicate that he accompanied Paul to Rome, or was with him there during the first imprisonment.

It has already been remarked (above, p. 117) that, if, without reference to the ancient tradition, we were under necessity of conjecturing which one of Paul's friends who were with him in Rome wrote the account of the journey in Acts xxvii., the choice would most naturally fall upon the physician Luke. But, in addition, there is an ancient and unanimous tradition which represents Luke as the author of the entire work, i.e. identifies him with the person speaking in Luke i. 1-4; Acts i. 1, also, however, with the person associated with Paul and his other travelling companions in the "we" passages of Acts. It is impossible to explain this tradition unless there are at least good reasons for assuming that Luke is the author of the "we" passages. For it is inconceivable that Luke should be the author of the entire work and at the same time have appropriated for his own use in different parts of his work accounts of journeys written by Titus, or some third party, without so much as changing the inappropriate "we" into the third person. A man with the literary training of the writer of these two books could not have made such a blunder unintentionally (n. 2). Nor could a man like Luke, who was so closely associated with Paul and the events narrated, have endeavoured to deceive his readers by borrowing the journal of another disciple of Paul's and by retaining the "we" used in these accounts. He did not need to borrow a mask; his own authority was sufficient. In this case it would be necessary to assume at once that some later writer, out of touch with the events which he was about to narrate, sought by the retention of the "we," which he found in one of his exemplars, to create the impression that he was an eye-witness. And, as a matter of fact, this is the assumption made by those who grant that Luke was the author of the "we" passages, but not of the entire work (n. 3). But this hypothesis is in itself incredible and incapable of explaining the tradition. One unacquainted with the original work would not notice the fact that in Acts several of its passages had been borrowed, and hence could not in this way be led to believe that Luke, who may have been known as the author of the original work, was the author of the much later compilation. But the same would be true also of the reader, who was acquainted with the original work, and who knew that Luke was its author; since such a person would detect the plagiarism and could not possibly confuse a large historical work, consisting of two books, with a work by Luke of an entirely different character, because of a few chapters incorporated from the latter. Nor is any such deception to be attributed to the author of the Lucan work; for if this were his purpose, then the means which he chose in order to pass himself off for Luke, the friend of Paul, were ridiculously inadequate. In the preface he would be merely suggesting that, in the course of the history which he is about to set forth, he became an eye-witness of the events which he records, and a helper in the proclamation of the gospel. And, indeed, in such a delicate way that modern readers can deny that the passage really contains the author's testimony to himself which we have found it to contain (above, pp. 46 f., 54 f.). When he comes to deal with the events where he wanted the reader to think that he was an eye-witness, when he was not, he would be concealing his identity by the use of a "we," which clearly includes several persons, without indicating the specific person for whom he wishes himself to be taken, and without relating how he became a companion of Paul. Why did he not use one of the unmistakable methods employed by the classical historians, or by Polybius, or Josephus, or Porphyry, when they wanted to make clear to their readers things about themselves and their personal relations to the facts which they recorded (above, p. 86, n. 11)? Anyone having such a purpose, no matter how stupid he was, could not have failed to make use of means which were suited to accomplish it. In particular, judging by all analogous cases, the deceptive intention of the author to pass himself off for Luke must have betrayed itself in a bold use of unmistakable designations of himself (n. 4). The modest way in which the author refers to himself in the hints of the prologue, and the corresponding manner in which he introduces himself in Acts xi. 27, and from xvi. 10 onwards, is evidence of his truthfulness.

If there is no reasonable ground for denying the Lucan authorship of the "we" passages, he is to be regarded also as the author of the entire work. The burden of proof rests with those who deny this claim, not with those who find no reason to question the agreement of the tradition with the witness of the book to its author. But this latter conclusion is otherwise supported both by the contents and by the style of the entire work. Against the proof based upon similarity of language in the "we" passages and other parts of the work (above, pp. 79, 92, n. 28), it is argued, either that the redactor of the entire work introduced long interpolations in xx. 5-xxviii. 31, or that he revised thoroughly the style of the sources which he used. Thus it will be seen that this evidence is met, not by counter arguments, but by hypotheses. The first of these assumptions can never be positively proved, and against the second stands the fact that Luke admitted into his work the greatest variety of style (above, p. 104). His revision of the style of such narratives as he took from Mark was due to the clumsiness of their language, particularly to their strongly Hebraised character. That, however, the account of the journey written by one of Paul's companions would have required as much revision as Mark's Gospel is very unlikely.

W. K. HOBART (n. 5) has proved to the satisfaction of anyone open to conviction, that the author of the Lucan work was familiar with the technical language of Greek medicine, and hence was a Greek physician. It is not to be judged as a coincidence that Luke alone preserves the proverb used by Jesus, "Physician, heal thyself" (iv. 23), that he only of the four evangelists who tell the story of the wounding of Malchus' ear, also related that it was healed by Jesus (xxii. 51), and that in the description of Jesus' healing work he sometimes writes more fully than does Mark, and with greater vividness, notwithstanding the fact that in the sections which he borrows from Mark he frequently omits unnecessary details. The friends of the woman stricken with fever consult the physician. He approaches the bedside, bends over the patient, and rebukes the fever as He does elsewhere the evil spirits (iv. 38 f. = Mark i. 30 f.). It did not seem natural to a physician after the restoration of the maiden to life, that Jesus should first have forbidden those present to make the fact known, and then have given the medical instructions that the child be supplied with something to eat (Mark v. 43). So he reverses the order (Luke viii. 55 f.). Just as in the accounts of cases of healing peculiar to his Gospel, Luke often indicates how long the person healed had been afflicted (xiii. 11 ; Acts iii. 2, iv. 22, ix. 33, xiv. 8, only Luke viii. 43 has parallels in Matthew and Mark), so in viii. 27-29 he inserts such a notice in an older account (Mark v. 2), with the added remark that the person possessed of the evil spirit would not endure clothing upon his body, a fact which has been observed by physicians (Hobart, p. 14). It is Luke alone who accurately indicates that it was the right hand which was healed (vi. 6), and who notes that healing was accomplished by the laying on of hands (iv. 40), where mention of this act is not made in Matthew (viii. 16) or in Mark (i. 34). Luke alone describes vividly the physical side of Jesus' struggle in prayer (xxii. 43 f.). Out of consideration for himself and his fellow practitioners, Luke does not omit the humiliating confession that the believing touch of Jesus' garment brought healing where long and expensive treatment by physicians had accomplished nothing (Luke viii. 43, n. 6). It is even more significant that Luke everywhere avoids the inaccurate popular designations of diseases and kindred things, and uses the technical language of medical writers. It will also be observed that Luke often uses, in describing other objects and relations, words with which a physician must have been familiar in his practice, and which, therefore, occur with very great frequency in the writings of the Greek physicians (n. 5). The crowning proof of the composition of the entire work by the physician Luke is the fact, first, that these peculiarities are found in those sections of Luke which have parallels in Matthew and Mark; secondly, that they recur in other parts of the entire work, or, at least, have their analogies; and thirdly, that they consist of words and expressions which are to be found in the N.T. in no other writings save those of Luke, or occur here with greater frequency than in all other N.T. writings. These facts cannot, therefore, be explained on the ground that one of the sources used by the author of the entire work was written by a trained physician, but from the fact that the author of the entire work—the person who worked over the older narratives of Mark and also of other writers who are unknown to us—must himself have been an educated physician.

It would require a complete historical commentary to answer fully all the arguments that have been advanced against the composition of the Lucan work by a friend of Paul's. While the theologians have persistently charged Luke with ignorance of the historical conditions and personages with which he deals, historians and investigators of antiquity of the first rank, who have gone into the matter with great care, declare Acts especially to be throughout an important and, in the main, trustworthy historical document (n. 7). Whereas all the apocryphal literature of the second century (the Gospels of James, Thomas, and Peter; Acts of Pilate, Paul [including the Acts of Thecla], Peter, John, etc.) clearly betray in the Christian and even more in the non-Christian, characters which they introduce, and in their portrayal of political conditions in Palestine and in the empire, the influence of the N.T., and consist almost entirely of fantastic stories, Luke's account is everywhere confined to facts which we are able to verify from other sources. On the subject of Jewish history from 4 B.C. to 60 A.D.,

Luke's information is independent of Josephus, and for the earlier decades of the period, is sometimes more reliable (above, pp. 95 ff., 131), for example, with reference to the official position of Quirinius and the time when he held office (above, p. 96). It is possible that in what Luke says about Theudas (Acts v. 36) there is a great chronological error (above, p. 132, n. 6), but this cannot be proved from the conflicting account by Josephus. In any case Luke did not compose the speech in which this error is supposed to be found, but took it from some older source which he may not have been able to correct in this minor point. The case is different when he is dealing with subjects that come properly within the scope of Christian history, for example, in what he says concerning the Fabian policy of the Pharisees toward Christianity, prior to the death of Stephen, as distinguished from the attitude of the Sadducees, which alone enables us to explain the entrance of Pharisaism into the Christian Church (xv. 5), and without which it would be impossible historically to explain Paul's development. Here his testimony is historically unimpeachable. Consequently progress in our knowledge concerning Jewish parties is to be made, not along the lines suggested by Geiger and Wellhausen,—by more thorough study of the Talmud or of Josephus,—but by a better appreciation of the words ἡ οὐσα αἵρεσις τῶν Σαδδουκαίων in Acts v. 17.

Luke is even better acquainted with conditions and persons in the provinces and cities which were the scene of Paul's labours than he is with Jewish conditions. The proconsuls Sergius Paulus and Gallio (xiii. 7, xviii. 12) are historical personages, and, so far as we are able to determine the date of their respective terms of office in Cyprus and Achaia, there is no contradiction to the probable chronology of Paul's life and work (Part XI.). In the investigation of Paul's letters we have frequently found the notices of Acts confirmed by inscriptions and writings, for example, with regard to the politarchs in Thessalonica and the population of Philippi (vol. i. 211 f., 532 f.). Here there is no difference between the "we" passages and other parts of Acts. No success has attended the effort to explain the uprising of the silversmiths (Acts xix. 23 ff.) by assuming that it is simply a misinterpretation of an official title (n. 8).

It is impossible to determine in separate instances to what extent Luke, in recording the longer discourses of Peter and of Paul, made use of the liberty often taken by the ancient historian freely to reconstruct their form, in the light of his knowledge of persons and conditions involved. Nor do we know how far these could have been taken from the reports of persons who heard them (e.g. xvii. 34, xxv. 23, cf. xxiv. 23). But it is only necessary to compare the addresses recorded by Luke with the miserable harangues which Josephus puts into the mouths of his heroes, in order to see that Luke was not only much better educated than Josephus, but that he regarded much more seriously the obligation of historical accuracy.

The strongest proof of Luke's thorough acquaintance with what he undertook to set forth is the fact that, without consultation of Paul's letters as sources (above, p. 118 ff.), Luke's accounts, in their main outlines and in a great many of their details, are in thorough agreement with them. In addition to what has been already said incidentally in numerous passages of the earlier volumes, the following points may be noted here. In Acts the progress of Paul's ministry is marked not only by visions and revelations (ix. 3-9, xiii. 2, xvi. 6-10, xviii. 9, xx. 23, xxi. 11, xxii. 17-21, xxiii. 11, xxvii. 23), by notable cases of healing (xiv. 8-10, xix. 11-17), and similar miracles (xiii. 11, xvi. 18, xx. 9, xxviii. 3-6), but also by natural phenomena of the most extraordinary character (xvi. 26-30). But all this is in accord with Paul's own testimony. In addition to the revelation of Christ to which he owed his faith and calling (Gal. i. 12-16 ; 1 Cor. ix. 1, xv. 8), the visions of a later time which he could never forget (2 Cor. xii. 1-4 ; Gal. ii. 1), and his participation in the miraculous gifts of the Spirit (1 Cor. xiv. 18), he refers to signs, wonders (τέρατα), and mighty works which prove his right to exercise his apostolic calling (2 Cor. xii. 11-12 ; Rom. xv. 19), and which, if need be, will again establish his right to punish evil-doers (1 Cor. v. 3-5 ; 2 Cor. x. 4, xiii. 2-10). It shows a lack of careful thinking when the letters of Paul mentioned above are accepted as genuine, but the authorship of the corresponding narratives in Acts, or the entire book of which these narratives are a part, by a friend of Paul's and by an eye-witness of some of these things, is denied, because of the miraculous element which it contains. Literary and historical criticism have nothing to do with the question as to the nature of these events and why it was that they influenced so strongly the consciousness of Paul and those about him.

By the "very chiefest apostles," in contrast to whom Paul speaks of the signs and wonders which were done through him (2 Cor. xii. 11 f.), are meant, not the original apostles, but the followers of Peter, who were not willing to admit that Paul's apostleship was on a par with that of Peter (vol. i. 288 f.). The very fact that in making this contrast Paul calls these miraculous signs τὰ σημεῖα τοῦ ἀποστόλου, shows that in this respect also he claimed to be the equal of the older apostles, especially of Peter (cf. also 1 Cor. ix. 1-5, xv. 5-11). But this comparison is not something new, suggested now for the first time by his opposition to the Petrine party. But, according to Gal. ii. 7-9, at the apostolic council the same comparison was made between Peter and Paul, and the fact that God owned and blessed Paul's preaching in exactly the same way that He did Peter's made a profound impression. Even then this was the effect produced by the stories told in Jerusalem by the missionaries to the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 2; Acts xv. 3, 12, σημεῖα καὶ τέρατα, cf. xxi. 19). There is no occasion, therefore, because of a certain parallelism in Acts between the miraculous deeds and experiences of Peter and of Paul to question the historicity of these accounts (n. 9). If Luke, in choosing from the abundance of material at his disposal, brought out this relation, he was led to do so only under the influence of a Pauline idea, or, as is more probable, by an uplifting experience of apostolic Christianity.

In summarising the main ideas that pervade the entire work (above, p. 69 ff.), it has been repeatedly observed that the author was influenced by ideas not found in the N.T. except in Paul's writings. The claim that Luke represents the attitude of Paul toward legalistic Jewish Christianity as one of yielding to it, thereby sacrificing historical accuracy and contradicting the fundamental principles of Paul, cannot be substantiated. The circumcision of Timothy, which, if it had not actually happened, would be, as an invention, in the most glaring contradiction to history, is testified to by Paul himself (vol. i. 538, 182). The Paul of Acts, who, on the one hand, denies that the observing of the law has any saving efficacy, either for Jews or Gentiles, attributing this power to faith in Christ (xiii. 38 f., cf. Luke xv. 1-32, xviii. 9-14, vii. 36-50), and who will not suffer the Mosaic law to be forced upon the Gentile Christians, but, on the other hand, is eager to keep Jewish feasts in Jerusalem (xx. 16, cf. xx. 6, according to β, also xviii. 21), has no objections to the assumption of vows by Jewish Christians (xviii. 18), and on one occasion himself takes part in such an act (xxi. 26),—this Paul is none other than the Paul of the letters. In fact, Paul never required Jewish Christians to give up the observance of the law. Even in Churches, where there were both Jews and Gentiles, the former might retain their Judaism as a religious non-essential, in so far as it did not conflict with higher ends (1 Cor. vii. 18 f. ; Gal. v. 6, vi. 15 ; Rom. xiv. 5 f., vol. i. 422 f.). Consequently he was able to deny the false report that he compelled the Jews of the diaspora to renounce the law (Acts xxi. 21). He represents his own emancipation from the law as being for the sake of his calling, a renunciation of rights which were legitimate, and of his natural Jewish manner of life (1 Cor. ix. 21, cf. Gal. iv. 12). On the other hand, he asserts with equal clearness that, notwithstanding his inward freedom from the law, he observes it for the sake of the Jews, with whom his calling brought him into contact (1 Cor. ix. 20).

For this reason the so-called apostolic decree cannot be regarded as contradictory to Paul's account in Gal. ii. 1-10, nor treated as an invention, made on the basis of customs in vogue in the Church at a later time ; because, by the end of the first century, some of its stipulations had become obsolete and after that time were nowhere strictly observed (n. 10). The literal fulfilment of all its requirements—in some quarters down to the Middle Ages, and even to the present time—was due entirely to the tendency to observe the letter of this apostolic command. The fact that, in his short account in Gal. ii. 1-10, Paul does not mention abstinence from the four things mentioned, which were not the only, nor by any means the principal, contents of the decree, is no argument against its historical character. For, in the first place, this requirement had nothing to do with Paul's relation to the original apostles and the mother Church, which is the only question under discussion in Galatians. The missionaries to the Gentiles were not commissioned to enforce these regulations upon the Gentile Christians, but the mother Church dealt with them directly through her own ambassadors. In the second place, the resolution did not affect intercourse between the Gentile and Jewish Christians, concerning which not a single word is said in Acts xv. The Jewish Christians who desired to live according to the law, could not associate in social life and worship even with Gentile Christians who observed the four restrictions, without constantly being made ceremonially unclean. In the third place, the decree was no concession to the Judaisers; since the recommendation to abstain from the four things specified was not intended as a substitution of a partial observance of the law for a full compliance with its demands. On the contrary, it was meant to free the Gentile Christians entirely from the legal yoke, which already had its advocates among the rabbis in every city (xv. 19-21, cf. ver. 10). In the fourth place, it represented no compromise between the missionaries to the Gentiles and the Judaisers. On the contrary, while the work of the former was unconditionally recognised (ver. 25 ff.), that of the latter was unconditionally condemned (vv. 10, 19, 24). In the fifth place, it was not a new command, observance of which was made a condition for the recognition of men as Christians. The Christian character of the Gentile Christians is acknowledged from the outset as unconditionally as that of their missionaries (vv. 8-11, 14, 19, 23), and it was not the recognition of their Christian character, but their well-being as Gentile Christians, which is represented as dependent upon their abstinence from the four things specified (ver. 29). Finally, in the sixth place, nothing whatever is said about commands and requirements, but mention is made only of a communication by letter (ver. 20, ἐπιστεῖλαι, cf. xxi. 25), which was received joyfully by those to whom it was sent, being regarded by them as an encouraging word, as were also the oral communications of those by whom the message was brought (ver. 31 f. somewhat in the sense of 1 Pet. v. 12). For this reason it is not to be supposed that the Gentile Christians in Antioch had not heretofore abstained from the things mentioned, that Paul had not demanded it of them, and that the requirement was now laid upon them for the first time as a new burden. If only they continue to abstain from these things (ver. 29, διατηροῦντες), it will go well with them. The fact that the Council in Jerusalem had reached this decision made it natural for the missionaries to at once enjoin abstinence in these four particulars upon the more recently organised Churches of Lycaonia, but that does not in any way affect the fact that the principal point in the decree was the recognition of the right of the Gentiles to live as they had lived heretofore, unfettered by the law, and that the accompanying recommendation of abstinence in the four particulars mentioned set the Council's approval upon a Christian custom in process of formation in the Churches of Antioch and Cilicia. This custom spread in the missionary Churches among the Gentiles. The attitude of the majority in the Corinthian Church regarding the question about meats offered to idols, as well as the laxity of their opinions concerning unchastity, were opposed to the general Christian practice (1 Cor. x. 32, vol. i. 297, n. 7). Gradually the requirements, which from the beginning were of minor importance, namely, abstinence from blood and things strangled, were no longer observed, with the result that the text of the decree as preserved by Luke was misinterpreted and modified in many ways (above, p. 33 f.). Luke would not have incorporated this document in his work—especially in a book intended for Theophilus, who was still outside the Church—if already in his time the progress of Christian morals had made the stipulations of the decree in some respects antiquated, as they were at the time when Revelation and the Didache were written (n. 10).

The Lucan work must, therefore, have been written somewhat earlier than the close of the first century. This we have already seen to be the case, because of the author's entire independence of the Pauline letters (above, p. 118 ff.), and because he had no knowledge of any Gospel written by an apostle, in particular of our Greek Matthew (above, pp. 50, 108 f.). Furthermore, if the reasons for the composition of the whole work by Luke have been shown to be as strong as the objections to it are weak, and if Luke was a member of the Church in Antioch as early as the year 40 (above, p. 2), it is not likely that it was written later than the year 85; especially if that Lucius of Cyrene, who in the years 40–50 is mentioned by name as a teacher of the same Church—therefore at that time no longer a young man—was still alive when Acts was written (above, p. 28, n. 6). On the other hand, it could not well have been written before the year 70. The use of Mark, which at the earliest was not written before the year 67, brings us almost down to the year 70. Luke's intention to conclude his work in a third book (above, p. 56 ff.) presupposes that a period of Christian history of considerable length had intervened since the time the narrative was broken off in Acts xxviii. 30 ff., i.e. since the spring of 63. Finally, a Christian of the age in which Luke lived could not well have the idea that the development of the history of Christianity had reached its consummation before the judgment upon Jerusalem and the Temple, prophesied by Jesus, had taken place (above, p. 60). This would be especially true in the case of Luke, who records more fully than any other evangelist very definite prophecies of Jesus regarding these events. Besides Luke xiii. 34–35, xxi. 6 (Matt. xxiii. 36–xxiv. 2; Mark xiii. 2, cf. Matt. xxii. 7, xxvi. 61, xxvii. 40; Mark xiv. 58; John ii. 19; Acts vi. 14), Luke alone records the impressive scenes in xix. 41–44, xxiii. 27–31, the parable of xix. 11–27, the meaning of which is unmistakable, the pointed application after xx. 18 (Matt. xxi. 44 is spurious), and, finally, the discourse in xxi. 20–24. While the latter has many words in common with Matt. xxiv. 15–20, Mark xiii. 14–18, and has the same relative place in the long prophetic discourse as do the corresponding sections of Matthew and Mark, its contents are essentially different.

According to Matthew and Mark, Jesus did not on this occasion speak of the awful destruction of the temple, much less of the siege, capture, and destruction of Jerusalem. But their words refer rather to the setting up in the temple of an idolatrous abomination prophesied by Daniel, by which true worship is to be displaced, the temple desecrated, and consequently desolated, and to the last and greatest persecution of the Church which will be connected with this event, and which will be ended by the return of Christ (vol. ii. 570 f., vol. i. 226 ff., 235 ff.). Luke says nothing of these things, and gives instead a prophecy of the siege of Jerusalem by hostile armies (xxi. 20, cf. xix. 43), of the flight of the saints from Jerusalem and Judea (xxi. 21 ff.), of the slaughter of part of the population of Jerusalem, and the capture and leading away into captivity of others, and of the permanent conquest of Jerusalem by the Gentiles (xxi. 24, cf. xix. 44, xxiii. 28 f.). Only by gross misinterpretation of the prophecy to be found in Matthew and Mark is it possible to affirm that Luke merely states with greater clearness what is mysteriously hinted at in Matthew and Mark. The real question is why Luke replaced the prophecy of the desecrating abomination in the holy place, with which he was familiar from Mark and from the prophetic teaching of the Pauline Churches, by a prophecy of totally different contents, and why generally in his Gospel he inserts with so much greater clearness and so much greater variety than do Matthew and Mark the prophecies of the fall of Jerusalem. In answer to the first question, we have the fact that his book was intended for a man still outside the Church, who would not be able to understand such a prophecy. Luke here follows the principles of his own teacher (1 Cor. ii. 6-16). The answer to the second question is not dependent upon the question whether it was probable or even possible for Jesus to depict the events which took place in 70 with greater clearness than in the passages quoted from the other Gospels, for example, as clearly as in Luke xix. 43 f., xxi. 20-24. According to the unanimous tradition, Jesus predicted that the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple would occur before His own generation passed away. Consequently, it is presumptuous to deny that He was able to describe this event with the clearness of Luke xix. 43 f. as of xxi. 20-24. The only question is whether in the prophetic discourse recorded by all three of the Synoptists in the same connection Jesus actually spoke what is found in Matt. xxiv. 15-28; Mark xiii. 14-23, or what is found in Luke xxi. 20-24. If the objections to the historicity of what Matthew and Mark say on this point are without weight (vol. ii. 570 f., 588, n. 2), then it follows that the departure from strict historical accuracy is on the side of Luke, who wrote later than the others. When it is recalled that in the same passage Mark interpreted the prophecy preserved in its original form by Matthew, with distinct reference to the later understanding of the Church, and otherwise recast it (vol. ii. 500), there can be little doubt that Luke was led by the destruction of Jerusalem, which had now actually taken place, to report the prophecies of Jesus relative to this event with greater detail and fulness than the evangelists writing before 70 had done, and in xxi. 20-24 to substitute such a prophecy for the one which is found in Mark. The narratives in xix. 11-27, 41-44, xxiii. 27-31 do not read as if they were written after 70, or as if they were the inventions of Luke. The fact that Luke brought these narratives out of the treasury of tradition is itself only an indication of the time when he wrote. On the other hand, the recasting of the original prophecy in xxi. 20-24 was the effect of the events of the year 70.

Whether this modification was due to Luke alone, or whether it was simply a reflexion of the impressions made upon Palestinian Christians who witnessed these events, the present writer does not venture to decide. The latter supposition is the more probable. It was impossible for these persons to watch the approach of the destruction of Jerusalem, and see it actually accomplished, without considering the events of their time in the light of Jesus' prophecy, and without following their development with the deepest interest. It is almost impossible not to suppose that the prophecies among these Christians which are said to have led to the flight from Jerusalem to Pella (vol. ii. 588, n. 3), were based upon the prophecy of Jesus preserved in Matt. xxiv. 15-28; Mark xiii. 14-23, and consisted of an adaptation of these words to the particular circumstances of the time. Luke, by appropriating this modified form of Jesus' prophecies, and by adopting into his narrative a large number of prophecies concerning the fall of Jerusalem,—omitting, however, the prophecy of the βδελυγμα ἐρημώσεως, which was based upon Daniel and unintelligible to Theophilus,—was able to make it serve his apologetic purpose. If he had written his third book, he would certainly have shown definitely how the prophecies of Jesus concerning Jerusalem were fulfilled forty years after they were made. In view of all these considerations, it may be assumed with practical certainty that Luke wrote his work about the year 75 (n. 11).

According to the present writer's view, it is not possible to make any affirmation relative to the place where the work was written. A tradition represents Luke as writing his work in Greece and dying between his seventy-fourth and eighty-fourth year in Bœotia, or Bithynia; this is based upon legends which we must have before us in a complete form before it is possible to determine whether they contain a germ of historical fact (n. 12).

1. (P. 142.) MAYERHOFF, Einl. in die petrin. Schriften, 1835, S. 13-30, endeavoured to show that Timothy was the author of the travel-document, and also of the whole Lucan work. According to the statement of Ulrich, ThStKr, 1837, S. 369 ff., SCHLEIERMACHER, in his lectures, regarded Timothy as the author of the travel-document, but not of Acts; and in this Bleek and others followed him. The view is not found, however, in the printed lectures (cf. his Werke, Zur Theologie, iii. 344-379). SCHWANBECK (Ueber die Quellen der Schriften des Lucas, 1847) pictured that Silas was the author of the itinerary, or rather of the memoirs, incorporated with little change in Acts xv. 1-xxviii. 31. He printed these memoirs (S. 265-309), and added (S. 309-320) fragments of a life of Barnabas from Acts iv. 36-xv. 4. KRENKEL, Paulus der Apostel der Heiden, 1869, S. 214, following others, suggested Titus.

2. (P. 144.) Examples of the mechanical retention by a later writer of an "I" or "we," which was appropriate only in the source of which he made use, are given by Schwanbeck, S. 189 ff. (after Stenzel, Geschichte Deutschlands unter den fränk. Kaisern, ii. 10 ff.), from the annalistic literature of the Middle Ages. Attention was called also to the interchange of the first and third persons in Ezra-Nehemiah, to similar phenomena in the book of Tobit (König, Alttest. Einl. 276 ff.; Schürer, iii. 176 [Eng. trans. II. iii. 40]), and to a curious "we" at the close of the Diamartyria Jacobi (Lagarde, Clementina, p. 6. 1). Jerome occasionally falls into a peculiar style midway between thoughtlessness and deception; cf. Forsch. ii. 88 f., 278 f.

3. (P. 144.) According to Baur, Paulus, i. 17, the author of Acts was very willing to be taken for Luke, whose travel-document he adopted, and with whom he thus identified himself. According to Zeller, 456, 460, 516, with less diffidence he did his utmost to deliberately confuse the reader as to his identity by giving the book a title which included the name of Luke, and thus made the "we" later on intelligible (see above, p. 80, n. 1). Overbeck, xlv., also assumes intentional pseudonymity.

4. (P. 145.) Protev. Jacobi, chap. xxv. 1, ἐγὼ δὲ Ἰάκωβος ὁ γράψας ταύτην τὴν ἱστορίαν; Ev. Thomæ, chap. i., according to both Greek recensions; Ev. Petri, xiv. 59 f., ἡμεῖς δὲ οἱ δώδεκα μαθηταὶ . . . ἐγὼ δὲ Σίμων Πέτρος καὶ Ἀνδρέας ὁ ἀδελφός μου. Clem. Hom. i. 1. Cf. GK, ii. 725 (Gospel of the Twelve, fragment 2), 772, 775, 856-860 (with regard to Leucius as author of apostolic histories). Cf. also the examples from secular literature above, p. 86, n. 11.

5. (Pp. 146, 148.) Hobart (The Medical Language of Luke, Dublin, 1882), with remarkable industry, has collected parallels to Luke out of the writings of Hippocrates (circa 430 B.C.), Dioscorides (contemporary with Luke), Aretæus, and Galen (both about 160 A.D.), arranging them topically, and furnishing a good index, pp. 299-305. A few only can be selected here, partly to amplify and partly to justify what has been said above, p. 146 f.: I. Designations of bodily processes, symptoms of disease, cures, and the like, in harmony with the usage of medical writers. (1) In those portions of Luke which have more or less exact parallels in Matt. and Mark. Let it be observed, to begin with, that Luke avoids the following terms for sickness which are not customary with the medical men, μαλακία (Matt. LXX., Tst. XII. Patr.), βάσανος, βουανίζεσθαι (Matt. iv. 24, viii. 6, ridiculed by Lucian, Solac. 6), and that of Luke terms for conception, etc., ἔχειν ἐν γαστρὶ (xxi. 23), συναρμυζάνειν with (i. 31, cf. ii. 21) and without ἐν γαστρὶ (i. 24, 36), ἔγκυος, σπάρτα, σπένος, which, with σπαργανοῦν also, are all current with the physicians, only the first is found in Matt. (i. 18, xxiv. 19) and Mark (xiii. 17). Terms of a specifically medical character which are not found in the parallel passages are, for example, ῥίψαν . . . μηδὲν βλάβσαν, iv. 35 (cf. Mark xvi. 18); συνεχόμενη πυρετῷ μεγάλῳ, iv. 38 (cf. πυρετοῖς καὶ δυσεντερίῳ συνεχόμενον, Acts xxviii. 8). This last-named verb, occurring 6 times in Luke (of a constrained state of mind in viii. 37 and xii. 50), 3 times in Acts, and once in iv. 24 with βασάνοις (see above), belongs, like the distinction between "great" and little fever and the plural πυρετοί to the technical phraseology of medicine. Even the combination of πυρετὸς καὶ δυσεντερία is quite usual (Hobart, 3 f., 52 f.). Luke, however, preferred the common form δυσεντέριον (Lobeck, ad Phryn. 518). Instead of παραλυτικός (Matt. and Mark each 5 times), Luke always uses παραλελυμένος, as do these four medical authorities—Luke v. 18, 24 (variant readings); Acts viii. 7, ix. 33. Instead of the poetical expression of Mark v. 29, Luke viii. 44 has ἔσθη ἡ ῥύσις τοῦ αἵματος, which is strictly medical throughout. For the accompanying παραχρῆμα (10 times in Luke, 6 or 7 in Acts, elsewhere only in Matt. xxi. 19 f.) as a designation of immediate curative or destructive action, Hobart, p. 97 f., adduces 16 examples from a single work of Hippocrates, 27 from Galen, and 7 from Dioscorides. Similarly ἐξαίφνης, Luke ix. 39 (cf. ii. 13; Acts ix. 3, xxii. 6; elsewhere only in Mark xiii. 36). ἐπίβλεψαι ἐπὶ τὸν νόον μου, Luke ix. 38 (Galen, ἐπιβλέπειν τι or εἰς τι), and ἀποχωρεῖ (of the abating of disease), also find support in medical usage. (2) In the sections peculiar to Luke there occur the following words, appearing rarely, or not at all, elsewhere in the N.T., but employed in accord with medical usage: x. 30–35, ἡμθανής (in an entirely similar connection in Galen, ed. Kühn, vi. 850, vii. 602), καταδέειν, τραῦμα (τραυματίζειν, Luke xx. 12; Acts xix. 16; Rev. xiii. 12, 14, on the other hand, has πληγή, which in Luke x. 30, xii. 48, Acts xvi. 23, 33 denotes blows), ἐπιμελεῖσθαι (cf. ἐπιμελείας τυχεῖν, Acts xxvii. 3; in 1 Tim. iii. 5 quite differently expressed), ἐπιχέειν ἔλαιον καὶ οἶνον. Luke xvi. 20–25, ἔλκος (Rev. xvi. 2 also), ἐλκοῦσθαι, ὀδυνᾶσθαι (Luke ii. 48; Acts xx. 38 of mental suffering); Luke xxii. 44, ἀγωνία, ἰδρῶς, θρόμβοι αἵματος, καταβαίνειν. Further, ὀχλεῖν, ἐνοχλεῖν, παρενοχλεῖν, Luke vi. 18; Acts v. 16, xv. 19; ἀνάπηρος (or ἀνάπειρος), Luke xiv. 13, 21, and its opposite, ὀλοκληρία, Acts iii. 16; ἀποψύχειν, ἐκψύχειν, καταψύχειν, ἀνάψυξις, Luke xvi. 24, xxi. 26; Acts iii. 20, v. 5, 10, xii. 23; πνοή, Acts xvii. 25, cf. ii. 2; ἐμπνέειν, Acts ix. 1; ἐκπνέειν, Luke xxiii. 46 (this also in Mark xv. 37, 39); ζωογονεῖν, Luke xvii. 33; Acts vii. 19; ἀπέπεσαν . . . λεπίδες, Acts ix. 18 (Hobart, 39 f.); ἔκστασις, Acts x. 10, xi. 5, xxii. 17 (in Luke v. 26; Acts iii. 10, on the other hand, as in Mark v. 42, xvi. 8, in the sense of astonishment); εἰς μανίαν περιτρέπειν, Acts xxvi. 24 (the medical writers use τρέπειν, but also περιτροπή); κραυάλη, Luke xxi. 34; χρώς, Acts xix. 12 in the wider sense (Ionic, according to Galen, but used by all the medical men); προσδοκᾶν (6 times in Luke, 5 in Acts, and elsewhere only in two parallels in Matt., and 3 times in 2 Pet. iii. 12–14; also προσδοκία, only in Luke xxi. 26; Acts xii. 11) is used in Acts xxviii. 6 quite in Galen's manner, and close to a specifically medical μηδὲν ἄτοπον (Hobart, 162, 289); cf. also οὐδὲν ἄτοπον, Luke xxiii. 41; τὶ ἄτοπον, Acts xxv. 5 (ἄτοπος in any use is found elsewhere only in 2 Thess. iii. 2). Also πιμπρᾶσθαι, καταπίπτειν, θηρίον = ἔχιδνα, Acts xxviii. 3–6; ἀπαλλάσσεσθαι, Acts xix. 12 (with νόσοι as subject); καταφερόμενος ὑπνω βαθεῖ, Acts xx. 9, are medical phrases. Finally, cf. ἄσιτοι διατελεῖτε, Acts xxvii. 33, with Galen, ἄσιτος διετελεσεν, ἄδιψοι διατελοῦσιν, and in Hippocrates as here a διατελεῖν for fourteen days, Hobart, 278. Cf. Madan, JThS, 1904, Oct. p. 116, who understands ἄσιτος in this passage to mean loss of appetite, resulting from sea-sickness. II. Noteworthy also is the application to other subjects of words common in medicine. If the needle used for surgical purposes is regularly called βελόνη, not βάφεις, and the eye of it is commonly spoken of by the doctors as τρήμα, not τρύπημα or τρυμαλία, and if we read in Galen τοῦ κατὰ τὴν βελόνην τρήματος or τοῦ διατρήματος τῆς βελόνης (Hobart, 60 f.), the wording of Luke xviii. 25 as compared with Matt. xix. 24, Mark x. 25 (following Tischendorf's text in all three passages), indicates that the writer was a physician. If Galen expressly comments on the customary use of ἀρχαί, by himself as previously by Hippocrates, to denote the ends (πέρατα) of a bandage (οἱ ἐπίδεσμοι, and often δρόνια and δρόνη), it is clear that Acts x. 11, xi. 5 were written by a physician. Among the numerous peculiar words and phrases used by Luke to which Hobart further adduces parallels, are : ἀναδιδόναι ἐπιστολήν, Acts xxiii. 33, and οὐκ ἄσμος πόλις, Acts xxi. 39 (both in Hippocrates) ; ἄσιτος, ἀσιτία, τὰ σιτία, Acts vii. 12, from Gen. xlii. 2 (LXX σίτος) ; ἀνέιζεν, ἱκμάς, κατακλείειν, Luke iii. 20 ; Acts xxvi. 10 (Galen with ἐν εἰρκτῇ also) ; πλήμνυρα, ῥῆγμα, προσρήγνυμι, συμπίπτειν (Luke vi. 48 f., words which occur neither in Matt. vii. 25-27 nor elsewhere in the N.T.), συκάμινος with συκομορέα, Luke xvii. 6, xix. 4, often interchanged in ordinary usage, according to Dioscorides. Of course, such words and turns of phrase, found elsewhere only in the medical books (cf. also above, p. 82, n. 5 ; p. 129 f., n. 1), have no weight in and of themselves, but only in connection with the examples previously given.

6. (P. 147.) That the account, not very flattering to doctors, in Mark v. 26 was toned down by Luke as a physician, viii. 43 (according to Tischendorf's text, at least), is an unworthy insinuation. Mark himself does not say that the condition of the sick woman grew continually worse in consequence of the medical treatment, but in spite of it. This in a case continuing for twelve years is as natural as the other statement to the effect that the ineffectual treatment by constantly changing physicians was a serious burden. Here, as elsewhere (cf. above, p. 105), Luke simply avoided Mark's diffuseness. The case is the same if one omits ἰατροῖς—βίον, Luke viii. 43 with BD Ss Sah. Arm. ; for, of course, "no one" here means "no physician."

7. (P. 148.) RANKE, *Weltgesch.*¹ iii. 1. 170-193, who follows Acts in his narrative, speaks, with reference to chap. xxi. (187), of the "simple account of the documents"—and in concluding (191) refers to the entire book as a narrative which "combines trustworthiness with simplicity of presentation." E. CURTIUS, Griechische Gesch. i. 50, A. 18, was not indeed, as Maass holds, in Orpheus, 1895, S. 8, the first to disclose the meaning of Acts xvii., but blundered in transferring the scene from Mars Hill to the market-place. Still it is of some significance when one, who knows Athens as Curtius does, declares (S. 925) that in Acts xvii. "a well-informed witness is giving a faithful account of the occurrence. In the sixteen verses of the text there is such an abundance of historical material, everything is so pregnant and original, so characteristic and full of life, there is such a lack of anything formal and stereotyped, as must be the case if one were relating a fictitious story. It is impossible to show a single trait which might render deliberate invention in any way probable. One must be familiar with Athens in order to understand the account properly." The altar inscription (xvii. 23), which some who could not boast this familiarity have criticised, was cited without hesitation by Clement, a native Athenian (Forsch. iii. 162), Strom. v. 83, and by Origen, who had seen the city, tom. x. 5 in Jo. At the time of Didymus (Mai, Nova p. Bibl. iv. 2. 139) such an inscription was no longer to be found, but only certain forms similar to it with a plural dedication. If one compares with this reference Jerome, ad Tit. (Vall. vii. 707), it will at once be seen that Jerome is copying from his teacher Didymus, on the one hand, and, on the other, from some other Greek who had given the wording of the inscription, in all probability Origen (cf. Forsch. ii. 88 f., 275 ff., GK. ii. 426 ff.). But that Jerome, through his blending of information from two sources, contaminated the text, appears from a comparison with Oecumenius (Migne, cxviii. 237). The latter derived from the same source as Jerome, presumably, therefore, from Origen, the text: θεοῖς Ἀσίας καὶ Εὐρώπης καὶ Αἰβύης, θεῷ ἀγνώστῳ καὶ ξένῳ, which Jerome, under the influence of Didymus' remark, altered to diis ignotis et peregrinis. The inscription, which might still be seen at Athens in the time of Clement and Origen, had disappeared before the time of Didymus († 395) and Jerome, perhaps during the reaction under Julian; cf. Lucian, Philopatris, 8. Among the eminent archæologists who appreciate the great historical value of Acts should also be mentioned first of all W. M. RAMSAY, in the works so frequently cited. TH. MOMMSEN is an unfortunate exception; vol. i. 67 f., n. 15, 392 f.; above, 138, n. 20; NKZ, 1893, S. 648; 1904, S. 23 ff., 190 ff.

8. (P. 150.) Hicks (Espos. 1890, p. 401 ff.) identified a Demetrius who seems to be reckoned with the νεωποιήσαντες or νεωποιοί (the letter N is all that remains of the title) in an Ephesian inscription (Ancient Greek Inscriptions of the British Museum, No. 578, line 6), with the Δημήτριος ἀργυροκόπος, ποιῶν ναοὺς ἀργυροῖς Ἀπρέμιδος, Acts xix. 24, and thereupon charges the author of Acts with having misunderstood the former title, and so made a silversmith of a temple-officer, and invented the manufacture of silver representations of the temple of Diana. Ramsay's refutation, *Church in the Rom. Emp.*² p. 112 ff., seems to the present writer to be sufficient.

9. (P. 152.) The following come under consideration as parallelisms between Peter and Paul: The healing of the lame man, iii. 1-10=xiv. 8-10; in some measure also iii. 12, x. 26=xiv. 11-18, xxviii. 6; the marvellous cure of multitudes, v. 15 f.=xix. 11 f.; the sorcerers, viii. 18-24=xiii. 8-11; the effect of the laying on of hands, viii. 17-19=xix. 6; the raising of the dead, ix. 36-41=xx. 7-12; the miraculous release from prison, xii. 3-12 (v. 18-21)=xvi. 23-40. One hardly knows whether to admire more the art shown in the symmetry of construction or the skill that devises scenes ever new and radically different, unless all this is rather a faithful reproduction of reminiscence and tradition.

10. (P. 153, 155.) Even in Rev. ii. 14, 20, out of the four divisions of the apostolic decree, we find only φαγεῖν εἰδωλόθυστα καὶ πορνεῦσαι referred to, and when Christ assures the faithful portion of the Church in Thyatira (ii. 24 f.) that He lays upon them no further burden, but simply charges them to hold fast what they have, we can understand by ἄλλο βάρος, according to usage and context, not censure or punishment, but only burdensome obligations; and by that which faithful Christians have hitherto had and held we must understand primarily their abstinence in the two points named. These are contrasted, however, with broader obligations of a kindred sort, of course; for it goes without saying that Christ also requires men to abstain from lying, theft, murder, and similar sins. The author thus meets the apprehension, probably fostered by the Nicolaitans,—the preachers of an immoral liberty—(2 Pet. ii. 19, cf. vol. ii. 281 f.), that further limitations and constraints were to be laid upon the Gentile Christians. The requirements laid down presuppose the apostolic decree, and the express setting aside of further restrictions with regard to external conduct presupposes that even before the time of Revelation the two remaining items of the decree were no longer observed in the Asiatic Churches. In the Didache, chap. vi., there is a still more explicit reference to other apostolic commands to the Gentiles concerning foods, besides the prohibition of meat from idol sacrifices; these others were known to the author from Acts, but their observance was no longer insisted upon; cf. GH, ii. 933 f. As a further result of the fact that the prohibition of blood and of things strangled was no longer enforceable and had actually ceased to be observed, arose the modified interpretations and alterations of the text, see above, p. 8 ff. The present writer must not enter here into an exhaustive discussion of the decree. It is sufficient to say that μηδὲν πλέον βάρος, Acts xv. 28, like οὐκ ἄλλο βάρος, Rev. ii. 24, can only mean “no further burden beyond the obligation which you already bear, and this accepted willingly, so that it is in fact no burden.” The πλήν in both passages does not, like ἤ after πλέον, introduce an exception to the negative statement, which would imply that the following requirement was in fact an ἐπιβάλλειν βάρος (Rev. ii. 24), an ἐπιθεῖναι ζυγόν (Acts xv. 10), a παρενοχλεῖν (Acts xv. 19); on the contrary, πλήν, as usual, introduces a matter only more remotely connected with the contrasted subject of discussion, a matter which is not to be excluded by what precedes. This is equally true whether it is an independent sentence (Matt. xviii. 7; Luke xxii. 21, 42; Phil. iv. 14; Rev. ii. 25—“yet,” “however”), or a dependent clause (Acts xx. 23), or a single substantive (Acts xxvii. 22—the ship is not a ψυχή) that follows.

11. (P. 159.) The words αὐτῇ ἐστὶν ἔρημος, Acts viii. 26, are of no service in determining the time, though Hug, *Bibl.*³ i. 23, mistakenly assuming that this was a parenthetic remark of the author—whereas it belongs to the address of the angel—and also that it referred to the city of Gaza, besides tacitly inserting a νῦν, claimed to find in it a reference to the destruction of Gaza by the Jews, A.D. 66 (Jos. Bell. ii. 18. 1). If the second supposition were correct, the phrase would more properly point to the time before the rebuilding of Gaza, 62 B.C., recalling Strabo, p. 759 (μέγιστα ἔρημος, on which see Schurer, ii. 87 [Eng. trans. II. i. 70 f.]). Plainly, however, the reference is not to the city which had no interest for Philip, but to the road between Jerusalem and Gaza, which he was to take, and on which he was to meet the eunuch as he travelled alone. Not in the sense, however, that of several roads leading from Jerusalem to Gaza that is intended, which runs through a sparsely inhabited district (as Robinson, Palestine, ii. 644, 748; Overbeck, Kom. über d. Apostelg. on Acts viii. 26) a linguistic impossibility. The remark is expressly made of the one main road—probably that by way of Eleutheropoli—in order to indicate to Philip that he is not to proceed this time as a missionary from city to city, preaching to the people, but that he is to be prepared for a meeting on the lonely road with something that he does not expect. Hofmann's opinion (ix. 265) that the author would not speak in the present of the loneliness of this road at a time when all Palestine had been desolated by the Jewish war, would not be in point even if Luke were to be regarded as the speaker, and not rather the angel; for it is not to be imagined that all Palestine after 70 was an uninhabited waste. Nor is it obvious that after 70, because so long subsequent to the death of Agrippa I. (+ 44), Luke (iii. 1) would have had no further occasion to mention Lysanias of Abilene (Hofmann, ix. 261). Agrippa II., during whose reign (circa 50-100) Luke certainly wrote, received this territory in 53 (Jos. Ant. xx. 7. 1; Bell. ii. 12. 8), and not only does Josephus, but Ptolemy also (v. 15. 22), refer to the district by the name of its former possessor.

12. (P. 159.) For the opinions of the ancients concerning the place of composition see above, p. 7 f., n. 7. Until the most recent times, it has been argued in favour of Rome that unimportant places in its neighbourhood, like Forum Appii and Pes Tabernæ, Acts xxviii. 15, are assumed to be known. It would be a sufficient explanation if Theophilus had at some time made a journey to Rome. Troas, Samothrace, Neapolis, Cenchreæ, Assos, Mitylene, Chios, Samos, Trogyllium (or Trogylia, Cod. D), Cos, Patara, Myra, Adramyttium, Cnidus, Salmone (Acts xvi. 11, xviii. 18, xx. 13-15, xxi. 1, xxvii. 2-7), are introduced in the reports of Paul's journeys in just the same way as the noted cities of Corinth, Ephesus, Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Rome, or these unimportant stations on the Appian Way. It cannot be shown that there is a uniform procedure in this regard. The Palestinian cities Nazareth, Juda (Jutta?), Bethlehem, Capernaum, Nain, Arimathea, and their situations, are introduced as unfamiliar (Luke i. 26, 39, ii. 4, iv. 31, vii. 11, xxiii. 51), the location of the Gadarene country (Luke viii. 26), the distance of the Mount of Olives and the village of Emmaus from Jerusalem, and of Lydda from Joppa (Luke xxiv. 13; Acts i. 12, ix. 38) are given, while Jericho (Luke xviii. 35), Gaza, Ashdod, Lydda, Joppa, Antipatris, Cæsarea, Ptolemais, Tyre, Damascus (Acts viii. 26, 40, ix. 2, 32, 38, 40, xx. 3, 7, xxiii. 31), are introduced as familiarly as Jerusalem and Antioch. At the same time one may infer from those more detailed references that Theophilus did not live in Palestine, and from Acts xvi. 12, xvii. 19, 21,—remarks which are important for the understanding of the events,—that Luke did not assume in Theophilus' case the same knowledge of conditions in Macedonia and Greece that he himself possessed. Köstlin, Urspr. der synopt. Evv. S. 294 ff., and Overbeck, S. lxxviii. ff. have argued for the composition of the work in Ephesus; or at least Asia Minor.

§ 63. RETROSPECT AND FORECAST.

Of the three historical works investigated up to this point, the first is preserved to us only in translation, which is for the most part faithful, but not always felicitous. The second was not completed; and the third,

which was planned to occupy three books, was not continued beyond the second. The condition of the Church between the years 60 and 80, and the practical needs which the three authors of this period desired to meet by their writings, were not such as tended to the production of finished literary works. Nor could they lead to the production of works which meet our need for historical information. Even Luke, who in nationality, training, and insight is closer than the other evangelists to the modern and Western mind, could not have said with reference to his work: τοῦ συγγραφέως ἔργον ἔν' ὡς ἐπράχθη εἰπεῖν (Lucian, Hist. conser. 39).

All three of the gospel writers had in view religious instruction and religious impression. The character of these books was correctly described by the post-apostolic Church, when the word εὐαγγέλιον, εὐαγγέλια was applied to them. The description was more correct in the case of the first three Gospels than of the Fourth. For, while the last is addressed to Christian Churches already long existant, the first three, each in its own way, are connected with the missionary preaching, which was originally called τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. Matthew concerns himself almost more with unbelieving Jews than with his fellow-believers; Luke endeavours to win over altogether to the faith and the Church a Gentile favourably inclined toward Christianity. Even Mark in his writing does not deny that he was a missionary helper; he has in view primarily new converts (vol. ii. 432 ff.). And so all three of the Synoptists follow closely the main outlines of the history as given in the missionary preaching, which covered the activity of Jesus after the arrest of the Baptist—from this point onwards giving an uninterrupted and progressive account of His public ministry up to the time of His death and resurrection. As is so often the case in the popular treatment of complex historical development, intermediate steps are omitted and the whole progress of events so set forth that the movement which began in Galilee ends in Judea (Acts x. 37-42, xiii. 23-31, cf. i. 21 f.; see vol. ii. 369 f., 377, n. 1, 379 ff., 383 f. n. 5, 459 ff.). This does not mean that the individual writers did not, each in accordance with his own special point of view, make departures from this scheme. For different reasons Matthew and Luke did this in their "histories of the childhood." This was omitted by Mark, because it did not fall in with his proposed plan. But all three of the evangelists made this scheme the basis of their accounts, and generally confined themselves within its bounds. From this it is certainly not to be inferred that their knowledge was limited to this outline—an idea which would mean that the conclusions heretofore reached regarding the authorship and origin of the synoptic Gospels are only so many errors. The correctness of this negative conclusion would seem all the more certain to one convinced of the genuineness and trustworthiness of the Fourth Gospel (n. 1). But it has already been observed more than once (vol. ii. 372 f., 441 f., 556 f., 605 f.) that the premise upon which this conclusion rests, namely, that the information of Matthew, Mark, and Luke was limited to the material found in their respective Gospels, is false.

As is well known, the principal difference between the Fourth Gospel and the other three—a difference which has been made use of in the criticism both of John and of the "Synoptists" ever since the second century—is their different representation of Jesus' relation to Jerusalem. In the synoptic Gospels He appears here only once during the last days of His life, whereas in John there are no less than five visits to Jerusalem (ii. 13, v. 1, vii. 14, x. 22, xii. 12). He is also represented as working for some time in Judea (iii. 22-iv. 3), and His ministry covers at least three Passovers after His baptism (ii. 13, vi. 4, xii. 1 ff.). The opinion that Jesus' teaching covered only one year—which is based upon the synoptic account, and often supported by an appeal to Luke iv. 19, and which was frequently maintained in the ancient Church, notwithstanding acquaintance with and acceptance of the Fourth Gospel—cannot be maintained even when the Fourth Gospel is left out of account. No one of the Synoptists gives a chronological statement with regard to Jesus' first appearance which can possibly justify this limitation of His ministry. Moreover, according to Matt. xii. 1; Mark ii. 23; Luke vi. 1, Jesus witnessed the beginning of a harvest while He was in the midst of His Galilean ministry, and long before His crucifixion. It is not possible to suppose that authors like Matthew, and Mark, and also Luke,—authors who nowhere betray evidence of stupid ignorance, and who, on the other hand, show themselves to be thoroughly acquainted with Jewish customs and with the natural features of Palestine,—thought of this scene as taking place in the autumn or winter. They knew that the beginning of the harvest was coterminous with the Passover season, consequently that between this time and the Passover, when Jesus was crucified, at least one full year elapsed. Moreover, Luke understood the tradition, which he reproduces with the phrase σαββάτῳ δευτεροπρώτῳ, to mean that it was the second Sabbath reckoned from the first Sabbath of the Jewish "ecclesiastical" year—which always fell between the 8th and 14th of Nisan—on which this event took place, i.e. it was just before the Passover. This is not the place in which to prove that this Passover is identical with the one mentioned in John vi. 4. The language which Luke uses in iii. 23 must also be considered very strange, if he was not aware that a number of years elapsed between the baptism and death of Jesus. No intelligent writer would say of a man who ceased to work at the end of the same year in which his work began, "he was when he began about thirty years old." Moreover, if Luke understood the discourses of Jesus' which he incorporated in his Gospel, he must have learned from them—if he did not know it from other sources—that the year of grace foreseen by the prophet in which salvation was to be offered to Israel (iv. 19) in its fulfilment covered a number of years. Even at the risk of being charged with old-fashioned exegesis, the present writer is bound to maintain that, according to Luke xiii. 6–9, Jesus, at a time considerably remote from His crucifixion,—probably during the last summer or autumn of His life,—looked back over a period of three years, during which God had looked in vain for fruit from the preaching of the gospel begun by the Baptist and continued by Himself—primarily in Jerusalem, the unfruitful fig-tree in the vineyard of Israel (n. 2). Nor is it possible to interpret the word in Luke xiii. 34, which closely follows Luke xiii. 6–9—a word preserved also in Matt. xxiii. 37—in any other sense than that Jesus Himself had often striven in vain through His testimony, which was always rejected, to save the people of Jerusalem from their threatened doom (n. 3). That the public appearance of Jesus in Jerusalem, described only by the “Synoptists,” was not the only but the last attempt, is evidenced by the word which He spoke over the city as He rode down from the Mount of Olives (Luke xix. 42), “If thou hadst known (as do the Galilean disciples) in this day (the last opportunity given to thee) even thou, the things which belong unto peace!” Unless there were earlier visits to Jerusalem, not altogether temporary in character, the words of Jesus in Matt. xxvi. 55, Mark xiv. 49 (καθ’ ἡμέραν, cf. John xviii. 20) would sound strange, and one is at a loss to account for the close personal relations between Jesus and several persons in and about Jerusalem, which are presupposed in Matt. xxi. 3, 17, xxvi. 6, 18, xxvii. 57; Mark xi. 3, 11, xiv. 3, 13 ff., 51 (vol. ii. 491 f.), xv. 43; Luke xix. 31, xxiii. 50 f.

Luke shows most clearly that he is entirely free from the conception of the ministry of Jesus, which is supposed to be based upon the accounts of all three of the "Synoptists." It has been already seen (above, p. 106 f.) that Luke avoids giving the impression, to which support is given by the accounts of Matthew and Mark, that all Jesus' activity in Galilee followed the arrest of the Baptist, and why this is so. He separates the journey from Judea to Galilee, which marks the beginning of this and of all Jesus' public work, from its association with the conclusion of John's work, and connects this journey directly with the baptism and temptation of Jesus (Luke iii. 22, iv. 1, 14; John i. 29-ii. 11). He says expressly in one of the earlier passages of his book (iv. 43 f.) that Jesus preached, not only in Galilee, but in the synagogues of all Palestine (above, pp. 64, 88, n. 18). In x. 38-42 he tells of the sojourn of Jesus in the house of the sisters of Bethany, near Jerusalem, a sojourn which cannot belong to the closing days of His life.

But why is it Luke alone who relates these facts, and why do Matthew and Mark fail to relate formally and in detail what evidently they knew? Anyone not satisfied with the answer afforded by the particular purpose which each of these evangelists had in view, and by their common dependence upon the main outlines of the missionary preaching, is at liberty to supply a better answer. But let him also explain why Matthew and Luke tell us nothing of the great and numerous miracles which were done in Chorazin and Bethsaida, and which are mentioned in Matt. xi. 21, Luke x. 13, before the deeds in Capernaum, and why they say nothing about the appearance of the risen Jesus to Peter (Luke xxiv. 34), and of the earlier relations of the four fishermen in Capernaum to Jesus, without which it is impossible historically to understand the account in Matt. iv. 18-22; Mark i. 16-20.

The facts here suggested are certainly not satisfactorily explained by any one of the constructions of the history of the Gospels hitherto brought to light—constructions that contradict the internal testimony of the Gospels and the first century tradition regarding their origin, and which at the same time leave this tradition and internal testimony entirely unexplained. Only when it is shown to be probable that the men whose identity is concealed by the names Matthew, Mark, and Luke wrote after the eye-witnesses of the gospel history had passed away, and that the investigations to which one of these authors refers (Luke i. 3) were limited to the reading of two or three earlier writings, can the present writer admit that the passing over by the Synoptists of important events, to which they make clear reference, is to be explained by their dependence upon sources now lost. Even this does not solve the problem; it simply pushes it back. The question recurs, "Why did these earlier authors, whose writings we no longer possess, make such limited use of their abundant knowledge?"

It remains to be seen whether the investigation of the Fourth Gospel confirms or contradicts the conclusions heretofore reached.

1. (P. 167.) P. Ewald, who considers the one-sided choice of material by the Synoptists "the chief problem of the Gospels," assembles on S. 52 f. of his work (Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, 1890) all that has hitherto been pointed out of Johannine material in the synoptic Gospels, and adds to it, particularly by his reference to Luke xxii. 24 ff., 35 ff., as compared with John xiii. ff.

2. (P. 169.) Rightly conceived in substance, though not in detail, as early as by Ephrem, Ev. Conc. Expos. pp. 166 f., 183 f., 213; Opp., ed. Rom. i. 562 (cf. Forsch. i. 68, 261); Bengel, Gnomon ad Lc. xiii. 7; Wieseler (Chron. Synopse, 202; Beiträge, 165). In opposition to his own instructor in exegesis, J. Stockmeyer, Erklärung ausgewählter Gleichnisse (ed. C. Stockmeyer, 1897), S. 251-260, and Hofmann, N.T. viii. 351 ff., who reject this interpretation, the present writer must remark that: (1) The tree is planted in the vineyard, the vineyard is expressly spoken of as belonging to the owner of the tree, and the gardener is particularly called an ἀμπελουργός, although in the parable he has to do only with the fig-tree. It cannot possibly be that all this expresses merely the thought that the tree stood on well prepared soil and in a sheltered position (as Stockmeyer, S. 254). The vineyard, which is so significantly prominent in the parable, is an established figure for the Jewish people (Isa. v. 1-7, xxvii. 2-6; Matt. xxi. 33-46; Luke xx. 9-16). The fig-tree within it, therefore, cannot mean Israel again, but only Jerusalem. (2) This is confirmed by the story in Matt. xxi. 18-22; Mark xi. 12-14, 19-24, which, in the historical connection, can be applied only to Jerusalem. It cannot be mere chance that Luke does not have this story, but has this parable as if to take its place; cf. above, p. 102. (3) That Luke himself had Jerusalem in mind is shown by his attaching the parable to xiii. 1-5—a passage that refers to two calamities in this city which were admonitory to repentance. As there is no note of time in xiii. 6, the connection must have been occasioned by the thought relationship between the passages. Jerusalem is again mentioned directly afterwards in xiii. 22, 33-35. (4) As the owner of the vineyard stands for God, and the vine-dresser puts in a good word for the tree at the end of the three years, one might be inclined to take the three years as denoting the centuries during which God had often visited His people seeking fruit (Luke xx. 10 ff.). But, in the first place, Jerusalem and not Israel is under discussion. Even if this city was peculiarly to blame for the ill-success of these prophetic visitations (Luke xiii. 33 f.), still the visitations concerned not Jerusalem but the whole people. In the second place, Luke represents Jesus as speaking immediately afterwards (xiii. 34, n. 3) of His own repeated efforts in behalf of Jerusalem. In the third place, the precise period of three years seems strangely chosen, and the explanation from Lev. xix. 23 ff.; Judg. ix. 27; Jos. Ant. iv. 8. 19 (Hofmann, viii. 352) is unsatisfactory. On the other hand, one cannot identify offhand the three years of the passage with the three years of Jesus' public ministry, or even find an allusion in them to the three visits of Jesus to Jerusalem, separated each from the other by a year's interval. The latter finds no support in ver. 7, for the owner says simply that three years have now passed since he began looking—who knows how often?—to see if the tree would not at last bear fruit. (Here, too, we must remember that the fig-tree bears at very different seasons, cf. Winer, Realb. i. 367). The former would lead us to reckon the three years from the Passover of John ii. 13, and with a correct understanding of the Fourth Gospel they would end with the Passover of John xii. 1 ff. We should then be transferred by the parable to a point immediately before the last Passover, about the time of Luke xviii. 31-xix. 28, or xix. 41-44, or John xi. 55. But from the surroundings in which Luke has placed the parable (cf. also xiii. 31-33) the reader must rather infer that a considerable time was yet to elapse before the end. That the fourth year, which, from the analogy of the three years, should be in this case a plain statement of actual time, should answer in reality to the period of some forty years until the execution of judgment upon Jerusalem, is inconceivable. Jesus did not announce that this judgment would come in the following year, but simply that it would be within the experience of His contemporaries. We must, therefore, seek another starting-point in the count of years, namely, that indicated in Luke iii. 1-6. According to Luke himself, Jesus represented the appearance of John the Baptist as the beginning of the new epoch of revelation (xvi. 16, cf. iii. 18, vii. 27-35, xx. 3-7; Acts i. 5, 22). Through John, too, God had sought for fruit, and had threatened the destruction of the barren trees (iii. 8 f.), but without any effect upon the leaders of the people (vii. 30, xx. 4-7; Matt. xxi. 24-32), whose chief seat was at Jerusalem. The rulers there rejected the double testimony of the Baptist and of Jesus (John iii. 11, v. 33-36). To give John's testimony a peculiar reference to Jerusalem was all the more warranted, as he had never worked in Galilee, but always in the neighbourhood of the city (Matt. iii. 1, 5; Mark i. 5; Luke iii. 3; John i. 28, iii. 23-iv. 1, x. 40). John appeared several months at least, and perhaps a whole year, before Jesus' first visit at the feast in Jerusalem (John ii. 13). Jesus, therefore, can have spoken this parable about the time of the Passover next before His last—the one He did not attend (John vi. 4)—or, as the present writer considers more probable, about the time of the following Feast of Tabernacles, when He had already fixed His eye upon a later festival as the time of decision (John vii. 8). Not all hope has disappeared as yet; Jesus begs a further respite for Jerusalem—may God still have patience with the unfruitful fig-tree in this fourth year, now beginning or already begun. When this year also is spent, Jesus speaks and acts quite differently (Luke xix. 41-44; Mark xi. 12-14).

3. (P. 169.) While Strauss, Leben Jesu krit. bearb. (1835) i. 444, cf. Leb. Jesu für das Volk, S. 247 f., was unprejudiced enough to recognise that Matt. xxiii. 37 (= Luke xiii. 34) presupposed repeated efforts by Jesus in Jerusalem, Steinmeyer, Apologet. Beitr. iv. 219, sought to refer the ποσάκις to the many summons to repentance which "the grace of God" had addressed to Jerusalem through the prophets and finally through Jesus as well. But the speaker is not "the grace of God," nor, as others have dreamed, "the wisdom of God," but Jesus Himself and no other. Still more impossible is the favourite application of the words to the attempts so far made to convert the Jewish people at large, for (1) the children (sons, daughters, daughter) of Jerusalem or Zion in Isa. i. 8, iii. 16, iv. 4, xxxvii. 22; Zech. ix. 9; Ps. clxix. 2; Luke xix. 44, xxiii. 28; Matt. xxi. 5; John xii. 15, are the inhabitants of that city; so that to put upon Jesus' lips the theological phrase, based on an extended allegory, which Paul uses in Gal. iv. 25, is the more inadmissible because the context in Luke xiii. 31-35 distinguishes definitely between Jerusalem and other sections of the Holy Land. In Matt. xxiii. 37 also the city is first addressed twice by name and in the singular, and not until her children have been mentioned do we come, with ἠθελήσατε, to the plural address. Just as plainly as the "thou" is identical with the "ye," is Jerusalem (and the Jewish people is never called by that name) identical with her children, that is, the city with its inhabitants. But (2), and most important, ποσάκις does not mean "how long" or "for how many months or years," but "how often."

X.

THE WRITINGS OF JOHN.

§ 64. THE TRADITION.

ONE who has extricated himself from a labyrinth is wont to breathe a sigh of relief and set out with increased courage upon the way which he has farther to pursue. That is the natural feeling which the investigator has in passing from his study of the oldest historical literature of the apostolic age to the latest writings of the N.T. which bear the name of John, in particular to the Gospel of John, which follows the other three Gospels and is known as the Fourth. In the case of the others the inexperienced observer is confused by a mass of material practically identical in contents and language, the similarities of which are as difficult to explain as the corresponding differences. In the Fourth Gospel, on the other hand, we have an entirely distinct work, which never gives the impression made by the earlier Gospels, of being only another variation of the common primitive form.

Because John is an independent work, it follows at once that traces of its existence and influence in the Church are much clearer than in the case of the Synoptics (n. 1). When the reader finds, for example, in Clement of Rome, or Polycarp, a saying of Jesus which is to be found in similar form in Matthew, and also in Mark or Luke, he is unable to determine from which one of these sources it is taken, or whether it may not possibly be derived from a lost Gospel, or even from the oral tradition. That which bears the Johannine stamp cannot be mistaken for or confused with anything else. It must also be remembered that the tradition concerning the origin of John's writings goes back much nearer to the time and place of their origin than does the tradition concerning the origin of the other historical books. We have no tradition concerning Matthew and Luke which can be proved to have originated in the place where these books were written and among the disciples of the men who wrote them. In fact we are compelled to conjecture the place where these books originated from their contents alone, or from traditions of a comparatively late date. The situation with regard to Mark is not much more favourable as regards this point. The Johannine writings, on the other hand, originated in the province of Asia, and for this information we are not dependent upon tradition alone. It is unmistakably affirmed in Revelation, and the tradition is entirely confirmed in this point by the contents of the Gospel and the Epistles. In this same province also we find living until far on in the second century personal disciples of the John of Ephesus, to whom these writings are ascribed. Some of these are bishops, as Papias in Hierapolis and Polycarp in Smyrna; others are not mentioned by name, but associated by Irenæus, the personal disciple of Polycarp, with Papias and Polycarp, and called "the elders" (οἱ πρεσβύτεροι, seniores). The fact that John lived to an extreme age and was still alive at the beginning of Trajan's reign (98–117), dying, therefore, about the year 100, and the fact that Polycarp died in the year 155 (Feb. 23) at a very great age,—86 years after his baptism, which must have taken place, therefore, in the year 69,—gives us an unbroken tradition from Jesus to Irenæus, i.e. from 30 to 180, with only two links between them, namely, John of Ephesus and Polycarp of Smyrna. Naturally there were numerous other lines of connection between Irenæus and his contemporaries and the representatives of the apostolic generation in Asia Minor (Philip in Hierapolis, Aristion, see vol. ii. 436 f.), and doubtless in most cases there were more links in the chain than in the case of this one of four links, which we are able to establish biographically (n. 2).

The first clear traces of the influence of the Fourth Gospel upon the thought and language of the Church are found in the Epistles of Ignatius (about the year 110). How unmistakable these traces are may be inferred from the fact that not infrequently this dependence of Ignatius upon John has been used as an argument against the genuineness and antiquity of the Ignatian letters. It is possible, if one is disposed to do so, to assume that the resemblance of passages in Clement of Rome (circa 96), in the Shepherd of Hermas (circa 100), in the Didache (circa 110), in the so-called Second Epistle of Clement (circa 120), in the Epistle of Barnabas (circa 130), in the Protevangelium of James, and the fragments of Basilides, to passages in the Fourth Gospel presupposes no more than the pre-existence of Johannine ideas and expressions, but in the majority of these cases the more natural explanation is acquaintanceship with the Fourth Gospel (GK, i. 767, 906-912, 915). On the other hand, it is certainly proved that Valentinus, who must have developed his system before the year 140, outlined his list of æons under the dominating influence of the Johannine prologue (GK, i. 736-739), and that the entire school of Valentinus valued the Fourth Gospel highly, and regarded it as the work of an apostle. One of the leaders of this school, Heracleon, wrote a commentary on this Gospel in the year 160, important fragments of which are preserved to us by Origen (GK, i. 732-739, ii. 956-960). The whole of John xiii. 4-xv. 34, xv. 19, possibly also portions of John vi. 33 ff., were found in Marcion's Gospel, and it cannot be proved that these passages were incorporated into this Gospel by his disciples and not by Marcion himself, about 145, with whose ideas they agreed perfectly (GK, i. 663 ff., 675–680). Not a few passages were appropriated from the Fourth Gospel by others, who prepared new Gospels and apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, e.g. the unknown author of the Gospel of Peter (about 150), and Leucius, the alleged disciple of John, in the Acts of John and of Peter (between 160 and 170). Among other things, Leucius represents Peter as developing his ideas concerning the limited value of the written Gospel on the basis of John xxi. 25 and 1 John i.–iv. (Forsch. vi. 195 f.). Justin, who wrote the works, which have come down to us, between 150 and 160, knew the Fourth Gospel as the composition of apostles and their disciples, which was also in use in religious services in his time (GK, i. 516–533). Since Justin lived in Ephesus between 130 and 135, and became a Christian there, his knowledge concerning the Gospels and their use in the Church was derived from this period and region.

From the beginning of the controversy about the time of the Easter celebration, which broke out in the province of Asia between 160 and 170 A.D., the equal authority of the Fourth Gospel with the other three was presupposed. It is impossible to understand the Montanistic movement which started in the year 157 (or 156), except in the light of the Johannine discourses about the Paraclete. When (170 A.D.), in opposition to Montanism, a party, to which Epiphanius foolishly gave the name Alogi, declared the Johannine writings to be the work of the heretic Cerinthus, they stated their opinion of them in the sentence, "They are not worthy to be in the Church" (Epiph. Hær. li. 3). They made no effort to prove that these writings did not make their appearance in the Church until after the death of John, but, in ascribing their composition to a contemporary of John's, they admitted that they had been "in the Church" since the close of the first century. The Asiatic "elders" of Irenæus appeal to the Johannine sayings of Jesus, as well as to the synoptic sayings (Iren. v. 36. 2; GK, i. 782). The appendix to the Gospel of Mark, which at latest was probably added about the year 150, is based, among other passages, upon John xx., and also upon the work of Papias (see vol. ii. 471-476). The fragments of the latter work also show some traces of familiarity with the Fourth Gospel (n. 3). In a fragment preserved only in Latin, the genuineness of which there is no other reason to suspect, Papias expressly says that John gave his Gospel to the Church during his lifetime (n. 4). The fact that Eusebius has not preserved for us this testimony of Papias is easily explained by its manifest triviality. As a matter of fact the sense of the fragment is excellent; since, when superficially considered, the appendix, and especially John xxi. 24 f., might make it appear as if the Fourth Gospel were an opus posthumum, edited by the friends of the author.

There are two ancient accounts of the origin of the Fourth Gospel. One of these was found by Eusebius in Clement of Alexandria, and is preserved to us only in indirect discourse, and apparently in a very much abbreviated form. It is referred by Clement himself to his teachers (οἱ πρεσβύτεροι), as are the similar statements concerning Mark (n. 5). According to this account, John, who was the last of the evangelists, considering that the human and external side (of the gospel history) had been set forth in the (already existing) Gospels, at the suggestion of his friends, and under the influence of the Spirit of God, prepared a spiritual Gospel. The other account, manifestly also abbreviated and more of the character of a legend, is found in the Muratorian Canon (n. 6). According to this account, John replies to his fellow disciples and the bishops, who exhort him to write a Gospel, with the suggestion that they fast with him for three days and await a revelation. On the very next night it is revealed to the apostle Andrew that John shall write all down in his own name, but that all the others (disciples present) shall revise his writing. If, as is probably the case, this account was derived from Leucius' Acts of John, which were written in Asia Minor between 160 and 170 A.D. (n. 6), it is possible that many similar but more extravagant things which are reported by later writers concerning the origin of John were largely derived from this same book of Leucius, which, notwithstanding its Gnostic character, was much read. Most of these accounts agree in representing the bishops of Asia as sent by their Churches to urge John to write, and in representing the prevailing heresies as creating a feeling that a new Gospel was needed. By some no specific heresies are mentioned (Cat. in Jo., n. 4); others mention Cerinthus and Ebion (Epiph. Hær. li. 2. 12; Jerome, Vir. Ill. ix.). Quite anachronistically mention is made also of Valentinus (Victorinus on Rev. xi. 1), or in lieu of all others, Marcion (Argum. in Jo., see n. 4). But even Irenæus, who elsewhere shows no traces of this legendary story, is confident that John wrote his Gospel in conscious opposition to his contemporary Cerinthus, and the still earlier Gnostic teaching of Nicolaüs (n. 7).

All tradition which is ancient and in general worthy of notice agrees in representing John as writing after Matthew, Mark, and Luke, at a great age, and during his residence in the province of Asia, or more specifically in Ephesus (n. 8). As already noticed, this is frequently combined with the tradition held by the teachers of Clement, according to which John wrote his Gospel with the other three in view (n. 8 end). This is confirmed by the fact that the John of Ephesus, to whom the Gospel is attributed, did actually express his views with regard to the Gospel of Mark, and by the fact that, during his lifetime and in the region where he lived, the original of the Gospel of Matthew was orally interpreted in religious services, and finally replaced by a written translation (see vol. ii. 433-444, 509-517).

The tradition of the Church is also unanimous in representing the evangelist John as at the same time the author of Revelation and the Johannine Epistles—and as none other than the apostle John, the son of Zebedee. John the evangelist is called a disciple of the Lord both by teachers of the Church and by heretical writers, and by these same persons he is sometimes called an apostle (n. 9). The first designation is the more natural, since the writing of a Gospel is not of itself the function of an apostle, and since the significance and trustworthiness of a Gospel depend very much upon its author's having been an eye-witness of the facts he records, but not at all upon his apostleship. Furthermore, there was no need frequently to describe John as one of the twelve apostles, since John, surnamed Mark, was known in the Gentile Christian Church only by the latter name, and since down to the time of Dionysius of Alexandria the Church was acquainted with only one distinguished John of the apostolic age, namely, the son of Zebedee, the disciple and apostle, the guardian of the Asiatic Churches during the last decades of the first century, the teacher of Polycarp and of Papias (see vol. ii. 433 f.).

Until after the death of Origen, all the Johannine writings in the N.T. were assigned by all the Fathers of the Church to the same author without question or explanation. When, as is occasionally the case, attention is called to the identity of the author of some one of the Johannine writings, it is done either for the purpose of recalling the various gifts for which the Church was indebted to this one John, or for the purpose of honouring him, or in order to indicate special relations existing between the Gospel and Revelation, or between the Gospel and the Epistles. It is never done in order to establish the identity of the author, as if this were not self-evident (n. 10). This was the point of view even of the Alogi. They simply rejected "the books of John" (n. 11). Naturally their polemic was directed mainly, if not entirely, against the two principal Johannine works,—the Gospel and Revelation,—since the Montanists, in opposition to whom their opinion was developed, based their views upon the Paraclete passages in the Fourth Gospel and upon the visions of Revelation. Consequently Hippolytus writes, in opposition to the Alogi, his apology "for the Gospel according to John and for Revelation." But it must not be forgotten that the criticism of the Alogi applied to all the Johannine writings, and that they regarded the John, whose mask Cerinthus assumed, as an apostle. It was not until much later that the attempt was made, on the basis of one accepted work of the apostle John, to deny his authorship of another writing bearing his name, and to assign it to another John. This was impossible in the year 170, because at that time only one John who belonged to the apostolic age was known. And even as late as 210, when Caius of Rome accepted the negative conclusions of the Alogi with reference to Revelation, but rejected them in the case of the Gospel, he did not distinguish between an apostle John who wrote the Gospel and another John who was the author of Revelation, but maintained the opinion that it was not John but Cerinthus, under the mask of "a great apostle," who wrote Revelation (n. 11 end). The history of the criticism of Revelation, and later of the shorter letters, is an important chapter in the history of the Canon, but does not concern directly the investigation of the tradition relative to these books: for the reason that from the very outset this criticism is a conscious denial of every tradition. But even this is an indirect witness to the one existing tradition regarding the Johannine authorship of these books.

Justin, who, as we have already seen, became a Christian in Ephesus between 130 and 135 A.D., says that, like Isaiah, Ezekiel, and the author of Genesis and the Psalter, the Christian John, the apostle of Christ, received a revelation and prophesied the millennial reign of Christ and the Christians and the general resurrection that is to follow (n. 12). The elders of Irenæus, "who had seen John face to face," endeavoured to find out the meaning of the number 666 in Rev. xiii. 18, interpreted other passages of the book, and thereby fixed their own eschatological views (n. 13). According to the testimony of those who saw his work, Papias, a disciple of John of Ephesus, affirmed the "trustworthiness" (τὸ ἀξιόπιστον) of Revelation, made explanatory comments on some passages of the book, and, most significantly of all, derived his belief in the millennium from this source. Mark, the Valentinian, who lived in Asia Minor about the year 150, fed upon the mysteries of Revelation. Melito of Sardis wrote a book on Revelation about the year 170. In short, we have an unusually large number of witnesses to the fact that between the years 100 and 180 Revelation was highly esteemed in the Churches of Asia, to which it was originally directed (Rev. i. 4, 11), and that it was regarded as the work of John of Ephesus, who, at the very latest, from 130 onwards, was generally held to be one of the twelve apostles. Between 170 and 220 we find Revelation circulated and accepted in all parts of the Greek and Latin Church as the work of the apostle and evangelist John.

It is a noteworthy fact, however, that the circulation of Revelation outside of the province of Asia cannot be traced back as far as the circulation of the Gospel. With the exception of Papias, the only writer before Justin who shows familiarity with Revelation is the author of the Epistle of Barnabas, who wrote about the year 130 (GK, i. 954 f.). The absence of clear reminiscences of Revelation in Clement of Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp, and the author of the sermon bearing the name of Clement (2 Cor.), might be explained as an accident. But when no reference is made to it in a great apocalypse like the Shepherd of Hermas (circa 100), and by the author of the Didache (probably circa 110), in an extended teaching concerning the end of the world (chap. xvi.), it is strong proof that Revelation was not yet in circulation in the regions where these works were written, i.e. in Rome and (probably) Alexandria, or at least it had not yet won its place in these large Churches. This agrees with the tradition concerning the time when Revelation was written. In a context in which he appeals constantly to the authority of the Asiatic elders, the disciples of John (v. 5. 1, 30. 1, 33. 3, 4, 36. 1-3), Irenæus says positively that the vision of Revelation "was seen" shortly before he was born, near the close of the reign of Domitian (died September 96) (n. 14). A date so definite as this, and one that could not be derived by exegesis from Revelation itself, would be significant, even if found in a later writer, and even if Irenæus did not testify that this was the common view among the personal disciples of the author of Revelation. It is confirmed, not only by the indications of the date of its own composition to be found in Revelation, but by the above mentioned fact that outside of Asia Minor there is as yet no trace of the influence of Revelation upon the Church in the literature dating from between 90 and 120 A.D. It is not until later that traces of it are found. The correctness of the date is also confirmed by all those traditions which refer the exile of John upon Patmos to his extreme old age, or which describe Revelation as the latest, or one of the latest, writings in the N.T. On the other hand, all the differing views as to the date of the composition of Revelation to be found in the literature of the Church are so late and so manifestly confused, that they do not deserve the name of tradition (nn. 8, 10, 14).

There are three Epistles which in the tradition bear the name of John. The longest of these is without any greeting, and there is nothing in the course of the letter which definitely identifies the author. In the place usually occupied by the name of the writer, the author of the two shorter Epistles calls himself ὁ πρεσβύτερος—a title which is used as a proper name—instead of by his own name. Nevertheless, except by the Alogi, who denied the Johannine authorship of these Epistles, and ascribed them to Cerinthus (above, 181, and n. 11), no one of these Epistles was ever attributed to an author of another name than John. It follows, therefore, that this tradition must have originated in the same circle in which the letters originated, from which also they were circulated in the Church. According to Eusebius, Papias, the disciple of “the presbyter whose name was John” (vol. ii. 451 ff.), quoted, or adopted, passages from 1 John. In the case of his companion Polycarp, we ourselves can prove as much (n. 15). Both the disciples of John show traces of their familiarity with the shorter Epistles. Naturally, these shortest writings in our N.T. are seldom quoted. Their history is also not a little obscured through a widespread custom of early writers, by which they were accustomed to speak of the Epistle of John or of Peter, or of the Epistle of Paul to the Corinthians or to the Thessalonians, even when there was more than one letter by the same author or to the same readers (n. 16). Because of their brevity, 2 and 3 John would never have circulated beyond the first readers and have come down to us, if from the first they had not been connected with 1 John, and if they had not had the support of this more extended writing, which was full of important teachings. Without such connection with a longer writing, or a place in a collection of writings, or an insertion in an historical work, such fragments are apt to be scattered to the winds. As a matter of fact we meet 2 and 3 John in Alexandria, Rome, and Gaul at the beginning of the second century. At that time, and for a long time afterwards, it was only their relation to the Canon that was uncertain. The Syrian Church, which at first had none of the catholic Epistles in its N.T., afterwards, when the redaction of the Peshito was made, accepted only the three longest, James, 1 Peter, and 1 John. It was not until much later that the four shorter Epistles were accepted. At the time when the Muratorian fragment was written, 2 and 3 John and Jude were found "in the Catholic Church" in Rome, i.e. in the N.T. of the Roman Church, which was still in Greek. But there was no such clear witness in them of their Johannine origin as in 1 John, the relation of which to the Gospel is assumed in 1 John i. 1-4. Perhaps it was not known in Rome that ὁ πρεσβύτερος was a name given to the apostle John (n. 17). This uncertainty may explain why 2 and 3 John were probably not found in the oldest Latin Bible, and why, as late as the middle of the fourth century, the effort to introduce these letters in the Latin Church met with opposition in Africa. Not very long after this there appeared also in Alexandria, where Clement had commented upon 2 John, without suggesting any doubts as to its Johannine origin, and probably also on 3 John, the same questioning which had appeared in Rome, or it seemed best to take account of the omission of the shorter Epistles from the canon of other Churches. "Not all regard 2 and 3 John as genuine," says Origen, but without attaching any great weight to the objection. The result was, however, that Origen and Dionysius of Alexandria described only 1 John as a catholic Epistle, and that Eusebius reckoned 2 and 3 John among the antilegomena. It is worth noting that Dionysius in his efforts to discover a second John of the apostolic age, to whom the authorship of Revelation might be assigned, did not think of ascribing to the same author the shorter Epistles about which questions had been raised. Likewise Eusebius, who thought that the desired author needed by his hypothesis was to be found in the presbyter John of Papias, commended this discovery only to those who could not ascribe Revelation to the apostle John. In the case of 2 and 3 John, he contents himself with the suggestion that they may have been written by some John other than the evangelist. It is not until Jerome that we meet with the definite statement that many regarded the presbyter John, who was to be distinguished from the apostle as the author of 2 and 3 John. But in both the chapters where this statement is made Jerome simply copies Eusebius without scruple (n. 18).

There is no tradition concerning the occasion of the Johannine Epistles and the time of their composition. The assumption that 1 John was written after the Gospel was simply the result of a very questionable interpretation of 1 John i. 1-4 and of the making of this passage refer to the Gospel. In the same way the statements which we meet incidentally, that 1 John was written after Revelation, or that Revelation was written after the Gospel, or vice versa (nn. 8, 11), have not the value of traditions regarding the chronology of these books. The only things which do have this value are (1) the report that John wrote Revelation on the island of Patmos between the years 93 and 96, and (2) that John wrote his Gospel in Ephesus at an advanced age.

The reports regarding the person of the apostle and author John may be divided into four classes: (1) The express statements of the N.T. regarding the apostle John; (2) those statements of the N.T. which are to be referred to the same John, on the presupposition that he is the author of the writings attributed to him; (3) the reports concerning the John of Ephesus which originated among the apostle's disciples in Asia; (4) the legendary accounts.

Since John is regularly mentioned second, when he is associated with his brother James, we may assume that he was the younger of the two sons of Zebedee. The tradition that he was the youngest of all the apostles is to be constantly met, and is probably much older than the sources enable us to prove (n. 19). The family in Capernaum was not poor. The father carried on a fishing business with the aid of his sons and a number of hired servants (Mark i. 20). Whereas the name of the father occurs frequently only because the sons are called the sons of Zebedee, in order to distinguish them from numerous other persons bearing these very common names, the mother is very prominent. We learn that her name was Salome only by a comparison of Matt. xxvii. 56 with Mark xv. 40 (cf. xvi. 1). She was one of the women who accompanied Jesus and the apostles on their preaching journeys and on the last journey to Jerusalem, and who used their own means to defray the expenses of the support of the large company of travellers (Mark xv. 41; Luke viii. 3). She is also mentioned among the women who purchased spices to embalm the body of Jesus after it was laid in the grave (Mark xvi. 1; cf. Luke xxiii. 55-xxiv. 1). All this goes to show that, as regards its prosperity and social position, the family of Zebedee is to be compared with that of Chuza (Luke viii. 3), the financial officer of Herod, or even of Joseph of Arimathea, rather than with that of Joseph and Mary (Luke ii. 24; cf. ii. 7). But these two families were closely related. Since it is extremely unlikely that two sisters would have each been called Mary, we may assume that four, not three, women are mentioned in John xix. 25. It is also very natural to identify these four women with the women mentioned in Matt. xxvii. 56; Mark xv. 40 f. and the unnamed sister of the mother of Jesus, mentioned in John, with Salome (n. 20). The sons of Zebedee were, therefore, own cousins of Jesus, and if Mary and Salome were relatives of Elizabeth, who was a priest's daughter (Luke i. 36), were, like Jesus, relatives of John the Baptist. While the brothers of Jesus continued to maintain at least a neutral attitude towards Him (John vii. 3), after the arrest of the Baptist Jesus' cousins became permanently His disciples (Mark i. 19; Matt. iv. 21; Luke v. 9), and after they were chosen among the Twelve they with Peter are repeatedly distinguished by Jesus as His most intimate disciples (Mark v. 37, ix. 2, xiv. 33; Matt. xvii. 1, xxvi. 37; Luke viii. 51, ix. 28). Occasionally a special commission is given John and Peter alone (Luke xxii. 8). We are not told what it was that led Jesus to give the brothers the name, "Sons of thunder" (Mark iii. 17, vol. i. 16), but what is said of them in Mark ix. 38-40, Luke ix. 49-55 (above, p. 89, n. 19), shows that they had intense zeal for their Master's honour, and were possessed by burning anger whenever any insult was offered Him. But this was accompanied by the overweening ambition which led them and their mother to ask for the place nearest to the throne of the Son of David in His glorious kingdom (n. 21). For both these exhibitions of unsanctified zeal they were earnestly rebuked by Jesus; but He does not for this reason cease to trust them, nor is their loyalty and that of their mother to Him thereby shaken. Jesus' prophecy that they must suffer like Himself (Mark x. 38 f.; Matt. xx. 22 f.) was fulfilled in James' case at Easter 44 (Acts xii. 2). His execution by Herod Agrippa I. is the only thing which is recorded of him in Acts. On the other hand, John is represented as being from the first along with Peter one of the leaders in the Palestinian Church (Acts iii. 1-iv. 23, viii. 15-25). But always when they appear together Peter is the speaker (Acts iii. 4, 12, iv. 8, v. 29, viii. 20), and frequently, without mention of John, Peter is represented as the undisputed leader of the early Church. The fact, however, that after the death of his brother and the assumption of the leadership of the mother Church by James, the brother of Jesus, John, together with Peter and James, occupied a distinguished place in the Jewish Church is evidenced by Gal. ii. 9.

The picture of John which we get from these definite statements is essentially enlarged by what is said in the writings attributed to him—provided the interpretation of their testimony to their author, which is given below, proves to be correct. This explains at once why the sons of Zebedee, after the arrest of the Baptist, in response to the brief command of Jesus that they give up their business and attach themselves to Him with a view to becoming His future helpers in His calling, were willing to obey at once and unconditionally (Mark i. 20; Matt. iv. 22; Luke v. 11). Both were disciples of their relative John, and at the suggestion of their former master attached themselves to Jesus, when He returned again to the place of baptism not long after His own baptism, forming with Peter and Andrew, Philip and Nathanael (Bartholomew), the first group of Jesus' disciples. This enables us to understand why, in all four of the lists of the apostles in the N.T., the first five, and, with the exception of Acts i. 13, where the name of Thomas is inserted between Philip and Bartholomew, all six occupy the foremost places. From the moment when they attached themselves to Jesus they were constantly associated with Him, both in their native city Capernaum, where Jesus settled with His family (John ii. 12), and upon a journey to Jerusalem to attend a feast, as well as during a somewhat protracted residence in Judea (John ii. 13–iv. 2). When subsequently Jesus, because of the continued activity of the Baptist, abandoned His work in Judea and withdrew into Galilee and the quietness of private life, determined to await the further development of events (John iv. 1–3, 43 ff.), His disciples went with Him and in all probability resumed for a time their usual occupations, until Jesus recognised the imprisonment of the Baptist (cf. John v. 35) as the signal for the resumption of His work, and summoned His disciples to share it. If the unnamed disciple in John xiii. 23-26 (xviii. 15 f.), xix. 26, 27, 35, xx. 2-10, xxi. 7, 20-25 is the apostle John, this confirms at once the statement of the other Gospels, that he was one of the apostles who were most intimate with Jesus. The statement that he had relations with the high priest Caiaphas, and that he was known to the servants in the high priest's house, is new and surprising, if John xviii. 15 f. refers to him and not to his brother James (see below, § 65); but in either case is less surprising when we remember that Zebedee's wife was a priest's daughter, and that the family, while not one of the highest social standing and broadest culture (Acts iv. 13), did belong to the prosperous middle class. The statement in Acts iv. 13 also proves that John, like Peter, had been known by sight to some of the high priestly circle even before Jesus' death. The statement that John, with his mother Salome, ventured to approach near to the cross during the last moments of Jesus' life (John xix. 25 ff., 35), is neither confirmed nor contradicted by Matt. xxvii. 55 f.; Mark xv. 40 f.; Luke xxiii. 49. But it will be observed that Mark mentions Salome among the women who at this time watched the cross from afar, and that Luke mentions, besides the women, also the men who were friends of Jesus. If John was a near relative of Jesus, and if more than this his family was in comparatively good circumstances, it is easy to understand why Jesus entrusted His mother to John's care, and why he took her into his family (xix. 26 f.). The contributions made to the history of John's life by John xxi. will be discussed later (§ 66).

The three Epistles show that when they were written John was a teacher and occupied a position of leadership in a group of Christian Churches, the main constituency of which did not owe their conversion to his preaching, and that they were Gentile Christian Churches. From Revelation we learn that he occupied this position in the Churches of the province of Asia.

The traditions current among the disciples of John in Asia concerning the last period of his life, so far as they relate to the origin of his writings, have already been established (above, p. 174 ff.). There is, however, some further matter of importance for the criticism of these writings. According to the testimony of Irenæus, his disciple Polycarp, who became a Christian in the year 69 (i.e. was baptized in that year), was "made a disciple by apostles," which means that he was not a small child when he was baptized, but was converted sometime during his boyhood by apostles and afterwards baptized (n. 22). Irenæus repeatedly mentions a number of apostles and also other personal disciples of Jesus with whom Polycarp was in constant intercourse during his youth. Evidently men like Philip and Aristion are meant (see vol. ii. 452 f.). But again and again Irenæus mentions John as the principal teacher of Polycarp, and of Papias and of the other Asiatic elders. Consequently at the latest he must have taken up his residence in the province of Asia in the year 69. In the year 66, when 2 Tim. was written, he evidently was not working in these regions. It is conceivable that after the death of Paul and Peter, men who remained at their posts in Palestine until the breaking out of the Jewish war (cf. Matt. x. 23 ; see vol. ii. 572) now recognised that the time had come when their calling, which had always been wider than Israel, should now be more extensively exercised—just as Peter had attempted to do not long before (vol. ii. 158 f.). It is also conceivable that they should choose as the scene of their apostolic labours (i.e. their labours as missionaries and leaders in Churches that were already organised), the Churches of the province of Asia, which, to judge from conditions in the second century, were especially numerous and strong—especially since in these Churches the wheat and the tares grew together luxuriantly, as is evidenced by the last letters of Paul. The tradition that it was after the death of James and shortly before the outbreak of the Jewish war that the apostles left Palestine and the mother Church in Jerusalem, also favours the dating of the settlement of apostles and other disciples of Jesus in Asia between 66 and 69 (n. 23).

Since, according to Irenæus, John wrote his Gospel in opposition to Cerinthus, and since the Alogi declared Cerinthus to be the author of the Johannine writings (above, p. 177), it is significant that Irenæus is able to cite witnesses who heard from Polycarp's lips the well-known story of the meeting of John and Cerinthus in a public bath in Ephesus (n. 24). In this John of Ephesus one easily recognises the young Boanerges and the author of the Epistles. Judging from the context in Irenæus, it appears that Polycarp related this anecdote in Rome on the occasion of his visit there at Easter 154. It was on this same occasion also that Polycarp, speaking with reference to the differences in ecclesiastical custom between his native Church and the Roman Church, said that he himself, with John and the other apostles, had always celebrated the Christian Passover as it was then celebrated in Asia, not as it was celebrated in Rome—in other words, that a fast had preceded the Passover, which was really a special yearly celebration of the Lord's Supper (n. 25). No mention is as yet made in the intercourse between Polycarp and Anicetus in Rome in the year 154 about another difference which led to a vigorous contest within the Asiatic Church between the years 165 and 170, and which about the year 190 created a dissension between the Asiatic and Roman Church that was still more dangerous and which finally implicated the entire Church. Since in these later controversies most of the Asiatic bishops appealed to the authority of John of Ephesus, Philip of Hierapolis, and also of Polycarp and all the prominent bishops of the past in defence of their practice in observing the Passover on the 14th of Nisan, there can be no doubt that John and the other members of the apostolic circle who came from Palestine to Asia Minor after the year 66 were quartodecimans, that is to say, they celebrated the Christian Passover in the manner mentioned above every year at the time of the Jewish Passover, on the 14th of Nisan, no matter on what day of the week it fell.

It is more difficult to determine how much trustworthiness attaches to the other traditions concerning John. Some of them sound as if they were genuine history (n. 26), and it would be foolish to reject as pure inventions all the accounts concerning John peculiar to Leucius Charinus, who wrote in Asia from 160–170. In this work Leucius must have followed existing tradition much more closely than was done in the Acts of Peter, which was also probably written by him. The scene of the latter was the distant city of Rome, and the death of Peter had taken place some thirty or forty years earlier than that of John. Whereas in the case of John, Leucius wrote a few years after the death of the last of his disciples. Of special importance to us is his description of the death of John. According to ancient and genuine tradition, John of Ephesus died a natural death in that city in his extreme old age, at the beginning of the reign of Trajan (i.e. about 100), and was buried there (n. 27). If there had been anything remarkable about this death except John's extreme age, it is impossible to understand the silence of Irenæus and the other prose witnesses concerning it. Nor is Leucius' representation of it essentially different from this tradition (n. 28). On a Sunday after religious services, John went outside the gates of the city, accompanied by a few trusted disciples, had a deep grave dug, laid aside his outer garments which were to serve him as a bed, prayed once more, stepped down into the grave, greeted the brethren who were present, and gave up the ghost. According to this writing he does not die of weakness, as one might expect to be the case from the genuine traditions concerning the old man who had finally grown decrepit; but he does actually die and rests in his grave in Ephesus, just as truly as Philip and his daughters rest in theirs at Hierapolis, and just as truly as do the other "great heavenly lights of Asia, who will rise on the day of the Lord's return" (Polycrates of Ephesus [circa 190] in Eus. v. 24. 2-5). It was not until the fourth century that popular superstition, taking up the suggestion of John xxi. 23, began to disturb his rest in the grave and to relate miracles about the immortal disciple and his grave, which grew constantly more and more fantastic (n. 28).

1. (P. 174.) With regard to the external evidence for the Fourth Gospel, cf. E. LUTHARDT, Der joh. Ursprung des 4 Ev. 1874; E. ABBOTT, The Authorship of the Fourth Gospel. External Evidences, 1880; J. DRUMMOND, An Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 1903, pp. 72-351; GK, i. 17 f., 150-192, 220-262, 516-534, 675-680, 732-739, 767, 778, 780, 784 ff., 901-915, 934, ii. 32-52, 733, 850 f., 909 f., 956-961, 967-973; Forsch. vi. 105, 127, 181-190, 201-203. As to the use of John's Gospel in the Gospel of Peter, cf. the writer's work, Evang. des Petrus, 1893, S. 49 f.

2. (P. 176.) Concerning Apostles and the disciples of Apostles in the province of Asia, cf. Forsch. vi. 1-224, where also the biography of Irenæus, the chronology of Justin, and other relevant facts and questions are considered. More recently, E. SCHWARTZ ("Über den Tod der Sohne Zebedæi, ein Beitrag zur Geschichte des Johannesev." 1904, Abh. der gött. Ges. d. Wiss. philol.-hist. Kl., N. F. vii. No. 5) has once again made an attempt, surpassing in audacity all earlier ones, to prove that the entire tradition concerning the long-lived Apostle John is a myth. Starting from a remark of Wellhausen (Ev. Marc., 90), made without much consideration of the matter, Schwartz infers from Mark x. 35-40=(Matt. xx. 20-23) that the apostles John and James died violent deaths and at the same time; therefore, according to Acts xii. 2, about 44 A.D. This inference naturally does not depend, like the old myths of the martyrdom by oil, and of the poisoned cup related in connection with John, upon the presupposition that every prophecy of Jesus must have been literally fulfilled. (Cf. the writer's Acta Jo. cxvii. ff., Forsch. vi. 163, 147 ff.). Schwartz (S. 4) considers it self-evident, and not at all needful of proof, that the saying of Jesus is not authentic, but a vaticinium ex crepto attributed to Jesus. In that case certainly before the first record ing of the apparently prophetic words there must have taken place the event which Schwartz asserts is implied in that saying. This assertion is made with the naïveté of the philologist, which has become proverbial, and again without any attempt at proof. If Mark x. 38 f. might be understood to mean that James and John would die in the same way as Jesus (cf. John xiii. 36, xxi. 19), it would be necessary also to postulate that they were crucified, a fate which neither of them experienced. The drinking of the cup and the being baptized to which Jesus refers as the experience which is to come to Himself and His disciples, have the much more usual meaning of the suffering preceding the glorification, and thus understood form, as so often, the contrast to the reigning of Jesus, and the reigning with Him, which are to follow (cf. Luke xxiv. 26 ; Acts xiv. 22 ; Rom. viii. 17 ; 2 Tim. ii. 11 f.). In itself this saying stands on a level with the demands which Jesus made upon all true disciples and His announcements concerning their future (Matt. x. 38, xvi. 24 f. ; John xii. 25 f., xv. 20 f., xvi. 2). Not until James was beheaded by Herod Agrippa (Acts xii. 2) could one be tempted to accept the supposition that this announcement to John was to be fulfilled, as in the case of his brother, by a martyr's death. It was possible that Mark and Matthew entertained such an expectation when they wrote down that conversation ; for both of them wrote some twenty years after the death of James the son of Zebedee, and some thirty years before the death of John. The conclusion of Wellhausen, that this prophecy of martyrdom would hardly have stood in the Gospel if it had been only half fulfilled, would have a faint appearance of plausibility only if John had already died a peaceful death at the time when Mark and Matt. were written. As long as he lived, his death as a martyr could be expected daily. Does not the Gospel contain many prophecies of Jesus which had not been fulfilled when the evangelists wrote, and are not yet fulfilled ? Entirely without any support in the text is the improbable assertion of Schwartz, that Mark x. 38 f. prophesies a simultaneous martyrdom of both apostles, or rather that on the basis of this fact the prophecy was fabricated. Here again the critic makes what he would prove the presupposition of his exegesis. What further violent efforts are necessary to save this thesis from absolute absurdity ? The author of Acts, "for the sake of the later tradition," omitted the name of John in xii. 2 ; i.e., to favour the myth that identified the long-lived John of Ephesus with the son of Zebedee, he falsified the history handed down to him. The John who, according to Gal. ii. 9, at the time of the Apostolic council was, together with Peter and James, the Lord's brother, one of the pillars of the mother Church, is held to be not the apostle of this name, who, according to Acts iii.-viii., stood second to Peter, but the John Mark of Acts xii. 12, whom the author of Acts through his unhistorical statements (xii. 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 37 f.) made a helper of Paul and Barnabas in their preaching, and who is not to be identified with the Mark of Col. iv. 10 ; Philem. 24 ; 2 Tim. iv. 11. From these criticisms of the Gospels and Acts it is easy to imagine how the fragmentary and in part obscure statements of the post-apostolic literature were handled. W. Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, p. 32, has correctly characterised the tone of this treatise ; and O. Benndorf (Forschungen in Ephesos, i. 107, published by the Austrian Archaeological Institute, 1905) is probably not the only non-theological historical investigator who turns away from its method and conclusions unsatisfied.

3. (P. 178.) Concerning traces of the Fourth Gospel in Papias' work, cf. GK, i. 902. In connection with this is what Conybeare communicates to us in the Guardian of July 18, 1894, from the Solutiones in IV. ev. of the Armenian Vardan Vardapet (XII. Cent.), according to the MS. at S. Lazzaro, No. 51, fol. 3: "And as the doors were shut, He appeared to the Eleven and the others who were with them" (cf. Luke xxiv. 33; John xx. 19; a connection with the following is not clear). But the aloes, which they brought (John xix. 39), was a mixture, so to speak, half of oil, half of honey. It is certain, however, that aloes is a sort of incense, as we are told by the Geographer and by Papias, who say there are fifteen kinds of aloes in India, four of which are costly—namely, Nikré (? Ingré), Andrataratz (? Sangrataratz), Jerravor, Dzakothén. Accordingly, what Joseph and Nicodemus used for the burial was (1 of these four costly kinds); for they were rich (John xix. 38 f., cf. Matt. xxvii. 57, πλούσιος). The "Geographer" is Moses of Khorene, in whose work, chap. xli., we can read of the four kinds of aloes. So this did not come from Papias. Just as little is he the originator of the popular misunderstanding of aloes as a mixture of oil and honey, because the Geographer and Papias are cited directly in opposition to this idea. There remains the assertion of Papias that aloes is a kind of incense. Consequently he has made John xix. 38 f. the subject of one of his ἐξηγήσεις. In this connection it is to be noted that the acquaintance of the Armenians with the work of Papias is also otherwise assured; cf. Forsch. vi. 128–130, 155.

4. (P. 178.) According to Cardinal Thomasius (Opp., ed. Vezzosi, i. 344) and Pitra (Analecta, ii. 160), the following argument for the Gospel of John is found in a Latin Bible of the ninth century, in the Codex Regina 14 in the Vatican: "Evangelium Johannis manifestatum et datum est ecclesiis ab Johanne adhuc in corpore constituto, sicut Papias nomine Hierapolitanus, discipulus Johannis carus, in exotericis id est in extremis quinque libris retulit. Descripsit vero evangelium dictante Johanne recte. Verum Marcion hæreticus, cum ab eo fuisset improbatus eo quod contraria sentiebat, abjectus est a Johanne. Is vero scripta vel epistolas ad eum pertulerat a fratribus, qui in Ponto fuerunt." This same text is found in bad orthography in a Codex Toletanus of the tenth century as the conclusion of a long prologue, which in the preceding sentences agrees essentially with Jerome, Vir. III. ix. This codex is printed in Wordsworth-White, N.T. Lat. i. 490; cf. also Burkitt, Two Lectures on the Gospels, 1901, pp. 90–94, in addition GK, i. 898 ff. Only as far as constituto have we the right to refer this statement to Papias. Whether the author of the argumentum borrowed directly from Papias, or, as the present writer assumes, from a work in which he found Papias cited, may not here be discussed. There is no doubt that a Greek source lies at the basis, and that in exotericis = ἐν τοῖς ἐξωτερικοῖς κτλ. is an error of the copyist for ἐν τοῖς ἐξηγητικοῖς; cf. Clem. Strom. iv. 83, Βασιλείῃς ἐν τῷ ἀκοστῷ τρίτῳ τῶν ἐξηγητικῶν. Enough has been said (Forsch. vi. 127, A. 1) against a very superficial criticism of what Papias reported concerning the publishing of the Fourth Gospel by the John who was still living, and also in GK, i. 900, concerning "the justness of the theological criticism," which passes over this testimony of Papias in silence, and contents itself with the rejection of the "myths" connected with his words. The words which immediately follow retulit, connected by a vero, are also extant in Greek in the Proœmium of the Catena in Jo., ed. Corderius, 1630, and in the Acta Jo. of Prochorus are assigned to this disciple of the Apostle (cf. the writer's Acta Jo. p. 154 ff.). Also the subdictante of the Codex Toletanus in place of the dictante of the Regino-Vatic. points to a Greek source; it is a literal translation of ὑπαγορεύοντος Ἰωάννου. Although it is not possible to name an authority for this account, there is no reason for treating it as a senseless myth. It is almost self-evident that John, like Paul, dictated extended portions of Greek writings to an amanuensis; and Papias, the friend of Polycarp, and a companion of the same age, can just as well as he have been twenty-five or more years of age when the Fourth Gospel was written. The notice concerning Marcion, introduced by a verum and in the Codex Toletanus written as a new section, the source of which we are less able to discover than that of the statement concerning Papias as secretary, is chronologically unbelievable in the form in which it appears, but excepting the name of John does not sound senseless. Marcion came from Pontus, and Polycarp seems to have come to know him in Asia before he met him again in Rome; cf. Iren. iii. 3. 4. Evidently there is a misunderstanding of the source like the apud Johannem, Jerome, Vir. Ill. vii.; cf. NKZ, 1898, S. 216, A. 1.

5. (P. 178.) Clem. Alex. in Eus. H. E. vi. 14. 7 (after the words cited, vol. ii. 400, n. 9, and 448, n. 9, and governed by the ἔλεγον, sc. οἱ πρεσβύτεροι): τὸν μέντοι Ἰωάννην ἔσχατον συνιδόντα, ὅτι τὰ σωματικά ἐν τοῖς εὐαγγελίοις δεδήλωται, προταπέντα ὑπὸ τῶν γνωρίμων, πενύματι θεοφορηθέντα, πνευματικὸν ποιῆσαι εὐαγγέλιον.

6. (P. 178.) Can. Mur. lines 9-16; GK, ii. 5, 32-40; Acta Jo. pp. cxxvi-cxxxi. The origin of this narrative in the Acta Jo. by Leucius (GK, ii. 38) has become still more probable, since it has been proved that the Can. Mur. stands also in close relation to the Acta Petri written by the same author (GK, ii. 844). In GK, ii. 37 f., are given also the noteworthy patristic statements in this connection (cf., further, GK, i. 898 f., and the previous notes 4, 5). As to the relation of the narratives of Leucius and Clement, cf. Forsch. vi. 201-204.

7. (P. 179.) Iren. iii. 11. 1: "Hanc fidem annuntians Joannes, domini discipulus, volens per evangelii annuntiationem auferre eum, qui a Cerintho insemminatus erat hominibus, errorem et multo prius ab his qui dicuntur Nicolaitæ, qui sunt vulsio eius, quæ falso cognominatur scientia, ut confunderet eos . . . sic inchoavit in ea, quæ est secundum evangelium doctrina: 'In principio erat verbum,'" etc. Cf. vol. i. 515, n. 4.

8. (P. 179.) That John was the last of the evangelists to write, cf. vol. ii. 392 f., 397-400. This supposition involves the admission that he wrote in old age. After a life spent only in preaching, he came at its close to make use of the written word (Eus. H. E. iii. 24. 7). Epiph. Hær. li. 12 expresses himself most definitely: διὸ ὕστερον ἀναγκάζει τὸ ἅγιον πνεῦμα τὸν Ἰωάννην, παραιτούμενον εὐαγγελίσασθαι δι' εὐλάβειαν καὶ ταπεινοφροσύνην, ἐπὶ τῇ γηραλέᾳ αὐτοῦ ἡλικίᾳ μετὰ ἑτῇ ἐνενήκοντα τῆς ἑαυτοῦ ζωῆς, μετὰ τὴν ἀπὸ τῆς Πάτρου ἐπάνοδον, τὴν ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου γενομένην Καίσαρος καὶ μετὰ ἱκανὰ ἔτη τοῦ διατρίψαι αὐτὸν ἐπὶ (Dindorf, ἀπὸ) τῆς Ἀσίας ἀναγκάζεται ἐκθίσθαι τὸ εὐαγγέλιον. Cf. li. 2, ὁ ἅγιος Ἰωάννης μεθ' ἡλικίαν γηραλέαν ἐπιτρέπεται κτλ. As to the determination of the date of the exile on Patmos, cf. below, n. 14; and with reference to the strange statements contained in Har. li. 33, cf. Forsch. v. 35-43. Not one of the Church Fathers (Irenæus, Clement, Origen, Eusebius) says that John wrote his Gospel after his return from Patmos, and therefore after the completion of Revelation. At the same time, with the exception of Epiphanius, there is a whole line of witnesses for this statement: (a) A speech delivered at Ephesus under the name of Chrysostom (Montfaucon, viii. 2. 131), which Suidas (cf. sub voce, Ἰωάννης [ed. Bernhardt, i. 2. 1023]) had looked upon and copied as a genuine work of Chrysostom; (b) many Lat. prologues to John's Gospel (N.T. Lat., ed. Wordsworth, i. 486, 490); (c) two treatises ascribed to Augustine (Mai, Nova patr. Bibl. i. 1. 381; Aug. Opp., ed. Bass. iv. 382); (d) indirectly, the "History of John," which was preserved in the Syriac (Wright, Apocr. Acts, i. 60-64), in so far as it states that John wrote his Gospel in Ephesus after an exile, the place of which it does not give; and (e) Prochorus in his History of the Apostle John in so far as it tells us that John dictated to him his Gospel in two days and six hours at the end of his exile, while he was still on Patmos; however, after he had left behind for the churches of the island a copy which was also written by Prochorus, but on parchment, he brought with him to Ephesus the original, which was on paper (cf. the present writer's edition of the Acta Jo. pp. 154-158, xliii-l). As has been more explicitly shown in the above reference, there must have come a confusion into the tradition, at the time when and in the circles where the Johannine origin of Rev.—this record of the exile on Patmos—was denied, and the book itself was far from being given a place in the N.T. Canon. Prochorus puts the Gospel in the place of Rev. which was written on Patmos, and only through an evident interpolation is there brought into his book a supplementary narrative of the Patmos origin of Rev. (op. cit. 184). It is an echo of the original narrative of Prochorus, when min. 145 (Tischend. N.T. i. 967, cf. another min. by Matthæi, Evang. Jo. 1786, p. 356) and the Synopsis of "Athanasius" (Athan., ed. Montf. ii. 202) admit that John wrote or dictated the Gospel on Patmos, but published it in Ephesus, and also when the Chron. pasch., ed. Bonn, i. 11 and 411, idly talks of the ιδίωχειρον of the Johannine Gospel, which was alleged to be still preserved in Ephesus (Acta Jo. p. lix). But the source of the tradition that the Gospel of John was written in Ephesus after the return from Patmos can scarcely be any other than the legend of Leucius (Acta Jo. p. cxxvi ff.). It does not deserve any particular credence, because Irenæus, who offers very definite statements in regard to the time of the writing of Matt., of Mark (iii. 1. 1), and of Rev. (v. 30. 3), would not have contented himself with the more indefinite statements as to the Fourth Gospel—e.g. that John may have written it later than Matt., Mark, and Luke, and that he may have written it during his stay at Ephesus (iii. 1. 1)—if the word of Papias or the oral tradition of the elders of Asia had furnished him with more exact information. Not only Leucius, if the present writer's opinion in regard to him as above stated is correct, and the Syriac history of John, but the general tradition agree with Irenæus, that Ephesus is the birthplace of the Gospel (as to the Syrians, cf. the writer's Acta Jo. p. cxxviii; Forsch. i. 54 f.). Also where only Asia is spoken of, Ephesus is meant. The fables of that Syriac legend and of the Acta Timothei need no further discussion (GK, i. 943, ii. 38 ; Acta Jo. p. cxxxviii). Yet it is to be noted that these apocryphal statements, in so far as they allow that John in the writing of his Gospel had at hand and took into account all three of the synoptic Gospels, rely upon a very old tradition—a tradition going back to the teachers of Clement (above, n. 5) and repeated by well informed people such as Eusebius (H. E. iii. 24. 7–13) and Theodore of Mopsuestia (Comm. in N.T., ed. Fritzsche, p. 19 f.).

9. (P. 180.) We lack the definite testimony of Marcion and Justin that they ascribed the Fourth Gospel to the apostle John (cf., however, vol. ii. 389 f.; and with regard to Justin as a witness for the apostolic title of the Christian writer John, below, note 12. The Valentinian Ptolemæus calls the evangelist now Ἰωάννης ὁ μαθητὴς τοῦ κυρίου (Iren. i. 8. 5), now ἀπόστολος (Ep. ad Floram in Epiph. Hær. xxxiii. 3 ; cf. GK, i. 732 f., ii. 956 ff.). The Valentinian Heracleon (Orig. tom. vi. 2 in Jo.) designates him at first as ὁ μαθητὴς, in order to distinguish him from the Baptist, and classes him directly afterwards among the οἱ ἀπόστολοι. This view of Heracleon's statement is based on the more probable limiting of the fragment by Brooke (Texts and Studies, i. 4. 55), which Preuschen, p. 109. 15 ff., ascribes to Origen. Also the Oriental Valentinians (Clem. Al. Epit. c. Theodoto, §§ 7, 41) call the writer of the prologue apostle. The Alogi certify that this was the prevailing view up to that time (see n. 11). Irenæus regularly uses "disciple of the Lord" where he speaks of John as author of the Gospel (III. i. 1, xi. 1, 3, end), and also at other times : v. 33. 3, ii. 22. 5 (here, however, immediately follows non solum Joannem, sed et alios apostolos viderunt), iii. 3. 4 [at first μαθ. τ. κυρίου, then including him οἱ ἀπόστολοι] ; Epist. ad Victorem in Eus. v. 24. 16, "John the disciple of the Lord and the other apostles"—Can. Mur. line 9, quarti (read quartum) evangeliorum Johannis ex discipulis. We are then told of the consultation which John held with his condiscipuli and episcopi about the writing of a Gospel (above, note 6), and that within this circle—evidently from among the condiscipuli of John—Andreas ex apostolis was specially noted. In other words, John too is an apostle as well as Andrew. In fact, the only Christian of the apostolic age, by the name of John, of whom the author of the fragment knows (cf. lines 27, 49, 57, 69, 71), has already, before Paul's time, been a holder of the apostolic office (line 48) ; cf. GK, i. 154 f., ii. 32 ff., 48 f., 88 f. ; in general, cf. Forsch. vi. 72–78.

10. (P. 181.) Irenæus, Clement, Tertullian, Can. Mur., Hippolytus, Origen steadily cite the Gospel, the Epistles (particularly 1 John), and Rev. as the works of the one person, John, without finding it necessary to characterise him more definitely (GK, i. 202 ff.). It is only for the purpose of explaining the statements of one writing by means of the others or of specially honouring John that now and then mention is made of the identity of the author of these different writings. Thus Irenæus, iii. 16. 5, in connection with a citation from John xx. 31, says : propter quod et in epistola sua sic testificatus est nobis ; following which is 1 John ii. 18 ff. So Can. Mur. (lines 26–34) brings to the discussion of the Fourth Gospel the evidence of his Epistles, i.e. of 1 John i. 1–4—in fact, it presents it as a writing later than the Gospel. Hippolytus (Contra Noët. 15) explains the name Logos, John i 1, 14, from Rev. xix. 11–13, as a later statement of the same John (ὑποβάς ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει ἔφη). Without expressing this idea of the chronological sequence of the books, Orig. (tom. ii. 5 in Jo.) makes a similar statement as to the identity of these writers (ὁ αὐτὸς δὲ Ἰωάννης ἐν τῇ ἀποκαλύψει κτλ.). Tert. De Fuga, 9; Scorpiace, xii., takes it for granted that Rev. was written before 1 John (cf. GK, i. 207). Frequently titles are given to John, appropriate to his different writings; e.g. Hippol. De Antichr. 36 addresses the Seer in Rev.: ὁ μακάριε Ἰωάννη, ἀπόστολε καὶ μαθητὰ τοῦ κυρίου. Clem. Pæd. ii. 119, with reference to Rev. xxi., uses φωνὴ ἀποστολική. In his Quis Dives, xlii., he calls the exile of Patmos Ἰωάννης ὁ ἀπόστολος; in Strom. iii. 106 he speaks of the writer of Rev. as ὁ προφήτης; Orig. tom. ii. 5 in Jo. refers to him as ὁ ἀπόστολος καὶ ὁ εὐαγγελιστής, ἥδη δὲ καὶ διὰ τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως καὶ προφήτης. For other examples, cf. GK, i. 206 A. 2; Forsch. vi. 210 A. 2.

11. (P. 181.) With regard to the Alogi and the further related critical attempts of Caius of Rome, cf. GK, i. 220–262, ii. 967–991; *PRE*³, i. 386. Before Epiphanius gave the Alogi their name they were called ἡ αἵρεσις, ἡ ἀποβάλλουσα Ἰωάννου τὰς βίβλους (Epiph. Hær. li. 3). Inasmuch as these and similar designations by Epiphanius occur repeatedly (ed. Dindorf, ii. 452. 9, 19–21, 453. 6, 501. 30), and Epiphanius himself, reflecting upon the meaning of the expression, confesses that he does not know exactly whether only the Gospel and Rev. or also the Epistles are to be understood by it (τάχα δὲ καὶ τὰς ἐπιστολάς, § 34; cf. § 35), we may, therefore, be sure that this expression had been used by Hippolytus, whose writing against the two-and-thirty heresies was a source for both Epiphanius and Philaster (Hær. xxx.). But since Hippolytus, to judge from those who depended upon him for their information, and from the title of his writing ὑπὲρ τοῦ κατὰ Ἰωάννην εὐαγγελίου καὶ ἀποκαλύψεως, discussed only the critical arguments of the Alogi directed against these two principal works of John, it is likely that he did not originate the expression “the books of John,” but found it in his opponents’ writings. The Alogi themselves stated: “the books of John are not by John, but by Cerinthus, and are not worthy to be in the Church” (Dindorf, pp. 452. 9, 20 f.), and further declared that “his books do not agree with the other apostles” (p. 453. 6). By the latter expression they testify that the John around whose books the discussion gathers was an apostle. Epiphanius (p. 451. 16) observes quite truly that “they know that he—the alleged John—belonged to the number of the apostles.” They indicate the books individually with sufficient exactness: τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τὸ εἰς ὄνομα Ἰωάννου ψεύδεται (p. 474. 18); or λέγουσι τὸ κατὰ Ἰωάννην εὐαγγέλιον ἀδιύθετον εἶναι (p. 475. 7), also ὁ Ἰωάννης (i.e. the author of the Fourth Gospel, who passed himself off as John), ψεύδεται (p. 479. 6); τί με ὠφελεῖ ἡ ἀποκάλυψις Ἰωάννου (p. 499. 7). That, in rejecting the “books of John,” they could not ignore his Epistles, is evident from the fact that they were known in the country and in the time of the Alogi under the name of John (below, note 15). This is verified also in the Can. Mur. line 26 ff.; for in the passage after the harmony of the four Gospels is maintained in the face of the assertion of the Alogi that the Fourth Gospel is inconsistent with the other three, the positive testimony to its author in 1 John i. 1–4 is defended as one well warranted and by no means surprising. The Alogi urged, as Dionysius did later in regard to Rev. (Eus. H. E. vii. 25. 6–11), that this strong self-attestation was a ground of suspicion against the genuineness of 1 John (GK, ii. 45–52, 136). Caius in Eus. H. E. iii. 28. 2 says of the author of Rev. : Κήρυθος, ὁ δι' ἀποκαλύψεων ὡς ὑπὸ ἀποστόλου μεγάλου γεγραμμένων τερατολογίας ; ἡμῖν ὡς δι' ἀγγέλων αὐτῷ δεδειγμένας ψευδόμενος κτλ.

12. (P. 182.) Just. Dial. lxxxi. : καὶ ἐπειδὴ (so. codd. read ἔτι δὴ, al. ἔτι δέ, al. ἔπειτα) καὶ παρ' ἡμῖν ἀνὴρ τις, ᾧ ὄνομα Ἰωάννης, εἰς τῶν ἀποστόλων τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ἐν ἀποκαλύψει γενομένη αὐτῷ χίλια ἔτη ποιήσειεν ἐν Ἱερουσαλὴμ τοὺς τῷ ἡμετέρῳ Χριστῷ πιστεύσαντας προσφίτευσε, καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα τὴν καθολικὴν καὶ συνελόντι φάναι αἰωνίαν ὁμοθυμαδὸν ἅμα πάντων ἀνάστασιν γενήσεσθαι καὶ κρίσιν. Cf. Rev. xx. 4-15 ; GK. i. 560 f.

13. (P. 182.) The Asiatic Elders of Iren. iv. 30. 4, v. 30. 1, 36. 1. In regard to the number of the antichrist, v. 30. 1, cf. ZfKW, 1885, S. 561 ff.; as to the older witnesses for Rev. in general, cf. GK. i. 201-208 (Epist. Lugd. in Eus. H. E. v. 1 ; Irenæus, Can. Mur., Hippolytus, Acta mart. Scillit., Passio Perpetuæ, Tertullian, Clement and the Church of Alexandria, Theophilus of Antioch, the Montanists, Melito of Sardis), 560-562 (Justin ; cf. above, note 12), 759-761 (the Valentinians), 794 f. (the Elders of Irenæus, Sibyll., circa 150), 950-957 (Papias and Andreas in Ap. [ed. Sylburg, p. 2, 52], and Eus. iii. 39. 12 : Barnabas). With reference to Leucius, cf. Forsch. vi. 197-201.

14. (P. 183.) Iren. v. 30. 3. (The Greek is rather free, rendered by Eus. H. E. v. 8. 6. There are added here in brackets the variants of the Lat. version : ἡμεῖς οὖν (μενοῦν) οὐκ ἀποκινδυνεύομεν περὶ τοῦ ὀνόματος τοῦ Ἀντιχρίστου ἀποφαινόμενοι βεβαιωτικῶς (ἀποκινδυνεύομεν ἐν τούτῳ, οὐδὲ βεβαιωτικῶς ἀποφανόμεθα, ὅτι τοῦτο ἔξει τὸ ὄνομα). εἰ γὰρ ἔδει (εἰδότες ὅτι εἰ ἔδει) ἀναφανδὸν τῷ νῦν καιρῷ κηρύττεσθαι τοῦτομα αὐτοῦ, δι' ἐκείνου ἂν ἐρρήθη τοῦ καὶ τὴν ἀποκάλυψιν ἐωρακότος. οὐδὲ γὰρ πρὸ πολλοῦ χρόνου ἐωράθη (Lat. visum est), ἀλλὰ σχεδὸν ἐπὶ τῆς ἡμετέρας γενεᾶς, πρὸς τῷ τέλει τῆς Δομετιανοῦ ἀρχῆς. In accordance with Wettstein (NT, ii. 746), whose interpretation E. Böhmer, Über Vf und Abfassungszeit der Ap. 1855, S. 31, has appropriated, Irenæus is held to have said that John was to be seen on earth or was alive towards the end of Domitian's reign. According to Iren. ii. 22. 5, iii. 3. 4, however, John had lived in Ephesus, not until toward the end of Domitian's reign, but until the times of Trajan. There is also no proof needed to show that ἐωράθη is to be understood in any other way than as ἐωρακότος. According to his commentary on Rev., Dionysius Barsalibi, who had at hand writings of Hippolytus not possessed by us, this author was of the same mind as Irenæus with reference to the time of the writing of Rev. ; cf. J. Gwynn, Hermathena, vii. (1889) p. 146. The extant writings of Hippolytus, however, offer no confirmation of this view. He simply says (De Antichr. 36) that Rome, that is to say, the emperor, had brought about the banishment of John to Patmos. Also Orig. tom. xvi. 6 in Mt. does not dare to name a definite emperor, because in Rev. i. 9 none is named. Cf. Forsch. vi. 199 f. In the legend of the young man saved by John (Clem. Quis Dives, xlii.), no emperor, indeed, is named, though Domitian certainly is meant ; for, in the first place, John is represented as a very old man ; and, secondly, the return from the exile is closely connected with the death of the tyrant (i.e. of the emperor, who had banished him). This presupposes the change in affairs at the passing of the rule from Domitian to Nerva. Cf. Dio Cass. lxxviii. 1 f. ; Victorinus on Rev. x. 11 (cf. what immediately follows) ; Lact. De Mort. Persec. 3 ; Eus. H. E. iii. 20. 10. The exile on Patmos and the writing of Rev. are assigned expressly to the time of Domitian by Victorinus in Apoc. (Migne, v. col. 333) ; Eus.

H. E. iii. 18. 1 f., 20. 11, 23. 1; Chron. ad a. Abrah. 2109 and 2113 (cautious only in regard to Rev., whose genuineness he doubted); Jerome, Vir. Ill. ix.; contra Jovin. i. 26; pseudo-Chrys. in the discourse (Montfaucon, viii. 2. 131) referred to above, p. 198. Victorinus of Pettau, circa 300, remarked (loc. cit.) in Apoc. x. 11: "Hoc dicit propterea quod, quando hæc Joannes vidit, erat in insula Pathmos in metallo damnatus a Domitiano Cesare. Ibi ergo vidit apocalypsin. Et cum jam senior putaret, se per passionem accepturum receptionem, interfecto Domitiano judicia eius soluta sunt, et Joannes de metallo dimissus sic postea tradidit hanc eandem, quam acceperat a deo, apocalypsin." The publication of Rev. after the return from Patmos is referred to in the statement of the renewed prophecy given in Rev. x. 11. Clearly Victorinus follows here an older narrative. In comparison with this, Epiphanius appears entirely innocent of the old tradition and lacking sound intelligence when (Hær. li. 12, 33) he places the exile, the writing of Rev., and the return from Patmos in the reign of Claudius (41-54), and at the same time (li. 12) makes John at ninety years of age write his Gospel "after the return from Patmos." To be sure, he seeks in some degree to adjust the contradiction between this statement of John's age and the name of the emperor under whom he is said to have lived out his exile and returned, since he introduces, or seems to introduce, a considerable number of years of residence in Ephesus between the return from Patmos and the writing of the Gospel (above, p. 197, n. 8). The contradiction, however, is but poorly veiled, for no sensible man will use the words "after the return from Patmos, which occurred under Claudius," to fix chronologically an event which, according to the statement of John's age, and according to the old tradition, happened about forty years after the death of Claudius. Of still less value is the opinion of Can. Mur. line 48—an opinion only incidentally expressed and as self-evident—that John, who, in comparison with Paul, was the older Apostle (Gal. i. 17), also wrote the messages to the seven Churches of Asia before Paul wrote his letters to the seven Churches. Cf. GK, ii. 70. The oft-mentioned Syriac History of John, which knows nothing of Rev. and does not name Patmos, represents John as banished by Nero and again set free by him (Wright, i. 60 ff.). Prochorus transfers the exile on Patmos to the time of Trajan or, according to another reading, of Hadrian (cf. the writer's Acta Jo. pp. 45, 46, 173, xxii, cxxv). To the emperor under whom John again received his freedom, he gives no name at all (p. 151). An indirect witness for the tradition supported by Irenæus is furnished by the opinion which repeatedly crops out, that Rev. is the last, or one of the last, writings of John and of the N.T. This is the view of Hippolytus, when he conceives of Rev. as written later than the Gospel (above, p. 197, n. 10). Furthermore, the employment of Rev. xxii. 18 f. to express the thought that it is sacrilege to add anything to the holy record of the N.T. revelation as of equal worth, seems to presuppose that Rev. is the last apostolic writing. Cf. Anonym. Contra Montan. in Eus. H. E. v. 16. 3; Iren. iv. 33. 8, v. 30. 1; Tert. Contra Hermog. xxii.; GK, i. 112 ff.

15. (P. 184.) According to Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16, Papias is witness for 1 John (cf. vol. ii. 185 f., n. 1). It is very significant that the Syriac translation of Eusebius (cf. ThLb, 1893, col. 472), already known to Ephrem, and consequently originating at the latest about 360, freely renders this passage:

"This writer makes use of Papias as witness (for portions) of the letters of John and of Peter." By this there would not perhaps be meant several letters of John and of Peter; but the Syrian, who knew or recognised only the one letter of John and the one of Peter, included these both in one plural. The designation of Christ as αὐτὴ ἡ ἀληθεια in the preface of Papias (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 3, cf. ἡ αὐτοαλήθεια in Orig. tom. vi. 3 in Jo.) reminds one very strongly of 3 John 12. Polycarp's statement (ad Phil. vii. : πὰς γὰρ ὁς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν) has a much clearer connection with 2 John 7 than with 1 John iv. 2f. On this point, as well as in regard to the similarity of Barnabas to the Epistles of John, cf. GK, i. 905 f.

16. (P. 184.) Concerning the method of citation mentioned on p. 184 f., above, cf. the examples given in GK, i. 210 f. Even by such a learned man as Origen there is nothing more common than this carelessness. For new examples, cf. tom. i. 23 in Jo., κατὰ τὸν Παῦλον . . . ἐν τῇ πρὸς Κορινθίους; just the same i. 31; further, ii. 7, ἐν τῇ πρὸς Θεσσαλονικεῖς. So also i. 33, ἐν τῇ Ἰωάννου ἐπιστολῇ (= 1 John ii. 1), besides i. 22, ἐν τῇ καθολικῇ ἐπιστολῇ ὁ Ἰωάννης; Ambros. in Ps. xxxvi. (ed. Bened. i. 777); Jerome, ad Eph. vi. 5, Vall. vii. 667.

17. (P. 185.) With reference to the Johannine Epistles in the Can. Mur. lines 28-34, 68, cf. GK, ii. 48-52, 88-95; on the other evidences for the Epistles, cf. i. 209-220, 374 f., 739, 759, 905 f.

18. (P. 186.) In the matter of Origen's witness to 2 and 3 John as given in Eus. H. E. vi. 25. 10, cf. GK, i. 211. For the testimony of Dionysius, cf. H. E. vii. 25. 11. And for the testimony of Eusebius himself, cf. H. E. iii. 24. 17, 25. 3. In the latter passage, at the end of the Antilegomena, he mentions ἡ ὀνομαζομένη δευτέρα καὶ τρίτη Ἰωάννου, εἴτε τοῦ εὐαγγελιστοῦ τυγχάνουσαι εἴτε καὶ ἐτέρου ὁμωνύμου ἐκείνου. Here Eusebius evidently has in mind John the presbyter who was discovered by him. So is he understood by a later writer who quotes from him (TU, v. 2. 170). But in the passage where Eusebius communicates his discovery of the presbyter John (iii. 39. 5-6), he makes use of him only in reference to Rev., just as the double tomb of John at Ephesus is employed by him and before him by Dionysius (Eus. vii. 25. 16) only for the hypothesis of a second John as the author of Rev., not as the author of the shorter Epistles. Jerome (Vir. Ill. ix.) has nothing to say about the very clearly stated hypothesis of Eusebius regarding the presbyter John as the author of Rev.; in fact he turns against it the material offered him through Eusebius and the mere hints which Eus. gives (iii. 25. 3) as to the boastful assertions respecting the Epistles (Vir. Ill. ix. after the discussion of 1 John: "reliquæ autem duo. . . . Johannis presbyteri asseruntur, cuius et hodie alterum sepulcrum apud Ephesum ostenditur; et nonnulli putant, duas memorias eiusdem Johannis evangelistæ esse," etc. Later (Vir. Ill. xviii.) he infers as does Eus. (H. E. iii. 39. 4-6) from the preface of Papias, that a presbyter John—a different person from the apostle—had been the teacher of Papias, and continues: "Hoc autem dicimus propter superiorem opinionem (i.e. Vir. Ill. ix.), qua a plerisque rettulimus traditum, duas posteriores epistulas Johannis non apostoli esse, sed presbyteri." Jerome does not even know how to quote himself accurately. Cf. v. Sychowski, Hieron. als Literarhist. S. 91, 107.

19. (P. 187.) James stands before his brother John three times in Matt. nine times in Mark, three times in Luke. John precedes James only in Luke viii. 51, ix. 28; Acts i. 13. The use of οἱ (νιοί or τοῦ) Ζεβεδαίου without the proper name is found only in Matt. xx. 20, xxvi. 37, xxvii. 56; John xxi. 2; beside the names of the sons, Matt. iv. 21, x. 2; Mark i. 19, iii. 17, x. 35; Luke v. 10. In regard to John as the youngest of all the apostles, cf. the writer's Acta Jo. p. cxxxiv f.; in addition to this, cf. Theod. Mops. Comm. in Jo. (Syriac ed. Chabot, p. 3. 16).

20. (P. 187.) Cf. the discussion regarding the brothers and the cousins of Jesus, Forsch. vi. 225-363, especially 338-341.

21. (P. 188.) Mark x. 35 represents the sons of Zebedee as themselves presenting the request. At the same time the statement (Matt. xx. 20) that their mother came before Jesus with them and was herself the spokesman sounds most credible. Mark and still more Luke, who gives no account of this incident, leads the reader, who knows the story through the sequence of the narratives in Mark ix. 33-40, Luke ix. 46-55, to suppose that the brothers were very actively concerned in the dispute for position. According to Luke xxii. 24-34, cf. John xiii. 4-17, the dispute was renewed at the time of the Last Supper, and Peter also appears to have had a part in it.

22. (P. 191.) Iren. iii. 3. 4. In regard to this passage and the entire testimony of Irenæus as to the relation of Polycarp to John, cf. Forsch. iv. 259 f., vi. 72-78, 96-109.

23. (P. 192.) Eus. H. E. iii. 5. 2 f.; Demonstr. ev. vi. 18. 14; Epiph. De Mens. xv.; Hær. xxix. 7, xxx. 2 (cf. vol. ii. 588 f., n. 3), cf. Theod. Mops., ed. Swète, i. 115 f.

24. (P. 192.) Iren. iii. 3. 4 (as given in Greek in Eus. iv. 14. 6): καὶ εἰσὶν οἱ ἀκηκόυτες αὐτοῦ (i.e. of Polycarp), ὅτι Ἰωάννης, ὁ τοῦ κυρίου μαθητής, ἐν τῇ Ἐφέσῳ πορευθεὶς λούσασθαι καὶ ἰδὼν ἔσω Κήρινθον, ἐξήλατο τοῦ βαλανείου μὴ λουσάμενος, ἀλλ' ἐπειπὼν: "φύγωμεν, μὴ καὶ τὸ βαλανεῖον συμπίσῃ ἔνδον οὗτος Κηρίνθου τοῦ τῆς ἀληθείας ἐχθροῦ." No suspicion can be attached to this narrative of Polycarp's, traced back so definitely to ear-witnesses, who were still living in the time of Irenæus, through the very similar narratives of Epiph. Hær. xxx. 24, in which Ebion takes the place of Cerinthus (GK, ii. 757). If, in all probability, the latter account goes back to Leucius, who wrote earlier than Irenæus, then it is a significant confirmation of the historicity of Polycarp's narrative. Leucius, who was at least connected with the school of Valentinus (vol. ii. 73, n. 7), and therefore not so greatly out of sympathy with the teaching of Cerinthus, although he was anti-Judaistic, has substituted the name of Ebion for Cerinthus, which he has probably retained beside it as "Merinthus"; cf. the writer's Acta Jo. p. cxxxviii. The anecdote is of itself not possible of invention. What inventor of legends would represent an apostle as frequenting a public bathing-place. In Epiph. (op. cit.) one can read how offensive this story from a secular source was to the pious taste. But it could not even have been invented fifty or sixty years after the death of John, if the fact was not established that Cerinthus in the lifetime of John had been prominent in Ephesus as a heretic.

25. (P. 192.) Polycarp's position in the question of the Passover we know through Iren. Ep. ad Vict. in Eus. H. E. v. 24. 16 (Forsch. iv. 283-303, where the present writer believes he has contradicted old errors, and has made clear for the first time the real facts in the case); cf., further, Polyc. Ep. ad Vict. in Eus. H. E. v. 24. 1-8.

26. (P. 193.) Of the narratives regarding John which cannot be traced nearer to their sources, the one that claims special confidence is in Clement (Quis Div. xlii.), beginning with the words, ἄκουσον μῦθον, οὐ μῦθον ἀλλὰ ὄντα λόγον περὶ Ἰωάννου τοῦ ἀποστόλου παραδεδομένον καὶ μνήμη πεφυλαγμένον, not poorly rendered by Herder in the legend, "Der gerettete Jüngling," cf. Acta Jo. p. cxl ff.; Forsch. vi. 16-18, 199. Further seems genuine what Jerome on Gal. vi. 10 (Vall. vii. 528 f., at all events according to one of the Greeks named on p. 370, probably according to Origen) related of the decrepit John, who, brought by his disciples into the assembly, could utter nothing but the ever repeated word Filioli, diligite alterutrum. So the story of John playing with the partridge, though originating with Leucius, has nothing made up about it (Acta Jo. pp. cxxxvi, 190). The resurrection of a dead man at Ephesus through the agency of John, which is testified to by Apollonius (in Eus. v. 18. 14) in the year 197, is perhaps identical with the interesting account Acta Jo. pp. 188. 33-190. 2, and also p. cxxxvi.

27. (P. 193.) The expression concerning the death of John at Ephesus, παρέμεινε αὐτοῖς μέχρι τῶν Τραϊανῶν χρόνων, twice used by Irenæus (ii. 22. 5, iii. 3. 4), particularly in comparison with the similar assertion in regard to Polycarp (also in iii. 3. 4), allows of no other conception than that of a natural death. When at this same time Polycrates (Eus. iii. 31. 3, v. 24. 3) writes, ἔτι δὲ καὶ Ἰωάννης ὁ ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος τοῦ κυρίου ἀναπεσὼν, ὃς ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορεκὼς καὶ μάρτυς καὶ διδάσκαλος, οὗτος ἐν Ἐφέσῳ κεκοίμηται, he characterises John, in the first place, according to John xiii. 25, as the Evangelist; secondly, as the high priest (as Epiph. Hær. xxix. 4, lxxviii. 14, characterises the Lord's brother James, an idea which probably arose in connection with the priestly origin of Mary and Salome; cf. above, p. 87); thirdly, as a witness and teacher, both of which he was in all the writings that bear his name, as well as in his preaching (John i. 14, xix. 35, xxi. 24; 1 John i. 1-4, iv. 14; Rev. i. 2; cf. Forsch. vi. 208-214). That Polycrates could have thought of μάρτυς in the sense of martyr, as he directly afterwards uses it of Polycarp and Thraseas, is improbable also, because, as in the case of these two, he would have placed the μάρτυς as designating the manner of John's death directly after the other titles. Otherwise he must have seen a martyrdom perhaps in the banishment to Patmos, Rev. i. 9. That prophecy regarding the sons of Zebedee, which is given in Mark x. 38 f., Matt. xx. 22 f., and which was fulfilled literally only in the case of James, gave early opportunity for explanatory interpretations, providing a Lat. fragment under Polycarp's name were genuine (Patr. Ap. ii. 171, with the necessary emendation Acta Jo. p. cxix). At all events, such interpretations were forthcoming from Origen and many later than he. On the other hand, this prophecy also gave rise to the invention of the legend regarding the immersion of John in boiling oil and his drinking a cup of poison (Acta Jo. pp. cxvi-cxxii). All this, and especially the silence of Irenæus, who had in his possession the work of Papias, would be incomprehensible or rather impossible, if, as has been often maintained, Papias had stated that the apostle John had been killed by the Jews. In one passage of the Chronicle of Georgios Hamartolos, about 860, where, according to all other manuscripts, he testifies to the peaceful death of John (ἐν εἰρήνῃ ἀνεπαύσατο), a single MS. has the direct contrary, μαρτυρίῳ κατηξίωται, and adds to this further that Papias says of John, in the second book of his work, ὅτι ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνηρέθη, by which the prophecy of Mark x. 39 was fulfilled in regard to him as well as in regard to his brother James (Georg. Hamart., ed. Muralt, p. 336, præf. xvii. f.; Nolte, ThQSc, 1862, S. 466 f.). De Boor, TU, v. 2. 170, has published from a collection of extracts, essentially the same thing in this form: Παπίας ἐν τῷ δευτέρῳ λόγῳ λέγει ὅτι Ἰωάννης ὁ θεολόγος καὶ Ἰάκωβος ὁ ἀδελφὸς αὐτοῦ ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνηρέθησαν. That this MS. of Georgios is interpolated at this place, is just as certain as that in the second book of Papias there must have been something which served as a basis for the two extracts (cf. De Boor, 177 ff.). We do not possess the text. Just after this place the interpolator of Georgios has reproduced a passage from Orig. tom. xvi. 6 in Mt. most inexactly and with absolute incorrectness. The second excerptor shows by ὁ θεολόγος that he is not quoting the words of Papias. That which is common to both, namely, Ἰωάννης ὑπὸ Ἰουδαίων ἀνηρέθη, will remain as the expression of Papias. But who is the John of whom Papias speaks? Certainly not his teacher, the presbyter John of Ephesus, or an apostle John, to be distinguished from him, who possibly might have been a martyr in Palestine and never have come to Ephesus. For, in the first place, Papias knew only one John of the apostolic generation (vol. ii. 435 f.); and, secondly, in both of these cases the silence of Irenæus and all the testimony of those witnesses, among whom Irenæus is merely the clearest, would be incomprehensible. The question must, then, deal with another John, who can be no other than the Baptist: Commodianus, Apol. 222 (Judæi), Johannem decollant, jugulant Zachariam ad aras: Pseudo-Cypr. Adv. Jud. 2, Johannem interimabant Christum demonstrantem. Still more mistakenly and yet just as certainly does Theop. (Lat. ed.) In Evr. (Forsch. ii. 56, Text and Anm.) say the same thing in regard to the Baptist. Whoever thinks it improbable that Byzantine excerptors have transferred to the Apostle an expression of Papias concerning the Baptist, let him read the communication of Conybeare in the Guardian of July 18, 1894. The above mentioned Varlapet (above, p. 196, n. 3) calls Polycarp a "disciple of the Baptist," referring to the much older Ananias Sharkuni, who had rightly called him a "disciple of the evangelist John." Cf., besides, Acta Jo. cxviii, and more in detail Forsch. vi. 147-151.

28. (P. 193.) The last chapter of Leucius' Acts of John is preserved for us in what the Syriac version and the Armenian version, which is attributed to the fifth century, have in common with the Greek texts, and is confirmed not only by the silence of those who possessed the book, but incidentally also by their positive statements, e.g. Epiph. Har. lxxix. 5, cf. Acta Jo. pp. xciv-cxii, 238-250, also p. 235; Acta Ap. Apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part i. 215. Augustine is the oldest witness for the superstition that John still breathes in his grave and thereby lifts the surface of the earth; cf. the writer's Acta Jo. pp. 205, xcviii, cxviii. In the same work, cf. pp. cliv-clxxii in regard to the various places where people later believed him to be buried, and the building connected with them.

§ 65. THE TESTIMONY OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL TO ITS AUTHOR.

John, whom we may venture to call the author of the Johannine writings, did not, like Matthew and Mark, prefix a title to his Gospel. Nor did he, like Luke, write a preface, or a dedication taking the place of a preface, in which the author, addressing the first reader or readers of his book, discussed the presuppositions and purpose of his literary work; since what is called the prologue to John (John i. 1-18) is an introduction of an entirely different sort. But in two later passages of his book (xix. 35, xx. 31), addressing his readers, John does speak concerning the reasons why he wrote, and in the first of these of his own, the narrator's, relation to the facts which he recorded. The occurrence of a "you" addressed to the readers in the midst of a narrative in which there is nothing else to indicate that it is of the nature of a communication, and to which no dedication is prefixed giving it a certain resemblance to a letter, is something unheard of in literature (n. 1). It is the language of the preacher addressing his congregation. This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that in both passages the purpose of the written narrative is declared to be the upbuilding of the religious life of the readers. The narrative is a means used for the accomplishment of the preacher's end. It is, therefore, a sermon addressed to a definite group of hearers, or rather, since it is in written form, a definite group of readers. From this it follows at once that the readers for whom John wrote his book were Christians, with whom he was acquainted and who knew him. That they belonged to the Church is in no way rendered doubtful by the fact that Christian faith is declared to be the goal to which the readers are to be led by the testimony of John. For it is a peculiarity of the Fourth Gospel frequently to speak of a relative unbelief, and of a beginning of belief in those who in a general sense have already become and are believers (n. 2). Furthermore, the language of the Gospel, especially xx. 31, shows very clearly that the reference is not to a first beginning of belief, but to the strengthening of already existing faith, and to the increase of the blessedness that accompanies living faith. The entire character of the book is against the assumption that it is intended to be a written sermon for the conversion of persons not yet believers. To address as "you" the indefinite and unknown "public" into whose hands the book might fall, especially a Gentile or Jewish public of this character, would show a lack of good taste quite unparalleled. With the help of the tradition (above, pp. 179 f., 194 f.) we may define the first impression of xix. 35, xx. 31 as follows: In imagination John sees the Church of Ephesus, or all the Christians of Asia, gathered about him, and in important passages of his book he addresses them directly. Under ordinary circumstances in written, as in oral, discourse the "you" which is twice used would correspond to an "I" representing the speaker. This is not only wanting in xix. 35, xx. 31, but throughout the entire book, and the question arises what substitute for it was chosen by the author who was known to the readers.

Omitting for the present the consideration of the supplement (chap. xxi. § 66), we observe that, while "I" does not occur in the prologue, "we," which includes the author, is used three times (i. 14, 16). When John compares the existence of the Logos, who became flesh upon earth, with the visible appearance of the glory of Yahweh during the flight out of Egypt and its descent upon and into the tabernacle, he immediately represents himself as one of the group of men among whom the Logos dwelt in the flesh as in a tent. Consequently he was also one of the men who beheld the glory of the Logos shining through the veil of the flesh when He dwelt among men; and, finally, he was one of those, all of whom had received from the fulness which this one personality held within itself grace upon grace (n. 3). The use of the aorist three times in these statements, the subject of the last verb and the object of the first, make the writer's meaning perfectly clear. John does not regard himself as simply one of the contemporaries and fellow-countrymen of Jesus who saw Him occasionally and heard Him speak, but reckons himself, just as clearly as is done in 1 John i. 1-4, iv. 14, among "the eye-witnesses from the beginning"—the disciples who believed on Jesus and were in constant fellowship with Him; since Jesus had revealed His glory, not to those who had seen some of His wonderful deeds, or who had only heard of Him (ii. 23 ff., vi. 2, 14, 26, 36, xii. 37 ff., xv. 24), but to the disciples who believed on Him (ii. 11; cf. i. 51, xi. 40). To this circle the author belonged.

When first mentioned, the two disciples of John, who were the first to attach themselves to Jesus shortly after His baptism (i. 35-39), appear without names. It is not until later, and then in a very circumstantial way,—when something is to be narrated about Peter,—that we learn that one of these was Andrew, Peter's brother (ver. 40 f.). The thoughtful reader asks, "Who is the other of these first two disciples of Jesus?" One would naturally suppose that this particular evangelist, who is the only one to relate how a group of disciples was first gathered about Jesus, and who gives details about more disciples than do the other evangelists (n. 4), must have regarded these first two disciples as of equal importance. Our wonder is increased when we read ver. 41. According to the correct reading, which is to be accepted more because of its originality than because of strong external testimony, it is stated with marked emphasis that Andrew, the first of the two disciples, finds his own brother, which implies that after Andrew the other of the two disciples, whose name is not mentioned, also finds his brother, whose name is likewise unmentioned (n. 5). To everyone who can read Greek it is perfectly clear between the lines that, in addition to the two brothers Andrew and Peter, there must have been two other brothers who left John and became disciples of Jesus. The more peculiar this suppression of the names of the second pair of brothers and the mere suggestion of an event which clearly was of importance to the author seem, the more imperative is it that we ask the reason for the peculiarity. In all four lists of the apostles the two brothers whom John mentions, Andrew and Peter, are associated with two other brothers, John and James, and the names of these four always stand at the head of the lists. It is more than conjecture to suppose that the two brothers associated with Peter and Andrew in John's account of the call of the disciples are the same as those who in the lists of the apostles without exception sustain the same relation to them. This enables us also to explain why these four names always come first. They were the first of the apostles who became disciples of Jesus. This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that in all four of the lists Philip occupies the fifth place, as in John, and Nathanael, who is sixth in John's account—if he be identical with Bartholomew—occupies this same position in the lists of Matthew, Mark, and Luke, being seventh only in Acts i. 13 (n. 6).

For the present we may conclude our proof of the identity of the unnamed brothers in John i. 35-41 with James and John by calling attention to the further fact that these two apostles, who, according to the testimony of all the other tradition, together with Peter stood closest to Jesus, and who are distinguished by the place given them in the lists of the apostles and by the rôle which they played in Acts (above, p. 187 f.), are never mentioned by name in the Fourth Gospel. Nor is their father, Zebedee, mentioned except in the supplementary chapter xxi. (ver. 2); and, as we have already seen (above, p. 187), even their mother, Salome, is designated as the sister of Jesus' mother without mention of her name. How are we to explain the fact that no mention is made of the names of this family, all the members of which were so close to Jesus, and the fact that in this Gospel, in which the personal characteristics of the members of the apostolic circle are more strongly brought out than in any other, there is complete silence concerning two apostles of the first rank? It is even less possible to think of the omission of the names of the two brothers in John i. 35-41 without connecting this fact with the entire silence of the Gospel concerning James and John, than it is to think of the unnamed brothers among the first four disciples without connecting this fact with the occurrence of the names of James and John among the first four apostles in all the lists. Unless we are willing to assume a multitude of peculiar accidents and to admit that the facts to which attention has been called are a meaningless puzzle, we must admit, as the result of a purely exegetical study, that one of the two disciples whose name is not mentioned in i. 35 ff. was either James or John, and that the brother whose name is likewise unmentioned, whom one of these found and brought to Jesus as Andrew did Peter, was either John or James. But the only credible reason for the absence of the names of James and John and of the entire family in the Fourth Gospel, is the aversion of the author of this book to introducing himself by the use of "I," or by the use of his name, into the history, which to him and his readers was sacred—an aversion which is manifested in different ways by the other evangelists and the author of Acts (n. 7). It is the author of the book who introduces himself and his brother without mention of their names. The author is, or means to represent himself as being, either the unnamed companion of Andrew in i. 35-39, or the brother of this unnamed person not expressly mentioned, of the finding of whom we read between the lines in ver. 41. Which of these two it was is determined by the character of the narrative in vv. 35-39. While there is no account of the finding of the brother by the companion of Andrew in vv. 35-39, it is either the account of something the author experienced, or a skilful imitation of such an experience (n. 8). The unnamed person is, therefore, the narrator, who with Andrew followed Jesus at the suggestion of his former teacher, and who after hours of conversation with Jesus became convinced that He was the Messiah, and who, like Andrew, but somewhat later, brought his own brother to the newly-found teacher. It is easier still to determine whether the narrator was John or James. Not only does tradition unanimously make John the author, but it is impossible that James, who was put to death in the year 44 (Acts xii. 2), should have been the author of this Gospel, which was certainly written much later. Nor is it conceivable that a writer of a later time should have identified himself with this James who died at such an early date, and who was so little prominent after the death of Jesus, and that this identification should have been entirely without result. The author was, therefore, John, the son of Zebedee.

Since the six men, whose first contact with Jesus is narrated in i. 35-51, accompanied Him on His journey to Galilee (i. 43), and are represented as being among the witnesses of His wonderful deeds (i. 50 f.), it is self-evident that wherever in the further course of the Gospel the disciples of Jesus are mentioned (ii. 2, 11, 12, 17, 22, iii. 22, iv. 2, 8, 27-38) these disciples are meant, or at least included. This name is also applied to all those who, through their faith in Jesus and at least a temporary attachment to Him, are distinguished from the multitudes who come and go (iv. 1, vi. 60-66, vii. 3, viii. 31, ix. 27 f., xix. 38). But where "the disciples" are spoken of as the travelling companions of Jesus, or His regular followers, or His companions at table, it is made clear in various ways that those are meant whom Jesus had appointed at the beginning to share His work, whom He had attached to Himself, and twelve of whom He had chosen to be apostles at a time not definitely indicated by John (n. 9). Where individuals belonging to this circle are mentioned by name they are always those who, from the other sources we know, belonged to the circle of the Twelve, namely, Andrew (vi. 8, xii. 22), Peter (vi. 8, 68, xiii. 6-9, 24, 36-38, xviii. 10, 11, 15-18, 25-27, xx. 2-7), Philip (vi. 5-7, xii. 22, xiv. 8), Thomas (xi. 16, xiv. 5, xx. 24-29), Judas the traitor (vi. 71, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 11-26-30, xviii. 2-9), and the other Judas (xiv. 22). When Philip and Peter reappear in the narrative, it is assumed that they are already known from chap. i. On the other hand, Thomas and Judas are introduced as if heretofore unknown. While Andrew is introduced in vi. 8 as a new figure, it is done in such a way that the reader recalls i. 40, just as he recalls i. 44 in connection with the third mention of Philip in xii. 21. Attention is never again called to i. 35-39, 41, and the two unnamed brothers. It is not until xiii. 23-25 that an unnamed person belonging to the inner circle of the disciples is once more brought into prominence, and then again in xix. 26-35 and xx. 2-10, with unmistakable reference to xiii. 23. One of the disciples reclining with Jesus at the table occupied the place at His right, which is explained by the remark that Jesus had a special fondness for him. The confidence which was a natural result of this fondness is evidenced by the fact that the disciple arose from his place, which was lower down and removed somewhat from the Lord, and, leaning on Jesus' breast, quietly whispered to Him the question about the identity of the traitor. Who is this disciple for whom Jesus showed a special love, which was distinguished from His love to all men, and especially to His disciples (xiii. 1, xv. 9, 13), not so much by its greatness or its strength as by His special fondness for the particular personality of this disciple (n. 10)? The answer of the early Church always was, "This unnamed disciple is the evangelist who is identical with the apostle John" (n. 11). And it is difficult to understand how, if we accept the identity of the evangelist with the disciple who leaned on Jesus' breast, the identity of the same with the apostle John can be denied. According to Matt. xxvi. 20; Mark xiv, 17, 20; Luke xxii. 14, 30, no one except the twelve apostles took part in Jesus' last meal, and John itself makes it clear that it was the apostles whom Jesus had chosen for a special service, and particularly for the service of preaching, who sat with Him on the last evening at table, and that the only person among those at the table not really belonging to the circle was the apostle Judas, not some admirer of Jesus who belonged to the larger group of His disciples (n. 9). In view of the entire agreement of the evangelists as to this point, every statement to the effect that others were present at the table is to be regarded as a priori false, and every attempt to derive from the Fourth Gospel itself a conception in contradiction to the more explicit testimony of Matthew, Mark, and Luke is to be regarded as making mockery of the text (n. 12).

The fact that the disciple who leaned on Jesus' breast, like the companion of Andrew in i. 35 ff., is unnamed, is to be explained, as it is in i. 35 ff., by the fact that the author is speaking of himself; and what in the latter instance was inferred from the apparent identity of the two pairs of brothers who were the first disciples, with the two pairs of brothers who are mentioned first in all the lists of the apostles, namely, that the narrator was, like his brother, an apostle, follows directly from the situation in xiii.-xvii. In i. 35 ff. the only question was as to whether John or James was the narrator, which, in view of the time prior to which the Fourth Gospel could not have been written and the unanimous tradition, was decided in favour of John; and both these arguments apply in case of the unnamed narrator in xiii. 23 ff. The fact is also to be taken into consideration, that in the nature of the case the apostle upon whom Jesus bestowed His special friendship must have been one of the three most intimate disciples of Jesus (above, p. 187). If for reasons already mentioned James is out of the question, and if Peter is excluded because in John xiii. 24 and frequently also in other passages he is associated with the unnamed disciple, there remains only the apostle John. This conclusion that the unnamed apostle in xiii. 23 ff. was John is confirmed by the fact that in John xiii. 23 ff., xx. 2-10, and, as will be shown, in xxi. 1-7, 20-25 also—possibly also in xviii. 15-18—this unnamed disciple is associated with Peter, just as was the apostle John, according to other tradition (Luke xxii. 8; Acts iii. 1 ff., iv. 13 ff., viii. 14 ff.; cf. Gal. ii. 9), even before the death of James, the son of Zebedee, who was the third among the intimate apostles of Jesus.

In xix. 26, xx. 2, the unmistakable reference to xiii. 23 makes it certain that the apostle John was among the disciples who stood near the cross and hastened to the grave; but in xviii. 15, according to the reading supported by the strongest evidence (ἄλλος μαθητής, without the article), a disciple is introduced in association with Peter, who for the time being is left unidentified. While formally it is possible to assume that here some person other than the apostle John is meant, the analogy of xiii. 23, where in the same manner, without regard to his earlier reference to himself in i. 35 ff., the apostle is introduced as merely one of the disciples, and, afterwards characterised by his special relation to Jesus, shows that this assumption, while possible, is not necessary. Certainly the unnamed person in xviii. 15 was one of the apostles, since, together with Peter, he follows Jesus from the place where Jesus was taken prisoner to the palace of the high priest. But in Gethsemane, as at the Last Supper, only apostles were present; and of these Peter, John, and James were especially near to Jesus. When it is further borne in mind that the names of personages so little prominent in the narrative as Malchus (xviii. 10), Mary the wife of Clopas (xix. 25), and Joseph of Arimathea (xix. 38) are mentioned by name in John, and that nowhere save in the passages in which we have discovered the author himself is an apostle introduced as speaking or acting without being mentioned by name, there can be no doubt that the anonymity of the other disciple and apostle (xviii. 15) is to be judged by the analogy of similar passages already discussed. The other disciple is one of the two apostles whom the author, from principle and without exception, introduces only anonymously, i.e. either John or James. But the reasons which in all the other cases were decisive for John and against James are not applicable here. There is nothing in the experience related in xviii. 15–16 to indicate that it was that of the author. The apostle John could have learned this simple incident from his brother James, or from Peter. Nor have we, as in the case of xiii. 23 (xix. 26, xx. 2), a very ancient tradition—found as early as John xxi. 24—that the unnamed person in xviii. 15 is identical with the author. Consequently the unnamed person in xviii. 15 could have been some person other than the author, namely, the apostle James, the son of Zebedee; and if anyone prefers this assumption, and thinks that it explains the noticeable absence in xviii. 15 of a reference to xiii. 23, which is taken up again in xix. 26, xx. 2, there is no decided objection to this view. Not even the consideration that the apostle, who alone had the courage to press his way up to the cross, namely, the evangelist and apostle John, was probably the same disciple who ventured into the palace of the high priest, is decisive (n. 13). But hesitancy in this one instance about deciding which of the two sons of Zebedee is meant does not affect in any way the definiteness of the conclusion based on the other passages, namely, that the author is, or intends to represent himself as, the apostle John.

If the apostle John was not the author, then the author certainly expresses in the strongest possible way his intention of being taken for John, particularly in the one passage (xix. 35) in the narrative where he imagines himself among his readers, and addresses them. The account of Jesus' death on the cross is concluded by the mention of two incidents connected with it—the fact that the soldiers, when they say that Jesus was already dead, did not, as in the case of those crucified with Him, break His legs; and that one of them pierced Jesus' side with a spear, and that blood and water flowed from the wound. That the last-mentioned fact, important as it may be in itself, is incidental in this connection, is proved by the fact that the two quotations, designed to prove that these things took place in fulfilment of prophetic utterances in Scripture (ver. 36 f.), refer only to the fact that the legs were not broken, and that Jesus was pierced with a spear, but not at all to the issue of blood and of water from His side. Nevertheless, the remark which the author inserts between the narrative and the reference to the prophecies which it fulfilled, καὶ ὁ ἑώρακὼς μεμαρτύρηκεν κτλ., refers to the entire contents of vv. 32–34. Since it is not stated that some eye-witness of the event narrated it to others, but as the subject is “he, who saw it,” i.e. the specific eye-witness who has been already mentioned and is known, and since, for grammatical reasons, and because of the contents, the women in ver. 25, and especially the soldiers in ver. 32, are excluded, the only person that can be referred to is the one man who remained loyal to Jesus, who, according to ver. 26 f., stood near the cross during the last moments of Jesus' life,—the disciple whom Jesus particularly loved, the apostle who in xiii. 23 and in xix. 26 is characterised in the same way. The readers here addressed would have recognised the well-known author (above, p. 207) as they did in i. 35 ff., xiii. 23 f. (xviii. 15 f.); they certainly did not ascertain for the first time in xix. 35 who the author was. On the other hand, the modern reader, farther removed from the author, learns for the first time clearly in xix. 35 what can be ascertained from the earlier passages only by inference, namely, that the narrator of the story of the cross and the author of the Gospel are identical with the apostle whom Jesus especially loved. For the μεμαρτύρηκεν relates to the testimony given in the written account that precedes. It is possible that the eye-witness testified to these things orally more than once before he embodied his testimony in a narrative, and that in this passage his thought embraces both the oral and written testimony. But it is impossible to interpret the words as referring to any oral testimony whatsoever without regard to whom it was addressed. The perfect does not exclude the possibility of its reference, primarily or even exclusively, to the written testimony that immediately precedes (cf. i. 34, iv. 18, vi. 65, xiv. 29, xv. 15, xx. 31); while the presents which follow (ἐστίν, λέγει), and the statement that this testimony and word in question are designed to influence the readers addressed to believe (cf. xx. 31), prove that the reference is to the testimony which has just been laid before the readers of the book in the preceding account. As has been already remarked, the author did not write xix. 35 with the purpose in view which it may incidentally serve in our case, namely, to enable his readers here toward the end of the book to discover his identity—something which could have been done much earlier and much more simply. He wrote it rather to make his readers feel that it was an eye-witness who reported the facts which immediately preceded.

INTRODUCTION TO THE NEW TESTAMENT

This conclusion is confirmed by the second and third statements which follow, each of which is connected with what precedes by καί. According to the regular usage of ἀληθινός in John—the retaining of which here is all the more reasonable because ἀληθής is used in the same context—the second clause means that the testimony of the narrator is worthy of the name ; it is testimony in the full sense of the word. In the broad sense any statement which corresponds to the facts may be called a testimony, but the full and original sense of the word is preserved only when one testifies to what he has seen, heard, and in general experienced (n. 14). The third clause goes farther, and says that the witness here testifying speaks the truth, which would by no means necessarily follow from his having been present when the events in question took place, and that he records this truthful account only in order that the readers, like the author, may attain to faith. This is not stated directly with the words, καὶ ἀληθῆ λέγει κτλ., but is introduced by the very much disputed phrase κακεῖνος οἶδεν ὅτι ἀ. λ. Even if the interpretation of the preceding clauses just given be incorrect, it is nonsensical to claim that here in one breath the evangelist claims that his account is that of an eye-witness, and at the same time distinguishes himself, the writer, from the eye-witness who is absent and no longer living (n. 15). At all events, it is a fact that the author, instead of using an "I" or a "we," that would include himself (i. 14 ; 1 John i. 1 ff. ; Acts xvi. 10 ff.),—which formally would be in better keeping with the "you" of the address,—follows the same course as in the preceding narrative, and speaks of himself in the third person (λέγει, n. 7). Theoretically this makes it possible for him to use ἐκεῖνος of himself, the writer, or of "the writer of these things," as he might use οὗτος, or αὐτός, or ὁ τοιοῦτος, which in a discourse where the speaker uses the first person of himself would imply strong emphasis upon the "I" (ix. 37, cf. iv. 26 ; 2 Cor. xii. 3). But if the subject of οἶδα is the same as the subject of μεμαρτύρηκεν and λέγει, there is no reason why it should be emphasised by the use of a demonstrative, and thereby be given a certain contrastive force. The idea, however, that the author himself was conscious of the entire truth of his account, or of his statement about being an eye-witness, would not be expressed in this way, but by αὐτὸς οἶδεν or (αὐτὸς) ἐαυτῷ σύννοιδεν. Nor is it possible to understand what value this appeal to the author's own conscience would have for the readers. In v. 31 f., viii. 13-18, cf. x. 25, 37 f., xiv. 11, they had read how the most guileless of men had acknowledged the insufficiency of His own testimony to Himself. Consequently they would not have understood, nor could they have allowed the exaltation of the disciple above his master and the proud appeal to his own consciousness as the decisive proof of the truth of his statement. Therefore it follows, both from the contents of the passage and from the language used, that the ἐκεῖνος to whom the author appeals is another and a higher one than himself. But it would be only an empty phrase, if the one to whom he appeals to bear witness to the truth of his statement were some person already dead, who can neither affirm nor deny what he says. Nor can God be meant, the only natural expression for which would be ὁ θεὸς οἶδεν. On the other hand, it is quite in keeping with the Johannine usage for ἐκεῖνος to refer to Christ (n. 16). It seems even more natural here than in 1 John; for, in the first place, John has here reached the conclusion of the earthly life of the Lord, and He is the one overshadowing figure in all the preceding narratives. John and his readers know that He who died on the cross lives in the world above; nor can there be any question in their minds that He who in His earthly life showed such wonderfully profound knowledge of the human heart (John i. 42, 47 f., ii. 25, iv. 17 f., vi. 64-71), now from His heavenly throne, to which the cross was only preparatory, knows, proves, and judges even more deeply the innermost thoughts and works of His servants upon earth (Rev. ii. 2, 9, 18, 23). In the second place, as indicated by the address to the readers, John imagines himself in the midst of the assembled congregation. Here, however, the Christians of that time knew Christ to be always invisibly near (Matt. xviii. 20 ; 1 Cor. v. 4 ; Rev. ii. 1). In an address to the assembled congregation, a "Thou knowest that I speak the truth" (cf. John xxi. 15-17) directed to Christ passes naturally into the assurance intelligible to every member, "He, the only one, He who is exalted from the cross to heaven, He knows that His witness on earth speaks the truth, and that he does not here testify out of any feeling of self-complacency in order to represent himself as the only faithful witness among the apostles, but only in order that the readers may possess the same unwavering faith which he himself enjoys." Such an affirmation has the force of an oath. This is the climax of all the testimony of this Gospel to its author. This is not the place to discuss why John makes so much of this testimony, and why he lets it culminate just in this passage in an appeal to Christ, as the highest witness and judge, that has the force of an oath.

The exposition of the actual situation is of itself sufficient refutation of the attempts to make the testimony of the Fourth Gospel refer to some other person than the apostle John (n. 17). Those efforts are frequently influenced by the idea that the author refers to himself in some very mysterious manner. Again there are others who think that between the attempt to identify himself with the intimate disciples of Jesus and the consciousness that he was making a false claim, the author's attitude becomes one of wavering. To the extent that this opinion is based upon xix. 35 it must fall to the ground of its own weight, even if the preceding interpretation of this passage be incorrect. Since it is inconceivable that, at the very moment when for the first time, with the exception of the general testimony of i. 14, he unhesitatingly describes his account as that of an eyewitness, the courage and intelligence of the author should have failed him, to such an extent as no longer to render him able in intelligible language to say to his readers that he himself is this eye-witness, or that he is someone else who received his information directly or indirectly from the eye-witness. If this was the actual relation of the author to the apostle John, then i. 14 is a weak attempt to deceive the readers as to the real facts, and xix. 35 is the halting confession of a false witness who is no longer able to maintain his rôle. But granted that the contradiction between i. 14 and xix. 35 can be got rid of, by proving in the former passage, with the aid of exegetical art, that it is not the testimony of an eye-witness, and by reading into xix. 35 the clear confession of the author who was not the eye-witness as to his actual relation to this person, yet the consistent silence of the Gospel concerning the apostle John and his entire family in i. 35 ff., xiii. 23 ff., xviii. 15 ff., xix. 26 f., 35, xx. 2-8 is an unsolvable riddle, or rather an unreasonable and purposeless trifling. If, as the fact that they are twice addressed would seem to indicate, the author was known to the readers, as the writer of a letter is usually known to the persons whom he addresses, the avoidance of the use of "I" and of "we" in the narrative, and his constant suppression of his own name and that of his family, is not to be considered an aimless attempt to create an air of mystery, even less so than is the similar procedure of Mark; but it is an expression of that sense of fitness which in various ways meets us everywhere in the historical literature of this time, Christian and non-Christian alike. Therefore, the only question is whether the witness of the Gospel to its author, which was clear to the original readers at once, and is so to the modern reader after a little reflection, is worthy of credence or not. The testimony of the post-apostolic Church as to the origin of the book (§ 64) does not so confirm its witness and correspond so exactly to it that it may be regarded as simply an echo of it; for, with regard to the time and place of the composition of the Gospel, concerning which the tradition of the ancient Church gives very definite information, no clear testimony is to be derived from John i.-xx., of which the tradition of the origin of the Fourth Gospel in Ephesus late in the apostolic age might be regarded as a reflexion.

1. (P. 207.) As to addressing a person to whom a writing is dedicated, apart from the dedication itself, cf. above, pp. 81, 85, nn. 2, 10. Concerning Just. Dial. viii. cxli., cf. ZfKG, viii. 45 f. As a rule, such direct address occurs also in writings at the beginning of which there stands a dedication, but in such cases only at the end of the entire writing or at the transition from one book of a larger work to another, so that xx. 31 would be less striking than xix. 35. The address xx. 31 is not without example even in writings in which the preface has not the form of a letter of dedication (Jos. Vita, 76; cf. Ant. i., Proem. 2). On the other hand, the direct address, xix. 35, is unprecedented in historical literature. There is, of course, no parallel here with such narratives as the accounts of the death of Polycarp or of the martyrs of Lyons, which have throughout the form of epistles (Patr. Ap., ed. maior, ii. 132, 162; Eus. H. E. v. 1. 3); the comparison lies rather with the Passio Perpetuæ (ed. Robinson, p. 62. 13), which, partly in Johannine forms, show that it is intended for reading in the meetings of the Church (pp. 61, 94). In other writings, as in the pseudo-Cyprian ad Novatianum and de Aleatoribus, it appears from addresses, such as fratres dilectissimi, that they are not treatises, but either sermons or letters.

2. (P. 207.) It is indeed said of those who are already believers, that they came to their faith through a new experience, ii. 11, 22, xx. 8, or that they should believe, xi. 15, 40, 42, xiii. 19, xiv. 1, 11, 29, xx. 24-29, or it is denied that they have the right belief, cf. iii. 2 with iii. 11 f., or viii. 30 f. with viii. 45-47; also iv. 41 f., 48-53. It is to be further noted that in xix. 35, xx. 31 is probably to be read with *Ν*Β πιστεύετε* ("may believe"), not πιστεύσῃτε ("shall believe"), and that an author who writes x. 38, ὅνα γνῶτε καὶ γνώσκητε, is conscious of this difference.

3. (P. 209.) The comparison of the Logos appearing in the flesh with the manifestation of the glory of God, Ex. xiii. 21 f., xxxiii. 9 f., xl. 34-38, is warranted not only by the word ἐσκήνωσεν, which the LXX does not employ of the Shekinah (it uses, indeed, κατασκηνοῦν, Num. xxxv. 34; 1 Kings vi. 13), though it is used by Aquila, Ex. xxiv. 16, xxv. 8, but also by the combination of the conceptions σκηνοῦν and δόξα, as well as by the antithesis of the אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד and the law given through Moses (vv. 14, 16, 17; cf. Ex. xxxiv. 6, 29-35); cf. also John ii. 21; Rev. xxi. 3; Ex. xxxvii. 27; Joel iv. 17. Moreover, the metaphorical use of σκήνος, 2 Cor. v. 1, 4, and σκήνωμα, 2 Pet. i. 13 f., for the body may have occasioned the employment of σκηνοῦν in this place, and made the thought more intelligible to the first readers. The circle of the disciples is designated by ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν as the Church, in whose midst the glory of the Logos dwelt in the flesh, as in a tabernacle. But the additional πάντες, ver. 16, does not mean an expansion of this circle to those who later attained to the belief, among whom the Logos had not visibly dwelt—in which case the aorist would not have been adhered to—but is explained from the contrast of the many who received, and the One from whose fulness all drew as from one single source.

4. (P. 209.) In Matt. iv. 18–22, ix. 9, x. 2–4; Mark i. 16–20, ii. 14, iii. 13–19; Luke v. 2–11, 27, vi. 13–16 we are not informed, as we are in John i. 35–51 (al. 52 because of the division of ver. 39), of the organisation of a circle of the disciples. We are told simply of the call of those who already believe on Jesus to follow and work with Him (vol. ii. 541 f.). The Synoptists present to us the character outlines only of Peter, the sons of Zebedee, and Judas the traitor; concerning the publican among the apostles, of whose call we are told (vol. ii. 506 f.), as also of Andrew, very little is said. On the other hand, Peter (i. 40–42, vi. 68, xiii. 6–10, 36–38, xviii. 10–27, xx. 2–10, xxi. 2–22) and the traitor (vi. 70 f., xii. 4–6, xiii. 2, 11, 18–30, xviii. 2 f.) are, at least, as prominent as they are in the Synoptics. However, it is John alone who informs us of the remarks of Philip (i. 43 f., vi. 5–7, xii. 21 f., xiv. 8–10), of Thomas (xi. 16, xiv. 4 f., xx. 24–29; cf. xxi. 2), of Andrew (i. 40 f., vi. 8; cf. xii. 22), of Judas the son of James (xiv. 22), indeed, very characteristic remarks throughout (cf. Luthardt, *Das joh. Ev.*² i. 78–119). The phlegmatic character of Philip, which accounts for the fact that he alone of the first disciples had to be expressly invited (i. 43) by Jesus to join the Twelve, is reflected in the cumbrous confession (i. 45), especially in contrast to the brief εὐρήκαμεν τὸν Μεσσίαν of Andrew (i. 41), which expresses no less exultation than the εὑρηκα of Archimedes. Philip doubtfully makes calculation, while Andrew immediately discovers the means at hand (vi. 5–9). He does not venture to submit the wish of the Greeks to Jesus until he has consulted the more courageous Andrew; while the latter, as is shown by the fact that he is first mentioned, is ready to make the request of Jesus in the name of them both (xii. 21). Also in xiv. 8–10 Philip still appears more than the others as the doubtful one. It would be in special keeping with this character sketch that, as Clem. Strom. iii. 25 declares—probably following the Gospel of Philip—the remark given in Matt. viii. 22, Luke ix. 60 might have been directed to Philip if the apostle, and not the evangelist Philip were meant by it (cf. GK, ii. 766; Forsch. vi. 26, 158 f., 161). The portrait of Thomas, whose name John alone translates (xi. 16, xx. 24; cf. xxi. 2), speaks for itself. Here belongs, too, the fact that only John gives an account of the characteristic remarks of the brothers of Jesus (vii. 3–10), whose attitude toward Jesus as given in the Synoptists is not at all clear (Matt. xii. 46–50, xiii. 55; Mark iii. 21 (?), 31–35, vi. 3; Luke viii. 19–20; Acts i. 14), and that he as well as Luke (i. 26–ii. 51), through important information, gives character to the picture of the mother of Jesus (ii. 3–5, xix. 25–27; cf. ii. 12, vi. 42), which is entirely colourless in the other Gospels. But it is worthy of note that throughout his narrative he calls her merely “His mother,” only once “the mother of Jesus” (ii. 1), and never by her name, which Matthew uses 5 times, Luke (incl. Acts i. 14) 13 times, and Mark at least once. John lets his adopted mother also participate in the anonymity of his whole family.

5. (P. 209.) In John i. 41, ABMT^bXII have πρώτον, also one of the later correctors of *SSS*³, and a few minuscules, among which are two of the Ferrar group (69, 346, on the other hand not 124); Ν*ΛΓΔΑ and the mass of the remainder have πρῶτος. So also Sh. Moreover, there is not much more to gain on this point from the older versions. Sc Ss eliminate the characteristic passage, "and one of these disciples of John: Andrew was his name, the brother of Simon (Kepha,† Sc). And this Andrew saw Simon Kepha on that day (so Ss; only "Simon Kepha," Sc) and said to him," etc. The copyists who corrected πρῶτος to πρῶτον (Ν^c from Ν*) certainly wished to have it understood not adverbially, but as an accusative; because, to designate this deed as the first that Andrew did (cf. Matt. v. 24, vii. 5; John ii. 10, vii. 51; Rom. i. 8), would be meaningless in a connection where nothing of the further action of Andrew is told, and a closer time connection of ver. 40 f. with vv. 35-39 is not expressed at all. Moreover, the accusative (cf. Matt. xvii. 27), which would mean that Andrew, as the first of those whom he found or of all who were found, found Peter, is impossible; because, in the first place, the hypothesis, that Andrew had received and later carried out the command to seek men, would have no support in this connection, while the notion of Delff (Gesch. des Rabbi Jesus, 1889, S. 80), that not Jesus, but Andrew, is the subject of εὕρισκει Φίλιππον, ver. 43, merits no refutation. But, secondly, τὸν ἴδιον would not suit such a connection; instead of this, αὐτοῦ alone would have been more appropriate. We are, therefore, to read πρῶτος. But this finds its antithesis, of course, not in Philip who finds Nathanael later (ver. 45),—about which the reader knows nothing in ver. 41, and to which his attention is not called in ver. 45,—but in the other of the two men who have been already introduced. As the first of the two disciples of John who had followed Jesus, Andrew finds his brother (cf. John xx. 4, 8; Matt. xxii. 25; Rom. x. 19). In this way only is explained the strongly accented τὸν ἴδιον, which, just as πρῶτος here, and as ἴδιος everywhere (especially in connection with ἕκαστος, John xvi. 32; Acts ii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 23, 38), is intended adversely or distributively. Each of the two men finds his brother, but Andrew as the first finds his.

6. (P. 210.) In regard to Nathanael=Bartholomew, cf. vol. ii. 524 and vol. i. 31; in regard to the variation of the list, cf. vol. ii. 522 f. n. 1. Späth (ZfWTh, 1868, S. 168 ff., 309 ff.) wished to show that Nathanael is a pseudonym for the author, who, however, still wishes to pass for the apostle John. Aside from xxi. 2, where Nathanael stands next to the sons of Zebedee, the author through the use of this name would have made it absolutely impossible for the reader to identify him with the nameless disciple of xiii. 23 ff., etc., and especially to recognise in him the apostle of the wholly different name of John. The name Nathanael, which, according to the O.T., the Talmud (vol. i. 22), and Josephus (Ant. vi. 8. 1, xx. 1. 2), has been borne by Hebrews of all times, is said to be an entirely non-Hebrew invention of the Gospel, a Grecised (!) form of Elnathan or Jonathan (S. 324, 329 f.). On the contrary, Hilgenfeld (ZfWTh, 1868, S. 450; cf. also *N.T. extra Can.*² iv. (evangeliorum secundum Heb., sec. Petrum, etc.) 119) held firmly to his theory that Nathanael should = Matthias of Acts i. 23. The Apostolic Church Directory, which counts Nathanael among the twelve apostles, agrees in this with the correct interpretation, while its distinction of Nathanael and Bartholomew is as mischievous an invention as the distinction of Peter and Cephas and the whole catalogue of such distinctions (*N.T. extra Can.*² iv. 111).

7. (P. 211.) In regard to the forms by which the authors introduce themselves in the Gospels, the Acts, and the other N.T. literature, cf. above, pp. 55, 86, n. 11. That Matthew, just as Xenophon or Thucydides, Polybius or Josephus, does not omit his name from the narrative, is fully counter-balanced by the fact that, in distinction from them as well as the other historians of the N.T., he does not in any way identify the author with the Matthew mentioned in ix. 9, x. 3, or even hint at such identification, and that he offers absolutely no sort of substitute for the I of the author which fails in his whole book. That John in the prologue speaks of himself in the first person (plural), but in the narrative in the third person, is not especially remarkable. Josephus and many others have done the same (above, p. 86). The peculiarity of John consists merely in the twofold fact that he addresses the readers in the midst of the narrative (xix. 35; cf. xx. 31, above, p. 223, n. 1), and that in the same narrative where, as over against the "you" of the address an "I" or a "we" would be the more natural and more correct way for an author to designate himself, he retains the third person (μεμαρτύρηκεν, λέγει). But this is no more grossly inconsistent with good style than when one of us signs a letter: "Hearty greetings from your old friend, X," or when, in petitions to a Minister of high rank, the latter is addressed as "Your Excellency" and "You," notwithstanding the writer of the petition, avoiding every "I," speaks of himself constantly as the "your most obedient servant"; or when a popular author writes: "Know, dear reader, that the writer of this is a grandson of the hero of his story." In ancient times, also, we find examples of the same sort of awkwardness. With the more definite ἐγὼ Τέρτιος ὁ γράψας (Rom. xvi. 22), cf. Mart. Polyc. xx. 2, Εὐάρεστος ὁ γράψας, without ἐγὼ (therefore in the third person with ὑμᾶς . . . ἡμῖν); also the appearance of the first and second person, even before the real greeting, which contradicts the style of the ancient form of greeting (see vol. i. 369 f. n. 1); or inscriptions such as those in Hogarth, Devia Cypria, p. 114, No. 36: "Apollonius erected this column to his father and mother according to your own order."

8. (P. 212.) The passage i. 35-39 is one of the most picturesque in the Gospel. The Baptist stands with two of his disciples; his eye falls upon Jesus (35 f., much more colourless ver. 29). The brief exclamation, "Behold the Lamb of God," attracts attention, and results in action (ver. 37). At first, not noticing those who were following Him, Jesus turns around (as He hears their steps) and lets His gaze rest in contemplation upon them. In direct form of speech, question, answer, and rejoinder follow. The Hebraistic form of address is retained. The ever memorable hour of the first meeting with Jesus is exactly noted, though the reader is left to infer the contents of many hours of conversation from the εὐρήκαμεν of Andrew.

9. (P. 213.) In iv. 1 μαθηταί has the wider meaning; but οἱ μαθηταί, which immediately follows in iv. 2, has the narrower meaning, as, of course, is to be understood in iii. 22-iv. 38. They are those who had been drawn by Jesus into His company to work with Him, and therewith commissioned (ἀπεστάλκα, iv. 38, cf. xiii. 20, xvii. 18, xx. 21) His ἀπόστολοι, xiii. 16. The number of the basket, vi. 13, bears witness to the number of these disciples; and where the question has to do with the distinguishing of these followers who adhered to Him from the beginning to the end as against the larger circle of the disciples who only temporarily accompanied Him, this number is three times expressly repeated, vi. 67, 70, 71, otherwise only one other time, xx. 24. It is significant, however, that the apostle John, as well as the apostle Matthew (x. 2) and Mark, who repeats the narratives of an apostle (vi. 30), uses only once the title ἀπόστολος (xiii. 16); while Luke, who was not an apostle, makes use of it 6 times in the Gospel and about 30 times in the Acts. Their installation in office, which John no more narrates than the apostle Matthew, is designated by the former (otherwise only by Luke) as ἐκλέγεσθαι, vi. 70, xiii. 18, xv. 16, 19, while he never uses this word of an act of Jesus which had to do with other men (also ἐκλεκτός, i. 34, 8^{*} Sc Ss etc., only once of the Messiah). It is, therefore, to be considered a bold stroke that F. v. Üchtritz, Studien eines Laien über das Ev. nach Jo. 1876, S. 222, gave to the word in xiii. 18 another meaning from that which it has in vi. 70, particularly since in xiii. 10 f., 18–21, as in vi. 70 f. (cf. xvii. 12), the same antithesis prevails between the whole of those present, whom Jesus had chosen, and the one member of this circle who forms the sad exception. The significance of Jesus' choice of all those present is given us in the thrice repeated the twelve (vi. 67–71); but in chap. xiii. this is expressed by the name ἀπόστολος (xiii. 16) and by the ratification of the remaining disciples in their mission, xiii. 20,—i.e. ἀποστολή (Rom. i. 5; 1 Cor. ix. 2; Gal. ii. 8),—which was made necessary by the desertion of the apostle Judas. Also from the close connection of xv. 16 with ver. 18 it follows that ἐκλέγεσθαι does not signify reception into the number of the believing worshippers,—which no Gospel traces back to an ἐκλέγεσθαι of Jesus,—but to choice as apostles. They are those called to be preachers, xv. 20, 26 f.

10. (P. 213.) With ἀγαπᾶν (xiii. 23, xix. 26, cf. xxi. 7, 20), φιλεῖν (xx. 2) is interchanged, as in the account of the similar relation to the brother and sisters of Bethany (xi. 3, 5, 36). The latter word is not confined to personal friendship (cf. per contra, xvi. 27, xxi. 15–17; 1 Cor. xvi. 22), though it is still the more distinctive expression for it.

11. (P. 214.) Polycrates in Eus. H. E. v. 24. 3, Ἰωάννης ὁ ἐπὶ τὸ στήθος τοῦ κυρίου ἀναπεσών. Similarly Iren. iii. 1. 1; Orig. in Eus. vi. 25. 9; Jerome, Pref. Comm. in Mt. (Vall. vii. 3). By later writers ὁ ἐπιστήθιος; cf. Routh, *Reliquiae Sacrae*², i. 42. The first exegete who formally states, and through appeal to John xxi. 24 establishes, what the others presuppose, namely, that the unnamed person in xiii. 23 is identical with the evangelist and apostle John, is Origen in Jo. (Ed. Preussen) tom. xxxii. 20.

12. (P. 214.) When the Gospel to the Hebrews apparently makes James the Lord's brother take part in the Last Supper (GK, ii. 700), it belongs to the realm of fable, if for no other reason because of the chronological contradiction which the whole narrative of the Supper would thus have with 1 Cor. xv. 7. We can no more infer from this inclusion of James in the circle of John xiii. that the redactor of this Gospel held James for an apostle, than that one who was not an apostle had taken part in the meal (cf. Forsch. vi. 277 f.). Still less can the master of the house in which the Last Supper took place (as Delff, op. cit. 83, would have us believe), be thought of as a table companion, who then is to be identified further with the young man of Mark xiv. 51; for although a friendly relation between Jesus and this house must certainly have existed, it is not to be considered too intimate a one simply because of the question of the disciples (Matt. xxvi. 17; Mark xiv. 12; Luke xxii. 19), and because of the way in which the two disciples are to find the house (Mark xiv. 13). With these facts as well as with such positive statements as Matt. xxi. 17, xxiv. 1-3, xxvi. 6; Mark xi. 11, 15, 19, 27, xiv. 3, 13, 16; Luke xxi. 37, xxii. 10, it is an irreconcilable fancy of Delh's (S. 89, 94) that this house was the regular lodging place of Jesus. The clothing of the young man mentioned in Mark xiv. 51, and the distinction there made between him and the company of Jesus, excludes him from having had any part in the Supper. As to the actual facts in the case, see vol. ii. 491 f. Jesus does not send word to the master of the house that with him and his family, but that with His own disciples He wishes to keep the Passover in his house (Matt. xxvi. 18; Mark xiv. 14; Luke xxii. 11). Jesus and the Twelve made a household and a company at the table (Matt. x. 25; John xii. 6) of more than the requisite size for the Passover meal (cf. Ex. xii. 4). If, according to Jos. Bell. vi. 9. 3, the number of the participants might not be less than 10 (so also the Jerusalem Targum on Ex. xii. 4), but sometimes rose even to 20, yet Josephus took the number 10 as that nearest the average for a basis of his reckoning of those present at the feast.

13. (P. 216.) Here P. Cassel's Das Ev. der Söhne Zebedäi (1870) should be named, and his Die Hochzeit von Cana (1883, S. 49-64). Cassel found these two brothers suggested in i. 35 ff., and recognised in xiii. 23, xix. 26, xx. 2 the John whose name was to some extent to be translated by ὁ ἡγάπα ὁ Ἰησοῦς. James was considered as the one referred to in xviii. 15. But when Cassel, against whose views up to this point there is nothing to be said (see above, p. 209 f.), distinguishes without reason (and no reason can be discovered) the witness and the reporter in xix. 35 from the eye-witness of the death of Jesus in xix. 26 f., he comes to the assertion that the ἑωρακώς, μαρτυρηκώς—who is designated also by ἐκείνος (xix. 35)—is James, and that therefore he and not John is the narrator in chaps. i.-xx. In other words, he claims that James is the actual author of the Gospel (S. 49 f.), which was written, consequently, before 44, and through the addition of chap. xxi. enlarged by his younger brother John at a date considerably after the death of Peter, but published otherwise practically unchanged (S. 52-55). The words, xxi. 24, οἷδαμεν—ἐστίν (very inexactly quoted by Cassel, S. 55) are held by Cassel to be an unguenuine gloss taken from xix. 35. This is not, however, adhered to in his second work, S. 57.

14. (P. 219.) Throughout the Fourth Gospel an actual sense perception, or at least an experience comparable to this, and to be designated by this name, is posited as a presupposition of the μαρτυρεῖν, i. 34, iii. 11, 32 (v. 37), viii. 14, xii. 17 (xii. 41), xv. 27; 1 John i. 1-4, iv. 14; Rev. i. 2; cf. vol. ii. 155 f. n. 9.

15. (P. 219.) The Greek interpreters, in spite of the remarkable phraseology of xix. 35, have clung to the opinion that the evangelist himself is the only subject of all the verbs of this sentence (Chrys. Hom. lxxxv. in Jo., Montf. viii. 507). It is difficult to explain the statement of Cyril of Alexandria (Migne, lxxiii. col. 677), οὐχ ἕκαστον τὰ ἀποκρίνον, on the basis of any other interpretation of the ἐκείνος. This remained the ruling opinion. Even Baur did not make use of the passage to establish his opinion that the author throughout the Gospel pursued his purpose to be known by the readers as the disciple beloved by Jesus, and as John the apostle and the author of the Apocalypse, but refrained, however, from so announcing himself directly. In fact, in xix. 35 as well as in i. 14 it was rather a mere spiritual vision which the author had in mind (Krit. Unters. über die kan. Evv. 1847, S. 364-389). It was his pupil Köstlin (ThJb, 1851, S. 206-211) who, mainly from this passage, and especially from the ἐκείνος, first established the view that the author of John i.-xx. does not identify himself at all with the apostle John,—an identification which is first made by the author of xxi. 24,—but that he distinguishes clearly between himself, the author, and the apostle as his main authority. This was taken up by Hilgenfeld, who, however, more in the view of Baur, held that the purpose of the author was to pass for the apostle. At the same time, instead of following in the line of Köstlin and explaining xix. 35 as an uncontradictory expression of the author, who makes a clear distinction between himself and the apostle, he found in the very unnaturalness of the expression a proof that the author, who had written also xxi. 24 and thereby gave his book out for a work of the apostle, had in the determinative passage unintentionally betrayed his difference from the apostle (Die Evv. nach ihrer Entstehung u. geschichtl. Bedeutung, 1854, S. 341; Der Paschastreit der alten Kirche, 1860, S. 151 f., 403; Einkl. 731). The discussions concerning ἐκείνος in John which this theory occasioned between G. Steitz (ThStKr, 1859, S. 497-506; 1861, S. 267-310) and A. Buttman (ThStKr, 1860, S. 505 ff.; ZfWTh, 1862, S. 204 ff.) have not helped to any clearness of exegesis. It is also of little interest to follow out the opinions of others in their wavering between the interpretations of Köstlin and Hilgenfeld. The present λέγει, with its added purpose in regard to the readers, leaves no doubt that the λέγων is the author who is here addressing the readers, and not some dead authority from whom the author directly or indirectly claims to have received the material and the spirit of his report. Such an authority does not speak to the readers in the present tense. Even if the author in a vivid representation could cite him as a witness still to be heard to-day (cf. i. 15), he could not have cited him as one addressing the readers and having their religious advancement in view. If, however, every reader had to recognize the author as the subject of λέγει, then the author was to be charged not with an ambiguous, but with a meaningless phraseology, in case we understand him as wishing to distinguish between the subject of λέγει—which is not detached from the preceding statement either by a pronoun or in any other way (possibly ὅτι ὁ γράψας ἀληθῆ λέγει)—and the subject of μεμαρτύρηκεν, and so of the ἐνρακάς, and the person again indicated by αὐτοῦ. The only question there can be is as to whether ἐκείνος also indicates the same subject; cf. Forsch. vi. 183 f. and the following note.

16. (P. 220.) The "ἐκείνος" κατ' ἐξοχήν (Schol. on Aristoph. [Nub.], The Clouds, 195, ed. Dindorf, i. 196, compared with the "αὐτὸς ἔφα" of the Pythagoreans) is used in John vii. 11, xix. 21 (ix. 12, 28) by those who stood far aloof from Jesus, or in unfriendly relations with Him. It is also used from a disciple's point of view in 2 Tim. ii. 13, where in the preceding sentence (συνναπεθάνομεν κτλ.) Christ is not named, but is only to be understood as referred to by the pronoun. In 1 John ii. 6, iii. 3, 5, 7, 16, iv. 17, it appears as a firmly established expression. The ὁ θεὸς οἶδεν, 1 Cor. xi. 11, 31 (xii. 2, 3), is formal, and the formulæ for solemn assertion in 1 Thess.

ii. 5, 10; Gal. i. 20; 2 Cor. i. 23, xii. 19; Rom. i. 9, ix. 1; Phil. i. 8 (1 Tim. v. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 1), especially 3 John 12, are to be compared with it as related in kind: To the testimony of the Church is added that of the "truth itself," i.e. of Christ (John xiv. 6; Papias in Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 3). For the truth of his own testimony, however, John does not appeal in this Epistle to his own consciousness, but to the knowledge of the recipient of the letter. Gerhard (Harmonia Ev. ad locum, ed. Jen. 1617, p. 874) mentions certain who have applied the ἐκείνος to the soldier Longinus, who ran the spear into Jesus' side; and others (p. 883) who, in appeal to Rom. ix. 1, have referred it to Christ, as the present writer has done above and in ZjKW, 1888, S. 594. Recently essentially the same interpretation has been advocated by H. Dechent in ThStKr, 1899, S. 446 ff., and Hausleiter, Zwei apost. Zeugen für d. Jo. Ev. 1904, S. 27. Sanday also in The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, 1905, shows himself favourably disposed towards this view, as doubtless others will be; cf. ET, 1905, Nov. p. 51.

17. (P. 221.) The "presbyter John," who owes his existence to the critical needs and devices of Eusebius (vol. ii. 452), served first as a suitable author of Rev., and incidentally also as author of the shorter Epistles of John. More recently the Gospel also has been repeatedly ascribed to him. This hypothesis has been developed in fullest detail by the novelist and dramatic poet Fr. v. Üchtritz [† 1875] (Studien eines Laien über das Ev. nach Jo. 1876), and without any consideration of this predecessor, who was far superior to him in suggestive speculations and in delicacy of treatment by the philosopher H. Delff (Gesch. des Rabbi Jesus von Naz. 1889, S. 67–111; Das 4. Ev. ein authentischer Bericht über Jesus, 1890; Neue Beiträge zur Kritik u. Erklärung des 4. Ev. 1890; ThStKr, 1892, S. 72–104). Both agree that the nameless disciple (i. 35 ff., xiii. 23 ff., xviii. 15 f., xix. 26 ff., xx. 2) is the author of the Gospel, yet not the apostle John, but the presbyter John of Ephesus. Üchtritz makes a few insufficient attempts (S. 220 ff.), while Delff considers it superfluous to demonstrate how it was possible or even probable that one who was not an apostle should partake of the Last Supper—over against the distinct statement of the Synoptics and of the Fourth Gospel itself (above, pp. 214, 227 ff. nn. 9, 12). Both leave unexplained the strange silence of the Fourth Gospel in regard to two of the three apostles who stood closest to Jesus, and as to the entire family of Zebedee (above, p. 211 f.). But both think that they can prove that the author, who appears as a member of the exclusively Galilean discipleship of Jesus (i. 35–51, cf. vii. 52; Mark xiv. 70; Acts ii. 7, in reference to all the disciples in Jerusalem) was no Galilean, but a man of Jerusalem, and did not belong to the regular following of Jesus. That this theory is wrecked by the inseparable connection of chap. i. with chaps. ii.–iv. has been already shown (p. 213 f.). Moreover, the acceptance of interpolations, by which Delff has tried to strengthen his hypothesis (Geschichte des Rabbi Jesus von Naz. S. 97 ff., Das 4. Ev. S. 11–16. If we correct the entirely faulty numbering of the verses in accordance with the reconstruction of the text given in Das 4. Ev. S. 30–94, the following passages are omitted: i. 1–5, 9–18, ii. 1–11, 17, 21–22, iv. 44, 46–54, vi. 1–29, 37–40, 40b, 54b, 59, vii. 39 [45–53 placed before 37, 38, 40–44], xii. 16, 33, 38–41, xiii. 20, xx. 11–18; in 1890, xix. 35–37 was also added),—affords no help as long as there remains i. 51, according to which, even without the textually uncertain ἀπ᾽ αὐτοῦ, the whole number of these newly won disciples are to be from that time onwards the witnesses of the wonder-revelation of Jesus, and as long as there is left xv. 27 (cf. xvi. 4), according to which the whole number of the table companions were constant followers of Jesus. From xix. 27, Uchtritz (S. 287) and Delff (Geschichte Jesu, S. 82) conclude that John possessed a house of his own, and that it was in Jerusalem (as to further fantasies of Delff, see above, p. 227, n. 12). With equal right one might conclude from John xvi. 32 that all the apostles were owners of houses in Jerusalem, and in the same night in which Jesus spoke these final words fled from His presence to their eleven dwellings. Cf. with the expression, Luke xviii. 28; Acts xxi. 6; Jos. Bell. i. 33. 8. Further, ἀπ' ἐκείνης τῆς ὥρας (Matt. xv. 28, xvii. 18) is not the same as ἐν ἐκ τ. ὥρα, John iv. 53; Luke vii. 21, or αὐτῇ τῇ ὥρα, Luke ii. 38, x. 21, xii. 12. The meaning is merely that, from the moment Jesus spoke, John fulfilled the duty of a son to the mother of Jesus, who was now, as it were, deserted—a filial care that must have appeared during the attendance upon the festival in Jerusalem in other ways, which through lack of information cannot be more definitely ascertained, as afterward it showed itself when both had returned to their residences in Capernaum (John ii. 12), whence Mary a few weeks later again came to Jerusalem (Acts i. 14, ii. 7) with the other Galilean women of the company of Jesus (Luke xxiii. 49, 55), her sons and the apostles, to dwell in that city for the future, as did the apostles and brothers of Jesus. The idea that Jesus could not have committed His mother thus to the apostle John, who himself had a mother that believed in Jesus (Uchtritz, S. 204 f.), is due to the mistake of supposing that it was a question of providing John with a mother, instead of Mary with a son, who would consider her sorrow and take care of her as Jesus would have done. The natural sons of Mary were at all events not at that time the right ones for such a service (see vol. i. 104 f., vol. ii. 239 f.; Forsch. vi. 336 f. A. 1). Delff found support for further vagaries in xviii. 15, 16, according to which John was supposed to be a relative of Annas' (rather of Caiaphas', for he is the only one whom John designates as the high priest). But that γνωστός in the Bible, as sometimes γνωτός in the poets since Homer, ordinarily, or exclusively, designates the confidential friend, in the sense of relative, becomes no truer by repetition (e.g. Cremer, Wörterb. 7 S. 223; Baljon, Woordenboek, i. 447). Luke xxiii. 49 is clearly not to be thought of in this connection, while Luke ii. 44 so understood would be a useless redundancy; for that συγγενής designates the more distant, γνωστός the nearer, relative, is in view of Luke i. 61 (cf. i. 36) a groundless assertion. As in Acts x. 24, where the combination ἀναγκαίους φίλους proves that not relatives but trusted friends are to be understood (cf. the proofs in Wettstein), so in Luke ii. 44 relatives and acquaintances are placed together. Moreover, no proof that γνωστός = "relatives" can be found in the LXX. In Neh. v. 10 it is a free translation for שָׂרָם = servant; in 2 Kings x. 11, as is shown by the position of the optimates and sacerdotes (Vulg.) and the "and," by which these three classes are joined to the house of Ahab and the kingly princes (cf. vv. 6-8), relatives are not meant, but friends belonging to the court. No other meaning is apparent in Ps. xxxi. 12, lv. 14, lxxxviii. 9, 18. But Delff found in Polycrates of Ephesus, circa 195 (Eus. H. E. v. 24. 3, above, p. 205, n. 27), another and more definite evidence that the evangelist belonged to the high priestly aristocracy. Inasmuch as he designates the John buried in Ephesus as the evangelist, but not as the apostle, it is claimed that he knew that he was no apostle, and this in contradiction to the conviction of his contemporary and fellow-countryman, Irenæus, of his still older countrymen, the Alogi, and of Leucius Charinus, as well as of all the other heretics and Church teachers before and after his time (above, p. 177 f.). However, his statement ὅς ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πένταλον πεφορεκώς is said to bear witness to the fact that this same John, on one occasion on the Day of Atonement, without being ruling high priest, officiated in the full high priestly dress (Geschichte Jesu, S. 93; 4 Evangelium, S. 9) as substitute for the real high priest, who had been hindered, or, as he puts it later, when this view is rejected (ThStKr, 1892, S. 93), that John was "a priest of the first high priestly rank." The aristocratic reserve which this man of rank, who had leaned on the breast of the Lord, is held to have observed toward the Church of Jesus, we may estimate by the fact that he possibly is identical with the John of Acts iv. 6 (read rather Ἰωανθας) (Delff, Geschichte Jesu, S. 95). He is said to have written his Gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem for the sake of his colleagues in that city (ThStKr, S. 83-90). That the readers are twice addressed would then probably be explained by the fact that he had invited these mentioned in Acts iv. 6 to his reception room, and had read his composition to them, according to the custom of the literary men of the time, before he gave it to the public at large. From beginning to end Delff has made simply an earnest effort to weaken by exegesis and criticism the witness found within the Fourth Gospel itself. Of the subterfuges by which Renan, Weizsäcker, Harnack, and others have thought to reach the same result, even this cannot be said; cf. Forsch. vi. 186-190.

§ 66. THE SUPPLEMENTARY CHAPTER.

No other historical writing in the N.T., and few historical writings of antiquity, have such a clear conclusion as does the Fourth Gospel in xx. 30 f. Having in view the entire contents of the book, which he is now bringing to its close, the author declares to the readers, whom he here addresses for the second and last time (cf. xix. 35, and above, p. 223, nn. 1 and 2), that the σημεῖα of which an account is here given, as contrasted with many other miracles which Jesus performed in the presence of His disciples not recorded in this book, were written that they might believe on Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God, and in this faith might enjoy the life which is to be had in His name. If it be insisted that this distinction between the signs of Jesus, which are recorded in this book, and those which are not recorded, is confined to the resurrection appearances of Jesus (xx. 14–29),—of which there is no indication and which is also extremely improbable, because the word σημεῖα is much less adapted to describe these phenomena than it is the ἔργα and σημεῖα of which announcement is made in i. 51, and which forms the framework of the entire narrative (ii. 11, 23, iii. 2, iv. 45, 54, v. 20, 36, vi. 26, 30, vii. 21, 31, ix. 16, x. 32–38, 41, xi. 47, xii. 11, 18, 37, xv. 24),—then there is all the more reason for regarding chap. xxi. as a supplement to the book, added after its completion. For here also we have the account of a σημεῖον wrought by Jesus in the presence of His disciples, and in xxi. 1, 14 this is connected with the two appearances of the risen Jesus of which an account is given in xx. 19–29, which is described as a third appearance, and which, in the nature of the case, has the same purpose as the preceding accounts. If, when xx. 30 f. was written, the addition of this chapter had been contemplated, the only appropriate place for the verses would have been after xxi. 14, or rather after xxi. 23.

There is clear evidence also that the composition of chap. xxi. has its own peculiar history. In general, this chapter has the stamp of the peculiar style of the Fourth Gospel (n. 1), which makes it impossible to treat it as an appendix added by some unauthorised hand, as we do, for example, Mark xvi. 9–20 (vol. ii. 467 f.); nor is it possible to cut out even a part of the chapter as an interpolation, as we do other portions of the Gospel, the style of which proves that they are not part of the original work (John viii. 1–11; see § 69, n. 3). The relation of this chapter to the body of the book differs from that of such sections as these mainly in this, namely, that while it is possible by means of existing documents and patristic evidence to prove the absence of such sections from the books into the text of which they were interpolated, down to the Middle Ages, so far as we know the Fourth Gospel never circulated without chap. xxi., nor is there nearly so much uncertainty in the tradition of the text of this chapter as in the case of the interpolations mentioned (n. 2). Since now, as is indicated by the address to the readers (above, p. 207), the book was intended from the first for a Church, or a group of Churches, in close touch with the author,—which necessarily required that it be read in the congregations,—it follows that chap. xxi. must have been added to the book before it was circulated outside of this small circle. For if the book had been circulated without chap. xxi., there was no power on earth which could have prevented copies of the Gospel from being read and multiplied without this final chapter. The only argument which can be opposed to this opinion is the fantastic idea, not worth refuting, that the canon of the Gospels was made by an official body, which had authority over the whole Church to withdraw from circulation and destroy copies of a Gospel already in use, and to substitute in their place the canonical recension of the same Gospel.

Chap. xxi. is therefore not to be thought of as an appendix, independent of the history of the origin of the Gospels, but as a supplement, added to the Gospel not long after it was written, and in the same region where it originated. The only interval which it is necessary to assume between the composition of chaps. i.–xx. and of chap. xxi., is that required for the feeling to arise that the supplement was necessary, which the author had not felt when he wrote xx. 30 f., and for the need to be met. On the other hand, chap. xxi. cannot be referred to the author with the same directness as chaps. i.–xx. The passage exhibits several differences from the main body of the book, which consist not so much in another style as in a different attitude of the narrator to the disciple whom Jesus especially loved and to his family. Whereas in chaps. i.–xx. all the members of this family remain anonymous (above,

p. 211 f.), at the very beginning of chap. xxi. John and James, while not spoken of by name, are clearly designated as the sons of Zebedee (xxi. 2), as is sometimes the case in the other Gospels (Matt. xx. 20, xxvi. 37, xxvii. 56 ; cf. Mark x. 35 ; Luke v. 10). This impresses us all the more as an involuntary expression of the point of view natural to the author of this account, because in its course John is again characterised by a reference to xiii. 23 without any name, as in xix. 26, xx. 2. But whereas in xix. 26, xx. 2, this is done in the simplest possible manner, merely in order to prevent any doubt as to the identity of the person in question, in chap. xxi. more emphasis is placed upon the designation. The ἐκεῖνος in xxi. 7, which is not found in the parallel passages, and especially the detailed way in which the account in xiii. 23-25 is recalled in xxi. 20, show that someone else is here writing who is no longer influenced by the fear lest he should seem to sound his own praises. In xxi. 24 it is even more clear that someone else, or rather a number of persons are speaking of the apostle and evangelist John in the third person. "This (i.e. the disciple concerning whom an incident is told in vv. 20-23) is the disciple that beareth witness of this (these things) and wrote this : and we know that his witness is true." From its very nature, the "we" includes an "I" and excludes the "he." For this reason it is impossible to appeal on the one hand to i. 14, and on the other to xix. 35 in support of the idea that this "we" includes the author of the book, while at the same time he is concealed behind the third person in ὁ μαρτυρῶν, ὁ γράψας. While in the prologue—i.e. outside the narrative sections of the Gospel—John does use "we," which, if occasion required, might have been changed to "I," just as the "we" in xxi. 24 is changed naturally into "I" in the οἶμαι of xxi. 25 (n. 3), in the narrative sections he regularly uses the third person in referring to himself, even where, in addressing his readers, the use of the first person would seem to be more natural (xix. 35). It is true that xxi. 24, like the prologue, is not in the narrative sections of the Gospel, which makes it possible for the "we" to include the author of the book. But that in designating himself in the course of one short sentence the author should have so wavered and changed between "he" and "we" (including himself), it is impossible to assume. This abnormality is found neither in i. 14-16 nor xix. 35, consequently not in xxi. 24. It is also rendered impossible by the fact that the author of this particular Gospel is the last person to appeal to his own testimony to himself in affirmation of his truthfulness (above, p. 210 f.). We conclude, therefore, that others, who know him on the basis of their adequate experience, are here testifying to the readers of this book that the witness who speaks to them in it is trustworthy. But, like the appeal to the Lord's knowledge in confirmation of the truthfulness and pious purpose of the author in xix. 35, this testimony seems to be only an addition to the main affirmation, namely, that the disciple whom Jesus especially loved is the disciple who testifies to and wrote what precedes.

It is unnecessary to prove that what is said in xxi. 1-23 is included among the things to which he testifies (περὶ τούτων) and the things which he wrote (ταῦτα). The only question is whether the object of μαρτυρῶν and γράφας is to be confined to the contents of the supplement. This is altogether improbable. In the first place, while the concluding sentence of the preceding chapter, xx. 30 f., shows chap. xxi. is a supplement, there is nothing in the chapter itself to indicate that it is an independent account. The passage John xxi. 1 is connected with what precedes just as are John iii. 22, v. 1, vi. 1,—probably according to the correct reading without Ἰησοῦς,—while xxi. 1, 14 refer back to xx. 19-29, just as iv. 46, 54 do to ii. 1-11. While chap. xxi. is thus added as a supplement, it is really an essential part of the whole. If xxi. 24 referred exclusively to xxi.

1-23 this would necessarily be expressed, and, since vv. 1-23 describe one continuous and uninterrupted event, this could have been done by the use of περὶ τούτου and τοῦτο (cf. μετὰ τοῦτο, ii. 12, as distinguished from μετὰ ταῦτα, iii. 22). In the second place, if ver. 24 referred only to the supplement, every reader who understood it would ask who wrote chaps. i.-xx.; and if it was necessary to assure the readers that chap. xxi. was written by the beloved disciple of Jesus, it was even more important to make clear to them who wrote chaps. i.-xx. If this was omitted because it was self-evident, there must have been some hint to this effect in ver. 24, which could have been very simply indicated by writing καὶ περὶ τούτου and καὶ τοῦτο. That disciple is the author also of the supplement, as he is known to be the author of the entire book. In the third place, reference is made in ver. 25 to a multitude of books which would have to be written in order to set forth in detail all the notable things in the history of Jesus. Here, as in xx. 30, a contrast is implied to the deeds of Jesus set forth in the Fourth Gospel, and to this one book with which the readers ought to be content. Hence the person, who in ver. 24f. is speaking in the name of a number of persons of kindred mind with himself, has in view the entire book, which here reaches its final conclusion. John xxi. 24 refers to i. 1-xxi. 23.

To this conclusion it may be objected that traces of a hand other than that of the author of the entire book are to be found not simply in ver. 24f., but even from ver. 2 onwards (above, p. 233). From this, to be sure, it would follow that the entire supplement was added by the friends of John, who came prominently to the front in ver. 24f. But this does not harmonise with the statement of this very verse, that John was the author of the supplement as well as of the rest of the book; or, if the statement concerning the authorship of chap. xxi. was written by another hand, there would be the same authority for the authorship of the entire Gospel. The latter conclusion is certainly to be rejected ; since from chaps. i.-xx. it has been shown (§ 65) that the apostle John is here conceived of and represented, not as an authority upon whom the author depended, but as himself the author of the book, and since, from the difference in the way in which John is referred to in chap. xxi. and chaps. i.-xx., it has been concluded that chap. xxi. is not from the same hand as chaps. i.-xx. Consequently the testimony of xxi. 24 (ὁ γράψας ταῦτα) agrees literally with the result of the exegetical study of these preceding chapters. This is not so, however, with regard to xxi. 1-23. At the same time there is nothing peculiar about the use of ὁ γράψας ταῦτα in connection with this supplement. As good a letter writer and author as Paul regularly made use of an amanuensis to whom he dictated ; accordingly Peter could say that he had written a short letter to the Christians of Asia Minor just as though he had written it with his own hand, although he had not even dictated it, but, after stating what he wanted written, had left its entire composition to Silvanus (1 Pet. v. 12, vol. ii. 149 f.). As regards xxi. 1-23, this or some similar relation must have existed between John, who in xxi. 24 is declared to be the author of the supplement, and the men who in ver. 24 f. are clearly distinguished from him, providing the observations which show that this account was written by someone else than John, and the testimony of xxi. 24 are both allowed due weight. With John's consent, or even at his suggestion, persons who were near him recorded the things which he more than once had related to them, and which he certainly repeated before he wrote them down. If they were conscious of having added nothing of their own, and of having omitted nothing contained in John's communications, they could say that John was the author of this account ; nor is there any apparent reason why they should have distinguished sharply between the direct Johannine authorship of chaps. i.-xx. and his indirect authorship of xxi. i.-23. There would be occasion to charge these persons with culpable inaccuracy, which could hardly be defended against the suspicion of being intended to deceive the readers, only in case the apostle had left behind him as his work chaps. i.-xx., and after the apostle's death the author of chap. xxi. had added the supplement without his knowledge or consent. But this assumption is to be rejected not only because of the apparent candour of xxi. 24 and the naïve tone of ver. 25, but mainly because it contradicts the language of ver. 24.

The first statement of ver. 24 concerning John is not ὁ γράψας ταῦτα, but ὁ μαρτυρῶν περὶ τούτων; and not only the order of the words is significant, but the change in the tense. If μαρτυρεῖν here as μεμαρτύρηκεν in xix. 35 referred to the testimony which John gave when he wrote his book, including the supplement, the only appropriate place for it would be after γράφας ταῦτα. In this case also the use of μαρτυρῶν instead of μαρτυρήσας or μεμαρτυρηκώς would be unnatural, but might be justified on the ground that the act of writing belongs entirely in the past, while testifying by means of a book which outlives its author is continuous, lasting as long as the book is read (cf. John v. 46 with v. 39). But if these were what the writer meant, μαρτυρῶν would in that case have to follow γράφας, because the continuous testifying is the result of the preceding act of writing. When there is also taken into consideration the fact that, according to the reading, which is probably correct (ὁ γράψας, see n. 2), "the writer" and "the witness" are two ideas independent of each other, which it is possible to refer to two different persons, there can be no doubt that John's testifying is thought of as independent of his writing. The former still continued at the time when xxi. 24 was written; so the author writes the present, ὁ μαρτυρῶν: the latter belonged to the past; so he uses the aorist, ὁ γράψας. This proves that John was still living when this was written. For, in view of the use of the aorist participle, it is stylistically impossible that the present should have been chosen in order to make vivid oral testimony of the past (cf. John i. 15, μαρτυρεῖ and also κέκραγεν), or that the present participle should be used without reference to time, —as is not infrequently the case in John's writings (e.g. i. 29),—because after the death of John his oral testimony quite as much as the composition of the Gospel belonged to the past.

That John was still alive when the supplement was added, follows with even greater certainty from xxi. 20–23. It is clearly a mistake to seek in these sentences the main, still less the exclusive purpose of the supplement. What precedes has independent meaning, and even without vv. 20–23 would not only be worth telling for its own sake, but would be also a real addition to the book. Just as in xx. 21–23 all the apostles are newly confirmed in the calling for which they seemed to be rendered incapable by the shattering of their faith (xvi. 32, xx. 9); so in xxi. 3–17 in a particular way, Peter who, after the traitor, yielded most to the temptations of the hours of Jesus' passion (xiii. 38, xviii. 17–27), is confirmed anew in his calling, and indeed on both sides of the apostolic office—i.e. as regards the task of winning men for the kingdom of God and of Christ by preaching (vv. 3–11), and as regards the office of directing the life of the Church (vv. 15–17, n. 4).

But this confirmation of Peter concludes with prophecies as to his personal fate, and indirectly also as to the fate of John, the right understanding of which on the part of the readers is manifestly a matter of concern to the narrator. In the first of these prophecies it is revealed to Peter that in his old age, as contrasted with his youth, the impulsive and intrusive character of which was still constantly creating trouble for him (xiii. 6-10, 36-38, xviii. 10-11, 17, 25, 27),—qualities which come to view again in this chapter (xxi. 7), although not in a dangerous way,—he shall stretch out his hands like a helpless old man for support and for someone to lead him, while others shall put his clothes upon him, and even compel him to go where he does not wish to go. If this had meant that at the end of his life he was to be given over to the power of his enemies, he could not possibly have understood that the added injunction of Jesus to follow Him signified only that he was to accompany the Lord a few steps further until He disappeared from view, as in the earlier resurrection appearances. Peter prepares to obey at once the command literally; but he could not do this without endeavouring to discover in this, as in the other commands and transactions of that day, a deeper symbolic and prophetic meaning. When Peter connected this command with the prophecy of ver. 18, and recalled the conversation of xiii. 36-38, he must have understood it to mean—if not at once, certainly as soon as he thought the matter over—that after a long life he was to follow the Lord into the other world by a violent death (n. 4). We have already seen (vol. ii. 211 ff.) that Peter did actually understand these words and xiii. 36 in this way (2 Pet. i. 14). These words of Jesus could not be taken to mean more, either by Peter or by anyone else who heard them. But in ver. 19^a the narrator gives the first saying—which is clearly a prophecy (ver. 18)—an interpretation which no amount of reflection upon the language of the passage could of itself produce. According to this interpretation, Jesus indicated in this prophecy by what death, i.e. by what kind of a death, Peter should glorify God. Since the language of the prophecy does not even suggest a violent death, much less a particular kind of death, such as beheading, strangling, or crucifixion, the interpretation given by the writer of the supplement must have originated after Peter's death, being suggested by the death itself. All doubt in this point is removed when ver. 19*a* is compared with xii. 33 (cf. xviii. 32), which is in all respects parallel, and when there are recalled the express remarks of the evangelist in two instances, which are at least similar to the effect that it was not until after their fulfilment that the disciples understood the meaning of prophetic utterances and symbolic actions of Jesus (ii. 22, xii. 16; cf. vi. 61 f., vii. 39, xiii. 7, 19, xiv. 20, 26, 29, xvi. 4, 12 f., xviii. 9, xx. 8 f.). After Peter was crucified in Rome in the year 64 (vol. ii. 165 ff.), Jesus' words to Peter, which made such a profound impression upon Peter's own mind (2 Pet. i. 14), but which heretofore had remained somewhat mysterious, were called to mind. Now, in the light of what had taken place, it was no longer possible to think that in John xiii. 36, xxi. 19*b*, Jesus had meant to express only the unimportant truth that Peter would sometime die and leave the world, like all men and like Jesus Himself. Since Peter died a martyr's death, it was natural in the command to follow Him to find the suggestion to Peter that he like Jesus was to die for the sake of God and the truth, i.e. that he was to suffer a martyr's death. Since, moreover, Peter like Jesus was crucified, it was felt necessary to take the prophetic description of Peter's declining years in xxi. 18—especially the stretching out of his hands and arms—as a prophetic forecast of this particular manner of death (n. 4).

After the death of Peter, it seemed to the Church as if all Jesus' various prophecies about Peter's work as a fisher of men and as the shepherd of the flock, about the patience he would have to learn, about his martyrdom and the particular manner in which he was to die, had been fulfilled. Thereafter it was almost inevitable that all who were familiar with the story related in xxi. 15–22 should endeavour to interpret the saying of Jesus with reference to John as it had been interpreted with reference to Peter.

When Jesus replied to Peter, who wanted to apply to John the same command that he had received, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" and when the command to Peter was repeated with strong emphasis upon the contrast between him and John, "Follow thou me," it seemed as if this could only mean that John was not to follow Jesus in the sense in which the word of Jesus had found fulfilment in Peter's case—in other words, he was not to die a martyr's death. It seemed at least possible that John should not die at all, but live until the Lord's return, an event which makes death impossible for those of His followers who witness it. Words of Jesus like Matt. xvi. 28, Mark ix. 1, Luke ix. 27 gave this interpretation a certain justification. Especially if John survived Peter and the other apostles a considerable number of years, it was very natural to regard the long life of this apostle as proof that he was destined to live until the parousia. This view actually became current and assumed the form of a definite judgment, "That disciple shall not die" (ver. 23). But this judgment is decisively opposed by the narrator, and inasmuch as this is the last thing which he says about this event,—indeed, the last word before the conclusion in ver. 24 f. which relates to the entire book,—it is clear that the story in vv. 20–22 was told primarily to correct the false interpretation of it which had become current.

If this be so, it follows also that chap. xxi. was written while John was still living, a conclusion which has often been misunderstood and even rejected. If John died and was buried in Ephesus, this was a conclusive and final refutation of the idea that, according to a prophecy of Jesus, he was not to die, but to live until the parousia. If, notwithstanding John's death and burial, the superstition grew up that his death was only apparent, that he had secretly fled, as Nero was said to have done, and would appear again when the Lord came, all that the author says—his account of the event which gave rise to the superstition, the reminder that Jesus did not say in so many words that John was not to die, and the repetition of the hypothetical statement of Jesus—would be an entirely inadequate refutation of the belief. The only effective argument against such a superstition would be an appeal to those who witnessed John's death, and above all a reference to the grave which was outside the city gate. If, however, at the time when the supplement was written the superstition had grown to the point where it was claimed that John, who had seemed to die and was really buried, was still living in his grave, or that the grave had been opened by a miracle and that John had escaped, against such μῦθοι γραῶδεις, vv. 20–21 would be merely childish prattle. When ridicule and reproof failed, the only effective answer to such foolishness was spade and shovel. But there is no need for these hypothetical considerations, since it is certain that, from the time of John's death about 100 until the time of Polycrates in 190 and long afterwards, no one in Ephesus questioned the fact that John had really died and was resting in his grave like other men (above, p. 193 f.).

It has been maintained that vv. 20–23 were not intended to refute the story about John's immortality, but the claim made after John's death to the effect that Jesus had been mistaken in His prophecy. But who would have ventured to make such a claim? The fact that Jesus connected His prophecy about His return almost inseparably with His prophecy about the destruction of Jerusalem (Matt. xxiii. 36–xxiv. 35), and the fact that decade after decade passed after the destruction of Jerusalem without the Lord's return, furnished the strongest possible temptation for claims of this sort. But there is not the slightest evidence that between the years 70 and 170 the Church lost its faith in the parousia, much less its confidence in the truthfulness and infallibility of Jesus.

There was a disposition manifested before the year 70, even in the reproduction of Jesus' prophecies, to interpret elastically the chronological statements that seemed to relate to the parousia (vol. ii. 500 f. ; cf. above, p. 158 f.) ; and in the decades after the year 70, men waited entirely confident of the truthfulness of Jesus, and certain that His promise of His return would be fulfilled. To be sure, before the year 70, as well as afterwards, there were, of course, weak souls whose faith in the promise, like their faith in everything else, wavered, requiring to be strengthened by argument and exhortation (Jas. v. 7-11 ; 2 Tim. ii. 11-13 ; Heb. iii. 6-iv. 11, x. 35-xii. 29) ; there were also mockers who despised all the prophecies of Jesus (2 Pet. iii. 3-13). But in the present instance it is not a case of frivolous mockery, or of a general weakness of faith, but of a wrong interpretation of a single saying of Jesus' which was current among the brethren,—among believers who were members of the Church,—and a wrong expectation regarding John based upon this interpretation, both of which errors could persist only until John's death. To attempt their refutation after this event would have been foolish. But it would have been even more foolish to reply to an unfavourable judgment concerning Jesus and His prophecy, without so much as intimating that there were such impious opinions in the Church, and that they had arisen because of the contradiction between Jesus' prophecy and John's death. But the most foolish thing of all would have been the refutation of such opinions by the means which the author uses. A man of any intelligence at all would have attempted the refutation of an unfavourable opinion regarding Jesus, which was based upon an alleged contradiction between a saying of His and the later course of events, only in one of three ways. It would have been necessary for him either to deny outright that Jesus had said what was attributed to Him and was declared to be a false prophecy ; or, if Jesus really did speak the word which was interpreted as an unfulfilled prophecy, to prove that this interpretation was false, which could have been accomplished only by giving another definite interpretation of Jesus' words ; or, if this was impossible, he would have to show that this undeniable and perfectly clear prophecy was fulfilled by facts which his opponents had not properly appreciated (n. 5). The author does none of these things. He does not deny that Jesus spoke the word the meaning or fulfilment of which was in question ; he mentions no fact which could be considered its fulfilment ; he does not oppose a wrong interpretation of the word of Jesus in question by another which could satisfy the reader. The only objection which he makes to the widely current interpretation of the saying is, that it does not correspond to the language used. It varies in two ways : (1) It takes for granted that "to tarry until the Lord comes" is equivalent to "not to die" ; (2) it overlooks the hypothetical character of the saying and makes out of it an unconditioned affirmation.

But this reply, which would have been so foolish if John had been dead for ten or thirty years, is natural and to the point if it was written in the interval between the death of Peter and that of John. Just as the crucifixion of Peter made possible a clear and certain interpretation of the two sayings of Jesus about him (vv. 18, 19),—as was true also in the case of other significant or enigmatical words and deeds of Jesus (ii. 19, 22, xii. 14—xvi. 32 f.),—so the author of chap. xxi. and John who stood behind him desired that a final judgment about the saying of Jesus referring to John be withheld until the Lord had made good His word by deeds. Different possibilities were conceivable. What Jesus had promised in a purely hypothetical sense could actually happen in exact keeping with its language, i.e. the Lord might return before John's death. It was also possible that John might die before the parousia. In the latter case, the Church found it necessary either to be satisfied with the belief that Jesus had spoken of a possibility which was not expected to be realised, simply in order to rebuke Peter, and to safeguard the freedom of His action, or to take the saying about Jesus' coming in an elastic sense, interpreting it in the light of events, as they had already learned to do in the case of Matt. xvi. 28. In this particular instance they would have to refer it to a single event of the last time connected with the parousia, namely, to the destruction of Jerusalem, which would make Jesus' prophecy mean that Peter would die before the year 70, John not until after this date.

We reach accordingly the following conclusions as the result of a purely exegetical study of chap. xxi., particularly of vv. 18-23 and ver. 24: (1) The supplement, chap. xxi., was written subsequent to the death of Peter, but while John was still living; (2) it was not written by John with his own hand, but by persons closely associated with him who composed this account with John's consent, probably at his suggestion and upon the basis of his oral statements. It was added as a supplement to the completed Gospel, and from that time onwards remained an inseparable part of it. (3) These same persons testify that John is the author of the entire book, making their testimony cover also the supplement, without expressly saying that John's authorship of chap. xxi. was indirect, as is affirmed in (2), but without in the least concealing this view. Proposition (3) agrees with the testimony of chaps. i.-xx. concerning itself (§ 65) and the unanimous tradition (§ 64); but in view of objections to this threefold witness to the Johannine authorship of the Gospel, the trustworthiness of the statement remains to be tested (§ 69). Proposition (2) is not confirmed by a certain tradition which is independent of the text of the supplement. The stories of the teachers of Clement of Alexandria and the stories of the Muratorian Canon, as well as the manner in which later writers tell of the amanuensis of whom John made use in the composition of his Gospel (above, pp. 178 f., 196 f., nn. 4-6), may be echoes of the fact that the friends of John had a part in the completion and the publication of the Fourth Gospel. But proposition (2) does not require the confirmation of external tradition, since it is proved absolutely by xxi. 24 and confirmed by observations on xxi. 1-23 (above, p. 233 f.). The fact that there is no clearer evidence in the tradition for proposition (2) is satisfactorily explained by the circumstance that the supplement itself, in the same sentence in which it is clearly indicated that it was written by friends of John, speaks of John as the real author of the supplement as well as of the Gospel. It is also explained by the fact that proposition (1) was firmly held by the tradition. Irenæus calls John not only the author, but also the publisher of his Gospel (n. 6); and Papias testifies even more emphatically, and with unmistakable reference to chap. xxi., that the Gospel was published and given to the Church by John while he was still living (n. 2). Then there is the added fact that everywhere and always the Gospel was transmitted and circulated with chap. xxi. attached, which would be inconceivable if chap. xxi. was added to it after the author of chaps. i.-xx. had published this book which he had written for the Church, and subsequent to his death. If this were the case, we should expect the same or similar phenomena in the tradition of the text that we find in the case of Mark xvi. 9-20. Finally, as has been shown, xxi. 18-23 is meaningless the moment it is assumed that this account was written after the death of the disciple whom Jesus particularly loved. In view of all these considerations, it may be said to be established beyond the possibility of critical doubt that chap. xxi., as well as the entire Gospel, was written and put into circulation before the death of Jesus' long-lived disciple, John of Ephesus, i.e. before the year 100.

1. (P. 233.) Eberhardt, Ev. Jo. cap. 21, 1897, gives on S. 7-19 a review of the criticisms which have been made of this chapter, and on S. 73-78, as well as in the intervening comment a varied assortment of remarks in regard to its language as compared with that of chaps. i.-xx. Much more thorough is the work of Horn, Abfassungszeit, Geschichtlichkeit und Zweck von Ev. Jo. c. 21, 1904. Words and phrases which are found elsewhere only or almost only in John are (A = chaps. i.-xx., B = chap. xxi.) : φανερῶν ἐαυτόν, φανερούσθαι, B i. 14 (3 times, A 6 times ; elsewhere only in Mark iv. 22, and then without reference to Jesus, and twice in the unguenuine supplement, Mark xvi. 12, 14) ; ἡ θάλασσα ἡ Τιβεριάς, B 1 (similarly only in A vi. 1) ; ἐκ τῶν μαθητῶν αὐτοῦ δῶο, B 2 (just so A in i. 35 ; cf. ix. 16, xii. 42) ; ὁψάριον, B 9, 10, 13 (again only in A vi. 9, 11 ; for this in the parallels we have ἐχθύς) ; the asyndeton λέγει αὐτοῖς, αὐτῷ with and without an expressed subject, B 3 (twice), 6, 10, 12, 15, 16 (3 times), 17 (twice), 22 (very frequently in John alone, sometimes in Matt. See vol. ii. 591, note 7) ; also λέγει οὖν, B 5, 7 (A vii. 6, xii. 4) ; further, in general a more abundant use of οὖν (B, 8 or 9 times in the whole of Mark, certainly not more than 7 times ; on the other hand, in A oftener than in Matt., Mark, Luke, and Acts together). ἀμήν, ἀμήν, B 18 (elsewhere only A) ; interchange between ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν, B 15-17 (cf. A xix. 26 with xx. 2). Compare the entire sentence B 19 with A xii. 33 ; further, τοῦτο ἦδη τρίτον, B 14, and πάλιν δεύτερον, B 16, with A iv. 54 ; ὡς ἀπὸ πηχῶν διακοσίων, B 8, with A xi. 18 ; also B 4b with xx. 14. Also in B as in A, Jesus is designated regularly by His personal name (13 or 14 times), and within the narrative, merely in view of a former remark of the disciples and from their standpoint, by ὁ κύριος (xxi. 12 ; cf. ver. 7). The latter occurs in A only in iv. 1 (?), vi. 23, xi. 2, and in xx. 18, 20, just as in xxi. 12. Cf., on the other hand, Mark xvi. 19 and vol. ii. 476. Further, "Simon Peter" is given in B 5 times, in A 12 times ; as "Son of John" only in B 15-17 and A i. 43 ; Thomas called Didymus B 2, otherwise only A xi. 16, xx. 24. Only in B 2 and A i. 46 ff. is Nathanael mentioned ; but here for the first time—that which helps us to understand the connection of ii. 1 with i. 46 ff.—his origin from Cana is stated, and in a form which, both because of the superfluous addition τῆς Γαλιλαίας (cf. ii. 1, iv. 46) and in view of the ἀπὸ (i. 45, 46, xi. 1, xii. 21, xix. 38, otherwise only in Matt. xxvii. 57 ; Mark xv. 43 ; Luke xxiii. 51), is genuinely Johannine. The παῖδια used once in address in B 5 (cf. 1 John ii. 14, 18) with the once used τεκνία, A xiii. 33, is of no consequence ; but the ἀρνίον, B 15 (Rev. 29 times instead of ἀμνός, A i. 29), and προβάτιον, B 16, 17, instead of πρόβατον (A x. 1-28), are full of significance. The interchange between lamb and sheep, however, is plainly only an interchange, just as that between ἀγαπᾶν and φιλεῖν, and the diminutive forms have reference to the need of protection and care of the flock which is given into the charge of the shepherd. For the use of οἱ ἀδελφοί, B 23,—instead of which οἱ μαθηταί (thus Ss) would have been misleading, since the latter would have been understood of the apostles while the former designates the members of the Church,—there would have been absolutely no opportunity in A, except perhaps in the prologue, where there was, however, no urgent need of it. Naturally xx. 17 is no parallel. 1 John iii. 14, 16 ; 3 John 3, 5, 10, however, offer good comparison. The πρωῖας γινομένης or γενομένης, xxi. 4 (cf. Matt. xxvii. 1), would have been out of place in xviii. 28, xx. 1, because the previous context does not inform us that something had happened in the night before. But from the point of view of style, ὁψία ἐγένετο, vi. 16, is quite similar.

2. (Pp. 234, 239.) To the testimony of all the Greek MSS. and of all the old versions (also Ss, though Sc. is defective), is to be added the above mentioned statement of Papias, pp. 178, 196, n. 4, which is intelligible only if the Fourth Gospel was already supplied with the supplement, which through ver. 24 could make it appear as if not John himself, but others after his death, had published the Gospel. It is also noteworthy that Tatian in the Diatesaron has worked up the substantial contents of chap. xxi. (Forsch. i. 218), and that, following the combined testimony of the Arabic and of the Latin Diatesaron, he concluded his work with John xxi. 25 as he began it with John i. 1 (GK, ii. 554). What is said above on p. 234 of the whole chapter holds also of ver. 25, which Tischendorf has excluded from the text. The former opinion that this verse is wanting in Codex 63 at Dublin, which formerly belonged to Usher, has been refuted by Scrivener, more thoroughly by Gwynn (Hermathena, vol. viii. No. 19, 1893, pp. 1-7). The latter has shown in the same article, pp. 7-17, on what a weak foundation Tischendorf's opinion rests, that ver. 25 and the signature of the book in Σ were not written by the first hand, but by the hand of the contemporary corrector. In fact, Tregelles, who had seen the Dublin codex, opposed Tischendorf's view, while the spelling κατὰ Ἰωάννην instead of Ἰωάννη, which is peculiar to the corrector (Σ^a), is decisive. There is, therefore, no manuscript evidence against ver. 25. A scholiast also, who explains it as a marginal note which had gradually worked into the text (in Wettstein N.T. i. 964, and Matthaei, Ev. Jo. p. 354. According to the Cod. Vatic. Regin. 9, fol. 197b, in Mai, N. patr. bibl. vii. 1. 407, this was Theodore of Mops.), bears witness that ver. 25 is found in all MSS. But if the case were otherwise, every critic would have to hold that the simple hyperbole of the expression had induced pedantic writers to expurgate it. As Tatian in the Diatesaron, so also the probably still somewhat older Acts of Peter have taken ver. 25 into account; for if the ἀ ἐχωρήσαμεν ἐγγράψαμεν to which Peter there gives expression (ed. Lipsius, p. 67, 2: preserved in the Greek by Isidorus of Pelusium; cf. GK, ii. 848 A. 2, 849 A. 2, 851) both in the name of the other apostles and especially of the sons of Zebedee, is based primarily upon 1 John i. 1-4, still the expression ἐχωρήσαμεν which is not found in the Epistle passage, and which in the Acts of Peter is at once taken up again in χωρητικῶς (capaciter), proves that there is reference at the same time to John xxi. 25. Origen (in Jo. tom. xiii. 5 f., xix. 10, xx. 34; cf. Eus. H. E. vi. 25) and Isidorus, who through Jewish polemic against John xxi. 25 had his attention called to the passage of the Acts of Peter, and also Bengel, all understood χωρήσαι to concern the intellectual comprehension. Leucius both in the Acts of John and the Acts of Peter had already given a similar interpretation, only that at the same time he connects it with the uncertainty and incompleteness of the sense perception of Jesus' being which was conditioned by the mutability of His bodily appearance? Cf. Forsch. 6, 195 f. That Theodore of Mops. pronounced ver. 24, or ver. 25, or the entire chapter as spurious, is pure myth. Where Mill (N.T. 1707, Proleg. p. xxix) obtained his note in regard to Theodore which Eberhart, S. 8, so remarkably misinterpreted, the present writer has no knowledge. According to the Syrian Lechodad, circa 850 (cod. Sachau, 311 fol. 163; cf. Goussen, Stud. theol. i. p. 111), Theodore would have eliminated John

v. 4 and xxi. 25 from the text. Barhebraeus (in Ev. Jo., ed. Schwartz, p. 24) repeats this statement, but refers this opinion to people generally (φασίν τινες) instead of to Theodore. According to the Syriac translation of Theodore's commentary on John, with whose conclusion Prof. L. Abel acquainted the present writer by a copy of the Cod. Sachau, 217 fol. 280^a, at Berlin, Theodore adds to the text of xxi. 24 and 25 given in full by him nothing further than this: "These are sentences (κείμεναι) which are not from John, but (belong) to someone else. And here we conclude the seventh book, with which this writing (that of the commentary on John) ended and was completed." It follows from this that Theodore did not at all dispute the Johannine authorship of xxi. 1-23, but merely, as a good exegete, had concluded from the plural οἶδαμεν that ver. 24 and with it ver. 25 were not written by the hand of John himself, but by that of some unknown person. In the Cod. Syr. 308 at Paris, upon which the printed edition is dependent (Theodorus Mops., Comment. in Ev. Jo. versio syr., ed. Chabot, Paris 1897), the concluding sentence (p. 412) runs literally as follows: "But these sentences from ἔστιν δὲ καὶ onwards, and up to this point, the Commentator says, are not by John, but by another, whoever that may be." The writer of this MS, forgets his rôle when he speaks of Theodore, who by the Syrians bears the honorary title of "the commentator" as of another person, probably in order to entirely remove from himself the responsibility of this critical remark. At the same time, however, he confines the criticism expressly to ver. 25; while Theodore, according to the original text of the Berlin MS., wished to have it referred to vv. 24 and 25. The texts for vv. 24-25, which have come down to us, show no greater fluctuations than other undoubtedly original passages. A καὶ before μαρτυρῶν (B, Orig. in Jo. xxxii. 13, ed. Preuschen, p. 461. 9, and Cyril) might be genuine, and it might be correlative with the following καὶ, which Origen, however, discards. Only in that case we could not read ὁ before the second καὶ (S^a Cyril, etc.) or after it (BD). Probably, however, B, which has in part Origen and in part D and good Latin witnesses on its side, has the original wording: ὁ καὶ μαρτυρῶν π. τ. καὶ ὁ γράψας ταῦτα. From Ss ("who bore witness of this and wrote this") we cannot infer a reading μαρτυρήσας. Just as little critical value has the free translation of Ss in ver. 25 ("and many other [things] Jesus did, which, if they were written down one by one, the world would not be enough [have been big enough] for them"). It gives evidence of the tendency to displace the real and tangible conception, which has been vouched for by τὰ γραφόμενα βιβλία by the interpretation which has been shown to be very early. The only doubt can be whether we are to read the hard ῥσα, but which just on that account demands especial notice, instead of ᾱ before ἐποίησεν, and whether χωρήσειν or χωρηῆσαι is the correct reading.

3. (P. 235.) Inasmuch as of those who in xxi. 24 testify to the writing of the book by the disciple whom Jesus loved, and who witness to his truthfulness, only one actually penned the statement, the change from οἶδαμεν to the singular οἶμαι cannot appear strange, especially since the latter expression, like οἶδα, οὐκ οἶδ' ὅπως, οἶνω, and other similar ones, had come to be almost an interjection. The whole circle of those in whose name the writer of these lines speaks, guarantees the testimony of ver. 24; but to make all of them responsible for the very subjective judgment contained in ver. 25 would be unnatural.

4. (Pp. 240, 241.) The symbolical meaning of the draught of fishes, which at the same time was full of a promise of blessing, could not have remained secret to such readers as knew the traditions in Matt. iv. 19, xiii. 47; Mark i. 17; Luke v. 10, and, least of all to Peter, if in this passage as in the others actual words and deeds of Jesus have been reported. The disciple John, who had been an eye-witness of Peter's former draught of fishes, recognised the Lord by this one (ver. 7). On the other hand, the number 153 (ver. 11) as well as the number 200 (ver. 8) and the numbers in i. 39, ii. 6, 20, iv. 6, 18, v. 2, vi. 7, 9, 19, xi. 18, xii. 5 elude every reasonable allegorical or cabalistic signification, in spite of the frequent attempts which have been made in this direction, e.g., by Theophilus, Latin version, Forsch. ii. 84 = Augustine, Tract. cxxii. in Jo.; by Ammonius (Cramer's Catenæ, ii. 408); Severnus Antioch. (Cat. in Jo., ed. Corderius, p. 438); Jerome, ad Ezk. xlvii. 12 (Vall. v. 595), with appeal to the ἀλιευτικά of the poet Oppianus: CLIII. esse genera piscium, which Hilgenfeld, Einkl. 717, further applies to the men who are to be won from the heathen peoples, as if John had said anything about the different kinds of fishes, or could have represented Peter as primarily the apostle to the heathen. Volkmar, Mose Prophetic, S. 62, found that the name Simon Bar Jona Kepha, written in Hebrew (כפא, however, instead of כפא) and resolved into its value in figures, yields 153. The only unfortunate thing is that the author of John xxi. 15-17 as well as of i. 42 does not call the father of Peter Jona, but Jochanan. The symbolic meaning of the draught of fishes in Matt. iv. 19; Mark i. 17 is connected with Peter and Andrew, in Luke v. 10 with Peter alone. In xxi. 6 the command falls upon the seven disciples of ver. 2 (cf., however, also Luke v. 4, χαλάσατε, with ἐπανάγαγε, and v. 5, χαλάσω), but Peter occupies the entire foreground in xxi. 3, 7, 11, so that the predictive meaning of the incident concerns him primarily. Moreover, according to Matt. xvi. 17-19 (of which the reader of the Fourth Gospel is reminded by i. 42); Luke xxii. 32; John x. 9 (where men are introduced, who through the interposition of Jesus receive the office of shepherd in the Church), the allegorical meaning of the three times repeated injunction of vv. 15-17 could not be any more doubtful for Peter than for us. More in agreement with the command in ver. 6 than with that in vv. 15-17 is that in ver. 19, so far as it refers to a definite outward act, which immediately is to and actually does ensue. But the deeper predictive meaning is excluded thereby as little here as in ver. 6. As surely as Peter must have been reminded by the thrice asked question vv. 15-17 of his thrice uttered denial (xiii. 38, xviii. 17, 25, 27), so certainly must the ἀκολουθεῖ μοι have called to his mind the conversation of xiii. 36 f.—especially after the prophecy in ver. 18 had pointed out to him his future life up to old age. Furthermore, the reader, to whom the narrator in ver. 19a had explained this prophecy as relating to the death of Peter, could have understood the ἀκολουθεῖ μοι, without detracting from its most probable and proper meaning, as referring to nothing else than to Peter's following into death and the invisible world. It is evident from ver. 20 f., however, that Peter himself at once grasped this meaning more or less clearly. Whether in connection with it a recollection of the prophecy in Matt. xx. 23, Mark x. 39 assisted him, cannot with certainty be determined. Only when in his following of Jesus, which was the point in question here, he recognised a symbolic expression of that following of which Jesus in xiii. 36 f. had spoken, namely, an accompanying and following of Him into the other world, through which for him the time of the painful separation from Jesus was shortened, only then could he perceive in this a privilege and an honour, a share in which he could wish to have given also to his fellow-disciple John who stood so close to Jesus. For no proof is needed that this is the meaning of Peter's question as to John in ver. 21, and that Peter in the following of Jesus, which he had before desired, but which was now proffered him, and at the same time foretold of him, saw no punishment, that in his jealousy for his rival he wished him to share. In a Gospel which contains words such as xii. 26, xiii. 36–xiv. 6, xvi. 16–22, and in a period of the history of Christianity in which words such as Phil. i. 20–23; Rev. xiv. 13; Ign. Rom. ii.–vii., were written, the latter meaning would have been a blasphemy and an absurdity beyond all comprehension. The second draught of fishes, as the first, had led Peter to the most humble self-abasement (cf. Luke v. 8); and whatever remnants of a false ambition might have been present in him, must have been entirely stifled, at least for the moment, by this conversation of vv. 15–17, which put him again in his place as leader, and yet at the same time painfully reminded him of his weakness (ver. 15, πλέον τούτων; ver. 17, ἐλυπήθη), and also by the prophecy of ver. 18, which was not lacking in censure. The interpretation of ver. 18 in the light of ver. 19a is similar, not only in form but also in substance, to xii. 33. As that word concerning the lifting up from the earth (xii. 32) by its context expresses first of all the thought of the removal from the earth to heaven (xii. 23, 34–36, iii. 14, vi. 62, viii. 21–28), and was only recognised after the crucifixion of Jesus as a predictive indication of this definite kind of death in which the one about to die is raised from the earth (xii. 33, xviii. 32), so xxi. 18 gave Peter, and, as long as Peter lived, the reader no definite information concerning the apostle's death, while it was only through combination of ideas that Peter himself came to base upon this statement, among other things, the expectation of a violent death (vol. ii. 211 f.). Inasmuch as he remained active in the service of the truth until his old age, he, as Paul in Phil. i. 20, ii. 17, 2 Tim. iv. 6, must have connected with this the hope that his violent death would be a martyrdom, and so redound to the glory of God. But John xxi. 19 goes beyond that; for ποῖα θανάτῳ here, as in xii. 33, xviii. 32, points to a definite kind of death, in fact, here as there to the same kind of death—the crucifixion; for even if we did not possess historical information concerning the crucifixion of Peter, we would not be able to think of anything but the crucifixion, if any hint of a definite kind of death is given in ver. 18. The point of comparison lies in the stretching out of the hands, the extending of the arms; cf. Epict. Diss. iii. 26. 21 (in the address to the man who feared to become poor): δέδοικας μὴ οὐ σχῆς . . . ἄλλον τὸν ὑποθήσοντα, ἄλλον τὸν ἐνδύσοντα, ἄλλους τοὺς τρίψοντας, ἄλλους τοὺς ἀκολουθήσοντας, ἢ' ἐν τῷ βαλανείῳ ἐκδυσάμενος καὶ ἐκτείνας σεαυτὸν ὥς οἱ ἐσταυρωμένοι τρίβῃ ἔνθεν καὶ ἔνθεν; with reference to Artemidoras, Interpretation of Dreams (Ὀνειροκρίτικα), i. 76, see Horn, S. 93.

5. (P. 246.) It is instructive to note the comparison of the martyrdom of the sons of Zebedee,—a prophecy not given even in hypothetical form (Mark x. 38 f.; Matt. xx. 22 f.),—and the attempt to bring it into agreement with the biography of John (cf. above, p. 205, and Acta Jo. 199. 20–200. 5, 201. 4, 207. 2, 237. 27; Act. Ap. Apocr., ed. Lipsius et Bonnet, ii. part i. 156. 13 ff.); and above, p. 195 f.

6. (P. 248.) Iren. iii. 1. 1; see the text, vol. ii. 398, n. 7. If the expression used of John (καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον)—as distinguished from that previously said of Luke, and more plainly than the expressions used of Matt. and Mark—itself asserts not only the writing, but the formal publication of the Gospel by John, so does the context completely prove that Irenæus had no thought of a merely indirect Johannine origin of the Gospel. According to Irenæus, the fourfold Gospel originated with apostles—the second and third with Peter and Paul through the agency of Mark and Luke, the first and fourth direct with Matthew and John. Moreover, the legend which tells of certain assistance of others in the writing of the Fourth Gospel, nevertheless emphasises the fact that John himself wrote the whole book (Can. Murat. line 13 ff., “Revelatum Andreae ex apostolis, ut recognoscentibus cunctis Joannes suo nomine cuncta describeret”).

§ 67. THE RELATION OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL TO THE EARLIER GOSPELS.

The view that the Fourth Gospel was written for a Christian church, or for a group of such churches, which cannot be said in any way of Matthew and Luke, and only with limitations of Mark, is corroborated by the observation forced upon us as soon as we read the Gospel, that John takes for granted a considerable degree of acquaintance with the gospel history on the part of his readers. The question arises whether this knowledge was derived from the unwritten Gospel which they heard from their missionaries (§ 48), or from books in circulation among them. The tradition makes John write his Gospel in his old age, and later than Matthew, Mark, and Luke (above, p. 178 f.), and for this very reason favours the latter supposition. We have also the account of the teachers of Clement of Alexandria, that John wrote with the three older Gospels consciously in view and with the purpose of supplementing the same on the theological side (above, p. 197, n. 5). Moreover, it has been shown that Mark's Gospel was the subject of earnest discussion among the friends of John at Ephesus (vol. ii. 438 ff.), and that in the same region the Aramaic Gospel of Matthew was interpreted orally in the church services for a long time, until the translating of the Gospel into Greek rendered this unnecessary (vol. ii. 510 ff.). There is no certain starting-point in the tradition for the determination of the chronological relation between these facts and the composition of the Fourth Gospel. It is possible, however, that our Gospel of Mark was much read in Ephesus, that the Aramaic Gospel of Matthew was interpreted orally there, and that even the Greek translation of it had been made prior to the time when John wrote. In fact, Luke's work may have been known in Ephesus at this time (above, p. 159). Since, moreover, the preceding investigation has not confirmed any of the conjectures concerning lost documents which Matthew and Mark made the basis of their works, and since, with the exception of Mark, there is no trace of the wider circulation of the older attempts to produce a gospel history with which Luke became acquainted in the course of his investigations, we infer that our Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke are the writings from which John's readers may have derived the knowledge of the gospel history which he takes for granted they possessed (n. 1).

No one of the Gospels shows from the outset so clearly as does the Fourth Gospel the lack of any attempt to furnish readers who may not be as yet familiar with the subject a history which could be understood out of its own material. Without any introductory words acquainting the readers with the person and work of John the Baptist (n. 2), the Gospel begins (i. 19), in striking contrast to the other Gospels, with an account of an official embassy from the Jews of Jerusalem, which presupposes that John had been carrying on an important work for a considerable time; as a matter of fact, we learn incidentally (i. 25, 26) that he had been engaged in baptizing with water.

Whence John obtained that knowledge of the person of the Messiah—who had already made His public appearance—which he shows in reply to a question put to him at the time by the Pharisees (n. 2), the reader first learns from the following narrative, in which John applies to Jesus as He was approaching him, a testimony spoken earlier concerning Him, while still absent, and explains (i. 29–34) from a definite experience his knowledge of the high dignity of Jesus, which had already been attested by the earlier testimony and at the time it was given. Even if there were no thoroughly characteristic words recalling the account of the baptism in Matt. iii. 13 ff.; Mark i. 9 ff.; Luke iii. 21 f., every reader would understand from the way in which John twice recalls the fact, that his mission was to baptize with water (vv. 31, 33),—which otherwise would be without point in this connection,—that John as he concluded the act of Jesus' baptism had seen the sign which God had revealed to him as the sign of Him who should baptize with the Spirit, namely, the visible descent of the Spirit from Heaven, in the form of a dove which rested upon Jesus. From these statements of John we conclude that his baptism of Jesus preceded not only the scene recorded in vv. 29–34, but also the testimony in ver. 26 f., and the still earlier testimony to be distinguished from that of ver. 26, to which the Baptist refers in ver. 30. After His baptism, which took place some time prior to the events recorded in i. 19 ff., Jesus came again to Bethany where John was baptizing, before His return to Galilee (i. 43), which continued to be His home (i. 45) notwithstanding His presence in Judea. Anyone familiar with Matt. iv. 13–17; Mark i. 9–11, or Luke iii. 21–22, iv. 1–14, recognizes at once that this interval between Jesus' baptism and His return to the Jordan was the forty days of His temptation. Without acquaintance not only with the general outlines, but also with numerous details of the synoptic accounts of the work of the Baptist and of the baptism of Jesus, the entire narrative in John i. 19–34 is unintelligible (n. 3).

it is consequently inconceivable that the author should have written in this way without consciously taking it for granted and without being certain that his readers were in the possession of such knowledge.

This appears in a particularly striking manner in iii. 24. No intelligent writer could communicate in this form to readers, who did not as yet know that the work of the Baptist was brought to an end by imprisonment, a fact of which he relates nothing either in what precedes or in what follows (cf. per contra, Matt. iv. 12, xi. 2, xiv. 3 ; Mark i. 14, vi. 17 ; particularly, however, what is said by Luke, who is a real historian, Luke iii. 19 f., vii. 18). Nor would mere acquaintance with the fact on the part of the readers be sufficient to render the sentence intelligible. For, since it is impossible that a man could be engaged in a public work of baptism and preaching and surrounded by his disciples, as indicated in iii. 25 and iii. 25–iv. 1, and be suffering at the same time the imprisonment from which he was never to be released, it is self-evident that this statement was not made on John's account. Least of all could it be intended to explain the statement about his continued public work. The remark is intelligible only if John presupposed on the part of his readers a clear idea of the relation between Jesus' public work and John's imprisonment—a relation with which his account did not seem to harmonise. Although such a conception was not required by Luke's account (above, p. 106 f., 167 f.), it was an inevitable inference from Mark i. 14 and Matt. iv. 12 ; since both of these evangelists make all of Jesus' public work, which they describe, follow the arrest of the Baptist. Christians who had a definite idea of the course of the gospel history which they had derived from Mark or Matthew could read John i. 19–iii. 21 with the feeling that here were important facts of which they had known nothing heretofore. When, however, they came to iii. 22–iv. 2, which contained an account of the contemporaneous activity of Jesus and of the Baptist, the new account may have, indeed it must have, seemed to contradict their familiar conception of the course of the history. The statement in iii. 24 was intended for the information of such readers, possibly also designed to offset their wrong impression. The writer says to them in effect: "You must understand that what is here related took place before the imprisonment of the Baptist; it was not until after this event that Jesus began the work with which you are familiar, which was then confined chiefly to Galilee." This remark, which is intended for the information of his readers, is inserted at this particular point where it is necessary, in order to make the narrative clear to those acquainted with Mark and Matthew; it is, however, related to the entire contents of i. 19–iv. 54, for Jesus breaks off the work which He had begun and withdraws from Judea to Galilee, in order not to interfere with the Baptist's work so long as God permits it to be carried on, and in order to avoid the appearance of rivalry with His Forerunner (iii. 25–iv. 3). It would never occur to readers such as John had in mind—readers familiar with the synoptic tradition, and others of common intelligence—to identify this journey of Jesus from Judea to Galilee, which was undertaken because of the continuance of the work of the Baptist, with the journey from Judea to Galilee which Jesus made after the arrest of John (Matt. iv. 12; Mark i. 14). This unlikely combination of events was made altogether impossible by the fact that, according to the synoptic accounts, this journey marked the beginning of a prophetic work on the part of Jesus which moved the whole of Galilee, whereas in John there is nothing to indicate that Jesus resumed in Galilee the work which He had broken off in Judea. Nothing is recorded in iv. 43–54 concerning teaching and baptism on the part of Jesus, and nothing is said of His activity as a miraculous healer. Only a single act of healing is recorded, which was wrung from Jesus against His will (iv. 48); and in this instance the parallelism between this miracle and that in Cana (iv. 46, 54) is twice pointed out, showing it to have been a revelation of Jesus' glory which was just as isolated and just as premature as was the latter event (ii. 4), and just as much an exception to the rule which Jesus observed at this time of refraining from public work. It is just here, in connection with this stay in Galilee, that John represents Jesus as formally establishing this rule, for he gives as the motive of this journey to Galilee a saying of Jesus'—when spoken need not be considered here—from which no exegetical sophistry can derive any other meaning than this, namely, that Jesus went to Galilee at this time because He was convinced—and as occasion demanded, expressed the conviction—that in His native Galilee He was less likely to receive such recognition as He had received in Judea and even in Samaria, as He passed through it on His hasty journey to Galilee (n. 3). It was not His intention, therefore, to change the scene of His labours from Judea to Galilee, which would not have relieved in any way the unfortunate state of affairs which had caused His withdrawal from Judea (iii. 26, iv. 1), but He designed to remain in retirement so long as it pleased God that the Baptist should remain at liberty and continue his work. When Jesus appears again in Jerusalem at a feast (v. 1), this period of waiting is at an end; because now He speaks of John as a light which was no longer burning and shining (v. 35). Readers, such as were presupposed in iii. 24, knew that when in the narrative Jesus appears again in Galilee after this visit to Jerusalem (vi. 1 ff.), the time is that following the arrest of the Baptist, to which period the older accounts were almost exclusively confined. And their expectation is confirmed by the very first incident which John records after this reappearance in Galilee (vi. 3-13). Here they find a portion of the older tradition with which they were familiar (Matt. xiv. 13 f.; Mark vi. 31 ff.; Luke ix. 10 ff.), and this is the first instance where John gives essentially the same account as was found in the Synoptics.

Here there comes to light with great clearness the general presupposition on which the Fourth Gospel was based. The readers are introduced at once to the climax of Jesus' Galilean ministry, of which not only is nothing said in what precedes, but for which, rather, there is no place before v. 1, and consequently no place before vi. 1. As the imperfects in vi. 2 indicate, on account of His numerous deeds of healing, Jesus is followed constantly in Galilee by great throngs. The enthusiasm of the people is roused to a dangerous pitch (vi. 14 f.). As we learn in a purely incidental way in vi. 67-71, the twelve apostles have been for a long time already chosen. A harsh saying of Jesus brings about a crisis among the disciples less intimately attached to Him; from this moment the movement, now at its culmination, begins to decline (vi. 6-66). The ebb continues, so that half a year later (cf. vii. 2-9 with vi. 4) Jesus' brothers, in view of the decrease of His popularity in Galilee, urge Him now at last to reveal Himself before the whole world in Judea, where it was alleged that He had won so many followers (vii. 3, cf. ii. 23, iii. 26, iv. 1, 45). There is an interval of at least six months between v. 1 and vi. 4 (n. 4), and according to John's account this period was occupied by a work which moved the whole of Galilee, or more specifically, by the whole series of events which, according to Matt. iv. 12-xiv. 12; Mark i. 14-vi. 30; Luke iv. 14-ix. 10, took place in the interval between the arrest and the execution of the Baptist. Then follows another six months, from the Passover which, according to vi. 4, took place shortly after the events recorded in vi. 3-71 until the feast of Tabernacles in vii. 2, to which John gives only a single sentence, vii. 1. Nor was this six months a time of retirement, like the period beginning with iv. 43 (n. 3); for at its close Jesus' brothers do not find fault with Him because He had begun His work on a large scale in Galilee and then given it up again, but because He did His works in Galilee instead of in Judea and Jerusalem. We have, therefore, at least one full year of important prophetic work in Galilee which John passes over in silence, with the exception of the one connected account in vi. 3-71 and the general hints of vi. 2, vii. 1; although he not only betrays knowledge of the events which he passes over, but indicates their significance. There is no comparison between this procedure and that of the Synoptists, who also sometimes mention single events about which they know, without giving a full account of them (Matt. xi. 21, xxiii. 37, above, p. 170 ff.). John's procedure at this point, where for the first time his narrative comes into touch with the great current of the synoptic account (vi. 1-vii. 2), can be explained only on the assumption that his readers were fully informed about all the events which took place during this great "year of the Lord" in Galilee (Luke iv. 19, above, p. 169). Where, however, he does have occasion to bring before the readers again in full the account of a particular event which is recorded also in the older Gospels (vi. 3-13),—in order to add to it the account of other and new incidents and discourses, closely connected with the event (vi. 14 f., 23, 26-71), which he had to give, he shows again, as in the history of the relations between Jesus and the Baptist (above, p. 256 f.), by the addition of various details which cannot be explained as due to the influence of a poetic or didactic idea, that he has at his command independent knowledge of the situation (n. 5).

A new aspect of the relation between John and the Synoptists comes to view in John xi. 2, 3. Inasmuch as x. 40 refers back to i. 28, where Bethany (not Bethabara) on the east bank of the Jordan is mentioned as the place in which John began his baptism, it would not be at all unnatural, in the passage immediately following, where another Bethany near Jerusalem is referred to (xi. 1, 18), if in some way the latter place were distinguished from the former. The fact, however, that Bethany in Perea is not mentioned again by name in x. 40-42, renders such a geographical notice unnecessary. But even if it were, what a remarkable designation is that given in xi. 1. Instead of saying that the Bethany mentioned in this verse was situated near Jerusalem (ver. 18), John calls it "the village of Mary and her sister Martha." It is not until ver. 2 that the reader learns that the two women are the sisters of Lazarus; and even if it had been possible to infer this earlier, it must have impressed him as peculiar that the place which is mentioned as Lazarus' home is described not by his name, but as the village of Mary and Martha. Neither designation, however, is suited to distinguish the geographical location of the one Bethany from that of the other. The passage is intelligible only if we assume that the readers were already acquainted with a "village of Mary and Martha." In this case it would be of interest to them to learn, what they had not known before, that the Bethany where Lazarus lived and where he was now sick was the "village of the sisters Mary and Martha" of which they already knew. Manifestly the readers were in the same position in which we find ourselves to-day. From Luke x. 38-42 they knew, as do we, of a village in which two sisters, Mary and Martha, possessed a house; but that this village was called Bethany, and that it was the same Bethany where also a certain Lazarus lived, they learned, as do we, for the first time when they read John xi. 1. Before, however, informing his readers concerning the relationship of Mary and Martha to Lazarus (ver. 2*b*), who up to this time has remained unknown to them (xi. 1, 7*s*), the writer arouses further interest in the persons who appear in the narrative which follows, by indicating that Mary was the woman who had anointed the Lord with oil and wiped His feet with her hair. This incident was to be narrated with ample detail in its historical connection, xii. 1-8. But unless informed from other sources, the reader could not know this beforehand, and would necessarily understand xi. 2 incorrectly to mean that the anointing had taken place before the time of xi. 2, just as vii. 50, xviii. 14, 26, xix. 39 are to be taken as references to events which had happened and which are recorded earlier in the book, namely in iii. 2, xi. 50, xviii. 10. Here, however, where, as xii. 1-8 shows, the narrator has no intention of being so understood, he nevertheless refers to an anointing of Jesus with oil by a woman, just as though he himself had narrated the incident earlier. He takes for granted, therefore, that his readers are familiar with the details of the incident from other sources, and the new thing which he relates is the fact that this woman is identical with the Mary who has just been mentioned. Consequently the readers must have known, as we do, either from Matt. xxvi. 6-13, Mark xiv. 3-9, or from Luke vii. 36-50, the story of an anointing such as John took for granted they knew, i.e. one in which the act was narrated without the name of the woman being given. But comparison with John xii. 1-8 shows that John had in mind Mark xiv. 3-9 = Matt. xxvi. 6-13, not Luke vii. 36 ff.; and here again his account resembles that of Mark so closely, both in subject-matter and in language, that it is most natural to suppose that Mark was consciously made use of by John (n. 6). Here, as in the account of the feeding of the five thousand, John represents one disciple as saying what Matthew and Mark represent the disciples as saying collectively. Neither does he hesitate to report the most significant saying of Jesus in a form differing widely from that of the other accounts (ver. 7),—a form which, at a comparatively early date, seemed to pious readers objectionable, because, as John reported the saying, it had the appearance of being a prophecy which was not fulfilled (n. 6).

Up to this point two things seem to have been established, or shown to be extremely probable. (1) John takes for granted on the part of his readers a comprehensive knowledge of the gospel history. This knowledge includes not only the main outlines of the Gospel and the facts of great religious importance which would necessarily be brought out in the mission preaching, but also many separate stories which sometimes may have been narrated orally, but which could not have been parts of a uniform tradition in general circulation. (2) He is not only himself acquainted with the synoptic Gospels, especially with Mark, apparently also with Luke, but he presupposes this knowledge on the part of his readers. This is proved by the fact that throughout his Gospel he utilises the synoptic narratives, sometimes by connecting his own account directly with the same on the presupposition that they are known, sometimes by taking for granted that some event there recorded had happened which he does not repeat, sometimes by guarding the readers against possible misunderstanding of the synoptic accounts, or by informing them for the first time of details which had become effaced in these accounts, or by correcting slight inaccuracies which had crept into them. On the whole, however, the synoptic accounts are confirmed both by what John repeats and by what he does not report but takes for granted as having happened and as being known.

Assuming that these facts suffice to prove that John's omission of material found in the Synoptics, which in itself is important, is no proof either that he was ignorant of the same or that he disapproved of it, we may pursue this line of inquiry still further. In passages like i. 19-34, iii. 24, vi. 1-21, xi. 1 f., xii. 1-8, the reader is reminded constantly of the synoptic accounts, and nowhere does he get a conception of events essentially different from that which he finds in the earlier Gospels. Just as in the case of the most important facts of the gospel history, as, for example, the whole of John's baptismal work, Jesus' baptism by him, the imprisonment of the Baptist, the healing of multitudes in Galilee, and the choice of the apostles, the reader finds his previous conception directly confirmed by the fact that John does not undertake to give a new and different account of these facts; so he discovers with regard to numerous other instances to which John less clearly refers.

Without claiming anything at this point as to the purpose of the Fourth Gospel, we may call attention to the patent fact, which the author himself brings out very explicitly in xx. 30 (xxi. 25), that what he records is selected from a mass of material at his disposal. In a degree unparalleled by any other evangelist, he abandons all attempt at completeness in the narrative in the history, and consequently disregards entirely an external pragmatic treatment of the history. In the case of the "year of grace in Galilee" this is self-evident, and likewise in the case of the beginnings of the history of Jesus. We have seen how the curiously chosen beginning of his narrative in i. 19 does not exclude the accounts in Matt. iii. 1-4, 11; Mark i. 2-13; Luke iii. 1-iv. 13, nor lessen their importance, but rather presupposes them (above, p. 256). Quite as little does this beginning exclude or disparage the accounts in Matt. i.-ii.; Luke i.-ii. Just before it is said that the Logos became flesh, who, because of the incarnation, is called the only-begotten Son of God (i. 14), it is stated (according to the text still accepted) very explicitly how those for whom Christ has won the right and possibility of becoming children of God, and who are now believers on the name of Christ, become children of God. If the reader were unacquainted with the traditions in Matt. i. and Luke i., possibly the fact that the simple thought that we become children of God not by a natural, human birth, but by a working of God which may be figuratively described as begetting or birth (cf. iii. 3-8), is expressed by three negative and one simple positive statement, might excite only surprise, especially, however, that the will of the man as a factor in the begetting and birth of the child of God is excluded, whereas in natural birth the woman as well as the man is a factor, and besides the use of the plural αἱμάτων, suggests the inclusion of both the man and the woman. On the other hand, for readers such as those whom John addressed—who belonged to the Christian Church and were familiar with the traditions of the beginning of Jesus' life—the mystery was solved at once when it was observed that John described the birth of the children of God according to the analogy of the birth of the only-begotten Son of God, who is this in the fullest sense, and from His incarnation onwards. How inevitably Christian readers discovered in the passage reference to the begetting and birth of Jesus without the mingling of the blood of two human beings, and without the concurrence of fleshly desire and of the will of man, would be shown in the history of the text, if in ver. 13 οἱ . . . ἐγγενήθησαν were the original reading, from which in the second century the reading ἐγγενήθη, without a connecting relative (οἱ or ὅς), may have arisen and been widely spread abroad in the Churches. There are, however, strong reasons for the originality of this latter reading. For John would then have expressly acknowledged the traditions in Matt. i. and Luke i., and all the more have presupposed readers who knew these traditions and believed them to be true (n. 7).

After having put before his readers in i. 19-xi. 57 material which, with the exception of vi. 1-13 and occasional references to what they knew from other sources, was entirely new, in the account of the last days of Jesus' life John was under the necessity either of remaining silent altogether or of repeating what was already known from various sources; for, like the earlier Gospels, the missionary preaching and all the oral traditions concerning these days must have contained a full account of everything connected with the death and resurrection of Jesus. Nevertheless, in this section also the author of the Fourth Gospel follows the same eclectic method, and makes no effort to conceal the fact. Here it was impossible for a reader of any intelligence at all to conclude from John's silence regarding facts which were important in themselves, and which still survived in the tradition, either that the events had not taken place or that they were not accepted by John as true. From xii. 1, 12 the reader learns that a number of days intervened between the entrance of Jesus into Jerusalem and His death; but only one event, xii. 20-36, which took place during these days, and one short discourse, xii. 44-50, the time and place of which is not even indicated, are recorded. It is also necessarily presupposed in xii. 35 f. that Jesus did not in any way withdraw Himself from the people, but rather testified to them of Himself by His teaching and His deeds. After all the conflicts between Jesus and the Jewish authorities in Jerusalem, of which John especially gives us a full account from ii. 18 onwards, it must have been perfectly clear to everyone that collisions of this character could not be avoided during His last visit to the city. The fact that John passes all these events by in silence without even so much as such general remarks as are found in Luke xxi. 37 f., which would give the readers an idea of Jesus' life during these eventful days, of His place of residence, and of His works and discourses, is to be explained only on the supposition that they were sufficiently informed regarding these particular facts (Mark xi. 12-xiii. 37; Matt. xxi. 12-xxv. 46; Luke xix. 47-xxi. 38). In contrast to the seanty account of this part of the history, we have detailed reports regarding the last hours which Jesus spent with the apostles (xiii. 1–xvii. 26). But this narrative would be quite unintelligible to readers unacquainted with at least the main features of the history of the last night of Jesus' life. It is not until well on in the narrative that such readers would become aware that it was the last evening which He spent with them and the night before His arrest (xiii. 32, εὐθὺς; xiii. 38, xiv. 25–31, xvi. 32, xviii. 1 ff.). Without statement as to place or time (xiii. 1, n. 8), an account is given of what took place during a meal of which Jesus partook with His disciples. That Judas' betrayal of Jesus, which is referred to at an earlier point in the narrative (vi. 64, 70 f., xii. 4), and again in xiii. 2, 18–30 (xiv. 22), xvii. 12, as if it were already known, was the outcome of an arrangement with the authorities, is not indicated either here or anywhere else, not even in xviii. 2, where the progress of the narrative requires that it be presupposed. It must be taken for granted, therefore, that this fact was known.

If, as all the tradition from 1 Cor. xi. 23 onwards affirms, Jesus instituted the Christian sacrament of the Lord's Supper on the occasion of His last meal (vol. ii. 380, No. 7), the idea could occur to no Christian writer that, by passing by in silence this event, which was of such great importance in Christian worship, he could banish the same from the consciousness of the Church for which he wrote (above, p. 208 f.). And the later he wrote and the more deeply the celebration of the Lord's Supper, which depended upon this act of Jesus, became ingrained into the custom of the Church with the lapse of time, the more impossible would it be for him to entertain such an idea. If the writer had not taken it for granted that his readers were fully informed concerning this part of the history, he could not have passed this event by in silence, nor could he have written chap. xiii. –xvii. in their present form. The same is true of chaps. xviii.—xx. The omission of the account of Jesus' struggle in prayer in Gethsemane and of Judas' kiss in xviii. 1–11, and the introduction into the picture of a number of features which are not found in the Synoptics (the names of Peter and of Malchus, the co-operation of the Roman cohort, and the conversation between Jesus and those sent to arrest Him), are quite in keeping with what we have observed in sections previously discussed, which are formally parallel to accounts in the Synoptics. Here, however, is to be especially observed that John does not omit important facts which the parallelism between portions of his account and that of the Synoptics would naturally lead him to relate without elsewhere supplying a kind of substitute for them,—a fact which was found to be true also of Luke in relation to Mark (above, p. 102 f.). The essential contents of the story of the agony in the garden (Matt. xxvi. 37–45; Mark xiv. 33–41; Luke xxii. 41–46; Heb. v. 7, vol. ii. 362, 380), which John omits, are given in connection with an event recorded by him alone in xii. 27. There is no account of the institution of the Lord's Supper; but in vi. 26–65 is found a discourse which the original readers could construe only as a prophecy fulfilled by the observance of the Supper in the Church, and which was actually so construed (n. 9). Peter's great confession (Matt. xvi. 16; Mark viii. 29; Luke ix. 20) is replaced by another having the same significance, but different in form, and found in a different connection (John vi. 69). For the missing story of Jesus' birth there is a brief but significant substitute in i. 13 f. (above, p. 265 f.), and in place of the account of His baptism, John offers i. 32–34. In all these instances John's statements and narratives are independent. An author who, on the one hand, shows by such chapters as iii. 1–v. 47, vii.—xi., xiii.—xvii. that he has a large amount of material at his disposal not used in any form by the Synoptists, and that he knew also how to arrange the same, and who, on the other hand, does not hesitate to repeat without essential modification what the Synoptists had written earlier (vi. 1-13, xii. 1-18, xviii. 1 ff.), is above the suspicion of having produced these and other accounts (n. 10) with the help of his imagination and by recasting the material furnished him by the Synoptics.

In the history of the Passion, repetition was unavoidable; but here also John writes with the same conscious reference to the Synoptics. Accepting the text of the older MSS., modifications of which are easy to understand and therefore to be rejected (n. 11), John in xviii. 13-28 distinguishes between a transaction in the house of Annas and a later hearing in the house of Caiaphas. The express statement that the former of these hearings took place first (xviii. 13, πρῶτον), and the omission of all account of the second hearing, with only the insertion of the account of Peter's second and third denials between the notice of Jesus' deliverance into Caiaphas' hands by Annas (ver. 24) and His handing over to Pilate by Caiaphas (ver. 28), would be incomprehensible on the part of an author who was giving the history of these events without reference to other accounts with which the readers were familiar. For it is altogether self-evident that what is first recorded and what immediately follows the account of the arrest took place first; and everyone understands that what took place in the house of Caiaphas, whose position as ruling high priest is strongly emphasised in vv. 13 f., 24 as earlier in xi. 49-51, must have been more important than the hearing before Annas, to whom John ascribes no official position whatever, and whose participation in the trial he explains merely on the ground of his relationship to the high priest (ver. 13). When, nevertheless, John expressly affirms that the hearing before Annas took place first, and then passes by without a word the latter event, concerning which he had aroused their attention in ver. 24, it can only he because he wrote with other accounts in view which seemed to make the first statement necessary and allowed him to pass the other by. Mark xiv. 53-65 and xv. 1 and Matt. xxvi. 57-68, xxvii. 1, agree in distinguishing between what took place during the night in the dwelling of the high priest and a session of the Sanhedrin held in the early morning; and both Gospels place the decisive hearing and the death sentence of Jesus in the night assembly. Matthew differs from Mark only in calling the high priest, before whom the hearing by night took place, Caiaphas, and in stating (xxvii. 1) that the decision in regard to the execution of Jesus was made at the morning sitting. There is no reference to this in Mark xv. 1. Luke is similar to Matthew in this latter variation. He makes no mention whatever in xxii. 54 ff. of a hearing by night before the Sanhedrin, and, on the other hand, places the decisive hearing in the official session of the Sanhedrin, which was held in the morning (xxii. 66-70). It is evident that the tradition was uncertain with regard to the different steps of Jesus' trial. It was the special mission of the disciple who was known in the household and the court of the high priest, and who, therefore, was not compelled like Peter to remain without in the court, but could enter the inner rooms of the house which were used for the trial, to make this clear. Since John says only that Peter remained in the court, he himself must actually have gone within, and so have gained a more exact idea of the course of events than was possible for Peter, especially since the latter was very much occupied with his own affairs and became confused (n. 11). Consequently, whether the disciple in xviii. 15-16 was John himself or his brother James (above, p. 216), John was able to correct the error, which is expressed in so many words only by Matthew, but which was probably shared also by Mark and Luke, namely, that Jesus was led at once upon His arrest to Caiaphas. Not to Caiaphas, says John, but before and first to Annas (ver. 13). With this error which John thus corrects was connected another, expressed by Matthew and Mark, but corrected by Luke, namely, that witnesses were examined at the hearing held during the night, and the sentence of death passed as if it were a regular court. Here John agrees with Luke, since what he relates about the transaction in the house of Annas is only a preliminary hearing of Jesus; there is no decision, and the whole lacks the character of a judicial procedure in which a case is pressed to an issue. But such a trial was the necessary presupposition of the appearance of the members of the Sanhedrin before Pilate (John xviii. 30, xix. 7; Matt. xx. 18; Mark x. 33; Acts xiii. 27). This was not held at night before Annas, but in the early morning before Caiaphas. John is aware of this, and notices also the transference of Jesus to Caiaphas (vv. 24, 28), but omits an account of what took place during this trial, because in the nature of the case neither he nor his brother was present at the meeting of the Sanhedrin, and consequently he had nothing to add to what the readers already knew from Mark or Luke or Matthew, or from all three of the synoptic Gospels. While in this instance John clearly shows himself acquainted with the older tradition and reveals his definite purpose to arrange his own account with reference to the earlier synoptic narratives, the reference of πάλλιν in xviii. 40 to previous participation of the crowd in the trial by loud cries, of which, however, nothing is said in John, may be unintentional. But it is evidently an echo of Mark xv. 8, 11, 13. In general, it may be said that the sudden appearance of Barabbas in John's narrative is to be explained only on the supposition that the story was familiar to the readers, but could not well be passed over by John in silence. This is true also of xx. 2, although in the previous verses we read only that Mary Magdalene came to the grave and saw that the stone was rolled away; nevertheless, when she comes to Peter and John she says to them that someone has taken the Lord's body out of the grave, which no one could know without having convinced himself that the tomb was empty. Moreover, in declaring her uncertainty as to the place where the body has been laid, she does not use οὐκ οἶδα, as in ver. 13, but οὐκ οἶδαμεν. It is thus presupposed that others besides her had had essentially the same experience, and had discussed with her the question as to where the body had been removed. But the others must have seen more than she did, i.e. they must have inspected the tomb and have found it empty. In short, while on the one hand John's account presupposes the narrative in Mark xvi. 1-5 (Matt. xxviii. 1. 5-6; Luke xxiv. 1-10), on the other hand it differs from this account, in which the distinctions had become obliterated, by indicating that Mary Magdalene came only as far as the grave, but did not enter it. In the meanwhile, however, she had spoken with the other women who had gone into the grave. The lack of skilful historical narrative in John which we notice here and elsewhere is more than offset by the evidence of his dependence upon the synoptic narrative, especially upon Mark. Indeed, this lack of skill is the very means by which dependence upon the Synoptics is brought clearly to light.

It is from this point of view that an answer is to be given to the much debated question as to how John's idea of the chronology of the Passion history, i.e., of the time relation of the last meal and the crucifixion to the Jewish feast of the Passover of that year, is related to that of the Synoptists. This was one of the main questions at issue at the time of the disputes about the proper date for the celebration of the Christian Passover which arose between 165 and 170 in the Churches of Asia Minor, and which after 190 were continued between the Churches of Rome and Ephesus (n. 12). With only rare exceptions, such as Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis (about 170), the Churches and bishops of the province of Asia had at the time of these disputes been for a long time Quartodecimans (τεσσαρεσκαίδεκατῆται), and they continued to remain such during the third century, i.e., they observed the Christian Passover, which consisted of a special celebration of the Eucharist after a fast, on the day and at the hour of the Jewish Passover meal on the evening of the 14th of Nisan. In support of this practice they appealed to the example of the great saints of the Church of their province, the apostle John of Ephesus, Philip of Hierapolis, and also the bishops and martyrs of the post-apostolic age. They appealed also to "the Gospel," particularly to Matthew, according to which Christ on the evening before His death observed the Jewish Passover at the time prescribed by the law. i.e., the evening of the 14th of Nisan, and on this occasion instituted and celebrated the Christian Passover or Eucharist. Inasmuch as they claimed to have the authority of "the Gospel," i.e. the four Gospels, and in general of the entire Scripture on their side in this question, they must have been of the opinion that John and Matthew were in agreement on this point. Their opponents also took for granted that under all circumstances the Gospels must agree with one another and that they did actually so agree; but on the authority of John, especially of John xviii. 28, they claimed that Jesus partook of His last meal, which they regarded as in no sense a Jewish Passover meal, on the 13th of Nisan, and died on the 14th of Nisan as the true Passover lamb.

How the original representatives of these two opposing practices and exegetical views found support in detail in the texts for their common principle, namely, that the four Gospels are in harmony with one another, we are unable to determine positively from the literature which has come down to us, and which consists merely of scanty fragments. The view of the Johannine account which the opponents of the Quartodecimans (Apollinaris, Clement, Hippolytus) maintained has become the dominant view also in modern times. The Tübingen school made this one of their principal arguments against the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel. They maintained that the anti-Quartodecimanian Fourth Gospel could not have been written by the apostle John, who according to trustworthy tradition was himself a Quartodeciman in practice; in fact, that one of the reasons for the composition of the Gospel and its ascription to the apostle was to give support to the anti-Quartodecimanian manner of observing Easter (n. 13). This view was extreme, and may be dismissed in a few words. In the first place, if this were the writer's purpose, then he must have been devoid of intelligence. For he leaves the character of Jesus' last meal entirely indefinite (xiii. 2) and says nothing about the institution of the Lord's Supper, thus leaving entirely untouched the chief point of dispute in the Easter controversy of the second century. Nor does he anywhere inform his readers expressly regarding the time relation between the separate acts of the Passion and the various parts of the Jewish Passover, and his own definite view regarding this relation which is thought by many to contradict that of the Synoptists comes out only in an incidental way. A man who conceived the bold idea of setting aside the view regarding the most important part of the gospel history which had prevailed up to his time and upon which the method of celebrating Easter in the Church of Asia was based, must have attempted to do so by an out and out denial of the correctness of the prevailing practice, and by positively claiming in the appropriate place at the beginning of the history of the Passion the correctness of the opposite practice. The later he wrote and the more deeply the practice which he antagonised had become rooted with the lapse of time through the influence of literature and of Church usage, the more positive must have been his denial. The employment of such entirely inadequate means as it is claimed that the writer used to accomplish his purpose resulted in the complete failure of his attempt in the immediate region where the Fourth Gospel originated: for, with the exception of the isolated case of Apollinaris, the Church of Asia Minor remained Quartodecimanian until within the fourth century. In the second place, even if John did observe Easter in Ephesus according to Quartodecimanian practice, we have no right to assume that at this early date he was influenced by the same considerations and arguments which the Quartodecimans advanced in the disputes between the years 165 and 200 when their time-honoured custom was attacked. That the conception of Christ as the Paschal Lamb of His Church is entirely independent of the alleged view of John that Jesus died on the 14th of Nisan, before He could have partaken of the Passover meal, is proved by Paul; since he expresses the idea even more clearly than the author of the Fourth Gospel (1 Cor. v. 7), although he is familiar with the fact that Jesus observed the Jewish Passover on the night of His arrest, and on this night instituted the Lord's Supper (above, vol. ii. 380 under no. 7). The conception of Christ as the Paschal Lamb which is found throughout the N.T. is in no way based upon this alleged coincidence of the hour of Jesus' death with the time of the slaying of the Passover lamb, but was involved in the view that redemption under the new covenant was the counterpart of the deliverance from Egypt, and found merely a natural point of connection in the fact that Jesus died at the time of the Jewish Passover, and not, for example, during the feast of Tabernacles (John vii. 2-10). In a similar way the Quartodecimanian observation of Easter was not dependent upon the chronological details of the Passion, e.g., upon the fact advanced by the later Quartodecimans that Jesus observed the Passover and instituted the Lord's Supper on the 14th of Nisan, for the reason that the observance of the Lord's Supper by the Church and the Christian

Passover—for that is what the special yearly celebration of the Eucharist really was—is not a memorial celebration of the institution of the Lord's Supper, but the celebration of the redemption of the entire Church by Christ,—an antitype of the Jewish Passover meal.

In just the same way the method of observing Easter in the West, opposed to that of the Quartodecimans, is not dependent upon the exegetical opinion of Apollinaris or Clement regarding single passages in the Fourth Gospel, since Irenæus, Origen, and Tertullian observed Easter after the manner customary in the West, without on that account denying that Jesus observed the Passover on the evening before His death at the time prescribed by the law, and, consequently, without denying that the earliest possible date for His death was the 15th of Nisan (n. 14). The Quartodecimanian observance of Easter may have been introduced into the province of Asia by Paul or his disciples (Timothy, Epaphras, and others), and John may have adopted the method of Easter observance which he found already existing in Ephesus, without regard to our view of the details of the chronology of the Passion history; since the fact that Jesus had partaken of His last meal with His disciples at the time of a Jewish Passover feast, the fact that He had suffered death and had risen from the dead, and that by choosing this time for His redemptive acts He had represented Himself as the Paschal Lamb of the new covenant, and His work as the antitype of the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, were facts established beyond all question and independent of chronological details. If John did hold a view of the date of Jesus' death different from that held by Paul and the Churches from Antioch to Corinth, by the Synoptists and the different circles who reproduced their tradition, the possibility that this would have influenced him to oppose the custom in vogue in the Churches of the province of Asia was rendered less by the fact that in Palestine he himself, like all his companions, had lived according to the law which required the yearly celebration of the Jewish Passover, but which in the case of Christians could not terminate without the celebration of the Christian Passover meal, namely, the Eucharist. Consequently, John's Quartodecimanian practice in Ephesus is no proof whatever that this John connected the different stages of the Passion history with the different days of the Jewish feast of the Passover, and so argues nothing against his authorship of the Fourth Gospel, even if this should be found to present a view of the chronology of Jesus' Passion differing from that of the later Quartodecimans. The belief still prevalent that this is actually the case, has influenced many who are convinced that the Fourth Gospel was written by the apostle John, or at least by an eye-witness of the Passion history, in some instances to form conclusions regarding the Synoptists which deny all connection between them and first hand information; in other cases, to make bold conjectures concerning the facts in the case designed to remove the alleged contradiction between John and the Synoptists (n. 15).

There is, however, no occasion whatever to dispute the fact that all three Synoptists report, without the least evidence of uncertainty about the matter, Jesus' observance of the Jewish Passover at the time prescribed by the law, namely, on the 14th of Nisan, His crucifixion on the 15th of Nisan, i.e. on Friday, and His resurrection on the 17th of Nisan, which fell on a Sunday. According to the preceding investigations (§§ 48-63) this is attested by the apostle Matthew, by Mark, who drew his account principally from the oral discourses of Peter, and in whose home Jesus partook of His last meal, and also by Luke, who had been a member of the Church in Antioch since about the year 40, and who also had abundant opportunity to inform himself of the details of the gospel history from members of the original Church, of which opportunities he made good use. But even if these results of the investigation of the first three Gospels were less certain than they seem to the present writer to be, it would nevertheless remain true that we have to do here, not with the opinion of three individual writers, but with three representatives of a tradition which before the year 80 had spread from Palestine to Rome with ramifications in many directions.

To this must be added Paul's testimony, who publishes the same view in the year 57 (vol. ii. 380, no. 7), and declares that at the time when the Corinthian Church was founded (52-54 A.D.) he had imparted to the Corinthians the history of the institution of the Lord's Supper—in the account of which his opinion comes clearly to view—just as he had received it by tradition from the Lord (vol. ii. 384, n. 6). Therefore he must have found this view dominant not only in the Church of Antioch between the years 43 and 49, but also in the Church in Damascus between the years 35 and 38. In view of this fact, it seems impossible that an eye-witness of the Passion should have held a view regarding the question as to whether Jesus' last meal, when the Lord's Supper was instituted, was a Passover meal, and as to whether Jesus died on the 14th or 15th of Nisan, differing from the tradition which universally prevailed after the year 35, and which was necessarily repeated whenever the chief features of the Passion history were related, and whenever instruction was given regarding the institution and significance of the Lord's Supper. A writer who advanced such a view, and at the same time claimed that he occupied a place at Jesus' side during the last meal and stood under His cross, would be at once convicted of falsehood, both as regards his claim and his view of the time of Jesus' last meal. If the Fourth Gospel dates the chronology of the Passion a day earlier—in this way changing the character of essential features of this most important part of the gospel history—then the Johannine authorship of the record will have to be denied, not because he was a Quartodeciman, but because of the close relationship which this disciple sustained to Jesus. But is it true that the Fourth Gospel does date the Passion a day earlier?

This question cannot be correctly answered if one denies what was established above (p. 255 ff.), namely, that John wrote for Christians who were familiar with the tradition represented in the Synoptics, and especially with Mark, in consequence of which he treats this tradition throughout as a history which the readers believed and which is essentially trustworthy; that in some instances he passes over very important parts of this history without thereby implying any doubt as to its importance or truth; that in other instances he incidentally takes for granted that events have happened and are known (e.g. vi. 2, 70); and finally, that in cases where he does find the synoptic account misleading (e.g. iii. 24), or actually inaccurate and incorrect, he simply supplies another account out of his own fuller knowledge (e.g. xii. 7), or corrects it in so many words (e.g. xviii. 13). In the light of these facts it must be self-evident that if John had held the synoptic accounts, or, rather, the tradition universally current in the early Church regarding the character of Jesus' last meal and the time relation of His death to the celebration of the Jewish Passover, to be incorrect, he must either have corrected the same expressly, clearly, and in the appropriate place, or have omitted all corrections, and have replaced the synoptic accounts by another account. An eye-witness of the events would certainly not have lacked the courage to make such corrections, and a pseudonymous writer, who intended by his invention to oppose or to correct the account which had been heretofore believed and upon which Church usage was based (see above, p. 275 f.), must have summoned it to action. But there is nothing of this spirit in the Fourth Gospel. The author does not show any disposition to instruct his readers concerning the relation of the last events of Jesus' life to the Jewish Passover; he only uses this relation to explain a few occurrences. On the other hand, he does lay a good deal of weight upon the fact that Jesus died on a Friday and rose from the dead on a Sunday (xix. 14, 31, 42, xx. 1, 19, 26), evidently because the Christian arrangement of the days of the week was based upon this presupposition (Rev. i. 10; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Acts xx. 7). But in this John agrees entirely with the Synoptists. Even as early as vii. 8 (cf. vv. 1-6) the attentive reader is prepared by what is there said to expect that Jesus will not end His career at the feast of Tabernacles, but at a later feast, which is definitely in mind. In xi. 45-53 his attention is directed to the near approach of Jesus' death; in xi. 54-57, to the nearness of the Passover. The date of His arrival in Bethany, xii. 1, is reckoned with reference to the Passover (n. 16). Since, however, in the case of the six days which follow the transition from one to the other is indicated in only a single instance (xii. 12), it is impossible for the reader to assign the events recorded in xii. 20-xviii. 27 to the particular days on which they took place; but if, like the first readers of the Fourth Gospel, he already has a definite view of the course of events during the last days, he finds nothing in John which contradicts it, certainly not in xiii. 1.

When this passage is correctly understood (n. 8), the very most that can be inferred from it is that everything related in xiii. 2-xx. 29 took place during the Passover which began some time during the course of the 14th of Nisan; and when the reader observes, as he must do at once, that what is recorded in xiii. 2-xviii. 27 took place on the last evening and the night before Jesus' death, this preconceived idea that the meal mentioned in xiii. 2 ff. was the Passover meal could only be confirmed, especially since the omission of the article before δείπνου γενομένου, xiii. 2, was an appeal to the reader's previous knowledge of the history of the last evening of Jesus' life, and the verse contained not the slightest hint of any intention on the writer's part to inform his readers more fully regarding the time and character of this meal.

Readers such as John had in mind could not infer, even from xiii. 29, that the feast was still to take place, and had not begun already at the time of xiii. 2. The first passage which could lead them astray was xviii. 28. But as a matter of fact, so far as we know, the author's own disciples and the Church of the province of Asia were not misled by the verse, and it was not until the middle of the second century that several scholars came to the conclusion that, according to John, the Passover meal had not yet been celebrated on the morning of the crucifixion, —a view, opposition to which to-day is almost an act of impropriety (n. 17). But for scholarly readers, who know how to put themselves in the place of the original readers, the singular expression φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα is less difficult to accept than the possibility that in this passage, near the end of his book, in an entirely incidental remark which has no connection either with Jesus' last meal or with the transactions and sufferings on the last day of His life, but which ostensibly is designed merely to explain why members of the Sanhedrin refused to enter the Prætorium, the writer should have attempted to overthrow a view of his readers which he has left entirely undisturbed throughout the whole of the preceding account (xii. 1–xviii. 27). It would be more credible to assume that φάγωσιν is an early scribal error for ἀγώσιν, which would then naturally refer to the entire seven days' feast just begun. But it is not necessary to employ such a drastic means of escaping the difficulty, since the usage of the expression "to eat the Passover" loosely and popularly for the entire seven days' or, properly, seven and a half days' feast, beginning with the slaughter of the Passover lamb, is adequately attested (n. 17). Moreover, it is probable that the members of the Sanhedrin had specifically in mind the so-called Chagigah, the sacrificial meal of the 15th of Nisan, which, unlike the Passover meal, was held during the course of the day and not after sundown. Cum vulgo loquitur evangelista, correctly remarks the elder Lightfoot (Opp. ii. 670). To stake everything upon one little subordinate clause, or possibly even upon a single letter in the clause, and to leave out of consideration everything that is said elsewhere in the book, and the clear relation of the whole narrative to the older accounts, is not exegetical accuracy, but violates the laws of historical interpretation. The relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Synoptics harmonises with John of Ephesus' brief judgment regarding Mark: ἀκριβὼς ἔγραψεν, οὐ μέντοι τάξει, which, because it is brief, requires careful elaboration, and with Papias' judgment, based upon the statement of John: οὐδὲν ἡμαρτεν Μάρκος. Thus the investigations of this section confirm the conclusions reached above in §§ 48-63 regarding the origin of the first three Gospels.

1. (P. 255.) Concerning the relation of John to the Synoptics, cf. Hug, *Eint.*³ ii. 191-205; Baur, Krit. Unters. über die kanon. Evv. 1847, S. 239-280; Holtzmann, ZfWTh, 1869, S. 62-85, 155-178, 446-456. Wuttig (Das joh. Ev. und seine Abfassungszeit), S. 52-59, is under necessity of denying John all reference to the Synoptics, because, contrary to most critics, he makes Luke write his Gospel to supplement the Fourth Gospel, S. 59-69, 96-102. Of still less importance are the few words with which Gebhardt, Die Abfassungszeit des Jo. ev. 1906, S. 15-17, believes that he can discredit all proofs for John's attention to the synoptic tradition.

2. (Pp. 255, 256.) That John i. 6-viii. 15 is no substitute for an historical introduction—such as is found in Matt. iii. 1-6; Mark i. 2-8, but especially in Luke i. 5-25, 39-80, iii. 1-20—is obvious. It is likewise obvious that the conjecture that the Baptist wished to pass for the Messiah (John i. 20, 25, cf. iii. 28; Luke iii. 15)—a conjecture presupposed by the question put to him by the embassy—could not have arisen so early in his public activity. If, as is undoubtedly the case, in ver. 24 ἀπεσταλμένοι, without the article, is the correct reading, it is to be rendered: "and there were sent Pharisees"; since here, as in ix. 40, xvi. 17; Rev. ii. 10, iii. 9, xi. 9; Matt. xxiii. 34 (similarly also John vii. 40; Rev. ii. 17; Matt. xiii. 47, xxvii. 9; ZKom. Matt. 700), ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων is a Hebrew and Syriac idiom (Blass, Ntl. Gr. § 35. 4; Nöldeke, Syr. Gr. § 249c) = des Pharisiens. The official embassy (cf. v. 33) consisted of priests and Levites, and was made up, therefore, not of Pharisees, but rather of adherents of the Sadducean party; these were accompanied, however, by representatives of the Pharisaic party. Moreover, as Origen saw,—although his insight is not without error (tom. vi. 8 in Jo.),—the tenor of their question proves that the persons speaking in ver. 24 are altogether different from those speaking in vv. 19–23. The fact that in the Fourth Gospel the Baptist is never called ὁ βαπτιστής (Matt. 6 times, Mark 3 times, Luke 3 or 4 times, also Josephus),—although baptism is everywhere spoken of as his distinctive calling (i. 25, 26, 28, 31, 33, iii. 23, iv. 1, x. 40),—may be due to the circumstance that the apostle John is never mentioned by name in the Fourth Gospel. There is no occasion, therefore, to distinguish between the Baptist and the apostle. The various readings in ver. 27 are due to a mistaken effort to find in this verse the earlier testimony to which the Baptist refers in ver. 30 (=ver. 15). The testimony recalled in ver. 30 belongs before the beginning of the narrative in ver. 19 ff. Since it presupposes also that profounder knowledge of Jesus which the Baptist obtained only when the Spirit descended upon Him at His baptism (vv. 31–34), this revelation in visible form, i.e. the baptism of Jesus, must likewise precede vv. 19–27. This is proved also by ver. 26; for the emphatic ὃν ὑμεῖς οὐκ οἴδατε implies a ὃν ἐγὼ οἶδα, without which also the positive μέσος ὑμῶν στήκει would be unintelligible. The description of the Messiah as ὁ βαπτίζων ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ, which is used in ver. 33 as if it were a familiar conception, presupposes on the part of the readers acquaintance with the fact that the Baptist had ascribed to the Messiah, who was to come after him, baptizing with the Spirit as His principal function, cf. Mark i. 8; Matt. iii. 11; Luke iii. 16. Similarly also only readers familiar with Mark i. 11 (Matt. iii. 17; Luke iii. 22) could understand how, on the basis of the experience related in vv. 32–33, the Baptist could claim to have testified previously what is given in ver. 34 as the contents of his testimony. In the same verse ἐκλεκτός (S* Sc Ss c) is to be read instead of υἱός, as in the Textus receptus, which agrees with the ἐν ᾧ ἐδόξασα of the Synoptics, when this phrase is correctly understood = “whom I have chosen,” cf. Luke ix. 35, xxiii. 35. But in the use of this word John, like Peter (vol. ii. 215 ff.), shows that his knowledge is independent of the language of the Synoptics.

3. (Pp. 256, 259, 261.) The correct and, in fact, self-evident interpretation of iv. 44 has been urged particularly by Hofmann (Weissagung u. Erfüllung, ii. 86). The following points are clear: (1) In this connection, where only Judea and Galilee are mentioned, and Samaria is spoken of as the region lying between the two (iii. 22, iv. 3, 4, 43–45, 47, 54), the ἰδίᾳ πατρίδι of Jesus can be only Galilee, not Nazareth, which is not even mentioned, still less Judea. (2) The remark, which would have been appropriate in iv. 3, is properly introduced in iv. 44, because the unexpectedly great and unsought for results in Sychar, which might have diverted another from his immediate calling, and turned him aside from his newly formed resolve temporarily to withdraw from public work (iv. 1–3), had not so affected Jesus, but had rather led Him, in view of the common experience that a prophet is not apt to be very highly esteemed in his own home, to leave Sychar at once, and immediately to continue His journey into His native Galilean homeland. Whether on this occasion Jesus actually spoke the word concerning the prophet, or whether John, remembering that Jesus had used this proverbial expression on another occasion (Matt. xiii. 57; Mark vi. 4; Luke iv. 24), introduces it in order to explain why Jesus continued His journey to Galilee, cannot be determined. (3) αὐτός Ἰησοῦς (without an article, as in ii. 24) does not, like Ἰησοῦς αὐτός, iv. 2, mean "Jesus Himself," as distinguished from His disciples or others, who might have been more likely to express themselves in this way. The meaning is exactly the same as in ii. 24: "He for His part" thought and spoke thus, in contrast to what, from a different point of view, might otherwise have been thought and done. In this instance it meant that the results were not entirely in accordance with the purpose of Jesus. (4) It is not necessary in this case that οὖν in ver. 45 be replaced by δέ, since ver. 45 does not in any sense express a consequence and result of ver. 44 or ver. 43. Jesus' friendly reception by the Galileans was a result neither of the common experience noted in ver. 44, nor of the circumstance that Jesus had uttered the words of ver. 44, nor of His journey to Galilee (ver. 43), nor even of His unreported work in Galilee, but the outcome rather of the miracles which He had wrought in Jerusalem. The particle οὖν, which John uses with very great frequency (about 210 times; in all three Synoptics only about 110 times), is used here, as often in John, especially after inserted remarks, simply in order to resume, or even merely to continue, the narrative; cf. iii. 25, iv. 5, 9 (certainly genuine), xi. 3, 6, 14. The contrast between the mind and purpose with which Jesus went to Galilee (iv. 1-3, 43-44), and His reception there, is not formally expressed in this passage any more than it is in those passages where John connects contrasted statements by καί (e.g. i. 10, 11). That Jesus, however, did persist in His opinion and purpose is attested by ver. 48, and by the silence of the Gospel concerning the public activity in which Jesus might have permitted Himself to become engaged.

4. (P. 260.) This is not the connection in which to give the real order of the gospel history, though it is in place to sketch its plan according to John. If in v. 1 we read ἡ ἐορτή, with NC, etc., there can be no doubt that the reference is to the feast of Tabernacles, since in vii. 2 the expression ἡ ἐορτή τῶν Ἰουδαίων, clear enough in itself, is further explained by the appositional phrase ἡ σκηνοπηγία (vi. 4 is not a parallel case). This corresponds to the use of in in the narrower sense of the feast of Tabernacles—a usage common in the Talmud, to which there is approach even in the O.T. (see Levy, Jastrow, Dalman, s.v.), a usage also which is in keeping with the extremely popular character of this feast. The error of the Church Fathers, beginning with Irenæus, and of many modern interpreters, in assuming that "the feast of the Jews" means simply the Passover, is due to the supposition that the Passover must have had the same significance for the Jews that it came to have for the Church and its worship through the Passion history. If the feast of Tabernacles be meant, then between December (iv. 35) and the feast of Tabernacles in v. 1 about nine months elapsed, and a Passover falls within the period; but, like everything else which occurred in this interval, is passed over in silence. We would have then, besides the three Passovers mentioned in ii. 13-23, vi. 4, xi. 55-xx. 29, a fourth between iv. 35 and v. 1, and between the first Passover in ii. 13 and the fourth in xi. 55 an interval of three years. If the reading ἑορτή without the article (ABD, etc.) be preferred, so far as the language is concerned one is at liberty to assume any feast he pleases, e.g. the feast of Purim after the December suggested in iv. 35, and preceding the Passover of vi. 4 by a month. But this is, in fact, historically impossible, assuming, of course, that John is writing history. It would then be necessary to crowd into the single month between Purim and the Passover, less the time occupied by the journey from Jerusalem to Galilee and the days which intervened between the feeding of the multitude and the Passover (vi. 4), i.e. into about three weeks, the whole of Jesus' extensive Galilean ministry (the content of Matt. iv. 12-xiv. 12), for which John leaves no place before chap. v., and which is presupposed in chap. vi. This is impossible. If ἑορτή be the correct reading, either the Passover, or Pentecost, or Tabernacles must be meant. Not only in case it be interpreted as the third feast, which would be self-evident if we read ἡ ἑορτή, but also in case it be interpreted as the first or second, according to John's plan, besides the three Passovers mentioned, there would be a fourth, belonging somewhere between iv. 35 and vi. 4. The whole course of events would then be the same as if we read ἡ ἑορτή. The only difference arising from the various possibilities would be the interval of time between iv. 35 and v. 1, or between v. 1 and vi. 4. This would vary, while that between iv. 35 and vi. 4, and the period covered by the gospel history, would in any case remain the same.

5. (P. 261.) Leaving out of account general agreement in the progress of the story and in situation, resemblances between John vi. 3-13 and Matt. xiv. 13-21, Mark vi. 34-44, Luke ix. 11-17, are as follows: (1) The five loaves of bread and two fishes; (2) the twelve baskets of fragments; (3) the five thousand men (only in Matt. are women and children expressly excluded); (4) the two hundred denarii (only in Mark vi. 37 and John vi. 7). Peculiar to John are: (1) the conversation between Jesus, Philip, and Andrew (of which the Synoptics give only a colourless picture). Mark alone has a somewhat more vivid account, so that in Mark vi. 37 the name Philip can be supplied from John, and in Mark vi. 38 the name of Andrew. In this connection it may also be remarked that John very closely resembles Mark: ἀνατίπτειν twice in John, once in Mark; the picturesque description of the grass-covered ground (expressed in Mark by χλωρός, in John by πολὺς); (2) παιδάριον, ver. 9; (3) the description of the loaves of bread as κριθῖνοι, vv. 9, 13; and (4) the characterisation of the fish as ὀψάρια, vv. 9, 11 (cf. xxi. 9, 10, 13).

6. (P. 264.) That the event referred to in John xii. 2-8 and hence in xi. 2 is the one mentioned in Matt. xxvi. 6-13, Mark xiv. 3-9, and not the story in Luke vii. 36-50, is apparent from the place (Bethany); the nearness of the Passover; the character of the woman who anointed Jesus; the practical identity and at the same time the difference in the remarks called out by the deed. But it is equally evident that in the statement (John xii. 3) that Mary anointed the feet of Jesus and dried them with her hair, the Johannine narrative varies from Matt. xxvi. 7 (ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς) and Mark xiv. 3 (κατὰ τῆς κεφαλῆς), where nothing is said of the anointing of the feet of Jesus, and of their being dried with the woman's hair, although one does not exclude the other, and possibly the indefinite τὸν κύριον in xi. 2 (cf. Matt. xxvi. 12; Mark xiv. 8, τὸ σῶμά μου) permits of both. It is also undeniable that John here resembles Luke vii. 38. Even the Lucan word ἐκμάσσειν is found in John xi. 2, xii. 3. This is not the place to settle the question whether Luke is here relating an historical fact distinct from the anointing in Bethany, or whether the same fact has been handed down in the two entirely different forms, one of which is found in Matt., Mark, and John, the other in Luke. In favour of the latter hypothesis is the fact that in Luke the host's name is Simon, as in Matt. and Mark, and the fact that Luke, in view of his own distinct account of the anointing, omits the anointing in Bethany with which he was familiar from Mark (above, p. 102). On the other hand, it is not impossible that two different events, which, however, agreed in some points, were assimilated to each other in the oral tradition more than they should have been, which gave rise to resemblances that awaken suspicions on the part of critically disposed investigators. But this is a question having to do more with the ἀσφάλεια of the traditions used by Luke than with the relation of John to the Synoptics. John agrees with Mark as against Matt. in the following points: (1) the valuation of the ointment at three hundred denarii (ver. 5 = Mark xiv. 5 preceded by ἐπάνω, Matt. xxvi. 9 only πολλοῦ); (2) in the use of almost exactly the same words, some of which are rare: λαβοῦσα λίτραν μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτίμου = Mark. ἔχουσα ἀλάβαστρον μύρου νάρδου πιστικῆς πολυτελοῦς (Matt., on the other hand, apparently has ἔχουσα ἀλ. μύρου βαρυτίμου). John xii. 8 is almost identical with Matt. xxvi. 11; only Mark xiv. 7 inserts καὶ ὅταν θέλῃτε δύνασθε (in other readings αὐτοῖς or αὐτούς or αὐτοῖς πάντοτε are added) εὖ ποιῆσαι. In addition to those already mentioned, the following are the more important variations in the Johannine account of Mary's action: (1) whereas the connection of the story in Mark and Matt. makes possible the impression—a possibility which disappears when the words are carefully considered—that the event took place two days before the Passover (Matt. xxvi. 2, 6; Mark xiv. 1, 3, ZKom. Matt. 677), John says (xii. 1) that Jesus arrived six days before the Passover; so that the feast given in His honour occurred either on the same or the next day, certainly on the day before the triumphal entry (xii. 12). This is not a correction of the Synoptics, any more than is iii. 24, but is intended rather to guard against a misunderstanding that might easily arise from the synoptic accounts, which do not follow exactly the chronological order. (2) John does not mention the host Simon, neither does he say who prepared the feast, consequently he does not indicate in whose house it took place. That, however, John did not think of it as taking place in the house of the sisters, is evident from the fact that in that case it would not be necessary to mention the circumstance that Martha helped in the serving, and still less the fact that Lazarus was one of those at the table. (3) Only John mentions the amount or weight of the ointment (ver. 3, cf. xix. 39). (4) John puts into the mouth of Judas practically the same words which in Matt. xxvi. 8 the disciples as a body are represented as saying, and which are assigned to some of the disciples in Mark xiv. 4, with whose account, therefore, at this point John agrees more closely than with that of Matthew and Luke. The situation is exactly the same as in John vi. 5-9 (see above, n. 5), and here the work of the harmonist is not a difficult one. The explanation of Judas' words in ver. 6 (cf. xiii. 29) seems to be derived from independent information, particularly since John says nothing about the payment of money to the traitor by the Sanhedrin, which is more easily understood if John's explanation in ver. 6 be correct. (5) Undoubtedly the correct reading in ver. 7 is ἵνα εἰς τὴν ἡμέραν τοῦ ἐνταφιασμοῦ μου τηρήσῃ αὐτό. But since this Mary had nothing to do with the burial of Jesus, and since even those women who did desire to anoint Jesus failed to accomplish it (Mark xvi. 1; Luke xxiii. 56, xxiv. 1), the reading was easily replaced by τετήρηκεν omitting ἵνα, without thereby making the personages agree with Matt. xxvi. 12; Mark xiv. 8. According to the correct reading of ver. 7, Jesus' aim is to prevent Judas' words from affecting the future acts of Mary and the disciples. He assumes that Mary will gladly use the remainder of the ointment left in the vessel to anoint His body, when He is laid in the grave. At the same time He indicates that this will shortly take place. The only point which Matt., Mark, and John have in common is the notice of Jesus' approaching burial.

7. (P. 266.) In the first and second German editions the present writer preferred the reading in i. 13, οἱ . . . ἐγεννήθησαν, of the Textus receptus, and therefore found only an indirect confirmation of the statement that Jesus was born of a Virgin (cf. also the writer's work, Das apost. Symbolum, S. 62 f.). Since then, however, by more careful investigation of the tradition, and especially for reasons of style, he has become convinced of the originality of the reading ἐγεννήθη without οἱ, which prevailed until the fourth century in the Western Church. Also the Valentinians, whom Tertullian accuses of having invented the reading ἐγεννήθησαν, used the verb without οἱ. The proofs of this conclusion, which are not exactly simple, will be found in ZKom. Joh. Cf. Resch, Anserkan. Parall. iv. 57 ff.; Ev. Joh., ed. by Blass, 1902, p. xii. Readers, such as i. 13 presupposes, could not have been misled by Philip's remark on the first day that he met Jesus (i. 46), or by vi. 42, into supposing that Jesus was Joseph's own son; since they knew that the Jews, notwithstanding their belief to the contrary, were not at all acquainted with Jesus' real origin (vii. 27-29, viii. 14), while it was not until later that Philip and the other disciples became aware of it (xiv. 8-11, xvi. 27-30). Neither did they need a learned dissertation to show that Jesus was really descended from David and born in Bethlehem,—facts which occasionally at least were questioned by some of the common people who knew Him only as a Galilean (vii. 41 f., cf. i. 45, 46, vii. 52). If the readers were not familiar with these facts, the evangelist certainly shows unpardonable carelessness, and defeats the purpose stated in xx. 31 in failing to answer these criticisms and in not denying—as, indeed, he could not deny—the basis of these opinions in Scripture (vii. 42), and in the Law and Prophets (i. 45).

8. (Pp. 268, 281.) That the events recorded in chaps. xiii.-xvii. belong to the time of the Passover the readers were already aware from xii. 1, 12, 20, since up to this point events have been recorded in strictly chronological order. Consequently in xiii. 1, 29, the readers are not definitely informed of this fact again, but simply reminded of it incidentally in connection with remarks made for a different purpose. With regard to xiii. 1-4, we limit ourselves here to the following points: (1) Since v. 1 is grammatically complete, and since the object of εἰδώς ὅτι in ver. 1 is entirely different from the object of εἰδώς ὅτι in ver. 3, there is no occasion to assume a sort of a logical anacoluthon between the two clauses and to take the second εἰδώς as a resumption of the first, by means of these devices making the time indicated in ver. 1 cover the washing of the disciples' feet in ver. 4 ff. (2) In ver. 1 there is as yet no reference whatever to the washing of the disciples' feet. Although strictly ἀγαπᾶν always means an emotion expressing itself in deeds (1 John iii. 18), and although occasionally, like φιλεῖν, the word is used for a peculiar expression of affection, namely, the kiss (Ign. ad Polyc. ii. 3; used by the same writer of the celebration of the love feast and the Lord's Supper, ad Smyrn. vii. 1; the word ἀγάπη is found in Jude 12; 2 Pet. ii. 13; vol. ii. 235); here ἡγάπησεν must have the same meaning as ἀγαπήσας which precedes, i.e. Jesus' devoted love to His own, which was naturally a love manifesting itself in words and deeds. The translation, "to give a proof of His love," referring to the washing of the disciples' feet, is not only in itself inadmissible and incompatible with the correlation between ἀγαπήσας and ἡγάπησεν, but does not agree with εἰς τέλος; for whether the latter phrase means "to the end" (Matt. x. 22, xxiv. 13) or "finally" and "ultimately" (1 Thess. ii. 16; Luke xviii. 5), Jesus did not wash the disciples' feet to the end nor ultimately, nor was the washing of the disciples' feet the last nor the supreme proof of Jesus' love to His own. The greatest proof of His love was still in the future (xv. 13, xix. 17-37); such proof was not lacking even after the resurrection and the ascension; nor between the washing of the disciples' feet and the laying down of His life. Furthermore, leaving out of account the fact that the discourses in xiii. 18-xvii. 26 evidence Jesus' very great love for His disciples (cf. especially xviii. 8, xix. 26 f.), the washing of the disciples' feet is not given as a proof of love, but as an example of humble service (xiii. 12-17). The words ἀγαπήσας αὐτοὺς serve as a heading for chaps. xiii.-xvii. or even chaps. xiii.-xx., and mean merely that Jesus kept to the end the love which He had ever manifested toward His own who were in the world, and who were to remain in the world after His departure. Unlike other men in a similar situation, as His terrible death approached, Jesus was not preoccupied with thoughts of Himself and anxious to receive help and comfort from His own. He was constantly thinking of how He could lovingly serve and help them. (3) Since εἰς τέλος must be equivalent to ἕως τέλους, the other temporal expression, πρὸ τῆς ἑορτῆς τοῦ πάσχα, cannot be taken with the same phrase, but is to be connected with εἰδώς, as in Ss. The scenes of violence which were to affect so deeply all the disciples and make them lose their self-command (xiv. 1, xvi. 20-33), did not overcome Jesus, because they did not take Him by surprise. "As one who knew before the Passover that the hour of His departure out of the world to God had come, Jesus continued to show His love for His own . . . to the end." Just as the consciousness of the power which has been given Him forms the background for His humble act in washing their feet (ver. 3 ff.), so the consciousness of His approaching return to God, which He had before His Passion, explains the quietness and serenity with which Jesus suffered, and the loving spirit of sacrifice by which, up to the last moment, He showed Himself to be concerned not about Himself, but about His own. This is a thoroughly Johannine idea (xviii. 4, xix. 28; cf. vi. 64, vii. 8, ix. 4 f., xi. 9 f., xii. 7, 23-36; with application to the disciples, xiii. 19, xiv. 29, xvi. 4). The placing of the time phrase first is just as natural if taken with εἰδώς as with ἡγάπησεν, and it is thus given the emphasis which the writer intends (cf. i. 1, 48): "Even before the feast and not at the time of the feast," i.e. before the events happened (xiii. 19), not when the events had taken place, and because of them, did Jesus know that He was to suffer. In this way it is assumed and indirectly attested that the events, the account of which follows, took place during the Passover. (4) Even if ver. 1 referred to the washing of the disciples' feet, πρὸ τ. ἐ. τ. π. could not determine the time of this event. In this case we should expect "shortly or immediately before the beginning of the feast" (Xen. Cyrop. v. 5. 39, πρὸ δείπνου), which would be just before the killing of the Passover lamb, that is, the forenoon or noon of the 14th of Nisan; but δείπνον in ver. 4 (cf. ver. 30) places the time of the event in the evening. Assuming the usual meaning of πρὸ as contrasted with μετὰ τὴν ἐ. or ἐν τῇ ἐ., the reader was left to choose for himself any moment between the last date mentioned (xii. 1, 12) and the afternoon of the 14th of Nisan. This would leave the day and the hour of the washing of the disciples' feet very indefinite. Still more incredible is the supposition that John, who nowhere indicates that the meal in question is Jesus' last meal, and who makes no mention of very important events which took place during the Last Supper (the institution of the Lord's Supper, etc.), recorded in the Synoptics, should have corrected the latter, which say nothing of the washing of the disciples' feet, by merely assigning such a meaningless time to this event. The evangelist, who certainly had as much insight as some of his interpreters, has been supposed to mean: "Jesus did not partake of His last meal with His disciples at the time of the Passover feast, but in connection with a meal (δείπνον, ver. 2, without the article) before the Passover, not more definitely described, He washed His disciples' feet"; which would be as senseless as to say, "Luther did not burn the bull of excommunication on December 10, 1520, but rather on October 31, 1517, he did post the ninety-five theses." (5) Since δείπνον γίνεται signifies only "a meal takes place," not "a meal is being prepared" or "a meal is begun" (cf. ii. 1, x. 22; Matt. xxvi. 2), the reading δείπνον γενομένου (S^aBLX Orig. tom. xxxii. 2), which agrees better with ver. 4, means "during the meal," δείπνον γενομένου (S^aAD, etc.) "after the meal." The determination of the correct reading in this passage is of importance to one attempting to harmonise the Gospels; but of greater weight in the present connection is the fact that John does not consider it necessary to say explicitly that a supper was prepared in connection with which the following events took place (cf. per contra, xii. 2; Mark vi. 21; Luke xiv. 16), and that he does not specifically describe the supper in question, either positively or negatively. Having indicated to the readers in ver. 1 that from this point on he intends to tell what took place at the feast of the Passover (see above under 3), he was sure they would understand that the supper to be mentioned was the same with which the reader knew the Passover began, namely, Jesus' last meal.

9. (P. 269.) The designation of the σῶμα instead of the σῶμα of Christ as the heavenly substance in the Lord's Supper by Ignatius, Justin, and Irenaeus, also the conception of the Lord's Supper as φάρμακον ἀθανάτias, is derived entirely from John vi.; cf. Ign. Eph. xix. 2; Smyrna. vii. 1; Rom. vii. 3; Phlad. iv.; Just. Apol. i. 66; Iren. iv. 18. 5, v. 2. 2f.; Clem. Quis Div. xxiii.; the writer's Ignatius von Ant. S. 605; as to whether Marcion is to be considered in this connection, see GK, i. 677, ii. 472. Churches in which the Lord's Supper was called εὐχαριστία, and in which an annual celebration, the chief event of which was the Eucharist, was called the Pass-over, were led to this understanding of the Lord's Supper by vi. 4—which otherwise is only an unimportant parenthetical remark—and by vi. 11, 23.

10. (P. 270.) The opinion that John iv. 46–54 is a working over of Matt. viii. 5–10, Luke vii. 2–10, is untenable. The point in the synoptic narrative is the fact that the centurion is a Gentile whose faith puts to shame that of Israel. John's royal official, on the other hand, is treated by Jesus as a representative of the Galilean populace, whose eagerness to see miracles Jesus condemns (ver. 48); he is therefore to be regarded as a Jew, and belongs to the group of officials of "King" Herod Antipas (Matt. xiv. 9; Mark vi. 14) to which reference is made in Luke viii. 3; Acts xiii. 1. The idea of the synoptic account would have been in place in John's narrative; Judeans (iii. 22–iv. 2), Samaritans (iv. 3–43), and then a Gentile, would form a climax, and there are no general reasons why John should have failed to recognise the strong faith of a Gentile (cf. x. 16, xi. 52, xii. 20, 32, xvii. 2, 20). More difficult to decide is the question of the relationship of John ii. 13–22 to the very similar story in Matt. xxi. 12–16; Mark xi. 15–18; Luke xix. 45 f. It is possible (1) that the Synoptists, who narrate only a single visit to Jerusalem, have included in this account facts which belong to an earlier visit, and that John, in placing this event earlier, rectifies the earlier accounts without comment. It is also possible (2) that Jesus did the same thing twice, at the time both of His first visit and of His last visit to Jerusalem. Since it was John's purpose to omit after xii. 19 the later event, with all that happened on the following days, he tells of the earlier cleansing of the temple. The saying of Jesus which accompanies the action is in each case different. On the occasion of His first visit to the temple after His baptism, Jesus felt Himself to be the son in His Father's house, as He did when a boy (Luke ii. 49), exercises the authority of the head of the house, and condemns the use of the holy places for purposes of trade (John ii. 16; cf. Luke ii. 49). Three years later (Matt. xxi. 13; Luke xix. 46) it is the prophet whom Jerusalem will murder, as it has His predecessors (Luke xiii. 33 f.), who speaks, using the language of the prophets, relative to the proper use of the temple (Isa. lvi. 7), which the Jews have turned into a robbers' cave, believing that they and their booty were safe from the arm of divine justice (Jer. vii. 2–11). On both occasions He was asked to justify His action; but the first time His answer is a riddle, understood by neither friend nor foe (John ii. 18–22), but the second time His answer is a counter-question, the purport of which could not be misunderstood (Matt. xxi. 24 ff.). When one considers, in addition, the many things peculiar to John, even where the narratives are parallel (the κέρμα of κερματισταί, the scourge of cords, the words spoken to those who sold doves, and the anxious foreboding of his disciples), he is confronted by the alternative of supposing either that a writer—for some unknown reason—has taken old material, and with wonderful skill fashioned it into a new picture remarkably suited to the assumed situation, or that an eye-witness is here faithfully reproducing impressions received at the time.

11. (Pp. 270, 271.) Ss (in all probability earlier than this Tatian; cf. ThLb, 1895, col. 20 f.) placed John xviii. 24 directly after ver. 13, and inserted vv. 16-18 between ver. 23 and ver. 25. The marginal reading of S^s (probably also an Alexandrian MS. collated by Thomas) and Cyril of Alexandria (Migne, lxxiv. 539) place only ver. 24 after ver. 13, and a cursive 255 has ver. 24 after πρῶτον of ver. 13a. This interpolation has also crept into one of the three MSS. of Sh, namely, the Vatican MS., which until recently was the only one known; according to Adler, de NTi vers. syr. p. 196, "margini adscripta"; according to the more exact statement of Lagarde in his edition, p. 393, it is an addition of C (the corrector), "non vetus in intercolumnio." In the edition of Lewis and Gibson nothing is said concerning this interpolation on p. 193; and in the preface, p. lxi, one only finds something which is inconsistent with the text and notes on p. 193. As for the rest, all three MSS. of Sh agree in omitting from ver. 13 the words ἦν γὰρ πενθερὸς τοῦ Καϊάφα, so that concerning Annas alone the statement is made: ὅς ἦν ἀρχιερεὺς τ. ἐν. ἐκ. This omission, as also the insertion of ver. 24 in or after ver. 13, is to be judged as an act of short-sighted arbitrariness, which is shown also by the fact that, in spite of this insertion, all the witnesses which have been mentioned have ver. 24 also in its proper position. Cyril's reflections (Migne, lxxiv. 608 f.) on this repetition are merely amusing. Ss, on the other hand, offers a text which, in itself, does not appear untrustworthy. However, it has an arbitrary emendation, the causes for which are evident.

(1) The need of the harmonists, who wished to remove the contradiction between Matt. xxvi. 57 (πρὸς Καϊάφαν) and John xviii. 13 (πρὸς Ἀνναν πρῶτον). By means of this change it was lessened, in that it appeared that Matthew had passed over a very subordinate event. (2) Added to this was the astonishment that, according to John xviii. 24, as long as this sentence remained in its position nothing at all seems to have taken place before Caiaphas. (3) Finally, there was the consideration that, according to xi. 49-51, xviii. 13 f., 24, by ὁ ἀρχιερεὺς of vv. 19, 22 it seemed possible to designate only Caiaphas and not Annas. One who, like Sh, would cut the knot by evident violence to the text and meaning of ver. 13, could be easily led to infer that a hearing, in which the high priest Caiaphas was the principal person, would have taken place in his dwelling, and not in the house of his father-in-law Annas. He would, for this reason, suppose that ver. 24 had its correct and original position after ver. 13. The premise in No. 3 is correct, but the conclusion is wrong. Since John everywhere emphasises in the strongest manner the high priesthood of Caiaphas, and, on the other hand, never calls Annas high priest (Luke iii. 2), nor even says that he had held the office earlier, but gives as the only reason why Jesus was led before Annas, the relationship of the latter to the high priest Caiaphas, there can be no question that Caiaphas is meant in vv. 19, 22 and also in vv. 10, 15, 16, 26. But this does not in the least invalidate John's statement to the effect that they led the prisoner first to the older man, Annas, before whom was held a preliminary hearing, at which, according to Matt. xxvi. 57, 59, Mark xiv. 53, 55, many members of the Sanhedrin were present. That the official high priest should ask Jesus a few questions in the house of his father-in-law (John xviii. 19) is not strange, any more than that later they should go to the house of the ruling high priest with the prisoner for the purpose of holding a formal session, which must have been previously appointed for a very early morning hour at a definite place (ver. 24). The former assumption that Annas and Caiaphas dwelt in separate wings of a single large palace, which enclosed a court, has much to commend it, in the light both of the comparison of John xviii. 25-27 (between ver. 24 and ver. 28) with Luke xxii. 61, and because of xviii. 15. In order to reach Annas, or in order to be near Jesus, who was brought before Annas, it was necessary to enter the αὐλή τοῦ ἀρχιερέως (John xviii. 15; Mark xiv. 54, vol. ii. 504), the palace (consisting of several buildings, wings, and courtyards) of the reigning high priest, i.e., according to John, of Caiaphas. This assumption makes it all the more clear why, as regards the assignments of the separate acts to the various places and assemblies, the tradition of the group of men, who in other respects had the best information, is uncertain. Everything took place in the αὐλή or οἰκία τοῦ ἀρχιερέως (Luke xxii. 54).

12. (P. 273.) In regard to the disputes concerning the date of Easter, already touched upon (above, pp. 177, 192 f.), cf. E. Schürer, De Controversiis Paschalibus, 1869; in German ZfHTh, 1870, S. 182-284, where the earlier literature on the subject is indicated; cf. also GK, i. 180-192; Forsch, iv. 283-308.

13. (P. 275.) The Tübingen critics (Baur, Krit. Unters. 273 ff.; Hilgenfeld, Paschastreit, 159 f., 222 f.) conceive John to be strongly influenced by the idea that Jesus was the Passover lamb of the New Testament, and therefore must have died on the 14th of Nisan, in reply to which it may be remarked, in addition to what has already been said (above, p. 273 ff.), that while the idea of Christ as the Passover lamb certainly seems to be suggested in John i. 29, 36 by the Baptist, there is no particular reference to the Passion history. Moreover, it is at least a question whether the reference in xix. 36 is not to Ps. xxxiv. 21 rather than to Ex. xii. 46; Num. ix. 12.

14. (P. 277.) How Irenæus, Tertullian, and Origen dealt with the chronological allusions in the Fourth Gospel, especially xviii. 28, unfortunately we do not know (cf. GK, i. 190 f. A. 1). Tatian solved the difficulty in a peculiar manner, by referring John xiii. 1-20 to the day before the appointed day for the feast of the Passover, then inserting Luke xxii. 7-16; John xiii. 21 ff., etc. (GK, ii. 551); probably also by rendering xviii. 28, as in Ss, "That they might not be defiled, while they ate the Azyma" (ThLb, 1895, col. 21; cf. Burkitt, Ev. da-Mephar. ii. 79, 83, 313, and Hjelt, Forsch. vii. 1. 105, on the translation of πάσχα by ἄζυμα chosen by Ss only in the Fourth Gospel). Consequently, according to Tatian, they did not fear, lest by defilement they should be hindered from participating in the approaching feast of the Passover, but lest their eating of the Azyma, which lasted for seven days, should be interrupted. Similarly, Maimonides and Bartenora (in Surenhus on Pesachim ix. 5) refer a sentence of the Mishnah, which treats only of the Passover lamb, to the seven days' eating of the unleavened bread.

15. (P. 278.) It is not possible, also hardly necessary, to give here an enumeration of the various attempts which, under the supposition that John correctly dates Jesus' death on the 14th of Nisan, have been made from the time of Eusebius on (cf. his writing De Pasch. in Mai, N. Patr. Bibl. iv. 1. 214 ff.), either to discredit the synoptic account, according to which Jesus celebrated the feast of the Passover on the 14th of Nisan and died on the 15th, or to show that, notwithstanding some inaccuracies of expression, the synoptic account is essentially historical and in harmony with John—the Last Supper really being the Passover feast, although held on the 13th of Nisan. The present writer is not acquainted with an adequate survey of the literature dealing with the question. References to the more important of the earlier literature will be found in the commentaries in Winer, RW, ii. 202 f., and in Schürer (Über φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα), S. 8 f.; for more recent statements, see R. SCHÄFER, Das Herrenmahl nach Ursprung und Bedeutung, 1897, S. 53–99. CHWOLSON attracted attention by his Das letzte Passamahl Christi und der Tag seines Todes nach den in Übereinstimmung gebrachten Berichten der Syn. und des Jo. (Mém. de l'Acad. de St. Pétersbourg, Série vii. Tome xli. No. i.; it also appeared separately in St. Petersburg, 1892); see also a paper by the same author in MGWJ, 1893, also published separately, Breslau, 1893. Further treatises in ZfWTh, 1894, S. 542 ff., 1895, S. 335 ff., 1898, S. 250 ff. Cf. the discussion by E. RIGGENBACH, ThLb, 1894, No. 51. Chwolson denies what, in view of the agreement of Josephus and all three Synoptics, seems beyond dispute (n. 17, Nos. 2 and 3), namely, that the 14th of Nisan could be included in the feast of the Azyma. Accordingly, Matt. xxvi. 17, on which Mark xiv. 12, Luke xxii. 7, must be dependent, is meaningless as it stands, and must be corrected by conjecture. In the Aramaic Matt. the reading was: “The first day of the Azyma drew near, and the disciples of Jesus drew near (קרבו וקרבו) to him.” The letters קרבו were dropped out by mistake before קרבו, and, in order again to give the words meaning, the preposition כ was inserted before the first word נסא. The harmonising of the synoptic account thus corrected with the Johannine tradition is effected, through the hypothesis that in that year, when the 14th of Nisan fell on Friday, the Passover lamb was killed on the evening of the 13th, in order to prevent a desecration of the Sabbath, which otherwise would have been unavoidable, because presumably at that time the lamb was not slain before sunset, as in the time of Josephus and the Mishnah (see note 16), but after sunset, so that it would have fallen on the Sabbath, i.e. on the 15th of Nisan. The Passover could be celebrated immediately after the lamb was slain on the evening of the 13th, or not until the evening of the 14th. Jesus and the Pharisees kept the Passover on the former, the Sadducean high priests on the latter day. According to J. Lichtenstein (from his Hebrew commentary on the N.T. 1895, Schr. des Instit. Jud. zu Leipzig, No. 43, S. 24–29), this difference between the majority under the leadership of the high priests and a minority to which Jesus belonged arose from the fact that the Sadducees, in accordance with their view that Lev. xxiii. 11 refers to the Sabbath, falsified the dates of the new moon, so that in this year the first day of the Passover fell upon a Sabbath.

16. (P. 281.) John xii. 1 seems to be an exact date, and it is naturally to be taken not as Hilgenfeld takes it (Der Paschastreit der alten Kirche, S. 221 f.) as the peculiar terminology of the Roman calendar, but as an ordinary Jewish expression (2 Macc. xv. 36; Jos. Bell. ii. 8. 9; Winer, sec. 61. 4 end; Wieseler, Beiträge, 264); and is unquestionably to be reckoned backwards from the beginning of the celebration of the Passover, i.e. from the slaying of the Passover lamb between three and five o'clock on the afternoon of the 14th of Nisan (Jos. Bell. vi. 9. 3; cf. Pesachim v. 5), which makes Jesus come to Bethany on the afternoon of the 8th of Nisan. If now, as the Synoptics imply, Jesus died on Friday the 15th, then the 8th of Nisan fell also on Friday. If, on the other hand, as the Johannine account is supposed to necessitate, Jesus died on the 14th, and if the 14th was also Friday, then the 8th, the date on which Jesus arrived in Bethany, must have been a Sabbath. But that is impossible, since Jesus could not travel on the Sabbath. One is compelled to make the very improbable assumption that Jesus arrived in the vicinity of Bethany on the 7th—so that on the 8th He was compelled to make only a Sabbath day's journey. But why should Jesus have planned the journey so badly as, within a short distance of His destination—the friendly home in which He regularly lodged during the last days of His life—to be under necessity of seeking quarters for Himself and the large company with Him? It was only necessary to start fifteen or twenty minutes earlier, or to hurry a little, in order to avoid this. But if the day of Jesus' arrival in Bethany, according to John xii. 1, the 8th of Nisan was not a Sabbath, then, according to John, the 15th of Nisan was not a Sabbath; in other words, the Sabbath, during which Jesus was in His grave (John xix. 31, 42, xx. 1), was not the 15th of Nisan. Since to assume in this particular year, in addition to the synoptic and the alleged Johannine chronology, a third arrangement of the days of the week in relation to the days of the month, for which there is no evidence whatever, is entirely arbitrary, it follows that John and the synoptics are in perfect agreement at this point. In xii. 2 we are not told that Jesus and the disciples ate supper at the end of their journey,—something indeed which would not have been worth telling, and which would have been mentioned incidentally, like the supper in xiii. 2,—but that a feast was prepared in His honour (above, p. 287, n. 6), which probably did not take place immediately upon Jesus' arrival on Friday the 8th, but on the Sabbath, the 9th (cf. Luke xiv. 1). If Jesus arrived in Bethany early in the afternoon of the 8th, when the usual preparation of the food for the coming Sabbath was made, the arrangements for the feast of the following day could still have been completed before sunset and hence before the beginning of the Sabbath. This would make the entry into Jerusalem take place on Sunday the 10th. The time mentioned in xii. 12 can only be the day after the anointing, since vv. 10, 11 contain no indications as to time. This conclusion is not affected by the fact that in xii. 2 the relation of this event to the time indicated in xii. 1 is left indefinite. The same thing occurs, e.g., in i. 41 in relation to i. 39, and yet the narrative is continued in i. 43 with τῇ ἐπαύριον. John is not writing a journal, in which no day may be passed over, especially is he not doing so in the Passion history. He simply desires to call attention to the fact that on the day after the quiet anticipation of His burial in Bethany, Jesus entered Jerusalem amid universal rejoicing, which to His enemies seemed so terrible (xii. 12–19). The common view has been thought to have support in xix. 14, on the assumption that παρὰσκευὴ τοῦ πάσχα corresponds to the Jewish ערב תפסח, which means literally evening, i.e. eve, of the Passover, being also parallel to ארבעה עשר, the common term for the whole of the 14th of Nisan (e.g. Pesachim iv. 6), and, like ערב שבת, a designation of the day before the Sabbath, e.g. Friday. John, according to this view, presents the case in which the 14th of Nisan, the 'ereb huppessach, falls on a Friday, on 'ereb shabbath (Pesachim v. 1). But it must first be shown that παρὰσκευή is ever used as an equivalent for ערב, and, like the latter term, came to be regarded as needing a modifying genitive, like σαββάτου or τοῦ πάσχα. In the N.T. and Christian literature the word is complete in itself, and always used like the Aram. עֲרֵבְתָּא (עֲרֵבְתָּא) for the sixth day of the week, namely, Friday. Where a qualifying word is found, it is not the name of the following day in the genitive (Jos. Ant. xvi. 6. 2, ἐν σαββάσιν ἢ τῇ πρὸ αὐτῆς παρασκευῇ). The word παρασκευή without any modifiers whatever is used of the day of Jesus' death in Mark xv. 42; Matt. xxvii. 62; Luke xxiii. 54; John xix. 31, 42, consequently also in John xix. 14. John lays great weight upon the days of the week on which the crucifixion, the burial, and the resurrection took place, and upon the fact that this whole series of events took place during the time of the Passover (above, pp. 276 f., 280 f.). The two ideas are associated in the passage, xix. 14, where he mentions the day and the hour when sentence of death was passed upon Jesus: "It was Friday at the time of the Passover, and about the sixth hour." These statements serve at the same time as a preparation for what follows. Because the following day was a Sabbath falling within the Passover period, it was especially holy, and every desecration had to be avoided (xix. 31, 42), even more scrupulously than on other Sabbaths (v. 9, vii. 23, ix. 14). The fact that in the Bab. Sanhedrin 43a, 67a, it is thrice stated that Jesus was crucified "on the 'ereb happesach" (fol. 43a, according to the Florentine MS., quoted by Dalman following Laible's Jesus in Talmud, S. 15*, "on 'ereb shabbath and 'ereb happesach") contributes nothing to the understanding of the Fourth Gospel. The rabbis obtained their knowledge of the gospel history mostly from uncertain hearsay and Christian tradition which had begun to fade; cf. GK, ii. 673 ff. If these statements were derived from the Hebrew or Aramaic translation of John's Gospel, which was read by Jews at Scythopolis in the fourth century (Epiph. Har. xxx. 6), the translation of John xix. 14 could not have been very happy. Sh (in two MSS. against one) has עֲרֵבְתָּא in xix. 14, 31, 42; S¹ has עֲרֵבְתָּא in xix. 14, 31, but in xix. 42 renders quite freely "because the Sabbath had begun." Ss has the same in xix. 42 with a different verb; but xix. 14, 31 is lacking in Ss, and all three references in Sc.

17. (P. 282.) SCHÜRER in his festal publication, Über φάγεῖν τὸ πάσχα (Giessen, 1883), strongly opposes the interpretation briefly outlined above. It has recently been defended by J. VAN BEBBER (Zur Chronol. des Lebens Jesu, 1898, S. 5-81), partially on new grounds. Here discussion must be limited to bare essentials. Πάσχα means in the N.T. as in the O.T.—(1) The Passover lamb, as object of θύειν, φάγεῖν, etc.; Ex. xii. 21; Dent. xvi. 6 f.; 2 Chron. xxx. 15, 18; Matt. xxvi. 17; Mark xiv. 12-14; Luke xxii. 7, 11, 15; 1 Cor. v. 7; (2) the observance of the 14th of Nisan, i.e. the feast of the Passover, including the slaying of the lamb, which preceded, to be distinguished from the seven days' festival which followed, called the ἄζυμα, generally used as the object of ποιεῖν, Ex. xii. 48; Lev. xxiii. 5 f.; Dent. xvi. 1; Philo, De Septen. xviii. 19; Jos. Ant. ii. 14. 6, iii. 10. 5; Bell. vi. 9. 3; Matt. xxvi. 18; Mark xiv. 1; Heb. xi. 28. In the case of ἐτοιμάζειν τὸ π., Matt. xxvi. 19; Mark xiv. 16; Luke xxii. 8, 13, we have the choice of either meaning. (3) The name ἄζυμα is also applied to the Passover which precedes, Jos. Ant. ix. 13. 2. 3 (Niese, §§ 263, 271); Bell. ii. 12. 1, iv. 7. 2, so that the Azyma includes eight days (Jos. Ant. ii. 15. 1), and the 14th of Nisan could be reckoned as the first day of the Azyma (Matt. xxvi. 17; Mark xiv. 12), or even more broadly, simply as the day of the Azyma (Jos. Bell. v. 3. 1; Luke xxii. 7). (4) On the other hand, the name πάσχα is also made to cover the days of the Azyma, and the two terms are used quite synonymously, Jos. Bell. ii. 1. 3, vi. 9. 3 (where certainly uninformed readers could not infer that the feast called the "Passover" is only a part of the previously mentioned feast of Azyma); Ant. xiv. 2. 1, xvii. 9. 3, xviii. 2. 2; Luke xxii. 1; cf. Acts xii. 3 with xii. 4. This wider use of πάσχα is evidently found in John ii. 23, xviii. 39, perhaps also in xix. 14; and there is clearly no intention of distinguishing the Passover proper from the feast of the Azyma in John ii. 13, vi. 4, xi. 55, xii. 1, xiii. 1; Luke ii. 41. (5) The rabbis also were quite familiar with this usage. The Mishnah tractate פסחים treats of the festival of the entire seven days, which as a whole is there called המער (i. 3) or הפסח (ii. 2-7). The latter term had entirely replaced the original name חג המצות. Consciousness of the divergence from the original usage betrays itself. In Pesachim ix. 5 we read: "What [is the difference] between the Egyptian Passover and the Passover of the generations (i.e. the yearly Passover feast)? The Passover of Egypt: it [took place] beginning with the 10th [of Nisan] (Ex. xii. 3), and it was necessary to sprinkle the lintel and the two side posts of the door with a bunch of hyssop (Ex. xii. 22), and it was eaten in haste in one night (בלילה אחת); but the Passover of the Generations is customary (נהגה, custom) for the whole seven [days]." From this it follows not only that the learned rabbis used the term פסח to include the Passover proper and the Azyma, but also that they spoke of the seven days' celebration as "eating of the Passover." The phrase, "whole seven days," can stand in contrast to nothing save "in a single night." Moreover, since no new verb takes the place of "eating" the Passover in the original celebration, this same verb is to be supplied in the second instance also. This same usage is found in 2 Chron. xxx. 21 f.: "And the children of Israel . . . kept the feast of the Azyma seven days with great gladness . . . so they did eat throughout the feast for the seven days, offering sacrifices of peace-offerings and making confession to Jahweh, the God of their fathers." When Bleek (Beiträge zur Evangelienkritik, 1846, S. 111) suggests modestly, and Schürer, op. cit. S. 12, claims confidently that, instead of יָאָכְלוּ attested by the massorah and without the keri, by the Targum, the Peshito, and Jerome, the correct reading is יָכִלּוּ (LXX συνετέλεισαν), they fail, in the first place, to show that כָּלָה ("to complete"), followed by an object such as מער, חג, etc., means anywhere in the O.T. or even in late Jewish literature, to celebrate a feast. In the second place, they have not given due weight to the fact that witnesses mentioned above for the reading "they ate" are very much stronger for the usage of the Jews of Palestine among whom John belonged than for the usage of the Alexandrian translators. If this reading were a later correction of the original reading preserved in the LXX, then it only goes to prove that the expression "to eat the seven days' feast" (i.e. the Passover, called a potiori a "seven days' feast") was much more familiar among the Jews than the expression "to complete," i.e. to celebrate a feast of seven days, which occurs nowhere else. The expression φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα, in this broader sense, is no more peculiar than Josephus' θύομεν ἑορτὴν πάσχα καλοῦντες, Ant. ii. 14. 6, xvii. 9. 3, infra, and the corresponding θύσια for the entire observance of the 14th of Nisan, or also of the seven days, Bell. vi. 9. 3. The only difference is that the latter expression represents classical usage (θύειν τὰ Αὔκαρα, Xen. Anab. i. 2, 10; τοὺς γάμους, Philostr. Vita Apoll. vii. 7; see Bebbler, S. 55, and the lexicons), whereas φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα represents Jewish usage, which John everywhere follows more closely than does Josephus. Jewish idiom is peculiar in a very broad application of the idea "to eat," e.g. "to eat the years of the Messiah," Bab. Sanhedrin 98*b*; "eat up widows' houses," Mark xii. 40; "to taste death," John viii. 52, etc.; cf. Bebbler, S. 55; and it was very natural to speak thus broadly of the Passover, because the act after which the whole observance was loosely called was a meal, and because the sacrificial meals as well as the eating of unleavened bread were characteristic of this feast. On the other hand, the regular technical expression for the celebration of the 14th of Nisan is not φαγεῖν but ποιεῖν τὸ πάσχα, Ex. xii. 48; Num. ix. 2, 5, 6, 10, 12-14; Deut. xvi. 1; Matt. xxvi. 18; Heb. xi. 28. In the celebration of the Passover, eating is only one feature along with the θύειν, and is never mentioned unless the more general expression ποιεῖν or θύειν has preceded, or unless the Passover has been previously spoken of; Num. ix. 11; 2 Chron. xxx. 18; Matt. xxvi. 17 (cf. vv. 1, 5; Mark xiv. 12*b* (cf. vv. 1, 2, 12*a*); Luke xxii. 11, 15 (cf. vv. 1, 7, 8). The full expression φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα is found in the LXX, including the Apocrypha, only once; 2 Chron. xxx. 18 (ἔφαγον τὸ φασέκ, here, as the context indicates, xxx. 1-22, probably in the broadest sense); in Philo and in Josephus, so far as the present writer is aware, it never occurs; in the N.T. (besides John xviii. 28) five times of the participation in the Passover meal. But it is very improbable that the Jews, i.e. the high priests and their servants (xviii. 35, xix. 6), whose excuse to Pilate is given in John xviii. 28, had in mind only the evening Passover meal and not also the earlier slaying of the lamb, which on the morning of the 14th of Nisan had not yet taken place, when they spoke of being prevented from participation by defilement. (6) Of less importance is the question whether, in Deut. xvi. 2 (2 Chron. xxxv. 7-9, cf. 3 Esdr. i. 8*f.*, are left out of account), the cattle for the Shelamim as well as the sheep or goats for the Passover meal are covered by the expression κτῆ. Certainly here, where it is not a question of the usage of the time of Josiah or Moses, but of the time of John, it is wrong to say with Schürer, S. 14: "The fact simply is that according to the author of Deuteronomy not only smaller animals but also cattle could be used for the Passover proper." Because for the Jews of the time of Jesus, who knew nothing of the modern criticism of the Pentateuch, Ex. xii. 3-5 made this interpretation of Deut. xvi. 2 "simply" impossible. In his account of the Jewish interpretations, Schürer, S. 17*f.*, constantly confuses the manner in which the rabbis understand the word κτῆ in the text, and the manner in which in their effort after exact interpretation they use the same word in their comments. Leaving out of account the merely hypothetical consideration of the possibility that, according to Deut. xvi. 2, it was allowable to use cattle for the Passover proper—naturally the possibility has not been considered seriously—all the above mentioned interpreters agree that in the text the word κτῆ includes the animals for the Passover sacrifice and the Passover meal and the animals for the Chagigah; but in order to make this clear, naturally it was necessary to employ the more definite expression and to say "small animals for the Passover, cattle for the Chagigah."

§ 68. PURPOSE AND METHOD, CHARACTER AND READERS OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.

At the close of his book, John states very clearly its purpose, just as Luke does in his dedication; at the same time, however, John goes on to speak of the means by which he endeavoured to accomplish this purpose (xx. 30 f.; cf. xix. 35). As was unavoidable in a brief concluding sentence, both these statements are so general that it is necessary to seek in the book itself some more definite information, in particular, to draw certain conclusions from the means used with reference to the author's purpose.

From among a large number of σημεῖα which Jesus did in the presence of His disciples, John sets forth a few in order to lead the readers whom he addresses to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, to the end that they, believing this to be the case, may have life in the name of this Jesus Christ. We have already seen (above, p. 207 f.) that it was not His intention to convert Jews or Gentiles to the Christian faith through a written missionary sermon. The readers were already believers—confessors of the name of Christ (cf. i. 12), a Church with which the author was acquainted and on intimate terms, or a group of such Churches who needed to be furthered and strengthened in the faith which they already had; just as Jesus by constantly bearing new testimony to Himself endeavoured to strengthen His disciples and also such as had come to have a certain faith in Him and yet could not be called His disciples (viii. 30 f., cf. ii. 22, vii. 31, x. 38, xi. 45, xii. 11) in the faith which they confessed when they first came into contact with Him (i. 41, 45, 49); in order that this faith might become unalterably fixed, and so to deepen this faith that it might develop into an independent and experiential knowledge of the truth revealed in Him (ii. 11, iv. 39–42, vi. 45 f., 69, viii. 32, x. 38, xi. 15, 42, xiii. 19, xiv. 1–11, xvi. 30–33, xvii. 8, xx. 8, 24–29). Only in this way do believers become disciples of Jesus in the full sense of the word (viii. 31; cf. xiii. 35, xv. 8) and win the freedom, the peace, the joy, in short, the life which is transmitted from the only-begotten Son of God to those who become children of God (i. 12) through Him (viii. 32, 35 f., x. 28, xiv. 27, xv. 11, xvi. 33, xvii. 2 f., 8, 13, 18, xx. 29). There is no greater human distinction than to become a disciple of Jesus', and through His mediation attain to God (vi. 46, xiii. 16, xiv. 6, xv. 5, 8). But this is also a goal which the believer can attain only step by step. It is the mission of Jesus and of the Spirit whom He will send to further them toward this end (xiv. 26, xvi. 12 ff., xvii. 26); the apostles also are called to share this teaching work (xv. 27). It is John's purpose to fulfil this mission in the case of the believers for whom he writes by giving his own testimony, in order that they may share the same blessed experience as himself (xix. 35, xx. 31; cf. i. 16; 1 John i. 3 f.).

The fact that the book was intended for believers, whom it is designed to confirm in this manner, gives it an esoteric character which distinguishes it from the Synoptics, and especially from Luke. The detailed account of the discourses at the Last Supper is not the most unmistakable evidence that John is writing for the instruction of believers. More significant is the fact that he chooses as the subject of his account a number of signs which Jesus did before the eyes of His disciples (xx. 30). It is self-evident that Jesus' constant companions were eye-witnesses of all His miracles. In view of this, it is all the more certain that the remark means that for the most part the author contemplates the σημεῖα from the point of view of Jesus' self-revelation to His disciples and for their sake. Naturally, however, this does not lessen the significance of these σημεῖα—especially of those which are not related, but only summarily mentioned—for all those who witnessed them and for the progress of the history (ii. 23, iii. 2, iv.

45, v. 20, 36, vi. 2, 14, vii. 21, 31, x. 25-38, xi. 47, xii. 10, 37, xv. 24).

The entire book, from i. 14 onwards, is in keeping with the emphasis laid in xx. 30 upon the significance of these signs for the disciples. The very first utterances of Jesus of which an account is given are wonderful proofs of that profound knowledge of the human heart, transcending all the limits of sense by which He won His first disciples (i. 42-49), while as a title to all that follows stands the promise to Nathanael and to the entire group of the first six disciples that in the companionship of Jesus they shall experience greater things, and learn from a multitude of deeds that God who rules in heaven has put at the disposal of the Son of Man upon earth all the angel powers by which He Himself rules the world (i. 50 f.). The result of the first of these experiences is declared to be simply that, in consequence of this revelation of the glory of Jesus, His disciples believed on Him (ii. 11), notwithstanding the fact that there were other witnesses besides the disciples, e.g. the mother of Jesus, who certainly was not indifferent and must have witnessed the miracle. In other words, the disciples were confirmed in their faith. While it is true in the case of the second and third miracles which are related (iv. 46-54, v. 1-18) that the disciples are not mentioned, in the first case one who is already a believer is stimulated by a rebuke of Jesus' to greater faith. In vi. 5 ff. again it is clearly described how the faith of those who believe in Jesus is tested and strengthened. While the multitude see signs and yet do not see (vi. 14, 26, 30, 36), the miracle of the feeding and of Jesus' walking on the water make the disciples able not only to bear the discourse of the following day, but in the light of its promises to rise to a joyful confession. With one sad exception this was true of the Twelve, while other disciples, who were not really disciples, deserted Jesus (vi. 60-71). The healing of the blind man is introduced as a means of instruction for the disciples

(ix. 1-5); and in the case of the man who was healed, it is to be observed how, under the impression of the deeds of Jesus, his open-minded understanding is developed from stage to stage. At first the Lord is a man named Jesus (ix. 11), then a prophet (ver. 17), certainly not a sinner, but a man from God (vv. 25, 30-33), and finally the Lord, to whom he kneels in faith and prayer (vv. 35-38). While the raising of Lazarus is an important event in the concluding days of Jesus' life (xi. 45-53, xii. 9-11, 17-19), the principal thing described is the significance of this deed and the circumstances accompanying it for the faith of His disciples (xi. 15; cf. the whole of vv. 4-16), the women who believed on Him (xi. 3, 20-40), and the larger group of those who were receptive (vv. 42, 45). Where the Lord is, who Himself is Resurrection and Life, sickness and death and the grave must lose their terrors (xi. 4, 11, 23-27, xii. 1, 2, 9). He who makes the dead to live cannot Himself remain in death. In chap. xx. it is not so much Christ's own glorification that is described, as the convincing of two souls that He who was dead was alive.

This helps to explain why John, more than any other of the evangelists, gives us character sketches of Jesus' disciples—both of those who were intimately and those who were more remotely associated with Him (above, pp. 209, 224, n. 4). He gives accounts of conversions which have a wholly individual stamp, often with a few strokes of his pen, sometimes, however, at length. The genuine Israelite, Nathanael, who comes to Jesus with mockery upon his lips, but who, when he perceives that his heart is known, pours forth words of earnest confession, with the result that he never leaves Jesus again (i. 45-50; cf. xxi. 2); Philip, cautious, slow of speech and understanding (i. 43-45, vi. 5-7, xii. 21 f., xiv. 8-10; above, p. 224); Thomas, melancholy, disinclined to any easy optimism (xi. 16, xiv. 5, xx. 24-29); Nicodemus, who at first comes to Jesus by night because he is afraid of the light, and afterwards alone of all his colleagues has the courage in the Sanhedrin to demand fair treatment for Jesus; and at last, when the most trusted of Jesus' disciples deny and desert Him, confesses himself a follower of the crucified Jesus (iii. 1-21, vii. 50-52, xix. 39); the Samaritan woman, who, in spite of her sinful past and the wilful spirit which she manifests at first, becomes an earnest believer (iv. 7-42); the paralytic, whose own sin had evidently brought upon him an incurable disease (v. 5-15); and the man who without any fault of his own was born blind (chap. ix.); the two sisters in Bethany, so different in type (xi. 1-xii. 8); and Mary Magdalene, who made up for her lack of knowledge by her self-sacrificing love (xx. 1-18),—all of these are incomparably described, and, without any express effort to bring out the fact, are instructive illustrations of the divine leading and of human development out of darkness into light, and from faith to faith. They were drawn, not by the herald of the gospel proclaiming his message to all peoples, but by the pastor devoting Himself to the human souls committed to Him, and who by these pictures designed to increase the faith of those who were already believers and to make them true disciples.

It necessarily impresses one as peculiar that both in xx. 30 and in the retrospect of the whole of Jesus' public testimony in xii. 37, His deeds are the only recognised form of His testimony to Himself, and that these are declared to be the contents of this book; whereas in reality the discourses not only occupy much space, but in many ways are emphasised as important. Although on the authority of i. 50 f. it is possible to reckon sayings like i. 48, iv. 16 (29) or prophecies like ii. 19, vi. 70, xii. 32 f. (xviii. 32) among the σημεῖα, the author understands the word as applying only to the miracles (ii. 11). Consequently it is evident from xx. 30 f. that he does not regard the deeds as a sort of customary adornment of the Redeemer, or as an occasion for profound discourses which are really the more important things. There are only a few deeds to which long discourses are attached (namely, v. 17-47, vii. 19 ff. attached to v. 1-16, and vi. 26-71 attached to vi. 3-13); while other deeds of Jesus no less striking are left to speak for themselves (ii. 1-11, ix. 1-38, xi. 1-44). This is true not only of the few which are formally related, but also of the many which are summarily mentioned. These works, as they are often called by John without any further qualification (n. 1), distinguish Jesus from the Baptist, who was the witness by water and word (x. 41). Since Jesus works only in dependence upon God, in fellowship with God, and by means of the angel-powers at His command (v. 19, 30, xi. 41 f., i. 51), these works are a work of God Himself (xiv. 10), or a participation of Jesus in the work of God (v. 17-23, ix. 3 f.). To the extent, however, that God permits these works to happen through Jesus and through Him alone (xv. 24, x. 41, vii. 31), they are God's own testimony concerning Jesus (v. 36 f., x. 25, 37 f., xiv. 11), which renders unbelief without excuse (xii. 37, xv. 24).

John's use of the O.T. and Jewish word σημεῖα to designate the miraculous deeds of Jesus regularly and much more frequently than the other evangelists (n. 1), is not intended to indicate that they are regarded by him either exclusively as symbols or as prophecies. The conception is broader. The σημεῖα are events which point beyond themselves to the cause of which they are the effect, to the person of whom they are the acts, to the unseen events of which they are the symbols, to the future events of which they are the prophetic preludes. In these striking acts of Jesus the entire work of God, itself invisible—in the completion of which Jesus has become an active participant—is visibly manifested (ix. 3 f., cf. iv. 34, v. 36). The healing of the blind man, just before which Jesus makes the statement of ix. 3, He Himself transforms into a symbol, a real allegory which He afterwards interprets (xi. 39-40). In the same way the miraculous feeding becomes to Him a prophetic symbol of a still more wonderful feeding (vi. 27 ff.). The healing of the sick foreshadows the subsequent awakening of the dead, and the cases where Jesus raised the dead during His earthly ministry are at one and the same time symbols of the awakening by the word of Jesus of the spiritually dead to spiritual life and intimations of the general awakening of the physically dead by Jesus at the last day (v. 20-26, vi. 39, xi. 23-27).

Along with this high valuation of the miraculous deeds of Jesus are found other words which seem to lessen their value. In order that faith in Jesus, and the blessings, primarily invisible, which are mediated by Him, may strike root at all among men, faith must be preceded by a vision of the witnessing of Jesus to Himself through deeds, which show Him to be the "Saviour of the world" sent from God (iv. 42), i.e., by a θεωπεῖν, θεᾶσθαι, ὁρᾶν (i. 14, 32-34, 39, 46, 51, ii. 11, iv. 19, vi. 36, 40, xii. 45, xiv. 9, xx. 6, 8, 20, 27). To those, however, who have not lacked this opportunity, and who, nevertheless, demand a sign so as to be exempted from the act and the work of faith (vi. 26-31), the sign is denied (ii. 18, vi. 30). With those who through the signs have obtained a certain faith, but do not receive the testimony concerning the moral and religious conditions of salvation, it is impossible for Jesus to enter into more intimate relations (ii. 23 f., iii. 11, 32). Moreover, persons otherwise well disposed, but who constantly demand new signs as if they had a right to do so, are earnestly reproved (iv. 48, xx. 27). The conception of the sign is such that it is designed to render itself unnecessary. The Gospel, which is intended for readers who have seen none of the signs of Jesus, concludes with the blessing of those who have not seen, but nevertheless have believed (xx. 29). But the signs are not without value even for those who have not seen. They need to be related. If the discourses occupy more space in the Fourth Gospel than the signs, it is to be remembered that as a rule the commentary is longer than the text, which nevertheless remains the more important thing. The author's written testimony concerning the σημεῖα which Jesus did in his presence, is designed as a substitute for what the readers lack, as compared with the author, and is intended to enable them to believe as he believes (xix. 35). Since, however, he was writing for Christians who already had considerable knowledge of the gospel history, and who, of the Gospels which have come down to us, were certainly familiar with Mark, probably also with Luke, and perhaps also with Matthew, although only through oral translation (§ 67), it was only natural for John to choose from the abundance of reminiscences at his command such σημεῖα with the corresponding discourses as the readers had not yet become acquainted with through the other Gospels.

Nothing could be more incorrect than to attribute to the author, as his principal design, instead of the purpose mentioned in xx. 31, the supplementing of the Synoptics. But the circumstances under which he wrote were such as to make it natural for him actually to supplement the earlier Gospels by the insertion of parallels to their accounts, by explanatory remarks which corrected misunderstandings to which these accounts were naturally open, by formal corrections (above, pp. 256 ff., 270 f.), but primarily by such entirely new information as was calculated to render more intelligible the picture, obtained from the Synoptics, of the course of the gospel history as a whole and of many of its details. With reference to the first point, from what the Synoptists relate from the last days of Jesus' life, it is impossible historically to understand the origin of the deadly hatred of the Jewish authorities toward Jesus, which led to His crucifixion. John explains the catastrophe. Such accounts as the official embassage from Jerusalem to the Baptist (i. 19), the visits to Jerusalem with the attendant constant conflicts with the Jewish authorities (ii. 13 ff., v. 1 ff., vii. 1 ff., x. 22), the repeated resolutions of the Sanhedrin and of the Pharisaic party, which in some instances led to attempts upon Jesus' life (v. 16, 18, vii. 1, 13, 25, 30, 45-52, viii. 28, 37, 59, ix. 13, 22, x. 39, xi. 8, 46-50, 57, xii. 9-11, 19), the raising of Lazarus and the retrospection of the entire public testimony in Jerusalem in xii. 37-43, give the idea of an intelligible development which it is impossible to derive from the Synoptics. The προσάκις of Luke xiii. 34, Matt. xxiii. 37 (above, p. 173, n. 3) is elaborated by John. There are single points also in which John's narrative serves to explain the synoptic account. The call of the fishermen to become fishers of men (Matt. iv. 18 ff.; Mark i. 16 ff.) is psychologically incomprehensible without the assumption of previous familiarity on the part of those called with the person and intentions of Jesus. How they obtained this acquaintance we read in John i. 35-51. The treachery of Judas, which in the Synoptics falls like a thunderbolt from heaven, we learn from John vi. 70, xii. 4-6, xiii. 2, 11, 18-30, xvii. 12, xviii. 2-5, was long in preparation, and connected with Judas' earlier attitude among the disciples. The reference of Isa. xl. 3 to the Baptist in all the Synoptics is intelligible if he applied the saying to himself (John i. 23), and it is not strange that the disciples of John understood the figure in Matt. ix. 15, Mark ii. 19, if their master had used it to represent his relation to Jesus (John iii. 29). The historical occasion for the accusation of Jesus in Mark xiv. 58, xv. 29, Matt. xxvi. 61, xxvii. 40, Acts vi. 14, is to be found only in John ii. 19. This and other things are the incidental, if not altogether unintentional, results of the method which circumstances compelled the author to use, especially of his eclecticism in the choice of material. The purpose of his book is proved to be that already noted, namely, the confirmation and furtherance of the readers in the faith which they have confessed.

But this faith in which it is John's purpose to confirm his readers he states in the terms of the common Christian confession, namely, that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of God (xx. 31). It is the old message which the readers have heard ever since their first contact with the gospel (1 John i. 5, iii. 11), and which stands at the very forefront in all the gospel testimony concerning Jesus. Even the Baptist testifies, "I am not the Messiah, but Jesus is" (i. 20, 25 f., 33 f., iii. 28 f.). Those who were the first to leave John in order to become disciples of Jesus used this title to express their new faith (i. 41, cf. vv. 45, 49); and the author, who was one of these disciples, in the passage where he gives the account of this event, retains the form which the title had in his native language, although it is necessary for him to translate it for the readers (n. 2). John uses also the archaic titles "The Chosen One" and "the Holy One of God," which had hardly yet been taken up into the language of the Church, and hence disappeared from the text in the common tradition (n. 2). In the same way Jesus maintains the connection with the O.T. and the people of Israel. Although Jesus is the Saviour of the world (iv. 42, cf. i. 29, iii. 14 ff., xii. 47, xvii. 2, 17 ff.), nevertheless salvation is of the Jews (iv. 22). Not until after His death and exaltation is it possible and is it His desire to exercise His world calling in its full compass beyond the boundaries of Israel (x. 14-16, xii. 23-32). For this reason He quickly withdraws from the Samaritans who willingly receive Him (iv. 40, 43), and refuses to receive the Greeks (xii. 20 ff.). Although His enemies taunt Him with being a Samaritan (viii. 48), and believe it possible that He may seek safety in the Greek diaspora and preach to the Greeks (vii. 35), which would be equivalent to self-destruction (viii. 22), nevertheless He remains a Jew (iv. 9, 22) and faithful unto death to His own people, the race of Abraham. For He is the one promised in the O.T. (i. 45, v. 39, 46 f.), the King of Israel (i. 49, xii. 13), the Good Shepherd predicted by the prophets

(x. 1-10), i.e. the Sovereign of His people, to be distinguished from the usurpers of the throne,—the Herodian family, foreigners who obtained their power through craft and violence,—and from such bandits as Judas the Galilean (x. 1, 8, 10), and from other false Messiahs who were yet to come (v. 43). His kingdom, like Himself, did not originate in the world, and in the realisation of the same He makes use of no earthly powers (xviii. 33-37). The scorn, however, with which Pilate, notwithstanding this avowal of Christ, that His kingdom was not of this world, calls Him the King of the Jews (xviii. 39, xix. 3, 14, 19 f.), represents the full truth. The Jews themselves were compelled to confess that He had so spoken of Himself (xix. 21), and only by the betrayal of their Messianic idea to the heathen (xix. 15) was it possible for them to destroy Him in whom this idea was fulfilled. In spite of the protest of the Jews, it is proclaimed to all the world in the language of the people from whom Jesus sprang, in the language of the world-ruling Romans and in the language of the Greeks,—the common bond between all civilised peoples,—that the crucified Jesus is the king of the Jews (xix. 19 f.). The confession to which “all flesh,” i.e. the entire world, is to be brought in order that they may receive eternal life from Jesus, is, besides the acknowledgment that the Father of Jesus is the only true God, the confession of Jesus whom He has sent as the Messiah (xvii. 2 f.).

When in xx. 31 (cf. xi. 27) we find, in addition to the Messianic title, the expression ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, it is nothing new. Neither in the Synoptics nor in John is this title synonymous with ὁ Χριστός. Just as the combination of these two titles in Matt. xvi. 16 presupposes the confession of Matt. xiv. 33, which is based upon an experience of the supernatural greatness of Jesus, so the confession of John i. 49, in which mention of the divine sonship precedes that of the Messiahship, is based upon the overwhelming experience which had come to one of the first disciples of Jesus through the wonderful witness of Jesus to Himself.

This confession of the divine Sonship is capable of being deepened; not, however, by the use of ὁ μονογενής, a title which John uses both with and without υἱός to describe Jesus (n. 3). For this simply affirms that Jesus is the Son of God in the full sense of that word. Like ὁ υἱός alone (iii. 35 f., v. 19 ff., viii. 35, cf. Matt. xi. 27; Luke x. 22, cf. Matt. xxi. 38) or ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ (John ix. 35, xi. 4; Luke xxii. 70), it serves to distinguish Him from the children of God who become such only through His mediation (i. 12, xii. 36) and through a second birth (iii. 3-8). Although in xx. 17 Jesus makes parallel His original Sonship and the derived sonship of His disciples with a definiteness not to be found in the Synoptics, calling them His brethren in the same context, nevertheless the specific distinction remains. This is true also in the Synoptics, which, to put the matter briefly, never represent Jesus as combining the ideas of "my Father" and "your Father" in an "our Father," for the Lord's Prayer is not a prayer which Jesus prayed Himself, but one which He taught His disciples. Since John uses the word μονογενής for the first time in the sentence in which he declares that the Logos became flesh (i. 14), and in very close connection with the sentence which, according to the common text, deals with the divine sonship wrought by Jesus in those who believe on Him (i. 12 f.), but according to the original text treats of the begetting and birth of Jesus without the assistance of a man (i. 13, above, pp. 266, 288, n. 7), there is no doubt that John calls Jesus the μονογενής, the Son of God in a unique sense because of this wonderful entrance into human life. Jesus is from birth what other men become through regeneration, and by nature what they are by grace—a thought which finds expression in various ways elsewhere in the Fourth Gospel (n. 3). By i. 13, even according to the Textus receptus, the physical fatherhood of Joseph is excluded ; but, according to John as well as the Synoptics, during Jesus' lifetime His divine Sonship as opposed to His descent from Joseph was not the subject either of teaching or confession. Those who first confessed that He was the Son of God regarded Him at the same time as the son of Joseph (i. 45). To others who, because they are acquainted with Him, think they know all about His origin, it is simply said that they are in error (vi. 42, vii. 26 f., viii. 14, 57 f.). As is proved by the prologue of John and the birth stories of Matthew and Luke, at the time when all these Gospels were written it was commonly believed by the Church that Jesus was not the son of Joseph ; but neither John nor the Synoptics make this a part of the teaching of Jesus.

John does, however, show an advance upon the other evangelists when he represents the Baptist and then Jesus as testifying with constantly increasing clearness His pre-existence and His eternal being with God, His sending forth, origin, and descent from heaven to earth. The ἐκ θεοῦ γεννηθῆναι, without which no man can become a child of God, took place also in Jesus' case, since He entered into the human estate ; but for Him it was an ἐξέρχεσθαι παρά or ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς (xvi. 27 f.), the incarnation of one who was eternal and whose divine Sonship involves His being God. It does not follow, however, that what the Baptist recognised prophetically (i. 15, 30) was recognised by Jesus' disciples from the beginning. It is a long way from the confession of the sincere Nathanael, σὺ εἶ ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, who at first mocked, to the confession of the sincere Thomas, ὁ κύριός μου καὶ ὁ θεὸς μου, who at first was unwilling to believe. What heretofore had escaped from Jesus' heart in excited and often in obscure language He did not state in unmistakable terms to His disciples until on the last evening (xvi. 24-30). The development of faith from the first (i. 45-49) to the final confession (xx. 28) of the disciples is proof of the truth of such sayings of Jesus as iii. 21, xviii. 37. It is the way, the goal of which John desires that the readers of his Gospel shall not fail to attain (xx. 31). How anxious he is that this shall be the case is evidenced in the prologue, which begins with the affirmation of the eternal being of Christ with God. Moreover, in the course of this prologue he represents the Baptist as bearing testimony (i. 15) in the same words as are used in i. 30, where they are recorded for the first time in their historical connection, and the prologue concludes with a confession of Jesus as the "only-begotten God" (i. 18, n. 3), an expression which seems self-contradictory. This and not "the Logos doctrine" is the thing peculiar to the Fourth Gospel, and indeed the only new thing in the representation of the person of Jesus as compared with that of the Synoptics (n. 4).

It would be possible to speak of John's Logos doctrine, or of a Logos doctrine in the Gospel of John, only in case John formally identified the Logos which was familiar to the readers (i. 1) with Jesus the Christ (i. 17), or in case he formally stated that Jesus Christ whom the readers know is the divine Logos, or an incarnation of it, and if by the unfolding of the conceptions involved in one or the other of these propositions he went on to make some further statements about either the Logos or Christ. But nothing of this kind is found in the prologue (n. 5). Although the historical name of the Redeemer does not occur until i. 17, any reader at all acquainted with the gospel history would understand when he read i. 6-13, if not before, that the author was speaking of Jesus; since the Baptist's testimony was concerning Jesus the Christ, not concerning a being called "Logos" or "Light" (i. 7 f.), and since the name on which the children of God believe is none other than the name of Jesus Christ (i. 12, cf. ii. 23, iii. 18, xx. 31). In i. 4-5 also the only possible subject is Jesus. When and while He dwelt upon the earth He and He alone was the light of men (i. 4, cf. viii. 12, ix. 5, xii. 35 f., 46, iii. 19). Although He may not be the light now in the same sense, nevertheless the light which He was is not entirely lost, but continues to be manifested in the children of light (xii. 36), in whom He lives by word and spirit and who are in Him (xv. 5, 7, xvi. 7-15, xvii. 8, 17, 23). Nor has the dark world in which this light has long been shining (1 John ii. 8) and in which it still shines, been able to overcome and extinguish it (i. 5). Throughout the passage, ὁ λόγος like τὸ φῶς is a name applicable only to the historical Christ.

Even assuming that the proposition, "Christ is and is called the Logos," may contain a logos doctrine,—in the nature of the case a Christian Logos doctrine,—this doctrine is not expounded but presupposed in the prologue. From the simple designation of Christ as Logos, even if this be found in an independent statement (n. 5), the existence of a Christian Logos doctrine cannot be inferred any more than a Christian doctrine of light can be inferred from John viii. 12, ix. 5, xii. 46, or from the numerous suggestive designations of Christ an equal number of doctrines bearing these distinctive names (John vi. 35, 48, 51,—x. 11,—xi. 25,—xiv. 6,—xv. 1,—Col. i. 27, ii. 2,—2 Cor. iv. 4; Col. i. 15). Such an inference would be justified only if it were known that the Christians of that time derived further propositions from the identification of the Logos with Christ, or of Christ with the Logos, which would then likewise be silently taken for granted in the prologue. Certainly in the prologue nothing is deduced from this identification only presupposed of Christ with the Logos. The original existence of the Logos with God and its divine nature are not derived through a definition or development of the Logos idea; they are simply affirmed. Since essentially the same expressions (viii. 58, xvii. 5, cf. xii. 41) recur as utterances of Jesus concerning Himself without any connection with the name of the Logos, the statements of i. 1 would have exactly the same meaning, if their subject were ὁ Χριστός instead of ὁ λόγος. This is the language Paul would have used (n. 5). The idea of the creation of the world through Christ (i. 3) is expressed in the Fourth Gospel only in this one passage, but is found elsewhere in the N.T. without any discernible dependence upon the Logos idea (1 Cor. viii. 6; Col. i. 15-17; Heb. i. 2 f.; Rev. iii. 14). Consequently, there is no basis for assuming that John derived his statement from the Logos idea, or, on the other hand, that he called Christ the Logos because this was one of the articles of the common Christian faith. He does not in any way intimate that this was the case; and if this thought had been in his mind he would certainly have repeated the name of the Logos in i. 3, in order to direct the readers' attention to Gen. i. 3; Ps. xxxiii. 6, 9. That John does not regard the name of the Logos as a mine of speculative ideas is evidenced by the fact that the prologue does not contain any such ideas, and more especially by the fact that from i. 4 onward the Logos idea is replaced by that of light, and the former idea does not recur until i. 14, and then nothing is said which could have been derived from the λόγος conception.

We conclude, then, that in the prologue no Christian or non-Christian Logos doctrine is expounded or presupposed, but that the author assumes that the readers are familiar with the term λόγος as a designation of the Christ. The question then arises how this usage originated, and why John employs it in the prologue. He does not represent Jesus as using it, nor is there any obvious basis for it anywhere in the Fourth Gospel (n. 5). On the other hand, we do find the term used in two other writings of John's which confirms what is apparent from the prologue, namely, that the name was in more or less common use in the Church circles where these writings originated. In 1 John i. 1 the term ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς is used to describe not the gospel preaching, but the personal centre of that preaching—the person of Jesus, who, on the one hand, is without beginning, and, on the other hand, one whom the disciples heard speak, whom they saw walk and act, a man whom it was possible to touch, whom they perceived with all their senses. This eternal person is the eternal life, and as such has existed eternally with the Father. But because this life has issued from its silent abode with God, appeared in tangible form among men and become manifest to them, it can be called the “Word of Life.” In His own person Christ is the eternal life (John xiv. 6), and consequently the life which became visible and which could be heard is “the word of life.” Hence ὁ λόγος is a designation, not of the pre-existent Christ as such, but of the incarnate Christ (n. 6).

In Rev. xix. 11–16 John is represented as seeing Christ coming from heaven to judgment with the insignia of royal and judicial power (n. 7). In this vision He bears one name related to the work He had come to do at this time (ver. 16); also another, inscribed apparently on His diadem, which no one knew but Himself (ver. 12, cf. ii. 17). John saw this name inscribed on the diadem, but could not decipher it, hence was unable to express it. This means that for human thought and speech there is no term suited to express the entire significance of Christ and His being which is fully known only to Himself. But it is impossible for men not to give Him names, in which the attempt is made to express this thought. The name ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ (ver. 13) is one such attempt. It will be observed that John does not see or hear the name in the vision, but that he simply remarks at the close of the description of the personal appearance of Christ that this name was given to Him. It was the name used for Christ in the Church, and He was so called when it was desired to express in a comparatively comprehensive way what He is and what He signifies. He is the Word of God expressed in the world. His person represents completely what the numerous revelations of God by word are in part. The attributes of truth and trustworthiness belong to Him, just as they do to these revelations (xix. 9, xxi. 5); but because He is a person they are expressed by a proper name (xix. 11, cf. 1 John i. 9, v. 20?). The fact that Christ revealed the Word of God as a faithful witness (Rev. i. 5, iii. 14) is only one way in which He proved Himself to be the Word of God. He Himself is "the Amen," or, as we should express it, "the Amen in person," i.e. God's solemn declaration of His will and of His thought toward men (Rev. iii. 14, n. 8). He is not an amen or a word, but, since God has revealed Himself finally and definitely in Christ (Heb. i. 1), the Amen and the Word of God. This thought is not without analogies in N.T. writings other than those of John (n. 8).

This is the conception which we have in the Fourth Gospel. The general presuppositions and analogies are found here in the words of Jesus Himself. Jesus is the life, but also in His own person the truth (xiv. 6, xi. 25), the visible manifestation of God (xii. 45, xiv. 7-10), and He supplies men with the knowledge of God necessary to life, not simply through the words which He speaks as a teacher, but also through His deeds, i.e. during His earthly life He is the light of men (ix. 4-5, viii. 12, xii. 35 f., 46). He distinguishes Himself from all the official representatives and mediators of divine revelation who came before Him by affirming that, whereas they became what they were for other men through some word of God that came to them from without, He in the whole compass of His life is the one consecrated by God for His mission to men and sent by Him to fulfil it (x. 35 f.).

If, as the prologue taken in connection with 1 John i. 1, Rev. xix. 13 proves, ὁ λόγος had come to be used along with other terms to designate Christ in the region where John lived, manifestly not without his influence, the comprehensiveness of the term made its use particularly appropriate in the prologue which describes in large outlines the history of Christ and the revelation accomplished by Him; from the eternity out of which He sprang to the present when He has returned again to God, when, however, the body of those who believe on Him, the heirs of His grace, the guardians of the knowledge of God brought into the world by Him, continue to exist in a world which is without this knowledge. Christ is here represented as throughout the Gospel and in Revelation as the indispensable witness of the truth and revealer of the knowledge of God which no man can derive from himself (i. 18, cf. iii. 11, v. 37 f., vi. 46, xviii. 37). But His relation to the God whom He reveals is different from that of all other bearers of the divine revelation. Not only had He seen God before He appeared as His only-begotten Son; He is Himself θεός (i. 18). While the revelation of the law was transmitted through the hand of Moses to other men, the grace and truth of God with which Jesus Himself was filled has become through Him an historical reality (i. 17, cf. xiv. 16). His person is the complete revelation of God to men, consequently "the Word" per se.

The question how the term ὁ λόγος (τοῦ θεοῦ, τῆς ζωῆς) came to be used as a general expression, gathering up the early Christian conceptions of Christ which otherwise were unconnected, and how it came to be used as a proper name, we are unable to answer by tracing its history, just as we are unable to answer many similar questions; for the reason that we know practically nothing of what was taught in the Church. It is conceivable historically that the apostle John may have become familiar in Jerusalem with the Greek speculation, the first representative of which, so far as we know, was Philo; since there was a synagogue of the Alexandrians in Jerusalem, and many Hellenists in the membership of the mother Church

(vol. i. 60 f. n. 8). It is also possible that Alexandrian Jews, like Apollos, brought such ideas to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 24). If only someone could succeed in showing a real connection between Philo and John! John's conception of Christ is not Philo's conception of the Logos, the Platonic idea of ideas, the plastic world-soul of the teachings of the Stoa. It would be more natural to suppose that the teaching concerning the memra current among the rabbis was utilised by the Christian teachers in expressing their ideas concerning Jesus. But apparently this term could be used only if the pre-existent Christ were thought of as the mediator of the Old Testament revelation as well as of the New. But no traces of this idea are to be found in John, even where it might be expected (v. 37-47, viii. 52-58, xii. 37-41). Probably, therefore, the expression is to be explained as one which grew up in the late apostolic age out of the above-mentioned roots embedded in the soil of the Christian Church.

If John had applied to Christ a Logos speculation derived from non-Christian sources, and under its influence had attempted a higher conception of Christ, inevitably the clear figure of the man Jesus would have faded away like a shadow and been distorted into ghostly form. In reality the opposite is the case. No one of the Gospels presents a picture of Jesus which in all essential respects is so entirely human as that of John. Jesus is weary with His journey (iv. 6); confesses that He is thirsty (iv. 7, xix. 28); weeps at the grave of His friend (xi. 35); cherishes friendships with individuals, which can have no direct connection with His redemptive work (xi. 3, 11, 36, xiii. 23, xx. 2). When dying He made provision for the temporal well-being of His mother (xix. 26). Just as He is deeply stirred and even moved by a feeling of anger at the desolation which death had been permitted to bring into the home of a friend, especially because He Himself by His delay had been responsible for this victory of death (xi. 33, 38), so He is profoundly shaken by the thought of His own approaching death, and in a state of doubt and uncertainty seeks to be assured of the divine will regarding it (xii. 27), which he had long known (viii. 21-29). He can do all things only as He depends upon God (v. 19, 30); the Son of Man requires the aid of God's angels, in order miraculously to testify that He is the Son of God (i. 51). All His miracles are done in response to prayer (xi. 41). He is and continues to be the studious pupil of His Father (v. 30, viii. 26, 40, xv. 15). However far and deeply He is able to see into human hearts and into the dark recesses of the future (n. 10), this is no proof of a native omniscience, but is a gift of God in accordance with Jesus' vocation, a manifestation of the Spirit which He has received for His work (i. 32 f.). Like other men, He is informed of things which He Himself does not witness (iv. 1, xi. 3-6), or draws inferences from what He does witness (vi. 15). He asks questions, not simply in order to test others (vi. 6), but in order to find out what He does not know (xi. 34). Even in the case of His official work, His knowledge is subject to growth, and thus (temporarily) limited, with the result that His decisions to act are subject to change (n. 9).

Nor can this thoroughly human representation of Christ—in comparison with which there is little in the Synoptics which gives so naïve and so clear an impression—be explained as the remnant of an older view, which the author himself had transcended. On the contrary, this is the image of Jesus which lives in his thought, and which with loving devotion he pictures before the eyes of his readers. However important he may regard it that they believe the Jesus to be the Christ and the Son of God, he does not, like Matthew, picture the Christ (n. 10), indeed very seldom calls Him "Lord," as is frequently done by Luke (vol. ii. 476; above, pp. 91, n. 21, 249), and in all his statements about Him makes the subject the man Jesus. That this is not only the natural reflection of his view of Jesus, but his conscious purpose in the Gospel, is evidenced by i. 14. The language is strong. He who from eternity was God (i. 1), and who in every aspect did not cease to be God (i. 18, 33–36, n. 3, xx. 28), became flesh—appeared as flesh. It is clear, even without the light thrown upon the passage by the Epistles, that this language, which, in comparison with Phil. ii. 7, Rom. viii. 3 is so very harsh, can be explained only in the light of another and contrasted view of Jesus. Just as the humanity of Christ is emphasised here, where His entrance into the human estate is described, so in the account of the end of His life strong emphasis is laid upon the reality of His death. It is true that the two details, namely, that Jesus' legs were not broken, and that He was pierced with a spear after His death, are important in the eyes of the author as fulfilments of prophecies (above, p. 217); but in comparison with the earlier accounts of the crucifixion these facts are in themselves new and significant. The legs were left unbroken, only because the soldiers were convinced that Jesus was already dead, and it was the doubt of one of the soldiers as to this fact that led to the piercing of the side. Even if the soldier's doubt were well grounded, the piercing of the side with a spear would have caused death. Apparently both to the soldier and to the narrator the issue of blood and water was evidence of the disintegration of the blood which had taken place after death. It is in connection also with this entire transaction that the narrator introduces the solemn assurance that he is an eye-witness whose account is in accordance with the truth (above, p. 219 ff.). When it is further remembered that no other Gospel gives such circumstantial historical proof that the grave was empty (xx. 1–13), or records the way in which Thomas was convinced of the reality of the body of the risen Jesus, and of the identity of this body with the one which was crucified (xx. 24–29), it becomes clear beyond question that John's purpose is to fortify the faith of his readers against doctrines which questioned the reality of the incarnation and death of Jesus. According to Irenæus, this was the teaching of Cerinthus. But the Epistles must be investigated before definite conclusions can be reached on this point.

There is still another direction in which John seems to show a polemical purpose. If the author is the unnamed companion of Andrew in i. 35 ff., there is nothing peculiar about the fact that he reports in detail and with strong emphasis the Baptist's testimony concerning Jesus which brought Andrew to Jesus (i. 6-9, 19-36, iii. 27-36, v. 33-36, x. 41). Nor is it strange that outside the narrative, in a form other than that of an historical notice, he should represent this as a testimony given in the present, and thus valid for the readers, as he does when he puts it among the statements regarding the experience of himself and of his fellow-disciples who companied with Jesus (i. 15). This would all be satisfactorily explained by the purpose indicated in xix. 35: ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς πιστεύητε. In other words, that you as well as I and my fellow-disciples may believe, you as well as the μαθητῆς (xix. 26) and his συμμαθηταί (xi. 16), who were disciples as well of the Baptist as of Jesus. But this does not explain the marked emphasis with which from the very beginning of the Gospel both the author and the Baptist himself deny that John is the Messiah or the Light of Life (i. 8, 20-27, 30-33, iii. 28-30). The temptation which John had to represent himself as the Messiah he honourably and steadfastly resisted (i. 20), and rejected all other titles which in the confusion of Jewish ideas about the person of the coming Messiah might be interpreted as implying a claim to the Messianic dignity, or equality with the Messiah (i. 21, 25, n. 11). The only office which he claims is that which Isaiah represents under the figure of a voice, the subject of which remains entirely undefined (i. 23). His work is great, but is entirely in the service of his incomparably greater successor, whose origin is from eternity, and of the greater work which He came to do. They are related to each other as water to spirit, word to deed. Hence John must recede into the background, as Jesus, the bridegroom of the bride, the Messiah of the Church, comes into prominence. He does it without envy and willingly, even with profound joy as the friend of the bridegroom (iii. 27-36); while Jesus in His turn fully recognises John's calling (v. 35), classes him with Himself as a true witness (iii. 11), declares that for the time being John's baptism with water is just as necessary as the future baptism with the Spirit (iii. 5; cf. the contrast i. 33), for a time practises it through His disciples (iii. 22, iv. 2), and, in order to avoid the appearance of rivalry, even gives up this work as soon as He sees that it may interfere with the activity of the Baptist (iv. 1). While, therefore, perfect harmony existed between John and Jesus, and not a few of John's disciples, accepting his testimony concerning Jesus and following his suggestion, left him in order to become henceforth disciples of Jesus (i. 35-51), and while many who heard John believed on Jesus later (x. 42), there were other followers of John who remained with him, refused to join themselves to Jesus, and in the spirit of envy endeavoured to stir the jealousy of their master against Jesus (iii. 26). But He who came from above, and so is above all (iii. 31), has no rival. Although John was a lamp which burned for a long time but was finally extinguished (v. 35), he is not a light of the world to be compared with the only one who is the Light of the World. Rather is he one of those who in obedience to a divine command exercised a calling limited both in time and scope (x. 35); nor has he any of the glory of the σημεῖα (x. 41) which distinguished Jesus as the Christ and the Son of God (xx. 30 f.). Just as John declares his entire subordination to Jesus, so Jesus also, when He has occasion to point out to the Jews their hostile attitude toward Himself from the beginning of His ministry as contrasted with their favourable reception of John, states clearly that by the divine witness He is declared to be greater than John (v. 36 ; see § 69, n. 1). Not taking into account at all the Synoptics, in which scarcely any of this historical material is to be found (Luke iii. 15 f., v. 33-39, xi. 1 ; Matt. ix. 14-17 ; Mark ii. 18-22), from the manner in which the relations between John and Jesus are set forth—strongly emphasised even in the prologue—one is compelled to infer a polemical purpose on the part of the author. Among those in the circle about John there must have been some who attached overmuch importance to the personality of the Baptist, and who denied the definite distinction between him and Jesus. We have not sufficient historical knowledge to set forth, concretely, definitely, and with entire certainty, this fact which appears from the Fourth Gospel. But it is natural to assume that the after effects of the wrong attitude which some of the Baptist's disciples took toward Jesus were connected with or helped to give rise to the movement which the author opposes by his strong emphasis upon the incarnation, the truly human life and death of Jesus, and His bodily resurrection. There are also indications that it was in Ephesus especially, where, according to all the tradition, the Fourth Gospel originated, that the influences of the work of the Baptist continued to be felt, the connections of which with apostolic Christianity were ambiguous (n. 12).

This leads us to consider, finally, the question as to the nationality and home of the original readers of the Fourth Gospel. That they were familiar only with the Greek language is evidenced by the fact that the writer, who is fond of retaining the Hebrew or Aramaic form of the names of persons and things, translates them into Greek regularly at least the first time they are used, sometimes also in the second instance—i. 38 (cf. i. 49, iii. 2, 26, iv. 31, vi. 25, ix. 2, xi. 8), i. 41 (the second time in iv. 25), i. 42, ix. 7, xi. 16 (again in xx. 24, xxi. 2), xix. 13,

17, xx. 16. In only one instance does he leave the name of a place untranslated, and this name is of significance to himself because of the meaning of the word (v. 2, vol. i. 28, n. 15). Names of feasts and holidays like πάσχα, σάββατον did not need to be translated, because they had long since passed over into Christian usage; others, like σκηνοπηγία (vii. 2), ἐγκαίνια (x. 22), are given directly in their Greek form, the meaning being clear from the words themselves. With words like ἀμὴν (i. 51), ὡσαννὰ (xii. 13) the readers were likewise familiar from their own cultus or the earlier Gospels. They are not familiar with Jewish customs and cultus practices, nor with the geography of Palestine. The author tells them that the usual route from Judea to Galilee led through Samaria (iv. 4, n. 13). The readers do not appear to know that Cana is in Galilee (ii. 1, 11, iv. 46, 54), nor are they familiar with the location of Bethany on Jordan (i. 28, x. 40), and of the other Bethany near Jerusalem (xi. 1, 18). Ephraim in Judea (xi. 54) is quite as unknown to them as Sychar in Samaria (iv. 5). He informs them for the first time that there is a pool in Jerusalem called Bethesda (v. 2). To designate the Lake of Gennesaret, John uses ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας, which was to be found in Matt. iv. 18, xv. 29; Mark i. 16, vii. 31, and was therefore, perhaps, familiar to his readers. However, out of regard for them, who, because of their unfamiliarity with the geographical situation and the Jewish custom to call an inland lake also a sea, might have misunderstood his reference, he adds the other name of the Lake, ἡ Τιβερίάς (vi. 1, n. 14). Because the readers are accustomed yearly to celebrate a Christian Passover lasting for one day, and, on the other hand, know that the Jews, some of whom must have resided in their vicinity, celebrated the feast for several days, John uses the expression, "Passover of the Jews" (ii. 13; cf. vi. 4, xi. 55) in order to call their attention to the fact that Jesus' first sojourn in Jerusalem covered an entire week (ii. 23, iv. 45). With the feast of Tabernacles they may have been familiar (vii. 2). It is necessary, however, to inform them that the last day was celebrated in Jerusalem with special solemnity (vii. 37); likewise that the Sabbath which fell within the Passover period was observed with special strictness (xix. 31). It is necessary at least to remind them that on Friday evening, just before the beginning of the Sabbath, Jews were unable to take an extended journey, even in order to bury a corpse (xix. 42). The presence of the large water jars in Cana he explains by reminding the readers of the custom of the Jews as to purification, with which perhaps the readers were familiar, but which they did not practise (ii. 6). Special attention is called to the particular manner in which the Jews bury their dead (xix. 40), in part at least because one feature of this description is to be noticed again in xx. 6. Probably it is John himself and not some glossator who remarks in iv. 9, in explanation of the conversation which there takes place, that the Jews and Samaritans are accustomed to hold no friendly intercourse with one another (n. 13), which makes the meaning of viii. 48 clear without any comment.

In a word, then, we conclude that the original readers of John were Greek Christians remote from Palestine. There is nothing which contradicts the tradition that they lived in the province of Asia. Assuming that the Gospel was written by the apostle John, this is proved with certainty by the date of the composition of the supplement (§ 66) and of the entire Gospel (§ 69), for at this time John was resident in Ephesus. This was also the seat of the unsound tendencies against which we have seen the Fourth Gospel to be directed (n. 9; cf. also § 69, n. 9).

1. (P. 304.) John uses σημείον regularly only of the deeds of Jesus (indirectly also in the negative statement of x. 41). He has the word 18 times: whereas in Matt. it is found only 6 or 7 times, in Mark only in viii. 11-12, and in Luke, omitting the parallels (xi. 16, 29-30), only in xxiii. 8; Paul uses it more frequently. It is appropriately used in the sense of mir, in Ex. iv. 8 f., 17, for the demand of the Jews for some miraculous evidence of God's approval of Him whom He sent (John ii. 18, vi. 30; cf. 1 Cor. i. 22). John never uses δυνάμεις, so common in the Synoptics, and in addition to the word σημεία (once connected with τέρατα=prodigia in a passage where Jesus reproves the half faith which seeks confirmation by miracles, iv. 48) uses only ἔργα in an equivalent sense, v. 20, 36, vii. 3, 21, x. 25, 32, 33, 37, 38, xiv. 10-12, xv. 24. The only other passage where ἔργα is used in this sense is Matt. xi. 2.

2. (P. 308.) Concerning Μεσσίας, John i. 41, iv. 25 (nowhere else in the N.T.), see vol. i. 20 f. There is nothing peculiar about the use of the word by the Samaritan woman. For even if the Samaritan title for the Messiah משיח (the "Converter"; cf. Cowley in the Expositor, 1895, March, p. 165, in opposition to Merx and Hilgenfeld) does go back so far, this woman who remarks upon the religious differences between the Jews and the Samaritans must have known the Jewish name, and could have employed it in conversation with the Jews. Concerning ὁ ἐκλεκτός τοῦ θεοῦ, i. 34, see above, p. 284 n. 2. Both this title and ὁ ἅγιος τ. θ., vi. 69 (SBC*DL), have been replaced by ὁ υἱὸς τ. θ. (Sc and the old Latin versions), more frequently preceded by ὁ Χριστός (so also in Ss) and followed by τοῦ ζῶντος. Matt. xvi. 16 was preferred to Mark i. 24; Luke iv. 34 (cf. Acts iii. 14, iv. 27, 30). Cf. also John x. 36, xvii. 19. John uses also ὁ Χριστός 14 times, Ἰησοῦς Χριστός twice (i. 17, xvii. 3), once Χριστόν (ix. 22), as a predicate. Mention may be made also of ὁ βασιλεὺς τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ or τῶν Ἰουδαίων (above, p. 309), and ὅτι ἐγὼ εἰμι, viii. 24, 28, where ὁ Χριστός, or a synonym, must be supplied.

3. (Pp. 310, 312.) The stately tone of the English phrases "The only-begotten" (John i. 14) and "The only-begotten Son of God" (iii. 16, 18; 1 John iv. 9) is lessened when we remember that every only son is spoken of in this way (Luke vii. 12, viii. 42, ix. 38; Tob. iii. 15; Clem. 1 Cor. xxv. 2 of the Phoenix). The word is used to translate יחיד and יחיד בן in Judg. xi. 34; Ps. xxii. 20 LXX; Gen. xxii. 2; Jer. vi. 26 Aquila; Heb. xi. 17 (ὁ ὁδῖος υἱός instead in Rom. viii. 32). But since the same expression is usually translated in the LXX by ἀγαπητός (Gen. xxii. 2, 12, 16; Zech. xii. 10; Jer. vi. 26, see also the variant reading in Judg. xi. 34 (it follows that ἀγαπητός in Matt. iii. 17, xvii. 5; Mark i. 11, ix. 7, xii. 6 (ἐνα . . . υἱὸν ἀγ.); Luke iii. 22, xx. 13; 2 Pet. i. 17 (cf. Col. i. 13), is synonymous with μονογενής in John. It may be considered as proved that the correct reading in John i. 18 is μονογενὴς θεός without ὁ (not ὁ μονογενὴς υἱός); cf. Hort, Two Dissertations, 1876; GK, i. 736, Forch. i. 122. The following is the sense of the two affirmations of i. 1 and i. 14: One, who was God, and therefore One who in His essence is and continues to be God, since He cannot cease to be God, and who at the same time by reason of His incarnation is God's only Son, has revealed to us men the God who otherwise cannot be known. In x. 33-38 also the conception of the Son of God is such as to include His divine being. Not only the accusation of the Jews, but also the scriptural proof adduced by Jesus, show that He called Himself God—a claim which the Jews repudiated, but which Jesus held to be justified. When in x. 36 Jesus calls Himself "Son of God" instead of God, the title is in accord with His matter of fact method of speech; but is so much the less to be regarded as an intentional weakening of what He has just proven from the Scriptures, namely, His right to call Himself

God, since in Ps. lxxxii. 6 "gods" and "sons of the Highest" are used interchangeably. Because His consecration to His calling coincides with His sending into the world or even precedes it, He is in person and vocation the Son and the Holy One of God (x. 36, cf. vi. 69). But since the consecration and the sending presuppose His existence, that is to say, His supramundane and ante-historic existence, His Sonship of God includes His deity. Everything He possesses, even life itself, is a gift of God, and yet possessed by Him as God Himself possesses it; in other words, He does not, like created beings, find the conditions and means of life outside Himself, but in Himself. For this reason also he has the Godlike power to impart His life without Himself losing it, v. 26, vi. 57.

4. (P. 312.) Valentinus, the Gnostic (above, p. 176), and Justin, "the philosopher," were the first to discover in the prologue a Logos doctrine, or rather they were the first to read the doctrine into the prologue. That this was not the way in which the original readers understood the prologue is evidenced by Ignatius, earlier than either Justin or Valentinus, and the first clear witness for the Fourth Gospel, when, in Magn. viii. 2 he writes: "God is one, who has revealed Himself through Jesus Christ, His Son, who is His Word proceeding out of the silence, who in all things was well-pleasing to the one who sent Him" (Patr. Ap. ii. 36, 201, also editions of Lightfoot and Funk). Consequently the man Jesus is called the Word of God, because, after a long silence, in Him, His Son, God finally spoke clearly and audibly to men, revealing Himself not only through Jesus' teachings, but equally through His deeds (cf. Ign. ad Eph. xv. 1). As to His person, Jesus is "the infallible mouth, by which the Father has truly spoken" (ad Rom. viii. 2), the γνώμη of the Father (ad Eph. iii. 2), the γνώσις of God (ad Eph. xvii. 2); cf. Zahn, Ignatius von Ant. S. 382 f., 472 f. Traces of this early Christian "Logos Doctrine" are found elsewhere, e.g. in the "Kerugma of Peter" in Clem. Eccl. Proph. 58 (νόμος καὶ λόγος αὐτὸς ὁ σωτὴρ λέγεται), and in later writers; cf. the writer's Hirt des Hermas, S. 147 f. The one-sided tendency to consider only the name of the Logos and not the many similar titles found especially in the Fourth Gospel, such as Truth, Light, Life, etc., is appropriately condemned, especially by Origen, in his Commentary on John, tom. i, 21-39. The opinion which, notwithstanding this protest, has remained prevalent no one has expressed more unfortunately than Keim (Gesch. Jesu i. 125): "Cannot all the flesh and blood in this history be explained from the philosophy which sits at the entrance and distributes the admission tickets and the programmes?"

5. (Pp. 312, 313, 314.) To be compared with the lack of all explanation of the readers' familiarity with the use of ὁ λόγος as a name for Christ, which familiarity is presupposed in the prologue, is the manner in which Paul connects with Christ ideas not directly derived from the gospel history or from current ecclesiastical usage (1 Cor. x. 4; Col. i. 27, ii. 2), or lets such ideas appear as predicates in sentences where Christ is the subject (1 Cor. i. 30; 2 Cor. iii. 17, iv. 4; Col. i. 15; Eph. v. 23), and this peculiarity of John may also be compared with Ignatius' procedure in similar cases (see preceding note). In addition to analogies and foreshadowings of the use of the name "Logos" noted in the text and in notes 6-8, special attention is called to x. 35 (cf. n. 3, and Luthardt, Das joh. Ev. 2 i. 273). Where the O.T.

worthies are spoken of as those to whom the word of God came (Jer. i. 4, Luke iii. 2), and Jesus likewise is represented as having to do with the word of God (John vii. 16, viii. 26, xiv. 10, xvii. 6-8, 17), it would seem almost necessary that the distinction between them and Jesus should be brought out, namely, that this connection with the word of God is original, involving His entire personality. But even in x. 35 the author does not attribute these thoughts to Jesus. The use of the term in i. 1 and i. 14 is mainly responsible for the opinion that ὁ λόγος in the prologue is a specific name for the pre-existing Christ, or for His eternal and unchangeable essence. But it must be remembered, first, that the apostolic Church had no specific name for Christ's essence apart from His human manifestation. Even when speaking of Him as pre-existing the Church used names applicable to men—Jesus, Christ, the Son of God, the Lord, Eph. i. 3 f.; Phil. ii. 5 f.; Col. i. 13-20; 1 Cor. viii. 6, x. 4, 9. In a sentence like John i. 1, Paul would have used ὁ Χριστός; according to xii. 41 (cf. ver. 32, viii. 58; Jude 5 (vol. ii. 252 f.)), John might have used even Ἰησοῦς instead of ὁ λόγος in i. 1, just as well, however, ἡ ζωὴ (1 John i. 2) or τὸ φῶς, ἡ ἀλήθεια κτλ. It showed better taste to put the more general name at the beginning, and not to employ the common historical names until the passage where Moses, through whom the first revelation came to Israel, is contrasted with Jesus, through whom the final revelation was made (i. 17). Consequently the use of λόγος in i. 1 indicates nothing as to the source whence Jesus derived this name, and as to the length of time He had borne it. In the second place, it is just as impossible to infer from the use of this name in i. 14 that Jesus was so called apart from His incarnation and in contrast to it. The name is used here again appropriately because in vv. 14-18 the author is about to show fully how far the historical Jesus is the complete and final revelation—i.e. the Word—of God. Further, the reappearance of ὁ λόγος in these verses is for the sake of reference to and connection with ver. 1. Just as ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ ἦν in ver. 10 stands in contrast to ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεόν in ver. 1, so the σὰρξ ἐγένετο in ver. 14 stands in contrast to θεὸς ἦν in ver. 1. No contrast exists between the subject and predicate of ver. 14a; but between the predicates in ver. 1 on the one hand and ver. 14 on the other hand, given the one and the same subject called ὁ λόγος, there is a sharp and intelligible contrast. For the concept of the word does not at all involve immateriality; the word is rather thought become perceptible to the senses; the spoken word is audible, it can sound loud or soft, pleasant or harsh; the written word is visible, and when it is cut in stone or printed in the blind-alphabet, may be perceived even by the sense of touch. On the contrary, the spirit is contrasted to the flesh in John (iii. 6, vi. 63) as everywhere in the Bible (God, however, is spirit (iv. 24, cf. xxxi. 3)). He, who in the beginning was God, and therefore spirit, became flesh, i.e. a man of flesh and blood. He became a member of the human race, which John also calls πᾶσα σὰρξ (xvii. 2). It is self-evident that He was not changed into flesh, as the water into wine (ii. 9) or the stones into bread (Matt. iv. 3); for He, who is God without beginning, cannot in that sense cease to be such a being. The correct text of i. 18 states this to excess (above, n. 3); accordingly, therefore, there is meant only an exchanging of the one mode of being and form of appearance with another, a metamorphosis in the essential meaning of the word (cf. Phil. ii. 6 f.), by which the identity of the ego is not destroyed.

Still less are we to think of such a transformation of the Logos into flesh, by which He would cease to be the Logos. For, whatever may be included in the name ὁ λόγος, it must, however, at any rate be predicated of the one who became flesh; indeed, strictly taken, it may first be predicated of the one who has become flesh. One principal reason for the continued misinterpretation of ver. 14 lies in the untenable opinion, that finally at this point the transition is made from the representation of the being and activity of the pre-existent to the description of the one appearing as man, whereas from ver. 4 onwards reference is made only to the one who has become man. If one accepts as genuine the text of ver. 13, presented above, p. 288, n. 7, it must be fully admitted that this transition is not first made with ver. 14. Rather the statement concerning the begetting of Jesus by God without the aid of a man is extended by the sentence, that in and with this begetting the Logos—which in the beginning and from the beginning until His miraculous begetting as man was God—became flesh.

6. (P. 315.) Since in 1 John i. 1 τὸν λόγον τῆς ζωῆς in the sense of gospel (Phil. ii. 16; Acts v. 20) could very easily be connected as a loose appositional phrase (cf. Acts x. 37, τὸ γερόμενον ῥῆμα) with the four relative clauses which are the objects of ἀπαγγέλλομεν ὑμῖν, the use of the construction περὶ τοῦ λόγου τῆς ζωῆς is a positive proof that this connection is intentionally excluded. Not the word of life which the apostles proclaim, but the person about which their preaching centres, namely, Jesus, is meant (1 John v. 9, 10; John i. 7, 15, v. 31–46, x. 41, xii. 41, xv. 26; Rom. i. 3, xv. 21; Acts viii. 12). In the preceding relative clauses also, this person who always existed, all the manifestations of whose life and whose physical qualities were sensibly perceived by the apostles with ears, eyes, and hands, is meant, but described impersonally and by a paraphrase. All that was audible, visible, and tangible which the disciples were able to perceive in their intercourse with Jesus, is summed up in the ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς, and, as the change in the construction shows, referred back to its centre. The ἀπαγγέλλειν τὰ περὶ τοῦ Ἰησοῦ (vol. ii. 377, n. 2) = ἀπαγγέλλειν and μαρτυρεῖν περὶ Ἰησοῦ. But the personal Logos is not called ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς because He gives life, but because He has life in Himself (John i. 4), i.e. is living; or, as the substitution of the idea ἡ ζωὴ in ver. 2 shows, by means of an appositional genitive, He is Himself described as the one who is in person life; cf. John xi. 25, xiv. 6.

7. (P. 315.) In Rev. xix. 12, ἔχων ὄνομα γεγραμμένον ὃ has the strongest MS. authority (to which S² has been recently added). The reading ὄνόματα γεγραμμένα ᾧ is due to the mention of many diadems in the same verse. In BS³ the two readings are confused. In ver. 13 the present writer considers κέκληται to be the correct reading. The testimony of the versions as such for καλεῖται has no great weight. Although in xix. 16 we have the names directly connected with the judgment, the name ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ, which is outside of the vision, is not without reference to the coming of Christ to judgment. If Christ did not come, or if He did not conquer and administer judgment, then He would not be, what He as the Word of God must be, truthful and reliable (cf. xix. 9, 11, iii. 14).

8. (P. 316.) Although originally an adjective, πᾶς is never so used either in the O.T. (where πᾶν and πᾶς are used instead) or in the N.T. Consequently, it is not so used in Rev. iii. 14, where it would be a mere parade of learning, since ὁ πιστὸς καὶ ἀληθινός immediately follows. The readers were familiar with ἀμήν only as an adverbial exclamation. Elsewhere, when used substantively, τὸ ἀμήν (1 Cor. xiv. 16; 2 Cor. i. 20) occurs, but ὁ ἀμήν is used here because it is the name of a man. Practically the same thought is expressed by the synonym ναί in 2 Cor. i. 19. The primary reference is to Christ as preached (cf. Rom. x. 5-8). As such He is not at the same time both Yea and Nay, but in Him is a Yea which cannot be contradicted. Moreover, in relation to the promises of the O.T., Christ Himself is found the confirming Yea to all the questions contained in and suggested by prophecy. According to Paul, therefore, Christ is a word of God spoken unto the world at the end of days, an affirming word, itself in turn confirmed by the Amen of the Church.

9. (Pp. 319, 325.) The contradiction between John vii. 8 and John vii. 10 early led to a change of the reading οὐκ ἀναβ. (SD Sc Ss, etc.), which could not have been invented into οὐπω ἀναβ. (BL Sah. etc.). Appealing to this passage, Porphyrius (in Jerome, c. Pelag. ii. 17) accuses Jesus of inconstantia et mutatio. Schopenhauer (Grundprobleme der Ethik, 2te Aufl. S. 225) in proving that falsehood is not unconditionally wrong, cites the fact that on one occasion "even Jesus Christ intentionally told an untruth." Something of the same contrast is to be observed between ii. 4 and ii. 7f.

10. (P. 319.) Reference to the fulfilment of O.T. prophecy in the gospel history is more frequently made by John (i. 23, 45, ii. 17, 22 [τῇ γραφῇ], xii. 14 f., 38-41, xix. 24, 36, xx. 9) and by Jesus Himself in the Fourth Gospel (v. 39, 46 f., vi. 45, xiii. 18, xv. 25, xvii. 12) than by Mark and Luke. The point of view, however, is entirely different from that in Matt. In Matthew the purpose is apologetic, namely, to prove to the Jews that in the very respect in which Jesus was an offence to His people, He fulfilled prophecy—when this is rightly interpreted (vol. ii. 560 f.); on the other hand, John does not attempt to refute formally and in detail the objections raised by the Jews on the ground of the apparent lack of correspondence between prophecy and fulfilment (i. 46, vi. 42, vii. 27, 41 f., 52, xii. 34). This contradiction is met by the fulfilment in Jesus of God's plan of salvation foreshadowed in the O.T. by example and by word (i. 14, 16, 17, 23, 33, 41, 45, iii. 14, iv. 26, 42, v. 39, 46 f., vii. 31, ix. 37, x. 11, 35, xii. 37-41), which general position the Christian readers of the Gospel accepted, and which is frequently attested in the Fourth Gospel without detailed instances. On Him as the agent of salvation, God has set His seal (vi. 27), and whoever believes in Him, becomes by the change thus wrought in himself a confirming seal of the truthfulness and loyalty of God in the fulfilling of His promises (iii. 33, cf. vi. 35; 1 Cor. ix. 2; 2 Cor. iii. 2). So that the agreement between prophecy and fulfilment which catches the eye, becomes a matter of great significance for the faith of believers. Just as the first disciples were strengthened by the discovery of this agreement even after the death and resurrection of Jesus (ii. 22, vii. 39, xii. 16, 37-41, xiii. 18, xv. 25, xix. 24, 36 f., xx. 9), so here references to it are designed to strengthen the faith of the readers. The same is true also of the predictions of Jesus Himself (ii. 19-22, vi. 70 f., xii. 32 f., xiii. 19-29, xiii. 38, xvi. 4, xviii. 9, 32); to which for this reason the solemn ὡς ἀπηγορεύ is applied (xviii. 9, 32), as it is likewise to the prophetic testimony of the Baptist (x. 41), and even to the unintentional prophecy of Caiaphas

(xi. 51). This is the significance also of the prophetic utterances dealing with the past and bringing to light the hidden things of the present. Jesus is a "seer," who does not need human intervention in order to know things most secret, when His calling demands such knowledge (ii. 24 f., iv. 16-18, 29, 39, 50, 52, vi. 64, 70, xiii. 10 f., 18, xxi. 15-17). Although Jesus rejects the dogma that every affliction suffered by the individual is punishment for his personal sins (ix. 2 f.), in a particular case He does recognise this to be the relation of sin to suffering (v. 14). It is the inexplicable manifestation of such deep, prophetic insight that overwhelms Nathanael and the Samaritan woman (i. 47-50, iv. 16-19, 29, 38). It was this insight which qualified Jesus to be the Good Shepherd, who knows every member of His flock, calling it by name and dealing with it in accordance with its individual characteristics (x. 3, 14, 27; cf. i. 42, xx. 16). The way in which John treats prophecy and prediction throughout the Gospel proves that he is not like Matthew an apologetic historian, much less a speculative religious philosopher, but the pastor and spiritual guide of his readers.

11. (P. 321.) The negative answer in John i. 21, 25 to the question as to whether John is Elijah, which in the light of Matt. xi. 10, 14, xvii. 10-13; Mark i. 2, ix. 11-13; Luke vii. 27, seems remarkable, is no absolute answer; since in John iii. 28 John speaks of himself as the one prophesied in Mal. iii. 1, hence as Elijah (Mal. iii. 23). Moreover, the principal mission which in i. 31 he ascribes to himself is, according to the doctrine of the Jewish schools, that of Elijah; cf. Just. Dial. viii. 49; Goldfahn, Justin und die Agada, S. 34 f.; better Weber, Jüd. Theol. § 77. There is also a strong resemblance between John v. 35 and Sirach xlviii. 1. In John i. 21, therefore, the question is answered in the negative only in the superstitious sense in which it was asked (cf. Matt. xvi. 14, xxvii. 47, 49; Mark vi. 15, viii. 28, xv. 35 f.); on the other hand, it is affirmed in the sense of Luke i. 17. John was also obliged in i. 21, 25 to answer in the negative the question as to whether he was the prophet; because this idea was used in connection with that of the Messiah, without a clear distinction being made between them, and might easily be confused with the latter (vi. 14 f., vii. 40).

12. (P. 323.) It is true that in Acts xix. 1-7 nothing is said about "disciples of John," simply disciples being mentioned, i.e. according to the usage of Acts, believing worshippers of Jesus, i.e. Christians. But since prior to the time when Paul came to Ephesus they had not received the baptism of the Church, and knew nothing of a baptism followed by the gift of the Holy Spirit, their Christianity was independent of the Church and preceded it. They could have received the baptism of John only from John the Baptist himself, or possibly, since we are informed in John iii. 22-iv. 2 that the baptism of John was used by the disciples of Jesus, from the latter; they had not prior to this time been members of a Christian Church, into which no one was received without Christian baptism at the hands of the Church. It is not distinctly stated in xviii. 25 that Apollos likewise had received the baptism of John, and hence it is not expressly stated that he afterwards received the baptism of the Church. But he also represents a form of Christianity earlier than the Church (vol. i. 262). When he came to Ephesus, he was familiar only with the baptism of John, and therefore knew nothing of the Church and its baptism. Moreover, his knowledge of the Christian teaching needed to be completed by Aquila. If these statements of Luke be correct, then faith in Jesus and a relatively accurate knowledge of His history (Acts xviii. 25, ἀκριβῶς) must have reached Alexandria (xviii. 24) and Ephesus prior to the time of Acts ii. 1, 38, and possibly even before the death of Jesus, through Jews who in Palestine had come to believe the preaching of John the Baptist and the testimony of Jesus to Himself, perhaps through visitors at the feasts from the Diaspora (Luke xxiii. 26, xxiv. 18; Acts xxi. 25). The danger, which lay in this form of Christianity unrelated to the Church, was averted by Paul and his friends in the case of the twelve disciples at Ephesus and of Apollos. We do not know whether this was true also in the case of all those at Ephesus and elsewhere related in the same or a similar manner to Jesus and His Church. Whether this happened in the case of the disciples of John in Palestine, who in Jesus' own time kept themselves separate from Him (Matt. ix. 14 ff.; John iii. 25 ff.), is even more uncertain. Reference may be made here to 1 John ii. 19, according to which the connection of certain errorists with the Christian Church seems from the first not to have been beyond question. Furthermore, it is not at all impossible that the confused statements concerning a connection between the followers of the Baptist and the semi-Christian adherents of Simon Magus and Dositheus have some basis in fact (Clem. Hom. ii. 22-24; Recogn. i. 54, 60, ii. 7-12). Moreover, the Mandæans or Sabians, with their worship of the prophet John, the son of Zachariah, and their anti-Christian system are probably only the Eastern descendants of a Palestinian gnosis which appealed to the authority of the Baptist, and rejected the Messiahship of Jesus, although they may have adopted many Babylonian elements into their system. This is not the place in which to dispute the assertions of Baldensperger, which overshoot the mark, Der Prolog. des 4. Ev. sein apologetisch polemischer Zweck, 1898.

13. (Pp. 324, 325.) In John iv. 4, ἔδει (cf. Luke xi. 42, xix. 5, xxii. 7) means little more than ἔθος ἦν in Jos. Ant. xxii. 6. 1, referring to the same route; cf. Bell. ii. 12. 3; Vita, 52 (ἔδει for those who desired to travel rapidly), also the remarkable parallels to John iv. in Bereshith Rabba, chaps. xxxiii. and lxxxi. (trans. by Wunsche, S. 141, 398). Jesus Himself would have travelled through Samaria on His last journey to Jerusalem, if the Samaritans had been willing to furnish Him lodging (Luke ix. 51-56, above, p. 89 f. n. 19). The strong expression in John iv. 4, which is not, however, to be pressed too far, is chosen, in order to emphasise the fact that Jesus travelled through Samaria without any intention of working there, and met with unexpected success, which astonished even Him. It is uncertain whether οὐ γὰρ ἀνερχόμενοι Ἰουδαίῳ Σαμαρείταις in iv. 9 is to be omitted, with ⁸D a b c, or to be retained, as in all other MSS. (including the contemporary first corrector of ⁸, also Se Ss, and probably therefore also Tatian, Forsch. i. 159). The classical brevity of the insertion is in favour of its genuineness. Strong evidence to the effect that John continued to live entirely under the influence of home surroundings and opinions, is to be found in the fact that he sometimes omits an explanation, where it would seem to be very necessary. To John himself the name Bethesda (v. 2, cf. ver. 42) is important, because of the meaning of the word (vol. i. 28, n. 15), and he recalls the connection between the ceremony of the seventh day of the feast of Tabernacles and the words spoken by Jesus on this day, vii. 37 f.; but in neither case does he take the trouble to make these relations clear to his readers—who were not familiar with them.

14. (P. 324.) From the fact that τῆς Τιβεριάδος (xxi. 2) is alone given as the name of the Lake, it is probably to be concluded that outside of Palestine this name was already the better known. When Jos. Bell. iii. 10. 1 writes, ἡ λίμνη . . . , ἣ καλεῖται Γεννησὰρ πρὸς τῶν ἐπιχωρίων, and Pliny, Historia Naturalis, v. 71, Pacum quem plures genesarum vocant, it is equivalent to saying that alongside of this name another, or many such, were used. According to Pliny, loc. cit., the Lake bore among other names also that of the town Turichea. Matthew and Mark use only ἡ θάλασσα τῆς Γαλιλαίας, although they know Γεννησαρέτ as the name of the country (Matt. xiv. 34; Mark vi. 53). Of the Gospels only Luke in v. 1 has ἡ λίμνη Γεννησαρέτ; Jos. with or without λίμνη, regularly ἡ Γεννησάρ (Bell. ii. 20. 6, iii. 10. 1, x. 7 and 8), and in the later writings the Hellenised form ἡ Γεννησαρίς or Γεννησαρίτις, Ant. v. 1. 22, xviii. 2. 1 and 3; Vita, 65 (Niese, 349). With this, however, we read in his Bell., published between 75 and 79 (iii. 3. 5), μέχρι τῆς πρὸς Τιβεριάδα λίμνης, and (iv. 8. 2) twice ἡ Τιβεριέων (sc. λίμνη), corresponding to the Talmudic כְּנֶסֶת הַיָּם. The translation of John is more exact than the circumlocutions of Josephus.

§ 69. INTEGRITY, DATE OF COMPOSITION, AND GENUINENESS OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.

One of the principal causes for the degeneracy of the text of the earlier Gospels is practically non-existent as far as the Fourth Gospel is concerned, namely, the irresistible tendency to make similar accounts resemble one another yet more closely. The thoroughly distinctive character of the Gospel prevented confusion of its text with that of the Synoptics. It is more natural to suppose that such details as the inscription over the cross in three languages (xix. 20, xxiv. 34), the notice of the casting of lots for the coat, and the piercing of Jesus' side with a spear, were inserted in the Synoptics (Matt. xxvii. 35, 49; Luke xxiii. 38) from John, than that John's Gospel was enriched by citations from them, although early changes in the text of John made on the basis of the Synoptics are not wanting (e.g. i. 34, vi. 69). More frequently changes in the original text are due to the boldness of John's thought or the awkwardness of his language (n. 1). There are also early glosses which became widely current (n. 2), and one undeniable interpolation which came to be almost universally regarded as a part of the Fourth Gospel (vii. 53–viii. 11, n. 3). The main reason why the work of the original author has been preserved practically intact is the fact, it was intended originally for the Church, and so was read in the congregations. In this respect it had the advantage of the letters sent by the apostles to the Churches (vol. i. 159), to which the two addresses to the readers which it contains give it a certain resemblance. The attempts to distinguish the later elements in the Gospel have proved illuminating only to those who have undertaken their separation (n. 4), while the assumption that disorder of sequence has been created in the Gospel through the accidental misplacing and loss of leaves, presupposes so many unlikely accidents (n. 5) that attention need only be called to it in a text-book.

The investigation of the supplement (§ 66) has shown that this, and consequently the entire Gospel, could not have been written after the year 100. With this conclusion agrees the entire Church tradition, which even the ancient deniers of the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel did not venture to reject (above, pp. 177 f., 180). On the other hand, the supplement could not have been written before the death of Peter, and we saw that it seemed probable that a number of years elapsed after 64 and 70 before it was written (above, p. 240 f.), a Terminus a quo determined wholly on exegetical grounds, but, like the Terminus ad quem, confirmed by the unanimous tradition. Now, it is possible that, while the composition of chap. xxi. certainly belongs later than the year 70, chaps. i.–xx. were written considerably earlier. But the history of the book shows that prior to the addition of the supplement it was confined to a very small group of readers, so that only a short interval could have intervened between the composition of chaps. i.–xx. and chap. xxi. This conclusion is confirmed by the investigation of the relation of chaps. i.-xx. to the Synoptics (§ 67), as a result of which we were compelled to bring the composition of the entire book down to the year 75, probably to some time between 80 and 90. This statement may be regarded as proved, until the representatives of other views discuss more fundamentally than they have done heretofore the proofs for the statement derived from tradition, the book itself, and comparative criticism. The attempt has been made frequently, but manifestly without warrant, to prove from the present tense in v. 2 that the Gospel of John was written before the year 60 (n. 6). Much more frequently a later composition of the Gospel has been assumed, always in consequence of the denial of its composition by the apostle John.

That for a hundred years the question of the genuineness of this Gospel should have been discussed zealously, even heatedly, without any resulting agreement among otherwise capable critics, is comprehensible and almost self-evident (n. 7). The contents of the book and its demands upon the reader are too great for it to be otherwise. Since the second century we have had exaggerated representations of its peculiarities; speculations and mysteries foreign to it have been found in it; though there are not lacking more sober treatments of the Gospel, which establish beyond question its unique place among the books of the N.T. In this Gospel alone do we find an historical scheme of the work of Jesus, which enables us to arrange the material supplied by the other tradition, and which gives us a picture of the development of events in the history of the world of the utmost significance for religion, and so for mankind. And this scheme is filled out with detail, which to the intelligence limited to the things of ordinary experience must seem a priori to be merely fantastic inventions, but which through all the centuries of the Gospel's existence have been received by multitudes of both wise and foolish men as disclosures of truth essential for life and death, and held to with glowing love. Here are deeds which defy every attempt to bring them under the laws of action which are daily observed and commonly accepted; sayings of Jesus which cannot be derived by inference from other sayings attributed to Him by tradition. And all this makes a stronger claim to historical trustworthiness than does any other account of Jesus' life. The Gospels of Mark and Luke were put forth as the writings of disciples of the apostles, reproducing not what the authors themselves had experienced, but the accounts of others. There is nothing in Matthew which indicates a direct personal relation between the author and the contents of his book, and not only does his book lack clear personal testimony of the author, but there is no witness of contemporaries which can be traced back to its origin. On the other hand, the Fourth Gospel contains the personal testimony of its author in the solemn form of an oath (above, p. 217 f.), and at its close is found a testimony to his authorship and truthfulness written in the author's lifetime by friends of his, and made an inseparable part of the original Gospel.

So long as and wherever Christianity is conditioned by what Jesus was, and did, and taught, it will be conditioned also by the answer given to the question concerning the genuineness, and consequently the trustworthiness, of this Gospel. Among thoughtful persons there are only a few who admit that the book was written by an eye-witness and apostle, and yet deny its trustworthiness in essential points (n. 8). A writer who makes truthfulness the condition of all knowledge of the truth and of the possession of eternal life (i. 47, iii. 20 f., iv. 16-18, xvii. 17, xviii. 37), and declares the Devil to be the father of lies and deceits (vi. 70, viii. 44, xiii. 2, 27), by every attempt made to confirm the personal testimony of i. 14, especially by the tragic retrospect in xii. 37-43, by words of Jesus, xv. 24, and the solemn assurance in xix. 35, would call down upon himself almost unutterable condemnation, if he declared to be deeds and sayings of Jesus things which he knew better than his critics Jesus had never done or said. It is not on purely scientific grounds, therefore, but out of pure necessity, that the majority of those who distrust the historical testimony of the Fourth Gospel on internal grounds deny also its composition by an eye-witness and apostle, and that others, not so decided in their opinions, seek ambiguous compromises in the question of the Gospel's genuineness, by a reinterpretation either of the tradition or of the internal evidence of the Fourth Gospel. The scientific grounds for the denial of the genuineness of the Gospel, either wholly or in part, have been discovered after it has been determined to seek them. The arguments derived from the relation of John to the Synoptics, on the presupposition that the latter are essentially trustworthy, have been answered in § 67 (cf. also § 63). Other arguments based upon a comparison of the Gospel with Revelation, on the presupposition that this is a work by the apostle John, cannot be discussed until Revelation has been investigated. All the other arguments consist of very questionable observations.

It is true that in many sections the narrative lacks the clearness and definiteness which we should expect from an eye-witness. While John shares Mark's tendency to retain the Aramaic form of names and addresses (vol. ii. 502, n. 1, and above, pp. 307 f., 323; below, n. 13), he lacks Mark's pictorial gift. Scenes which begin with a certain amount of definiteness have no conclusion; e.g. the passages iii. 21, v. 47, xx. 23, 29, xxi. 22 (cf. also ii. 20, iii. 36) end with a saying of Jesus instead of a narrative statement, although there is no lack of definiteness in the beginning of these narratives (cf. Matt. xxviii. 16-20). In xiv. 31 nothing is said which indicates that the disciples followed the bidding of Jesus to rise from the table and leave the meal, or the manner in which they did it; but in xvii. 1

(cf. xi. 41) we notice that at that moment Jesus was in the open air. Only by a careful reading of xii. 21-36 do we learn that the request of the Greeks was not granted (xii. 20). The representation of the course of events in vi. 21-24 is very awkward. Where and under what circumstances sayings like xii. 44-50, the beginnings of which (xii. 44, ἔκραξεν) show that they are not unrelated sayings thrown together like Matt. iii. 2, Mark i. 15, were spoken, we are not informed. In other instances, where the beginning lacks the desired definiteness, the name of the place is given farther on in the narrative (i. 28, vi. 59, viii. 20). In this the author does not seem to have any special purpose, e.g., to answer the question which one who heard an oral narrative might ask afterwards as to where the event narrated took place. At the same time, we notice an accuracy of details and a clearness in the delineation of things secondary and unimportant (n. 9) which reveals the vividness of the author's underlying conception. In clear characterisation of the persons who appear (above, pp. 224 f., 302), and in brief original sayings, which are not without a touch of delicate humour and bitter irony (i. 46, iv. 15, vii. 3, 28, 35, 48 f., 52, viii. 19, 22, 48, 57, ix. 20 f., 24-34, xi. 11, 16, xviii. 31, 35, 38, 39, xix. 5, 14, 19, 22), the incidents and conversations in i. 46-50, iv. 6-26, ix. 1-41, xi. 1-44, xviii. 29-xix. 22 are without parallel in narrative literature. The numerous elements which were accustomed to mingle on the occasion of the great feasts in Jerusalem (xviii. 20) are clearly delineated: the natives of Jerusalem (vii. 25); the multitudes of festival pilgrims (vii. 12, 31, 40), who disappeared again (viii. 12-x. 21) when it was over (cf. vii. 37); those non-Jews who came to the feast (xii. 20); the Pharisees who, notwithstanding their contempt for the multitude ignorant of the law (vii. 49, n. 10 end), mingle with it, observing the people's expression of feeling and motives, and dispute with Jesus (i. 24, above, p. 283 f.; iv. 1, vii. 32, 47, viii. 13, ix. 13, 40, xi. 46, xii. 19), in clear distinction from the ruling aristocracy, the high priests, who hold themselves aloof (especially vii. 48, xii. 42). John is aware that the Pharisaic party is practically identical with the guild of the scribes, and dominates in the synagogue (iii. 10 ; cf. vii. 49, xii. 42), although he never mentions the scribes (n. 10). He also knows that they are represented in the Sanhedrin along with the ruling party (iii. 1, vii. 47, 50). They have an interest in the religious movement set on foot by the Baptist and Jesus, which is prompted by religious motives, but they are able to take practical steps to regulate this movement only by bringing the observations which they have made among the people before the Sanhedrin, which then takes action, issues orders for arrests, and gives other directions (vii. 32, 45, ix. 22, xi. 46-53, 57, xii. 10, xviii. 3, 12-28). The moral influence of the Pharisees is greater in the Sanhedrin than that of the high priests (xii. 42), but the latter have more political courage. It is the ruling high priest who suggests that Jesus be got rid of, and how this may be done (xi. 49). In similar decisions with reference to Lazarus (xii. 10), and in the prosecution of the matter before Pilate, in which all law and all of Israel's religious hope were trampled under foot, the Pharisees do not seem to have had part. Only the high priests and their servants are represented as speaking (xix. 6, 12-15, 21). It needed only the skill of an historian, which John lacks, to create out of such material a monument of historical art ; and it needed only a slightly poetic temperament, which John also lacks, to transform narratives like chaps. iv. ix. xi. into engrossing romances, and to make out of the material in chaps. vii. xviii.-xix. a thrilling drama. It is just this lack of art, along with accurate knowledge of innumerable small details and a correct historical view, which proves that the author is a Jewish Christian from Palestine and an eye-witness.

It would require learning, which none of the critics of the Fourth Gospel can claim, to convict of ignorance on these very points the author, who occasionally informs his readers who are not Jews and who do not live in Palestine, of the location of places in his native land and of the customs of his people (above, p. 324). The opinion that he is not well informed with regard to geographical matters (n. 11) and political conditions in Palestine in the time of Jesus (n. 12) cannot be established. It is likely to become gradually more and more clear that it is better for us to learn from John with regard to these matters, rather than to criticise him without knowledge superior to his own. As evidenced by the Hebrew and Aramaic words and names which he retains, he, like Mark, is familiar with the language of his people. Nor does he, in translating these terms, make such mistakes as are to be found in the Greek Matthew and even in Luke (n. 13), e.g. in his translation of the name of Iscariot (n. 11). In his use of the Greek language also he betrays his Hebrew origin. While the book in respect of vocabulary, grammar, and style has a thoroughly unified character, and shows nothing of the patchwork of both of Luke's books (above, pp. 79, 104), the character of the language of the Fourth Gospel proves with complete certainty that it cannot have been written (n. 14) either by a Greek or by a Hellenist in the narrow meaning of the word (vol. i. 39 f.). Only a very one-sided and short-sighted comparison with certain stylistic peculiarities of the Book of Revelation, such as Dionysius of Alexandria made (Eus. H. E. vii. 25. 25 f.), could lead to a misunderstanding of this fact. The author's knowledge of the O.T. is not confined to the LXX, which he generally follows (n. 15). The peculiar use of the term οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι has been thought to betray the non-Jewish character of the author. However, (1) those passages must be left out of account in which the Jewish author informs his non-Jewish readers concerning Jewish customs, conditions, and feasts which are unknown to them, or which are feasts and customs foreign to their usage (ii. 6, 13, v. 1, vi. 4 vii. 2, xix. 40, 42). Mark, who was a native of Jerusalem (vii. 3), and Josephus uniformly use the same expression. Furthermore, (2) those passages must be left out of account where the author or those whom he represents as speaking contrast Jews with Samaritans or Romans (iv. 9, 22, xviii. 35, and throughout the entire section xviii. 31–xix. 21). More peculiar is (3) the use of the term for the political organisation of the Jewish people and their official representatives. In many passages Sanhedrin might be substituted for οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι, or it might be replaced by τὸ κοινὸν τῶν Ἰουδαίων, as in Josephus. This is clearly possible in i. 19, vii. 13, ix. 22, xviii. 12, 14, xix. 31, 38, xx. 19. Then connected therewith are (4) other passages where not the whole Sanhedrin, but members of it and official persons of high rank, such as the commandant of the temple, must be understood: ii. 18, 20, v. 10, 15–18, vii. 1, 11, 15 (cf. vii. 19? vii. 35, viii. 22–31, cf. vv. 40, 48, 52, 57, x. 24, 31, 33, xi. 8?). Finally, (5) there are a number of passages where the term is used to designate the majority of the people who do not yet believe on Jesus, or who are already pronounced unbelievers, as contrasted with Himself and the group of disciples gathered about Him, the future Church. In addition to the passages placed in brackets above, which evidently belong here, are to be reckoned in this class x. 19, xi. 19, 31, 33, 36, xii. 9, 11, also vi. 41, 52, where in the course of the narrative, Galileans, who are increasingly irritated with Jesus, are called Jews; likewise viii. 48–57, where after viii. 30, 31 the occurrence of the term is surprising, and ix. 18 where it seems to be equivalent to Φαρισαῖοι. In all these instances the narrator is speaking from the point of view of himself and his readers, just as the Jew, Paul, does when writing to Gentile Christians (2 Cor. xi. 24; 1 Thess. ii. 14; cf. 1 Cor. ix. 20), and the Jew, Matthew, writing in Palestine (xxviii. 15). The first passages which are really peculiar are those in which John represents Jesus as using this term in speaking to the disciples (xiii. 33; with regard to xviii. 20, 36, see n. 16). Even if it could be proved, which is not the case, that for the sake of clearness John represents Jesus as using a term for His enemies which was not used by Christians of Jewish and Gentile origin until after the organisation of the Church, it would not at all follow that the author was not a thorough Hebrew. Even according to the Synoptics, one of the inevitable results of Jesus' contest with Pharisaism and official Judaism was His treatment of His disciples as a body of men separated from Israel (Matt. v. 11 f., x. 16-42, xvi. 17-21, xvii. 24-27, xviii. 15-20, xxi. 40-46; Luke xii. 32). But inasmuch as John sets forth the entire development of the contest with official Judaism in Jerusalem, intimating it in i. 19 and entering into it fully from ii. 13 onwards, we find in his Gospel severe words which do not occur in the Synoptics. John also represents Jesus as acknowledging the absolute authority of the Scriptures, which justify His claims (x. 35, v. 39, 46, xiii. 18, xv. 25); Jesus never admitted that He had broken the law of Moses (v. 17-47, vii. 19-24); it is not simply among Samaritans that He feels Himself a Jew (iv. 22). He delights in true Israelites, whose king He is (i. 47, 49), and is faithful to His own people (i. 11) even unto death (above, p. 308). But when in opposition to Him who holds the law to be sacred, they appeal to their law, or plead their descent from Abraham against His religious and moral demands, or meet His offers of grace with declarations of what Moses gave to their fathers (v. 45, vi. 31, viii. 33 ff.), He gives them back their own language, and says, "your father" (vi. 49), "your father Abraham" (viii. 56), and "your law" (viii. 17, x. 34, xv. 25). All this is in keeping with the prophetic announcement from the beginning. Anyone who is unable to comprehend historically such words spoken by a messenger of God in the struggle with His people must necessarily regard Isaiah as opposed in principle to the whole temple cultus (Isa. i. 10-20), and must explain such words as those of the Baptist in Matt. iii 7-9, Luke iii. 7-8 as inventions of the Gentile Christian Church.

The naïve manner in which John mentions the friendly relationship between himself and Jesus, and substitutes it for his personal name, which is never employed, has been criticised. With reference to this point, it is to be observed that the modesty characteristic of modern writings is no more a certain guarantee of the correctness of their contents than the naïveness of ancient writings is of theirs. There is not a word in the Fourth Gospel that gives the impression of self-exaltation, such as Paul does not seriously attempt to avoid in 1 Cor. xv. 10 and elsewhere. What the author as briefly as possible says of himself in xiii. 23, xix. 26, xx. 2, could have been said equally well by Lazarus, Mary, and Martha, who were not distinguished persons (xi. 3, 5, 11, 36). Such a personal friendship is not conditioned by an exceptionally high grade of moral and religious qualities. There is no evidence of any prominent position occupied by John among the disciples. Apart from the statement of his call in i. 35 ff., unnoticed by many, John does not let himself appear until xiii. 23, whereas reference is made to the future significance of Peter for the Church as early as i. 42 (cf. xxi. 15-27). In vi. 68 f. Peter is the great confessor, as in the Synoptics. It is true that John represents him, as do the Synoptists, as the impetuous disciple, whose zeal outruns his discretion, and who is deeply penitent for his failings (xiii. 6-10, 36-38, xviii. 10-11, 15-27). But it is not sound critical judgment which finds in the race between Peter and John, in which the younger disciple outruns the older one (xx. 1-8), an expression of rivalry between these two apostles. That there were such rivalries among the apostles to the very end is proved by Matt. xviii. 1, xx. 20-28 ; Mark ix. 33 ff., x. 35-45 ; Luke xxii. 24-32. There is only a hint of it in John xiii. 12-17 and in the πλέον of xxi. 15. Moreover, it is this very supplement, added with John's knowledge and consent, which proves that after the death of Jesus all petty jealousy was banished from the apostolic circle.

The question as to the literal trustworthiness of the discourses of Jesus which are contained in the Fourth Gospel—a question which cannot be answered categorically even in the Synoptics—is to be distinguished from the question as to the origin of this Gospel. If the book was written between the years 80 and 90 (above, p. 334 f.), it seems hardly likely that one who heard the longer discourses of Jesus should retain an exact recollection of them for so long. Here, in the first place, due weight must be given to those considerations which explain in a general way the persistence of gospel traditions for decades (vol. ii. 418 f.). In the second place, a man who between the ages of twenty and twenty-five years received impressions which determined the whole course of his life, would know just as much about them at eighty, if he remains in full possession of his faculties, as twenty years earlier, particularly if it had been his vocation for fifty years to testify orally concerning what he had seen and heard when he was with Jesus (1 John i. 1-3). The difference between the discourses in John and in the Synoptics, and the resemblance of the former to the language of 1 John, do not prove that John's report of them is unfaithful. The latter merely shows that in him more than in others the "words of eternal life," which bound the author to Jesus, especially those words which Jesus spoke to His disciples, had been transformed into flesh and blood. With reference to the comparison between the discourses in John and in the Synoptics, there are sayings in the latter which no one would feel to be out of place in John (n. 17). Moreover, by correct exegesis there is much that can be discarded from the discourses of Jesus, such as speculative ideas and colourless generalities, which false interpretation has introduced into them. Finally, regard must be had to the esoteric character of this book, due to the fact that the Fourth Gospel was written for persons who had long been believers, and manifesting itself in the choice of the discourses to be recorded. How much freedom John allowed himself in the reproduction of the discourses it is not possible to determine exactly and in detail (n. 18). Whoever assumes that John used a large degree of liberty, must remember that this is more natural in the case of one who has heard and who feels certain that he is in possession of the essential historical truth, than in the case of one farther removed, who is dependent upon the accounts of those who heard, i.e. that it would be more natural for the apostles John and Matthew than for Mark and Luke, who were disciples of apostles.

1. (P. 333.) Examples of early and widely current alterations in the text are found in i. 18 (above, p. 326, n. 3), i. 34 (above, p. 284, n. 2), ii. 3 (there is no reason why the critics should question for an instant the originality of the genuine Semitic text, S [D defective] S³ [cf. also Adler, de Verss. Syr. p. 57; Se Ss are defective], and of the best Latin MSS.); iii. 34 (all changes from S, such as the addition of ὁ θεός and the omission of πνεῦμα, the complete alteration of the text found in Ss, are due to the failure to recognise that τὸ πνεῦμα is the subject); v. 36: μεῖζων ABE, etc., is harsh and hard to invent; even if μεῖζω (cf. i. 50), which superficially considered seems more satisfactory, or μεῖζονα be the correct reading, on account of the article before μαρτυρίαν and the contrast between ἐκεῖνος, ver. 35, and ἐγώ, ver. 36, the passage cannot mean: "I have a greater witness than that which John gave concerning Me," but must signify, "I possess the (requisite) witness for Myself in greater measure than did John for himself." Jesus refuses to appeal to the testimony of John in ver. 33 f.; and in ver. 35 John is not regarded as a witness for Jesus, but with Jesus is treated as a medium of revelation. Accepting the reading μεῖζων, the passage means: I, a greater personality than John, possess the (one, the only witness to be considered) witness (of God)" (see above, p. 322 f.).

2. (P. 334.) Whether iv. 9b is an interpolation or not is uncertain (above, p. 332, n. 13). This is certainly true of v. 3b, ἐκδεχομένων—κίνησαν, and v. 4. In addition to the strong external evidence against both additions is the fact that this must have been a welcome explanation of ver. 7, and contains nothing out of harmony with ideas about angels held by the early Church. On the other hand, the additions certainly go back to an early date. Ver. 4 was already part of the Greek text used by Tertullian (de Bapt. v.), and he explained κατὰ καιρὸν to mean "one each year"; cf. Didymus and Cyril in Tischend. 785, and Theophil. (Lat.), Forsch. ii. 81, 215, the last having also τὴν τοῦ ὕδατος κίνησιν from ver. 3. Moreover, the gloss is thoroughly Jewish; cf. Lightfoot, Hor. Hebr., ad loc.; Weber, Jud. Theol. §34; Rev. xvi. 5. Possibly it is one of Papias' comments; cf. note 3.

3. (P. 334.) With regard to vii. 53–viii. 11 the following remarks will suffice: (1) a distinction is to be made between witnesses for the existence of the story and witnesses which make it part of the Fourth Gospel. To the first only belongs the Didascalia, chap. vii. end (Syr., ed. Lagarde, p. 31; Lat., ed. Hauler, xxiv. 15–22 = Const. ap. ii. 24); because this third century work contains much apocryphal material and the length at which this story is reproduced (in the Greek recension even more noticeable because of the brevity with which a reference to Luke vii. 36 f. is here inserted) shows that it was not derived from one of the canonical Gospels. The story is very old, and could be read in various books not directly dependent upon each other. Unless all signs fail, it was to be found in Papias and in the Gospel to the Hebrews (Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16; GK, ii. 703 f.). In and of itself, and because of the analogy to Mark xvi. 9–20 (vol. ii. 478), it is very probable that the passage was inserted in the N.T. from Papias. Probably it is one of those apostolic traditions which Papias inserted in connection with his interpretations of the sayings of Jesus, most likely in connection with John vii. 24 and viii. 15, so that those who gave it its present place in the Gospel were perhaps influenced by their source, the work of Papias. This location would be also favoured by the fine contrast between this passage and the illegal proceedings of the session of the Sanhedrin in vii. 45–52. There is no reason why the story itself should not be regarded as historical. (2) The earliest witnesses for the location of the passage before viii. 12 are Lat. MSS. from the fourth century onwards; of the Greek MSS. the earliest witness is D (sixth cent.). The Syrians (Tatian, Sc Ss S¹ S³) for a long time knew nothing of the passage. It was not until the sixth century that it was made accessible to them by various translations; cf. Forsch. i. 190; Gwynn, Transact. of the Irish Acad. (1886) xxvii. 8, pp. 17–24; Nestle, *PRÆ*³, iii. 174. The passage is certainly no part of the Fourth Gospel; in the first place, because the Gospel to the Hebrews, in which it occurs, contains no other material in common with John; and, in the second place, it is not likely that Papias would have repeated an entire story of this kind if it were already in the Fourth Gospel (above, p. 196), which was known to him. Moreover, the possible moral danger arising from the story is not sufficient to explain its disappearance from the oldest Greek MSS., and the fact that it was wanting originally in all the forms of the Syriac versions. Direct evidence of the spurious character of the passage is to be found also in the fact that its position is very uncertain. In the early MS., now lost, represented by the Ferrar group of cursives (13, 69, 124, 346, etc.), it was inserted after Luke xxi. 38, where the location indicated in viii. 1, 2 made it seem natural; in other cursives and Armenian MSS. it is appended to John xxi. Even if the latter position be due to the fact that it was found before John viii. 12, recognised as suspicious or spurious, and removed to the end of the Gospel because of unwillingness to omit it altogether, this does not explain its location following Luke xxi. 38. Finally, the language shows that the passage is not Johannine. The Synoptic expression αἱ γραμματεῖς καὶ Φαρισαῖοι in viii. 3 is entirely foreign to the Gospel of John, notwithstanding the frequent occasions when it might have been used. Also ἐπ' αὐτοφώρῳ, ἀναμάρτητος, ἐλεγχόμενοι ὑπὸ τῆς συνειδήσεως are likewise not Johannine. The opinion advocated by Spitta (note 5), S. 197 f., following the suggestion of other writers,—that a genuine passage has fallen out between vii. 52 and viii. 12 and has been replaced by an apocryphal story, is untenable. For how does it happen then that the earliest MSS. ABC, etc., Origen, Eusebius (who if this were known to him could not have written as he does regarding Papias), certainly also Tertullian and the Syrian writers until the sixth century, know nothing of either the genuine or the spurious passage? The situation is practically the same as in Mark xvi. 9–20, save that the connection between John vii. 53–viii. 11 and the Gospel of John cannot, as Spitta maintains, be traced back into the second century, but only into the fourth. The oldest witness for this passage is Ambrosius; to counterbalance the Verona MS. b, in which the passage was written by the first copyist, and crossed out by a later hand, there is the Verc. MS. a (fourth or fifth cent.) of equal age, which does not have it.

4. (P. 334.) DELFF's interpolation hypothesis (above, p. 230) follows in part that of SCHWEIZER (Das Ev. Jo. nach seinem inneren Wert unters. 1841), who likewise cuts out the Galilean sections and with these the crudest of the miracles. TOBLER (Ev. Jo. nach dem Grundtext, 1867) demonstrates ad oculos an extremely brief ur-John. H. H. WENDT (Lehre Jesu, 1886, i. 215–342; in a more extended and improved form, Das Johannesev. 1900) has attempted to cull out an original writing of the apostle John, which in essentials was a collection of sayings to be compared with the mythical "Logia." In a way similar to that in which the authors of our first and third Gospels compiled their books out of the "Logia" and an original writing of a more historical character, a Christian of Asia Minor (circa 100–125) prepared the Fourth Gospel out of this Johannine collection of sayings by means of an independent and comprehensive recasting of the material, namely, by the insertion of stories of miracles, which were drawn partly from narrations of the apostle John which had been misunderstood, and partly from the earlier synoptic tradition (ii. 1–12, vi. 1–26, ix. 2–3, 6–38, xi. 39–xii. 19). The additions of the editor are not to be called interpolations, and one is not to be provoked with him on account of the awkward interpretations and the bold transpositions. We are rather, even to-day, to be grateful to him, that by means of the awkwardness of his recasting of the material he has made it possible for the critic to free the alone trustworthy witness of the apostle John from the deceptive covering.

5. (P. 334.) SPITTA, Zur Gesch. u. Lit. des Urchristent. i. (1893) S. 155–204, "Über Unordnungen im Text des 4. Ev.," discussing disarrangements in the text of the Fourth Gospel, believes that such disarrangements can be proved; (1) xviii. 12–28, he thinks, should be arranged as follows: verses 12, 13, 19–23, 24, 14, 15–18, 25b, 27, 28. In a measure this agrees with Ss, i.e. probably Tatian (Thlb., 1895, col. 20 f.), whose order is verses 12, 13, 24, 14–15, 19–23, 16–18, 25–28, and the motives for this rearrangement are in part the same as those which clearly influenced the first harmonist. (2) According to Spitta, the section xiii.-xvii. was originally arranged as follows :—xiii. 1-31a, xv.-xvi., xiii. 31b-xiv. 31, xvii. Moreover, after xiii. 31a a passage dealing with the institution of the Lord's Supper has been omitted. (3) A page has been omitted between xii. 52 and viii. 12 (see above, note 3). (4) vii. 15-24 belongs after v. 47. Furthermore, inquiring how these disarrangements arose, Spitta reaches the conclusion that the book restored by the removal of these disarrangements was itself the alteration of an original work (S. 184, 185, 202), differing from its original, for example, by the insertion of vi. 51-59 (S. 218 in the essay on the Lord's Supper). The observations upon which this hypothesis is based are attractive only in the case of chaps. xiii.-xvii. But the explanation of the disarrangements in the text is not satisfactory. In xviii. 12-28 we are supposed to have the mistake of a copyist, whose eye skipped from the end of ver. 13 to the end of ver. 24, between which in the original stood vv. 19-23. Without noticing his mistake, he copied ver. 14 which stood after ver. 24, and what followed in the original, namely, vv. 15-18. In the midst of the story of the denial he discovered his mistake and added the omitted verses, 19-24. In other words, he consciously inserted them in the story of the denial, the conclusion of which he was able to record only by inserting ver. 25a which he himself composed. This writer did not, therefore, belong to the familiar species of librarii oscitantes, but was an extremely smart and devil-may-care sort of fellow. To such a man as this was intrusted the production of the archetype of all later copies of the Gospel, the fair copy of a book intended for the use of the Church, and no correction of the text was deemed necessary. The displacement of vii. 15-24 was due to an equally bold procedure, only here the disarrangement was not due, as in the case of xiii.-xvii., to the wandering of a scribe's eye from one passage to another on a sheet before him, but to the displacement of the sheets, which the scribe subsequently noticed and tried to conceal. This might readily happen, if it were a case of the original construction of the book, the transcription of the text from the schedula and pagulae of the author to a roll, although one is astonished at the carelessness of a writer who permitted his work to be thus misborn. But, according to Spitta, the scribe to whom the Church owes the Fourth Gospel had before him a book which from a literary point of view was already complete, this work being in its turn the working over of an earlier original. Even Spitta is not able to assume that the copy which the scribe used had accidentally fallen apart (S. 182 f.). Neither has he succeeded in showing that published books were circulated in separate sheets not yet fastened together in a roll, which were intrusted to scribes for copying. Ulpian (Dig. xxxii. 52. 5) certainly means by libri nondum conglutinati vel emendati, books in the process of being made, i.e. manuscripts more or less complete, which, however, must first be fastened together, and have errors of the copyist corrected, before they could be published. In such an instance it is necessary to make peculiar negligence on the part of the emendator (διορθωτής) and on the part of the author himself the basis of the entire literary history of the Fourth Gospel; and in the other very improbable case, assumed by Spitta, we are met by the strange circumstance that all correct copies of the book have disappeared, and that all the copies used in the church were based upon a copy as carelessly and as boldly constructed as his assumption calls for. A commentary would be necessary in order to set forth the internal reasons for this and similar hypotheses.

6. (P. 335.) Bengel in his Gnomon on ἔσται in v. 2 says: Scriptis Joannes ante vastationem urbis. This is the position taken earlier by Lampe and recently by Wuttig, S. 28. In the first place, we are by no means justified in concluding from the brief description in Jos. Bell. vii. 1. 1 that no building remained standing in Jerusalem. In the second place, it would be just as reasonable to conclude from John xi. 18 that Bethany and Jerusalem had disappeared when John wrote, especially in view of the fact that this information is not, like iv. 6, xviii. 1, xix. 41, a part of the narrative, introduced in the past tense after the fashion of popular story-telling, notwithstanding the continued existence of Jacob's well and of the two gardens near Jerusalem; but as a matter of fact it is a paranthetical remark of the author, intended to make xi. 19, 31, 45 f., xii. 9-11 clear to the readers. In the third place, as a general rule such conclusions are not to be drawn from remarks of this kind (vol. ii. 340, n. 13 on Heb.). Josephus (Bell. v. 1-4) regularly uses the imperfect with reference to buildings and even localities not affected at all or not essentially changed by the destruction of Jerusalem (e.g. the towers Hippicus, Phasaël, and Mariamne, which Josephus himself tells us, Bell. vii. 1. 1, remained undamaged, τετράγωνος ἦν, etc.), the imperfect tense is used in the entire account (τρίτος ἦν λόφος, περιείχοντο, ἐκαλείτο [not only ὑπὸ Δαβίδου but also πρὸς ἡμῶν], ἐκαλοῦμεν, ἐκάλουν). But he uses also ὃν καλοῦσιν Ὀφλάς (Niese, § 145), ὃς καλεῖται Βεζεθαῖ (§ 149), and again ἐκλήθη δὲ ἐπιχωρίως Βεζεθαῖ. Gebhardt (Die Abfassungszeit des Joev. 1906), who is of the opinion that John i.-xx. were written in Ephesus about 65, and chap. xxi. about 67, uses the fact that the destruction of Jerusalem is not mentioned (S. 21, 32 f.) as proof for so early a date. As if Matt. and Luke give "detailed descriptions" of this event, and as if the destruction of the temple were not just as surely prophesied in John ii. 19 as in the Synoptics (see above, p. 156). With reference to the unsupported assumptions of Delff and Cassell, see above, pp. 228, 230.

7. (P. 335.) A review of attacks upon the genuineness of the Fourth Gospel is to be found in LUTHARDT (Der joh. Ursprung des 4. Ev. 1874, S. 6-34). A more detailed review, complete to 1890, is to be found in WATKINS' Modern Criticism in its relation to the Fourth Gospel, Bampton Lectures, 1890, especially pp. 187-413. SANDAY, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, 1905 (Lectures delivered in the autumn of 1904 in New York). Among the latest opponents of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel may be mentioned: KREYENBÜHL, Das Ev. der Wahrheit, i. ii. 1900, 1905, who has used about 1600 pages to prove the statement that the Fourth Gospel is nothing other than the evangelium veritatis of the Valentinians (Iren. iii. 11. 9), and that its author is Menander, the disciple of Simon Magus, in Antioch (Just. Apol. i. 26); also GRILL, Untersuch. über die Entstehung des 4. Ev.; 1 Teil, 1902, who, to be sure, has not gotten beyond an "Analysis of the Prologue on the basis of a history of ideas," but thinks (S. 384) that he has already made clear to his readers that Baur's date for the Gospel appears to him hardly less tenable than that of Harnack. Finally, WREDE, Charakter und Tendenz des Johannes ev. 1903. J. DRUMMOND, An Inquiry into the Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel; and Sanday, in the above mentioned lectures, 1905, calmly give apologies for the genuineness of the Gospel, which weigh the arguments pro and con.

8. (P. 336.) BAUR's remarks in Krit. Unters. S. 388, that even if the apostle

John were the author of the Fourth Gospel, "We should still have to assume that he had no intention whatever of writing a purely historical Gospel," has little weight, since Baur was of the conviction that John did not write the Gospel. Moreover, none of the four Gospels claims to be "purely historical." They are all writings containing historical material having a religious or didactic purpose. LAGARDE, Verhältnis des deutschen Staats zu Theol., Kirche u. R.L. 1873, S. 31), declares himself convinced that the author of all the Johannine writings in the N.T. "can be none other than the apostle John," and describes this apostle and Peter as the only important disciples of Jesus (S. 30); but at the same time he holds (S. 28-30) the statement that Jesus is the Messiah to be unhistorical and without meaning, declaring John, who by his Gospel desired to convince his readers of the truth of this statement, guilty of "gross exaggerations" (S. 31). WITTICHEN, who in his first work (Der gesch. Charakter des Ev. Jo. 1869) is far from accepting the contents of the Gospel as historically true, nevertheless admits that the book was written between 70 and 80 A.D. by the apostle John. Later, however, he gave up the apostolic authorship of the Gospel (Leben Jesu, 1876, S. viii).

9. (P. 338.) Accurate details are given in i. 35-39 (above, p. 226, n. 8); i. 44 (where mention is made of the home, not of Peter and Andrew and Nathanael, but only of Philip, which may serve incidentally to show how the gospel reached Philip from Jesus, since subsequently Bethsaida is declared to be also the home of Peter and Andrew. In xii. 21, on the other hand, this is not the purpose of the remark, but it is probably intended to distinguish this Philip from the evangelist Philip of Hierapolis, who was known to the readers), ii. 6 (numbers, which do not submit of any symbolical interpretation), ii. 15 f., 20, iii. 23, iv. 18, 28 (the leaving behind of the water-pot), iv. 30 (the picturesque imp. ἡρχομεν, which prepares the way for the parable in iv. 35), iv. 52 (where the mention of the hour as in ver. 53 would have been sufficient), v. 2, vi. 3-12 (above, p. 286, n. 5), vi. 19, 23, vi. 71 (cf. xii. 4, xiii. 2, 26, xiv. 22, the name of the father of Judas and explanation of Iscariot, see n. 11), viii. 48, 57, xi. 30, 44, xii. 1-8 (above, p. 286 f., n. 6), xviii. 1, 10 (cf. ver. 26), xix. 39.

10. (P. 339.) Speaking with reference to the relations of the Jewish parties, Wellhausen (Pharisäer und Sadducäer, 1874, S. 124) says of the Fourth Gospel: "The writer cannot be accused of ignorance of pre-Talmudic Judaism," and rightly emphasises the fact, that John's combination "high priests and Pharisees" (elsewhere only in Matt. xxi. 45, xxvii. 62), while technically incorrect, really describes the facts, and quite agrees with the views and representation of Josephus (S. 42, cf. S. 8, 30). For the distinction between the Pharisees, i. 24, and the embassy of "Jews of Jerusalem," i.e. of the Sanhedrin (i. 19, cf. iii. 28, v. 33), see above, p. 284. The representatives of the Sanhedrin performed their duty without taking any deep interest in the matter, i. 22. The Pharisees inquire as to the basis and justification of the Baptist's work, i. 25. They hate Jesus because in their judgment He is a Sabbath-breaker and a sinner, ix. 16, 24. Back of His miracle, which they carefully examine (ix. 16-34) and do not deny (xi. 47), they suspect some ungodly magic. They speak of political dangers (xi. 48) only in order to win the alliance of the Sadducees, who are indifferent religiously. Especially noteworthy is vii. 49, where ὁ ὄχλος κτλ. reproduces exactly the Jewish עם הארץ ; cf. Weber, Jüd. Theol. § 11 ; Schürer, ii. 387, 400 (Eng. trans. ii. ii. 8. 22).

11. (P. 340.) The present writer must reserve an exhaustive investigation of the geographical statements for his Commentary. Furrer, ZfNTW, 1902, S. 257-265, has given a brief survey. In respect of John vi. 1, where Furrer, S. 261, would cross out either τῆς Τιβεριάδος or τῆς Γαλιλαίας, see above, p. 333. In addition the following is repeated from the second edition of this work : Heracleon as early as 160 A.D. read Βηθανία in i. 28, and this is the reading of nearly all the MSS. of Origen's time, and also of our earlier MSS. But exception was taken to the reading by several writers before Origen, and especially by Origen himself, because there is no place of this name on the Jordan. They read instead Βηθαβαρᾶ, because the traditional place where John baptized was said to have this name (Orig. tom. vi. 40 in Jo. ; Eus. and Hier. De Situ et Nomin. Loc. Hebr., ed. Klostermann (Griechisch-Christliche Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte), p. 58. 18, also Sc Ss, but not Sh). Too much dependence is not to be placed upon local traditions of this sort, as, e.g., the traditions concerning Aenon and Salim in John iii. 23 ; perhaps Bethany could not be located because it was looked for in the wrong place. It need not necessarily have been situated directly on the Jordan, although, according to the Synoptics, John baptized in the Jordan. Possibly it is identical with Betonim, Jos. xiii. 26 (Eus. op. cit. (ed. Klostermann) 48. 11, Βοτνία ἢ καὶ Ποσειν, πέραν τοῦ Ἰορδάνου . . . καὶ εἰσέτι νῦν ὁμοίως ἐν τοῖς τόποις χρηματίζει. Jerome (ed. Klostermann), 103. 14, Bothnin trans Jordanem civitas . . . quæ usque hodie similiter adpellatur). The form of the name seems to have gone through all sorts of changes. Furrer, S. 257, has also come to this conclusion, which he thinks he was the first to discover. Συχάρ, John iv. 4, is not a copyist's mistake for Συχέρμ or Σίκιμα (סכ, so Ss in this place) ; this would have been rendered by John as by Josephus (Bell. iv. 8. 1), Neapolis or Marbatha. Nor is the name an intentional alteration on John's part (Hengstenberg, Komm. S. 244 f. = "Lügenstadt," town of lies). The place is סכר (so in Sh, which shows acquaintance with localities) half an hour east of Sichem (Shechem) on the road from Jerusalem to Galilee, a place still in existence in the fourth century, and plainly distinguished from Sichem (Shechem) by the geographers (Eus. op. cit. 150. 1, and 164. 1) ; a distinction not essentially modified by Jerome, although in another place Interpr. Hebr. Nom., ed. Lagarde, 66. 20, and Quest. Hebr. in Gen. xlviii. 22, he explains Sychar as an early scribal error in John iv. 5. Cf., further, the Pilgrim of the year 333, Itin. Hierosol., ed. Geyer, p. 20. 7 ; Sechar, 1000 paces from Sechim ; Epiph. De Gemmis, Dindorf, iv. 209), probably identical with the Talmudic סכר ; cf. provisionally Delitzsch, ZfLTh, 1856, S. 240 ff., in later times written by the Samaritans with the variant forms יסכר, יסכר, עסכר, עסכר. The present name is Asker or Askar ; cf. Socin-Badeker⁴, S. 245, 251. Because of his familiarity with language and localities, John knows that the synoptic Ἰσκαριώθ, Ἰσκαριώτης means the "man of Kerioth," and that this was the home of Judas' father, Simon, whom John alone mentions. The reading ἀπὸ Καρυώτου is to be recognised as original either wherever it occurs, vi. 71, xii. 4, xiii. 2, 26, xiv. 22, or in some one of these passages whence it has found its way into the others. Who could have invented it ? The place is either Kerioth, Jos. xv. 25, the modern Kureitain (cf. Buhl, Geogr. 182) in Southern Judea, or Kopiat (Jos.

Bell. i. 6. 5; Ant. xiv. 3. 4, 5. 2) in the northernmost extremity of Judea the modern Ḳuriyât or Ḳûriyât; cf. Robinson, Palestine, iii. 301; Wellhausen, Pharisäer, S. 152. With the latter location would agree the tradition recorded by Eusebius (on Isa. xxviii. 1 (Migne, xxiv. col. 284), that Judas belonged to the tribe of Ephraim.

12. (P. 340.) If in xi. 49, 51, xviii. 13, John expressed the idea that the office of high priest changed yearly, and that Caiaphas, who held the office from about 18 to 36 A.D. officiated only during the year of Jesus' death, he would show gross ignorance. But, (1) John does not say that Caiaphas was "the high priest of that year," which especially in this passage, xi. 49, would have to be expressed by ὁ ἀρχ. τ. ἐν. ἐκ. without *ᾧ*ν (cf. Matt. xxvi. 57; John xviii. 33, xix. 19, 21). (2) Nor have the critics shown that Greeks spoke of officials, like consuls and archons, who changed office yearly in the familiar modern fashion ("the champion shot of last year," "the hero of the day," and the combinations with du jour). The years were named after the consuls and archons, not vice versa. (3) One of the most absurd rules is the one given, for example, by A. Buttmann, Ntl. Gr. S. 148 [Eng. trans. p. 170], that the genitive is used to denote only general determinations of time (νυκτός, ἡμέρας, ἀπᾶς τοῦ ἐνιαυτοῦ). Some examples to the contrary are to be found in Kühner-Gerth. i. 386; Winer, § 30. 11. The present writer is able to add the following twenty cases: Gen. xi. 10; Isa. xiv. 28, xx. 1, xxxvi. 1; Jer. i. 2; Dan. i. 1, vii. 1 (LXX, not Theodotion); 1 Macc. iii. 37, vi. 16, 20, vii. 1; Just. Dial. ciii. n. 22; Leucius (Acta Jo. p. 222. 5); Artemid. Oneirocr. v. 12; Herodian, ii. 14. 3, iv. 15. 4, vi. 9. 2, vii. 3. 3, 5. 3, viii. 1. 3 (cf. also Rohde, Griech. Roman, S. 462, A. 2). This temporal genitive does not, like dates with cardinal numerals (ἐπὶ τὰ ἡμερῶν, Herodian, iv. 2. 4; Clem. Hom. iii. 72, vii. 5) denote the period of time within which the statement is to be limited, but means merely that at the time of the event recounted, Caiaphas was high priest, with no implication as to the terminus a quo and terminus ad quem of his high priesthood. John uses τοῦ ἐν. ἐκ., instead of the equally permissible τότε or ἐν ἐκείνῳ τῷ καιρῷ, etc., because he has in mind the fact that the only specific function performed by the high priest took place but once a year (Heb. ix. 7). It was necessary that the man, upon whom devolved the official duty of offering in that same year in his capacity as high priest on the Day of Atonement the legal sin-offering for God's people (Heb. ii. 17, v. 3), should unconsciously prophesy the propitiatory death of Jesus for the salvation of His people and of all children of God in the world. Jesus is the true sin-offering for mankind (1 John ii. 2, iv. 10), just as He is the true Passover lamb (John i. 29). If in John xix. 13 it were said that Pilate placed Jesus on the judgment-seat in order to mock Jesus, or the Jews, or both, the idea expressed would be historically impossible. In all probability the Acts of Pilate, which belong to a very early date, so understood or rather misconstrued the passages from which Just. in Apol. i. 35 confesses that he derived this idea upon which the Gospel of Peter is likewise certainly dependent (cf. the present writer's article on the Gospel of Peter, S. 42-45, 79 f.). The tendency to represent Pilate as practically innocent of the execution of Jesus, evidenced by the way in which Justin and the Gospel of Peter make the Jew, not Pilate, the subject of καθαίρει, which is taken transitively, is the governing idea in all the stories associated with the name of Pilate, and is derived, therefore, from the Acts of Pilate. But it is perfectly clear that in John xix. 13 ἐκάθισεν is not to be taken transitively but intransitively, as in Jos. Bell. ii. 9. 3, ὁ Πιλάτος καθίσας ἐπὶ βήματος; for (1) In John as in the Synoptics and Acts the word is used only intransitively and reflexively (36 times in the Synoptics and Acts, often in the connection, ἐπὶ θρόνον, βήματος, καθέδρας). (2) Any writer who wanted to make his meaning clear, especially any one using the style that John does, would necessarily have added αὐτόν or ἑαυτὸν, as in Justin and the Gospel of Peter, if this were really the object of ἐκάθισεν. (3) Historically it is quite impossible that Pilate should have desecrated the judgment-seat which symbolised his dignity by enacting with his own hands such a farce; for, since the reading is not ἐκέλευσεν καθίσαι, ἐκάθισεν if taken transitively must mean, like the ἐκάθισαν of Justin and the Gospel of Peter, a forcible elevation to the judgment-seat. (4) There is nothing in John's Gospel which necessitates our attributing to him the bad taste of inventing such an absurdity. The mocking of Jesus, which belonged to an earlier stage of the trial, xix. 2-5, Pilate left to the soldiers, and merely utilised the result of it to mock the Jews. In this passage, on the other hand, he is acting as the supreme judge of the land. The mention of the hour, the description of the place, the statement of the outcome of the trial in xix. 13-16, show that John here intends to describe the imposition of a very seriously intended death sentence by the judge who alone could impose such a sentence (xviii. 31, xix. 10 f., 19-22).

13. (P. 340.) Heb. and Aram. words and interpreted names are as follows: ματθαί, i. 38, 49, iii. 2, vi. 25, ix. 2, xi. 8 (Matt. and Mark 7 times together, Luke none); ματθιουρί, xx. 16 (cf. Mark x. 51, vol. i. 20); Μεσσίας, i. 41, iv. 25 (vol. i. 20 f.); Κηφᾶς, i. 42 (vol. i. 16); ἀμὴν, ἀμήν, i. 51 (only in John, 25 times, vol. i. 18); Βηθούδα, v. 2 (which is not translated, but interpreted in accordance with the literal meaning of the word (see vol. i. 28); μάννα, vi. 31, 49; Σιλωάμ, ix. 7 (vol. i. 29); Θωμᾶς, xi. 16, xx. 24; ὥσαννά, xii. 13 (vol. i. 21); Γαββαθᾶ, xix. 13 (vol. i. 29); Γολγοθᾶ, xix. 17. Cf. also the explanation of the name Iscariot above, note 11. Concerning σάββατον πάσχα, see above, p. 324.

14. (P. 340.) Cf. SCHLATTER, Die Sprache und Heimat des 4 Evangelisten, 1902. In addition to Heb. and Aram. words (n. 13) and the form of O.T. citations (n. 15), evidence of the Hebrew origin of John is to be found not so much in single Hebrew phrases like ἐκ τῶν Φαρισαίων = Φαρισαῖοι τινες (above, p. 284), and expressions like ἔρχου καὶ ἴδε, i. 46, cf. 39 (= ἵπ κη); Heb. (הקח וכו); ἀπῆλθον εἰς τὰ ὀπίσω, vi. 66; ἐξουσίαν πάσης σαρκός, xvii. 2; ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπολλείας, xvii. 12, as in the character of the style as a whole, which is in need of special investigation. John hardly ever attempts a periodic sentence, and when he does he fails, e.g. vi. 22-24. It is noteworthy how often καὶ is used in an adversative sense (i. 10, iii. 19, vi. 70, viii. 20, 49, x. 25, xvii. 11). Its use with the imperative or future to express sequence, i. 39, 46, vii. 52, xiv. 1, xv. 7, is likewise to be noted (cf. ZKomm. Matt. 303, 442). In continuing an account καὶ is frequently replaced by δέ, also by οὖν, which is used over frequently, and by the omission of a connecting particle altogether, e.g. i. 40, 41, 42 (twice), 43, 45, 46b, 47, 48, 49, 50, frequently in conversation by the unconnected λέγει αὐτῷ (vol. ii. 591, n. 7 on Matt.). It is as if there were writing a Jew, to whom someone had said : You must not always say "and." The rhythm of the language, while impressing the reader with a certain solemnity, shows on the other hand a monotony due to poverty of expression.

15. (P. 340.) Cf. FRANKE, Das AT. bei Jo. 1885, S. 255-316. The freedom with which John everywhere makes his citations (e.g. ii. 17, καταφάγεται instead of κατέφαγε, xii. 15, μὴ φοβοῦ, variations which suit the situation) renders it difficult to determine the relation of the passages to the original text and to the LXX. In i. 23, cited from Isa. xl. 3, ἐθνήετε corresponds to ἐθείας ποιείτε (LXX and Syn.) in the second part of the verse not quoted by John, but is an exact translation of נח independent of the LXX. If i. 29 were based upon Isa. liii. 4, which is very questionable, αἶψα would be a new translation of כעס. The citation in vi. 45 from Isa. liv. 13 could be changed into an independent sentence very easily if taken from the original text, but with difficulty if taken from the LXX. The abridged citation in xii. 15 from Zech. ix. 9 does not contain a word which shows its dependence upon the LXX; on the other hand, πῶλον ὄνον is a translation from the Heb., independent both of Matt. xxi. 5 (cf., however, Matt. xxi. 2) and of the LXX. The citation in xiii. 18 from Ps. xli. 10 shows no resemblance to the LXX, and is an exact translation of the Heb., especially if we read μου with BCL, not μετ' ἐμοῦ with SAD; cf. Matt. xxvi. 23; Mark xiv. 20. The same is true of the citation in xix. 37 from Zech. xii. 10, where the LXX has ἐπιβλέψονται πρὸς με ἀνθ' ὧν κατωρχήσαντο (the LXX MSS., e.g. Cryptoferr. rescr., and others in Field, Hecapla, ii. 1026, which have also εἰς ὃν ἐξεκέντησαν, some of them before, others after ἀνθ' ὧν κατ., are, of course, interpolated from John xix. 37). Only in the later Greek versions, all of which seem to have retained ἐπιβλέψονται πρὸς με (this is proved in the case of Theodotion), is the text corrected : Aquila, σὺν ᾧ ἐξεκέντησαν; Theod. εἰς ὃν ἔξεκ.; Symm. ἔμπροσθεν ἐπεξεκέντησαν. Cf. also Rev. i. 7, οἵτινες αὐτὸν ἐξεκέντησαν; Barn. vii. 9, ὄψονται αὐτόν . . . κατακεντήσαντες; Just. Dial. xxxii. ἐπιγνώσεσθε εἰς ὃν ἐξεκεντήσατε. In view of these examples, the supposition that in the Gospel and Rev. John is dependent upon some unknown Greek version, in which was found the characteristic forms ὀφονται (only in John and Barn.) and εἰς ὃν ἐξεκέντησαν (Just., Theod., only partially in Aqu.), only serves to prove that there are some who refuse to recognise what is perfectly evident, namely, that John is citing Zech. xii. 10 in the Gospel and Rev. from his own knowledge of the original text, and that Barnabas and Justin are dependent upon John.

16. (P. 342.) Once, in xviii. 36, Jesus speaks to the Romans of the Jews, who have cast Him out (cf. Acts xxv. 10, xxvi. 2, 4), which is less strange than the remark in xviii. 20, where before the high priest Jesus says "all Jews," instead of "our entire people." Yet the present writer is not disposed to consider this impossible historically, after Jesus has been called a Samaritan (viii. 48), charged with the intention of going to the Gentiles (vii. 35), and arrested with the help of the heathen cohort (xviii. 12). In Acts xxi. 21 Luke represents the presbyters of Jerusalem as speaking in the same way to the Jew Paul.

17. (P. 344.) Matt. xi. 25-30 = Luke x. 21 f.; Matt. xii. 12 (Mark iii. 4; Luke vi. 9 (cf. John x. 32, ἔργα καλὰ); Matt. xv. 13, xvii. 26 (John viii. 35 f.), xviii. 2 (John iii. 3-5), xviii. 7 (τῷ κόσμῳ), xviii. 14 (John vi. 38 f.), xix. 11 xxvi. 38 f. (Mark xiv. 34 ff.; cf. John xii. 27, v. 30, vi. 38), xxviii. 18 (John v. 27, xvii. 2), have a Johannine sound.

18. (P. 315.) In opposition to the view that John sometimes permits a speech of Jesus to shade off into theological expatiations of his own, instances to the contrary may be cited. John iii. 19-21 is a fitting conclusion of the address to Nicodemus, who was still afraid of the light (iii. 2, xix. 39, νυκτός). In John v. 2 the relation is manifest between the place (Bethesda) and the character of action which suggested the discourse (vol. i. 28, n 15). There is no discourse where it is difficult to imagine the source of John's information. If the gradual acceptance of the gospel by Nicodemus, which John describes, terminated, as it undoubtedly did, in his reception into the membership of the Church, John could have learned from him what he recalls in iii. 1-21, vii. 45-52, xi. 47-50. The contents of iv. 7-26 were probably repeated more than once by the Samaritan woman, and John had abundant opportunity both at the time (iv. 40) and later (Acts viii. 25) to hear her tell it on the spot.

§ 70. THE FIRST EPISTLE OF JOHN.

Both of the smaller writings which have come down to us under the name of John bear the stamp of genuine Epistles, in spite of the fact that the author calls himself simply "the Elder"; but the larger writing, which we are accustomed to call 1 John, lacks almost all the elements that constitute that form of composition. Not only is the greeting wanting, as in Hebrews, but in the course of the letter, and notably at the close, there is an absence of all that otherwise marks Hebrews as an Epistle. In this respect it is comparable rather to James, which, however, is introduced as an Epistle by its opening greeting. That 1 John has not lost its epistolary form by accident or design, is proved by the opening words (i. 1-4); as is the case in Hebrews in so far as its beginning might give occasion for a similar suspicion. Even after a greeting supposedly lost, an Epistle could not begin with such phrases as 1 John presents to us (vol. ii. 312 f.). On the other hand, it does not represent a speech put into writing before or after delivery; for the author indicates everywhere throughout the document (i. 4, and twelve times from ii. 1 onwards) that writing is the form of the communication he is making. Only once does he allow a λέγω (v. 16) to intrude in place of γράφω—a change which Paul often makes. 1 John is then, like James,—except that it lacks the form of a pastoral Epistle which is peculiar to the latter,—a written address to a circle of Christians, all, or the majority of whom, live at a distance from the author. Furthermore, inasmuch as there is wanting in this Epistle, just as in James, and even to a greater degree than in the latter Epistle, all regard for special, personal, or locally conditioned relations between the author and the readers, there can be no doubt that a somewhat large circle of congregations—as, e.g., the Christians of a district or of a province—are here addressed. The warning against idols, v. 21, which, as the last word of the writing, leaves all the deeper impression, indicates that these Churches have grown up on heathen soil. If we may trust the tradition and the first impression made by the comparison of 1 John with the Gospel of John, which would lead us to suppose that both writings have the apostle John for their author, we may assert even upon this basis that the author in this address has to do with the Churches of the province of Asia. The author who does not find it necessary to introduce himself personally to the readers—for i. 1–4, in which he does not speak of himself alone, is not a substitute for the introduction—possesses the authority of a father among them. Although he uses the name of “brother” often enough, he employs it only once in addressing the readers (iii. 13). On the contrary, he addresses them seven times as τέκνιά, and twice as παιδία, with which ἀγαπητοί, occurring six times, is almost equivalent, because of the frequent combining of ἀγαπητός with υἱός or τέκνον (n. 1). Despite the differentiation between old and young in their company, which occurs twice, he admonishes them all as a father would his children. Such language befits only an old man. This seems so much the more certain when one notices that this fatherly relation is not such as would be based upon the fact that the writer was the missionary who had instituted their religion among them (cf. 1 Cor. iv. 14-17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. ii. 1; 1 Pet. v. 13). He declares repeatedly and emphatically that he has nothing new in the way of doctrine or exhortation to offer them, but only that which they have heard and adopted from the very beginning (ii. 7, 18, 20 f., 24, 27, iii. 11). In none of these passages is there, however, any hint that the author had taken a personal part in this original evangelisation and fundamental instruction of the readers; cf. per contra 2 Pet. i. 16; 1 Cor. xv. 1; Gal. i. 8 f. If, therefore, despite this, he adopts toward the readers the attitude of paternal authority, he must have been active in these communities for a considerable period of time, as a teacher and a leader, though they had been founded by another.

But this is not true of him alone. Since he persistently uses "I" when he speaks of himself as the author of this writing, it is clear that the "we"—where it is not used as a general term for all Christians—(i. 6-10, iii. 1 f., 14-16), comprehends, besides the author, a number of persons who, in distinction from the readers, share in some way the author's position (i. 1-5, iv. 6, 14, 16). What they possess in common is, first of all, the fact that they have heard with their ears, seen with their eyes, and touched with their hands, the Son of God, sent by Him to be the Saviour of the world—the life which had existed from eternity, but which had been revealed in this historical personage—the personal Word of life (above, p. 329, n. 6) in all its manifestations (i. 1, 3, 5, iv. 14). In words which cannot fail to remind us of John i. 1, 14-16, vi. 68 f., the author reckons himself as one of the personal disciples of Jesus. But with this experience is given the commission to preach and bear witness regarding what he has seen, heard, and experienced, to those who have not enjoyed such an advantage (i. 2, iv. 6, 14 cf. John xv. 27). Even if this preaching (i. 2 f., 5) is spoken of as directed toward the readers, the absence of an ὑμῖν in iv. 14 reminds us of the evident fact that the mission of the disciples of Jesus to testify to others of the revelation of the eternal life in Jesus, which they had experienced, was not limited to the circle of readers of 1 John. More than this, it is very emphatically stated in i. 3 that John and those whom he includes with himself, announce to the readers (καὶ ὑμῖν) also, what they have seen and heard (n. 2). In other words, what they here proclaim they announce or have announced to others. The purpose of the proclamation is that the hearers may be in fellowship with the preachers, which is at the same time fellowship with the Father and with Jesus Christ. Inasmuch, however, as this purpose, as regards the readers, is expressed by the words ἵνα καὶ ὑμεῖς κοινωνίαν ἔχητε μεθ' ἡμῶν, it is thereby stated that John and the other disciples—with whom he here includes himself—have at some former time preached to others, outside their circle, and with the same purpose and success, what they have experienced in their intercourse with Jesus.

John speaks, then, in the name of several of the disciples of Jesus, who formerly in other places and in other communities pursued their calling as witnesses, and who are now carrying it on among those congregations to which 1 John is directed. If we turn to history we shall find that, from about the year 68, besides John several other disciples of Jesus who had formally been at work in Palestine, had settled in the province of Asia. We can name with certainty Aristion and Philip; but there is no lack of support for the assumption that still other members of the apostolic circle—whether understood in the narrower or wider sense—lived there for a more or less extended time (n. 3). Of himself and of these companions of his John says, "And these things (which we have announced and still announce to you as well as to others) we write, that our joy may be made full." It should be self-evident that this does not refer solely to the letter he is writing or solely to the Gospel he had written. That it does not refer to the letter is evident: (1) Because John, as has been remarked, always speaks of himself as the author of this letter, in the singular only. The other disciples, who likewise live and preach in Asia, have not the smallest share in this letter. It is the address of John the individual, who assumes toward this circle of readers the entirely unique position of a father. Whether it is his age, or apostolic dignity, or both which raises him above the other disciples in Asia, we cannot gather from the letter; but we may conclude that he probably did not share his peculiar position in the circle of readers with the companions mentioned in i. 1-5, iv. 6, 14, 16. (2) In ver. 4, according to the genuine text (n. 2), no reference is made to any connection existing between this literary work and the present readers—a reference which could not possibly have been wanting at the place where the author would first have had in mind his authorship of the letter. Ver. 4 does not refer to the satisfying of some need of the readers (cf. per contra ii. 1, v. 13), but to the joy and satisfaction which it affords the eye-witnesses to set forth in writing what they have heralded by word of mouth. Similarly the reference in ver. 4 cannot be to the Gospel. This would not agree with the tense nor with the plural number of γράφουμεν (cf. per contra, John xix. 35, xxi. 24, above, p. 239). It is rather a statement without reference to time, embracing all of the literary work of the eye-witnesses, both past and future. This general statement refers, therefore, quite naturally to the writing in which it occurs, as well as to others. With these words the apostle expresses the joy with which he now resorts to writing as a means of conveying to the reader his testimony to the "Word of Life"—his message

to them upon many former occasions having been delivered orally. It affords him pleasure to employ writing also as a means to the fulfilment of his mission. Whether he has employed it often before, either in letters to his present readers (n. 4) or to others, or in the composition of a Gospel, cannot be ascertained from this passage, since it does not refer to the writings of John alone.

If he had at that time written the Gospel,—which is more likely than 1 John to have been the writing referred to by the object (ταῦτα) of γράφειν,—or if he was then busy with its composition, or even with the project of its composition, he must have had this also in mind; we do not know. But as far as the others are concerned, who like him not only testify, but also write, ver. 4, which does not speak of any connection between the γράφειν and the present readers, therefore does not compel us to think of the other writers as just these disciples in Asia. Further, the lack of any element of time in γράφομεν gives us no occasion to think solely of recent writings or of writings which are about to be made. From the literature which has come down to us we must exclude the Epistles of Paul, who was not an eye-witness, as well as the Epistle of James, which contains nothing of the object of γράφειν, as it is summed up in the ταῦτα of ver. 4. On the other hand, we must remember that Peter, the witness to the Passion and exaltation of Jesus (1 Pet. v. 1; 2 Pet. i. 16–18), toward the end of his life recognised it as his duty to supplement his oral testimony by writings of various kinds, and so to give his teaching permanent form. One of these letters has not come down to us. We do not know whether any further literary purpose which he may have had was ever realised (vol. ii. 200 f.). We learn of this same desire on the part of Jude, who wrote his Epistle after the year 70 (vol. ii. 241 f.). Moreover, before this year the Apostle Matthew, and Mark, the disciple of Peter, had written their Gospels, and at the time John was living in Ephesus both books were known in the Churches of the province of Asia. The close relation of Mark's Gospel to Peter, which John discussed with his disciples, justifies our considering this Gospel also as part of the literature referred to, although Mark himself had been only in a very limited sense an eye-witness. Briefly, it is the Christian literature which since the sixties had been in process of formation and which had not yet reached completion, written directly and indirectly by the eye-witnesses of the gospel story, which John includes with his own written testimony. By this address John wishes to strengthen the readers as a whole in that Christianity which has been brought to them not by him, but by others before him. He wishes to write, not that they may believe, nor that their present belief may be strengthened (cf. John xix. 35, xx. 31), but that they may become thoroughly conscious of the possession of eternal life, which they have as believers on the name of the Son of God (v. 13, cf. 1 Pet. v. 12). They have received forgiveness of sins and the anointing of the Holy Spirit (ii. 12, 20, 27); they have known the Son of God who is from the beginning; and through the faith in Him which is common to all Christians, they have overcome the World and the Evil One in whose power the present transitory world is held (ii. 12-14, v. 4 f., 18 f.).

From the very beginning they have heard the whole truth, which alone is the important thing for them to hold fast (ii. 7, 24, 27, iii. 11). Moreover, as to the prediction of the end of the world, they need only to be reminded of what they have formerly heard (ii. 18); they all possess truth not recently received through the anointing (ii. 20 f., 27), but truth which they have always possessed (ii. 7, εἰχέτε not ἐχέτε), i.e. before John became connected with them. But the old truth must again and continually be preached, and taken to heart, and its consequences followed out; and this is to be done in two ways: as regards morality, and as regards appreciation of the person of the Son of God.

A superficial survey gives one the impression that i. 5–ii. 17 inclines toward the former, that ii. 18–iv. 6 leans at least predominantly toward the latter, and that iv. 7–v. 12 or to v. 21 unites both lines of thought. But the division cannot be strictly carried out. Even in the first two divisions the ethical is inseparably connected with the religious. The demands for purity of life in God's light, which includes the confession of sin (i. 5–10); for the observance of the commands of Jesus in emulating His holy life (ii. 4–6, cf. iii. 3), especially for brotherly love (ii. 7–11, iii. 11–18), as well as for the forsaking of the love of the world (ii. 15–17),—are everywhere derived from the highest truths of faith and religious experience. The one and only will of God, the fulfilment of which brings to man eternal life, embraces both: belief in the Son of God, and brotherly love according to the standard of the command of Jesus (iii. 23, cf. ii. 7 f., 17). Nevertheless, it must be recognised that the ethical admonitions are occasioned in a different way from the Christological statements. In the first section i. 5–ii. 17, in which the purpose assigned for the discussion is the very simple one, that the readers may not sin (ii. 1), there appear as occasions for the exhortation only the undeniable facts that the Christians also are still burdened with sin, and that they still live in a world which exercises a seductive influence upon those who live in it and in the flesh (i. 8–10, ii. 1*b*, 16). Even in the further injunctions as to moral requirements, iii. 3 f., 9–18, iv. 7–21, we meet everywhere only such motives for sinning as lie in the general depravity and weakness of human nature, and never a theoretical support of immorality, such as Paul—and Peter and Jude in a much more developed form—had to combat (vol. ii. 279 f.). The warning against being led into error (iii. 7), which occurs only in a single isolated instance among the ethical discussions, and in a later passage, points unquestionably to the fact that there were persons in the circle of the readers who spoke as though one could be righteous without practising righteousness and avoiding sin. With an eye to such false teachers (ii. 29–iii. 12), the contrast between the righteousness which has its origin in the righteous Jesus, and which has as its goal the future perfecting of the children of God in likeness with the Son of God, and sin, which is rebellion against God's law, and which makes one a child of the Devil, is described as an unreconcilable antagonism, extending from Cain and Abel down through human history. Perhaps one may here adduce the likewise isolated and exceedingly brief, but by reason of its position at the close, very effective warning in v. 21. Inasmuch as it is directed to the readers, who are here again tenderly addressed, and who in the whole letter appear in a very favourable light, it cannot mean that they are not to fall away to formal idol-worship, but that they are to avoid that dangerous approximation to the heathen cult against which the apostolic decree was directed (Acts xv. 20, 29, xxi. 25, φυλάσσεσθαι), and against which Paul had so insistently warned (1 Cor. viii.–x., especially x. 14, vol. i. 296, n. 2). Living in a land where there was a high degree of culture (ii. 16) and a flourishing cultus (v. 21), the readers do not want for enticements, and there is no lack of Gentile Christians who take lightly the duty of keeping oneself unspotted from this world. But still there is no trace of any libertine theory. Neither is there any hint of a connection between the phenomena by which John felt himself led to his treatment of ethical matters, and those phenomena which led him to very definite, positive and negative statements in regard to the person of Jesus. The first section which has this purpose in view, ii. 18 ff.; closes formally at ii. 26, and is followed in ii. 27 f. by a peroration, by means of which the ethical section ii. 29–iii. 18 is separated from the first warning against the false teachers in ii. 18–26, just as it is separated by iii.

18-24 from the second warning against the same false teachers. With these two portions directed against the same distortion of the picture of Christ, and the peculiar statements of 1 John concerning Christ which are occasioned by them, we may without hesitation connect the evidently similar passages in 2 John.

Many deceiving teachers have appeared who seek to lead the readers astray to their own doctrine (ii. 26; 2 John 7). They have gone forth from Christianity—not specifically from the circle of the present readers, which would in that case be stated in ii. 19. According to the opinion of John, however, they have not from the beginning, not even before they appeared with their peculiar teaching, belonged inwardly to Christianity. For him they are, as the Pharisaical Jewish Christians were to Paul, ψευδάδελφοι from the very beginning (Gal. ii. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 26) people who, when they entered the Church, did not break completely and conscientiously with ideas and aims which proceed from their former religious condition. That became evident from the fact that they appeared with their peculiar teaching concerning Christ; and so perfectly evident did that become, that they could no longer remain in the Church. They are expelled from the Church (ii. 19), and that, too, against their will; the Asiatic Churches have overcome them (iv. 4). But in spite of this they themselves seek to exert their seductive influence upon these congregations, and to claim, as Christian brothers, friendship and hospitality in the houses of the members of the Church. On this account John demands that they be refused greeting and hospitality (2 John 10 f.).

Their appearance is to him an omen of the approaching end; for they seem to him to be forerunners of the antichrist of whom Christian prophecy, based upon the prediction of Jesus, had warned men, and in this sense they themselves are antichrists (n. 5). Although they are called "false prophets"—i.e. teachers inspired with the spirit of the antichrist—and even "spirits" which are to be proved (iv. 1-3), there is nothing to lead one to suppose that they employ certain forms of address characteristic of the prophets, and base their claims upon visions or special revelations. It is sufficient for this characterisation, which occurs but once, to say that they preach their pseudo-Christian doctrine with the pretension of an inspiration coming from God. The fundamental falsehood which they champion is said to be the denial of the proposition that Jesus is the Christ; and this is characterised as a denial of the Son (ii. 22 f., v. 1, 5), which might in itself be said of every Jew or Gentile who rejects the fundamental article of Christian belief (John i. 41-49, vi. 69, xx. 31). But inasmuch as it has to do with people who not only have belonged to the Christian Church but who also wish still to be accounted Christians, it is impossible that they have in every sense denied the identity of the person of Jesus with the idea of the Christ; as also their designation as antichrists, and false prophets animated by the spirit of the antichrist, would be inappropriate if they had fallen away from the confession of the Christian faith to a simple negation and dispute of the same. Their doctrine is rather a distorted picture of Christian belief clad in its forms. What they deny is that Jesus Christ came in the flesh (iv. 2; 2 John 7). They do not deny the idea of the Christ, nor the fact that the promised One came, but they deny Jesus, or, according to the evidently original reading, they resolve into its human and divine elements the historical person of Jesus (n. 6). They deny that the man Jesus is the Son of God (v. 5). In opposition to them, therefore, the author testifies that this man of history who went through water and blood, i.e., who not only allowed Himself to be baptized, but dying, also shed His blood,—the Jesus of the gospel history and the Christ of the Churches' belief—is the Son of God (n. 7). In addition to the witness, which is in the baptism by water and in the bloody death of Jesus, there is the testimony of the Spirit—of that Spirit we may say, who before Jesus, in the Prophets, including the Baptist, had borne witness to Jesus as the Christ and Son of God; who came upon Jesus at His baptism, and who has passed over from Him, as the one baptizing with the Spirit, to His Church. The testimony of the Spirit, of the water, and of the Blood is a triple and yet single witness of God that He has, in Jesus, a man living in the body, sent His Son to the world, and in Him has given it life (v. 7–12). The matter here in dispute is not to be characterised by the one word “docetism.” The reality of the human person and of the human experiences of Jesus is not denied, but the complete identity of this Jesus with the Christ and the Son of God. Excessive emphasis was laid upon the baptism of Jesus, while the significance of the death of Jesus, on the contrary, was disparaged. One can hardly understand this otherwise than that the false teachers said that in the baptism of Jesus, the Christ and the Son of God had a part, in so far as He united Himself with Jesus at the time of and by means of the baptism; but that in the death upon the cross He had no part, in so far as He separated Himself again from Jesus before that event.

In the broader sense this doctrine was, to be sure, docetic; and it is with perfect propriety that John, in answer to it, testifies that the Christ, who is inseparable from Jesus, came in the flesh (iv. 2; 2 John 7); that he emphasises the redemptive power of the blood not so much of Jesus as of the Son of God (i. 7); that he teaches the recognition of the essential purpose of the sending of the Son of God in the propitiation for sin, which is to be conceived of only through the shedding of blood (iv. 10, ii. 2); and that he, at the very beginning of the Epistle,

i. 1-3, gives assurance with such incomparable energy, that the Man whom they perceived with their senses, with whom he and his companions were allowed to associate so intimately, was the revelation of the life which had existed with the Father from the beginning. He does not say, nor prove by means of reminiscences of isolated events in the gospel narrative, that Jesus was a man, perceptible to the senses, incarnate, revealing Himself as human in all that He did and suffered; but with the still incontestible presupposition of that time, when many disciples of Jesus were still living, that these things were true of Him, he bears witness that this man was the Son of God, sent as Redeemer of the world (iv. 14), the personal and incarnate manifestation of the eternal life (i. 2). From this standpoint the polemic and apologetic attitude of the Fourth Gospel becomes more intelligible (above, p. 321); not only to crass identification of the revelation accomplished through Jesus, with the incarnate, living man, but also the emphasis upon the reality of the death of Jesus and the shedding of His blood, of which John himself was one of the witnesses.

When the false teachers laid excessive emphasis upon the baptism of Jesus, and when they admitted only at His baptism a temporary personal union of the Christ and Son of God with Jesus, Jesus the man was not, to them, specifically different from other persons through whom revelation was given; and it is at least conceivable that the Baptist, through whose mediation God first made Jesus the instrument of the Christ, occupied almost as high a place as Jesus Himself. How intelligible then does it become that the Fourth Gospel, with an unmistakably polemical purpose, portrays the Baptist as the humble witness—vastly inferior to Jesus—of the coming Son of God, manifested in Him! If we look in the history of heresies for the original of the false doctrine depicted and contested by John, we shall find what we are seeking in the teaching of Cerinthus, the contemporary of John of Ephesus, in so far at least as we free the true portrait of this teacher from the foreign additions by which the ignorance of the later writers on heresy have disfigured it (n. 8). The report that Cerinthus enjoyed an Egyptian education has nothing against it. If he came from that country to Ephesus, as Apollos did, the theory obtains new support from this parallel that a school of thought, connected with that of the Baptist, outside the Church from the very beginning, was formally received into the Church of the province of Asia, though it did not give up altogether its peculiar opinions (above, pp. 323, 331). In accordance with this theory is also the fact that the false teachers of 1 John had their origin probably in Christendom, though not in the Asiatic Church (ii. 19, above, p. 364), so that the prophecy in Acts xx. 29, not that in Acts xx. 30, was fulfilled in their appearance.

After all this evidence has been considered, there can be no doubt as to the answer to the question regarding the origin of 1 John. The unanimous tradition which attributed this writing to the author of the Fourth Gospel, is corroborated by an affinity of thought, vocabulary, and style, such as can hardly ever be proved between an historical and a didactic writing of the same author, to say nothing of different authors (n. 9). If, without considering the varied problems which John had to solve, it be claimed on the basis of certain differences, that both writings have merely issued from the same school, it is equivalent to treating these writings as impersonal works of art, or as school exercises. In 1 John it is not a school, nor the single member of a school, who speaks to these eager readers; but, as has been shown, it is a teacher of unimpeachable authority who addresses a somewhat large circle of Gentile Christian Churches lying outside of Palestine. It is a personal disciple of Jesus who speaks here; one who has been active formerly as a Christian teacher in other regions, but who has had for a long time the position of a spiritual father in this new field of activity. He shares this career with several others, but so far surpasses them that he does not once find it necessary to allude to himself by name. Such a state of affairs existed, as far as we know, only in the province of Asia, and between about 68–100 A.D. At the same time, we find there also the false doctrine which 1 John combats (ii. 10). There must be taken into account also the fact that a writing which was originally anonymous cannot be called pseudonymous. The author cannot have intended to pass for the apostle John, without being so in fact, for he does not employ the means which are customary and indispensable for such purposes. He is, therefore, in the light of this writing, the writer of the Fourth Gospel, the John of Ephesus, and the apostle of that name. As to whether he wrote the letter earlier or later than the Gospel, the present writer would hardly be able to decide. A direct reference to the Gospel would have been very natural, if it had been already written and delivered to the Church. The Epistle must certainly have been written earlier than Revelation. All that we learn from the latter—a book intended for the same circle of readers—as to the condition of the Church in its relation to heathenism and to the State, as to the internal condition of the Churches, and as to the Nicolaitans and other matters—could not have failed to leave a trace in such a detailed writing as 1 John. On the other hand, John must have been at work in Asia for years, to have been able to address the Churches there in such a manner. 1 John can hardly have been written before the year 80.

1. (P. 356.) The ἀδελφοί which appears in ii. 7 and iii. 13 is genuine only in the latter passage. The readers as a body are addressed as τεκνία either with or without μὲν in ii. 1, 28, iii. 7, 18, iv. 4, v. 21, unquestionably, also in ii. 12. The expression does not mean that the Christians so addressed are youthful, as distinguished from aged, members of the Church—as is clearly proved by the fact that in this case the order, "children, old men, young men," ver. 12 f., would be senseless. The same is true also of παῖα, ii. 14 (in some texts ver. 13b), which in ii. 18 is certainly used to designate the readers as a body. Consequently the readers, who are alternately addressed as τεκνία (ii. 12) and as παῖδια (ii. 14) (cf. John xiii. 33, xxi. 5), are twice divided into two classes, πατέρες and νεανίσκοι; cf. πρεσβύτεροι and νεώτεροι, 1 Tim. v. 1 f.

2. (Pp. 358, 359.) The text of i. 1-4, in regard to which Tischendorf and Westcott-Hort agree, is not subject to improvement. The καί before ὑμῖν in ver. 3, removed in the Antioch recension, and the second καί, to which there is no serious objection, are attested by the Passio Perp. chap. i. The double καί is not pleonastic; in which case we should have it also in ver. 2 and ver. 5. Moreover, the relation between the disciples and the readers is already so strongly expressed by the conception καινώτια μεθ' ἡμῶν that the double καί, still deemed necessary, must be explained by a contrast between the readers and other groups of Christians; cf. Eph. vi. 21, vol. i. 490, n. 6. The variations of ver. 4 from the original text are due, for the most part, to the feeling that this must refer to the composition of the Fourth Gospel. Therefore the reading ἐγγράψαμεν is presupposed in the Acts of Peter (above, p. 250), Can. Mur. line 31, and some MSS. of the Vulgate. More widely diffused is the reading ὑμῖν instead of ἡμεῖς (so as early as the Canon. Mur.), and ὑμῶν instead of ἡμῶν. Not only are ἡμεῖς and ἡμῶν better attested, but they are also favoured by the fact that these readings could not have been easily invented. Since ὑμῖν is spurious, ἡμῶν cannot as in 2 John 12, assuming that it is genuine in the latter passage, include the readers with the author and his companions. The reading ἡμεῖς, which is peculiar both in itself and because of its position (cf. iv. 14, 16), refers back to the group of eye-witnesses previously mentioned.

3. (P. 358.) In regard to John and the other disciples in Asia Minor, see vol. ii. 435, 451 f., above, pp. 191 f., 193 f. In 1 John i. 1-4 the reference is not to apostles but to disciples of Jesus. There is nothing which prevents us from including Aristion and other μαθηταὶ τοῦ κυρίου. Even Philip of Hierapolis is not to be excluded. This Philip, who, because of his prophetically endowed daughters, who likewise resided in Asia Minor, is held in Eus. (H. E. iii. 31) to be the evangelist Philip, might the more easily be confounded with the apostle of the same name—as is done by Polycrates about 195 (Eus. H. E. v. 24. 2)—if he had been a personal disciple of Jesus. Nothing which makes this impossible is suggested in Acts vi. 5, viii. 4-40, xxi. 8 f. Cf. Forsch. vi. 158-175. Whether Andrew, also, was temporarily in Asia Minor is more uncertain. Regarding Andrew and Aristion, see Forsch. vi. 217-224. The present writer thinks that in Forsch. vi. 187 f., cf. S. 177, 183, he has paid sufficient attention to the attempts to refer 1 John i. 1-4, iv. 14-16 to the mystical contemplation of an epigone, instead of to an experience of the senses on the part of a life companion of Jesus.

4. (P. 360.) The word ἐγγράψα, which is thrice repeated in ii. 14, is not equivalent to γράφω as used in letters; because we find γράφω used in ii. 1, 7, 9, 12, 13 with reference to what is to be written immediately following. Neither does it refer to a previous letter; for in that case first of all ver. 14 would have to precede ver. 12 and a contrast indicated between the present letter and the earlier one by means of a νῦν, ἄρτι, πάλιν (cf. Gal. i. 9 where the antithesis is to earlier oral statements), or Τὸ δεύτερον (cf. 2 Cor. xiii. 1 f.; 2 Pet. iii. 1). Secondly, the object of the ἔγγραφα is practically the same as the object of γράφω in ver. 12 f. Consequently ἔγγραφα is to be taken here, as in ii. 21, 26, v. 13, as an aorist referring to what immediately precedes (cf. 3 John 9). John is fond of repetition, but likes at the same time to vary his language. Paul expresses himself more tersely, cf. Phil. iv. 4.

5. (P. 364.) In 1 John ii. 18 the idea that an antichrist will come is presupposed as part of the common Christian teaching familiar to the readers, in fact we have already seen that such an idea was actually part of the common Christian faith (vol. i. 226 ff.). Only at the time when 2 Thess. was written the name ἀντίχριστος does not seem to have been as yet in common use. Neither is it strange that the readers had heard of a spirit of antichrist yet to come, iv. 3, 6; because it was predicted that he would appear in the full glory of pseudo-prophetic signs and wonders, 2 Thess. ii. 9 f. Just as Paul saw the μυστήριον of the antichrist already at work in his time, so John saw the spirit of the same manifesting itself in his day (iv. 3, πᾶς; cf. 2 Thess. ii. 7). In every teacher inspired by this spirit he perceives a preliminary incarnation of the future antichrist (ii. 18, 22, 2 John 7). The relation of this preliminary to the complete manifestation is conceived of in the same manner as in John iv. 21-23, v. 25. The first is not merely analogous to the second; it is the beginning and indication of it. Because there are many antichrists, John recognises that "it is the last hour," naturally not in the general sense, in which the beginning of the end comes with the appearance of Christ (1 Pet. i. 20; 1 Cor. x. 11; Heb. i. 1), nor yet in the sense that "the last hour or the last day" has come (John xi. 24, xii. 48; Matt. xxiv. 36); but in the sense that the present, which is full of significant portends of the coming end, for this very reason partakes of the character of the end, cf. Jas. v. 3, 5, 8.

6. (P. 365.) The text of iv. 3 has been very much corrected, which is proof that its original language was unusual. In the first place, it is certain that the correct reading is Ἰησοῦν without Χριστόν, which is frequently added (KL S¹ S², Sah. Copt. Vulg., once also in a free quotation by Tert. Jef. i.) or κύριον (8). Other readings are as follows: (A) ὁ λόγος Ἰησοῦν, so Iren. (Lat.) iii. 16. 8; according to the scholion of the Athos MS. ad loc. (von der Goltz, S. 48), also in the Greek text of Irenæus. In this same scholion it is stated that CLEMENT of Alexandria in his work on the Passover (Forch. iii. 32), and ORIGEN in tom. 8 of his Commentary on Rom., quote the passage in this way. This is confirmed by Orig. (Lat.) in Matt. § 65, Delarue, iii. 883, cf. tom. xvi. 8 in Matt. p. 727, ὁ λόγος τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ (according to Cræmer, Gal. v. 226 on 1 Cor. xii. 6, Origen, however, seems, moreover, to have known the B reading, which is found also in the text of the Athos MS.). Here belong also certain "ancient MSS." referred to by Socrates, H. E. vii. 32, who appeals at the same time to ancient interpreters; also by TERTULLIAN (c. Marc. v. 16, repentes Christum in carne venisse [according to 1 John iv. 2; 2 John 7], et solventes Ieros [according to iv. 3]; Jef. i. non quod Ieros Christum abscit); LUCIFER, ed. Vindob. 262. 3; PRISCILLIAN, p. 31. 3; ACOUSTINE, Vulg. (+Christum) etc. (B) ὁ μὴ ὁμολογῇ τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἈΒ, with the added Χριστόν, Sahid. Copt. (C) The reading B with the addition ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, AKL S¹ S³. (D) The reading A with almost the same addition in Ticonius, Lib. Reg., ed. Burkitt, p. 68. 1, qui solvit Jesum et negat in carne venisse. (E) Quite as isolated is the reading in Cypr. Test. ii. 8, where simply qui autem negat in carne venisse is added as ver. 3 at the end of 1 John iv. 2. Other very early witnesses, such as Polyc. vii. 1; Tert. Carn. Chr. xxiv., refers rather to 2 John 7—a passage which Irenæus, Priscillian, and others quote in connection with 1 John iv. 3, which also Tert. c. Marc. v. 16 freely quotes in connection with the same passage. Readings (D) & (E) are clearly derived from 2 John 7 under the influence of 1 John iv. 2. B likewise is only an “improvement” of the original A text.

7. (P. 366.) In regard to the sentence v. 6a, which is interpreted in very different ways, the following remarks may be made: (1) The οἶτος which points backward can take up again only the predicate ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, not the subject Ἰησοῦς in ver. 5, and is itself the predicate; otherwise ὁ ἐλθών instead of ἦλθεν and the appositional phrase Ἰησ. Χρ., added at the end, are impossible. The expression is not smooth, but such language is often found in John (John vi. 50, 58, cf. 33). The name “the Son of God” is applicable to Him, who has gone through water and blood, namely, to Jesus Christ. (2) ὁ ἐλθών is not equivalent to ὁ ἐρχόμενος. It certainly, therefore, cannot refer to a repeated coming in the sacraments, or yet to the coming of Christ into the world, or to His public appearance. For, in the first place, in that case it would be necessary to refer to the flesh (cf. iv. 2; 2 John 7); and, in the second place, water and blood were not the medium through which Christ came into the world or entered upon His public work, nor were they associated with His coming or with His public manifestation (cf. 2 Cor. ii. 4, “I wrote unto you with many tears”). Still less does the passage mean that Christ thus equipped and clothed came into the world, in whichever sense this is taken. That would require ἐν not διά. The word ἔρχεσθαι means here, as it does elsewhere (vol. ii. 589, n. 4, also John iv. 30, vi. 17, xxi. 3), “to go”; consequently with διά=διέρχεσθαι, “to go through.” Jesus underwent the baptism of blood as well as the baptism of water (Mark i. 9, x. 38 f.). On the strength of this statement John could add that Jesus the Christ is to be found not “in the water alone, but in the water and in the blood.” Whoever seeks Him and hopes to find Him in the water alone “has not the Son,” and so is without the Father and without the life” (v. 12, ii. 23). With reference to the so-called “Comma Joanneum” about the three heavenly witnesses after 1 John v. 7, it is sufficient to refer to Tischendorf ad loc., Westc.-Hort, App. 103, and to Scrivener, Introd. ii. 401–407, for the literature. But none of these authorities cite the earliest quotation of the passage which is certain and which can be definitely dated (circa 380), namely, that of Priscillian (p. 6) and the possibly contemporaneous quotation in the Expositio Fidei Cathol. (in Caspari, Kirchenhistor. Anecd. S. 395), which quotation is apparently taken from the proselyte Isaac (alias Ambrosiaster). Nevertheless, on the 13th of January 1897, the Congr. S. R. et U. Inquisitionis declared that denial or doubt of the authenticity of this passage was not unobjectionable; cf. the present writer’s lecture, Über die bleibende Bedeutung des ntl. Kanons, 1898, S. 26. Conscientious Catholic theologians, however, have not allowed this declaration to prevent them from proving so much the more thoroughly the apocryphal origin of this interpolation. So especially Kunze, Das Comma Joanneum auf seine Herkunft untersucht, 1905, who seeks to show that Priscillian is the author of it.

8. (P. 368.) Concerning the real teaching of Cerinthus, see vol. i. 515, n. 4; concerning the opinion of the Alogi that Cerinthus was the author of the Johannine writings, see above, p. 200 f. n. 11; for his personal relations to John, above, p. 204, n. 24. If he denied the possibility of the virgin conception and birth of Jesus (Iren. i. 26. 1), the fact throws a new light on John i. 13 f. (above, p. 265 f.). John's references to Mark, which are particularly evident, must also be considered in the light of the fact that Cerinthus admitted only this Gospel to be genuine (vol. ii. 456, n. 16). No trustworthy witness charges Cerinthus with gross immorality or antinomian ethics, and this agrees with the tone of 1 and 2 John (above in the text, p. 362 f.). Not even 2 John 11 can be made to support such theories and practice on the part of heretics; since τὰ ἔργα τὰ πονηρὰ is only a description of their moral attitude as a whole, and their conduct as tending to mislead the children of God; cf. John iii. 19, vii. 7; 1 John iii. 12; 3 John 10. But it is evident that John failed to discover in them the true love of God and of their brethren. The πολλοί in 1 John ii. 18, iv. 1; 2 John 7 does not refer to a number of different types of errorists, but to the strong following secured by one type of them. The reason why their teaching found acceptance, is their use of non-Christian ideas and forms of expression, 1 John iv. 5. Cerinthus was learned in Egyptian wisdom and culture (Hipp. Ref. vii. 33, x. 21); he was a Gnostic.

9. (P. 368.) Regarding the relation of 1 John to the Gospel of John, see Holtzmann, JhfPTh, 1881, S. 699; 1882, S. 128, 316, 460. In order to show the close relationship between 1 John and the Gospel of John, it would be necessary to place beside nearly every sentence of 1 John two or three parallels from the Gospel. They agree, too, in not using certain conceptions, elsewhere widely current, such as εὐαγγέλιον (in the Johannine writings only in Rev. xiv. 6, and there not of preaching; ἀγγελία is used instead in 1 John i. 5, iii. 11), εὐαγγελίζεσθαι (neither word is found in James, Jude, and 2 Peter). That the resemblance between 1 John and the Gospel is not greater, only goes to confirm what is apparent from the Gospel itself, namely, that John in writing the Gospel was conscious of the difference between the language of Jesus and the understanding of the disciples at that time on the one hand, and the language and understanding of the Church on the other hand. He does not represent Jesus as using the name Logos, but himself employs it as a well-known phrase. Comparing 1 John i. 1 with John i. 1, 14, perhaps one can say that in the letter the conception of the Logos seems to be less fixed and the name less formal. There is nothing strange about the use of παράκλητος in 1 John ii. 1 to describe the relation of the exalted Jesus to God and to the Church (vol. i. 64 f.); because in John xiv. 16, Jesus represents Himself as having been heretofore the paraclete of the disciples. Not in every respect does He cease to be a paraclete because of His exaltation. But His Church, which remains on earth, needs for its life in the world another Paraclete which will remain with it. Neither Jesus nor Paul mention the "antichrist" by this name (above, n. 5). It is a misconception, however, to assume that the Fourth Gospel excludes the common eschatological views of the early Christians. To show this in detail would require a complete exposition of John iii. 17-19, iv. 21-23, v. 20-29, vi. 39, 44, 54, xi. 24-26, xii. 48, xiv.-xvi.

10. (P. 369.) Of the heresies of the post-apostolic age none has nearly so many points of contact with the errors which John opposes as the real teaching of Cerinthus, certainly not the Jewish docetism of Ignatius or the gnosis of Basilides. While in Cerinthus the cosmological speculations and the speculations based on the historical treatment of religion appear to be little developed, Basilides has a well developed system. Although Basilides may have laid a certain emphasis upon the baptism of Jesus (Clem. Ecc. e. Theodoto, 16; Strom. i. 146), there is no evidence that his teaching on this point was the same as that of Cerinthus. The errorists of 1 John exhibit none of Basilides' phantastic docetism (Iren. i. 24. 4) and loose morals (Iren. i. 24. 5; Clem. passim). Furthermore, there is no evidence to show that the teachings of Basilides spread from Egypt to Asia Minor.

§ 71. THE LESSER EPISTLES OF JOHN (N. 1).

The Third Epistle of John is evidently a letter of recommendation which the author has given to some Christians who wish to journey from his place of residence to that of Gaius, the person addressed. Their purpose, however, is not to settle in this new place, but to continue their journey. They are commended to Gaius that he may show them hospitality and send them forward on their way (5-7, n. 2). Apparently, not long before the same brethren have experienced similar kindness from Gaius. The author expresses his pleasure and gratitude (n. 2) that these brethren, who had recently returned to his home, which seems also to have been their own, have borne witness not only to the genuineness of Gaius' character and manner of life, but also to his love; and have commended it before the assembled congregation (3-6). It is this same love which Gaius is again to show them. These brethren are not, however, persons who, as private individuals, live a restless, roving life; they are preachers of the gospel, or rather travelling missionaries. As such they receive no help from those outside the Church, and are therefore so much the more dependent upon the hospitality of fellow Christians (7). Whoever entertains such persons co-operates in the spreading of Christian truth (8). This describes quite fully the occasion and purpose of the letter; since what follows serves really to explain why the author addresses the communication to Gaius and not to someone else. This would require no justification if Gaius occupied an official position in the local Church, upon which rested the duty of caring for missionaries and other Christians passing through the place. But there is no hint of this. Gaius seems to be a member of a congregation, who is upon friendly terms with the author, and whose means, as in the case of his namesake at Corinth, enables him to practise hospitality upon an extraordinary scale (n. 3). Since, however, the exercise of such Church hospitality is the business of the congregation, and therefore the affair of its presiding officer (n. 3), it is most strange that the travellers are recommended to Gaius exclusively, instead of to the local Church or to Gaius as its leader, with the injunction to interest the remaining members of the congregation in the matter. It is this, however, which is explained in vv. 9 ff. To be sure, the author also wrote a letter to the congregation to which Gaius belonged; but in this he could not and would not write what he writes to Gaius alone; for he could not be sure that his request would be granted (n. 4). Although we should expect him to have exhorted the congregation, either directly or through their leader, to entertain the missionaries,—especially since, apart from this, he had, at that time, to write to the congregation, and actually did write to them,—the remark about Diotrephes makes any such hypothesis impossible; for Diotrephes does not recognise the authority of the author and of the other disciples of Jesus (n. 5), who like him have come into the circle of the local Church. He will not be advised by them, and ventures even to make derogatory remarks about them. In fact, not satisfied with this, he refuses to receive the brethren recommended by the author—such as the travelling missionaries who are the bearers of the letter to Gaius; and not only forbids their reception by the members of the congregation, who would have been inclined to receive them, but excludes from its membership such as do not submit to his orders. Diotrophes, consequently, possesses great power in the local Church, and exercises it in a direction hostile to the author, and directly opposed to the measures which he recommends. The author is not at all inclined to allow Diotrophes to continue to do as he pleases. He plans, when next he visits the place where Diotrophes and Gaius reside, to bring to issue the evil conduct of the former (10, 14), and to do this before the assembled congregation; for his purpose is not simply to remind Diotrophes of his duties, but rather to bring to their minds his evil words and deeds (10, ὑπομνήσαι without αὐτόν; cf. 1 Tim. v. 20). Until such time, however, the author refrains from addressing letters of recommendation in behalf of journeying brethren to the congregation in which this imperious man rules, or to the man himself. The description of the conduct of Diotrophes, especially the ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐκβάλλει, presupposes that he occupies an official position, formally recognised even by those who do not agree with him, and one which even the author is bound to consider, and which enables him successfully to play the autocrat. The conclusion drawn from the description of him as ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων αὐτῶν, that Diotrophes was only striving for the position of autocratic bishop, is shown from the facts adduced to be unjustified (n. 6). He already has this official position, and what he is accused of is simply that he employs it in an imperious and ruinous manner; that he is an ambitious hierarch who does not follow the precept of Jesus (Mark x. 44) and the example and exhortation of the apostles (1 Pet. v. 3; 2 Cor. i. 24), being in addition an opponent of the author and of the other disciples of Jesus in that Church circle. This assertive and hostile attitude is not due merely to the fact that, as lord in his own house, he will not allow himself to be dictated to by these men in the affairs of his congregation. The insufficiency of such a theory is evident from the simple fact that it is unproved, and that it is unlikely that others of the apostolic circle besides the author occupied a similar superior ecclesiastical office in the Asiatic Church. His attitude is rather, like the instance in 1 John iv. 6, one of contradiction of the apostolic teaching (n. 5). The leader of this congregation is an enemy of the author and of his companions; but there are in the same place we know not how many persons such as Gaius, and perhaps also a certain Demetrius (12), upon whom the author looks as his friends and to whom he sends greetings by name (15). That which distinguishes these persons from Diotrephes, however, is not merely a respectful friendship for the author or a greater measure of practical brotherly love for the Christians travelling through their locality (6, 10, τοὺς βουλομένους); for the thing to which the missionaries bore witness upon their return from the home of Gaius, and that at which the author particularly expresses his pleasure, is that Gaius possesses the truth and walks therein (3, 4), which, according to 2 John 4 ff., 1 John i. 7 ff., certainly cannot be taken to mean a theoretical orthodoxy, still less an active brotherly love alone. It is rather the firm adherence to the apostolic teaching which shows itself in life. That this is the testimony given of Gaius, distinguishing him from others (3, where σὺ is not to be disregarded), shows clearly enough that Diotrephes is not attached to that truth, and that he is, principally on that account, unfriendly towards its advocates—i.e. to the author and the other disciples and missionaries recommended by him. It by no means follows that he was on this account a declared false teacher. The false teachers of 1 John were expelled from their congregations; not one of them could have been the leader of a local Church

But one who refuses as decidedly as does Diotrephes to give ear to the apostolic wishes (cf. 1 John iv. 6), and who speaks so disrespectfully of those who communicate them (3 John 10), marks himself thereby a confederate of these errorists; and it may be assumed that his rejection of the missionaries recommended by the author carries with it a suspicious toleration of the πλάνοι. In spite of the schism which divided the congregation, and the strained relations existing between Diotrephes and himself, the author wrote a letter to the Church of which the former was the presiding officer (3 John 9). When, in consideration of the power of Diotrephes over the congregation, the author does not take up the subject of practical demands which call for immediate fulfilment, he surely does not contemplate giving up his position of authority over that local Church. He intends soon to assert it in person (10*a*), and he already manifests it in his letter. He has friends there who at times are oppressed by Diotrephes (1, 10*b*, 15), and he looks upon all the members of the congregation as his children, even if he is able to take pleasure only in those who walk in the truth (4).

Fortunately we are not constrained to guess what the author wrote in the letter to the congregation, of Diotrephes, since we possess it in 2 John. According to 3 John 9 (ἔγραψά τι) it was brief in form,—in fact it is shorter than any other Epistle in the N.T. with the exception of 3 John. It is so exactly like 2 John in extent, that one must assume that the author used two pages of papyrus (χάρται, 2 John 12) of the same size for both these letters (n. 7). Furthermore, the stylistic form of both is so very similar, that, for this reason also, it cannot be doubted that both are from the hand of the same author, and were written at the same time (n. 7).

In both of them the author expresses his hope of coming soon to those whom he is addressing, and, instead of the unsatisfactory epistolary communication, to speak to them face to face. In 2 John nothing is said about recommending travelling missionaries, just as there was nothing on this subject in the letter to the congregation mentioned in 3 John 9, if we interpret it rightly. But 2 John is really directed to a local Church which the author addresses as a chosen mistress, as the mother of its members, wedded to the Lord Christ, and as a sister of the Church in the place where he is living, 1, 5, 13 (n. 8). We find here the same contrast which existed in the congregation of Gaius. The author found only a few children of the congregation to be walking in the truth (4). In fact, it must have happened that persons who did not hold the apostolic doctrine, but the same false doctrine that is combated in 1 John, received hospitality among the people, if we are to understand why the author so earnestly warns against the very thing which is condemned in the first Epistle, and stigmatises even the friendly greeting of such persons as participation in their evil ways (10, 11). The author includes all the members of the congregation in sincere love; not because of their virtues, but because of his faith in the enduring truth, which in Christians is not easily destroyed (1 f.). He uses great moderation of expression when, instead of rebuking the others, he speaks of his special pleasure at the good behaviour of many of the members of the congregation (4). His appeal goes out to the whole congregation to hold fast to the old command of love, to the old truth of Jesus Christ as come in the flesh, and to the doctrine of Christ Himself, and the warning not to lose, in their folly, the whole harvest of the labour of their Christian life (5-9; n. 9). The danger in which this local congregation stood was great; but Diotrophes had not yet reached the point where he could hinder the reading of the letter before the assembled congregation. The author does not give the congregation up, but trusts, by means of both letters, to prepare the way for the discussion in which he hopes to contend with Diotrephes and to restore the congregation to the right and proper way of thinking.

The author mentions by name neither himself nor the locality to which he is sending the letter by the hand of travelling missionaries; he characterises himself rather as "the Elder" (ὁ πρεσβύτερος) who has a right to consider as his children also the Christians of other parts of the province in which he lives (2 John 1; 3 John 1, 4). This is the name applied in the circle of his disciples to the John who lived in Ephesus (vol. ii. 435 ff., pp. 451 ff.; above, 184 f.). A man of letters who wished to pose as the apostle John, would have brought himself into the Epistle under the name and plain title of the latter. The apostle John could, thanks to his unique position in the Church of Asia, either neglect entirely the introduction of himself (1 John) or, in the case of real letters (2 and 3 John), select an appellation which had become current in daily life. Concerning the date of the composition of the Epistles only conjectures are possible. The disinclination to write (2 John 12; 3 John 13), which stands in such contrast to the pleasure which it gives him in 1 John i. 4, may be due to the painful occasion which gave rise to the lesser Epistles, but may also be explained by the increasing age of the author, in which case the term ὁ πρεσβύτερος which he gives himself would be most appropriate. The aggravation of the internal factionalism of the congregation, which is merely hinted at in 1 John iv. 6, may be due to the fact that 1 John is directed to the Churches of Asia, which on the whole were a source of satisfaction to the apostle; while, on the other hand, the lesser Epistles refer to a local Church in which exceptionally critical conditions had developed. But a further development may have taken place. The abuse which Diotrephes made of his episcopal position seems to take for granted that this institution was not one which was entirely new. At the same time it is likely that 2 and 3 John were written several years later than 1 John.

1. (P. 374.) Recent works on the subject are : POGGEL, Der 2 and 3 Brief des Apostels Jo. 1896 ; HARNACK, TU, xv. 3b, 1897, on Third John ; CHAPMAN, "The historical setting of the 2. and 3. epistles of St. John," JThS, 1904, p. 357 ff., 517 ff. Chapman infers from 3 John 7 that the strangers, who had been hospitably received by Gaius, had journeyed to the East from Rome, on account of the persecution of Nero. One of these was Demetrius (ver. 12), identical with Demas (Col. iv. 14 ; 2 Tim. iv. 10), in whose home city, Thessalonica, Gaius was also resident ; the same Gaius as the native of Corinth mentioned in Rom. xvi. 23, who, according to a tradition referred to by Origen, became the first bishop of Thessalonica. Therefore Diotrophes also lived in the same city ; and the letter, referred to in 3 John 9, but not extant to-day, was directed to that city. 2 John is subjected to similar caprices.

2. (P. 374.) The reference to hospitality is given in ver. 5, καὶ τοῦτο ξένους ; ver. 6, προπέμψεις refers to aid on the journey (vol. ii. 54, n. 4). For ἐχάρην λίαν in ver. 3, cf. Philem. 7 ; Phil. iv. 10 ; Polyc. Phil. i. 1 ; vol. i. 456, n. 3. In ver. 3, ἀδελφῶν, which is without an article, might refer to other than the persons mentioned in ver. 5, except that in ver. 6 μαρτυρεῖν, which we find in 6 as in ver. 3, is attributed to those who are now journeying to Gaius, only in ver. 6 the word has a more definite object. For ὑπὲρ τοῦ ὀνόματος, cf. Rom. i. 5 ; for τὸ ὄνομα, which = the name of Christ, see Acts v. 41 = ix. 16, xv. 26. In the Didache, xi. 3-6, we learn of the itinerant missionary preachers of a somewhat later period, called ἀπόστολοι (cf. also vol. i. 290 f., 302, 306).

3. (P. 375.) This Gaius can hardly be identical with the Gaius of Corinth (1 Cor. i. 14 ; Rom. xvi. 23), nor with the Macedonian of the same name (Acts xix. 29), but perhaps he is the same as the Gaius of Derbe (Acts xx. 4 ; vol. i. 209, n. 2). This Gaius is referred to in Const. vii. 46, where he is represented as having been ordained by John as bishop of Pergamum, just as Demetrius, mentioned in 3 John 12, is made bishop of Philadelphia. That φιλοξενία was a duty everywhere incumbent upon the Christians is evidenced by 3 John 8 ; cf. Tit. iii. 14 ; 1 Tim. v. 10 ; Rom. xii. 13 ; Heb. xiii. 2 ; 1 Pet. iv. 9 ; but because it was the duty of the Church, it was a special obligation on the part of those at the head of the Church (1 Tim. iii. 2 ; Tit. i. 8 ; Herm. Sim. ix. 27 ; Just. Apol. i. 67). Letters of introduction in the apostolic Church were always directed to the Church (Rom. xvi. 1 ; 2 Cor. iii. 1, viii. 23 f. ; Polyc. ad Phil. xiv.).

4. (P. 375.) The reading ἔγραψα ᾧν instead of τί, ver. 9, is due either to the feeling that it is improper for an apostle to confess that he is powerless against the Church, or, less probably, if the reference to 2 John is denied, to the desire to avoid the necessity of assuming a lost letter. It is of itself quite conceivable that John should say that in a letter to the Church he had already made the same request and recommendation that he does in 3 John, knowing, however, that it was useless, because Diotrophes would use his influence against it. But (1) in that case we should have, instead of τί, rather περὶ τούτων, αὐτὸ τοῦτο, or some similar expression ; (2) it is hardly likely that John would have made his request of the Church when he knew that it would be refused because of the opposition of Diotrephes; (3) it is certain also on other grounds that our 2 John is here meant, which says nothing concerning the introduction of travelling Christians. The situation, therefore, is rather that outlined above, pp. 374, 381.

5. (P. 375.) Of course, after the constant use of the personal pronoun "I" in the letter, the ἡμᾶς in vv. 9 and 10 cannot mean John alone, nor John and all who thought as he did, for the reason that the reference here is not to the hospitable reception of travelling brethren, as in ver. 10b, but to the recognition of authority and respect for exhortations. Consequently the reference here, as in 1 John i. 1-4, iv. 6, 14, must be to John and the other eye-witnesses who were in the province; above, p. 357 f.

6. (P. 376.) The word φιλόπρωτος = English, ambitious (Artemid. ii. 32; Plut. Mor. 844 E), does not mean one who is not yet πρῶτος, any more than φιλάργυρος means a poor man merely desirous of obtaining money (cf. φιλόλογος, φιλόσοφος, φιλότιμος, φιλόπικρος, φιλόνηκος, φιλόξενος). It can refer to persons of distinction, ambitiously inclined, who lay undue weight upon their position as such and misuse it, as well as to those who are desirous of winning such a position for the first time (cf. Matt. xxiii. 6 = Mark xii. 38 f.; Clem. Ep. ad Jac. ii. ἡ τοιαύτη καθέδρα (the bishop's chair) οὐ φιλοκαθεδρουῖντος πολυηροῦ χρείαν ἔχει, Iren. iv. 26. 3 speaks of presbyters, i.e. of holders of the πρωτοκαθεδρία (cf. Clem. Strom. vi. 106 f.; Herm. Vis. iii. 9. 7), who contumeliis agunt reliquos et principalis consessionis (πρωτοκαθεδρίας) timore elati sunt; cf. 1 Tim. iii. 6. To this class belongs Diotrephes, although, according to 3 John 9-10, he is not, like the προηγούμενοι τῆς ἐκκλησίας in Rome in the time of Hermas (loc. cit., and vol. ii. 124, n. 5), a member of the πρεσβυτέρων, but a ruler. What John may write to the Church is without effect save as Diotrephes allows it to be effective. He determines how travelling Christians shall be received. Those who do not submit to his will he excommunicates. If there were even moderate opposition on the part of other office-holders, or if there were co-operation between him and them, there would be some hint of it. Demetrius, who is mentioned in ver. 12, may be a presbyter who opposed Diotrephes—an assumption which possibly gets some support from the reading ἐκκλησίας instead of ἀληθείας, ver. 12 (see Gwynn, Hermathena, 1890, p. 304). But in that case the official position of the presbyter, as over against the bishop, must have been very weak. Demetrius may also have been one of the missionaries (vv. 3-8), the leader of the company of travellers. John makes no attempt to weaken the official position of Diotrephes by defining the latter's rights and the rights of others; he simply reproves Diotrephes' opinions, words, and deeds on moral grounds.

7. (P. 378.) According to Nestle's edition, 2 John consists of only 33 lines, of which two contain only a few words, and two are not complete; 3 John likewise consists of 33 lines, of which six are incomplete. Counting the letters, and allowing 36 letters for the ancient line, gives for 2 John 32 lines, for 3 John not quite 31 line; cf. GK, i. 76, ii. 397. The resemblance of style is closer than between Eph. and Col., or between 1 Tim. and Tit. Cf. ὁ πρεσβύτερος (without a name) . . . οὗς (ὁν) ἐγὼ ἀγαπῶ ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (2 John 1; 3 John 1), ἐχάρην λίαν . . . περιπατοῦντας ἐν ἀληθείᾳ, καθὼς (4 and 3), ἀργάτωσθε (3 and 5); cf. especially 2 John 12, and 3 John 13-14.

8. (P. 379.) It is true that Κερία does occur, although seldom, as a proper name, and is found in Asia Minor (cf. Sterrett, The Wolfe Exped. p. 138, No. 237; p. 389, No. 564; Epigraph. Journey, p. 167, No. 159), as does also Κίριος, which is found even in the Talmud, Jer. Shabbath, 7c; Beza, 61d; cf. the Aramaic name Martha, with the meaning κυρία. Even if this rendering were possible in 2 John 5, it is out of the question in ver. 1, where we should certainly expect Κυρία τῇ ἐκλεκτῇ (cf. ver. 13; Rom. xvi. 13, cf. 8-10, and the entire list of names in this passage where similar epithets are used; see also Ign. Smyrn. xiii. 2). Neither can κυρία be the title of a woman of rank; because, in the first place, the early Christians by common consent refrained from the use of such titles (above, p. 81, n. 3); in the second place, while such a title might be used in address (ver. 5; cf. Phil. iv. 3; 1 Tim. vi. 11), in a greeting it would have to stand in apposition to a proper name (1 Tim. i. 2; Philem. 1). While S² S³ transcribe κυρία as a proper name, ἐκλεκτή is so taken by Clement of Alexandria. He seems to have discovered the same name in ver. 13 also, where he construed it in apposition to σοῦ. On this basis he appears to have justified the identification of the woman addressed in 2 John as Ἐκλεκτή with the συνεκλεκτή of 1 Pet. v. 13. In this way he makes her a Babylonian, and maintains that under existing political conditions she and her children, who are likewise addressed, were Parthians. In this way arose the mythical title or subscription to 2 John, πρὸς Πάρθους (misread παρθένους by the Latin translator of Clement). In the West this was transferred to 1 John, and even to all three of the Epistles (cf. Forsch. iii. 92, 99 ff.). The opinion that κυρία is a figurative name for a local church is not a new discovery (cf. Scholion of Matthæi, pp. 153 and 242, where, however, the question as to whether the reference is to a man or to a church is left undecided); Jerome, Ep. cxxiii. 12, Val.² i. 909. Since 1 Pet. was highly esteemed by the disciples of John in Asia, to which province the Epistle was directed, it is not unlikely that John was acquainted with it, and that 1 Pet. v. 13 led him to personify the Church, and to employ the word ἐκλεκτός, which is very rarely used by him elsewhere (only in John i. 34, above, p. 284, n. 2, and Rev. xvii. 17). The Church is not only the bride of Christ (John iii. 29; Rev. xxii. 14), but also His wife (Rev. xxi. 9; Eph. v. 22-32; cf. Rom. vii. 4), and what is true of the Church as a whole is applicable to the individual Church (2 Cor. xi. 2), only in this case the Church is not "the wife," but a "wife of the κύριος," so that κυρία stands without the article. The transfer of the name κύριος in its feminine form to the wife is not a customary Jewish, Greek, or Roman usage, but yet it finds a certain analogy in the use of the term Shulamite in Cant. vii. 1 [Eng. vi. 13], the choice of which word is, without prejudice to its original meaning, determined by its relation to Solomon. Neither does the interpretation of the word to mean an individual woman agree with the contents of the Epistle. If John wished to say that he had had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with some of this woman's children while on a visit to their aunt (ver. 13), and of hearing that they were good Christians,—while in ver. 1 he assumes the same to be true of the woman's other children, whom he did not know personally,—the language of ver. 4 is impossible. This is practically Poggel's position (work cited n. 1), S. 137 ff. Moreover, the greeting in ver. 3, the apostolic fulness and solemnity of which are in strong contrast to the almost secular tone of 3 John 2 (vol. i. 78, n. 2; 119, n. 7), shows that it is not a friendly family which is here addressed, but a Church in which there was much to be desired in the way of grace, compassion, peace, love, and truth.

9. (P. 379.) It is assumed that εἰργάσασθε (Iren. iii. 16. 8; Lucifer, p. 29; NA S² S³) is the correct reading in 2 John 8. The recollection of such passages as 1 Thess. iii. 5; Gal. iv. 11; Phil. ii. 16, caused the correction to εἰργασάμεθα (B Sah. Vulg. Cop. margin of S³, i.e. Egyptian texts), in conformity to which were written ἀπολέσωμεν and ἀπολάβωμεν (KLP, i.e. Antiochian texts), whereas, as a matter of fact, John vi. 27–29, 1 Thess. i. 3, are a close analogy.

§ 72. THE NATURE, STRUCTURE, AND UNITY OF REVELATION.

The book which we are accustomed to call the Revelation of John after its author, who speaks of himself repeatedly by name (i. 1, 4, 9, xxii. 8), styles itself the revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave to Him to impart to His servants, announcing through it prophetically what must shortly come to pass. In carrying out this divine commission, Jesus, through His angel, imparted the revelation given Him to His servant John, who committed to writing all that it had been given him to see, and so presented, in his book, the word of God and the testimony of Christ (i. 1–2, n. 1); for in the last analysis it is God who speaks to John, and Christ who testifies to him.

The decision to put into writing the revelation which he had received, and to send it to seven Churches of Asia, was not his own; it was the execution of a task repeatedly imposed upon him in the vision, both as regards the whole of what he had seen, and in respect of its separate parts (i. 11, 19, ii. 1, 8, etc., xiv. 13, xix. 9, xxi. 5, xxii. 10). Only once is he forbidden to write down a communication made to him (x. 4). The condition in which he represents himself when he saw and heard that which goes to make up the contents of his book is described as one of ecstasy, and his seeing and hearing as that of a vision (i. 10, iv. 2, n. 1). On the other hand, when the revelation comes to him through an angel, even when the appearance is not a visible and audible one (i. 1, xxii. 6, 8, 16, n. 1), the author will have us understand that the ecstatic state and all the events therein experienced and impressions therein received are the direct results of the influence upon his nature, of this heavenly messenger. It is upon this origin of the book and its contents that the author bases the consciousness that in it he has, as a human witness (i. 2; cf. xxii. 8, 18), presented the word of God and the testimony of Christ; and thus has the right to call his work a revelation (i. 1) and a word and book of prophecy (i. 3, xxii. 7, 10, 18, 19). It is but another way of expressing the same thing when this communication to John, and through him to different persons and Churches, is said to be the word of the Spirit to those for whom the book is intended (ii. 7, 11, 17, 29, iii. 6, 13, 22; cf. xxii. 16 f.); for even the recording of the revelation, bidden as he is to make it, is a προφητεῖν (x. 11), and what the prophet speaks or writes is everywhere a declaration of the Spirit (Acts xxi. 11, 1 Tim. iv. 1; 1 Thess. v. 19 f., n. 2).

The Revelation of John consequently takes its place as a part of Christian prophecy, which, as a source of knowledge, edification, and action, was such a powerful and highly esteemed manifestation of the Spirit in the time of the apostles. Revelation is distinguished from the other products of this Christian prophecy merely in the fact that it is a written record of revelation received; whereas the prophets, so far as we know, had up to this time contented themselves with oral utterance. In this Revelation becomes a continuation of the writings of the O.T. prophets (n. 2). An understanding of the contents, origin, and value of Revelation, indeed even of the meaning of many individual passages, and of the nature of the book itself, is impossible until one has at least stated clearly the question with what right the author speaks thus of himself and of his book, and has answered it with the candour which is indispensable in scientific thinking. It is a misuse of language to speak of the author of the book as the "Seer," and to hold at the same time that he saw nothing but some books lying about him within the light of his study lamp; while it is a violation of the laws of historical criticism to assume that the author himself was as confused in regard to the origin of the pictures represented as his visions, as are many scholars who seek to explain them. His statements mentioned just above leave nothing to be desired in the way of clearness; and the claim which he makes for his rendering of the revelations received (i. 2 f., xxii. 18 f.) bears no evidence of uncertainty. When, as author of the book, he represented himself to be a witness to the word of God and to the testimony of Jesus, he must have known as well as Paul, as a preacher, that there are false witnesses, who report as facts things which have never occurred (1 Cor. xv. 15). He protests the same horror at all lying (xxi. 27, xxii. 15; cf. xiv. 5) as the John of the Gospel and of the Epistles. In declaring his book to be prophetic—ranking himself thus on the one hand with the prophets of the O.T., and on the other with those of the apostolic age—he does not claim absolute infallibility; for the prophets of the apostolic age had to subject themselves to the criticism of their fellow-Christians, and were under necessity of being cautioned against unnatural excitement, and the infusion of their own thoughts and desires into what was given them by the Spirit (n. 2). But there is no doubt that, in so estimating himself and his book, he assures us of the absence of any conscious admixture of this sort. On the other hand, every Christian prophet of that time must have been conscious of the contrast between the true and the false prophets who appeared among them, especially one who was acquainted with such persons in his immediate neighbourhood (Rev. ii. 20; 1 John iv. 1, cf. Matt. vii. 15–23, xxiv. 11, 24; Luke vi. 26; 2 Pet. ii. 1; Rev. xix. 20). These are, without exception, depicted as immoral men, and in some cases as preachers of false doctrine. But the idea of false prophets involves neither immorality nor false teaching (n. 2, end); it is rather the pretending to be a prophet and to have received divine revelation without this really having been the case (Rev. ii. 20; Jer. xiv. 14; Deut. xviii. 20-22). They are to be known by their fruits in life and in doctrine; but to these fruits belongs, first of all, the sincerity of their statements as to the origin of their preaching. In the case of the early Christian, there can be no suspicion of confusion in regard to these elemental truths. From the name ἀποκάλυψις, a title never borne by any writing before the time of Revelation, has been divined the idea of an "apocalyptic literature." The determining features of this class of writing (n. 3) are secured, however, not from the specific peculiarities of the Revelation of John, but from certain formal similarities between it and the Book of Enoch, the Book of the Twelve Patriarchs, the Book of Jubilees, IV Ezra, the Apocalypse of Baruch, the Sibylline Oracles, the Ascension of Moses, and the Ascension of Isaiah. Even if one considers the Book of Daniel, the first specimen of the "apocalyptic literature," on the assumption that it was composed about 168 B.C., common sense and an uncorrupted taste rebel at placing in the same literary group the Revelation of John, although it be the one from which the group has been named. A presentation of the world's historical development in the form of prophecy purporting to be of an earlier date, if it occurs at all in Revelation, is an entirely subordinate feature of the book.

As far as the pseudonymy is concerned, which constitutes the very essence of this literature, who can compare the name of Enoch or Moses, or even Daniel, Baruch, or Ezra, with that of John! The writers of these books transported themselves hundreds and thousands of years into the past, clothed themselves with the illustrious names of hoary antiquity, and then addressed themselves to the credulous public of their own day, without even so much as fabricating a personal relationship to it. In Revelation, on the other hand, a man speaks to seven Churches of the province of Asia, and commits to them his book. He is accurately acquainted with their present condition (§ 73), and speaks to them under the name of John—a name which circa 70–100 was borne by the most prominent ecclesiastical personality in that region; and all this is done, according to tradition, circa 95, i.e. at a time when the celebrated John of Ephesus was still living, and, by any conceivable hypothesis, at a time when the personal disciples of this John were yet alive. Although no intelligent person to-day believes that Enoch or Ezra wrote the books which bear their names, or that the daughter of Noah proclaimed the future in Homeric verses, but recognises the artificial character of such inventions, we have here to do with the product of the Christian Church in a time when visions, inspirations of different kinds and preaching based upon them, were part of the accepted order of the day. According to the testimony of Paul, the Book of Acts, and the literature of the Early Church, certain things, in spite of all the contemporary criticism, had maintained their character in the consciousness of the Church as a product of the prophetic spirit, independent of the personal desire and opinion of the speaker. He who has not the courage to characterise everything of this sort as artificial patchwork or pseudo-prophecy, has no right to treat a book, originating in that time and representing itself to be a book of prophecy based upon visionary experiences, as an artificial literary product, or a mixture of the effects of ecstatic states and the painstaking art of a man of letters at variance with the spirit of his time. Especially is this impossible when we consider that it was immediately recognised as contemporary and genuine by the Churches to which it was directed. To write a book on the basis of visions experienced is, of course, literary work which cannot be produced so mechanically as the impressions of a photographic plate. That the recording of the visions received may be a προφητεύειν (x. 11), the prophet who employs the medium of writing must, to the same degree as the one who speaks orally to the congregation, reproduce vividly the apocalypsis which he has received. He must also have the prophetic spirit, which, however, does not, as in the state of ecstatic vision, raise his consciousness above the external world and limit his individual activity, but awakens and stimulates it to prophetic enthusiasm. But it does not follow from this that the book is an artificial product of the artist, which deliberately deviates from the content of the vision which he has seen. It would in so doing lose the very claim which it makes. The book cannot be understood without taking the standpoint of the author and his first readers; so that we must assume, if only for the sake of argument, that John in i. 10-xxii. 16 is giving an account of visions which he has really experienced.

Disregarding for the time being the extended title of the book, John gives it the form of an epistle to "the Seven Churches in Asia." As in the apostolic Epistles, he begins with an address (i. 4-5*a*), in which he speaks of himself and of the recipients of the letter in the third person; but, like Paul and Peter, and in contrast to the antique epistolary style, drops into the direct address—using "you" and "we" (including "I")—when he comes to the greeting itself. A doxology follows (vv. 5*b*-6; cf. Eph. i. 3; 1 Pet. i. 3), which is separated by an Amen from the next two sentences, that furnish a hint of the contents of the following writing. After this there comes an announcement of the return of Christ (ver. 7), given from the standpoint of the writer and strengthened by ναί, ἀμήν, and an utterance of the almighty God (ver. 8). The Epistle in which John speaks of himself throughout in the first person (i. 9, xxi. 8, 18)—a form to be expected in letter-writing—begins at this point. The fact that—except for the words of Christ addressed to the individual Churches and their leaders (ii. 1–iii. 22)—the readers are not again addressed after i. 9 or in the closing greeting (n. 4), shows that the epistolary form, as in the case of many didactic and historical writings of that time (above, pp. 42, 81, n. 2, 223, n. 1), is intended merely to express in a clear manner the fact that the account is especially designed for certain definite readers. But this casting of the whole book in the form of an epistle does not exclude the use of a book title, any more than in other literature; indeed, this would be more in accord with common custom. It was all the more natural not to leave the book without a title, since its epistolary form might cause it, after a single reading, to be laid aside. But the author is persuaded of the importance of its contents for the Churches. It takes its place beside the “prophetical books” which the Church had inherited from Israel, as one of the same kind. It is to be to her an eternal possession, which she is to protect, as a sacred treasure, from every violation (xxii. 18 f.), and use diligently until the longed-for return of Christ (xxii. 17, 20), i.e. she is to make it accessible to her members by reading it in the meetings at public worship (i. 3; cf. 2, 7, 11, etc., xxii. 10, 17). Furthermore, the author is convinced that the contents of the book are designed and have significance not only for the seven Churches to which it is sent as an epistle, but for all the servants of God and of Christ (i. 1, xxii. 6)—for the whole of Christendom (xxii. 17), His Bride.

The Churches to which the prophetic spirit speaks through this book (ii. 7, 11, 17, 29, iii. 6, 13, 22, xxii. 16) are doubtless primarily the seven Churches of Asia; though its range of vision and purpose extend far beyond these to all the Churches (ii. 23). But just because the book was in the form of an epistle to the seven Churches, it was necessary by means of a formal book title to give expression to the fact that it was intended for the whole

Church, and for reading at divine service. A little reflection might have saved the writers of more recent literature on Revelation and their readers any surprise that the author, who in the body of the book speaks of himself in the first person, should employ the third person in the title (n. 5). There are also many things-difficult to understand which vanish when one bears in mind that the make-up of the book presupposes that all of the preceding visions have already been seen (n. 6), and by remembering that under normal conditions, especially in ancient times (above, p. 80, n. 1), the title is the part of the book last written, just as it is to-day the part last printed. Therefore the writer is looking backward in the title not only on the revelations received at an earlier time (vv. 1, 2*b*, εἶδεν), but also upon his completed literary activity (ver. 2*a*, ἐμαρτύρησεν), and he pictures to himself the near future when the ἀναγνώστης will read the book before the assembled congregation (ver. 3). But even when he begins to put in writing the book opening with i. 4, the visions lie behind him, their content being present to his mind; and his mode of expression acquires a definiteness which can be accounted for only by them. Since in i. 11 seven local Churches lying in the province of Asia are designated by him as those to whom he is to send the completed book, and since, in the course of the first vision, he receives the commission to speak to each of the congregations a special word, which, as a constituent part of the book directed to all seven of them, each will receive, read, and hear (n. 6), these seven Churches must have been definitely present in his mind from the start (i. 4).

It is not the Churches of Asia which are here alluded to (cf. 1 Cor. xvi. 1, 19; Gal. i. 2),—as though there were not in this province, even as early as the time of Paul, independent congregations at Colossæ, Hierapolis, and Troas (Col. i. 1, ii. 1, iv. 13; Acts xx. 6 ff.; 2 Cor. ii. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 13),—but the seven Churches designated by the angel which are all to be found in Asia. The definiteness with which he also speaks in i. 4 of the seven spirits before the throne of God, where, on the analogy of 2 Cor. xiii. 13, 1 Pet. i. 2, one would expect instead to find but one, is to be explained on the basis of the vision in which the Spirit revealed itself to John in the form of seven torches before the throne of God, and as the seven eyes of the lamb standing by it (iv. 5, v. 6). In Rev. ii. 7, xiv. 13, xxii. 17, however, it is the one spirit who is spoken of. One may characterise the definiteness of expression in i. 4, which is conditioned in this way, as literary awkwardness; but at any rate it bears witness to the origin of the written account, in visions previously experienced.

The division of the account into the two unequal parts i. 10–iii. 22 and iv. 1–xxii. 9, corresponds to the division of the subject-matter of all the visions into that which already existed at the time of the revelation, and that which is to come to pass in the future (i. 19, n. 6). The first part represents a single vision. John is sojourning upon the island Patmos. It is the Lord's Day. While the apostle is in an ecstatic state, Christ reveals Himself to him, in priestly array, as the Lord who rules in His Church, and who judges it with the sword of His word, and during the whole vision continues to speak to the apostle who has fallen at His feet, and through him to the "angels" of the seven Churches. At the close there is no mention of the vanishing of the vision or of the cessation of the ecstasy; but both are presupposed in iv. 1 f.

The indefinite term μετὰ ταῦτα, iv. 1 (cf. vii. 9, xv. 5; John v. 1, vi. 1), may denote hours and days quite as well as a very short intermission. As John tells nothing at all of the execution of the command to write out what he has seen, it is possible that in the intermission that occurred he may have proceeded with the writing down of the first vision, i. 10–iii. 22. According to iv. 2, John falls again into a trance, which presupposes that he had returned to consciousness; and the fact that the voice of the angel who shows him what he sees is said to be the same as that which spoke to him in i. 10, enables us to recognise the beginning of another revelation. No feature of the picture which John had before him during the first vision passes over into the new one. When Christ appears later, it is in another form (v. 6, xix. 11), nor does He ever again speak with the apostle face to face (on xxii. 10-16, 20, see n. 4). In the second vision (iv. 1-viii. 1), which is interrupted toward the close by two episodes (vii. 1-8, 9-17), John feels himself transported to heaven and beholds the Creator and Ruler of the world (chap. iv.) sitting upon His throne adorned with the attributes of His might over the world, surrounded by the council of His spirits, and unceasingly praised by all the adoring creatures of heaven. Not until John has received the impression of this picture as a whole does he become conscious of a βιβλίον on the right of the Enthroned, which is written only within, and on the back close sealed with seven seals (v. 1, n. 7). When it becomes evident that in the whole circle of creation no one can be found who would be able by loosing the seals to open the βιβλίον and read the writing contained in it, John breaks out into loud weeping over the fact, but is comforted by one of the twenty-four elders who sit around the throne of God, and reminded him of the Lion of the tribe of Judah, who has won a victory by virtue of which He can break the seven seals and open the book. Only now does John observe in the vision a Lamb, standing in the midst of the throne, and bearing marks as though it had been slain. This Lamb, amidst the songs of praise from the spirits of heaven, and from all creatures, receives from the hand of God the βιβλίον, and breaks in succession its seven seals (vi. 1-viii. 1).

The word βιβλίον itself permits of a great many interpretations, but for the readers of that time it was designated by the seven seals on its back beyond the possibility of mistake. Just as in Germany before the introduction of money-orders, every one knew that a letter sealed with five seals contained money, so the most simple member of the Asiatic Churches knew that a βιβλίον made fast with seven seals was a testament (n. 8). When the testator dies the testament is brought forward, and, when possible, opened in the presence of the seven witnesses who sealed it; i.e. unsealed, read aloud, and executed. The making of a will assumes that the death of the testator lies in the future, while its opening and execution imply that his death has taken place. But, as is well known, the Christians of earliest times, although mindful of the fact that God does not die (Heb. ix. 16 f.) and that omne simile claudicat, do not hesitate to imagine the property supposed to belong to God, to His Son, and to His Church, and the entrance of the Church into possession of it, under the figure of inheritance (heritage and inheriting), and accordingly, to compare the assurance of these properties on God's part with a testamentary disposition. Jesus Himself uses the figure (Luke xxii. 29, cf. Matt. v. 5, xxi. 38, xxv. 34; Mark xii. 7; Luke xx. 14), and all the N.T. writers (Gal. iii. 15–iv. 7; Rom. viii. 17 ff.; Eph. i. 14, 18, v. 5; Col. i. 12, iii. 24; 1 Pet. i. 4; Heb. i. 2, vi. 17, viii. 6, ix. 15 ff.; Jas. ii. 5). So also here, the document fastened with seven seals is an easily understood symbol of the promise and assurance by God to His Church of the future βασιλεία. This irrevokable disposition of God, similar to a man's testamentary disposition of his goods, has long ago occurred, been documented and sealed, but not yet carried out. The inheritance is still laid up in heaven (1 Pet. i. 4), and the testament therefore not yet opened and executed. That its content has been proclaimed through the prophets, and through Jesus and the Spirit which rules in the Church (1 Cor. ii. 10), and has to a certain extent become known, does not destroy its resemblance to a sealed testament still waiting to be opened, any more than the oral communication of a human testator, concerning the content of his will, destroys the importance of the document and renders its opening unnecessary. Apart from the fact that the heritages promised to the Church are to exceed all previous human experience, imagination, and anticipation (1 Cor. ii. 7-9, xiii. 12; 1 John iii. 2), and that not until they are delivered over will their true nature be disclosed (Rom. viii. 18), the point of comparison, since the promise of future glory and royal dominion is likened to a sealed will, lies not so much in the fact that no one knows the contents, as that they still await realisation. No one is authorised to open the testament and thereby to put into execution the will of God therein laid down, except the Lamb, who by dying gained the victory like a lion, and delivered the Church (v. 5, 9 f.). The returning Christ will open the testament of God and execute it. The fact that a will is opened by breaking all the seven seals at one time, but that in the vision the seals are broken one after the other by the Lamb, and that the opening of each seal is accompanied by a vision (vi. 1-17, viii. 1), does not destroy the applicability of the symbolism. At the same time, the breaking of the seals of a testament is a complicated act, which may be divided into seven operations, and which primarily prepares the way for its opening and execution. For this reason it is well adapted to show what, through the returned Christ, preparatory to it must precede the final fulfilment of the promise. The visions which occur as the first six seals are opened naturally bear upon the contents of the still unopened testament in this way: (1) the word of God must take its victorious way through the world (vi. 2, cf. Matt. xxiv. 14); (2) bloody wars must come (ver. 3 f., cf. Matt. xxiv. 6; Mark xiii. 7); (3) times of scarcity (ver. 5 f.); (4) plagues destroying part of the people (ver. 7 f., cf. Matt. xxiv. 7; Luke xxi. 11); then (5) bloody persecutions of the Church, the punishment for which is delayed (vv. 9-11, cf. Matt. xxiv. 9; Mark xiii. 11-13); but at last (6) events in nature which are to convulse the world and fill earthly despots with terrible anticipation of the wrath of God and of the Lamb which is about to be outpoured upon them (vv. 12-17, cf. Matt. xxiv. 29 f.; Luke xxi. 25, xxiii. 30). After the events which prepare the way for the end have thus led up almost to the day of the parousia, the opening of the seventh seal can bring only the parousia itself. But this is also to be seen from the figure of the testament itself with its seven seals; for with the loosing of the seventh seal the testament is opened and will thereupon be executed. But instead of there being any description of this act or the statement that it has occurred, a silence of about half an hour intervenes in heaven, where the apostle has been since iv. 1 (viii. 1), and neither here nor in the further course of the narrative does there follow anything which can be taken to be the phenomena accompanying the opening of the seventh seal.

When, therefore, in place of an apocalyptic description of the opening of the testament—i.e. the induction of the Church into the inheritance vouchsafed by God through Christ, the opener and executor of the will—this long silence occurs, it may be meant that not only is this act, which has been prepared for by the opening of the six seals, not to be described now or at all by word or picture, but also that this silence is a symbol of the condition which has thereby come upon the Church. God's people have entered into the Sabbath rest promised them (Heb. iv. 1-11).

This was all the easier to understand, since both the inserted episodes (vii. 1-8, 9-17) answer the pressing question as to what the condition of the Church is to be during the world-convulsing events immediately preceding the parousia (vi. 12-17), which is now described under the new figure of a devastating storm (vii. 1 ff.). The first answer is that one hundred and forty-four thousand of the people of Israel will be kept from this world-disaster and saved out of the midst of it (vii. 3-8). But the further question as to how it will be at that time with a much larger congregation collected from all the nations (vii. 9; cf. v. 9), is answered by the second episode: they are taken up into heaven, dying, from the final tribulation of the Church (a familiar idea, vii. 14; cf. Matt. xxiv. 15-28) which was alluded to in iii. 10 and vi. 11*b*, and there enjoy the repose of the blessed.

The impression that the silence in heaven, after the opening of the last seal, lasted about half an hour (viii. 1), could not but have constituted a sharp division for the apostle's consciousness, before whose eyes the vision of iv. 1-viii. 1 must have passed in a much shorter time. With viii. 2-xi. 18 comes a third vision, which is interrupted before the seventh trumpet-blast by two episodes (x. 1-11, xi. 1-14), just as the second vision is interrupted by two episodes before the seventh seal is opened. In viii. 2 we do not hear, as in iv. 2, of another ecstasy. The scene of action and the place where the apostle is stationed remain the same as in iv. 2-viii. 1. Nothing follows, however, which can be made to connect with the opening and execution of the testament by the returning Christ; but a description begins here which refers back to a point preceding this time, and one which, as the reference to vii. 3 in ix. 4 shows, takes us back to a point immediately preceding the parousia. As a consequence of the first four trumpet-blasts (viii. 6-12), which are separated by ver. 13 from the three following, occur catastrophes in nature, which in each case affect one part of the earth only; while, as a result of the fifth and sixth trumpet-blasts, such judgments are pronounced as affect men themselves, without, however, moving them to repentance (ix. 1-21).

At the seventh blast of the trumpet, which is closely connected with the fifth and sixth by ix. 12, xi. 14, in spite of their being separated by the episode in x. 1-xi. 14, there is again, as in the case of the opening of the seventh seal, no description of what happens; but we have here expressed by the songs of praise in heaven, just as in the former case by the silence, what takes place when the seventh act is performed. God and Christ have begun their world rule (xi. 15): God is no longer the One who is to come in the future (xi. 17; cf. per contra i. 4, ὁ ἐρχόμενος), but the One who has come to judgment in order to punish enemies and to reward the godly. It is, in fact, the "last trump," of which Christian prophecy had already spoken elsewhere (1 Cor. xv. 52; 1 Thess. iv. 12). As announced beforehand in x. 7, and as we saw in viii. 1, the end has again been reached; but it is not described.

The first episode expresses the thought that the apostle is not to communicate to the Church (x. 4) everything which he sees, but that he shall later experience and preach to the Church more than formerly the judgments of God upon the nations (x. 8-11).

Jerusalem, the once holy city, forms a contrast to the heathen; in punishment for the crucifixion of Jesus, it has, like Sodom and Egypt, experienced judgments which have brought it nigh unto destruction (n. 9). By the chronological statement (ver. 26) we are transported into the time of the last calamity brought about by the anti-christ, made familiar by Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7, 11. This tribulation will extend even unto Jerusalem (Matt. xxiv. 15-24), and at that very place will reach its culmination in the killing of the two prophets who are still to be a last protection to the Church; but a sacred area, and a congregation of the true worshippers of God remain, protected from the antichrist (xi. 1 f.; cf. vii. 3-8, ix. 4); and even the people of Jerusalem, who do not belong to this congregation, will, after a severe judgment, repent (xi. 13).

A fourth vision (xi. 19–xiv. 20) is introduced by a view of the Ark of the Covenant, set up in the Holy of Holies. The forms in which it is presented are borrowed from the O.T. sanctuary, but the expressions used show that the technical terms are not employed as familiar names for the objects themselves, but in accordance with the real meaning of the terms, and as symbols for higher things. It is the temple of God in heaven which is meant, in which there is no longer any barrier to shut out from view the holy of holies (Heb. vi. 19 f., ix. 8–12); and what the apostle sees is the ark in which the διαθήκη of God is deposited: i.e. no longer the long-vanished tables of the Law, but the documents of the eternally valid testament of God. The conception is similar to that of the sealed testament in v. 1, with but the difference that in the former instance the expressions are borrowed from the heathen legal institutions, while here they are taken from the holy institutions of Israel. In the former instance the subject is that which God has promised to His Church collected from all nations, including Israel; in the latter case, that which He has promised His Church in so far as it is the continuation of the O.T. Church and realises its purpose in a believing Israel.

The first readers of this must have understood the vision, xi. 19–xiv. 20, more easily than we; for this idea, which was already alluded to in the prophecy of Jesus, and which Paul had before him in developed form, could not have been strange to them; and they were well acquainted with the preaching of Christian prophecy—drawn chiefly from the Book of Daniel—concerning the last battle of the rebellious power of the world with the Church, and concerning the antichrist (1 John ii. 18, above, p. 371, n. 5, also vol. i. 228 ff.). It is of a thoroughly eschatological character in the narrower sense of the term. The same is true according to xv. 1 and xvi. 17 (γέγονεν) of the fifth vision (xv. 1–xvi. 17), in which the last judgments, which are comparable to the plagues of Egypt, and which in vain call men to repentance, are represented in the form of seven angels who pour out vials full of the wrath of God. In the sixth vision (xvii. 1–xviii. 24), introduced by xvi. 18–21, an incident already touched upon in xiv. 8, xvi. 19—the judgment upon Babylon, the metropolis of the antichrist—is depicted in a retrospective view of her history. The songs of praise, which are directly connected with this vision, glorify the fall of Babylon as the beginning of the kingly dominion of God and as a last event before the marriage of the Lamb, i.e., before the final union of Christ with the Church which is now prepared for it (xix. 1–8). In this will participate, however, according to the word of the directing angel (xix. 9, 10), not only those then living, but all who have ever obeyed the invitation to the wedding and have held fast the witness of Jesus.

With this the seventh vision (xix. 11–xxi. 18) is introduced. Here is at last represented the event which was by intimation anticipated as far back as viii. 1 and again in xi. 15–18, and in xix. 7 announced as being in the immediate future. Jesus Himself comes upon the scene of action in order that, after overcoming antichrist and binding Satan, He may enter upon His kingly rule of a thousand years upon earth,—a reign in which there shall participate not only the congregation who live to witness His coming, but also those who remained true till death, and who on that day are to be brought to life. Not till the millennium has expired do the general judgment, the destruction of death, and the creation of a new world take place. In this new world there is also a new Jerusalem. It is this city which is unveiled before the eyes of John in a last and eighth vision, xxi. 8–xxii. 5 (or -xxii. 15). However, it is not conceived of as a part of the new world, but, during the period of the kingly rule of Christ, as the glorified centre of a world not yet completed, to be transformed into a new and eternal world (n. 10) when the kingly rule of Christ is over. With this the course of the story closes most appropriately; for the longing of the Church is directed not to an endless eternity, but to the specific coming of Jesus into union with His Church, and to His royal reign, limited in time, but broadening out into eternity (xxii. 17, 20).

The foregoing attempt to sketch the structure of Revelation was also intended to bring out the evident unity of the book, in spite of the lack of all literary art. It would have been labour in vain to attempt to refute the manifold hypotheses by which Revelation is represented to be a patchwork compiled from different writings, partly Jewish, partly Christian; inasmuch as this could be done convincingly only by means of a complete exegesis (n. 11). None of the inventors of such hypotheses has really come to satisfactory terms with the tradition concerning the origin of Revelation, which extends back to the circle of persons and to the times in which it was written. None of them seems once to have weighed earnestly the undeniable fact without which the story of the book would become wholly inconceivable, namely, that the book, as was required by its own statement (i. 11), was delivered immediately after its completion to the Churches of Asia which stood in close personal relation to the author, was received there as a work of the John, who was well known to these Churches, and as a true account of visions which he had experienced; and as such was read before the assembled congregation. None of these scholars has supported his claim by an exposition of the book which would satisfy even the most modest claims. Several matters which ought to be corrected have been stated already; others will be discussed in §§ 73-75.

1. (P. 384.) In no other writing of the N.T. are the difficulties of literary and historical investigation, unaided by a detailed commentary, so great as in Rev. The style of the book alone, apart from the peculiarities of its contents, makes it very difficult to understand—a fact which has called forth the most remarkable interpretations. As regards i. 1–2, it is sufficient to observe that ἐσήμανεν ἀποστείλας διὰ κτλ. (cf. Matt. xi. 2) agrees in content with ἀπέστειλεν . . . δεῖξαι, xxii. 6; ἔπεμψα . . . μαρτυρῆσαι, xxii. 16, which also refers to the whole of Rev. with this difference, namely, that σημαίνειν refers more particularly to the prophecy of future events which follows in the form of allusions, images, and figurative language (John xii. 33, xviii. 32, xxi. 19; Acts xi. 28), while δεικνύειν means rather the disclosure to the prophet by the display of images of things invisible and future. For the idea of the revealing angel, cf. Zech. i. 9, iii. 1, iv. 1; Herm. Mand. proem. § 5; Sim. ix. 1. 1–3, and Zahn, Hirt des Hermas, S. 274 ff. Through this angel, even without his becoming visible, John was enabled to hear and to see revelations (iv. 1). The reference in the latter verse to i. 10 shows that this is true of the first vision, i. 10–iii. 22, just as i. 1, xxii. 6, 8, 16 show it to be the case with all the visions of the book. Not until xvii. 1, xix. 9–10, xxi. 9–15, xxii. 1, 6–9 does the revealing angel become visible to John and communicate with him. The fact that the latter presents himself as one of the seven angels with the vials of wrath in xv. 1–7, does not prevent John from conceiving of him as the angel through whom he received all his revelations. In the account of the impressions of his visions, John has no more intention of speaking dogmatically or statistically regarding the angelic personages than in i. 1 and xxii. 6 he implies that Jesus and God have only one angel at their command (cf. Acts xii. 11), or that by ἄγγελος without an article the evangelist would imply in Matt. i. 20, ii. 13, 19 that the angels which appeared to Joseph were in every case different. No special importance is to be attached to the fact that in i. 10 f. John's ecstasy is mentioned before anything is said about what he hears and sees through the angel, whereas in iv. 2 the ecstasy appears to be a result of the angel's voice, since in iv. 1 John sees things which he could not have seen in a waking state. In iv. 1 f. he reproduces accurately sensations which he remembered, and which those who can claim no visions are able to conceive only by the analogies of sleeping and dreaming. Before normal consciousness disappeared completely, he saw a door opened in heaven. Then, when he hears again the voice which he heard at the beginning of the first vision, he feels himself entirely separated from his earthly surroundings and translated to heaven (2 Cor. xii. 2). In this way the command of the angel to ascend into heaven is realised, and the vision which follows fulfils the angel's announcement δείξω σοι. That ἐγενόμην ἐν πνεύματι, i. 10, iv. 2 = γενέσθαι ἐν ἑκστάσει, Acts xxii. 17 (x. 10, xi. 5 in contrast to ἐν ἑαυτῷ γενόμενος, cf. τῷ πνεύματι . . . τῷ τοῖς, 1 Cor. xiv. 15, 19), means a change into an ecstatic condition, does not need to be proved.

2. (Pp. 385, 386, 387.) For incidental remarks concerning prophecy in the N.T. cf. vol. i. 228 ff., 505 f.; vol. ii. 97 f., 110–118; in respect of τὸ πνεῦμα see vol. i. 207, n. 1, 234, n. 2, 237, n. 6; above, p. 16. The richest source is 1 Cor. xiv., from which two definite conclusions are to be derived: (1) that prophets, in contrast to those speaking with tongues, remain self-conscious and retain control of their powers when speaking, using language the form and contents of which are intelligible. (2) So that prophets, as contrasted with teachers and preachers without prophetic gifts, do not speak as a result of their meditation, investigations, and inferences, but always as a result of a special ἀποκάλυψις (1 Cor. xiv. 30, cf. vv. 6, 26; Eph. iii. 5). For the criticism to which it was necessary to subject even the inspired utterances of the prophets, cf. 1 Thess. v. 19–22; 1 Cor. xiv. 29; Rom. xii. 6, and the present writer's lecture on Die bleibende Bedeutung des ntl. Kanons, S. 36–46. Rev. xviii. 20, 24 (cf. xvi. 6, xvii. 6, xix. 2; vol. ii. 165, n. 4) refer to N.T. prophets, and there is no reason why x. 7, xi. 18 should be taken as having in mind the O.T. prophets exclusively and not also those of the N.T. Prophecy is a continuous chain, which reaches from the oldest prophets of the O.T. to John, their youngest brother (xxii. 6, 9). The analogy of ψευδάδελφος and ψευδαπόστολος shows beyond doubt that the idea of false prophets was familiar. Those who are in the habit of lying are not apostles and Christians, but persons who say that they are Christians, or apostles, when they are not; cf. vol. ii. 232, n. 2.

3. (P. 387.) Lücke, Komm. über die Schriften des Ev. Jo. iv. 1 (1832),—"an attempt at a complete introduction to the Revelation of John and the entire apocalyptic literature,"—introduced the latter idea. The present writer offered some objections to Lücke's classification in his work on the Hirt des Hermas (1868, S. 70 ff.) (which cannot be classified as apocalyptic literature any more than can Rev.), and in his "Apokalyptischen Studien" (ZfKW, 1885, p. 523 ff.). The latter are quoted in what follows as Ap. Stud. i. (1885) and ii. (1886). Herder's remark (Maranatha, 1779, S. 13; Werke, ed. Suphan, ix. 111), perfectly correct in itself, that the pictures in Rev. cannot be represented artistically, or at least not all of them, has had a confusing effect upon the interpretation of the book. Durer and Cornelius knew what could be drawn or painted. But from this it does not follow that there is no need to reproduce imaginatively the changing scenes of the book in order to understand them.

4. (P. 390.) The correct reading of xxii. 21 is either μετὰ πάντων without τῶν ἁγίων (thus B, and S² which adds αὐτοῦ), and certainly without ὑμῶν, or μετὰ τῶν ἁγίων with κ. In xxii. 16 it is not John but Jesus who says ὑμῖν, for in xxii. 12 (or 10)–16 Jesus again speaks to John, i.e. addresses him together with all the other Christians. It will be noted also that this final address of Christ as well as the separate saying of Jesus in xxii. 20a are, like the word spoken by God in i. 8, outside the visions the series of which ends with xxii. 8–9 (or –11). God and Christ speak through the prophet, i.e. through John, the author of the book, without becoming visible to him (God in i. 8; Christ in xxii. 12–16, 20).

5. (P. 391.) Völter (Entstehung der Apoc., 2 Aufl. 1885, S. 8 f.) holds that the later origin of i. 1–3 as compared with i. 4–6 is proved by the fact that in vv. 4–6 John introduces himself and declares his relation to the readers, whereas vv. 1–3 "are characterised by an objectivity, impossible if the verses were written by the apostle John" (similarly also SPITTA, Offenb. Joh. 1889, S. 10 ff., and also J. WEISS, Offenb. Joh. 1904, S. 35 f.). But Völter overlooks the fact that this has always been and is the character of a book title, whether written by the author himself or added later. Among the Hebrews (Jer. i. 1–3 and i. 4) and the Greeks (Herodotus, i. 1, Ἡροδότου Ἀλικαρνησέος ἱστορίης ἀπαδέξαι ἥδε κτλ., cf., on the other hand, ii. 23, ἐγώ γε οἶδα, and wherever he speaks of himself as an investigator or narrator), and, as is well known, among modern European writers, in the title of a book the author speaks of himself in the third person (edidit), where it is possible, adding all his titles as if he were writing his epitaph. On the other hand, in the preface and in the course of the book, he allows himself to use the first person—even using the familiar “thou” in the dedication to a friend (among the ancients this was permissible in the course of the book or at the end—above, p. 223, n. 1). On the other hand, in a serious book the use of the first person in the title would be a violation of style permissible only for novelists, and then in quotation marks, e.g. “Graham and I,” “We Two,” “My Wife and I.” In i. 4 also the author speaks of himself and the readers in the third person, in a wholly objective way, as is required in ancient letter-writing, and allows himself only in the extended greeting itself to change to a “you” and a “we.” But enough has already been said on this point in vol. i. 369, n. 1; above, p. 226, n. 7.

6. (P. 391, 392.) When John, before seeing anything whatever, is commanded by the voice of the revealing angel: ὁ βλέπεις γράψον εἰς βιβλίον (i. 11), and when in i. 19 (where reference to ver. 11 is indicated by οὖν) he is commanded by Christ Himself: γράψον οὖν ἃ εἶδες καὶ ἃ εἰσὶν καὶ ἃ μέλλει γενέσθαι μετὰ ταῦτα, it is perfectly self-evident that John was not directed to write down what he saw while in a state of ecstasy, accompanying as it were the visions step by step with his pen at lucid moments in his ecstasy. There is no place for such a lucid moment before iv. 1. There is no interruption in the discourse of Jesus in i. 17–iii. 22. If the vision were written out while the writer was yet in a state of ecstasy, the fact itself would necessarily be recorded like the falling down of the prophet (i. 17), and such a procedure would destroy the dramatic vividness of the visions. Moreover, it would serve no conceivable purpose; since a record originating in this way would itself be of the nature of a vision, i.e. when the prophet awoke from his ecstatic state, it would have no more objective existence than what he had seen in a state of ecstasy. Just as the present βλέπεις (ver. 11) has the force of a fut., so the aor. εἶδες has the force of a fut. perfect (cf. x. 7, xv. 1), and both alike refer to all that John sees in his ecstatic state. There is a corresponding division of what John sees and afterwards is to commit to writing into things existent in the present and events to take place in the future. To the first class belong mainly the contents of chaps. ii.–iii.; to the second class mainly the contents of chaps. iv.–xxii. The division of the contents of all the visions that follow is to be understood a potiori, as is also the designation which covers the contents of the entire book in i. 1, xxii. 6. Spitta's interpretation of the passage (Offab. des Joh. 1889, S. 29) as meaning “what thou hast seen up to this time and what it means and what may further take place, i.e. what may further be perceived by thee,” seems to the present writer scarcely to need refutation either from a grammatical or logical point of view. In ii. 1, 8, 12, 18, iii. 1, 7, 14 γράψον is naturally to be taken as in i. 11, 19, as a command to the writer that when the vision is ended he shall include these several sayings to the separate Churches in the book which in i. 11 he is directed to write and send to all the seven Churches. One should not speak any more, at least in scientific literature, of the seven apocalyptic letters.

These are not independent letters, but each Church receives its special message from Christ only as part of the book which, as a whole, is sent to them all (i. 4). The same is true of γράφον in xiv. 13, xix. 9, xxi. 5. In this way attention is called to separate sayings particularly worthy of notice. Neither can x. 4 be made a basis for the opinion that the writing of the book and the seeing of the visions took place at the same time. Since John was to regard the recording of the sevenfold voice of thunder as forbidden by God just as the recording of the other visions was commanded, during the vision he must have felt a desire to record what he heard. This made the impression of the prohibition more profound.

7. (P. 393.) The only text of v. 1 which can be regarded as genuine is γεγραμμένον ἔσωθεν καὶ ὀπισθεν κατεσφραγισμένον σφραγίδιν ἑπτὰ (A, numerous cursives, Cyp. Test. ii. 11, i.e. the earliest Latin Bible; Orig. in Ps. i., Delarue, ii. 525; cf. Epiph. Hær. lxiv. 6; S³). Since there was at an early date an inclination to connect καὶ ὀπισθεν with what precedes instead of with what follows (S² [the earlier Syr. version edited by Gwynn, 1897] inserts καί, S³ a relative before κατεσφραγισμένον), unavoidably an effort was made to get rid of the apparent disagreement between "within" and "behind"; sometimes ἔξωθεν was written for ὀπισθεν (B [in this passage = Vatic. 2066, Sæc. viii.] P, also Hippol. in Dan., ed. Bonwetsch, 276. 1; Orig. Philoc., ed. Robinson, p. 37. 10; Primas. Forsch. iv. 95; S²), and sometimes ἐμπροσθεν was used for ἔσωθεν (N, Orig. Philoc. p. 46. 15). If, then, the inharmonious readings ἔσωθεν and ὀπισθεν be correct, it follows that ἔσωθεν has no correlate, either here or in iv. 8 (which correlate would necessarily be ἔξωθεν) (Matt. xxiii. 25, 27, 28; Luke xi. 40; 1 Cor. v. 13; 2 Cor. iv. 16), and that καὶ ὀπισθεν is to be taken with κατεσφραγισμένον, as even Grotius perceived in spite of his inaccurate text. Consequently, the idea of a papyrus roll written on both sides, a so-called opistograph (against Birt, Das antike Buchwesen, S. 506), must be given up. Such a poor document as this would give an unfavourable impression of this book, which rested upon the hand of the Almighty, upon which also the salvation of the whole world depends. The ἐπὶ τὴν δεξιάν shows that it was not a roll, in which case we would necessarily read ἐν τῇ δεξιᾷ (i. 16, ii. 1, x. 2. 8; Ezek. ii. 9), if the idea be that God is holding a roll in His hand. A roll would fall from an open hand, such as John saw the βιβλίον resting upon, unless an unusual effort to balance it be assumed. Moreover, if the document were a roll, the opening of the book, which necessarily precedes the seeing and reading of the text, would not be four times described by ἀνοίξαι, to say nothing of the opening of the seal (ver. 2), but we should certainly have ἀνελεῖν (Ezek. ii. 10), ἀνελίσσειν (revolvere, the opposite of ἐλίσσειν, Rev. vi. 14), or ἀναπτέσσειν, as in Luke iv. 17. That the βιβλίον was not written on the outside is further evidenced by the fact that it was sealed seven times, the only purpose of which was to make it impossible to open the βιβλίον and to see and read its written contents. Not until the last seal was broken was it possible to open the βιβλίον and to see and read what was written in it. This βιβλίον is altogether different from the open βιβλαρίδιον in x. 2. 9; Ezek. ii. 8–iii. 3. It is not a rolled sheet, or the larger book roll, but has the form of a codex, or codicil, i.e. of a modern book. Naturally, John did not see what was written in the book, since he saw only the closed βιβλίον; but in his vision he received the impression that it was written within, just as in dreams we associate ideas with objects, although these ideas cannot be represented to the senses (cf. Gen. xl. 16). It is hardly likely that he saw the seven seals; since these were on the back of the book, i.e. certainly not on the upper side, the side turned toward the spectator, but on the side turned away from him, the side resting upon the hand of Him who sat on the throne. It is, of course, self-evident that the βιβλίον did not consist of empty pages, but that something was written in it. But to say this was not superfluous, since a letter, for example, which sometimes is called βιβλίον, has an address on the outside, a document has a mark of registration on the outside, and a literary work has a title pasted on the outside from which some idea of the contents can be derived. This βιβλίον contains writing only on the inside. No one can know what it contains, until the seals are loosed. The only suggestion as to its contents is given by the seven seals.

8. (P. 394.) E. HUSCHKE (Das Buch mit 7 Siegeln, 1860), following out the idea of his essay on the wax tablets found in Siebenbürgen, Austria (Zt. f. gesch. Rechtswiss. xii. 173 ff.), is the first writer to set forth the essentially correct view, except that he is influenced by many ancient exegetical prejudices, and unnecessarily substitutes for the idea of the Testament—first transferring to other documents processes used in preparing a testament (Huschke, S. 15)—the more general idea of legal documents. The so-called Prætorian Testament must have had on the outside, more particularly on the threads with which, according to ancient custom, documents, consisting of little wooden tablets covered with wax, or of leaves of parchment or of papyrus (Dig. xxxvii. 11. 1), were tied together, the seals of seven required witnesses, with their names inscribed beside the seals. Cf. Marquardt, Rom. Privatrecht, 2 Aufl. p. 805 f.; Bruns, Fontes jur. Rom., ed. 5, pp. 292-303, especially p. 302; Gaius, Inst. ii. 119, 147; Ulpian, Fragm. Vatic. 23. 6, 28. 6. In Berl. Aeg. Urk. No. 361, col. 3, line 12, καὶ περὶ τῆς διαθήκης δὲ ἀποκρίνομαι, ὅτι ἐν πάσαις ταῖς διαθήκαις ἐπτά εἶναι σφραγισταὶ κτλ. Cf. in the same collection the will, Nos. 86 and 326; also the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, ed. Grenfell and Hunt, i. 171, No. 105.

9. (P. 398.) The present καλεῖται in xi. 8 represents the point of view of the time when the book was written, as does also ἑσταυρώθη. Sodom and Gomorrah, however, are not merely types of a sinful city, but of a city condemned because of its sins (Isa. xiii. 19; Jer. l. 40; Matt. x. 15, xi. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 7). Therefore Isaiah before the first destruction of Jerusalem and Paul before the second, declare that Israel would have been made like Sodom and Gomorrah, had not God left it a remnant (Isa. i. 9; Rom. ix. 29). Ezekiel, on the other hand, after the first destruction of Jerusalem, declares (xvi. 49-50) that Jerusalem has become a sister of Sodom; and this is the way in which John speaks here after the second destruction of Jerusalem in the year 70.

10. (P. 401.) It seems as if xvi. 2 must be taken to mean that John beheld the descent of the Jerusalem, which until then had been in heaven, and that this descent was subsequent to the establishment of the new world. Against this interpretation is the analogy of xxi. 10, where the same thing seems to be stated more explicitly, and where John does not witness the descent of a city, but is shown a city built upon a mountain. Moreover, the new Jerusalem is the Bride of Jesus, whose marriage with Him takes place at the parousia—i.e. at the beginning, not at the end of the millennium (xxi. 2, 9, xix. 7). It is also to be noticed, that in xxi. 2 as distinguished from iii. 12 (τῆς καυῆς Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἡ καταβαίνουσα) we read, “the Holy City, a new Jerusalem (the adjectives which follow are likewise without the article), coming down out of heaven from God, made ready as a bride adorned for her husband.” As seen by John it is primarily a part of the new world, to the establishment of which the vision extends. Here all national limitations are set aside, and even Christ Himself retires into the background (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 24–28). But this Jerusalem has already existed during the millennium on the earth, prior to the establishment of the new world, and so it is represented in xxi. 9–xxii. 15. In this passage the Lamb is everywhere prominent (xxi. 9, 14, 22, 23, 27, xxii. 1, 3), and at the end of the last vision Jesus Himself speaks, uttering both a promise and a threat (xxii. 12–15), just as God is represented as speaking in xxi. 6 ff. In the latter passage God and humanity are represented as united without any suggestion of differences among men (xxi. 3–7), whereas in xxi. 9–xxii. 15 Jerusalem retains its Israelitish character, as is evidenced by the prominence of the number twelve; the heathen are visitors, but not citizens of the city (xxi. 24 f.). In xxi. 5 ff. everything is accomplished and everything has become new, and sinners have been delivered over to the second death (xxi. 5–8, cf. xx. 10–15); but in xxi. 9–xxii. 15 without the holy walls are a mass of Gentiles for whom the unlocked city stands open, that they may bring their gifts, and receive blessings of healing (xxi. 24–26, xxii. 2). Only the unholiness and immorality which still exists among men is excluded from the city (xxi. 27, xxii. 15).

11. (P. 401.) A review of the more recent hypotheses will be found in HIRSCHT, Die Ap. und ihre neueste Kritik. 1895 (see also the supplements in the preface). For the more important attempts to distinguish different sources, strata, or literary hands in Rev., see VÖLTER, Entstehung der Ap. 1882; much revised in the second edition 1885 (cf. Zahn, Apok. Stud. i. 525 ff., 567). The main part of Rev. he represents as written originally by John (at first by the presbyter, afterwards by the apostle), in the year 65 or 66. It was afterwards enlarged by the same author, and was constantly revised by Christian hands up to 140 (former view 170). Volter represents the matter in still a different manner in Das Problem der Ap. 1893. VISCHER (Die Off. Jo. eine jüdische Ap. in christlicher Bearbeitung, 1886), starting from the observation that chaps. xi.–xii. present difficulties if taken as Christian prophecy which disappear if the chapters are Jewish, finds iv. 1–xxii. 5 to be a Jewish Apocalypse written in Hebrew, to be dated before the year 70. This was later superficially worked over by some unknown Christian into what at first glance seems a Christian book by the addition of chaps. i.–iii., xxii. 6–21, and numerous interpolations. SPITTA (Off. des Jo. 1889) distinguishes (1) a Christian Apocalypse which, omitting some interpolations by the redactor, is preserved in i. 4–vi. 17, viii. 1, vii. 9–18, xxii. 8–21 (printed on S. 549–560), and which belongs in the year 60 (S. 504, not the year 70, nor about the year 62, as Hirscht, S. 5, 7, states) by John Mark, who is, however, not the author of the Gospel of Mark (S. 528); (2) a Jewish Apocalypse, belonging to the time of Pompey (Rev. x. 8–xi. 18, xiv. 14–xv. 8, xvi. 1–xvii. 6, xviii. 1–xix. 8a, xxi. 9–xxii. 3a, and ver. 15); (3) a second Jewish Apocalypse belonging to the time of Caligula (Rev. vii. 1-8, viii. 2-x. 7, xi. 15, xii. 1-xiv. 11, xvi. 13-20, xix. 11-xxi. 6). All this was edited either under Domitian or Trajan by a Christian, who thought that he was acting "in the spirit" of the Apostle John (who perhaps was still living), and "therefore was justified in seeking to give authority to the writing (the original Christian Apocalypse of John Mark?) in falling back upon the judgment of (the apostle?) John" (S. 543, cf. GK, i. 952). Thus the authorship of Rev. was transferred from the real John of the year 60 to the apostle John of the year 95 or 100 (cf. vol. ii. 263). ERBES (Die Offenb. Jo. kritisch untersucht, 1891) simplified Spitta's hypothesis, and declared the whole work to be of Christian origin. GUNKEL (Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit, eine religionsgesch. Untersuchung über Gen. 1 und Apok. 12, mit (babylonischen) Beiträgen von Zimmermann, 1895). The chaos into which the cosmos of Rev. is changed in this work can hardly be described, at least it cannot be described briefly. JOH. WEISS. (Die Offenb. des Joh. 1904), in many points depending on Spitta, comes to the opinion that an original apocalypse, which was written by the John of Ephesus between 65-70, is preserved for us, with the exception of a few additions and changes from the later edition in chaps. i. 4-viii. 1, viii. 13-ix. 21, xii. 7-12, xiii. 11-18, xiv. 14-20, xx. 1-xxii. 21. The editor of the whole book, who worked into the original Johannine apocalypse an original Jewish apocalypse, written between May and August of the year 70, published his compilation in 95, while the original apocalyptic writer, the John of Ephesus, was still alive.

§ 73. THE CONDITION OF AFFAIRS IN THE CHURCH ACCORDING TO REVELATION I.-III.

The opening words with which John begins his account (i. 9) remind the Asiatic Churches that they are all, like himself, suffering under the oppression of a hostility which their Christian belief has brought upon them. This fact constitutes a bond of union between the readers and himself—isolated, though he is, upon the little island of Patmos, for the sake of the word of God and the witness of Jesus—which strengthens the tie of Christian brotherhood. In this statement we are told what the first readers must have already known before, that John had been banished to the island because of his activity as a preacher, and on account of his Christian belief (n. 1). To this reference is to be added the tradition concerning the exile upon the island of Patmos, which has in its favour, at least, the fact that it cannot be proved to have arisen through an expansion of the passage before us. Banishment to an island can have occurred only as the result of a legal sentence, and, in the case of the province of Asia, of a sentence imposed by the proconsul of that district, who would not have been able, upon his own authority, to punish in this way a preacher of the gospel and an adherent of the Christian faith, if he had not felt himself authorised so to act by some decree issuing from the Imperial Government, or some regulation tolerated by it, by which the propagation of the Christian religion was to be checked by the courts or the police. When we attempt to shed more light upon this fact by the application of other data in the book, we must not, of course, employ indiscriminately everything which is said in regard to the persecution and slaughter of the faithful. We must disregard first of all the repeated reference to the great tribulation of the latter days, which is assumed to be well known (iii. 10, vii. 14, xii. 17–xiii. 17, xiv. 9–13, xx. 4; cf. Matt. xxiv. 15–28); secondly, we must ignore the retrospective references to all the martyrs and martyrdoms for the sake of the Christian faith which have occurred in the past (vi. 9 f.). At the same time, it must be noted that the standpoint from which the author makes these declarations is in most cases that of one who is speaking at the moment when judgment is being pronounced against the antichristian power of the world, and against its antichristian capital; so that even what, from that point of view, is past, must, when viewed by one living at the time when the book was written, lie partly, at least, in the future. In vi. 11, persons who, from the standpoint of those living at the time, are about to become martyrs, are included with the Christians who have already suffered. In xx. 4, again assuming the standpoint of the parousia, the martyrs of the antichristian persecution are especially mentioned along with all those beheaded for the sake of the Christian faith.

Similarly, in xviii. 24 are included with the prophets and saints whose blood was shed in Babylon, all those who at any time or place have been slain for the same cause (cf. xvi. 6; Matt. xxiii. 35). But since in pre-Christian times it was not Babylon on the Euphrates, but Jerusalem, which was the murderess of the prophets (Matt. xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 34; 1 Thess. ii. 15; Acts vii. 52), and since apostles are also named among the martyrs whose blood is avenged by the judgment against the capital city, xviii. 20, it becomes clear that here, as in xvii. 6, where Babylon is described as drunken with the blood of the witnesses of Jesus, and in xviii. 24, xix. 2, where more general terms are employed, the author refers to the Roman martyrs of the time of Nero, and especially to Peter and Paul (vol. ii. 165, n. 4). The reference in chaps. ii.-iii. are temporally and locally less remote. The angel of Smyrna is already experiencing tribulation arising from the slanders of the Jews in that place. More suffering is predicted for him in the future. Punishment by imprisonment is to overtake some of the members of the Church. But the angel himself is required to remain faithful till death (ii. 9 f., see below). In Philadelphia also it is the synagogue of Satan, made up of Jews unworthy of the name, which is hostile to the angel of the Church. If we may draw conclusions concerning the present and future attitude of the Jews from the statement that the angel has kept the word of Jesus loyally, and has not denied His name (iii. 8-10), it is evident that Jewish hostility has brought persecution upon him. But the situation was different in Pergamum (ii. 12-17, n. 2). The angel in that place is subject to a special temptation to deny Jesus and belief in Him, because he lives where Satan's throne is, and he has up to this time successfully resisted. He has demonstrated his loyalty apparently not long before, since a certain Antipas was killed in Pergamum as a faithful witness of Christ, an occurrence which is explained by the fact that Satan dwells there. This change of expression alone betrays the fact that it is not something external, like a prominent building or work of art, which is meant, but an institution or custom there prevalent in which the Christians recognised a striking embodiment and activity of the dominion of Satan. This is the cause of the martyrdom of Antipas, and of the continued danger in which the confessors of Christ are placed. It cannot well be doubted that the author means the cult of Æsculapius, the God of healing, in Pergamum, which flourished there as nowhere else. The serpent, which was to the Christians a symbol of Satan (Rev. xii. 9, xx. 2; 2 Cor. xi. 3), was also the chief emblem of Æsculapius. His most common epithet was σωτήρ; he was not infrequently called ὁ σωτήρ without qualification, and was looked upon as σωτήρ τῶν ὅλων. He became in Pergamum, especially, Ζεὺς Ἀσκληπίος, and the most exalted king. He absorbed all other deities, and even became identified with the Emperor. It was inevitable—and the fact is well attested—that he should appear to the Christians to be, more than any of the other heathen sons of God, a devilish caricature of the true σωτήρ τοῦ κόσμου (n. 2). How easily it might have happened that in daily life, or at the celebration of the feast of Æsculapius, Christians in Pergamum came into conflict with the heathen population, and that a Christian who openly expressed his abhorrence of this cult might have been killed by fanatical worshippers of the divinity! It is very improbable that Antipas was executed upon sentence of a court (n. 3). It is evident, then, that at the time Revelation was written the Jewish congregations at Smyrna and Philadelphia knew very well how to fan into a flame the slumbering hostility of the populace; and that things had reached such a state in Pergamum, especially in connection with the worship of Æsculapius, that the devotees of the old cults had employed violence against the Christians, and were likely to do so again at any time. Such acts of hostility had been encountered by the Christians in Asia and Europe from the very beginning. On the other hand, compared with conditions in the time of Paul and of 1 Peter, it was an innovation for the Roman government to take measures which—as in the case of the banishment to a small island of a prominent Christian teacher from the field of his activity—could aim only at preventing the spread of Christianity. Equally new was the state of affairs in which the Asiatic Churches had come to suffer a general persecution of such a character that they were compelled to confess or to deny the name of Christ—a situation which forces us to assume that legal measures were employed. It cannot be shown that the Christians ever faced such conditions at any time previous to the later years of the reign of Domitian (n. 4). The tradition, in itself unassailable, that Revelation was written about 95 A.D., is thus corroborated (above, pp. 183, 201).

A consideration of the internal affairs of the Church leads to the same result. We are to draw no conclusions from the fact that, among the seven Churches enumerated, some are missing which were in existence even when Paul was living (n. 5, and above, p. 391 f.). We know, for example, that the Church of Hierapolis continued to flourish. This city was the residence of the evangelist Philip and his daughters, and the episcopal residence of Papias (Eus. H. E. iii. 31. 3 f., 39. 9). It may be a mere coincidence that Pergamum, Smyrna, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Thyatira are not mentioned in even such early writings as Acts and the Pauline Epistles. But as regards Smyrna, we know from the trustworthy testimony of Polycarp, the local bishop, that during the lifetime of Paul no Church as yet existed in that place. From the life of Polycarp we may conclude that it was not until circa 67–70 A.D. that a Church arose in that place.

through the efforts of the apostle John and others of the apostolic circle (n. 5). As there is no hint in Rev. ii. 8-11 that the Church of Smyrna—the second to be addressed—was founded in the immediate past, Revelation must have been written considerably later than 70 A.D.

The apostle John, obedient to the command which had come to him, sent the Book of Revelation to the seven Churches, from Ephesus to Laodicea, in the form of a single letter, of which seven copies were probably made, if he had scribes at his disposal (i. 4, 11). In the framework of the first vision he receives the commission to set down in the very beginning of this book, which he is commanded to write and despatch, what Christ has to say to the seven different Churches, or rather to their “angels” (above, p. 404, n. 6). That he may gain an immediate and correct understanding of this commission, which is to be seven times repeated, but which is not yet alluded to in i. 11, two elements of the vision before him are interpreted immediately preceding the first utterance of this command (i. 20, n. 6). The seven stars which Jesus holds in His hand, united as if by an invisible hoop in the form of a wreath or diadem, are angels (but not the angels) of the Churches previously mentioned; the seven candles, in the midst of which the author sees Jesus stand and move, are the Churches themselves. The omission of the article before ἄγγελοι shows that the latter is no technical designation derived from the real conditions surrounding the author, or from the group of ideas familiar to him, or from the revelation which has just begun, but that it is a qualifying characteristic, and therefore in some way a figurative designation of the persons meant. The theory first found in the writings of Origen, that real angels are here meant, to each of which was given the guardianship of a separate Church, must be rejected; for the idea is absurd that the Lord should make known His will to the spirits which like Himself belong to the invisible heavenly world, through the agency of John, a being of this earth, and that they should learn of this will only as unseen visitors at the meetings of the Churches when John's book is read (i. 3). Moreover, the praise and blame which Christ bestows upon them is incompatible with the idea that they are real angels, sent by God, i.e. good angels. The interpretation which makes the angel the personified spirit or heavenly idealisation of the individual local Church is equally bad. This is a modern conception, in itself obscure, which seeks in vain for support in Dan. x. 13-21, xii. 1, or from other biblical views concerning angels (Matt. xviii. 10; Acts xii. 15; Rev. xiv. 18, xvi. 5), and which has arisen from a mixture of ancient heathen ideas with the Christian doctrine of the Holy Spirit. On this point Goethe's Faust has said all that is necessary. According to the early Christian view, the Christian Churches have no other spirit than the one Spirit of God and of Christ, common to them all, which cannot be punished or called to repentance for the sins and weaknesses of the members of the congregation. All other dominant ideas and common tendencies which arose in a Church were conceived to be the effect of forces at work in the non-Christian world and in the unregenerate nature of the members; and were not ascribed to a mythological subject, called the "Spirit of the Church of Ephesus," or the "Spirit of the Phrygian Church." Only human beings can be meant, and only such as are in a high degree responsible for the condition of the Churches in which they occupy a position called figuratively ἄγγελος. But one must also reject the conjecture that these "angels" are emissaries of the seven Churches who have come to John at Patmos, and who are now to return to their homes with his written account of the visions which have been granted him. The theory is untenable: (1) because the author could not have applied to these persons such an indefinite term as ἄγγελοι (i. 20 without the article), but must have spoken of them as the representatives of the seven Churches, known to him, present with him, and perhaps awaiting orders from him, and so would have used οἱ ἄγγελοι, or better οἱ ἀπόστολοι τῶν ἐκκλ. (2 Cor. viii. 23; Phil. ii. 25); and the author could hardly have omitted calling the attention of the readers in i. 9–11 to these conditions. (2) It would be a very strange proceeding in the addresses to each of the seven Churches, to direct these not to the congregations in question, but to the messengers present with the author, who were to deliver these communications. If there were seven letters, each of which was to be brought to the Church for which it was intended by an ἄγγελος as a letter-carrier, it is at least conceivable that these messengers would have been indicated in the outside addresses of the sealed letters, to avoid confusion. But such is not the case. What the author sends—no matter by whom—to Ephesus, Smyrna, and the other cities, is the whole book, and in this book the ἄγγελοι are addressed by Christ. (3) What is said to the ἄγγελοι would be appropriate only if they were men definitely responsible for the condition of the Churches to which they belong, i.e., leaders of these Churches; it is immaterial whether they are with the apostle at the time, as envoys, or remain at home. But since it is usual to deal with persons present, not in writing but orally, it follows from γράψον (used seven times from ii. 1 onwards) that the ἄγγελοι are not on the island of Patmos, but in Ephesus, Smyrna, and the other cities. The point of departure in determining their station is not from the strange epithet ἄγγελοι, but from the way in which the author makes Christ address them. That “thou” everywhere in the address indicates the ἄγγελος is self-evident; and there is not a single phrase to lead to the assumption that this is a collective personality present only to the mind. When “thou” is occasionally replaced by “you,” which probably applies to a number of Christians of the locality in question

(ii. 10, 13*b*, 24), it follows that the "angel" is a member of the Church; but this does not exclude his being at the head of the congregation (n. 6, end). When the candlestick (i.e., according to the authentic interpretation of i. 20, the Church of Ephesus) is called the candlestick of the angel of Ephesus (ii. 5), it is clear that the "angel" is neither some member of the congregation nor the congregation itself. It is the bishop to whom Christ says "thy candlestick," i.e., thy congregation. In accord with this is the fact that other "angels" are told that they "have" people in their congregations worthy or unworthy in their character (ii. 14 f., iii. 4). There are such persons in his congregation; and it is the bishop's duty to test and to ward off suspicious elements which force their way into his Church (ii. 2, 6, 14 f.). He is to strengthen the wavering members (iii. 2). He is severely censured when he allows impure elements to flourish and to exercise a seductive influence, as in the case of the angel of Thyatira (ii. 20). According to the reading, which is undoubtedly correct, it is the wife of the bishop, who, like a second Jezebel, along with her irresolute husband is introducing ruinous practices (n. 7).

None of the names of the ἄγγελοι is given. But, since Bengel's discovery, one should not again lose sight of the fact that in iii. 1 there is a play upon the name of the bishop of Sardis, Zotikos (n. 8). If Revelation was written circa 95, we know from other accounts the name of the ἄγγελος of Smyrna. Even at that early date Polycarp stood at the head of the Church in that place. A short period of persecution is predicted for the Church, which will culminate apparently in nothing more serious than the detention of some of the members; but of the bishop is required faithfulness unto death. He is to die as a martyr. The allusion of Christ to Himself as the One "which was dead and lived again" (ii. 8), and the closing words of ii. 11 bear this out. The fact that this prophecy to the congregation and its bishop was fulfilled in the year 155 A.D. (n. 9) would lead one to regard it as a vaticinium ex eventu, if it were not an assured fact that Revelation had been written long before, and was at that time current in the Church.

The monarchical episcopate, of which in the period of the Pastoral Epistles there was no trace in this province of Asia (above, p. 195 ff.), had, when Revelation and 3 John were written, a firm foothold in that region (above, p. 376 f.); and the Epistles of Ignatius show the same condition at about 110 A.D. For this reason Revelation cannot have been written until a considerable period had elapsed after the death of Paul—not before the year 80, and very probably circa 95 A.D. The name ἐπίσκοπος seems not yet to have become the regular title of the individual bishops, as is the case in Ignatius; for then one would expect in i. 20 οἱ ἐπίσκοποι instead of the anarthrous ἄγγελοι. The apostle who felt himself upon the Lord's day (n. 10) transported involuntarily to the congregations assembled for divine service, must have understood the term bishop, probably borrowed from Jewish conditions, to mean the one who, appearing before God in the name of the congregation, leads in prayer and directs the service (n. 6, end). In the same way that he presents before God and Christ the petitions of the congregation, Christ speaks to him in order that the congregation of which he is in charge may through him hear the word of their Lord. It is incomprehensible how one can admit that the "angels" refer to the bishops, and still hold that Rev. ii.—iii. was written circa 65–70 (e.g. J. Weiss, S. 49).

In Ephesus, Pergamum, and Thyatira a pernicious theory (διδαχή, ii. 14 f., 24) and praxis (ἔργα, ii. 6, 22) has sought to gain entrance; in Ephesus without result, in Pergamum with some, and in Thyatira with great success. Its advocates are in ii. 6, 15 called Nicolaitans. This name is not to be read into the conditions described in ii.

18-29, since it is clear that in Thyatira a single individual, the wife of the bishop himself, is at the head of the movement, and apparently supports it in a peculiar way. She represents herself to be a prophetess (ii. 20), and it is only here that we meet with any indication of a speculative basis for the movement (ii. 24). But the teaching is the same as that of the Nicolaitans (ii. 14, 20). Fornication and participation in heathen sacrificial meals are not merely regarded with indifference, but are frankly recommended, and have been instituted, at least by the prophetess of Thyatira, for the reason that one must acquaint himself with the deep things of Satan,—not, of course, to be engulfed therein, but that he may realise the powerlessness of the world of evil spirits, and attain freedom from evil (n. 11). Even though in Rev. ii. 14 this teaching is not said to be that of Balaam, we must recognise its essential agreement with the doctrinal tendency combated in 2 Peter and Jude (vol. ii. 223 ff., 232 ff., 276-281, 292 f.). The only difference is that in the latter case we read of a libertine doctrine which arose in a region of Gentile-Christians and which made its way among the Jewish-Christians; whereas Revelation concerns itself wholly with the Gentile-Christian Churches of Asia, where the errorists did not need to practise the reserve necessary among the Jewish-Christians (vol. ii. 281 f.). They found in their heathen surroundings the strongest support for their efforts. But it appears that this tendency had only recently become a threatening danger for the Asiatic Church. In the Epistles of John we hear nothing of it; and if this seems of little importance in view of the brevity of 2 and 3 John, the silence of 1 John is all the more significant. From 1 John v. 21 the only fact that can be gleaned is that the heathen cults subjected these Churches to temptations, as was the case with the Corinthian Church at the time of 1 Cor. viii. x.; 2 Cor. vi. 14-vii. 1, and with the Churches in Asia Minor when

1 Pet. iv. 1-4 was written. The doctrine of the Nicolaitans must, therefore, have found favour in the province only at some time subsequent to that represented by 1 John. A comparison of Rev. ii. 2 and ii. 6 leaves no doubt that emissaries of this party had come to Ephesus some time before, and, after being turned away by the bishop of that place, had moved on to Pergamum and Thyatira, where they met with better success (n. 12). The fact that they represented themselves to be apostles, and were declared to be false apostles, makes them itinerant teachers who roamed about, like the followers of Peter in Corinth, but does not necessitate the assumption that, like these, they originated in Palestine and taught a doctrine more or less Judaistic (vol. i. 289 ff.).

The name "Nicolaitans" gives rise to more definite conjectures. The theory, not yet abandoned, that the name is a translation of "Balaamites" deserves at last to be buried (n. 13). But the tradition that Nicolaüs, the proselyte of Antioch (Acts vi. 5), later went astray as a libertine, deserves to be believed, if for no other reason, because it contradicts the nature of ecclesiastical legend-making, when it imputes evil to a Christian who is mentioned with honour in the N.T. Even as late as the time of Clement of Alexandria (Strom. ii. 118) there were persons, or writings of persons, who cited this Nicolaüs as authority for their libertine doctrine. The Book of Revelation cannot have led them to use the name in that way. It is clear, therefore, that it did not create this party and the name it bears, but that both existed independently of the book. In that case it is impossible to see whence the party could have got its name, if not from some man by the name of Nicolaüs; and since the party itself, as well as the teachers of the Church who oppose them, make the Nicolaüs of Acts vi. 5 the originator of the doctrine, it would be useless to seek for another person of that name. If, then, this Nicolaüs himself, like Philip his former companion in office, emigrated to the province of Asia, or if adherents of his came to that place—which is more likely—it is quite conceivable that the representatives of this doctrine, because of its outward connection with the primitive Church, introduced themselves as apostles of a true gospel. This last discussion also confirms the tradition that Revelation was written circa 95. At all events, the words of Christ to the seven Churches were written at a time later than 1 John.

1. (P. 408.) The fact that θλίψις stands first shows that this is not something which always accompanies the quest for the kingdom (Acts xiv. 22), but that it was present in the writer's mind at the time. The ἐν Ἰησοῦ, which is connected with it and which corresponds to the Pauline ἐν Χριστῷ, shows that it was persecution for the sake of Christianity. The ἐγενόμην ἐν τῇ νήσῳ (cf. Acts xiii. 5; 2 Tim. i. 17), which refers primarily to the arrival at Patmos (Athanas. in Montfaucon, Coll. nova, ii. 5 = παρεγενόμην), and which in this sense is connected with διὰ τὸν λόγον, affords even less basis than would ἤμην for the assumption that, at the time when he wrote, John was no longer on Patmos. By a mistaken reference to i. 2, Lucke, Bleek, and others are led to take διὰ τὸν λόγον κτλ. as meaning that John went to Patmos for the purpose of receiving the revelation. But (1) there is nothing which suggests this meaning in i. 9, while in i. 2 it is demanded by ἐμαρτύρησεν and by the context. (2) A Christian can do nothing whatever to induce revelation except to pray for it under certain conditions which give him a right to do so. Ecstasy certainly would not have to be induced by a twelve or twenty hours' trip by sail- or row-boat. Equally impossible is the interpretation, "in order to preach the gospel on Patmos." While the gospel preached by man can be called "testimony of Jesus" or "testimony of God" or "word of God" (vol. ii. 378 f. n. 2), it is contrary to all known usage by διὰ with the acc. to represent its proclamation as the purpose of an action (cf., per contra, such passages as 2 Cor. ii. 12; Phil. i. 5, ii. 22). Moreover, a missionary journey from the thickly populated mainland to the unimportant island on which there was no city (see n. 4, end) would be a strange proceeding. The interpretation given above is the only one in keeping with the usage of Rev. (vi. 9, xx. 4; cf. xii. 17, xix. 10) and of the N.T. (Matt. xiii. 21; Mark iv. 17; 1 Pet. iii. 14; Col. iv. 3; 2 Tim. i. 12) and with the context ("partaker with you in tribulation"). For the tradition concerning the exile, see above, pp. 197, 201, nn. 8, 11. According to a doubtful Latin fragment (Patr. ap. ii. 171), Polycarp mentioned the exilium of John.

2. (Pp. 410, 411.) Pergamum (τὸ Πέργαμον since Polyb. iv. 48. 11) or Pergamus (ὁ Πέργαμος, the earlier form, occurs Xenoph. Hell. iii. 1. 6, but is found later in connection with the later form, Ptolem. v. 2. 14), longe clarissimum A. ad Pergamum (Plin. v. 126), had in the time of Galen (Opp. v. 49) 120,000 inhabitants, and was at that time the principal city of one of the 13 or 14 judicial districts (conventus juridici), but was in no sense the capital of the province of Asia, a distinction claimed by Ephesus (Cicero, ad Famil. v. 20. 9; Jos. Ant. xiv. 10. 11; Digest. i. 16. 4). Consequently it is wrong to explain Rev. ii. 13 on the assumption that Pergamum was the centre of the Roman government. Moreover, to treat the latter as an incarnation of the rule of Satan is contrary to the views of Rev. as well as to those of Paul. Nor is the reference to the temple of Augustus built in 29 B.C. upon the highest point of the acropolis; since there is no apparent reason why this seat of the worship of an emperor should have aroused the aversion of the Christians more than did numerous other such places in the province. The passage has also been connected with the huge altar, rediscovered in 1878, famous on account of the relief work upon it. Cf. in general, Beschreibung der Skulpturen von Pergamon, i. Gigantomachie (edited by Puchstein), 2te Aufl. 1902. This structure, evidently built under Eumenes II. about 180 B.C., and dedicated to Zeus and Athena Nicéphoros (cf. Fränkel on No. 69 of the In-schriften von Pergamon), was much less a place of worship than an artistically adorned monument allegorically commemorative of the victory of Attalus I. over the Gallic hordes about 240 B.C.; cf. Tondeur, Die Gigantomachie des pergam. Altars, erläutert von Trendelenburg, 1884; Ranke, *Weltgesch.*¹ ii. 1. 286. This work could be regarded by Christians as the throne of Satan even less than could a temple; certainly there was nothing about it to make Pergamum dangerous for Christians. This would, however, be in a high degree true of the worship of Æsculapius. For information on this subject, cf. the article "Asklepios" by Thrämer in Roscher's Lex. der Myth. i. 615-641, and Pauly-Wissowa, ii. 1642-1697. For the Christian estimate, cf. Just. Apol. i. 21 (of the sons of Zeus comparable to Jesus besides the Hermes=Logos, there is also a second son, Æsculapius, the god of healing, who ascended into heaven); i. 22 (where Æsculapius' and Jesus' healings and restorations of the dead to life are compared); i. 54 end (the fable fabricated by the demons and conformed to the prophecy of Christ); the contrast between Æsculapius and Christ in Origen (contra Cels. iii. 3; Arnob. i. 49, iii. 23, vii. 44-48). Under Diocletian, Christian stone-cutters from Rome without scruple carved in the quarries of Pannonia not only pillars, capitals, and baths, but also victories and cupids, and even the sun-god in his chariot; but they steadfastly refused to make an image of Æsculapius. For this they were put to death as followers of Antipas of Pergamum; cf. Passio quat. coron. in Büdinger's Unters. zur Kaisergesch. iii. 324 ff., 331 ff.

3. (P. 411.) The legend of Antipas (Acta SS. April. ii. 3, 965), which in some form had been read by Andreas of Caesarea (ed. Sylburg, p. 11), has no historical value. To this extent Görres (ZfWTh, 1878, S. 257 ff.) is right. That independent of Rev. Antipas was no distinguished martyr is evidenced also by the confusion in the tradition and interpretation of the text among the ancients. Probably the correct reading is ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις Ἀντιπᾶ, ὁ μάρτυς (cf. i. 5). The nominative in apposition easily gave rise to the reading Ἀντιπᾶς, which was early interpreted as ἀντεῖπας ("thou contradictedst") and also changed into ἔτι πᾶς; see especially Gwynn, The Apoc. of St. John in a Syr. version, 1897, Notes on the Syr. text, p. 44 f. That Antipas was put to death in consequence of a judicial sentence is unlikely, because the throne of Satan is not to be connected with the Roman authority, and especially because the mention of only a single bloody martyrdom in the recent past, from among the seven Churches, is incomprehensible, if in Asia at that time, as in Bithynia in 112 under Trajan and Pliny, confession of Christianity when proved before a court was regularly punished by death. John, who was certainly more prominent and not less courageous than the others, was punished simply by banishment.

4. (P. 412.) Concerning the difference between the status of the Christians in the time of Nero and in the time of Domitian, see vol. ii. 177-185, 189-191; cf. Zahn, Hirt. des Hermas, S. 44 ff., 118-135. The present writer regards it as certain that not before Domitian, but in the time of this emperor and under his personal leadership, the government of the empire and the provincial magistrates under it took a position antagonistic to Christianity, and adopted a regular procedure with reference to it. There is also a tradition to the effect that Domitian sent Christians into exile because of their confession; thus, for example, Flavia Domitilla was banished to the island of Pontia (Eus. H. E. iii. 18. 5; Chron. an. Abr. 2109, and after an. 2110; Dio. Cass. lxxvii. 14). Reference is made to the banishment of Christians in Herm. Sim. i. (cf. Zahn, Hirt. des Hermas, S. 124). Sparsely settled islands were generally used as places of exile, such as Gyara or Gyaros (Tac. Ann. iii. 68 f., iv. 30; cf. xv. 71; Juven. i. 73, x. 170; Epict. i. 25. 19, iii. 24. 100, 109, 113; Philostr. Vita Apoll. vii. 16), an island among the Cyclades, of which Plin. H. N. iv. 69 says, as he does also of Melos and Calymna in iv. 71, that it had at least one city, a statement which in iv. 69 he is unable to make with reference to Patmos.

5. (Pp. 412, 413.) Polyc. ad Phil. xi. 3, speaking in his own name and in that of the presbyters of Smyrna, says concerning the Macedonian Churches with which Paul corresponded: "de vobis etenim gloriatur (Paulus) in omnibus ecclesiis, quæ deum solum tunc cognoverant; nos autem nondum noveramus." For further particulars, see Forsch. iv. 252-259. Of the Churches of the province, mentioned by Paul or in the Acts but not in Rev. (Colossæ, Hierapolis, Troas), Ignatius in 110 mentions only Troas (Smyrn. xii. 1; Philad. xi. 2); of those first mentioned in Rev., he mentions Smyrna and Philadelphia, besides these, but first he mentions Magnesia and Tralles. The order in Rev. i. 11, ii. 1 ff. is geographical. The Church which can first be reached from Patmos is Ephesus. Then going north follow Smyrna and Pergamum, and following in a south-east direction lay Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. Leucius in his "Wanderings of John" makes this order of the cities of Asia the basis of his entire treatment (Forsch. vi. 194-199).

6. (Pp. 413, 416.) After the comprehensive statement, given in i. 11, 19, of what John is to write (above, p. 404), τὸ μυστήριον κτλ., i. 20, naturally cannot be the object of γράψω in i. 19, a construction of the passage possible only on the absurd supposition that during the vision John produced pen and paper and begged the Lord, who stood before him, to cease speaking for a few minutes. The words are accusative absolutes and introductory appositives; cf. Luke xxi. 6; Rom. xii. 1. A somewhat freer use of the cases in apposition is characteristic of Rev. (i. 5, ii. 26, xxi. 17). "As regards the mystery of the seven stars, etc., the seven stars are the angels of the seven Churches." The fact that in this passage the article is missing before ἄγγελοι is not to be overlooked any more than is the very peculiar use of language in the headings in ii. 1, 8 ff. Without entering with detail into the very complicated critical question as to the text, where special consideration must be given to S² and the old Latin version, the present writer believes it possible to affirm that the smooth reading, τῷ ἄγγ. τῆς ἐν Ἐφέσῳ ἐκκλησίας, is spurious. If the reading suggested by Hort, τῷ ἄγγ. τῷ ἐν Ἐφ. ἐκκλησίας, be correct, ἐκκλησίας, which is probably to be struck out altogether in ii. 18 as a modifier of ἄγγ., is hardly a Greek construction, "To the church-angel in Ephesus." Origen discovers here actual angels, who along with the human bishops are charged with the oversight of the local Churches (Hom. xii. xiii. in Le.; de Orat. xi.; Theoph. (Latin) ii. 6; see Forsch. ii. 67. 19; cf. Jerome on Matt. xviii. 10 (Vall. vii. 139 f.); Andreas, p. 8 on i. 20 (who also quotes Gregory Naz. as holding this view); moreover, p. 4 on i. 4 and p. 19 on iv. 5, Andreas attempts to identify the seven angels with the seven spirits, and makes an obscure statement about a similar view of Irenæus, which probably relates to Rev. i. 4, iv. 5=viii. 2); among modern writers the same view is held, e.g., by Bleek (Vorl. über die Ap. S. 167). Ambrosiaster (Quæst. 102, ed. Bass. xvi. 466) and Epiph. (Hær. xxv. 3) identify the angels with the local bishops; the latter, however, seems also to believe in mystical union between the bishop and an angel of the altar. Ebrard, Olshausen's Komm. vii. (1853) S. 144, and recently Spitta, S. 38, identify the angels with the messengers of the Churches who came to John. While the Jewish analogies adduced by Vitranga, de Synag. vet., ed. ii. (1726) pp. 889-914; Comm. in ap., ed. ii. p. 25; Lightfoot, Horæ hebr. on Matt. iv. 23 (Opp. ii. 278); Schoettgen, p. 1089, on Rev. ii. 1, clearly need sifting and supplementing, they contain the gist of the correct view. The expression ܐܢܓܠܐ ܕܥܝܠܐ, which corresponds exactly in form (cf. the remarks above on the text of ii. 1), did not in itself and originally mean a fixed office, still less a humble office in the synagogue, but it meant the person in the congregation who was invested with full power, who acted in its name in all relations, especially in matters concerning the liturgy, the leading of prayers, etc. The idea is not that of the priest, who acts in the assembly in the name of God, or that of the prophet and apostle, who are sent by God or Christ, but that of an authorised agent of the Church, its representative before God and in acts of devotion. It is a noteworthy fact that the early Syrians, who were not familiar with Rev. or who at least did not have it in their canon, understood by ἄγγελοι in 1 Cor. vi. 3 and in other places the priests (Aphraat, p. 432; Ephr. Carm. Nisib. 42. 10; Comm. in ep. Pauli, p. 175), on the analogy of Mal. ii. 7; cf. Hag. i. 13. The best example of a transition from address to the bishop to address to the Church is Ign. ad Polyc. i.-iii., vi. 1-vii. 1, vii. 2, 3, viii. 1, 3; remote parallels are found in the concluding greetings in 1 Tim. vi. 21; 2 Tim. iv. 15; Tit. iii. 15.

7. (P. 416.) In Rev. ii. 20 the external authority for γυναικα followed by σοῦ (AB, many cursives, old Lat. version [Cypr. Primas.], S² S³) is at least as great as that for γυναικα alone (SCP Copt. vg; Epiph. Hær. li. 33). The later insertion of σοῦ cannot be satisfactorily explained as a mechanical repetition of σοῦ used three or four times earlier. On the contrary, since ἄγγελοι was early understood to mean angels (see n. 6), σοῦ must have seemed out of place. However, when the earliest witnesses for γυναικα without σοῦ were written, married bishops were objectionable exceptions, as the history of Synesius shows; especially a bishop who had such a godless wife in his house. Furthermore, the expression τὴν γυναῖκα ἑξ. is a gross violation of style, which in the nature of the case cannot be justified by examples like ὁ βασιλεὺς Ἡρώδης (Mark vi. 14, "the king, namely, Herod"). Therefore, accepting σοῦ as correct, the reference can only be to the wife of the bishop. The daughter of a Phœnician king, who as the wife of the weak king Ahab used her position to introduce into Israel the worship of Baal and the unchastity associated with it (1 Kings xvi. 31, xviii. 4, 13, xix. 1, xxi. 25), and who herself is charged with adultery (2 Kings ix. 22, cf. ix. 30), was a fitting type by which to describe a bishop's wife who countenanced the teaching of the Nicolaitans, recommended without scruple unchastity and participation in the heathen sacrificial feasts, and who herself indulged in vice. If, as is clearly the case, πορνεῖσαι in ii. 20 is to be taken literally (cf. ii. 14; Acts xv. 20, 29; 1 Cor. x. 7, 8; 2 Pet. ii. 13-20; Jude 4, 11 f., vol. ii. 224 f., 245 f.), πορνεία in ii. 21 must be taken in the same way, and the fact that the sin of those who have had intercourse with her is called μοιχεύειν μετ' αὐτῆς, only goes to confirm the fact that she was married; all unchastity on the part of a married woman is adultery (cf. Matt. v. 32). But it is not likely that her children were the fruits of such adulterous relations (τέκνα πορνείας, Hos. ii. 6; John viii. 41). That would necessarily be expressed. They are the legitimate children of the wife and also of the bishop. They are to be swept away by a pestilence (cf. Rev. vi. 8 = 727, Ex. v. 3, ix. 3, 15). If there is any point at which a depraved woman can be deeply touched it is with reference to her own children. The comparison with Jezebel is imperfect in so far as the weak Ahab actually committed wrong, although not without misgivings (1 Kings xxi. 27-29). The bishop of Thyatira, on the other hand, is praised because of his constantly increasing good conduct (ii. 19); but it is a blameworthy weakness on his part that he permits his wife to do as she likes. As a husband and a bishop he ought not to have allowed his wife entire freedom in her movements, which made it possible for her to exercise her seductive influence on many members of the Church. From the manner in which Christ describes Himself in ii. 23, it is evident that Jezebel knew how to conceal her actions from the knowledge and criticism of others; hence also from her husband. She passed not as πόρνη, but as πορφήτης, and we do not know how far she and her followers went. In every century the history of the Church shows all degrees of confusion between immoral conduct and exalted religiousness. He who tries the hearts and reins calls the more refined use of feminine charms in order to allure admirers πορνεία, and in no allegorical sense, and in the case of a married woman he calls it μοιχεία; cf. Matt. v. 28. The idea, put forth by Andreas, p. 12, that Jezebel is a personification of the Nicolaitan party is to be rejected; (1) if the reading of ii. 20 advocated above be correct, then we are confronted by the incredible supposition that this godless party could be represented as the wife of the pious bishop; (2) Jezebel, who teaches others and who commits adultery with her admirers, and who has children, cannot be identical with the party, the members of which are distinguished from her as her adulterous companions and her children. Even weaker is Schurer's view (Theol. Abh. C. Weizsäcker gewidmet, 1892, S. 37 ff.), that Jezebel is the Chaldean Sibyl, Sambethe (ProL. in Orac. Sibyll., ed. Rzach, p. 4. 28) or Sabbe (Pausan. x. 12. 9). This fancy is possible only on the basis of the wrong reading of Rev. ii. 20; furthermore, it is by no means settled whether the σαμβαθείον mentioned in an inscription at Thyatira, belonging to the time of Trajan or later (C. I. G. 3509), was a sanctuary of this Σαμβήθη; finally, how can this purely mythical figure be made to agree with the text of Rev. ii. 18–29, which unquestionably deals with actual events at the time when Rev. was written? It is necessary to suppose that at that time a priestess officiated in the sanctuary of Sambethe who pretended to be a prophetess, like the Sibyl, or a new incarnation of the Sibyl. In that case the name Jezebel would be the most unsuitable possible, since she was not a heathen prophetess, but the wife of an Israelitish king who had come out of paganism. Even accepting Schürer's false reading, there is still no doubt that "Jezebel" belonged to the Christian Church. (1) In ii. 20 it is very plainly indicated among whom she passes as prophetess and teacher; she does not teach and lead astray a few persons who have been Christians and who have fallen back into paganism, or weak individuals who, while attending the Church services, at the same time visited heathen oracles, but the servants of Christ in Thyatira. Those who have suffered themselves to be led astray by her (ii. 22), are contrasted with the members of the Church who remained faithful (ii. 24); it follows, therefore, that all are Christians. A heathen prophetess, who promulgated her "teachings" only among Christians, would be a peculiar saint. (2) The content of her teaching (διδάσκει, ii. 20; τὴν διδασχὴν ταύτην, ii. 24) is exactly the same as that which in ii. 14, 15 is called the teachings of the Nicolaitans, which were promulgated by alleged apostles (Rev. ii. 2, 6) among the Churches of Asia Minor. It is, therefore, evident that the false prophetess as well as the false prophets was outwardly a member of the Christian Church. (3) The angel or the bishop could not be blamed for permitting a heathen Pythia or Sibyl to do as she liked (ὅτι ἀφείς κατ.); since he had neither power nor authority over her. The only thing he could be blamed for would be his failure to warn the Christians under his care against visiting the heathen temple and against the suggestions of this heathen soothsayer. (4) Jezebel and all her followers are under the discipline of Christ; more precisely the discipline of the Church exercised most signally and most comprehensively by Christ Himself (ii. 21–23, especially v. 23, πᾶσαι αἱ ἐκκλησίαι and ὑμῖν). The fact that the exalted Christ has a part in God's government of the world, and that God requires repentance also of the heathen,—something that does not need to be proved from the Sibylline Oracles (cf. Matt. xii. 41; Acts xvii. 30),—offers no justification for the assumption that Christ is here conceived of as the master who punishes Jezebel and her followers in order to bring them to repentance and as a warning to all the Churches (cf. per contra 1 Cor. v. 12).

8. (P. 416.) Bengel (Erklärte Offenb. Joh. 1740, S. 262) saw that in iii. 1 a proper name is presupposed connected with the word "Life." The popular interpretation, "Thou enjoyest the reputation of living when thou art dead," (1) presupposes the reading of the Text. rec. τὸ ὄνομα, which is entirely unauthenticated, and which even Luther was obliged to translate ("the name"). (2) There is no justification of the interpretation from usage. The passage, Herod. vii. 138, cited by Raphel, ii. 794, is not parallel, since the reference there is not to a person who as such would have a proper name but to a warlike undertaking, the real purpose of which was concealed by false statements—a thought which would be expressed by λέγεσθαι (1 Cor. viii. 5; Eph. ii. 11; cf. Rev. ii. 2, 9, 20, 39); ὀνομάζεσθαι (1 Cor. v. 11), or δοκεῖν. (3) On this hypothesis it would be necessary to explain how the angel secured the unjustified reputation of being alive. It would be necessary to call him a hypocrite and to unmask him. That ὄνομα is here a proper name is further evidenced (cf. ii. 17, iii. 12, ix. 11, xix. 12) by the fact that in the immediate context, iii. 4, and only here ὀνόματα occurs in the sense of “persons,” and that in iii. 5 ὄνομα (cf. Phil. iv. 3) is again used to designate the proper name. If, then, the meaning be, “Thou hearest a name (which signifies) that thou livest,” it must be either Ζώσιμος or Ζωτικός. The latter is the more likely, because this name occurs very frequently in the inscriptions of the province (Forsch. v. 94; cf. also Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics, i. 390, 392, 475, 525, 533, 536, 539, 564, 656 f., 702, 705, 744, 760, 761, and the inscriptions in Altert. von Hierapolis, S. 87, 89, 114, 140, Nos. 41, 46, 133, 220); Zosimus, on the other hand, is comparatively rare (e.g. U. I. G. 3509; Ramsey, op. cit. 472 f., 535); moreover, ζώσιμος as an adjective is rare, while ζωτικός occurs frequently (= vividus, vegetus). The suggestion of the meaning of the word brings to mind not only the opposite idea νεκρός εἶ, but affects also what follows: ver. 2, ἀποθανεῖν; ver. 5, ἡ βίβλος τῆς ζωῆς. For a similar use of the literal meaning of proper names, see vol. i. 456, n. 5.

9. (P. 417.) According to Mart. Polyc. xix. 1, Polycarp was put to death in Smyrna in the year 155, either as the last of the twelve Christians, who in part, at least, had been brought thither from Philadelphia (according to the reading δωδέκατος), or as the thirteenth, after the twelve Philadelphians had preceded him in death (according to the more probable reading δώδεκα). If any other Smyrnaean besides Polycarp suffered martyrdom at this time, in the detailed account which we have there would necessarily be some trace of it.

10. (P. 417.) In the light of second century usage there can be no doubt that ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα means Sunday, and not the Christian feast of the Passover (cf. Zahn, Skizzen, 2 Aufl. S. 354, A. 16). The fact that Sunday is no longer designated by its Jewish name, as in 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Acts xx. 7, and in the Gospels, but by the Christian name in use later, is proof of the relatively late date of the composition of Rev. It would have been in bad taste to use this in John xx. 1, 19.

11. (P. 418.) If the saints in Thyatira are taken as the subject of ὡς λέγουσιν in ii. 24, these words are superfluous, since John's judgment concerning the teachings of the Nicolaitans cannot differ from that of the saints in Thyatira. If, on the other hand, the Nicolaitans are the subject, they would hardly be made responsible for the opinion that their pious opponents lack knowledge of the deep things of Satan; in that case ἐκείνοι would hardly be lacking before λέγουσιν. The meaning is rather, that the Nicolaitans themselves boast of such knowledge, and by the use of the slightly emphasised ὡς λέγουσιν John merely means to indicate that this expression is borrowed from the language of the Nicolaitans. In any case the saints are without “this alleged knowledge of the deep things of Satan,” of which the Nicolaitans boast. Not satisfied with the knowledge of the deep things of God (1 Cor. ii. 10), they feel that they ought also to penetrate the abysses of Satan (cf. vol. ii. 225 f., 246, 280 f.).

12. (P. 419.) The opinion of Baur (Christent. der drei erst. Jahrh., 2 Aufl. S. 81) and his school, that Rev. ii. 2 is aimed at Paul, is refuted by the fact that we have καὶ οὐκ εἰσὶν, not ἦσαν, which excludes all possible reference to the deceased Paul. The opinion that aspersions are cast on Paul, who wrote 1 Cor. vi. 12–20 and viii. 1–x. 33, as a representative of the teachings described in Rev. ii. 14, 20, and that the angel of the Church of Ephesus, which owed its existence to the work of Paul, is praised because he rejected Paul and his assistants as false prophets, and the opinion that the apostle John, whose attitude toward Paul we know from Gal. ii. 9, is responsible for such foolish utterances—need only to be stated to be refuted. There is no more definite description of the false apostles in ii. 2 or of the Nicolaitans in ii. 6. But since in ii. 2 the bishop's action in trying and rejecting the false prophets is mentioned as an example of his praiseworthy intolerance of evil men, and since in ii. 6 his hatred of the conduct of the Nicolaitans is the only praiseworthy act of his mentioned, we infer that the false prophets must have been representatives also of the teachings of the Nicolaitans.

13. (P. 419.) The best treatment of the Nicolaitans is that of WOHLBERG in NKZ, 1895, S. 923–961. The most important sources are Iren. i. 26. 3, iii. 11. 1; Clem. Strom. ii. 118, iii. 25–29; Hippol. Refut. vii. 36, and in the writing addressed to Mammæa (Hippolytus' Kleinere Schriften, ed. Achelis, p. 251). Victorinus also has some distinctive remarks on Rev. ii. 6 (Migne, v. col. 521). According to Irenæus and Hippolytus, Nicolaus himself fell into error; while Clement, in order to prove Nicolaus' innocence, charges the Nicolaitans with misconstruing innocent words and actions of his. The latter view only shows how hard it was to believe that an early Christian mentioned in the N.T. could become a heretic, and is proof of the historicity of Irenæus' account. The opinion current since the time of Vitringa (Comm. in apoc., ed. ii. 1719, p. 65 f.), that Νικόλαος, from which the term Nicolaitans is derived, is a translation of נִחֲלָא cannot be maintained. While those who really know Hebrew would rightfully and necessarily take exception to this translation, certainly inaccurate and probably false, to Christians in Asia Minor unfamiliar with Hebrew, the term would be entirely blind. They would more naturally infer that the teaching referred to in ii. 15 was different from that referred to in ii. 14. Actual translations, such as ζηλώτης, Luke vi. 15, or passages where it is expressly said that words are translations, as John i. 38–42, xix. 13, 17, xx. 16, Rev. ix. 11, cannot be cited as parallels. Such a translation would have served no purpose, since Balaam, like Jezebel, was a familiar historical figure, having a typical significance (2 Pet. ii. 15; Jude 11, vol. ii. 235, n. 3), and therefore Balaamites would have been much more intelligible than Nicolaitans, if there were no real Nicolaus and no real Nicolaitans. If there were such, however, these must be meant; and it would be a strange accident if the name Balaam, which is unquestionably mentioned because of the historical importance of this person, and not because of the literal meaning of the name, could seem to one imperfectly acquainted with Hebrew to be a translation of Nicolaus. Furthermore, the right place for the comparison of Balaam and Nicolaus would be ii. 6, not ii. 14 f.

§ 74. THE AUTHOR OF REVELATION.

Since the author, who gives his book the form of a message to the seven Churches, begins his writing with a greeting, he has occasion to introduce in the greeting his own name (i. 4). But he calls himself by this name also in i. 9, xxii. 8, and in the title of the book, i. 1. From the explicit manner in which the author says in xxii, 8, "I, John, am he who saw and heard this," we infer that the reason for the repeated mention of himself is the feeling that the one who has received revelations (i. 2, xxii. 18) should in person testify to the truthfulness of his account (Dan. vii. 2, 15, viii. 1, ix. 2, x. 2). The name indicates that he was a Hebrew (n. 1), and this is fully confirmed by his language. He is, therefore, to be regarded as a Christian of Jewish origin from Palestine who settled in Asia Minor. From the absence of all modifying clauses attached to the name except that of "a servant of Christ" (i. 1), it is clear that he was the only person of this name known among the seven Churches, or, if there were other Hebrews with this name, they were entirely overshadowed by this John. Unless the author were distinguished throughout the entire circle of Churches addressed, and were familiar with their conditions, the passage i. 4-iii. 22 would be quite incomprehensible. This conclusion is not affected by the fact that the communications he sends had their origin in visions. From this it follows that he was, or pretended to be, the well-known John of Ephesus, the author of the Fourth Gospel and of the three Epistles bearing this name, whom we have found to be the apostle John.

Of writers who do not think that Revelation can be attributed to the apostle, Dionysius of Alexandria is the first to suggest the identity of the author of Revelation with John Mark; but he refuses to make John Mark the author of Revelation, because of his inability to make this agree with the statements in the N.T. concerning Mark (n. 2). Nor have modern writers who hold Mark to be the author of Revelation, or of some parts of it, been able to get over this difficulty. This John, with the Roman surname Mark, is never designated among Gentile Christians (Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 11; 1 Pet. v. 13) and in the tradition of the early Church by his Hebrew, but always by his Roman name. The name John is never added, except in passages where reference is had to his early history (Acts xii. 12, 25, xiii. 5, 13, xv. 37), and then always in such a way as to make it clear that in the Gentile Christian Churches the Roman had replaced the Hebrew name (Acts xv. 39), just as Paul had taken the place of Saul. In the year 62 Mark was as yet personally unknown to the Asiatic Churches (Col. iv. 10; vol. i. 442, 450, n. 4). Apparently he came to Asia shortly thereafter, but only for a short time; since we find him in Rome toward the end of the year 63, or at the beginning of the year 64 (1 Pet. v. 13). He was again in Asia in the year 66, but is directed to come again to Rome (2 Tim. iv. 11). Mark's permanent residence in the province of Asia, prior to the year 67, is out of the question (vol. ii. 427 ff.). Since, however, the apostle John and others belonging to the apostolic group settled in this province not later than the year 69, it is impossible that thereafter Mark should come to occupy a position such as that occupied by the author of Revelation. Least of all could he introduce himself in this work as the one distinguished John known to the Churches in Asia; for this name belonged to the aged John of Ephesus, i.e., the apostle John.

Surprise has been expressed that the author did not call himself an apostle; but this overlooks the fact that Paul even, who more than any other apostle had occasion to call attention to his apostleship, and who made use of such opportunities, fails to use this title in a number of his letters to the Churches (1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1), occasionally also designating himself simply a slave of Christ (Phil. i. 1; cf. Rev. i. 1). It is also to be remembered that in writing his Epistles John does not use the apostolic title, and that the use of it is almost entirely avoided in the Gospel (above, p. 227, n. 9). But the most important consideration of all is the fact that the present work gave him no occasion to call himself an apostle. Any member of the Church possessing prophetic gifts may become the recipient of a revelation, and the high regard in which John was held in the Church of Asia, such as is certainly presupposed by the simple manner in which he introduces his own name in Rev. i. 4, 9, is due much less to his position among the Twelve—which give him no authority over the Gentile Christian Churches founded by other missionaries—than to the fact that he was able to bear testimony as one who had heard and seen Jesus (1 John i. 1–4, iv. 14). Of this fact the readers are reminded at the very beginning of the book. When he falls down as one dead before the majestic gaze of the Lord who appears to him, he is again heartened by the familiar summons, “Fear thou not, it is I” (i. 17). At the same time, the hand of the Lord, whom he has previously seen, heard, and handled (1 John i. 1), rests upon his head to comfort and reassure him (n. 3).

It has also been considered strange and inconsistent with the apostolic dignity of the author, that in xxi. 14 he should relate in so naïve a manner what he had seen, namely, the names of the twelve apostles written upon the twelve foundation stones of the wall of the Jerusalem coming down to earth. In that case words like Luke xxii. 30, Matt. xix. 28, which only apostles could have heard and repeated, must be the invention of persons who were not apostles; and when Paul wrote 1 Cor. i. 28 and Eph. ii. 20, iii. 5, iv. 11, he must have forgotten that in 1 Cor. i. 1, Eph. i. 1 he had very solemnly declared himself to be an apostle. John has never been able to satisfy his critics (n. 4). When, as in the Gospel and the Epistles, he refrains from using his title of honour explicitly, it is evidence that he has occasion to conceal something; on the other hand, if, as in Revelation he mentions his own name, it is the sign of disagreeable obtrusiveness. If he emphasises, as in John xix. 35, 1 John i. 1-4, the fact that he was an eye-witness, it betrays a suspicious design; if, as in Revelation, he lets his historical relation to Jesus remain in the background, it is proof that the relation did not exist. When he happens to speak once objectively of the twelve apostles, this is just as conclusive evidence that he was not one of their number, as if he called himself the presbyter instead of the apostle.

Nor does any real problem arise from a comparison of the teachings of Revelation with those of the Gospel and of 1 John. The single fact, discussed above, p. 312 ff., that in all three of these writings, and nowhere else in the whole of early Christian literature, save in the writings which can be shown to be dependent upon the Johannine writings, ὁ λόγος is used as a comprehensive name for the Christ; and this usage presupposed, has more weight than all the objections based upon supposed irreconcilable contradictions between ideas found in Revelation and the other Johannine writings (n. 5). It would require almost an entire interpretation, not only of Revelation, but more especially of the Gospel, in order to correct all the misunderstandings, which in this instance have hindered the acceptance of the correct view concerning the relation of these two works—as, for example, when one discovers in the Gospel the disappearance of the early Christian prophecy and hope, or a universalism in which the special position of Israel is totally denied, or a tenderness nullifying all serious thought of the wrath and judgment of God. Furthermore, one who regards both the discourses of the Gospel and the visions of Revelation as pure inventions, will necessarily make demands relative to similarity in idea and language between writings purporting to be from the same author, entirely different from the demands which one will feel himself compelled to make who regards the Gospel and Revelation not, to be sure, as stenographic reports, but as faithful accounts of a witness concerning what he had seen and heard. Jesus uses language in His earthly life and says things to His earthly companions different from the language and the message of the exalted Lord in visions to His servant and prophet. And still He is the same person.

The only real problem is that arising from the great difference in style observable between the Gospel and Epistles on the one hand and Revelation on the other. Here, first of all, it is necessary to correct the exaggerated statements made as early as the time of Dionysius the Alexandrian, concerning the good Greek of the Gospel and Epistles (n. 6). Even the Fourth Gospel must have been written by a Hebrew. Only by confining one's attention to a narrow group of expressions is it possible to overlook the gross violations both of the spirit and rules of the Greek language in the Gospel. Furthermore, in Revelation phenomena of this kind are for the most part due not to ignorance of Greek, but in particular instances to intention (n. 7), and to the dependence of the visions themselves and their literary form upon the model of the prophetic writings of the O.T. Oral and written prophecy in the apostolic Church had its own peculiar style, following closely the O.T. model, as did also the thoughtful didactic addresses and the historical narratives, and the Psalm. Consequently the same man, when writing as a prophet, would necessarily use language different from that which he would employ in a didactic communication to the Churches committed to his care, or in writing an account of the deeds and sayings of Jesus. Then it must be remembered that in the nature of the case the relation of the prophetic writer to his subject is one of much less freedom than in any other form of composition. Particularly when his prophecy is based upon visions, received in an ecstatic state, everything is received, not only the material, but also the form. All that he has to do is to put what he has seen into words, and for this reason he is much less inclined than is the historian and the teacher to polish or to permit to be polished for him the style of his first draft. The original account, written under the immediate impression of the vision beheld, is the best, because the most faithful. The more important the contents, the less important the form. With all the difference of content and form, however, there are significant agreements between the language of Revelation and the Gospel (nn. 5, 6).

The tradition regarding the origin of Revelation, the testimony of the book itself in those portions which have to do with the circumstances under which it was written, and in single expressions, and in the impression received from the whole book that it is a genuine product of early Christian prophecy, are all in harmony with the position that Revelation was written by the apostle John in the year 95 during his exile on the island of Patmos, and that it was received and handed down by the seven Churches to which he sent it as being really what it claims to be in its title. This conclusion has yet to be defended against that construction of its prophetic contents—a construction frequently shown to be untenable, but nevertheless not abandoned—according to which the book, either as a whole or in many of its parts, is thought necessarily to have been written considerably earlier.

1. (P. 428.) The present writer knows no Jew of the Græco-Roman diaspora with the name of John; whereas, e.g., Jude, Joseph, Jonathan, Samuel, Miriam, and Salome occur in Roman inscriptions. (Cf. also Forsch. vi. 176, A. 1. It was not until long after the time of Revelation that the custom arose among the Christians of calling themselves by the names of apostles (cf. Dionysius in Eus. vii. 25. 14).

2. (P. 429.) Dionysius in Eus. vii. 25. 15 rejects the idea that Mark is the author only because of Acts xiii. 5, 13. HITZIG (Über Jo. Mr. und seine Schriften, 1843) declares Mark to be the author of the whole of Revelation SPITTA (see above, p. 407, n. 11) declares him to be the author of an Ur-Apocalypse preserved principally in Rev. i. 3-iii. 22.

3. (P. 430.) Rev. i. 17 is correctly understood by Iren. iv. 20. 11 ("quoniam ipse est, in ejus pectore recumbat ad cœnam"); also by Herder (Maranatha, S. 13, notwithstanding his wrong division of sentences, S. 11). In favour of this interpretation is the clear suggestion of John vi. 20; Matt. xiv. 27, cf. Luke xxiv. 38 f.; John xviii. 5. Furthermore, if ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος were here used predicatively, and not in apposition to ἐγώ, there would be absolutely nothing in it to relieve the overwhelming impression of the vision, and to allay fear, as is the case in all other sentences in the Bible which follow μὴ φοβοῦ, φοβείσθε. Following i. 8 (cf. xxi. 6) so closely, it would be even impossible to avoid the misunderstanding that the one who here appeared is God the Lord Himself,—a mistake which would not be corrected until i. 18. It is also to be observed that in Rev., which in this respect resembles the doctrinal Epistles rather than a Gospel, the person of the Lord is frequently called simply Ἰησοῦς, even when the reference is to His exaltation and the religious attitude toward Him (i. 9, xii. 17, xiv. 12, xvii. 6, xix. 10, xx. 4, xxii. 16). Naturally the author is acquainted with the solemn formulas of i. 1, 2, 5, xiv. 13; uses also Χριστός in suitable places, xi. 15, xii. 10, xx. 4, 6; prays to Him as "Lord Jesus," xxii. 20; but he is not in the habit of using ὁ κύριος or ὁ Χριστός instead of the proper name, any more than does the John of the Gospel and the Epistles. He is too close to the historical manifestation of Jesus to do this.

4. (P. 430.) Dionysius, in Eus. vii. 25. 6-13, is an example of false criticism of John's mention of himself in Rev. The Alōgi also seem to have criticised 1 John i. 1-4; GK, ii. 50.

5. (P. 431.) As has been shown above, pp. 312 f., 327 f., in discussing the "Logos doctrine" of the Johannine writings, it is not a formula capable of several interpretations and differently understood by different writers, in the use of which the Gospel, Rev., and the Epistles agree, but it is the idea which comes out more clearly in Rev. than in any other early Christian writing, whereas the form in which the idea is expressed changes (Gospel, ὁ λόγος; Rev. ὁ λόγος τοῦ θεοῦ ὁ ἀμὴν; 1 John, ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς). Jesus could be called "Logos" even if He were not in an eternal manner God. But Rev., the Gospel, and Epistles agree in ascribing this estimate to His person. While the angels will not accept any worship (Rev. xix. 10, xxii. 9), there is no objection when John falls down at the feet of Jesus (i. 17). He addresses Him with the maranatha of the liturgy (xxii. 20; cf. vol. i. 303, n. 12), and all the inhabitants of heaven include Him in their worshipful praise of God (v. 9-14; cf. vii. 10, xi. 5). With God and His sevenfold Spirit He is the source of grace and peace, i. 5. To Him are ascribed the attributes, "the first and the last," which seem to belong inalienably to God, i. 17, xxii. 13; cf. also i. 8, xxi. 6. Like God, He stands at the beginning not only of history, but also of the created world, which is inconceivable without the presupposition that He had part in the creation (iii. 14; cf. John i. 3; Col. i. 15-18). And yet He calls God both His God (ii. 7, iii. 12) and His Father (iii. 5, 21; cf. John xv. 17), and confesses that all that He has was received from His Father

(Rev. ii. 27, i. 1; cf. John iii. 35, v. 22, 27, xvii. 2). In view of His earthly and human vocation He is called the faithful witness (i. 5, iii. 14), which agrees perfectly with the Fourth Gospel (xviii. 37). Reference to the Concordance under μαρτυρεῖν and μαρτυρία (found elsewhere only in Mark xiv. 55-59 with reference to false witnesses) shows that all the Johannine writings have the same author. Jesus is called τὸ ἀπρίον only in Rev., where the word occurs twenty-nine times; the word occurs elsewhere only in John xxi. 15, while the figure itself is found in John i. 29, 36 in the testimony of the Baptist, which led this apostle to Jesus. Only in Rev. xxi. 2, 9, xxii. 17, and John iii. 29 is the Church directly called the νύμφη of Christ, etc. The claim of Dionysius, op. cit. § 22, that Rev. has not a single syllable in common with the Gospel and 1 John, is a foolish exaggeration.

6. (P. 432.) Dionysius' contrast between the style of Rev. and that of the Gospel, op. cit. §§ 24-27, is just as much exaggerated as what he says concerning the teachings (see n. 5). Cf., on the other hand, Origen's carefully weighed judgment of the style of Heb. in comparison with Paul's Epistles in Eus. vi. 26. 11. In the latter case the comparison is between writings of the same class; but, leaving that out of account, the relation is altogether different from that existing between Rev. and John. Concerning Hebrew words and Hebraisms in the Gospel, see above, p. 353, nn. 13, 19 f.; in Rev., see below, p. 447 f. It is noteworthy that in each writing John once neglects to make clear to the readers through translation the idea associated with a name which is called Hebrew (John v. 2; Rev. xvi. 16; p. 353, n. 13). To be noted also is the Hebraistic use of ἐκ in the sense of a partitive gen. (above, p. 283, n. 2). The use of the neuter to describe persons (John vi. 37, 39, x. 29) in Rev. iii. 4; the use of the article as in John iii. 10 ("the official teacher among us," or "of us two"), also Rev. iii. 17. Cf. also single characteristic phrases such as those found at the end of each book referring to their respective contents, Rev. xxii. 18, 19; John xxi. 20 (γεγραμμένα ἐν τῷ βιβλίῳ τούτῳ), or σὺ οἶδας ("thou knowest better"), Rev. vii. 14; John xxi. 15-17.

7. (P. 432.) When a writer who uses ἀπό with the gen. between thirty and forty times writes once (i. 4) ἀπὸ ὃ ὦν καὶ ὃ ἦν καὶ ὃ ἐρχόμενος, it must be because he wants to indicate that ὃ ὦν κτλ. is used as an indeclinable proper name, as a paraphrase for Yahweh. Also ὃ ἦν (cf. also i. 8, iv. 8. xi. 17, xvi. 5) must likewise be an intentional substitute for an omitted imperfect or aorist participle. Just as τό can be placed before any part of speech whatever when the reference is to objects, so ὃ can be used (cf. ὃ δμῶν, iii. 14; above, p. 329, n. 8) when the reference is to persons. In i. 5, xx. 2, likewise, the disagreement in case between the noun and the word in apposition seems to be intentional, designed to give the word in apposition more prominence, by making it an independent exclamation; this may be true also in the case of πλήρης in John i. 14 (but cf. Blass, *Gr.*² S. 81). In other instances (ii. 20, iii. 12, vii. 4, ix. 14) there may be actual solecisms, carelessness such as would be likely to occur in the ordinary speech of barbarians not yet fully Hellenised. The present writer does not regard it as impossible that the style of John's other writings was revised by friends more familiar with Greek than himself (cf. vol. i. 63 on Josephus), but that, for the reasons suggested above, p. 433, he failed to have this done in the case of Rev.

§ 75. CONTEMPORARY-HISTORICAL OR FUTURIST INTERPRETATION.

Without due recognition of the very definite tradition, and the evident marks of time in chaps. i.-iii., the attempt has long enough been made to determine the date of the composition of Revelation by the so-called contemporary-historical interpretation of its prophetic contents (n. 1). Especially since it was thought that it had been discovered that the number 666 (Rev. xiii. 18) represents the name of Nero, it has been held by the majority of German critics to be a proved fact that Revelation was written soon after the death of Nero († June 9, 68 A.D.), and shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem (August 70). The five kings, who had fallen (Rev. xvii. 10), are said to have been the five emperors from Augustus to Nero, and the sixth, who was ruling when Revelation was written, either Galba († January 69) or—if Galba, Otho, and Vitellius, who had brief reigns, are omitted—Vespasian. The seventh, who is represented as having already been emperor and as to come again as antichrist (xvii. 8, 11, cf. xiii. 3, 12, 14), is supposed to be Nero, who, according to popular belief, was to return from the realm of the dead. In setting over against this interpretation and others of a similarly contemporary-historical character a futurist view, it must be recognised that they are not in every respect mutually exclusive. The former does not indeed deny that future events—the appearing of the antichrist, the parousia of Christ, and the final judgment—are predicted by John; and the latter does not deny that these final events are announced as being near at hand, and are represented as intimately connected with present facts. This is the nature of all prophecy. It aims always at the final outcome, and is yet bound to the past and the present.

Moreover, the origin of this prophecy in visions actually experienced does not alter the question, since the imagery of the ecstatic vision, as of the ordinary dream, is formed out of material present within the circle of vision of the seer or dreamer when awake. For Christians inquiring concerning the issue of the development of history and longing for the fulfilment of all of God's promises (xxii. 17, 20, v. 4, vi. 10), such material was at hand in the predictions of the O.T. prophets, especially Daniel, Ezekiel, and Zechariah, above all, however, in the prophetic testimony of Jesus, the possession of which alone secures to them a portion of the spirit of prophecy (xix. 10, cf. John xvi. 13 f.), and in the prophecy of the Church—based upon this possession of the prophetic spirit (1 John ii. 18 ; above, p. 371, n. 5)—with which Revelation is connected as a new—and, as far as the present is concerned, the last—link of the prophetic chain beginning with the prophecy of Jesus Himself. The Christian prophets from the first had held in view the course of the historical development of the world and the signs of the times (vol. i. 228 f., 235 ff., vol. ii. 110 ff.); John did likewise. It is, moreover, simply in agreement with the form of all N.T. prophecy, from the Baptist onwards, that the end is announced as imminent, the final coming of the kingdom of God and of Christ as rapid, sudden, and near at hand (i. 1, 3, iii. 11, xxii. 7, 10, 12, 20, cf. Matt. iii. 2–12 ; Jas. v. 8 f. ; Rom. xiii. 11 ff. ; Phil. iv. 5 ; Heb. x. 37 ; 1 John ii. 18 ; above, p. 371, n. 5). None the less, however, Revelation maintains the underlying principle of true prophecy, in withholding from men outside, and from the Church itself, a chronologically definite knowledge of the coming of the end (Matt. xxiv. 36 ; Acts i. 5 ; 1 Thess. v. 1 ff.). It does not contain a single statement that even in obscure reference gives the period of time intervening between the present and the parousia. It also contains prophecies which must be fulfilled before the final events, if they are to be fulfilled at all. Among these are included not only the partly hypothetical words, ii. 5, 22, iii. 9 (iii.

3, 19 f. ?), but also the persecution which will come upon the Church of Smyrna, and will cause the death of its bishop (ii. 8–11 ; above, pp. 417, 426).

As far as the prophecies are concerned, which unquestionably have in view the really final events, it has already appeared (above, p. 406, n. 9) that the naming of Jerusalem as the spiritual Sodom—a name chosen from the point of view of the present—presupposes that the destruction of the former Holy City had already taken place. Further, the number of the forty-two months = 1260 days = $3\frac{1}{2}$ years (xi. 2, 3, cf. xii. 6, 14, xiii. 5 ; Dan. vii. 25, xii. 7, 11) proves that this prophecy transports us into the time of the rule of the antichrist. It does not take its forms and colours from the pre-exilic prophecy of an Isaiah and a Jeremiah, but bases itself upon the prophecies of Daniel, which were uttered after the conquest of Jerusalem, and foretold not a destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, but a desecration of the temple in the end of days. To be sure, it is in the abstract conceivable that a Christian prophet before the year 70, like Jesus Himself, might have combined both kinds of prophecies without clearly explaining their mutual relationship. He might in this way have combined a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, given in the tone and meaning of an Isaiah, a Micah, or a Jeremiah, with a prophecy of the “antichrist” in the meaning of a Daniel. However, apart from the fact that the Christian prophecy of the antichrist in the time of Paul shows no trace of a confused mingling of these radically different lines of thought (1 Thess. ii. 16 ; 2 Thess. ii. 1–12), nothing of the sort appears at least in Rev. xi. 1–18. There is no mention of a taking of Jerusalem by an army, but only of a rule of the Gentiles in Jerusalem during the period of the antichrist (xi. 2 f.). The destruction of only a tenth of the city, and the killing of only a small portion of the inhabitants, are not occasioned by a hostile army, but by an earthquake (ver. 13), and the temple suffered so little destruction at the hands of the Romans, that the main building with the outer courts of the priests, in which the altar of burnt-offering stood, together with the congregation, worshipping there, is to remain protected from every desecration by the Gentiles (xi. 1 f.). No further proof should be needed to show that this prophecy could not have been made by a Christian before the year 70 who knew only of the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, prophesied by Jesus. It is only necessary to call to mind, that in the period from the death of Nero to the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jewish revolution had its reign of terror, with mutual destruction of the different party-groups. Since the Christians had fled to Pella, there was no longer in Jerusalem a worshipper of the true God, or a temple worthy of divine protection, but only Jews, who were no longer worthy of the name (Rev. ii. 9, iii. 9). No Christian could have judged this more mildly than the Jew Josephus (e.g. Bell. iv. 9. 10). All these events lie behind Revelation, just as the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians lies behind Daniel.

By the beast with the ten horns and seven heads, which at the command of Satan comes up out of the sea—an image of the world of nations—and begins the last struggle of wickedness against God and the Church of Jesus (xiii. 1 ff.), John could have understood only the world kingdom at enmity with God, and that too in its last development, since all the essential attributes and acts of the beast must have reminded him of Dan. vii. 2–27. However, in John's writing, as throughout Daniel (ii. 37 ff., viii. 20 ff.), the image of the kingdom changes to that of the kings who govern and represent it. The description of the transference of the rule to the beast (xiii. 2), the undoubtedly authentic masculine αὐτόν (ver. 8) and ὅς (ver. 14), as also the statement that the name of the beast is a man's name (xiii. 18), demand this personal heading up of the conception, without, however, doing away with the fundamental idea of a new and final world kingdom. From the connection of xiii. 1 ff. with xii. 13–17 (cf. xi. 7), it appears that no more than its personal head was this last world kingdom in existence at the time of the writing of Revelation. Still more clearly it is stated three times in xvii. 8–11, with emphatic reference to chap. xiii., that the beast does not exist in the present, and twice that it will appear in the future (μέλλει ἀναβαίνειν and παρέσται, ver. 8). There also the ten horns are interpreted to mean ten kings, who are allied with it and place their powers at its disposal. They, together with the beast, will receive the authority for a short period; in the present, however, they have not received it any more than the beast (xvii. 12). On the other hand, however, the beast has already once existed and will again come up out of the abyss—i.e. the world of the dead (cf. ix. 1 f., 11)—(xvii. 8, 11 three times ἦν καὶ οὐκ ἔστιν). The anti-christ and his kingdom are a power which had already appeared once in history, had then disappeared, and at the end of the times is to appear again in life. This is a fundamental thought of early Christian prophecy (vol. i. 251, n. 8). The same thought is expressed, xiii. 3, 12, 14, in the statement that one of the seven heads of the beast had received a mortal wound, which healed again. This means that the beast itself had received a death-stroke, and had come to life again (xiii. 12, 14). The healing of the wound of the one head caused the world to wonder in the same way as did the coming up of the beast out of the abyss (xiii. 3, xvii. 8). In a certain sense, therefore, the beast is identical with its seven heads. This is even more clearly stated in xvii. 10 f. Five of the seven heads had fallen, a sixth is standing at the time of Revelation, a seventh has not yet appeared. But one of the five beasts which had already fallen will appear again, and this head, which was and is to come again, is absolutely identified with the beast (xvii. 11). On the other hand, the whole idea of the seven heads of the beast would be impossible were the meaning of the beast itself out and out identical with the meaning of one of its seven heads. An analogous relation must exist between it and the remaining six heads. The heads are consecutive phases of the greatness of the world kingdom at enmity with God through all changes of history, which the beast represents. This broader meaning of the beast, along with the narrower one, according to which it represents a single one of the seven phases,—namely, the antichristian kingdom and its ruler, who had existed once and was to return,—is expressed in xiii. 2 by the statement that the beast bears in itself the marks of the three world rulers, which, according to Dan. vii. 4–6, precede the fourth and last. Accordingly, the seven heads cannot be individual rulers of one and the same kingdom, but only kingdoms which follow each other, together with their respective kings; so, for example, the Babylonian with Nebuchadnezzar, the Græco-Macedonian with Alexander, and the Roman with Cæsar at the head. The seven heads are interpreted in xvii. 10 simply as seven kings (βασιλεῖς and not βασιλείαι); but this cannot lead one astray, for, as has been said, since the time of Daniel the idea of the kingdoms had become inseparably blended with that of their founders or representatives (n. 2).

Since Revelation was written at the time of the Roman Empire, this is, according to xvii. 10, the sixth head; another seventh kingdom will follow it, but will not long reign. Upon this follows the eighth,—that of the antichrist,—which, however, is only a revivification of one of the five earlier kingdoms. Without question this is intended to be the Græco-Macedonian and its typical ruler, the pre-Christian antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes (vol. i. 227, 237, n. 4, 238 ff.). The interpretation of the seven heads as the line of Roman emperors from Augustus or from Cæsar onwards, which has confused many, is untenable. In passing judgment upon the Roman kingdom as the antichristian kingdom of the end of the world, Revelation, in the first place, would step entirely out of the position which we see was held in the presence of the Roman Empire by Jesus (Matt. xxii. 21 ; John xix. 11), by Peter (1 Pet. ii. 13-17), by Paul (Rom. xiii. 1 ff. ; 2 Thess. ii. 6 f.), and by the early Christian prophecy of which Paul approved ; further, by Clement of Rome, Melito, and Irenæus (vol. i. 229 f., 252 ff.). At all events the Roman Empire is one of the consecutive world kingdoms which together form a contrast to the kingdom of God and Christ, or, speaking figuratively, it is the sixth of the seven heads of the beast. So then Rome, i.e. the world-metropolis at this time, is represented as Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13 ; vol. ii. 163). The blood of saints and apostles has been shed in this Babylon-Rome, according to Rev. xviii. 20, under Nero (vol. ii. 165, n. 4). Probably also the seven hills, on which the harlot Babylon sitteth (xvii. 9), without detracting from their actual meaning (n. 2), are intended to refer to the seven hills of Rome. For that reason, however, Rome is by no means the Babylon of the last times, and the Roman kingdom the beast in his last antichristian development, or a Roman emperor of the immediate future the antichrist.

In the second place, by this interpretation it would be wholly inconceivable how the beast, who accordingly must be the Roman Empire founded by Cæsar or Augustus, could be represented as an appearance of the closing period of the world. That the beast has already once existed does not alter the case ; for the former existence is fully separated from the future prophesied existence by a present non-existence (xvii. 8-11).

The Roman Empire, however, has not ceased to exist since it was established, at least at the time of Revelation, when the Christians came to feel its power heavily enough. The interpretation of the seven heads as the Roman emperors succeeding each other is in the third place incomprehensible, as the killing of one of these heads is said to be at the same time the killing of the beast (xiii. 3 f., 12, 14, xvii. 8). By the death of Nero, or any other one of the emperors, before the time of Revelation, the continued existence of the Roman kingdom had never been questioned, much less had it ever ceased to exist (cf. vol. i. 229 f.). If a Cæsar dies, there is another Cæsar who immediately lives and reigns. In spite of the temporary disturbances of the national unity, which were occasioned by the simultaneous reigning of several pretendants during the two years from the death of Nero until the general recognition of Vespasian, in Asia Minor at least the governmental machinery continued in activity, and in that section of the empire no provincial in 68–70 A.D. could think of the Roman Empire as dead. This contemporary-historical interpretation makes in the fourth place any acceptable interpretation of the ten horns (xiii. 1, xvii. 3, 12–17, cf. xii. 3) impossible. The idea, however, that the representation of the revivification of the fatally smitten beast or of one of its heads (xiii. 3, 14, xvii. 8, 11) rests upon the myth of the return of Nero, is irreconcilable with the history of this myth (n. 3). The notion, which arose soon after the suicide of Nero and at first among his heathen admirers, that he had not died, but had fled to the Parthians, and would return from that country to Rome to take vengeance on his enemies and to assume the throne again, existed unchanged until the beginning of the second century,—namely, until the time when it was no longer probable that Nero, who was born in 37 A.D., was still alive. We find this notion in two Jewish Sibyllists of the year 71, and about the year 80. In the field of just this literature, about 120 to 125,—namely, at a time when Nero could no longer have been alive,—the idea of his return appeared in the changed form, that Nero, the instigator of the destruction of Jerusalem, though long since dead, would return again to life with signs and wonders. Finally, however, he would be destroyed in punishment for his last attack on the Holy City of the Messiah. A Christian Sibyllist about 150 to 160 combined these Jewish notions with the statements in Rev. xiii. 3, 15, xvii. 8, 11, and thus introduced into the Christian world one of the most confused ideas of which it was possible to conceive. The idea of the return of the dead Nero first arose when he could no longer likely be among the living, and the original form of the popular belief evidently for this reason only underwent transformation into the complete fantastic form; consequently this idea cannot be present in Revelation, whether it was written in 69, when Nero, if still alive, would have been thirty-two years old, or about 95, in which year Nero would have completed his fifty-eighth year. An oracle had warned him with regard to his seventy-third year, which he would have attained in 110 (Suet. Nero, xl.). Earlier than that date neither friends nor enemies, who believed in his return, had any occasion whatever for believing in a return from the dead. No thoughtful person, however, can consider it possible that Revelation was written after the year 110.

Moreover, the interpretation of the number 666 as the alleged Hebrew form, נרון קסר (Népon Kaîsar), of the name Nero (n. 4), is extremely improbable. Revelation was written for Greek Christians, for whom it would be necessary to translate a Hebrew name, in order that they might grasp its literal meaning (ix. 11, cf. xvi. 16). The author makes use of only such Hebrew words as would be familiar to the readers from their liturgy or their Greek O.T., like amen and hallelujah. He paraphrases the Yahweh name by a Greek participial form (i. 4), and does not use the Hebrew (נ-ס), but the Greek alphabet (Α—Ω) when he employs the first and last letters as a figurative expression for beginning and end (i. 8, xxi. 6, xxii. 13). He does not in any way indicate (xiii. 18) that it needed a knowledge of Hebrew and the numerical value of the Hebrew letters to solve the riddle. His readers could and had to understand him in no other way, than that the numerical values of the letters of the personal name written in Greek are summed up in the number 666. It was a fixed tradition (Iren. v. 30) in the circles of the disciples of John in Asia Minor, that the Greek alphabet was to underlie any interpretation of Scripture; and also those, who in the second century took the liberty of changing the number 666 to 616 in order to secure the name of the Emperor Caius (n. 5)—i.e. Caligula—follow this self-evident rule. In fact, we perceive from this early change of the test, on the one hand, how foreign it was to the Christians, even of the post-apostolic period, to consider Nero as the type of the antichrist; and, on the other hand, how still unforgotten the figure of the ἀντίθεος Caligula had remained (vol. i. 227, 237, n. 7).

The disciples of John, to whom Irenæus appealed not only for the authenticity of the number 666, but also for the principles of interpreting it, discarded rightly the interpretation that it meant a former or future Roman emperor. They did not know, further, what name the number represented, but were convinced that at the time of the appearance of the antichrist, this prophecy also would be fulfilled, and that the agreement between name and number would assist the Church, at once and with certainty, to recognise their last enemy. This method of consideration is in accord with the "spirit of prophecy" and the "testimony of Jesus" (Rev. xix. 10), as the apostle John has preserved it in his Gospel (John xiii. 19 and elsewhere; above, p. 330, n. 10). That is the position which Christianity has taken from the beginning toward all prophecy, recognised as genuine. Genuine prophecy contains much which lies outside the consciousness of the prophet himself, and will first become clear through its fulfilment. It is on this account, nevertheless, a guiding star, before it is fulfilled, and does not become through its fulfilment in any way superfluous, but as fulfilled prophecy renders just then the greatest service to the Church.

Whoever holds Revelation to be an artificial patchwork of a seer who has seen nothing, may make further effort to discover solutions of the number riddle 666, and in fact any other riddle of this book more satisfactory than have been found up to this time under these presuppositions. The rest of us, who, in memory of the warning of Paul (1 Thess. v. 20), find genuine prophecy in Revelation, of which we already understand something and hope later to understand more, shall, in face of the scorn which is not spared us, remember the words (1 Cor. xiv. 22) : ἡ προφητεία οὐ τοῖς ἀπίστοις, ἀλλὰ τοῖς πιστεύουσιν.

1. (P. 436.) A useful history of the interpretation of Rev., which would be almost equivalent to a history of Christian eschatology, has not yet been written. Cf., however, LÜCKE, Kommentar über die Schriften des Jo. iv. 1: Versuch einer vollständigen Einl. in die Offenb. und die gesamte apokal. Literatur, 1832.

2. (P. 441.) A difficulty is certainly presented by the double interpretation of the seven heads in xvii. 9 and xvii. 10 f. But no confusion is created, simply because the two interpretations occur so close together. The interpretation, as seven kings, which alone is elaborated, is the only one which agrees with xiii. 1-3, 12, 14, since a mountain cannot be mortally wounded. At the same time, the identification in the latter passage and xvii. 11 of one of the heads with the beast, proves that the heads, like the beasts, cannot designate kings in distinction from kingdoms, but mean kingdoms together with their representative kings. Moreover, the fact that the harlot sits upon the seven-headed beast (xvii. 3), whereas in xvii. 9 she is represented as sitting upon the seven heads, presupposes that the beast is a world empire, and that the seven heads are phases of the empire, since the capital city of the world does not ride upon a king or upon a number of kings, but reigns over the world empire or over several successive world empires. If xvii. 9 were omitted, nothing essential would be lost. Just as the beast signifies not only the world empire of the antichrist at the end of time, together with its ruler, but also the world empire whose successive phases are represented by the seven heads from its beginning, so Babylon also is the capital of the world empire as such. It was situated formerly on the Euphrates, now on the Tiber, in the language of the prophets later perhaps it will be on the Seine or the Bosphorus; but through all historical changes it retains its old name. If, then, the beast be conceived of as an entity persisting throughout the course of history, then Babylon sits upon the beast; if the point of view be the changing aspects of the world empire, then Babylon sits upon the seven heads. In a stationary picture successive events are necessarily represented as simultaneous. This is true also of the interpretation of the seven heads as seven mountains, which is not further elaborated. Of course, as the writer intended, the readers who regarded Rome as the Babylon of their age (1 Pet. v. 13), would necessarily think of the seven hills of Rome; and therefore they have always understood that Rome was intended by the Babylon of John, as by that of Peter (see vol. ii. 163, n. 3, 165, n. 4, 189, n. 5; cf. Hippol. de Antichr. 36 ff.; Tert. contra Jud. ix.; Jerome, preface in Litr. Didymi de spir. sancto; Andreas in Apoc., ed. Sylburg, p. 75 ff., 81 ff.). However, even these seven mountains were only symbols of the places—probably upon earth—where successively the capital of the world has stood and is destined to stand (cf. Jer. li. 25). Of subordinate importance is the question as to the succession of world empires presented in Rev. Probably (1) Egypt with Pharaoh as the typical name of the king, (2) Assyria with Sennacherib, (3) Babylon with Nebuchadnezzar, (4) the Medo-Persian empire, (5) the Greco-Macedonian empire, (6) the Roman Empire with its Caesar, (7) the shortlived empire which is to come, to be followed by a renewal of the fifth empire of which Antiochus is the antitype, who is the antichrist of the last days. This is the eighth kingdom.

3. (P. 443.) For the legend concerning Nero, cf. vol. i. 246 f., 252; Apok. Stud. ii. 337-352, 393-405.

4. (P. 444.) In regard to the number of the antichrist, cf. Apok. Stud. i. 561-576. Its interpretation, as equivalent to נרן קר, was proposed first in 1831 by Fritzsche (Annalen der ges. theol. Lit. i. 3, S. 42 ff.) and then by Benary, Hitzig, and Reuss, as it seems, quite independently both of Fritzsche and of one another (cf. Bleek, Vorles. über die Ap. S. 292 f.). The defective spelling קר instead of the regular קר (as in the Talmud; cf. also Sh, Matt. xxii. 17, and the inscription found near Bostra belonging to the year 47 A.D. C. I. Sem. ii. No. 170), is the least suspicious thing about this discovery. Mention may be made of other Hebrew interpretations as follows: Vitringa, Comm. 633 ff., ארננס, from Ezra ii. 13 with reference to the 666 fellow-tribemen, and without reference to the numerical value of the letters. Lightfoot (with whose view the present writer is acquainted only from Wolff, Cur. phil. in epist. Jac. etc. 1735, p. 546), סחר from Num. xiii. 13; this gives the number 666, and the meaning of סחר suggests μωσθησμον. This is united by Herder (Maranatha, S. 148) with the interpretation סרו suggested by Portzig and purporting to mean apostasie; also Herder appropriates Lakemacher's suggestion ר"ש סחן but does not, like its originator, refer it to the Rabban Simon, the son of Gamaliel (Schurer, ii. 365 [Eng. trans. ii. i. 365]), but to Simon bar Giora, the revolutionist (Schurer, i. 621 [Eng. trans. i. ii. 232]). Zullig (Offenb. Joh. ii. 247) proposes בלעם בן בער קס, Jos. xiii. 22; but in order to get the number he wants, it is necessary to omit the indispensable article before קס and the vowel ו twice. Aberle (ThQSc, 1872, S. 144) suggests סרנס ארננס (sic! supposed to mean Trajan). Völter (2 Aufl. S. 77), סרנס ארננס (Trajanus Hadrianus). Bruston (Le chiffre 666, Paris, 1880, p. 11), נסרן בן נס, Gen. x. 8, נ has to be omitted in the second name. Gunkel, S. 377, חסו, קרסניה, "Chaos of the primeval age." The well-known analogies adduced by Gunkel himself might well have suggested to him that an attribute without an article is questionable Hebrew. Several of these interpretations are worthy of the jest נרן סלמן, "Mr. Salmon," in Salmon's Historic. Introd. to N.T. (1885) p. 300. Greek interpretations.—Iren. v. 30. 3 gives us our choice among Εὐάρθας, Τετάρν, Δατέϊνος, the last favoured by Hippol. (de Antichr. 50), although, according to the report of J. Haussleiter, the real Victorinus of Pettau gives no name; in the later editions of his commentary (Migne, v. col. 399), "Ανεμος and the Gothic name Γενσήρικος are referred to as possibilities. Others suggest ἀρνούμαι, "I deny," or Papiscus (written Παπίσκος), since the time of the ancient dialogue, "Jason and Papiskus," a typical name for the Jew who contends with the Christian. More recent explanations are to be found ZfNTW, 1901, S. 109-114; 1902, S. 238-242; 1903, S. 167-174, 264-267; 1904, S. 84-88, 257-261.

5. (P. 445.) In his discussion of Rev. xiii., and after a theological explanation of the number 666 (v. 28-30), Irenæus remarks in a supplementary way (v. 30. 1, cf. Forsch. vi. 70): "His autem sic se habentibus et in omnibus antiquis et probatissimis et veteribus scripturis numero hoc posito, et testimonium perhibentibus his, qui facie ad faciem Joannem viderunt, et ratione docente nos, quoniam numerus nominis bestię secundum Græcorum computationem per literas, quę in eo sunt, sexcentos habebit et sexaginta et sex . . . ignoro, quomodo ignoraverunt quidam, sequentes idiotismum et medium frustrantes numerum nominis, quinquaginta numeros deducentes, pro sex decadis unam decadem volentes esse." This reading 616 is also attested to by Cod. C (fifth cent.), by two cursives which unfortunately are no longer extant (5 and 11, cf. Gregory, Prolegomena, 676), and by the Donatist Tyconius, whose remarks on this point are to be inferred from the agreement of the three commentaries dependent upon him; those of the pseudo-Augustine, of Primasius, and of Beatus, cf. Haussleiter, Forsch. iv. 133, also by the tract on the monogram of Christ (Anecd. Maredsol. iii. 3. 195), ascribed by tradition to Jerome. Irenæus was of the opinion that this reading originated innocently through errors in writing; since the numbers were written not only in numerals (thus Rev. xiii. 18, \aleph ACP sah. vg. S² S³ Iren. and apparently also in his ἀρχαία καὶ σπονδαία καὶ παλαιὰ ἀντίγραφα), but also in numeral letters (thus B, some cursives, Copt., and probably Hippol. de Antichr. 48, 50: χξ'), by vertical extension Ξ could easily be changed into I. Notwithstanding the present writer's remarks in Apok. Stud. i. 569, this is certainly possible, not only in the case of the old Doric form of the I (cf. Kirchhoff, Stud. z. Gesch. des griech. Alphabets, 3te Aufl. Tafel i.; Palæogr. Soc. series, vol. i. table after plate 101; Inscr. antiquiss. Græciæ, ed. Röhl, Nos. 15, 17, 20 ff.), but also according to inscriptions and coins of the time of the emperors; cf. Ramsay, JHS, 1887, p. 466 f. It was not until later, according to Irenæus, that inquisitive persons attempted to give a meaning to the meaningless scribal error by endeavouring to find a name which it would represent. The gist of Irenæus' further discussion is that a Roman emperor was found designated by $\chi\iota$: an opinion which Irenæus controverts. Tyconius, who was familiar only with the number 616, makes no reference to an historical explanation. He thought that he discovered in the number the monogram of Christ, and, as Burkitt proves (Cambridge University Reporter, 1896, p. 625), in reverse position. \Re is held to be a combination of $X=600$, $I=10$, and the old form of the episemon= \mathfrak{C} , which at the same time stands for the name of Christ. This reversed \Re is, therefore, a suitable monogram for the antichrist. This meaning cannot be correct and original; for, in the first place, according to Irenæus, there is no doubt that 666, not 616, was the number written by John. In the second place, there is just as little doubt that this was originally written in numerals, not in numeral letters. This disposes of Irenæus' well-meant supposition that the reading is due to an innocent scribal error, and likewise of Tyconius' explanation, which is, moreover, based upon the incredible supposition that the monogram of Christ was in use at the time of Rev., or, if the reading 616 is not genuine, at least some time before Irenæus; see, however, vol. ii. 192 f. Finally, it is impossible that the number 616 should have originated in this accidental way and afterwards been given a meaning, because, without any resort to artifice whatever, the number gives a thoroughly intelligible name, $\Gamma\alpha\iota\omicron\varsigma\text{Κα}\iota\sigma\alpha\rho$ ($\Gamma=3$, $\alpha=1$, $\iota=10$, $\omicron=70$, $\sigma=200$, $\text{Κ}=20$, $\alpha=1$, $\iota=10$, $\sigma=200$, $\alpha=1$, $\rho=100=616$). This observation, which the present writer believed to be original with him in Apok. Stud. i. 571, is said to have been made earlier by Weyers, Disput. de libro apoc., Lugd. Bat. 1728 (so quoted by Züllig, Offb. Joh. i. 147; others, 1828. The present writer has not seen the work). Because of the desire to find here a reference to Caius Cæsar, i.e. Caligula (cf. vol. i. 228, 237 f.), before the time of Irenæus, unknown persons residing in Rome or the West, not in Asia, changed the number 666 to 616. Spitta, S. 392 ff., holds the view that in the Jewish Apocalypse of Caligula's time, which he makes one of the sources of the canonical Apocalypse (above, p. 407, n. 11), the number 616 was found which meant Caligula, that between 90 and 110 the Christian editor, by making the Hebrew alphabet his basis and changing 616 into 666, introduced the name Nero Cæsar, and that finally those who are opposed by Irenæus, on the basis of "an old tradition" (S. 394), reintroduced the original number 616 from the Jewish into the canonical Apocalypse. It seems impossible to accept this explanation. For it represents the Jewish apocalyptic writer as basing his computation upon the Greek alphabet, while the Christian apocalyptic writer living in Asia Minor uses the Hebrew alphabet! But most inconceivable of all is the interpolation about the year 150 of a canonical Apocalypse originating between 90 and 110 from a Jewish Apocalypse written about 40. Nothing is more common than a confusion of the texts of an earlier and a later recension of a Biblical book (cf. in the MSS. of the Vulgate the many elements which date from a time previous to Jerome). But this presupposes that the older recension has been used canonically for generations in the Church; and cannot be at once entirely displaced by the new recension. Phenomena of this kind offer no analogy whatever for the relation of this alleged Jewish Apocalypse to the Apocalypse of John.

XI.

CHRONOLOGICAL SURVEY.

1. PRELIMINARY REMARKS.—(1) It is not the purpose of this text-book to arrange the entire chronology of the history recorded in the N.T. and at the same time to fix the dates of the writings brought together in that collection. The relative chronology of these writings, however, has been established in many particulars by the investigation of the individual books. In order to construct their absolute chronology, there seemed to be demanded, as the only sufficient thing, a complete enumeration and not a wholly superficial discussion of the possible synchronisms between the N.T. literature and general history, and of those synchronisms which do not as yet, but perhaps in the near future may help in fixing the dates absolutely. These synchronisms concern especially the history of Paul, the chronology of which has been discussed in recent years with particular interest. (2) Literature:—Bengel, Ordo temporum, 1741, 268–295; Wurm, TZfTh, 1833, S. 3–103; Anger, De tempor. in actis apost. ratione, 1833; Wieseler, Chronologie des apost. Zeitalters, 1848; Hofmann, NT. v. 11–17; Lightfoot, Bibl. Essays (written 1863), 1893, pp. 21–233; Aberle, ThQSc, 1886, S. 553 ff.; Aberle, Bibl. Zeitschrift von Göttberger und Sickenberger, 1903, S. 256 ff.; O. Holtzmann, Ntl. Zeitgeschichte, 1895, S. 128 ff.; Blass, Acta Apost. editio philol. 1895, p. 22 ff.; Harnack, Chronol. der altchristl. Literatur, Bd. i. 1897, S. 233 ff.; Belser, ThQSc, 1898, S. 353 ff.; Ramsay, several articles in Expos. 1896, 1897, 1900; Bacon, Expos. 1898, 1899 1900; Schürer, ZfWTh, 1898, S. 21–42; Schürer, *Gesch des Jüd. Volks*³, i. (1901) in many passages, especially S. 577 ff. [Eng. trans. i. ii. 181 ff.]; Hönnicke, Chronol. des Apostels Pl. 1903; Zahn, *PRE*³, xv. 62–68 (1904); Clemen, Paulus, Bd. i. (1904). (3) In the following remarks, which set forth the grounds for some of the principal dates in the table on p. 481 ff., the conclusions already reached in this book concerning the origin and trustworthiness of the N.T. writings, especially of Acts, are assumed. These remarks also recognise the principle, that in historical matters no writer is infallible, but each must be judged according to his historical position and probable intention in writing. For example, Tacitus is better acquainted with Rome than is Josephus; Josephus is better acquainted with Palestine than is Tacitus. Josephus (born in 37), though poorly informed concerning conditions among the Jews during the forty years prior to his birth and the first decade after it (above, p. 97 ff.), is the classical witness for the same conditions between 50 and 70, and in questions concerning the order of events during this period certainly deserves incomparably more credence than the chroniclers, learned and unlearned, from the time of Julius Africanus onwards. Leaving out of account the length of time between a writer and the event which he records, in chronological questions the authority of even a mediocre historian who gives a connected narrative is greater than that of chroniclers who group together separate dates, generally on the basis of some scheme. Where the chronicler has used, or seems to have used, official lists of emperors or bishops and their years of office, he should be given a hearing; but it is certain that there were no such lists of the procurators of Palestine. Furthermore, it must be regarded as not permissible to change dates which without variation are transmitted by such ancient and widely manifest tradition as that of the N.T. writings, e.g., in Gal. ii. 1 to substitute for διὰ δεκατεσσάρων, with Marcion (GK, ii. 497), διὰ τεσσάρων, as proposed by Grotius and Reiche (Comm. crit. ii. 1–10), and accepted by Baljon (Komm. zum Gal. S. 16–19, 102). If in the future a text with this reading should turn up, every critic would certainly know that it was a correction due to such reflections as are found in the Chron. pasch., ed. Bonn, i. 436. Furthermore, on stylistic grounds, it seems impossible to reckon the fourteen years from the conversion of Paul (Gal. i. 15) instead of from the first visit to Jerusalem three years after the conversion (Gal. i. 18). Even omitting πάντα in Gal. ii. 1, which refers directly to i. 18, with Marcion (GK, ii. 497), Iren. et al. ἑπείτα, which is twice repeated in i. 18 and ii. 1, shows that the three facts—the conversion, the first and the second visit to Jerusalem—are links in a chain (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 4–8), the second of which is separated from the first by a space of three years, and the third by a space of fourteen years (cf. the expression with that of Acts xxiv. 17); so that we have an interval of seventeen years between the conversion and the event narrated in Gal. ii. 1–10; cf. ZKomm. Gal. 76 f. Moreover, for the present writer as for most modern scholars there is no question that the events referred to in Gal. ii. 1–10 are the same as those of Acts xv. 1–29. This is evidenced not only by the practical identity of the two accounts, but also by the impossibility of making any other combination. A combination of Gal. ii. and Acts xviii. 22 is impossible, because in the latter passage Paul does not go to Jerusalem at all (above, p. 29 f., n. 8), and because Galatians was written prior to this time. But it is just as impossible to combine Gal. ii. with Acts xi. 30, xii. 25, because this journey with the collection took place in the autumn of 44 (see below), subtracting from which the seventeen years, we should have the year 27 as the date of Paul's conversion, which is impossible. Even if, on the presupposition of the combination of Acts xi. 30 and Gal. ii. 1, it were admissible to subtract only fourteen years, Paul's conversion would have to be dated in the year 30, which would make such combination very improbable. In the opinion of the present writer, it is by no means certain in what year Jesus' death took place; it certainly did not occur before the year 29. Moreover, it is impossible to crowd the events of Acts i.-ix. into the interval between the Passover of 29 and the autumn of 30. One needs only to recall the complete change in the attitude of the Pharisaical party and of the entire population toward the early Church—as contrasted with that of the Sadducees—which took place in the interval between the events of Acts i.-v. and the events of Acts vi.-ix. This would require years. Furthermore, Rom. xvi. 7 (vol. i. 418, n. 23) shows that Paul's conversion could not have taken place until several years after the death of Jesus. The fact that Paul makes no mention of the journey with the collection in Gal. ii. 1 is no reason either for such impracticable combinations, or for questioning the historicity of the journey with the collection in Acts xi. 30. The historicity of the account is proved both by the general character of Acts and by the fact that Luke was in Antioch at the time when Paul and Barnabas were sent to Jerusalem (Acts xi. 27; above, pp. 2, 4, 28). Paul does not say in Gal. ii. 1 that after his first visit he remained away from Jerusalem fourteen years; this would have required just as positive a denial of his presence there as we have in i. 16-18 if there had been any occasion for such a statement. He merely says that he went to Jerusalem fourteen years after his first visit, and tells why. There is no claim that the narrative is complete, especially if πάλιν, which is by no means certain, be omitted. It will, however, be made clear below (p. 455 f.) why Paul omits mention of the journey with the collection, and why his opponents could not use this against him.

Finally, it is assumed that the regulations governing ancient traffic were used, where the sources do not expressly state otherwise. Navigation was regularly closed from the beginning of November until the beginning of March (according to Vegetius, de Re Milit. iv. 39, from November 11 until March 10). According to the ancient calendars, the festival connected with the opening of navigation, the Navigium Isidis (cf. Apul. Metamorph. xi. 7 ff.; Lactant. Inst. i. 11. 21) fell on the fifth of March, C.I.L. i. 1 (ed. ii.) pp. 260, 280, 311. For the causes of this "weak point in ancient navigation," the mare clausum, see Breusing, Nautik der Alten, S. 160. From 1 Cor. xvi. 6, Tit. iii. 12 (cf. Acts xx. 3, 6), we see that Paul took this into consideration in making the plans for his journeys. He awaits in port cities the end of the winter, i.e., the reopening of navigation. This is also the meaning of παρὰχειμάζειν in Acts xxvii. 12, xxviii. 11. For this reason an assumption like that of Erbes (Die Todestage der Apostel Pt. und Pl. S. 48 f.), that Paul sailed from Malta on the twenty-sixth of January, is quite inadmissible. Particularly, after the experiences which the travellers had had on their way to Malta, this would have shown an incredible lack of caution on the part of the centurion Julius. Moreover, the latter was merely taking passage, and the decision as to whether, contrary to custom, the ship and cargo should be exposed to special danger rested primarily not with him, but with the captain of the Alexandrian vessel. That part of the sea was regarded as especially dangerous (Polybius, i. 37), and an officer entrusted with a responsible order would, according to Vegetius (op. cit.), exercise more, not less care, than the captain of a merchant vessel. In view of the character of his report in Acts xxvii.-xxviii., Luke could not have failed to note any departure from the rule, or to have stated the reason for the particular haste of the Alexandrian captain and for the consequent decision of Julius.

The synchronisms will be noted in their chronological order.

2. THE ETHNARCH OF ARETAS, i.e., of the Nabatæan king Harithath IV., the father-in-law of Herod Antipas, showed himself hostile to Paul, according to 2 Cor. xi. 32 (= Acts ix. 24), at the time of his flight from Damascus to Jerusalem, three years after his conversion (Gal. i. 18). The question need not be discussed whether Damascus was at that time, and only temporarily, a part of the kingdom of Aretas (mentioned by Gutschmid in Euting, Nabat. Inschr. S. 85; Schürer, i. 737, ii. 82, 118 [Eng. trans. i. ii. 357, ii. i. 66, 98]). The present writer believes that on very good grounds he has disputed this position (NKZ, 1904, S. 34 ff.; *PRE*³, xv. 62 f.—in the latter of which articles he has contested other confused views). Certainly it was impossible to speak of an ethnarch of Aretas after the latter had ceased to live and reign. At the same time we cannot determine definitely either the beginning or the end of his reign, though from his coins and inscriptions we know that he lived to see the forty-eighth year of his reign. His immediate successor, Abia, ruled under Claudius and in the time of Izates of Adiabene (Jos. Ant. xx. 4. 1), the latest possible dates of whose successor, Malchus (Maliku) II. (listed by Gutschmid as Malchus III.), according to Gutschmid, S. 86, were from April 49 to April 71. But only the final date is certain, whereas the year of importance to us is that of the beginning of his reign. It is probable, however, that Aretas reigned from about 9 B.C. to 39 A.D. (Gutschmid, S. 85; Schürer, i. 736 ff. [Eng. trans. i. ii. 356 ff.]). If Aretas' reign did not extend beyond this year, Paul's flight from Damascus must have taken place in the year 39, at the very latest, and his conversion at the very latest in the year 36. However, it may just as well have occurred several years earlier.

3. HEROD AGRIPPA I., who received the dominion and royal title of his grandfather from Claudius immediately after the accession of the latter to the throne, Jan. 24th, 41 (Jos. Bell. ii. 11. 5; Ant. xix. 5. 1), died three years later (Bell. ii. 11. 6; Ant. xix. 8. 2), i.e. in the year 44, according to Acts xii. 3, 19, some time after the Passover. With this agrees the fact that the festive games at Cæsarea, on the occasion of which he died, were held in honour of the emperor, more specifically ὑπὲρ τῆς ἐκείνου σωτηρίας (Ant. xix. 8. 2), which can refer only to Claudius' safe return from Britain in the spring of 44 (Dio Cass. lx. 23. 1, cf. lx. 21. 2; Suet. Claud. xvii.; Eus. Chron. Abr. 2060; cf. Schürer, i. 562 [Eng. trans. i. ii. 163]). The summer of that year must have come before the news of this event could have reached Palestine and been the occasion of extraordinary festivities. If this determines the chronology of the events in Acts xii. 1–23, the question arises as to the relation of the collection journey in Acts xi. 30, xii. 25, to the events which took place at the time of the Passover in the year 44. There are three possibilities. Of these, the first is to be excluded, namely, that which makes the journey of Paul and Barnabas to and from Jerusalem take place before the events of xii. 1–23. In this case it is impossible to understand why xii. 25 is not added directly after xi. 30, especially since nothing is added after xii. 25, the narrative beginning in xiii. 1 being entirely new. The second possibility, namely, that the events recorded in xii. 1–23 coincide with the visit of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem, is likewise to be rejected. In that case, (1) these events would naturally in some way be woven into the story of the experiences of Paul and Barnabas, and it would somewhere be intimated that Paul and Barnabas witnessed these events in Jerusalem, and the story would not be inserted into the account by means of a very indefinite date like that in xii. 1. (2) The only natural explanation of πρὸς τοὺς πρεσβυτέρους in xi. 30 is the absence of the apostles from Jerusalem. The disposition of the collection money by the presbyters, with the apostles present in the city, is, of course, conceivable; cf. vi. 1-6. But in xi. 30 the Church to which the money was sent seems to be represented by the presbyters alone, among whom the "bishop" James is reckoned, notwithstanding his eminent position (cf. xii. 17, xxi. 18; per contra, cf. xv. 2, 4, 6, 22, 23, xvi. 4, Gal. ii. 1-10; Forsch. vi. 353). Only the third possibility remains, namely, that Paul and Barnabas came to Jerusalem after the events of xii. 1-23. Peter had already fled from Jerusalem (xii. 17). Inasmuch as Peter in departing speaks only of James and the Church, not of the other apostles, we infer that the latter, or as many of them as were then present in Jerusalem, had made use of their right to flee (Matt. x. 23) immediately after the execution of the apostle James and during the imprisonment of Peter, since manifestly Agrippa's designs were against the apostles in general. So Acts xii. 1-23 is an episode taken out of the past, which, apart from whatever independent value it may have, serves to show the condition of things which Paul and Barnabas encountered in Jerusalem. One apostle had been beheaded, another had been saved by a miracle and had afterwards fled, the others had left Jerusalem earlier. The direction of the Church was in the hands of James and the presbyters alone. Paul did not see an apostle on this occasion. Therefore he had no reason whatever to mention this journey in Galatians. The only thing that follows directly from what precedes is the fact that the collection journey took place after the death of Agrippa I., therefore at the earliest in the summer of the year 44. Since, moreover, the full year during which Paul and Barnabas were teaching together in Antioch (xi. 26) could have ended, not with the introduction of the name Christian, or with the appearance of Agabus (xi. 27), but only with an event causing a serious interruption in the teaching work, i.e. with the journey with the collection, from which point the time (ἐνιαυτὸν ὅλον) is to be reckoned backwards, it follows that Barnabas could not have brought Paul from Tarsus before the summer of the year 43. But these dates (summer of 43 and summer of 44), before which the events could not have taken place, must coincide very nearly with the actual dates. For, in the first place, if a year or more elapsed after Peter's flight and the death of Agrippa, before Paul and Barnabas came to Jerusalem, the episode in xii. 1-23 is inserted in a very awkward place, and fails to fulfil its purpose, namely, to show the condition of things at the time when Paul and Barnabas arrived. Moreover, the expression κατ' ἐκείνουν τὸν καιρόν, xii. 1 (cf. xix. 23), notwithstanding its flexibility, needs to be connected in some way with the context, and the only thing with which it can be connected is the collection journey, which ended the first full year of Paul's work as a teacher in Antioch (xi. 26, 30). The events recorded in xii. 1-23 did not take place before the beginning of this year,—in which case the episode would belong before xi. 25, if it ought not to follow immediately after xi. 18,—but in the course of this year, from summer to summer, or autumn to autumn. Therefore the collection journey took place in the summer, or, since it was not customary to travel to the south in the hottest part of the year unless it was necessary, more probably in the autumn of the year 44,—the autumn of the year in which James had been put to death at Easter,—and Barnabas brought Paul from Tarsus in the summer or autumn of 43. But these dates must be further defended, in view of the misunderstandings which have arisen about the collection journey. The first occasion for the collection mentioned (xi. 28) is Agabus' prophecy of a general famine. This very general prophecy (that ὅλη ἡ οἰκουμένη cannot refer to Judea has been shown above, p. 130 f.) caused the Christians of Antioch to think at once of their poverty-stricken brethren in Judea, and led to the decision to raise a collection for them, each giving according to his ability.

The language in xi. 29 and the analogy of other collections (1 Cor. xvi. 1 ; 2 Cor. viii. 10, ix. 2) justify us in supposing that a year or more elapsed before the collection was completed, and that it was not sent until much later. In xi. 30 (ὁ καὶ ἐποίησαν, cf. Gal. ii. 10) the sending of the collection is clearly distinguished from the resolution to take and to send a collection. The difference in time between the prophecy and its fulfilment is even more clearly indicated in xi. 28. Every unprejudiced reader would necessarily infer from the contrast between μέλλειν ἔσεσθαι and ἥτις ἐγένετο ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου that the prophecy was made in the time of Caligula (died January 24, 41), and fulfilled in the time of his successor Claudius (vol. i. 228 ; cf. Bengel, Ord. temp. p. 247). Since now xi. 25–26, 30, xii. 25, place us in the year between the summer or autumn of 43 and the same time in 44, it is clear that in xi. 27–29, according to his custom (above, pp. 64–68), Luke goes back to the time prior to January 41 in order to explain the journey with the collection in the autumn of 44. The date mentioned in xi. 27 (cf. vi. 1 ; Matt. iii. 1) refers quite generally to the beginning of the Church in Antioch, described in xi. 19–26. No statement is made as to what occasioned the sending of the money, and to assume that the actual breaking out of the famine in Palestine caused it to be sent is arbitrary. If the indefinite prophecy of a single prophet was sufficient to lead to the collection of a charitable fund, any indication that this prophecy was about to be fulfilled could have led to the resolution to send the money at once to the poor Judeans, who had been in mind from the first. If, in addition, the news had reached Antioch of Agrippa's persecution of the apostles, and of the orphaned condition of the Church at Jerusalem, then there was all the more reason for such an immediate exercise of brotherly love. The prophecy of Agabus, however, did not begin to be fulfilled until after the beginning of Claudius' reign, which was generally afflicted by assiduæ sterilitates (Suet. Claudius, xviii. ; for further particulars see above, p. 130 f.). For Luke this was sufficient fulfilment of the prophecy of Agabus, whose indefinite and popular language he does not hesitate to repeat. It was likewise sufficient to induce the Antiochians to send the money collected, without waiting for a great famine actually to occur in Judea. Although this makes the Pauline chronology really independent of the date of the famine in Judea, the following brief remarks concerning the latter may be made. According to Jos. Ant. xx. 5. 2, it took place under the procurator Tiberius Alexander. The correct reading in this passage is certainly not that adopted by Niese following the epitome ἐπὶ τούτου, but ἐπὶ τούτοις, as in the Greek MSS., the Latin version, and Eus. H. E. ii. 12. 1; at the same time, however, it is unnecessary, with Anger, 43 f.; Wieseler, 157 f.; Lightfoot, 216; Schürer, i. 567 f. [Eng. trans. i. ii. 169 f.], to refer this to the last two procurators mentioned, namely, Fadus and Tiberius Alexander. Because, in the first place, Josephus, in the concluding sentence of xx. 5. 1, sharply distinguishes the history of the procuratorship of Fadus from what follows. In the second place, that construction would require the reading ἐπὶ τούτων. The phrase ἐπὶ τούτοις, like the following πρὸς τούτοις (cf. also xx. 12; Niese, 267), is to be taken in a neuter sense, and means, as often in Eusebius, “under these conditions and circumstances,” and consequently “at this time”; cf. H. E. i. 1. 3, 2. 20 (ἐφ’ οὗς), iii. 4. 11; chap. 12; 23. 1; Mart. Palæstinae, xii. (beginning) (cf. xi. 31), practically the same as ἐν τούτοις, H. E. iv. 21, and ἐν τούτῳ, iii. 18. 1, iv. 15. 1, v. 13. 1, vi. 18. 1. There is nothing in the context of xx. 2. 1 to indicate that the famine in connection with which the princess Helena distinguished herself by deeds of mercy (xx. 2. 5) occurred during the procuratorship of Fadus (xx. 1. 1 f.), for the reason that xx. 2. 1 ff. deals with the conversion of Helena to Judaism. In this connection, Josephus speaks proleptically of her journey to Jerusalem, which was coincident with the famine (xx. 2. 5), and, in the same way, speaks even of her death (xx. 4. 3). He then returns to the procuratorship of Fadus (xx. 5. 1), and only after he has given an account of the accession of Tiberius Alexander does he indicate that the activity of Helena belongs historically in connection with the famine (xx. 5. 2). From xx. 1. 2 we know that Fadus was still in office in 45 (according to a more uncertain reading, on the 28th of June 45). According to xx. 5. 2, Tiberius Alexander was again recalled in the year 48; for Josephus connects this event with the death of Herod of Chalcis, which is dated by him in 48, by a καί before which there should be no pause. The year is, therefore, the date of Alexander's recall. This is not contradicted by the indefinite connection indicated in Bell. ii. 11. 6. If we are willing to assume, contrary to the whole impression of the narrative in Ant. xx. 1. 1–5. 2, that the decree of Claudius, referred to in xx. 1. 2, belonged to the latter and not to the earlier part of Fadus' term of office, and that Fadus held office a very short time, while Tiberius Alexander held office for a very long period, their respective terms of office must be divided somewhat as follows: Fadus, 44 to 46 or 47; Tiberius Alexander, from 46 or 47 to 48. Therefore the famine in Judea certainly did not fall in 44 or 45, but took place between 46 and 48, probably 47 or 48. Even if repeated bad harvests from 41 to 45 in various lands had raised prices in Palestine also, famine conditions did not exist there at the very earliest until 46, and so were not the occasion of the collection journey. Two further remarks may be added. In 2 Cor. xii. 1–4, Paul alludes to an experience of visions of a kind to give him a feeling of his importance for the rest of his life. Although, according to his own statement, fourteen years have elapsed since this experience took place, he speaks of it with the greatest animation and precision. When he confesses himself unable to give any definite account of his physical and psychical condition at that moment, it is not because the memory of it has faded, but merely because he is reproducing the first impression which one has upon awakening from a state of ecstasy (cf. Acts xii. 9). For him it must have been a very significant experience. Of course, the reference here cannot be to the experience near Damascus, as some ancient writers suppose, nor to his vision on the occasion of his first visit to Jerusalem subsequent to his conversion (Acts xxii. 17-21); for 2 Cor. was certainly written later than Galatians, in which we are informed that the apostolic council, which is spoken of as already past, took place fourteen years after the first visit and seventeen years after Paul's conversion. By the vision referred to in 2 Cor. his thoughts were turned to a future mission to the Gentiles (Acts xxii. 21, ἐξαποστελῶ, not ἐξαποστέλλω). It was necessary for him to wait for years in Tarsus until the Lord should redeem His word and send him to the Gentiles. In the summer of 43, Barnabas sought him out in Tarsus, and drew him into the missionary work at Antioch. According to the chronology here followed, 2 Cor. was written towards the end of the year 57. Subtracting fourteen years, we have the year 43. The two dates, arrived at independently of each other, agree in this, namely, that the significant revelation in 2 Cor. xii. 2, and the new call and actual participation of Paul in missionary work among the Gentiles, both fall in the year 43. Is this to be explained as chance, or do the two reckonings agree both as regards the year and even the time of the year, because the events mentioned in 2 Cor. xii. 2 and Acts xi. 25 were simultaneous? If several years before this Paul became aware that he was to receive a new manifestation of Jesus, by which he was to be directed to preach to the Gentiles, he could not have begun this work until this revelation was received. Barnabas' summons could not of itself have been sufficient. The fact that only the human summons is mentioned in Acts xi. 25 is merely an accurate illustration of the same relation which exists between Acts xv. 2 and Gal. ii. 2. The human summons does not exclude the κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν. But in both cases the historian Luke emphasises the external aspect of the matter, whereas Paul emphasises the supernatural side in the great crises of his life. A second remark needs to be added here concerning Peter's visit to Antioch. Following Schneckenburger, Zweck der Apg. S. 109 ff., the present writer, in NKZ, 1894, S. 435-448, claimed and endeavoured to prove that this visit took place before the apostolic council, probably shortly after Acts xii. 17. It is left to others to judge whether or not Belser, Bibl. Stud., edited by Bardenhewer, i. 3 (1896), S. 127-139, has successfully refuted this thesis. The visit of the prophets from Judea, Acts xi. 27; the collection journey, xi. 30; Mark's settlement in Antioch, xii. 25, in the autumn of 44; the visit of Peter and of others associated with James, Gal. ii. 11-14,—constitute a series of events extending from about 40 to 45.

4. SERGIUS PAULUS, THE PROCONSUL OF CYPRUS, ACTS XIII. 7-12.—Concerning this, cf. the extended discussion, NKZ, 1904, S. 189-195, which is directed especially against Mommsen. Cyprus became a senatorial province under Augustus, and remained such from 22 B.C. onwards (Dio Cass. liii. 12. 7, liv. 4. 1). It seems that during the great Jewish rebellion under Trajan (Dio Cass. lxxviii. 32, and therefore under unusual conditions, Cyprus was governed by an imperial Legate, a certain M. Calpurnius Rufus, C.I.L. iii. No. 6072, if the latter be identical with the person of the same name who previously under Hadrian had been proconsul of Achaia (Digest, i. 16. 10. 1). The governors of Cyprus usually bore the title of proconsul before as well as after Trajan's time. The full name of the proconsul (Acts xiii. 7), L. Sergius Paullus, is found in all probability in an inscription of the city of Rome according to which he was one of the curatores riparum et alvei Tiberis under Claudius (C.I.L. vi. 31545, cf. Prosopographia, iii. 221, No. 376). The year cannot be determined; the only thing that is sure is that L. Sergius Paullus later than this was appointed to the much more important post on Cyprus. At Soloi on the island of Cyprus an inscription has been found, first published by Cesnola (Cyprén, German transl. by Stern, S. 379, No. 29), and then more carefully edited by Hogarth, Devia Cypria (1889), p. 114. This inscription ends with the words: τιμητεύσας τὴν βουλὴν [δι]ὰ ἐξαστῶν (sic) ἐπὶ Παύλου [ἀνθ]υπάτου. Hogarth regards the writing as wholly that of the first century. This makes it impossible to doubt the identity of this proconsul of Cyprus (the Paulus of the Soloi inscription) with the proconsul Sergius Paulus of Acts, and with the Sergius Paullus of the Roman inscription. For other than chronological reasons alone, the opinion of Mommsen, that the Soloi inscription refers to a certain Paullus Fabius Maximus, who died 14 B.C., cannot be maintained; see NKZ, 1904, S. 193 ff. Of importance as showing the connection of the Sergian gens with Cyprus is another Cyprian inscription found in 1887 (JHS, ix. 241, No. 56: Δούκιον Σέργιον Κ[. . .] Ἀρριανὸν συγκλητικὸν τριβούνον Σεργία Δημητρία τὸν ἀδελφόν). Moreover, Lightfoot (Essays on Supernat. Rel. p. 295) has shown it to be probable that the Sergius Paullus whom Pliny, II. N. i., mentions in the list of authorities for lib. ii. and xviii. (in the first reference only Sergius, not Paullus, see the critical apparatus of Sillig or Detlefsen), is the proconsul of Cyprus, and that the notes about Cyprus, H. N. ii. 210, xviii. 68, were derived from him. For other conjectures see Prosopographia, iii. 222, under Sergius Paullus. The Soloi inscription contains a date. A certain Apollonius (if he is to be identified with the Apollonius of C.I.L. vi. 1440 is questionable) set up a monument to his parents on the 25th Demarchexusios of the year 13. If this date refers to the year of the emperor's reign (cf. C. I. G. 2632, 2634),—in this case the emperor Claudius,—then the date is fixed as 53. Hogarth's hypothesis, that the figure P (100) should be added,—which gives the number 113, to be reckoned from the first organisation of the province, giving us the year 55,—seems to the present writer hazardous. The concluding words of the inscription just quoted seem to presuppose that the Paulus in whose proconsulship Apollonius as censor examined the senate of Soloi, was no longer in office; that, therefore, Paulus governed Cyprus before 53. Now it is true that these two lines and a half are written in somewhat different characters, i.e. are a later filling out of Apollonius' list of offices. But from this it does not follow that Apollonius and the proconsul Paulus did not hold office until a time subsequent to the date of the original inscription. Since whatever Pauline chronology is accepted, it is impossible to date Sergius Paulus' proconsulship of Cyprus later than 53, it follows that the supplement to the inscription records a distinction of Apollonius belonging prior to 53, and forgotten in the original inscription. But the proconsulship of Sergius Paulus must be dated back at least two years. According to C. I. G. 2632, the proconsul of Cyprus in the twelfth year of Claudius, i.e. in the year 52, was L. Annius Bassus (cf. Plin. Ep. vii. 31), who was not consul suffectus until the year 70 (C.I.L. vi. 200). There is no need to discuss the question whether he is identical with the person mentioned in Tac. Hist. iii. 50, year 69, nor the statements of Mommsen concerning him in the index to Keil's Plinius, p. 401, which to the present writer are unintelligible and certainly incorrect, nor the statements of Marquardt, *Röm. Staatsverwaltung*², i. 391, concerning his predecessor, Cordus; cf., on the other hand, the correct statements concerning both in Prosopographia, i. 63, ii. 188. Since in C. I. G. 2632, Bassus carries out an order of his predecessor, Cordus, and had, therefore, only just begun to govern, Q. Julius Cordus (C. I. G. 2631; the same person mentioned in Tac. Hist. i. 76?) must have governed the island until the spring of this same year, 52. The proconsulship of Sergius Paulus falls in the year beginning in the spring of 51, and ending in the spring of 52.

5. THE EXPULSION OF THE JEWS FROM ROME, ACTS XVIII. 2.—Dio Cassius (lx. 6. 6) makes the following remark in connection with the first year of Claudius, i.e. A.D. 41 (since there is no transition to the year 42 until lx. 9. 1, cf. 10. 1): “The Jews, who had again so increased in numbers that it would have been difficult to exclude them from the city without a riot on the part of their rabble (ὑπὸ τοῦ ὄχλου σφῶν), he did not indeed drive out, but commanded them, while retaining (otherwise) their ancestral customs, not to assemble.” The reference in πάτριος βίος can be to nothing else than that which in the edicts of tolerance in Jos. Ant. xix. 5. 2–3 is called τὰ ἴδια ἔθνη, ἡ πάτριος θρησκεία, τὰ πάτρια ἔθνη, οἱ ἴδιοι νόμοι. Since the observation of the Sabbath and the religious services in the synagogue on the Sabbath were a prime feature of their ancestral customs, the decree against συναθροίζεσθαι cannot refer to the religious services, which in Rome were held in a large number of different synagogues (vol. i. 47), but is directed against large assemblies and tumultuous gatherings of the whole Jewish populace in Rome, which were especially pleasing to the Jews (Jos. Bell. ii. 6. 1, 10. 3; Ant. xvii. 9. 1 ff., 11. 1, xviii. 8. 2; Philo, Leg. ad Cai. xxxii.), and which would be appropriately designated by συναθροίζεσθαι (Acts xix. 25; Jos. Bell. ii. 10. 3) as distinguished from συνάγεσθαι (cf. συναγωγή, σύναξις; Acts xix. 39, ἐκκλησία). With this decree against the Jews is to be compared the stricter measures against the hetariae, which Dio Cassius reports in the passage immediately following. Thus understood, this account of Dio Cassius agrees well with the fact that Claudius at the beginning of his reign showed great favour to the Jewish princes, Agrippa I. and Herod of Chalcis (Jos. Ant. xix. 5. 1; Dio Cass. lx. 8. 2), and that at their request he granted the Jews throughout the whole empire, including Italy, the right of religious worship (Ant. xix. 5. 3, of the year 42),—the same had been granted earlier to the Alexandrian Jews, Ant. xix. 5. 2,—warning them, however, to make modest and peaceful use of it. If this warning were not followed, it did not mean a return under Claudius of the conditions that prevailed under Caligula, but the enforcement of police regulations against the insubordination of troublesome Jews in different places. But it is very improbable that the Roman Jews gave occasion for such measures so soon after the year 42. The expulsion of the Jews from Rome mentioned in Acts xviii. 2 and Suet. Claudius, xxv. (vol. i. 433, n. 6), must belong to a later date. On the other hand, it is wrong to conclude, with O. Holtzmann, Ntl. Zeitgeschichte, S. 127, that, from favours shown by Claudius to Agrippa II. between 50 and 54 (Schiirer, i. 586 f. [Eng. trans. i. ii. 191 f.]), this edict does not belong to this, but to an earlier period. This continuous patronage of Agrippa does not presuppose general love for the Jews on the part of the emperor; neither is the fact that in consequence of the repeated tumults among the Jews in Rome, the patience of the Roman police was finally exhausted, to be taken as evidence of an especially unfriendly feeling or attitude of the Emperor toward the Jews. The date cannot be fixed more definitely either from the “Teaching of Addai,” ed. Philips, p. 16, or from Eus. H. E. ii. 18. 9, who simply follows Acts, or from Orosius, Hist. vii. 6. 15, who declares that he found the ninth year of Claudius’ reign mentioned in Josephus, who says nothing whatever about it; it must be fixed from the chronology of Paul as determined from other data.

6. GALLIO, PROCONSUL OF ACHAIA, Acts xviii. 12–17.

—Since the words in xviii. 12, Γαλλίωνος δὲ ἀνθυπάτου ὄντος τῆς Ἀχαΐας, are clearly intended to indicate not the motive for the Jews' charges against Paul, but the time and circumstances of them, it is fair to infer that Gallio did not assume office until some time during Paul's eighteen months' sojourn in Corinth, and, since official changes were usually made in the spring, not until the spring following Paul's settlement in Corinth. L. Junius Gallio (called Annaeus Novatus before his adoption by the rhetorician Gallio), the elder brother of the philosopher Seneca, left Achaia on one occasion (according to Seneca, Epist. xviii. 1 [105]) in order to get rid of a fever which he had contracted there. The sea-voyage here referred to cannot be the same as that which took him to Egypt (Plin. H. N. xxxi. 62), for the occasion of the latter voyage was a hæmorrhage. He died in the reign of Nero (Dio Cass. lxii. 25). It is naturally impossible to determine the date of his death more definitely from Tac. Ann. xv. 73. The date of his consulate is just as uncertain (Prosopogr. ii. 237) as that of his proconsulate in Achaia. Inasmuch as his younger brother Seneca was consul in 56, Gallio probably held the office at an earlier date. During the exile of his brother, from which the latter was recalled in 49 (Seneca, Dial. xii. 18. 2), Gallio continued his honourable career undisturbed. Seneca's history, therefore, throws no light upon the dates of his brother's career. In addition, the investigations of Ramsay (Expos. 1897, March, p. 201 f.), Schürer (ZfWTh, 1898, S. 41), and of Hönnicke (Chronol. des Apostels Pl., S. 26 ff.), have led to no sure result. Even if we knew when Gallio was adopted, and received this name from his adopted father, this information would be of no importance for the chronology of Paul; for Luke could have given him this name (Acts xviii. 14) without scruple, even if he had not yet assumed it at the time of this incident of which he writes.

7. THE PROCURATORS FELIX AND FESTUS, ACTS XXIII. 24—XXVI. 32.—Josephus, the only authority in any way closely associated with the events in question, in Bell. ii. 12. 8 mentions the sending of Felix to Palestine as the last event of Claudius' reign (ii. 11. 1–12. 8), and places everything which he relates concerning Felix's procuratorship (ii. 13. 2–7, cf. Ant. xx. 8. 4 on the first year of Nero) after the accession of Nero (ii. 12. 8). The remark in ii. 13. 2 concerning Nero, that he gave Agrippa II. some other cities of Palestine in addition to the tetrarchy of Philip (ii. 12. 8) which Claudius had bestowed upon him, and that he appointed (κατέστησεν not ἐξέπεμψεν) Felix procurator over the rest of Judea, can only mean that Nero confirmed Felix in the procuratorship to which he was appointed by Claudius, except that he reduced his jurisdiction in the manner mentioned. The date of the transference of office from Felix to Festus is not definitely fixed by Bell. ii. 14. 1. Practically the same situation is found in Ant. xx. 7. 1–8, 9. Here also no account of the official acts of Felix is given until the reign of Nero (8. 1–8). Only his appointment to Palestine falls in the reign of Claudius (7. 1). This cannot be claimed as certainly regarding his marriage with Drusilla (7. 2), the account of which is given merely as an episode. Josephus' idea of the appointment of Felix is indicated not only in the distribution of material between the reigns of Claudius and of Nero, but also by the fact that immediately after mentioning the appointment of Felix he reports the assignment to Agrippa of the tetrarchy of Philip (7. 1), which took place in the beginning of the thirteenth year of Claudius' reign (53). Consequently there can be no doubt about Josephus' idea of the date of Felix's procuratorship. Felix entered office in one of the last years of Claudius' reign (between 51 and 54), was confirmed by Nero immediately upon his accession (October 13th, 54), and was recalled in the same reign. But the greater part of Felix's term of office which, according to Acts xxiv. 10, 27, must have covered at least (4+2) six years, fell in the reign of Nero. Even if only half of the six years belong after the accession of Nero (October 54), Felix could, according to Josephus, have been withdrawn, at the very earliest, in the autumn of 57. The chronology of Josephus is confirmed by Tacitus (Ann. xii. 54) to this extent, namely, in that Tacitus assigns to the year 52 the sentence of Cumanus, which, according to Josephus, was the immediate occasion of the appointment of Felix. In another respect Tacitus' statement in this passage has caused confusion. Whereas, according to Josephus (Bell. ii. 12. 8; Ant. xx. 7. 1), Felix was sent from Rome to Palestine to succeed Cumanus, at the request of the high priest Jonathan, who was present at Rome at the time of the condemnation of Cumanus (Ant. xx. 8. 5; Bell. ii. 12. 6), according to Tacitus, Felix had governed Samaria for a long time prior to this sentence (jam pridem Judææ impositus) while Cumanus was governing Galilee. The statement of Tacitus is to be rejected, not only because in respect of time and place Josephus was much nearer the facts than Tacitus, and could not have invented such specific reports as those about Jonathan, but also because Tacitus' alleged division of the small province takes no account of the most important part of Palestine, namely, Judea and Jerusalem. This is a point on which Tacitus is poorly informed. It is more difficult to explain a contradiction in which Josephus involves himself notwithstanding his otherwise clear statements about Felix. In Ant. xx. 8. 9 he says that after Festus had been sent by Nero to Palestine to succeed Felix, the foremost Jews of Caesarea went to Rome in order to accuse Felix, and that he would have received the punishment which he deserved for his misdeeds if the emperor had not pardoned many of his offences at the intercession of Felix's brother Pallas, who was at that time greatly esteemed by Nero. Josephus evidently knows of the subsequent downfall of Pallas, and says with reference to it, that just when (μάλιστα δὲ τότε) Felix had to answer charges in Rome, Pallas was in high favour with Nero. But, according to Tacitus (Ann. xiii. 14), who must have been informed on this point, the downfall of Pallas occurred in the year 55 (cf. the statement concerning the consuls, xiii. 11) shortly before Britannicus had completed his fourteenth year (xiii. 15). But, according to Suet. Claud. xxvii., Britannicus was born on the twentieth day of the reign of Claudius during his second consulate, i.e. (reckoning from January 24th, 41) on the 12th or 13th of February 41, not on the 12th of February 42, as Schiller states in his Kaisergesch. i. 338. Naturally no account need be taken of the incidental statement of Dio Cassius, lx. 12. 5, from which it might be inferred that Britannicus was born in the year 42. Accordingly, Britannicus' fourteenth birthday fell on the 13th day of February 55, and Pallas was deposed in January of the year 55. With this, however, agrees Dio Cassius, lxi. 7. 4, where the death of Britannicus is placed in the year 55. In view of the complete agreement of Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dio Cassius regarding these dates, which are entirely independent of each other, referring in part to the birth, in part to the fourteenth birthday of Britannicus and his poisoning, which took place shortly before his fourteenth birthday,—dates, moreover, which are associated with the names of consuls,—such trivial statements as those of Harnack, Chronol. der Altchrist. Lit. S. 238, to the effect that Tacitus made a mistake of a year in giving the age of Britannicus at the time of his death, and consequently put the downfall of Pallas in the year 55 instead of 56, the correct date, are to be rejected. On the other hand, from the fact that in the year 55, when Pallas was charged with high treason, he showed a defiant spirit, and was acquitted along with

Burrus (Tac. Ann. xiii. 23), it is not to be inferred that between 55 and 57 he had gradually or suddenly regained the favour of Nero. Nero never showed him any special regard (Ann. xiii. 2), and it is certain that from January 55 until he was poisoned in 62 (Tac. Ann. xiv. 65) he was never in favour with the emperor, which would agree fairly well with the words of Jos. Ant. xx. 8. 9. How O. Holtzmann, Ntl. Zeitgeschichte, S. 128-130, infers from this statement of Josephus that in the summer of 55 Felix went to Rome and Festus to Palestine, and especially how Harnack, S. 235, reaches his conclusion that Felix was recalled not later than the year 55 or 56 (cf. S. 237, Accession of Festus, summer of 56), these writers themselves must explain. A glance into older works, e.g. Wieseler, Chron. des apost. Zeitalters, S. 72-74, would have prevented such mistakes. According to Acts xxiv. 27 (cf. xx. 16, xxvii. 9), Felix departed, and Festus assumed office in the summer. Felix's accusers could, therefore, have left Cæsarea immediately after his departure and have reached Rome before the close of navigation; but if Josephus is correct in his statement about Pallas, they did not arrive in the autumn of the year 55, at the beginning of which Pallas was deposed, nor in the year 56, i.e. one year and nine months after the fall of Pallas, but must have come at the very latest in the autumn of 54. But this, too, is impossible. For since Nero did not come to the throne until October 13th, 54, Festus, who arrived in Palestine in the summer of this same year, would not have been sent out by Nero but by Claudius, and Felix, who departed in the summer, would have found Claudius still alive. Josephus would then be entirely wrong in his statement that Nero confirmed Felix in his procuratorship and appointed Festus as his successor, and in his belief that the procuratorship of Felix fell largely under Nero. But even if he be correct in one point, namely, that Nero sent Festus to Palestine, nevertheless his statement about Pallas is untenable. It is impossible to crowd the journey of Festus from Rome to Palestine, the journey of Felix and the Jewish embassy to Rome, and the adjustment of their troubles, into the period of time between October 13th, 54, and approximately February 1st, 55, to say nothing of the fact that such journeys were not usually made in the winter months, and that according to the Acts they must necessarily have been made in the summer. Josephus' statement about Pallas is, therefore, certainly incorrect. But even if this were not as evident as it is, even if we had the choice of rejecting either this incidental account of Josephus' idea of events in distant Rome, or his consistent conception of the relation of the procuratorships of Felix and Festus in Palestine to the administration of Claudius and Nero, without question we would hold the latter to be historical, and reject the former as an error of Josephus' due to the practical necessity of explaining Felix's escape from punishment, and to a confusion of the times of Claudius with those of Nero. Whoever makes this error a corner-stone in chronology will certainly arrive at conclusions which are absurd—and these conclusions affect more than the history of the Church. Three examples will suffice: (1) If Festus succeeded Felix at the latest in the year 54,—which, as we have seen, would be the case on this supposition,—Paul was arrested at Pentecost, 52. On this occasion, fully two years before the recall of Felix, the uprising of the Egyptians is spoken of as an event not belonging to the immediate past (Acts xxi. 38, πρὸ τούτων τῶν ἡμερῶν, cf. v. 36). According to Josephus (Bell. ii. 13. 5; Ant. xx. 8. 2), however, this uprising occurred during the reign of Nero. The arrest of Paul took place, therefore, several years after October 54, and the recall of Felix several years after 56. (2) When, at the beginning of his imprisonment in Cæsarea, Paul spoke before Felix, the latter was married to Drusilla (Acts xxiv. 24), and there is nothing which implies that he had been only recently married. Drusilla, who in 44 was only six years old (Ant. xix. 9. 1), was only fourteen years old in 52. But when Felix induced her to infidelity she was married to Azizus of Emesa (Ant. xx. 7. 2), and, prior to this first marriage, her brother Agrippa II. had seriously negotiated with Epiphanes of Comagene for her marriage to him (xx. 7. 1). Drusilla's first marriage was of short duration (loc. cit.). In order to compress into a period of two years the whole of the first marriage, the struggle with the difficulties which Felix had to overcome in order to make Drusilla unfaithful to her husband, and to induce the Jewess to marry him (Ant. xx. 7. 2), and the period during which at the time of Acts xxiv. 24 Felix and Drusilla had been married, it is necessary to assume the most extreme possibilities. Her first marriage took place at twelve years, after negotiations concerning another marriage, which also required time, had failed. This in itself is hardly probable. Moreover, Josephus evidently knows when the first marriage took place. At the end of the twelfth year of Claudius, i.e. at the beginning of the thirteenth year of Claudius (= 53), Agrippa II. received the tetrarchy of Philip, and after this elevation in rank, i.e. at the earliest in the year 53, he gave his sister, who was then fifteen years of age, in marriage to Azizus (Ant. xx. 7. 1). At the very earliest, then, it was not until the year 54, probably later, that Drusilla became the wife of Felix. This marriage had already taken place when Paul spoke before Felix, and the latter retained his procuratorship for two whole years thereafter. Consequently, at the very earliest, Festus succeeded Felix in 56, probably later. (3) Neither does the "new chronology" agree with Josephus' statements about his first journey to Rome (Vit. 3). He was born in the winter of 37-38 (Schürer, i. 74 [Eng. trans. i. i. 77]), and completed his twenty-sixth year in the winter of 63-64; so that he started on his journey in the spring of 64. The purpose of this journey was the liberation of some Jewish priests from imprisonment in Rome, whither Felix had sent them during his procuratorship to be condemned by the Imperial court. If Felix was removed from office in 54 (55 or 56), these priests must have remained prisoners in Rome for at least ten (or according to the incorrect reckoning of our modern chronologists, at least eight or nine) years. This imprisonment was not the result of a judicial sentence, a mode of punishment unknown among the Romans, but it was an imprisonment pending a trial. The case is conceivable only if Felix remained in office until the summer of 60; so that the imprisonment of these priests until they were set free by Josephus may have lasted about four years, just as the first Roman imprisonment of Paul lasted from two to two and a half years. As regards the data of the Eusebian Chronicle (Schoene, ii. 152 ff.), (1) due regard is to be paid to the fact that Eus. H. E. ii. 20. 1, 22. 1, agrees with Josephus as against the Armenian version of the Chronicle in making Felix a procurator under Nero,—indeed, he places his procuratorship mainly under Nero,—and in making Nero appoint Festus. (2) It is not possible, with Blass, Acta apost. p. 22, to harmonise the two chronologists, Eusebius and Jerome, on the assumption that they differ only by a year. The Latin editor places the sending of Felix in Anno Abr. 2066, the tenth year of Claudius, and the sending of Festus in Anno Abr. 2072, the second year of Nero. On the other hand, the Armenian version places the sending of Felix in Anno Abr. 2067, the eleventh year of Claudius (= 51), but puts the sending of Festus in Anno Abr. 2070, the fourteenth year of Claudius (= 54). That the Armenian version is confused, appears also from the peculiar fact that Felix's entrance upon office is not recorded until after a statement is made concerning an event which took place under his procuratorship. (3) But even if the dates of the Armenian version are corrected on the basis of Jerome's editing (cf. Vir. Ill. v.), and even if we assume with Harnack, S. 234, 236 f., that the Eusebian dates for the assumption of office by Felix and Festus are the summer of 51 and the summer of 56 respectively, and that Paul's first trial before Felix took place at Pentecost (Harnack, S. 237, makes the surprising statement "at Easter") 54, there is still a contradiction to Acts xxiv. 10; for Felix had been then only three years in office, a period covering less than one-third of the time of Pilate's procuratorship. More especially there remains the irreconcilable contradiction to the course of events in Palestine under Claudius and Nero, according to the representation of Josephus. Certain dates can be obtained only by reckoning back with the help of Josephus from the Jewish war. According to the episodic narrative of Bell. vi. 5. 3, Albinus, the successor of Festus, was in Jerusalem at a feast of Tabernacles, which visit, according to Josephus, took place four years before the outbreak of the war, and seven years five months prior to a point of time just before the capture of Jerusalem. The second date, which is more definite, with which, however, the first agrees, refers clearly to the feast of Tabernacles in the year 62. But now all that is related in Ant. xx. 9. 2-3 (cf. the meagre allusions in Bell. ii. 14. 1) concerning Albinus' stay in Jerusalem, also took place at a feast of Tabernacles; for, since there is no previous mention of a feast κατὰ τὴν ἑορτὴν, ἐνείσθηκε γὰρ αὕτη in xx. 9. 3 is to be understood as referring to the feast of Tabernacles (cf. above, p. 285, n. 4, on John v. 1, vii. 2). This is a Jewish usage of language which is evidently found in Bell. ii. 12. 3; since ἡ ἑορτή in this passage is not the Passover mentioned in xii. 1, nor an undetermined feast, in which case there would be no article (cf. the importance attached to the feast of Tabernacles, Ant. viii. 4. 1). Unless a peculiar coincidence be assumed, the feast of Tabernacles, briefly referred to in Bell. vi. 5. 3, is identical with that spoken of in Ant. xx. 9. 2. From the context of xx. 9. 1-3 we learn that Albinus journeyed to Jerusalem very soon after his arrival in the country (cf. a similar case in Acts xxv. 1). If he was there at the feast of Tabernacles in 62, then he arrived in Palestine late in the summer of 62. But from xx. 9. 1 it follows that Festus died in Palestine at least three months previous, i.e. in May or June 62. Josephus gives the comparatively just and energetic administration of Festus only two lines in Bell. ii. 14. 1, and also describes it very briefly in Ant. xx. 8. 10-11. It produced no change in affairs, and must have been of short duration. In view of the silence of Josephus, it is a bold venture to assume that the procuratorship of Festus lasted from 54 to 55 or 56 (see above, p. 472 f.) until June 62. On the other hand, the events in Ant. xx. 8. 10-11 cannot possibly be crowded into the space of time—ten months at the most—between the arrival of Festus in the late summer and June of the following year. Therefore he cannot have assumed office so late as 61, but at the very latest began to rule in the year 60. When in Ant. xx. 8. 11 (cf. 11. 2; Vita, 3) Josephus calls Poppæa the wife of Nero, he is certainly speaking either proleptically or euphemistically; for the formal marriage between the two (Tac. Ann. xiv. 60-64; Suet. Nero, xxxv. lvii.) did not take place until after Nero's separation from Octavia and her death (June the 9th, 62), i.e. about the time of the death of Festus, whereas Ant. xx. 8. 11 refers to a period prior to his death. Moreover, the original reading in Acts xxviii. 16 (vol. i. 551 f.) presupposes that at the time of Paul's arrival in Rome there was only one Præfectus prætorio. That was the case until the death of Burrus, which, as the context of the narratives shows (Tac. Ann. xiv. 51; Dio Cassius, lxii. 13), occurred in the beginning of the year 62. After his death this office was shared by two persons. If Paul had arrived in Rome in March 62, he would have found this new arrangement in operation. Therefore he probably arrived in Rome at the latest in the spring of 61, and accordingly Festus assumed office as procurator at the latest in the summer of 60. But this latest possible date for his assumption of office has every claim to be the correct one. As has been shown, a date much earlier is impossible, while there can be no serious objection to taking the year 59 as the date of the change of office from Felix to Festus. In view of Acts xxiv. 10 and the representation of the rule of Festus in Josephus, there is little to recommend in deducting a year from Felix's procuratorship and adding it to Festus'. Then there is also to be considered the significant coincidence, shown above, p. 462, between 2 Cor. xii. 2 and the date in Acts xi. 25, which can be absolutely fixed. By referring the relative dates back a year, this very likely combination would be rendered impossible.

8. Taking the fixed date—the death of Agrippa I. in the summer of 44—and a date almost as certain, namely, Festus' entrance upon office in the summer of 60, the Pauline chronology can be arranged plausibly without any conflict with established dates. It requires no change in the traditional dates, but only the proof that Josephus and Tacitus each in one instance gave an inaccurate report of matters with which they were imperfectly acquainted. The excess of between five and six years, concerning which we have no information, causes no difficulty. The question, whether these years should be inserted between Acts xii. and xiii., or between Acts xiv. and xv. 1, or between Acts xv. 33 and xv. 40, is not difficult to answer. The apostolic council took place soon after the first missionary journey. The language in xiv. 28 may apply to a period of months, but not to five or six years. Paul and Barnabas brought to Jerusalem the fresh reports of the first missionary journey (xv. 3, 4, 12). In xv. 35 mention is made of the resumption of teaching in the Church at Antioch and of missionary preaching in the same city, but the close connection between xv. 40 and xv. 30–34, and between xvi. 4 and xv. 29, makes it impossible to assume an interval of more than weeks or months. Evidence is also found in Phil. iv. 15 (ἐν ἀρχῇ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) for the statement that only a short space of time intervened between the first and second missionary journeys. But, on the other hand, in xiii. 1 we have the beginning of an entirely new historical narrative. Nothing suggests that Paul and Barnabas took Mark with them to Antioch with a view to making him their companion on a more extensive missionary journey (xii. 25). But Mark settled in Antioch, where we meet him again in xv. 37. Only in a passing moment of discouragement did he go back to Jerusalem to his mother (xiii. 13). In view of what has just been stated, room for the insertion of a five-year period of the preparation of the apostle to the Gentiles for the calling which had been placed before him, is to be found only between Acts xii. and xiii. If Luke had written a third book, we would probably know much of the history of the older apostles during the years 44–50, which he dismisses with Acts xiii. 1 (above, p. 59 f.). During this period no important steps were taken affecting missionary work among the Gentiles.

9. THE DEATH OF PETER AND PAUL UNDER NERO.—In view of the investigations in vol. ii. 54–84, 158–194, it may be assumed as certain that both apostles died as martyrs in Rome in the reign of Nero, and also that Paul died considerably later than Peter. The parts of 2 Tim. which it would have been most impossible to invent, prove that the last imprisonment and the death of Paul were not part of the persecution of the Christians in 64. Paul's silence regarding Peter in all his imprisonment letters, and Peter's silence concerning Paul in 1 Pet., prove that their ways parted at the end. The clearest traces of the true course of events are preserved in the tradition of Clement of Rome up to and beyond the Chronicle of Eusebius. Harnack's assertion, Chronol. der altchristl. Lit. S. 239, 240, that Paul was certainly executed in the year 64, is as incorrect as it is bold.

CHRONOLOGICAL TABLE.

ROMAN AND JEWISH.

Deposition of Pilate and of Caiaphas, 36.

Death of Tiberius, March 16, 37.

Reign of Caius Cæsar (Caligula)

March 16, 37, to January 24, 41.

Birth of Nero and of Josephus, 37.

Herod Agrippa I., 37-44.

Persecution of the Jews in Alexandria, 38.

Attempts of Caligula to erect his statue in the temple, 39-40.

Reign of the Emperor Claudius, Jan.
24, 41, to October 13, 54.

Death of Herod Agrippa I., summer of 44.

Fadus' procuratorship, 44-46 (or 47).

CHRISTIAN.

Death and Resurrection of Christ, probably 30.

The events in Acts i.-viii. 1, from 30 to 34.

The Conversion of Paul, beginning of 35.

Three years' sojourn of Paul in Damascus, once interrupted by a journey to Arabia (Gal. i. 17).

Flight from Damascus, first visit to Jerusalem, settlement in Tarsus (Gal. i. 18-24; 2 Cor. xi. 32; Acts
ix. 23-30, xxii. 17-21, xxvi. 20;
Rom. xv. 19), 38.

Peter in Joppa and Cæsarea (Acts ix.
32-xi. 18, xv. 7).

Agabus and the other prophets in Antioch (Acts xi. 27 f.), about 40.

Luke a member of the Antiochian Church.

Paul brought by Barnabas from Tarsus to Antioch (Acts xi. 25;
2 Cor. xii. 2), summer or autumn, 43.

Execution of James the son of Zebedee, imprisonment of Peter, flight of Peter from Jerusalem, about Easter, 44.

Journey of Barnabas and of Paul to Jerusalem with the collection, and the settlement of Mark in Antioch (Acts xi. 30, xii. 25), autumn of 44.

ROMAN AND JEWISH.

Procuratorship of Tiberius Alexander,
46 (or 47)–48.
Famine in Judea.
Procuratorship of Cumanus, 48–52.

Sergius Paulus, governor of Cyprus, about 50 (certainly not between 51 and 53).

Banishment of Jews from Rome,
about 52.

Procuratorship of Felix, from 52, or beginning 53, until summer, 60.

Gallio, 'proconsul of Achaia, probably from the spring of 53 on.

Reign of Nero, from Oct. 13, 54, to June 9, 68.

CHRISTIAN.

Paul and Barnabas, active as teachers and missionaries in Antioch until the spring of 50.

The visit of Peter and of other Judeans in Antioch.

The Epistle of James, about 50.

First missionary journey of Paul (Acts xiii. 4–xiv. 27; Gal. iv. 13), spring of 50 until autumn of 51.

The apostolic council (Acts xv. 1–29; Gal. ii. 1–10), beginning of 52.

Beginning of the second missionary journey (Acts xv. 40), spring of 52.

Arrival, in Corinth, about November 52.

The Epistle to the Galatians, about April 53.

Arrival of Silas and Timothy in Corinth (Acts xviii. 5; 1 Thess. iii. 6).

First Epistle to the Thessalonians, about May or June 53.

Second Epistle to the Thessalonians,
August or September 53.

Hearing before Gallio (Acts xviii.
12–17), autumn of 53.

Journey from Corinth to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 18–21. Beginning of the three years' stay in Ephesus, Acts xx. 31, cf. xix. 8–10, xx. 18), before Pentecost, i.e. about May 54.

Continuation of the journey to Cæsarea (not to Jerusalem) and Antioch (Acts xviii. 21 f.).

Journey of Apollos from Alexandria by way of Ephesus to Corinth (Acts xviii. 24–28), summer, 54.

Beginning of the third missionary journey from Antioch to Ephesus (Acts xviii. 23, xix. 1), probably in the late summer of 54.

Settlement in Ephesus, somewhere about February 55.

Transfer to the lecture-room of Tyrannus, about Pentecost, 55.

Short visit in Corinth from Ephesus (vol. i. 263 f.).

A lost letter of Paul to the Corinth

ROMAN AND JEWISH.

CHRISTIAN.

ians (1 Cor. v. 9), toward the end of 56 or beginning of 57.

Sending of Timothy and Erastus to Macedonia, and thence to Corinth (Acts xix. 22; 1 Cor. iv. 17).

Letter of the Corinthians to Paul (1 Cor. vii. 1).

The First Epistle to the Corinthians (1 Cor. v. 7, xvi. 8), about Easter, 57.

Return of Timothy to Ephesus. Sending of Titus to Corinth (vol. i. 321 ff.).

The uprising of Demetrius (Acts xix. 23-41).

Departure of Paul and Timothy from Ephesus to Macedonia by way of Troas (Acts xx. 1; cf. 2 Cor. i. 8, ii. 12, vii. 5), at or shortly after Pentecost, 57.

Meeting of Titus and Paul in Macedonia (2 Cor. vii. 5-15).

Second Epistle to the Corinthians, about November or December 57.

Journey of Paul from Macedonia to Corinth (Acts xx. 2), at New Year, 58.

The Epistle to the Romans written during the three months' stay in Greece and Corinth (Acts xx. 3; Rom. xv. 25, xvi. 1), about February 58.

Journey by way of Macedonia (Easter in Philippi, Acts xx. 6), Troas, Miletus, etc., to Jerusalem.

Arrival in Jerusalem, and beginning of the Caesarean imprisonment, Pentecost, 58.

Porcius Festus, procurator from summer 60 to early summer 62.

Defence before Festus; late summer of 60.

Departure from Caesarea for Rome (Acts xxvii. 1, 9), September 60.

Arrival at Rome (Acts xxviii. 16; cf. ver. 11), March 61.

Epistle to the Ephesians, Colossians, and Philemon, summer, 62.

Second Epistle of Peter, in 62.

Matthew writes his Aramaic Gospel in Palestine, in 62.

ROMAN AND JEWISH.

CHRISTIAN.

- Burning of Rome (vol. ii. 68), from the 19th to the 24th of July 64.
- Beginning of the Jewish War, 66.
- Victory of the Jews over Cestius, November 66.
- War in Galilee, 67.
- Civil war in Jerusalem, winter 67-68.
- Death of Emperor Nero, June 9, 68.
- Death of Galba, January 15, 69; of Otho, April 16, 69; of Vitellius, December 21, 69.
- Vespasian proclaimed emperor in Alexandria, July 1, 69.
- Beginning of the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, April 70.
- Capture of Jerusalem and destruction of the temple, August 70.
- End of the two whole years (cf. Acts xxviii. 30), about April 63.
- The Epistle to the Philippians, summer of 63.
- Release of Paul, late in the summer of 63.
- Journey of Paul to Spain, autumn of 63 or spring of 64.
- Arrival of Peter in Rome, in the autumn of 63 or spring of 64.
- First Epistle of Peter, spring of 64.
- Mark engaged in Rome in the preparation of his Gospel, summer of 64.
- Persecution under Nero and crucifixion of Peter, autumn of 64.
- Return of Paul from Spain, tour of the Eastern Churches, composition of 1 Timothy and of Titus, spring and autumn of 65.
- Stay in Nicopolis during the winter of 65-66.
- Death of James the brother of Jesus, in Jerusalem, at Easter, 66.
- Return of Paul to Rome, spring of 66.
- Paul's arrest in Rome, composition of 2 Timothy, summer of 66.
- Paul beheaded, at the end of 66 or beginning of 67.
- Publication of the Gospel of Mark, in 67.
- Flight of the Christians from Jerusalem to Pella, 67.
- Settlement of the apostle John and other disciples (Philip, Aristion, and others) in the province of Asia, 68.

ROMAN AND JEWISH.

CHRISTIAN.

Reign of Titus, from June 23, 79, until September 13, 81.

Reign of the Emperor Domitian, September 13, 81, to September 18, 96.

Reign of the Emperor Nerva, from the 18th of September 96 until the 25th of January 98.

Reign of the Emperor Trajan, from the 25th of January 98 until August 117.

Epistle of Jude, about 75.

Gospel and Acts of the Apostles by Luke, about 75.

Epistle to the Hebrews, about 80.

The Gospel and Epistles of John, 80-90.

Appearance of the Greek Matthew,
about 85.

Revelation of John, about 95.

Death of John, about 100.

GENERAL INDEX.

- abba*, i. 48 f.
- Abilius, second Bishop of Alexandria,
iii. 8₇.
- Achaia, i. 185 f.₄, 256, 266₄; iii. 467 f.
- Achaicus, i. 260, 269₈.
- Acta Pauli, i. 270₉.
see also Acts of Paul.
- Acta Theclæ, ii. 21₃.
see also Acts of Thecla.
- Acts of the Apostles—
see also Luke, Writings of.
Accounts of Journeys, iii. 115 ff.
Agreement with Pauline Epistles,
iii. 150 f.
Alleged Hebrew (Aramaic) original,
iii. 141₂₇.
Author, iii. 54 ff., 125 f.
Author, relation to events recorded,
iii. 114 ff.
Authorship ascribed to Luke by early Church, iii. 1, 3₁.
Chronological order lacking, iii. 67 f.
Date, iii. 29₆, 125 f.
Dedication, iii. 43, 54.
Discourses of Peter in, compared with 1 Pet., ii. 173 f., 186₂.
Hebraisms in i.—xii., iii. 129, 140 f.₂₆.
Heb. translation, ii. 519 f.
Historicity, iii. 162 f.₇.
Names of Roman provinces in, i. 186 ff.
Purpose, iii. 79 f., 93₂₉.
view of Baur, iii. 79 f., 93₂₉.
Relation to Pauline Epistles, iii.
118–126, 139 f._{21, 23}.
Sources of, iii. 114 ff.
bibliography, iii. 127 f., 141 f.₂₈.
Text of—recension α, editio Antiochena, iii. 9 ff.
recension β, editio Romana, iii. 9 ff.
recension β, sources of, iii. 25 ff.₃.
two-fold recension of, iii. 8–41.
bibliography, iii. 25₇.
theory of Fr. Blass, iii. 8 f.
- Acts of the Apostles—continued.
Title, iii. 3₁, 59, 87₁₅.
“We” passages, iii. 14; iii. 54 ff., 86₁₂ (cf. 87₁₃), 115 f.
author, iii. 142–145, 159 f._{1, 3}.
Acts of John, iii. 88₁₇, 197, 206₂₈.
Date, iii. 179, 197₆.
Acts of John and of Peter, iii. 177.
on John xxi. 24 f., iii. 250₂.
Acts of Paul, i. 270₉, 451₇, 455₁; ii.
20₁; iii. 88₁₇.
Coptic fragments bearing on imprisonment of Paul, ii. 83 f.₁₀.
Testimony of, to Journey of Paul to Spain, ii. 63.
Acts of Peter, ii. 168 f.₄, 451₁₂; iii.
88₁₇.
Acts of Philip, ii. 163₃.
Acts of Pilate, iii. 352 f.₁₂.
Acts of Thecla, ii. 21₃; iii. 88₁₇.
Addai—
Missionary work of, ii. 164₃.
Teaching of, see Teaching of Addai.
Address, Christian—
Forms of, iii. 81 f.₃.
Adjectives, ending in ἄνός, ἄνυς, ἰᾰνός,
ii. 193 f.
Ado, iii. 26₃, 31₈.
Æsculapius—
Cult of, iii. 411 f., 421₂.
Africanus, Epistle of, to Aristides— on Luke, iii. 5₄.
Agabus, iii. 127, 131₃.
Prophecy of, date, i. 228; iii.
458 ff.
Agape, ii. 211₁, 229, 235 f.₃.
Ignatius on the, ii. 236₃.
Agrippa I., i. 553₂; ii. 130₁₉; iii. 75, 467 Death, iii. 133₆.
date, iii. 455 ff.
Persecutes Christians, iii. 457, 459.
Agrippa II., ii. 130₁₉; iii. 76, 467, 474.
Akeldama, meaning, i. 28₁₅.

- Albinus, iii. 476.
 Alexander, Cypriote Monk, i. 433₆; ii. 447₆.
 Alexander (in Acts and 1 and 2 Tim.), ii. 42₇, 86.
 Alexander (in Pastoral Epistles), ii. 108 f.
 Alexander (the coppersmith), ii. 16 f., 21 f.₃.
 Alexander (son of Simon), ii. 489 f., 504₅.
 Alexander Jannæus, i. 25₈, 37, 59₆.
 Coins of, i. 25₈.
 Alexandria, Church in—Founder, ii. 159.
 Origin, ii. 357₄.
 Alexandrians, Epistle to the, i. 160; ii. 295, 306₂.
 Aloes, iii. 196₃.
 Alogi—
 Estimate of Johannine Writings, iii. 177 f., 181, 200₁₁.
 on Cerinthus, i. 515₄.
 on Gospel of John, ii. 389.
 Alphæus (father of Levi), ii. 507, 522 f.₁.
 "Amen, the," iii. 316, 329 f.₈.
 Ammonius—
 Diatessaron of, ii. 401, 420₁.
 Ampliatus, i. 393, 419₂₄; ii. 21₂.
 Anagnost, ii. 374.
 Andreas Cretensis, on James, i. 108₄.
 Andrew, the Apostle, i. 41.
 Greek name, i. 63₁₀.
 in Asia Minor, iii. 370₃.
 in John, iii. 179, 209 f., 213, 224₄.
 Andronicus, i. 391, 418₂₃.
 Angelolatry, i. 475–479₆₋₈.
 Among Jews, i. 475 f.₆.
 Views of fathers, i. 476 f.₆.
 Angels (of the Churches)—
 Meaning of term, iii. 413–417, 422 f.₆.
 View of Origen, iii. 413 f.
 Annas, iii. 270 f., 292 f.₁₁.
 Annianus, first Bishop of Alexandria, iii. 8₇.
 Antichrist, i. 227 ff., 236 ff.₄₋₉.
 in First Epistle of John, iii. 364₁, 371₅.
 in Revelation, iii. 399 f., 438 f., 441 f., 446₂.
 number of, i. 238 f.₆; iii. 444 ff., 447 ff._{4, 5}.
 in teaching of John, i. 228.
 in teaching of Paul, i. 239 f.₉, 251₈.
 Antioch, Church of—Gentile Character of, ii. 344.
 Antioch in Pisidia, i. 191 f._{5, 6}.
 Antiochus Epiphanes, i. 36, 237₄, 239 f.₉, 251₈.
 Antipas, iii. 410 f., 421 f.₃.
 anus, adjective ending, ii. 193.
 Apamea, i. 448 f.₂.
 Apocalyptic Literature, iii. 387 f., 403₃.
 Apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, dependent on Canonical Acts, iii. 61, 88₁₇.
 Apocryphal Gospels—
 Gospel of Etchmiadzin, ii. 485₈.
 Gospel of the Ebionites, iii. 38₁₉.
 Gospel of the Hebrews, i. 109₇; ii. 518 ff., 529₇, 562, 573, 594₁₀, 596₁₁, 597₁₂.
 Date, i. 13.
 Language, i. 13.
 on James, iii. 227₁₂.
 Relation to the Heb. Matthew, ii. 518 f.
 View of Baur, ii. 413.
 Witness to John vii. 53–viii. 1, iii. 346₃.
 Gospel of Matthias, ii. 524₃.
 Gospel of the Nazarenes, ii. 403, 518 f.
 Relation to the Greek Matthew, ii. 519.
 Gospel of Peter—Date, ii. 466₁₅.
 on Pilate, iii. 352 f.₁₂.
 Relation to Mark, ii. 483₆.
 Gospel of Philip, iii. 92₂₇.
 Apollos, ii. 49 f., 87; iii. 82₄, 123.
 Alleged author of Hebrews, ii. 356, 364 f.₁₅.
 and Corinthian parties, i. 283 f., 285 ff.
 Christian belief of, ii. 356, 357₄.
 in Corinth, i. 262, 270 f.₁₁. in Ephesus, i. 262 f.; iii. 331 f.₁₂.
 Name, i. 270₁₀.
 Apollos Party, i. 271₁₁.
 Apostle, Apostleship, i. 354, 371 f.₂, 536₃; ii. 389, 463 f.; iii. 49, 226 f.₉, 429 f.
 Title, i. 107₃, 210₃; ii. 147 f., 206 f., 220₁₀, 386 f.
 Use of term by Paul, i. 210₃, 505 f.
 Apostles—
 Forged letters of, i. 242 f., 247₁, 270₉.
 in Asia Minor, iii. 191 f., 194 f.₂, 204₂₃.
 Apostles, and Apostolic Letters—
 Interest of Post-apostolic Churches in, i. 162, 164₈.

- Apostolate, iii. 78 f.
- Apostolic Council and Decree, i. 146, 168, 179, 266; ii. 161, 208; iii. 19 ff., 27₅, 33 ff.₁₂₋₁₅, 124, 153 ff., 163₁₀, 452.
- Apostolic Decree—
- Bibliography, iii. 35₁₂.
- Style, compared with Luke's style, iii. 100, 134₈.
- Apphia, i. 447₁, 452, 458₇.
- Aquila, the translator, i. 56, 62₉; ii. 563₂, 575.
- Translation approved, i. 62₉.
- Aquila and Priscilla—
- Authors of Hebrews, ii. 365 f.₁₅.
- in Corinth, i. 257, 265₃.
- in Ephesus, i. 262, 266₄, 389, 417₂₁, 483.
- in Pontus, ii. 152₁.
- in Rome, i. 417₂₁, 429₁; ii. 19, 350.
- Church in the house of, ii. 350.
- Arabia, i. 186₄.
- Bartholomew in, ii. 385₇.
- Gospel of Matthew in, ii. 385₇.
- Aramaic—
- Biblical = Syriac, i. 22 f.₄.
- Dialects, i. 8 ff.
- Dialects of non-Jews, i. 28₁₄.
- Forms in LXX, i. 18, 67₁₃.
- Idioms and Terms in the Gospels, ii. 573 f., 576 f., 591-597₇₋₁₁.
- in Rabbinic Circles, i. 33₁₉.
- In Seleucid Empire, i. 34.
- Language used by Jesus and Disciples, i. § 1; ii. 573 f.
- Language used by Paul, i. 11, 48 ff., 57.
- Language used in Synagogue services, i. 11 ff.
- Names for places in and near Jerusalem, i. 28₁₅.
- Original language of "the gospel," i. § 1.
- Original language of Matthew, ii. 522, 530₉.
- Words in Synoptic Gospels, i. 2 ff.; ii. 487 f., 502₁.
- in John, iii. 323 f., 353₁₃.
- in Luke, iii. 135 f.₁₂, 137₁₄.
- in Mark, ii. 610, 616₅.
- in Matthew, ii. 576 f., 610, 616₅.
- in Revelation, iii. 444 f.
- Archippus, i. 446 f., 452, 458₇, 459₈.
- Areteus, iii. 160 f.₅.
- Aretas, i. 5; ii. 130₁₉.
- Date of reign, iii. 455.
- Aretas IV., i. 5; ii. 130₁₉; iii. 455.
- Aristarchus, i. 209₂, 213₆, 320₆, 440, 451₄.
- Aristion, ii. 437 f., 452₁₃.
- (Ariston), relation to Mark xvi. 14-18, ii. 473 f., 485 f.₈.
- in Asia Minor, iii. 358, 370₃.
- Aristobulus, i. 392 f., 419₂₄.
- Arsinoë, ii. 357₄.
- Artemas, ii. 48.
- Ascetic Party in Rome, i. 365 f., 376 f.₁₀, 406 f.₁₂; ii. 346 f., 490.
- Asceticism—
- Among readers of Hebrews, ii. 331 ff.
- in Colossæ, i. 465 ff., 473-479₄₋₉.
- View of Paul, ii. 332.
- Asia, Province, i. 186₄, 189₄.
- Beginnings of Church in, ii. 138.
- Churches founded by Paul in, ii. 135 f.
- Churches of, Character of, ii. 136.
- Jews in, i. 449₂.
- Paul's work in, i. 259.
- Asia, Seven Churches of, iii. 390.
- Asia Minor, i. 47.
- Christian Church in, before Paul, ii. 137 f.
- Churches founded by Paul in, ii. 135 f.
- Churches of, Character of, ii. 136.
- Paul's journeys through—
- Ramsay's view, i. 188 ff.₄.
- Asia Minor, Churches of—
- Condition of, according to Rev. i.-iii., iii. 408-427.
- Founded by Paul, iii. 412 f., 422₅.
- Intercourse of Paul with, during the Roman imprisonment, ii. 16 f.
- Internal condition about 90-100 A.D., iii. 409 ff.
- Organisation, ii. 93.
- Persecution of, iii. 409 ff.
- Relation to Church in Rome, ii. 148 f.
- Relation to Mark, ii. 148 f.
- Relation to Paul, ii. 148 f.
- Relation to Silvanus, ii. 148 ff.
- Teaching of Nicolaitans in, ii. 292₁₅.
- Author's reference to himself in his work, iii. 226₇.
- Azuma, Feast of, iii. 296 f.₁₇.
- Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13)—
- = Babylon in Egypt, ii. 159, 162₂.
- = Babylon on Euphrates, ii. 159, 162 f.₂.
- = Rome, ii. 159 f., 163 ff.₃₋₄.

Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13)—continued.

Interpretation of Barhebræus, ii. 164 f.₃.

Interpretation of Papias, ii. 163₃.

Babylon (Rev. xvii. 5, etc.)—

Interpretation of, ii. 165 f.₄.

= Rome, ii. 165 ff.₄.

Babylon—

in Revelation, iii. 400, 442, 446₂.

Meaning of name in 1 Peter, ii. 158 ff., 162–173_{2,4}.

Origin of use of name for Rome, ii. 178, 188 f.₅.

Babylon, Church in, ii. 148, 158 ff., 162–173_{2,4}.

Balaam, ii. 233₂.

Compared with Nicolaüs, iii. 419, 427₁₃.

in Jude, ii. 246 f.

in 2 Peter and Jude, ii. 282 f., 291₁₄.

in Revelation, ii. 283.

the way of (2 Pet. ii. 15), ii. 225, 235₃.

Baptismal Formula, ii. 591₆.

in Pastoral Epistles, ii. 119, 131₂₀.

Barabbas, ii. 555, 569₁₁.

Name, i. 30₁₆.

Barnabas, i. 207₁, 442, 450₄; ii. 527₅.

Alleged author of Hebrews, ii. 302 f., 303, 308₅, 310_{10, 11}, 354–356, 361₁₃.

Biographical notes on, ii. 354 f.

Collection journey, Acts xi. 30, iii. 456 ff.

Cousin of Mark, i. 442; ii. 428.

in Galatia with Paul, i. 178 ff.

in Rome, i. 433₅.

Name, i. 31₁₆.

Surname of Joseph of Cyprus, i. 12.

Barnabas, Epistle of, ii. 302, 310₁₀; iii. 183.

Matt. use of, in the, ii. 515, 526 f.₅.

Bartholomew—

brought Gospel of Matthew into India, ii. 385₇.

see also Nathanael.

Bartimeus (Bar-Timai), i. 31₁₆.

Basilides, ii. 455 f.₁₅.

Teaching, iii. 374₁₀.

Berea, Church of—

Character, ii. 344.

Bethany, iii. 261 f.

Bethesda, Βηθεσδα—

Meaning, i. 28₁₅.

Bible, Jewish term for, ii. 277.

Bishop, ii. 32, 90 ff., 123 f.₄, 124₆.

Qualifications, ii. 32 f., 90 ff.

Bithynia, i. 185₃, 188₄; ii. 151₁; iii. 7₆.

Churches in, Character of, ii. 136 f.

Bœthusians, Family of, i. 62₈.

Books—

Reading of, in antiquity, ii. 373 f., 385₈.

Britannicus, iii. 471.

Cæsarea, i. 38, 58₂, 62₉, 443, 451₈.

Garrison in, i. 60₆.

Jews in, i. 451₆.

Paul in, i. 451₅.

Caiaphas, iii. 270 f., 292 f.₁₁, 352₁₂.

Cain, Comparison with, in Jude, ii. 257₅.

Caius of Rome, ii. 82₉.

Dialogue with Proclus, ii. 311₁₁.

on Johannine writings, iii. 181, 200₁₁.

Calendar—

Athenian, i. 319₅.

Jewish civil, i. 319₅.

Jewish ecclesiastical, i. 319₅.

Macedonian, i. 319₅.

Olympian, i. 319₅.

Caligula, i. 228.

Antichrist, i. 235₃, 239₉.

Decrees of, relating to Jews, i. 237₇.

References to, in Rev., iii. 445, 449₅.

Canon Muratori—

Dependence on Acts of Peter, and Acts of John, ii. 62 f., 73 ff.₇.

on origin of John, iii. 178 f., 197₆.

Canon, N.T.—

Composition of, i. 124.

Capitulatio Amiatina, i. 398 f.₄.

Cappadocia—

Churches in, Character of, ii. 136.

Carpocrates—

Teachings of, ii. 292 f.₁₅.

Carpocratians, ii. 129₁₇, 292₁₈.

Carpus, ii. 16.

Catholic Epistles, Canonicity, i. 123.

Celsus—

on angelolatry of Jews, i. 475₆.

Polemic against Christianity, ii. 563₃.

Cephas, ii. 206.

see also Peter.

a, other than Peter, ii. 155₈.

Cerinthus, i. 497, 515₄; ii. 116; iii. 181.

Alleged author of Fourth Gospel, ii. 389; iii. 177.

Alleged author of Johannine writings, iii. 184, 200₁₁.

Relations with John, iii. 204₂₄.

School of, ii. 444, 456₁₆.

Cerinthus—continued.Teaching, i. 515₄; iii. 374₁₀.Contested in 1 John, iii. 365 f., 373₈.Chagigah, the, iii. 283, 298₁₇.

Christ—

see Jesus Christ.

Christian Address—

Forms of, iii. 81 f.₃.Christian Church, see Church, Christian.

Christian Life and Worship, ii. 326 ff.

Christian Literature, Early—

Character of, ii. 367 f.

Christian Literature of 60–64, ii. 278.

Christian Preaching in Synagogues, i. 99₆.

Christianity—

Attempts of Roman government to suppress, ii. 178 f., 189₆.

Relation to the State—in Luke's writings, iii. 74 ff.

Situation of, in the world, from Paul's Epistles, ii. 179 ff.

Situation of, in the world, from 1 Peter, ii. 179 ff., 189–194₈₋₁₀.

Christians—

Conditions under Nero and Domitian, ii. 177–185, 189–191; iii. 412, 422₄.Friction between Jewish and Gentile, i. 147₂.

Jewish, in Jerusalem—

Attitude toward temple worship, ii. 333.

Jewish, in Palestine—

Attitude toward the law, ii. 334.

Origin of term, i. 21₃; ii. 185, 191 ff.₁₀.

Persecution of, under Nero, ii. 185.

Relation of, to the State, in 1 Peter, ii. 181 f.

Christians, Persecutions of—Nature of, in first century, ii. 180 f., 189₇.

mentioned in 1 Peter, ii. 179 ff., 184 f.

Chronological Survey, iii. 450–480.

Chronological Table, iii. 481–485.

Church, Christian—

Conception of, in Matthew's Gospel, ii. 550 ff.

Condition after 60 A.D., ii. 200, 241, 286₃, 293.

in Asia Minor before Paul, ii. 137 f. in Jerusalem, ii. 138.

Relation to the Jewish People in Matthew, ii. 550 ff.

Church, Christian, Early—

Deaconesses in, ii. 94 f.

in Jerusalem and Palestine—

Greek in, i. 43 ff., 112.

Hellenists in, i. 43 ff.

Membership of, i. 43–46.

Instruction, relation of, to the words of Christ, ii. 370 f.

Marriage in, ii. 95.

Patristic and modern views of, ii. 125 f.₁₀.

Offices in, ii. 32 f., 89–99.

Bishop, ii. 32, 90 ff., 123 f.₄, 124₆.Deacon, ii. 91 f., 123 f.₄.Elder (presbyter), ii. 23₆, 33 ff., 91 ff., 124 f.₅₋₈.

Officers in, functions, ii. 96 ff.

Qualifications, ii. 32 f., 90 ff.

Oral translation in, ii. 511 ff.

Persecution of, A.D. 35, i. 93.

Prophecy, ii. 97 f., 110 ff., 230; 236₄; iii. 16 f., 385 ff., 402 f.₂.Services open to outsiders, i. 99₆.

Teaching, ii. 96 f.

Compensation for, ii. 127 f.₁₃.

Widows, ii. 94 f.

Worship, ii. 514.

Church, Idea of—in Paul's Epistles, i. 503 f.

Church, the Palestinian—

Leaders in, iii. 188 f.

Church Services—

Gospels read in the, ii. 386.

Churches—in Asia Minor, organisation of, ii. 93.

Cilicia—

Churches in, ii. 134.

Claudia, ii. 20 f.₂.Claudius, Emperor, i. 228; ii. 168 f.₄; iii. 469 ff.

and the Jews, ii. 348.

Edict of, i. 427, 433 f.₆.

Expels Jews from Rome, iii. 466 f.

Return from Britain, iii. 456, 459 f.

Claudius Lysias, see Lysias.Clement, Epistle of, to James, i. 108₆; ii. 171₄, 289₈.

Clement of Alexandria—on James (first Bishop of Jerusalem), i. 103.

on Mark's Gospel, ii. 432 f.

on origin of John, iii. 178, 197₅.Clement of Philippi, i. 530, 534₁, 537₆, 559, 561₃.

Clement of Rome—

on Hebrews, ii. 299, 309₇.

Clement of Rome—continued.

- First Epistle to the Corinthians, ii. 264.
 - Confirming further activity of Paul, ii. 60 ff., 68 ff._g.
 - Date, ii. 60.
 - on parties in Corinthian Church, i. 298_o, 342.
 - Relation to Epistle to the Hebrews, ii. 346, 358 f.₇.
 - Relation to the Epistle of James, i. 134 f.₄.
 - Testimony to martyrdom of Peter and Paul, ii. 61 f.
- Second Epistle to the Corinthians, ii. 264, 311 f.₁₃.
- Echoes of James in, i. 135₆.
- Clementine Romance (Homilies and Recog.).
 - Ebionism of, i. 148₄.
 - on Barnabas, i. 433₅.
 - on James, i. 108₅, 136₆.
 - on Peter, ii. 170 f.₄; ii. 270, 289₈; iii. 5 f.₅.
- Codex—
 - Origin of, ii. 393, 398₆.
- Collection, the Great, ii. 317, 336₈.
- Colossæ, i. 447 f.₂.
 - Church of, ii. 138.
 - False teachers in, i. 463 ff., 478₇, 8.
 - False teaching concerning Christ in, i. 467.
 - Founded by Epaphras, i. 440 f., 449 f.₃, 460.
 - Jewish Christians in, i. 463 ff.
 - Relation to Paul, i. 460 f.
 - Teaching concerning asceticism in, i. 465 ff.
- Colossians, Epistle to the, i. 459–479.
 - Authorship, i. 456₃.
 - Date, i. 452₉.
 - Destination, i. 460.
 - Genuineness, i. 491–522.
 - Hitzig's criticism of, i. 491, 515₃.
 - Occasion, i. 461.
 - Predominant tone, i. 501 f.
 - Relation of Ephesians to, i. 499 ff., 516 f.₇.
 - Relation of teaching of Valentinus to, i. 498 f.
 - Resemblance to Ephesians, i. 500 ff., 517 f.₈.
 - Time and place of composition, i. 439–452.
 - Valentinian Gnosticism in, i. 497 ff., 515 f.₈.

Colossians and Ephesians, Epistles to the—

- Order of, i. 486, 490₆.
- Genuineness of—
 - Hilgenfeld on, i. 514 f.₂.
 - Mayerhoff on, i. 514 f.₂.
- Theory of interdependence—
 - Hitzig, i. 491, 499, 515₃.
 - Holtzmann, i. 491, 499, 514₁.
- “Comma Joanneum,” iii. 372₇.
- Corinth—
 - Apollos in, i. 262, 270 f.₁₁.
 - Church of, i. 232 f.
 - Apollos and Parties in, i. 283 f., 285 ff.
 - Baptism in, i. 303₁₁.
 - Charges of fickleness against Paul, i. 321 ff., 343 f.₂.
 - Christ Party in, i. 292 ff.
 - Collection in, i. 308 f., 318 f.₅, 320₆, 338, 351₈.
 - Condition at date of 1 Cor., i. 273–306.
 - Early history, i. 256–273.
 - Errors regarding resurrection in, i. 278 f.
 - False apostles in, i. 290 ff., 305 f.₁₃.
 - Founded by Paul, i. 256 f., 264₂.
 - Independent spirit of, i. 281 f., 297₇.
 - Intercourse with heathen, i. 274 ff., 278 f., 296₁, 2.
 - Letters from, to Paul, i. 261 f.
 - Date of, i. 262.
 - Libertines in, ii. 280 ff.
 - Lord's Supper in, i. 284.
 - Lost Epistle of Paul to, i. 263 f., 307, 312 ff., 327 f., 329, 345 ff.₅.
 - Hausrath's theory of, i. 313 f.
 - Lost Epistle of, to Paul, i. 263, 264, 273₁₅.
 - Membership, i. 273.
 - Moral condition when 1 Cor. was written, i. 263 f., 273 f.₁₅.
 - Origin, i. 258.
 - Parties, i. 282 ff.
 - Various views about, i. 298 ff.₉.
 - Peter and Parties, i. 283 f.
 - Question of sexual relations, i. 276, 296₃.
 - Slaves in, i. 297₆.
 - Unrecorded visit of Paul, i. 263 f., 271 f.₁₂₋₁₄, 307, 316₂, 327 f.
 - Women in public worship, i. 280 f.
 - History of, i. 256 f., 264₁.
 - Paul's first visit, i. 256 f.

Corinth—continued.

Paul's work, i. 232 f.

Peter in, i. 302 f.₁₀.

Population, i. 273.

Work of Paul in surrounding region,
i. 257, 264 f.₂.Corinthians, First Epistle to the—Date, i. 259 f., 268₇, 320₅.Krenkle's view, i. 268₇.

Occasion, i. 260 f., 263 f., 295.

Readers, i. 297 f.₇.Corinthians, First and Second Epistles to the— Events intervening between, i. 321.

Corinthians, Second Epistle to the—Analysis, i. 309–312.

Date, i. 320₅.

Effect, i. 342 f.

Integrity, i. 312, 338 f.

Occasion, i. 321–351.

Purpose, i. 335 ff.

Readers, i. 308.

Survey, i. 307–321.

Writers, i. 307, 316 ff.₃.Corinthians, Third Epistle to the, i.160, 249₅, 270₉; ii. 285 f.₅.Crescens in Gaul, ii. 11 f., 26₈.*Crete, iii. 138₂₀.

Christianity in, ii. 44.

False teaching in, ii. 44 f.

Jews in, ii. 52₁.

Paul in, ii. 43 f., 106.

Crispus, i. 258, 265₄.Cumanus—

Governor of Galilee, iii. 470.

Cyprian, Latin Bible of, origin, ii.

515.

Cyprus under Roman rule, iii. 463 ff.Dalmatia, i. 186₄; ii. 26₈.

Missionary work in, ii. 11 f.

Damascus, i. 67₁₂; iii. 455."Day of the Lord"—

in 2 Peter, ii. 226.

in 2 Thess., i. 226 f., 235₈.Deacon, ii. 91 f., 123 f.₄.

Qualifications, ii. 32 f., 90 ff.

Deaconesses—

in the early Church, ii. 94 f.

Decapolis, i. 35, 67₁₂.Dedication of Classical Writings, iii.42, 81₂.Demas, i. 213₆, 441, 450₄; ii. 3, 21₃, 87,129₇; iii. 1.Demetrius, the Silversmith, iii. 163₈.*Demetrius (3 John 12), iii. 377, 381₁, 3.*Derbe, i. 191 f.₅, 6, 209₂.*Diaspora, the, i. 75 f., 80₇, 82₉; ii.140 f., 153 f.₅.Connection with Jerusalem, i. 60₇.

Greek influence of, i. 39 f.

Greek used by, i. 46–48.

Diatessaron of Ammonius, ii. 401, 420₁.Diatessaron of Tatian, ii. 401, 421₁;

iii. 22.

Didache—Apostolic decree in, iii. 21, 35₁₃, 15, 164₁₀.Baptismal formula in, ii. 591₆.Date and origin, ii. 357₄.Dependent on Jude, ii. 259₈.Eucharistic prayers of, i. 304₁₂.Lord's Supper in, iii. 40₁₉.Maranatha in, i. 304₁₂.

Use of Matthew, ii. 515.

Didascalia—Apostolic decree in, iii. 21, 35₁₄.Witness to John vii. 53–viii. 11, iii.
346₃.Dio Cassius— on Claudius, iii. 466 f.

Diognetus, Epistle to, ii. 312₁₃.Dionysius of Alexandria—on Revelation, iii. 428 f., 432, 433 f.₂, 435₅, 6.

Witness to 2 and 3 John, iii. 185 f.

Dionysius of Corinth—Letter to Romans, ii. 75₈.on Peter and Paul, i. 302 f.₁₀.Dioscorides, iii. 82₅, 160 f.₅.*Diotrephes, iii. 375 ff., 381 f.₄₋₆.*Disciples of Jesus—

Calling of the first, in John, iii. 209.

Choice and work, in Matt., ii. 545.

Familiar with Greek, i. 42.

First, iii. 189.

Greek names, i. 41, 42 in Asia Minor, iii. 358, 370₈.Items about, in Fourth Gospel, iii.

224₄.Lists, ii. 506, 522 ff.₁.

Lists in Luke's work, iii. 78.

Order, iii. 210, 225₆.Meaning of term, iii. 212 f., 226 f.₉.Missionary activity, ii. 587₁.Personal, distinction between, and other Christians, ii. 206 f.

Relation to Jesus, ii. 463 f., 465 f.

Relation to Jewish law, ii. 586 f.₁.Sketches of, in Fourth Gospel, iii 302 f.

the Twelve—training, ii. 463 ff.

Training, in Fourth Gospel, iii. 301 f

- Domitian, ii. 240 ; iii. 183, 201₁₄, 412, 422₄
Doxologies in Epistles, i. 406₁₀.
Drusilla, iii. 469, 474.
- Early Christian Writings—
Date, i. 157 f.
Literary Character, i. 158 f.
- Easter Controversy, iii. 273-283, 293-298₁₂₋₁₇.
- Easter—
Date, iii. 293₁₂.
Controversies concerning, iii. 177, 192 f., 204₂₅.
View of Polycarp, iii. 204₂₅.
- Ebionism in James, i. 148₄.
in Luke, iii. 74, 92₂₄.
- Ebionites—
Doctrine of poverty, iii. 91 f.₂₄.
Gospel of the—
see Apocryphal Gospels.
Gospel used by, ii. 518.
Literature, ii. 308₄.
- Edom—Jewish name for Rome, ii. 178, 188 f.₅.
- Egypt—
Church in, ii. 344, 357 f.₄.
Founder, ii. 159.
Jews in, i. 47 ; ii. 357 f.₄.
Jewish Christian communities in, ii.
357 f.₄.
- Egyptian, the, iii. 133₆.
- Elder, ii. 23₅, 33 ff., 91 f., 124 f.₅₋₈.
- "Elders" of Irenæus, iii. 175, 178, 182, 201₁₃.
- Elect, the, ii. 153_{4, 5}.
- Enoch, Book of, ii. 286 ff.₇.
Original, ii. 270, 287 f.₇.
Quoted in Jude, ii. 248, 269 f., 286 ff.₇.
- Epænetus, i. 389 f., 417₂₁ ; ii. 138.
- Epaphras, i. 450₄, 495 ; ii. 16.
Founder of Church of Colossæ, i.
440 f., 449 f.₃, 460, 484.
- Epaphroditus, i. 525 f., 528, 537₆.
- Ephesians and Colossians, Epistles to the—order of, i. 486, 490₆.
genuineness—
Hilgenfeld on, i. 514 f.₂.
Mayerhoff on, i. 514 f.₂.
Theory of interdependence—
Hitzig, i. 491, 499, 515₃.
Holtzmann, i. 491, 499, 514₁.
- Ephesians, Epistle to the—Alleged motive for forgery, i.
511 ff.
Alleged new ideas in, i. 508 f.
Baur on, i. 491, 511 f.
Christ, significance in, i. 509 ff.
Copies, ii. 177.
Date, i. 452₉, 483, 489 f.₅, 492 f.
Dependence on Colossians—View of Holtzmann, i. 517 f.₈.
Destination, i. 479-491.
View of Church Fathers, i.
489 f.₅.
View of Marcion, i. 480 f., 488₃.
Encyclical character, i. 484 ff.
Genuineness, i. 491-522.
Holtzmann on, i. 491, 512 ff.
Predominant tone of, i. 501 f.
Relation to Colossians, i. 499 ff., 516 f.₈.
Relation to Philemon, i. 493 ff.
Relation to teaching of Valentinus,
i. 498 f.
Resemblance to Colossians, i. 500 ff., 517 f.₈.
Spuriousness, lexical proof of alleged,
i. 502 ff., 518 ff.₉.
Time and place of composition, i.
439-452.
Title, i. 481, 483, 488 f._{3, 4, 5}, 492 f.
Marcion's criticism, i. 481, 488₃.
known by Ignatius, i. 481.
Origin, i. 486 f.
Valentinian Gnosticism in, i. 497 ff., 515₅.
- Ephesus—
Christians in, ii. 135 f.
Church of, iii. 331 f.₁₂, 417 f.
origin, i. 483 f.
Paul, and the, i. 483 f., 489 f.₅.
Paul's work in, i. 259.
- Ephrem—
Commentary on Acts, iii. 27₃.
on Colossians ii. 18, i. 476₆.
on 2 Thessalonians ii., i. 239₉.
on Church of Ephesus, i. 489₅.
on Hebrews, ii. 308₅.
on Paul in Spain, ii. 74₇.
on Peter, ii. 164₃.
Text of Romans known to, i. 405₄.
- Epimenedes, ii. 44, 52 f.₁.
- Epiphaneus—
Teachings of, ii. 292 f.₁₅.
- Episcopate—
in Asia Minor, iii. 376, 417.
- Epistles, Catholic—
Canonicity, i. 123.

Epistles of N.T.—

Address and greeting, i. 73 f., 77₂, 78₃, 119₇.

Doxologies in, i. 406₁₀.

Silence of, concerning a Gospel literature, ii. 375 f.

Epistles of the Apostolic and Post-apostolic Age, greetings of, ii. 312 f., 335₁.

Epistles of the Early Church, ii. 367 f.

Epistolary Greeting—

Classical form, i. 369₁.

Epistolary Salutations, i. 414₁₈.

Equality of Jew and Gentile in—Epistle to the Romans, i. 372 ff.₄.

Erastus, i. 259 ; ii. 88.

in Corinth, ii. 14 f.

Eschatology—

Teaching of Gospels, i. 224₄.

Teaching of Jesus, i. 224₄, 253₁₁.

Teaching of Paul, i. 221, 223 f.₄, 253₁₁.

Teaching of 1 Thessalonians, i. 221, 223 f.₄.

Essenes, i. 376 f.₁₀, 471, 479₈ ; ii. 126₁₁.

Angelolatry among, i. 476₆.

Etchmiadzin, Gospel of—

see Apocryphal Gospels.

Eunice, ii. 22 f.₄.

Euodia, i. 530, 533₁, 537₆, 561 f.₄.

Eupolemos, i. 37, 59₄.

Eusebius of Cæsarea—

Chronicle of, ii. 168₄ ; iii. 475.

Gospel catalogues (κανόνες), Gospel sections (περικοπαί, κεφάλαια), ii. 401, 420₁.

on Aristion and John the presbyter, ii. 436, 452 f._{13, 14}.

on earthquake in Asia Minor, i. 449₂, 452₉.

on Luke, iii. 2, 4 f.₄.

on Mark and his Gospel, ii. 432 f., 448 f._{8, 9}, 450 f._{11, 12}.

on Matthew and his Gospel, ii. 528₇.

on Peter and Paul in Rome, ii. 77 f.₈, 80₉, 167 f.₄, 449 f.₁₀.

Use of term Syriac, i. 22 f.₄.

Witness to 2 and 3 John, iii. 185 f., 203₁₈.

Evangeliarium Hierosolymitanum, ii. 520 ; iii. 36₁₆.

Evangelist—

Meaning of term in Paul's Epistles, i. 507 f.

Evangelium Veritatis, ii. 389 f.

Eye-witnesses, iii. 46 ff., 82₆, 84₇.

Ezekiel—

Tragic Jewish poet, wrote in Greek, i. 38, 59₄.

(Fourth) Ezra, i. 142.

on fasting, i. 377₁₀.

Fables, ii. 103 ff., 113, 128 f.₁₅.

Fadus, iii. 460 f.

Faith—

Teaching concerning, in John, iii. 305 ff.

False Teachers—of Colossæ, i. 463 ff., 478₇.

of 1 John, iii. 363–368.

of Jude, ii. 243–252, 292 f.₁₅.

Character, ii. 279–283.

of 2 Peter, ii. 224 ff., 231, 232 f.₂, 292 f.₁₅.

Character, ii. 279–283.

Origin, ii. 226 f.

Famine in Judea, the—Date, Josephus on, iii. 460 f.

Faustus, Manichean—

on the Gospels, ii. 387, 396₂.

Felix, Procurator, iii. 76, 469–478.

Festus, Procurator, iii. 469–478.

First Person—

Use of, in ancient literature, iii. 86₁₁.

Flavia Domitilla, iii. 422₄.

Fortunatus, i. 260, 269₈.

Fourth Gospel—

see John, Gospel of.

Gabbatha, Γαββαθα—

Meaning, i. 28₁₅.

Gaius (of 3 John), iii. 374 ff., 381₁₃.

Gaius of Corinth, i. 209₂, 266₄, 435.

Gaius of Derbe, i. 209₂, 213₆, 321₆.

Gaius of Macedonia, i. 209₂, 213₆.

Galatia, i. 173–193 ; ii. 134, 151 f._{1, 2}.

Bibliography, i. 183₁.

Churches of, i. 176 f., 191 f.₈ ; ii. 138.

Character, ii. 136.

Composition, i. 166, 177, 192 f.₆.

False teachers in, i. 166 f.

Founded by Paul, ii. 135 f.

Origin, i. 164 f.

Jews in, i. 177, 192₆.

Judaizers in, i. 177 f., 182 f.

Luke's use of term, i. 174 f.

Meaning of, in Galatians i. 2, i. 175 ff.

Meaning of, in 1 Cor. xvi. 1, i. 175.

Meaning of, in 1 Peter i. 1, i. 175.

Older (North Galatian) and modern (South Galatian) views, i.

174 f., 183₂.

Galatia—continued.Meaning of, in 1 Peter i. 1—continued.

Confirmation of South Galatian view, i. 178 ff.

Messengers from, to Paul, i. 198.

Paul's use of term, i. 174 ff.

Use of term by Roman writers, i. 174, 183 ff.₃Confirmed by inscriptions, i. 184 f.₃.

Galatians, i. 173–193.

Nationality of, i. 183₁.

Galatians, Epistle to the—Acquaintance of Paul with Roman law in, i. 201 f.₁.

Analysis, i. 167 ff.

Baur's view of, i. 243 f.

Calvin's view of date, i. 202₂.

Compared with Acts, i. 178–182.

Date and place of composition, i. 170, 173₅, 193–202, 195, 196 f., 198 f., 200₁, 202₃, 233.

on North Galatian theory, i. 193 f.

on South Galatian theory, i. 194 ff.

False teachers of, ii. 257₄.

Genuineness, i. 242–255.

Hist. presuppositions and occasion, i. 164–173.

How written, i. 170, 172₄.

Ideas of, compared with Romans, i. 201.

Marcion's view of, i. 243.

Occasion, i. 166 f.

Peculiar words, i. 503, 521 f.₁₀.Peter, form of name, in, ii. 155₈.

Readers, i. 173–193, 175 ff., 178 ff.

Source of information for, i. 169.

View of Dutch School, i. 243 f.

Galen, iii. 82 f.₅, 160 f.₅.Galilean Dialect, i. 9, 27₁₃; ii. 292₁₄, 455₁₅.Gallio, i. 258, 267_{5, 6}; iii. 149, 467 f.

Gamaliel the elder, i. 11, 51; iii. 99.

Gamaliel the younger, i. 32₁₈, 62₉; iii. 99.

Three letters of, i. 10.

Gaul—

Missionary Work in, ii. 11 f.

Gaza, iii. 164₁₁.Genealogies, ii. 103 ff., 128 f.₁₅.Genealogy, ii. 532, 562 f.₂.Gennesaret, iii. 333₁₄.

Gentile Churches—

Paul's care of, i. 462 f.

View of 2 Peter, ii. 264.

Gentiles—and the Gospel—

View of Matthew, ii. 587 f.₁.Relation to Synagogues, i. 212 f.₆.Gischala, i. 68 f.₁₆.Glaukias, ii. 455 f.₁₅.

Gnosticism, in Ephesians and Colossians, i. 497 ff.

Valentinian, in Epistle to the Philippians, i. 557.

Gnostics—

Misunderstanding of Paul, i. 125 f.

on the Gospels, ii. 389.

Golgotha, meaning, i. 29₁₅.Gomorrhah, iii. 398, 406₉.

Gospel, the—

and the Gospels, ii. 388.

Uniqueness, ii. 388.

Gospel, the One, i. 388.

Gospel, the Original—

View of J. G. Eichhorn, ii. 404, 422 f.₆.View of Herder, ii. 423₈.

View of Hilgenfeld, ii. 414.

View of H. J. Holtzmann, ii. 415.

View of G. E. Lessing, ii. 403.

View of B. Weiss, ii. 417.

Gospel, the Original Unwritten—

View of Gieseler, ii. 408 f.

View of Herder, ii. 406.

View of Holsten, ii. 426 f.₁₃.

Gospel, the Unwritten, ii. 367–386.

Gospel History, the—Oral transmission of, ii. 384₆; iii. 48, 84₈.

Variant forms of the oral, ii. 603 f.

Gospels, the, and Acts—

Length of, ii. 487₁₀.

Gospel Literature—

Beginnings of, date, ii. 376.

Occasion for, ii. 375 f.

Silence of other N.T. writings concerning, ii. 375 f.

Gospel Preaching—

Early—

Content, ii. 174.

to Gentiles and O.T. Prophecy, ii. 146.

to Gentiles—

Content, ii. 203.

to Jews—

Content, ii. 202 f., 215 f.₈.

"Gospel of Christ"—

in Pauline writings, ii. 370 ff., 377 f.₂.

Gospel of Jesus Christ, the—Meaning, ii. 459 f.

Gospels, the—

and the Gospel, ii. 388.

Authorship, internal evidence concerning, ii. 391 f.

Gospels, the—continued.

Authorship, origin of tradition concerning, ii. 391 f.

Authorship, tradition concerning, in 1st and 2nd century, ii. 386-392.

Authorship—

View of Clement, ii. 387.

View of Faustus, ii. 387, 396₂.

View of Gnostics, ii. 389 f.

View of Irenæus, ii. 387, 397₄.

View of Justin, ii. 389.

View of Marcion, ii. 390 f.

View of Muratorian Canon, ii. 387.

View of Origen, ii. 387.

View of Papias, ii. 394.

View of Tertullian, ii. 399 f.₈.

View of Valentinians, ii. 390.

Differences in, early attempts to harmonise, ii. 402, 421₂.

Divisions (περικοπαί, κεφάλαια, κανόνες) made by Eusebius, ii. 401, 420 f.₁.

Eschatology of, i. 224₄.

Greek MSS, titles of, ii. 386 f., 396₁₋₃.

Harmonies, ii. 421₁.

Latin MSS, titles of, ii. 386 f., 396₁.

Order in Egyptian Codex, ii. 393, 398₆.

Order of Composition—

Tradition concerning, ii. 392-396, 397-400₅₋₈.

View of Clement of Alexandria, ii. 394 ff., 400₉.

View of Irenæus, ii. 393 f., 398₇.

View of Muratorian Canon, ii. 393, 399₈.

View of Old Latin Prologues, ii. 400₈.

View of Origen, ii. 392 f., 397₅.

Origin, common tradition in the Church regarding, ii. 386-400.

Origin, date of traditional, ii. 374 f.

Read in Church services, ii. 386.

Relation of, to the original language of the gospel tradition, ii. 574 ff.

Similarities of language in, noted by Augustine, ii. 402, 422₃.

Synopses of, ii. 421₁.

Titles, meaning of, ii. 387 f., 396₁₋₃.

Unity of, ii. 388, 397₃.

Use in religious services of Christians, ii. 376.

View of Marcion, ii. 390 f.

Gospels, Synoptic—

see Synoptic Gospels.

Greek, attitude of Rabbis towards, i. 62 f.₉.

Greek and Latin Words used by Jesus, i. 41.

Greek Churches—

Liturgical Formulæ, Aramaic expressions in, i. 12, 13, 18₃.
origin, i. 12 f.

Greek cities in Palestine, i. 35 f.

Greek coins in Palestine, i. 37.

Greek Influence on Hasmonean High Priests, i. 37.

Greek Influence on Jews, through diaspora, i. 35 ff., 39 f.

Under Greek Rule, i. 35-37.

Under Hasmoneans, i. 37.

Under Herod the Great, i. 37 f.

Under Roman Rule, i. 38 f.

Greek—

Josephus' knowledge of, i. 63₉.

Knowledge of, among higher classes of Palestine, i. 41.

Knowledge of, among middle and lower classes of Palestine, i. 40-43.

Language among Jews, i. § 2.

Language in Palestine, i. 35-46.

Official language under Roman rule in Palestine, i. 38 f.

Used by Jesus and disciples, i. 42.

View of J. Voss, i. 58₁.

Harmonies of the Gospels, ii. 421₁.

Hasmonean High Priests, Greek Influence on, i. 37.

Hebraisms in Luke, iii. 104 f., 135₁₁.

Hebrew, Hebrews ('Εβραῖος)—

Meaning of term, i. 48 ff., 60 f.₈; ii. 296, 306 f.₄.

Hebrew Language—

Greek knowledge of, iii. 141₂₇.

Modern—

origin, i. 6.

Use of, in time of Christ, i. 6-9, 25₁₀.

Used on Maccabean Coins, i. 25₈.

(Aramaic) words in Luke, iii. 135 f.₁₂₋₁₄.

(Aramaic) words in Mark, iii. 135 f.₁₂.

Zeal of Rabbis for, i. 40.

Hebrews, Epistle to the—Author—

= Apollos, ii. 356, 364 f.₁₅.

= Aquila and Priscilla, ii. 365 f.₁₅.

= Aristion, ii. 366₁₅.

Hebrews, Epistle to the—*continued.*Author—continued.

= Barnabas, ii. 302 f., 310₁₀, 354–356, 361₁₃.

origin of tradition, ii. 303.

Birthplace, ii. 357₃.

= Clement of Rome, ii. 300.

Facts about, ii. 316.

Known to the readers, ii. 304.

= Luke, ii. 300.

Nationality, ii. 324.

= Paul, ii. 296, 298–302, 303, 352 f., 360₁₁.

origin of tradition, ii. 304.

Relation to readers, ii. 316.

Traditions concerning, ii. 298–305.

Authorship—

Origin of three-fold tradition concerning, ii. 303 ff., 311₁₂.

Tradition of Alexandrian Church, ii. 298–301, 308₅, 309₇.

Tradition of Greek Churches, ii. 301.

Tradition of Western Churches, ii. 301 f., 309 f.₈.

View of Clement of Alexandria, ii. 296.

View of Harnack, ii. 365 f.₁₅.

View of Hippolytus, ii. 301 f., 310₉.

View of Irenaeus, ii. 301 f., 310₉.

View of Klostermann, ii. 305₂.

View of Luther, ii. 356, 364₁₅.

View of Montanists, ii. 302 f.

View of Origen, ii. 352 f., 356.

View of Pantænus, ii. 308₅.

View of Tertullian, ii. 302, 310₁₀.

Canonicity, ii. 305₁.

Character, ii. 313 f.

Date, ii. 293, 320 f., 323, 343, 351 f.

Didactic writing, ii. 293.

Epistolary character, ii. 314 f.

False (strange) teachings, warned against, ii. 331 ff.

Greek style, ii. 299.

Greeting, alleged lost, ii. 311₁₂, 313.

Greeting wanting, ii. 293 f.

Hebraisms, ii. 361₁₂.

Historical presuppositions, ii. 312–341.

in the Roman Church, ii. 346.

Jerusalem, references to the destruction of, in, ii. 351, 359 f.₉.

Language and style, ii. 360 f.₁₂.

Language, original, ii. 361₁₂.

Literary form, ii. 312.

Luke, the alleged translator of Hebrews, ii. 298 f., 308₅.

Hebrews, Epistle to the—continued.

Origin, ii. 352.

Original language, alleged, ii. 296, 298 ff., 308₅, 309₆.

O.T., allegorical and typological treatment of the, in, ii. 320–323.

O.T. quotations in, ii. 320 f., 337₆.

Pauline Epistles compared with, ii. 353 f., 360 f.₁₂.

Purpose, ii. 314, 330.

Readers, ii. 293, 296, 297 f., 314 f., 323 f., 341–351, 356–359₁₋₈.

and the Jerusalem Collection, ii. 317.

asceticism among the, ii. 332 ff.

Location—

Alexandria, ii. 344, 357₃.

Antioch, ii. 344, 356 f.₂.

Ephesus, ii. 344.

Italy (Rome), ii. 345–351, 358₅, 359₈.

Jerusalem, ii. 341–343.

Palestine (outside Jerusalem), ii. 343 f., 356₁.

varying views, ii. 333 ff.

Nationality of, ii. 323 ff., 328 f., 338₇.

Not hearers of the preaching of Jesus, ii. 315 f., 342.

Persecution of, ii. 317 ff., 336 f.₅.

Relation to temple cultus, ii. 341₁₃.

Religious life of, ii. 317 f., 319 f., 328 f., 330 f., 339 f.₁₁.

Tradition concerning, ii. 293–298.

View of ancient scholars, ii. 297.

Readers, date and author of, ii. 341–366.

Relation to Philo, ii. 364 f.₁₅.

Relation to Romans, ii. 365.

Septuagint used in, ii. 361₁₂.

Style, ii. 353.

Teaching—

Mosaic Law, ii. 333 f., 340 f.₁₃, 342.

New covenant, ii. 324.

O.T. Cultus, ii. 326 f., 333 f., 338₉, 340 f.₁₃.

Temple Cultus, alleged ignorance of, ii. 355, 361 ff.₁₄.

Theology—

Christology—

High Priest, ii. 327, 330, 362 f.₁₄.

Humiliation, ii. 330.

Incarnation, ii. 329 f.

King, ii. 329 f.

Redeemer, ii. 329 f.

Faith, ii. 325 f., 328 f.

Hebrews, Epistle to the—continued.

- Title, ii. 294–298.
- Currency, ii. 294 f., 304.
- Date, ii. 295.
- Meaning, ii. 296 f.
- Origin, ii. 295, 298 f., 305₂, 306₃.
- View of Klostermann, ii. 305₂.
- View of Pantanus, ii. 308₅.
- View of Semla, ii. 305 f.₂.
- Tradition concerning, ii. 293–312.
- View of Clement of Alexandria, ii. 298 f., 308₅, 309₆.
- View of Origen, ii. 299 f., 308₅, 309₇.
- Hebrews, Gospel of the—
see Apocryphal Gospels.
- Hegesippus—
on Heresy in Palestinian Church, ii. 292₁₅.
- on James the Just, i. 107₄.
- Helena, Princess, iii. 460 f.
- Hellenes, i. 58₅.
- Josephus on, i. 58₂.
- Hellenic—
Meaning, i. 36.
- Hellenism in Jewish Christian Churches in Syria, i. 44, 66₁₂.
- Hellenistic—
Usage and meaning of term, ii. 296, 309₆.
- Hellenistic Dialect, i. 56.
Greek, i. 54–57, 71 f.₂₁.
- Bibliography, i. 57₁.
- Hellenistic influence in Palestine, i. 35 ff.
- Hellenists, i. 8, 9, 39 f., 71 f.₂₁.
in Early Church, i. 43 ff.
- in Jerusalem Church, i. 40, 43, 60₈, 66₁₂.
- Synagogues of, in Jerusalem, i. 39 f., 50.
- Heracleon, i. 475₆.
Commentary on John, iii. 176.
on Author of John, iii. 199₉.
- "Heresy," ii. 232 f.₂.
- Hermas, ii. 359₇. acquainted with Hebrews, ii. 346.
- Hermas, the Shepherd of—
Date, i. 128.
- Relation to Hebrews, ii. 346, 359₇.
- Relation to James, i. 128, 135₅.
- Relation of 2 Peter to, ii. 281 f.₃.
- Uncanonical, ii. 302 f.
- Hermas (Rom. xvi. 14), i. 420₂₄.
- Hermogenes, ii. 3, 21₃, 129₁₇.
- Herod the Great, iii. 132₅.
Greek influence of, i. 37 f.

Herodion, i. 393:

- Hierapolis, i. 185₃, 448 f.₂.
- Hierapolis, Church of, iii. 412.
Founded by Epaphras, i. 441, 449 f.₃.
- Hippocrates, iii. 82 f.₅, 160 f.₅.
- Hymenæus, ii. 21₃, 42₇, 108 ff., 115, 129₁₇.
- Iconium, i. 191 f.₅, 6; ii. 6, 19.
- Ignatius—
in Province of Asia, i. 497.
- Epistles of—
Influence of Fourth Gospel on, iii. 176, 327₄.
- on Jewish Teachers in Asia Minor, ii. 116.
- on "love feasts," ii. 236₃.
- Title of Ephesians known to, i. 481.
- Witness to Peter's presence in Rome, ii. 165 f.₄.
- India—
Bartholomew in, ii. 385₇.
- Gospel of Matthew in, ii. 385₇.
- Inscriptions, Bilingual, i. 59₅.
- Irenæus—on Antichrist, i. 238 f.₉.
- on Cerinthus, i. 515₄.
- on Hebrews, ii. 295, 301, 310₉.
- on John, iii. 201₄, 205₂₇, 254₆.
- on Mark, ii. 387, 393 f., 398₇, 433 f.
- on Matthew, ii. 393 f., 398₇.
- on Peter and Paul in Rome, ii. 76₈, 393, 398₇.
- on Polycarp, iii. 204₂₄.
- on Rev. xiii. 18 (666), iii. 445, 448₅.
- Ischodad, ii. 522₁.
on the list of disciples, ii. 522₁.
- on Matt. i. 20, ii. 529₇.
- Israel, Spiritual, i. 76, 81₉.
- Italian Band, i. 60₆.
- James, Brother of Jesus, i. 109₆, ii. 240.
Attitude toward Paul's doctrine of Justification, i. 124, 129 ff.₁, 132₂.
- Author of Epistle, i. 104.
- Brother of Jude, ii. 238 f., 256₂.
- Called "the just," i. 103, 107₄, 131₁, 139 f.
- Death, i. 103.
- Head of Jerusalem Church, i. 103 f., 108₅.
- = James of Mark xiv. 51 f., ii. 447₆.
- Personality, i. 101–110.
- Spurious letter of, i. 148₅.
- Training and habits of thought, i. 110–123.

- James, the Less, i. 106.
 James, Son of Alphaeus, i. 102, 106 ;
 ii. 507, 522₁.
 James, Son of Zebedee, i. 102, 106 ; iii.
 187, 204_{19, 21}, 210 ff., 216.
 Alleged author of John, iii. 228₁₃.
 Death, iii. 188, 194₂.
 Martyrdom, iii. 457.
 Notices of, in N.T., ii. 490, 505_{5a}.
 James, Protevangelium of—
 Date, ii. 375.
 James, Epistle of—
 Address and greeting, i. 73, 83₁₀, 100₁₂, 113, 119₇, 136, 146 f.₁.
 Affinity with discourses of Jesus, i.
 114, 121 f.₁₁.
 Analysis, i. 117₃.
 Author, i. 101 f., 104, 106 f.₃. familiar with Gr. O.T., i. 113, 120₈. knowledge of Heb. O.T., i. 113 f.
 Canonicity, i. 123 f.
 Canonicity in Alexandrian Church,
 i. 123 f.
 Christian ideas, i. 144 f.
 Date, i. 73, 77, 91 f., 124, 129, 136, 146 f.₁, 147₃.
 evidences of early, i. 148 f.₆.
 Destination, i. 73–83.
 Divergent views regarding, i. 136–
 151.
 Ebionism in, i. 148₄.
 External evidence for, i. 123–136.
 Language, i. 112 f., 117 f.₄.
 Law referred to, i. 110 f., 115 f.₁, 130 f.₁.
 Literary character, i. 139 f.
 Progress of thought, i. 117₃.
 Readers, i. 83–101.
 Jewish Christians, i. 89 ff., 100_{9, 10}.
 Resident in Palestine, i. 91, 100₁₁.
 Relation to Clement, 1 Cor., i. 128,
 134₄.
 Relation to Clement, 2 Cor., i. 135₆.
 Relation to Pseudo - Clementine
 Literature, i. 136₈.
 Relation to Gospels, i. 114, 122₁₁.
 Relation to Hebrews, i. 123₁₁.
 Relation to Hermas, i. 128, 135₅.
 Relation to Revelation, i. 123₁₁.
 Relation of 1 Peter to, i. 128, 133 f.₃ ;
 ii. 175 f., 186₃.
 Relation of Pauline Epistles to, i.
 132₂.
 Relation of Romans to, i. 126 ff., 132₂.
 Style, i. 112, 118₅.
 James, Epistle of—continued.
 Theory of Aramaic original, i. 112 f., 118₆.
 Theory of Harnack, i. 147₁.
 Theory of Spitta, i. 141 ff., 149 f.₇.
 Theory of Weizsäcker, i. 148₄.
 Tone of, i. 101, 106_{1, 2}.
 Use of Sirach, i. 114, 121₁₀.
 James and Jambres, ii. 115.
 Jason, i. 213₆, 417₂₂ ; iii. 3₁.
 Jason and Papiscus, Dialogue of—Authorship, iii. 3₁.
 Jerome—
 Witness to 2 and 3 John, iii. 186, 203₁₈.
 Jerusalem—
 Christian Church in—Attitude toward temple worship,
 ii. 333.
 Beginnings of, ii. 138.
 Church of—
 Missionary activity of, ii. 342 f.
 Poverty of, ii. 342.
 Jerusalem Collection, i. 209₂, 368 f.
 Jerusalem Council—
 Date, i. 178, 194.
 Jerusalem—
 Destruction of, ii. 254 f.
 Prophecy of, iii. 156 ff.
 References to, in Hebrews, ii. 351,
 359 f.₉.
 Greek form of name in N.T., ii.
 592 f.₉.
 Jewish pronunciation of, i. 29₁₅.
 Jesus, the name, ii. 555, 569₁₁ ; ii.
 576 f., 592₈.
 Jesus Christ—
 Aramaic words used by, i. 3.
 List, i. 15 f.₃.
 Attitude toward Jewish law, ii.
 586₁.
 Attitude toward Judaism, in John,
 iii. 342.
 Attitude toward Pharisees, in John,
 iii. 342.
 Attitude toward Pharisees and Sadducees in Matt., ii. 549.
 Baptism, in Matt., ii. 540.
 Birth—
 Date, iii. 98.
 Blasphemy of name, i. 89, 99₈.
 Brothers, i. 104 f., 110₇ ; ii. 238 f., 240 f., 256₂.
 Brothers and Cousins, iii. 188,
 204₂₁.
 Crucifixion, in missionary preaching,
 ii. 369.

Jesus Christ—continued.

Crucifixion and death in John, iii. 217 f.

persons present at, iii. 217 f.

Davidic descent, ii. 533 ff., 563₃, 567₅.

Death, in John, iii. 320 f.

Date, in Fourth Gospel, iii. 277 f., 281, 293 f.₁₅.

Date, in Synoptics, iii. 278, 294 f.₁₆.

Teaching concerning, in Matt., ii. 551.

Death and resurrection—

Date, iii. 481.

Deeds and words—

Committed to writing, ii. 368–376.

Early source of knowledge of, ii. 374.

in Missionary preaching, ii. 369 f., 377 ff.₂.

Origin of Paul's knowledge of, ii. 373, 384₆.

References to, by Paul, ii. 370 ff., 379₃, 379 ff.₄.

References to, in N.T. writings (Gospels excluded) for Christians outside of Palestine, ii. 379 f.₄.

References to, in N.T. writings (Gospels excluded) for Jewish Christians of Palestine, ii. 383 f.₅.

Tradition of Apostolic Church concerning, ii. 372.

written records of (Gospels excluded), ii. 372 ff.

Disciples in Asia Minor, iii. 358 f., 370₃.

Discourses in Matt., ii. 557 ff.

Early history in Luke, iii. 62 ff.

False teaching concerning, in Church of Colossæ, i. 467.

Familiar with Greek, i. 42.

Feasts during ministry of, iii. 285 f.₄.

Foreign words used by, i. 64₁₁.

Galilean ministry, in Fourth Gospel, iii. 260 f.

in Luke, iii. 106.

Healing acts, in Matt., ii. 544 f.

Healing work, in Luke, iii. 146 ff.

History of, agreement with O.T. prophecy in Matt., ii. 537 ff., 567₆.

in Hebrews, ii. 327, 329 f.

Intercourse with His disciples, in Matt., ii. 550.

Language of, ii. 573 f.

Jesus Christ—continued.

Language of—continued.

Aramaic, i. 2 f.

Bibliography, i. 14₁.

Last days, in Fourth Gospel, iii. 267 ff.

Last Passover, place of celebration, ii. 429, 447₇.

Last Supper—

Persons present, iii. 214, 227 f.₁₂.

Matthew's acquaintance with, ii. 507 f., 524₂.

Name, in Pauline Epistles, ii. 353 f.

Names in Revelation, iii. 434₃, 5.

Origin, Jewish suspicion concerning, ii. 536, 538, 563₃.

the Paschal Lamb, iii. 276 f., 293₁₃.

Passion—

in Fourth Gospel, iii. 270 ff.

in Synoptics, iii. 278 f.

Passion and Resurrection—

History in Matt., ii. 554 ff.

Passovers in ministry of, iii. 167 f.

Predicts destruction of Jerusalem, iii. 156 f.

Public ministry, length of, iii. 167 f.

Relation of disciples to, ii. 463 f., 465 f.

Relation to Jewish Law, in Luke, iii. 91₂₂.

Relatives of, iii. 101, 135₉.

Resurrection—

Date, Fourth Gospel, iii. 281.

Synoptics, iii. 278.

in missionary preaching, ii. 369.

Sayings, how cited, ii. 388.

Significance in Luke, iii. 70 ff.

in Paul's doctrine, i. 509 ff.

Teaching—

Disciples and the Jewish Law, ii. 586 f.

Eschatology, i. 224₄, 253₁₁.

False Christs, i. 228.

in John—

Significance of Miracles, iii. 299 f., 303 ff.

in Luke—

Poverty, iii. 72 ff.

Wealth, iii. 72 ff.

in Matt. ii. 542 ff.

the Gospel and the Gentiles, ii. 587 f.₁.

Temptation—

Account in Luke, iii. 111, 137₁₆.

in Matt., iii. 111, 137₁₆.

Title, in Luke, iii. 91₂₁.

Titles, in John, iii. 308 ff., 316, 326₂, 3.

Jesus Christ—continued.Transfiguration, ii. 204, 215 f.₆.

References to, in 2 Peter, ii. 216 ff.

Trial, iii. 270 ff., 352 f.₁₂.

Visits in Jerusalem, iii. 167 f.

Words of—

Relation of instruction in the Early Christian Church to,
ii. 370 f.

see also Deeds and words.

Work—

According to Mark, ii. 460 f.

in Galilee, ii. 541 f.

in Jerusalem, ii. 553 f.

Jesus Justus, i. 64₁₀, 441 f., 450₄, 494;
ii. 371.

Jesus, the son of Sirach, i. 6.

Jews—

Usage and meaning of term, ii. 306 f.₄.Jew and Gentile; equality of, in Epistle to the Romans, i. 372 ff.₄.Jewish Christian Communities in Egypt, ii. 357 f.₄.Jewish Christianity of Post-Apostolic Age, i. 138.

Jewish Christians—

in Church of Colossæ, i. 463 ff.

Jewish Epitaphs in Rome, i. 67₁₃, 67₁₄.

Jewish Greek, i. 54-57.

Jewish Law—

Attitude of Jesus toward, ii. 586 f.₁.Jewish Literature, foreign words in, i.
64₁₁.

Jews—

Expelled from Rome, iii. 466 f.

in Asia Minor, i. 47.

in Crete, ii. 52₁.in Egypt, i. 47; ii. 357 f.₄.in Galatia, i. 177, 192₆.in Jerusalem, Letters of, to other Jewish communities, i. 144, 151₈.

in Philippi, i. 522 f.

in the Province of Asia, i. 449₂.in Rome, i. 47₁, 67₁₃.Language used by, in time of Christ,
i. § 1.Palestinian, Greek influence on, i.
35 ff.Proper names of, i. 63₁₀.Synagogue services, i. 212₈.

Use of Greek, i. § 2.

Jezebel, the prophetess, ii. 292₁₈; iii.
424 f.

Johannine Writings—

see John, Epistles of, Gospel of,
Writings of—

John—

Use of name, iii. 433₁.Alleged meeting with Cerinthus, iii.
192, 204₂₄.

at trial of Jesus, iii. 271.

Author of Johannine writings, traditional, iii. 178 ff., 199₉, 10₇.Identity, iii. 180 f., 199 f.₁₀.Biographical notes, iii. 175, 191, 194 f.₂.

in Synoptics, iii. 187 f.

Clement on, iii. 205₂₆.Death, iii. 194 f.₂.Various accounts, iii. 193 f.,
205 f._{27, 28}.Designation, in Mark, ii. 490 f.,
505_{5a}.Disciples of, iii. 175 f., 191, 194 f.₂.Exile on Patmos, iii. 201 f.₁₄, 408 f., 420₁.Family, references in Fourth Gospel to, iii. 210 ff., 222.in Asia Minor, iii. 358 f., 370₃.Inferences concerning, from Johannine Epistles, iii. 190 f.Jesus' prophecy concerning, iii. 242-247.Mother of, iii. 187 f., 190, 204₂₁.References to, in Fourth Gospel, iii.
189 f.Testimony of, to Mark's Gospel, ii.
501.Various stories about, iii. 205₂₆.

Writings of—

Tradition concerning, iii. 174-206.

John, Acts of, ii. 449₆.on Transfiguration, ii. 218₆.

John, Epistles of—Antichrist in, i. 228.

Author, iii. 184 ff.

John, First Epistle of, iii. 355-374.

Antichrist in, iii. 364 f., 371₅.

Author, iii. 356 ff., 368 f.

Character and form, iii. 355 f.

Christology, iii. 366 f.

Date, iii. 369.

Epistolary character, ii. 313.

Ethical admonitions in, iii. 361 ff.

False teachers of, iii. 363-368.

Introduction, ii. 313.

Readers, iii. 356, 363, 369 f.₁.Relation to Fourth Gospel, iii. 368, 373₉.Witness of Papias to, iii. 184, 202 f.₁₅.

Witness of Polycarp to, iii. 184.

John, Second and Third Epistles of,
iii. 374-384.

John, Second and Third Epistle of—

continued.

Author, iii. 378, 380.

View of Dionysius, iii. 185 f.

View of Eusebius, iii. 186, 203₁₈.View of Jerome, iii. 186, 203₁₈.View of Origen, iii. 185, 203₁₈.

Canon, iii. 185.

Circulation, iii. 184 f.

Date, iii. 380.

Length, iii. 378, 382₇.Style, iii. 378, 382₇.

John, Second Epistle of, iii. 378–380,

382 ff.₇₋₉.

Readers, iii. 379.

John, Third Epistle of, iii. 374–378,

381 f.₁₋₆.

Addressee, iii. 374 ff.

Criticism—

Bibliography, iii. 381₁.

John, Gospel of—

Aramaic and Hebrew words in, iii.
340, 353₁₃.

Author—

An eyewitness, iii. 209, 219, 221, 228₁₄, 336 ff., 349 f.₈.

Relation to Jesus, iii. 343 f.

Testimony of the Gospel to, iii.
207–232.View of Irenæus, iii. 254₆.

View of Alogi, ii. 389.

Character, iii. 299–307.

Chronology of Passion History in,
iii. 273–283, 293–298₁₂₋₁₇.Date, iii. 334 f., 349₆.Witnesses for, iii. 198₈.Disciples, items about the, in, iii.
224₄.Discourses of Jesus in, compared with discourses in the Syn-optics, iii. 344, 354₁₇.Discourses of Jesus in, trustworthiness, iii. 344 f., 354 f.₁₇₋₁₈.External evidence for, iii. 174, 194₁.

Galilean ministry in, iii. 260 f.

Genuineness, iii. 335–345, 349–
355₇₋₁₈.Arguments against, iii. 336 f.,
349 f.₈.Bibliography, iii. 349₇.Geographical references in, iii. 340, 351 f.₁₁.Greek style, iii. 340, 353₁₄.

Heb. translation of, ii. 519 f.

Influence in Early Church literature, iii. 176–178.Integrity, iii. 333 f., 345 ff.₁₋₅.John, Gospel of—continued.

Jesus, last days of, in, iii. 267 ff.

Jesus, titles of, in, iii. 308 ff., 316,
326_{2, 3}.Narrative style of, iii. 337 ff., 350₉.

Origin—

Canon Mur. on, iii. 178 f., 197₆.Clem. Alex. on, iii. 178, 197₅.Irenæus on, iii. 179, 197₇.Tradition of, iii. 179 f., 197 f.₄.

Original material in, iii. 269 f.

O.T. citations in, iii. 340, 354₁₅.O.T. Prophecy in, iii. 330 f.₁₀.Papias on, in Latin fragment, iii.
196 f.₄.Papias, testimony of, to, iii. 178, 196₃.

Peculiarity, iii. 335 f.

Political references in, iii. 340, 352₁₂.Prologue, iii. 312 ff., 327₄, 327 ff.₅.

Purpose, iii. 207 f.

Alleged, iii. 275.

Purpose and Method, iii. 299–323.

Readers, iii. 207 f., 299, 323 ff.

Acquaintance with the Gospel history, iii. 254 ff., 280.Addressed, iii. 207, 223₁.Relation of I John to, iii. 368, 373₉.Relation of, to Gospel of Mark, ii.
444.

Relation to Philo, iii. 317 f.

Relation to the Synoptic Gospels, iii. 254–298, 306 f.Bibliography, iii. 283₁.Relation to traditions concerning Jesus' deeds and words current in Apostolic Church, ii.
372.Supplementary Chapter, iii. 232– 254.

Author, iii. 234 ff.

Date, iii. 240.

Early witnesses to, iii. 234, 250 f.₂.Language, compared with chs. i.– xx., iii. 233, 249₁.

Origin and date, iii. 247 f.

Relation to chs. i.–xx., iii. 233– 236.Synoptic Gospels presupposed in,
iii. 254–264, 280, 284₂.

Text—

Changes in, iii. 333, 345₁.

Disarrangements in—View of Spitta, iii. 334, 347 f.₅.Glosses, iii. 333 f., 345 f.₂.Integrity, iii. 333 f., 345 ff.₁₋₅.

John, Gospel of—continued.Text—continued.Interpolations in, iii. 334, 346 f.₃.Later elements, iii. 334, 347₄.

Theology—

Faith, 305 ff.

Jesus—

Humanity, iii. 318 ff.

Incarnation, iii. 310 f.

Knowledge, iii. 319.

= Logos, iii. 312–321, 327₅.

Messiah, iii. 308 f.

Pre-existence, iii. 311 f.

Son of God, iii. 309 ff.

Logos, the, iii. 312–321, 327 ff.₄₋₈.

origin of term, iii. 314–318.

“Logos doctrine,” iii. 312 f., 327₄.

Use of Synoptic narratives, iii. 264 f.

Use of “we” in, iii. 208.

View of F. Chr. Baur, ii. 412.

View of G. E. Lessing, ii. 404.

John, Writings of—

Author—

(alleged) Cerinthus, ii. 389; iii.

177, 200₁₁.(traditional), iii. 199 f.₁₀.View of Alogi, iii. 181, 199₉, 200₁₁.View of Can. Mur., iii. 199₉.View of Delff, iii. 230 ff.₁₇.View of Heracleon, iii. 199₉.View of Irenæus, iii. 199₉.View of Üchtritz, iii. 230 ff.₁₇.Carping criticism of, iii. 430 f., 434₄.

Date, iii. 186.

Greek of, iii. 432 f., 435_{5, 6}.Logos Doctrine, iii. 312 f., 327 f.₄,431, 434 f.₅.

Origin, iii. 175.

Tradition concerning, iii. 174–206.

“John,” Syriac “History of, iii. 202₁₄.

John the Baptist—

Disciples, iii. 322 f., 331 f.₁₂, 368.in Fourth Gospel, iii. 255 f., 283 f.₂.

Luke’s account, iii. 62 ff.

Preaching, ii. 539 f.

Reference to, in Mark’s Gospel, ii.

460.

Teaching—

Kingdom of Heaven, ii. 539 f., 568_{8, 10}.

Work of, in Fourth Gospel, iii. 321 f., 331₁₁.

John of Ephesus, ii. 435 ff.; iii. 428 f.

John Mark—

see Mark.

John, the Presbyter, ii. 394, 435 f.,

451 ff.₁₃.John, the Presbyter—continued.Alleged author Johannine writings, iii. 230 ff.₁₇.Identity, ii. 435 ff., 451 f.₁₃.

View of Eusebius, ii. 436 f.

Papias, witness of, to, ii. 437 f., 453₁₄.Witness to Mark’s Gospel, ii. 435 ff., 453₁₄.

Joseph—

Davidic descent, ii. 533 f.

Josephus—

Antiquities—

Christian interpolations, i. 142.

Dedication of, iii. 81₂.Relation of Jude and 2 Peter to, ii. 291₁₄.

Bell. Jud.—

Language of, i. 9 f., 26₁₁.Title of, iii. 81₁.Contr. Apion, dedication of, iii.
81₂.

in Rome, iii. 474 f.

Knowledge of Greek, i. 63₉; iii. 94, 130₂.Knowledge of Luke’s work, iii. 134₇.

on Felix and Festus, iii. 469 ff.

on Hellenes, i. 58₂.on John the Baptist, iii. 134₇.

on Judas, the Galilean, iii. 97.

on Quirinius, iii. 96 f., 134₇.on the Zealots, iii. 92₂₆.Relation to Luke’s writings, iii. 99– 100, 129–134₁₋₇.Relation to religious life of his time,
iii. 134₇.

Trustworthiness, iii. 451.

Use of Hebrew and Aramaic, i.
26_{11, 12}.Use of term Hebrew, i. 26₁₂.

Writings of—

Date, iii. 94 f.

Greek of, i. 56.

Judah the Nasi, i. 22₄, 62₉.

Judaizers—

in Galatia, i. 166 ff., 177 f., 182 f.

Success in Galatia, i. 169.

Judas Barsabas, i. 207 f.₁; ii. 255₁.Judas, Bishop of Jerusalem, ii. 255 f.₁, 284₁.

Judas, the Galilean, iii. 96, 97 ff.

Judas (of) James, ii. 255₁; iii. 213,
224₄.Judas Iscariot, ii. 255₁; iii. 213, 224₄, 351₁₁.

Jude = Judas—

the persons so named in the N.T., ii.
238, 255 f.₁.

- Jude, i. 105.
 Biographical notes, ii. 240 ff.
 Brother of Jesus, i. 104; ii. 238 f., 256₂.
 Tradition concerning, ii. 268.
 Grandsons of, ii. 240, 292₁₅.
 Relation to readers of his Epistle, ii. 241, 242 f.
- Jude, Epistle of, ii. 238-262.
 Author, ii. 238 f., 255₁, 256₂.
 Canonicity, ii. 263.
 Date, ii. 254 f., 286₈.
 False teachers, ii. 243-252, 257₄, 292 f.₁₅.
 Character, ii. 279-283.
 Genuineness, ii. 262-293.
 Proof of, ii. 268 ff.
 Suspensions concerning the, ii. 283 f.₁.
- Libertines of, ii. 244.
 Not pseudepigraphic, ii. 262 f.
 Purpose, ii. 241 f., 256 f.₃.
 Relation to the Antiquities of Josephus, ii. 291₁₄.
 Relation to Assumption of Moses, ii. 269, 288₇.
 Relation to Book of Enoch, ii. 269 f., 286 ff.₇.
 Relation to literary works after 70 A.D., ii. 279, 291 f.₁₄.
 Relation to 2 Peter, ii. 211₁, 285₄.
 Various hypotheses of, ii. 264-268.
 Traces in literature of the early Church, ii. 284 f.₃.
 Use of Pauline writings, ii. 278 f.
 Use of prophecy of 2 Peter, ii. 250.
- Junius, i. 391, 418₂₃.
- Justification—
 by faith, i. 126 ff., 129 ff.₁, 132₂.
 by works, i. 126 ff., 129 ff.₁.
- Justin, i. 135₆; iii. 327₄.
 on the Fourth Gospel, iii. 177, 182.
 on Pilate, iii. 352 f.₁₂.
 on relation of Mark to preaching of Peter, ii. 450₁₂.
 on Simon Magus, ii. 168, 172.
 on the Gospels, ii. 389.
 on the resurrection, ii. 129₁₇.
- Kepha, ii. 219 f.
- Kingdom of heaven—in Matt., ii. 540, 568₈ 10.
- Korah, ii. 281.
 in the Epistle of Jude, ii. 244 f., 257 f.₅.
- Laodicea, i. 448 f.₂, 452₃.
 Church of, ii. 138.
 Founded by Epaphras, i. 441, 449 f.₃.
 Relation to Paul, i. 460 f.
- Laodicea, Council of, i. 477₆.
- Laodiceans, Epistle to the, i. 160, 249₅, 480, 488₂, 499 f., 503, 535₂; ii. 131₂₁, 285₅, 295, 306₂.
- Latin and Greek words used by Jesus, i. 41.
- Latin technical terms—
 Used by Jews in Palestine, ii. 489.
- Laying on of hands, ii. 6, 23₅, 91 f., 98 f.
- Lazarus, iii. 262 f.
- Lebbæus, ii. 255₁, 522 f.₁.
- Lectionaries, iii. 36₁₆.
- Leontopolis—
 Jewish temple in, ii. 333, 341₁₃.
- Letter writing (address, style, greeting), i. 77 f.₂.
- Leucius, iii. 88₁₇.
 Account of death of John, iii. 193 f., 206₂₈.
 Knowledge of Fourth Gospel, iii. 177.
- Levi, ii. 506, 522 f.₁.
 Matthew identical with, ii. 506 f.
 see also Matthew.
- Libertines—
 in Corinthian Church, ii. 280 ff.
 of Jude, ii. 244, 278, 279 ff. of 2 Peter, ii. 225 f., 278, 279 ff.
 of Revelation, iii. 418.
- Linus, ii. 20₂.
 First Bishop of Rome, ii. 167₄.
- Literature, Early Christian—
 Character of, ii. 367 f.
- Logia, the, ii. 416, 579.
 of Matthew, ii. 509 ff.
- Logos, the, iii. 223 f.₃; iii. 312-321, 327 ff.₄₋₈, 431, 434₅.
 Origin of term, iii. 314-318.
- Logos Doctrine—
 in Johannine writings, iii. 431, 434 f.₅.
- Lois and Eunice, ii. 22 f.₄.
- Lord's Prayer—
 Early use of, ii. 603.
 in Luke and Matt., ii. 559.
 Variant forms, ii. 603.
- Lord's Supper, the—Heathen slanders concerning (Pliny), iii. 70.
 Ignatius on, and love feasts, ii. 236₃.
- Institution—
 Date, view of Tübingen School, iii. 275, 293₁₃.

Lord's Supper, the—*continued.*Institution—continued.

in Luke, iii. 69 f.

Text of, iii. 39 ff.¹⁹.Codex D, iii. 40¹⁹.Didache, iii. 40¹⁹.Latin MSS, iii. 40¹⁹.Marcion, iii. 39¹⁹.Syriac versions, iii. 40¹⁹.Persons present, iii. 214, 227 f.¹².Place, ii. 447⁷, 492, 493.

Variant forms, ii. 603.

Meaning of the Church observance,
iii. 276 f.

Observance—

Date—Anti-Quartodecimans, iii.
274 f.Churches of Asia Minor, iii.
273 f.

John (apostle), iii. 275 ff.

Paul, iii. 277, 279.

Quartodecimans, iii. 273 ff.

Western Church, iii. 277.

Presupposed in Fourth Gospel, iii.
268 f.Lucian of Samosata, use of term Syrian,
i. 23₄.Lucius of Cyrene, ii. 505₅; iii. 15, 28 f.₆.Luke identified with, iii. 5₄.Luke (the evangelist), i. 440, 450 f.₄.Acquaintance with material in Acts, iii. 148 ff.Author of Luke and Acts, iii. 1, 3₁.

Biographical notes, iii. 51.

Biography of, sources for, iii. 1 f.

Identified with Lucius (Rom. xvi. 21),
iii. 5₄.Identified with Lucius of Cyrene,
iii. 5₄.

in Philippi, iii. 56.

in Rome, iii. 56, 102.

in Rome, with Paul, ii. 2f.

Knowledge of events recorded in Acts, iii. 127 ff.Knowledge of Mark and his Gospel,
iii. 101 f.

Knowledge of written Gospels, iii. 48 f.

Nationality, view of Jerome, iii. 4f.₂.Native of Antioch, iii. 2, 5₄.

Sources used by, iii. 94-142.

Tradition concerning, and his work,
iii. 1-8.Traditions concerning, iii. 6 f.₆.Use of names of Roman Provinces,
i. 174 f., 186 f.₄.Luke, Gospel of (see also Historical Work of)—Luke, Gospel of—*continued.*Authorship ascribed to Luke by Early Church, iii. 1, 3₁.Chronological order of events lacking, iii. 64 ff., 89 f.¹⁹.Compared with Gospel of Matt., ii.
603 f.

Dedication, iii. 42 f.

Dependence on Mark, iii. 49 f., 101-107, 135 ff.¹⁰⁻¹³.Hebraisms in, iii. 104 f., 135¹¹.Israelitish tone of, iii. 91²².

Jesus—

Galilean ministry of, iii. 106.

Healing works of, iii. 146 ff.

Joyful spirit in, iii. 76 f., 92²⁵.

Marcion's edition, iii. 22.

Parallels to Mark, iii. 102 f.

Parallels to Matt., iii. 110.

Pragmatism, iii. 63 f.

Prologue, scope of, iii. 53-61, 85 f.¹⁰.Proper names in, iii. 90²⁰.Prophecy of destruction of Jerusalem in, iii. 156 ff.

Purpose, iii. 42 ff.

Relation to Matthew, iii. 107-112.

Relation to oral preaching of Paul,
ii. 299.

Relation of, to Paul, ii. 387 f.

Relation to Paul's epistles, iii. 119 f.

Sources, iii. 50 ff., 94-142.

View of Feine, iii. 137¹⁷.Source of material peculiar to, iii.
113 f.Style, compared with Mark, iii. 104 f., 135¹⁰, 136¹³.

Text, history of, iii. 24.

Title lacking, iii. 41 f., 80 f.₁.

Two-fold recension of—Theory of Blass, iii. 9, 22.

Criticism of, iii. 22 ff.

Western text, iii. 22 ff., 33-41¹²⁻¹⁹.

Luke, Historical work of—

Aramaic and Hebrew words in, iii.
108, 136¹², 137¹⁴.

Author, iii. 95.

and date, iii. 142-165.

Familiarity with Greek technical medical terms, iii. 146 ff., 160 ff.₅.

Chronology of, iii. 97 ff.

Date, iii. 3, 7 f.₇, 95, 155 ff., 164 f.¹¹.Israelitish tone in, iii. 70, 91²².

Jesus, Teaching concerning, iii. 70 ff.

Language and style, iii. 79, 92²⁴.Medical terms in, iii. 82 f.₈, 146 f., 160 f.₅.

Luke, Historical work of—continued.

- Place of composition, iii. 7 f.₇, 159, 165₁₂.
- Plan, iii. 59–68.
- Preface, plan and purpose, iii. 41 ff.
- Proper names in, iii. 68, 90 f.₂₀.
- Purpose, iii. 42 ff., 61 f.
- Reference to contemporary events in, iii. 99.
- References to political history, iii. 68.
- Relation to Josephus, iii. 94–100, 129–134₁₋₇.
- Relation to Josephus—
 - Krenkel on, iii. 129 f.₁.
- Third Book, iii. 58 ff., 67 f., 76.
- Title lacking, iii. 41 f., 80 f.₁.
- Unity of, iii. 77 ff., 92₂₈.
- Lycaonia, i. 174 ff.
 - Cities of, 184₃.
- Lydia, i. 523, 533₁.
- Lysanias of Abilene, iii. 165₁₁.
- Lysias, iii. 101.
- Lystra, i. 191 f.₅, 6.
 - Church organisation in, ii. 23₅.

Maccabean coins, i. 25₈, 37.

Maccabean revolt, i. 36 f.

Macedonia, i. 186₄, 211 f.₄, 532₁.

Magi, the—

- Date of the visit to Bethlehem, early discussion, ii. 527₅.

Malta, iii. 138 f.₂₀.

Man of Sin [Lawlessness], i. 226 f., 229, 238 f.₉.

Mandæans, iii. 332₁₂.

Maranatha, i. 304₁₂.

Marcion—

Apostolicon of, i. 152, 156 f., 491.

Date, i. 156 f.

Edition of Luke, iii. 22.

Gospel of, ii. 391, 445₄; iii. 89₁₈.

Portions of Fourth Gospel in, iii. 177.

on the Gospels, ii. 390 f.

Teachings, ii. 118, 130₁₈.

Text of Romans, i. 379 f., 396 ff.₃.

View concerning title of Epistle to the Ephesians, i. 480 f., 488₃.

View of Galatians, i. 243.

Marcionite Gospel, ii. 385₇.

Marcosians—

Field of activity, i. 135₆.

Mark, i. 441 f., 450₄.

Alleged author of Revelation, iii. 428 f., 433 f.₂.

Biographical notes, ii. 427–431, 445–448₁₋₈.

Mark—continued.

- Called “stump-fingered” (κολοβοδάκτυλος), ii. 428, 445 f.₄.
- Canon Muratori on, ii. 428 f., 446₅.
- Family, ii. 487.
- Founder of Church in Alexandria and Egypt, ii. 159.
- Hebrew name, ii. 445₁.
- House of, ii. 427, 429, 447 f.₇.
- Household of, ii. 493 f.
- in Antioch, ii. 429, 430; iii. 479.
- in Asia Minor, ii. 148 f., 431.
- in Cyprus, ii. 430.
- in Egypt, ii. 431, 448₈.
- in Rome, ii. 601 f.
- in Rome, with Paul and Peter, ii. 431.
- Knowledge of the Gospel history, ii. 604 f.
- Knowledge of Jewish laws and customs, ii. 488.
- Missionary activity, ii. 429 f., 434.
- Mother of, ii. 427.
- Papias on, ii. 427.
- Papias on relation of, to Peter, ii. 438 ff.
- Peter, relation of, to Mark—
 - John the Presbyter on, ii. 442 f.
- Related to Barnabas, ii. 428.
- Relation to Paul, ii. 148 f.
- Relation to Paul and Barnabas, ii. 427, 429 ff., 434.
- Relation to Peter, ii. 148, 394, 427, 432, 434, 445₂.
- Mark and his Gospel—
 - Tradition regarding, ii. 427–456.
- Mark, Gospel of—
 - Agreement between Gospel of Matt. and, ii. 603, 608, 612₁.
 - Analysis, ii. 462–467.
 - Aramaic words in, ii. 487 f., 502₁.
 - Author, ii. 493 f.
 - Relation of, to youth of xiv. 51, ii. 491 f.
 - Traditional view, ii. 487.
 - Canon Muratori on, ii. 441 f.
 - Chronological order lacking, ii. 498 f.
 - Comparison of, with the tradition, ii. 487–506.
 - Conclusion, ii. 467 ff., 483 f.₅, 6.
 - Abrupt, explanation of, ii. 479 f.
 - Comparisons of the conclusions, ii. 470 f.
 - in Textus Receptus, witnesses for, ii. 467 f., 483 f.₅, Freer MS.
 - Original, ii. 476 ff.
 - Rohrbach on, ii. 485 f.₈.

Mark, Gospel of—*continued.*Conclusion—continued.

Shorter form, witnesses for, ii.
468 ff., 484₆.

Witness of Gospel of Peter to, ii.
483₅.

Date, ii. 479 f., 602.

Dependence on Matthew, ii. 602, 607 ff., 612 ff.₂.

Dependence on Peter, iii. 49.

Direct discourse in, ii. 608 f.

Early judgment concerning, ii. 439 f.

Greek of, Hebraic colouring, ii. 488,
502₂.

Incomplete, iii. 50.

John, the Presbyter, witness of, to,
ii. 435.

Known early in Asia Minor, ii. 444.

Latin technical terms in, ii. 489, 503 f.₄.

Length, ii. 479, 487₁₀.

Literary character, ii. 606 f., 614₂.

Luke dependent on, ii. 492; iii. 49 f.

Method in presentation of Gospel history, ii. 441 f.

Narratives, character of, ii. 461 f., 481 ff.₄.

Omits parts of the Gospel history, ii.
604 ff.

Origin—

View of Clement of Alexandria, ii. 432 f., 448 f.₉, 449 f.₁₀.

View of Eusebius, ii. 432 f., 449 f.₁₀.

View of Irenæus, ii. 433.

O.T. citations—

Form, ii. 609 ff., 616 f.₄, ₅, ₆.

Papias, witness of, ii. 434, 435, 438 ff., 449 f.₁₀, 450₁₁, 485₈.

Parables, ii. 464 f.

Passages, parallel with Luke, iii. 102 f.

Place of composition, ii. 450₁₁.

Traditional view, ii. 434, 449 f.₁₀, 487.

Plan, ii. 604 ff.

Purpose, ii. 459, 461, 583, 604 ff.

References to Peter in, ii. 497 f., 506₉.

Relation of Gospel of John to, ii. 444.

Relation to Peter's discourses and preaching, ii. 387 f., 434 f., 450 f.₁₂, 495 ff., 501.

Justin on, ii. 450 f.₁₂.

Papias on, ii. 438 ff.

Relation to Luke, iii. 101–107,
135 ff._{10–13}.

Relation to Matthew, ii. 601–617.

Traditional view, ii. 601 f.

Septuagint used in, ii. 610 f.

Mark, Gospel of—continued.

Style, ii. 457, 461 f., 481 f.₄.

Compared with Luke, iii. 104 f., 135₁₀, 136₁₃.

Title, ii. 456–460, 480₁.

Title, plan and conclusion of, ii. 456– 487.

Used by Cerinthus, ii. 444.

Written for Western readers, ii. 489.

Mark, Writings of—View of F. Hitzig, ii. 423₈.

Marriage in early Church, ii. 95.

Patristic and modern views of, ii.
125 f.₁₀.

Mary (the Virgin)—

Davidic descent, iii. 36₁₆.

Reference to, in John, iii. 224₄ end.

Mary, mother of Mark, ii. 427.

Mary and Martha, iii. 262 f.

Matthew (Apostle), ii. 581, 584.

Biographical notes concerning, ii.
507 f.

Call of, ii. 507 f.

Confusion of name with Matthias, ii.
508, 524 f.₃.

Early acquaintance with Jesus, ii.
507 f., 524₂.

Identical with Levi, ii. 506 f.

Literary activity, Papias' witness to,
ii. 509 ff., 525 f.₄.

Names of the evangelist, ii. 506 f., 522 ff.₁.

Position in the lists of disciples, ii.
506, 522 ff.₁.

Tradition regarding, and his Gospel,
ii. 506–530.

Matthew, Gospel of—Agreements between Gospel of Mark and, ii. 603, 608, 612₁.

Analysis, ii. 533–556.

Author, ii. 506, 508 f., 581.

Knowledge of the Gospel history,
ii. 585, 600 f.₁₅.

Nationality, ii. 561 f.

Authorship, Apostolic—

Objections to, ii. 590 f.₆.

Traditional view—

Dogmatic objections to, ii. 582 ff.

Canonical, the, ii. 403.

Canonicity of, ii. 301.

Carried by Bartholomew into India,
ii. 385₇, 517, 528₇.

Character, ii. 556 f., 570 f.

Characterisations of, ii. 570₁₃.

Christian Church, conception of, in the, ii. 550 ff.

Compared with Luke, ii. 603 f.

Matthew, Gospel of—continued.

Compared with the tradition, ii. 570-601.

Contents, plan and purpose, ii. 531-570.

Date, ii. 392 ff., 522, 530₁₀, 571 ff., 588₂, 602.

Witness of Irenæus to, ii. 522.

"Doublets" in, ii. 581 f., 598 ff.₁₃.

Gospel of the Hebrews, relation to the Heb. Matt., ii. 518 f.

Gospel of the Nazarenes, relation to the Greek Matt., ii. 519.

Greek Matt., origin, ii. 514 f.

Relation to Aramaic original, ii. 576 ff., 591-597₇₋₁₁.

a translation, ii. 594 f.₁₀.

Translator of, ii. 517, 527₆, 575 f., 579 f.

Witnesses to the, ii. 515 f., 526 f.₈.

Greek Translation—

Date and place of, ii. 516 f.

Hebraisms in, ii. 576 ff., 591-597₇₋₁₁.

Hebrew Matt., the, ii. 511 f., 515 ff.

Disappearance of the, ii. 520 f.

in "India," ii. 517, 528₇.

Witness of Pantænus to, ii. 517 f.

Hebrew names in, Transcription of, ii. 598₁₂.

Hilgenfeld's view concerning, ii. 414, 586 f.₁.

Historical material in, ii. 559.

in Syrian Church, ii. 529₇.

Jesus, discourses of, in, ii. 557 ff., 584 f.

Literary character, ii. 606 f.

Narratives, Character of, ii. 583 f.

Original language, ii. 530₈, 573 f.

Epiphanius on, ii. 519.

Franz Delitzsch on, ii. 530₉.

Irenæus on, ii. 518, 528₇.

Jerome on, ii. 518 f., 529₇.

Origen on, ii. 517, 528₇.

Papias on, ii. 509 f., 517 f.

O.T. Citations—

Form, ii. 579 f., 596 f._{11, 12}, 611.

O.T. Prophecy in, ii. 537 ff.

Parallels to Luke, iii. 110.

Place of composition, ii. 571 ff., 590₆.

Purpose, ii. 544, 545, 560 f., 570₁₃, 583.

Readers, ii. 521 f., 528₇, 561 f.

Refrain in, ii. 598 f.₁₃.

Relation to Luke, iii. 107-112.

Relation to Mark, ii. 601-617.

Traditional view, ii. 601 f.

Septuagint in, ii. 610 f.

Matthew, Gospel of—continued.

Teaching—

Kingdom of heaven, ii. 540, 568_{8, 10}.

Parousia, ii. 571 f.

Title, ii. 531 ff.

Used by Epistle of Barnabas, ii. 515, 526 f.₅.

Matthias, ii. 508, 524 f.₃.

Medical language of Luke, iii. 82 f.₅, 146 f., 160 f.₅.

Menander, ii. 110, 129₁₇; iii. 349₇.

Mesopotamia—

Early missionary work in, ii. 163 f.₃.

Miletus, ii. 26₉.

Miracles, Significance in Fourth Gospel, iii. 299 f., 303 ff.

Missionary preaching, i. 285 ff.

Content, ii. 369-373, 377 ff.₁₋₆.

Crucifixion of Jesus, ii. 369.

Resurrection of Jesus, ii. 369, 377₁.

Words and deeds of Jesus, ii. 369 f., 377 ff.₂.

Scope, ii. 587 f.₁.

to Jews and proselytes in Palestine—content, ii. 369, 377₁.

to Jews of the diaspora and Gentiles—content, ii. 369, 377 ff.₂, 379₃.

Mnason, i. 66₁₂; iii. 18.

Modern Hebrew, works on, bibliography, i. 25₉.

Montanists, i. 405₉; ii. 302 f., 310 f.₁₁; iii. 177.

Moses, Assumption of—Quoted in Jude, ii. 269, 288₇.

Muratorian Canon, see Canon Muratori.

Muratorian Fragment, see Canon Muratori.

Mystery of Lawlessness, i. 229, 236₃, 251₈.

Naassenes, ii. 116, 126₁₁, 129₁₇.

Names in Philemon, Discussion of, i. 458₇.

Narcissus, i. 392, 419₂₄.

Nathanael, i. 31₁₆; ii. 517, 524₁, 528₇; iii. 210, 225₆, 302.

Navigation, Regulations in 1st century, iii. 454.

Nazarenes, ii. 74, 403, 518.

Nazarenes (4th century), ii. 264.

Nazarenes, Aramaic Gospel of the—see Apocryphal Gospels.

Nazareth, ii. 539.

- Nazarites—
 Gospel used by, i. 13.
 Jewish zeal, i. 44 f.
 Language, i. 13.
 Vow of abstinence from wine, i. 473₄.
- Neapolis (in Macedonia), i. 533.
- Nereus, i. 420₂₄.
- Nero, iii. 410, 422₄, 469 ff.
 Legend concerning (and Rev.), iii. 436, 443 ff., 447₃.
 Legend concerning (and 2 Thess.), i. 246 f., 250₇, 252₉, 10.
 Marriages, iii. 477.
 Persecution of Christians, ii. 57 f., 61 f., 68₅, 71, 76 f., 160, 170, 185, 347 f.
- New Testament Canon, composition of, i. 124.
- New Testament Canon of Theodore of Mopsuestia, i. 123.
- New Testament Times, Chronology, iii. 481 ff.
- New Testament Writings—Chronology, iii. 481 ff.
 Synchronisms with general history, Bibliography, iii. 450 f.
- Jewish origin, i. 57.
 Literary dependence in, ii. 603 ff.
 Names in, i. 29 ff.₁₆.
 Text of, iii. 12 f.
 History, iii. 22 f.
- N.T. Writings (Gospels excluded)— to Christians outside of Palestine, reference in, to the Gospel story, ii. 379 f.₄.
 to Jewish Christians in Palestine, references in, to the Gospel story, ii. 383 ff.₆.
- Nicodemus, iii. 302 f., 355₁₈.
- Nicolaus, Nicolaitans, i. 497, 515₄; ii. 110, 129₁₇, 283; iii. 179, 197₇, 417 ff., 426₁₁, 427₁₃.
 Teaching of, in the Churches of Asia Minor, ii. 292₁₅.
- Nicopolis, ii. 48 f., 53 f.₃.
- Novatian, ii. 303, 310 f.₁₁.
- Officers of the Early Church—Functions, ii. 96 ff.
 Qualifications, ii. 32 f., 90 ff.
- Old Latin Translation—
 Relation to original language of Gospel tradition, ii. 575.
- Old Testament Citations—in Fourth Gospel, iii. 340, 354₁₅.
 in Mark, ii. 609 ff., 616 f.₄, 5, 6.
 in Matthew, ii. 579 f., 596 f.₁₁, 12, 610 f.
 in Pauline epistles, ii. 52.
- O.T. oral translation of, i. 12, 23₄, 33₂₀.
- O.T. Prophecy—
 Fulfilled in Gospel history, iii. 330 f.₁₀.
- Onesimus, i. 439 f., 444, 446₁, 451 f.₈, 453 f., 456₅, 458₇, 494.
- Onesiphorus, ii. 2 f., 19, 20₁, 68₃, 86.
- Oral translation—in the Early Christian Church, ii. 511 ff.
 of O.T., i. 12, 23₄, 33₂₀.
- Origen, i. 69₁₆.
 Eusebius on, ii. 397₅.
 Latin sermons attributed to, ii. 303, 310 f.₁₁.
 on angelolatry of Jews, i. 475₆.
 on "Angels of the seven Churches," iii. 423₆.
 on chronological order of Gospels, ii. 392 f., 398 f.₆, 7.
 on Ephesians, i. 482, 488 f.₄.
 on Hebrews, ii. 299 ff., 309₇.
 author, ii. 308₅.
 on inscription of Acts xvii. 23, iii. 163₇.
 on Paul's missionary activity, ii. 74.
 on Peter's missionary activity, ii. 152₂.
 Text of Acts, iii. 10, 33₁₂.
 Text of 1 John iv. 3, iii. 371₆.
 Text of Rom., i. 379, 395, 406₁₁.
 Witness to 2 and 3 John, iii. 185, 203₁₈.
- Palestine—
 Christianising of, i. 93.
 Greek Cities in, i. 35 f.
 Greek language in, i. 35–46.
 Land of Israel, i. 75, 80₇.
 Ptolemy's division of, ii. 589₄.
- Pallas, iii. 470 ff.
- Pantænus—
 in India, ii. 517 f., 527₆.
 on authorship of Heb., ii. 298.
 Teacher of Clement, ii. 308₅.
- Papias—
 Biographical notes, ii. 526₄.
 Date, ii. 436, 515.
 Designation of Christ, iii. 203₁₅.
 Disciple of Aristion, ii. 473.
 Disciple of John, iii. 175.
 Fragment (Latin) on Fourth Gospel, iii. 196 f.₄.
 Fragments of, in Eusebius, ii. 435 ff., 451 ff.₁₃, 453 f.₁₄.
 Interpretation of Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13), ii. 163₃.

- Papias—continued.
 Interpretation of John's testimony to Mark's Gospel, ii. 501 f., 510 f. on Mark, ii. 394, 427, 434 ff., 449 f.₁₀, 450₁₁, 453₁₄, 485₈, 499.
 Witness to 1 Peter, ii. 173, 186₁.
 Witness to Gospels—
 View of Griesbach, ii. 405.
 View of Schleiermacher, ii. 411 f.
 Witness to John, iii. 178, 196₃.
 Witness to John vii. 53–viii. 11, iii. 346₃.
 Witness to Matthew, ii. 509 ff., 511 f., 525 f.₄.
 Witness to Revelation, iii. 182.
 Work of, the, ii. 436.
Parousia, ii. 222, 237 f.
 in Gospels, i. 224₄.
 in Matthew, ii. 571 f.
 in 2 Pet., ii. 273.
 in 1 Thess., i. 221 f.
 in Rev., iii. 396 f., 437 f.
 Reference to, in John xxi., iii. 243–247.
 Time of, ii. 230.
Parthia—
 Early missionary work in, ii. 163 f.₃.
Participial construction in N.T., ii. 595₁₀.
Passion History—
 in Fourth Gospel, iii. 270 ff.
 in Synoptics, iii. 278 f.
Passion and Resurrection of Jesus—
 History in Matthew, ii. 554 f.
Passover—
 Celebration of, iii. 282 f., 294₁₅, 296 ff.₁₇.
 Last, of Jesus—
 Place of celebration, ii. 429, 447₇, 492, 493.
Pastoral Epistles, ii. 1–133.
 Alleged interest in the organisation of the Church, ii. 93 f.
 Alleged late date, ii. 99–118.
 Baptismal formula in, ii. 119, 131₂₀.
 Comparison with pseudepigraphical literature, ii. 123₂.
 Date, ii. 118 f.
 ἐρεπιδιδάσκαλοι in, ii. 126₁₁.
 False teachers in, ii. 99 ff.
 Linguistic character, ii. 121 f., 131 ff.₂₁.
 Similarity of Romans to, i. 413₁₇.
 Term, meaning, ii. 55, 67₁.
 Unity of Christian doctrine and confession demanded in, ii. 119 ff.
Pastoral Epistles, ii. 1–133—continued.
 Not inconsistent with Paul's teaching, found elsewhere, ii. 119 ff.
Patmos, iii. 408 f., 420₁.
Patrobas, i. 420₂₄.
Paul—
 of Acts, iii. 152 f.
 Address of, in Acts xxi. 37 ff., i. 42 f., Age, i. 457₆.
 Alleged author of Hebrews, ii. 296, 298 ff., 302.
 Antioch, work in, date, iii. 458 f., 462 f.
 ("Apology") πρώτη ἀπολογία, ii. 7 f., 12 f.
 Apostle to the Gentiles, i. 353 f., 370 f.₂.
 Apostolic calling of, i. 353 f.
 Apostolic dignity, defence of, i. 289.
 Aramaic, language of, i. 48 ff., 57.
 Asia—
 Danger in, i. 309, 318₁, 321 f.
 Extent of work in, i. 449 f.₃.
 Asia, Churches of, intercourse with, during Roman imprisonment, ii. 16 f.
 Asia Minor, ii. 148 f.
 Athens, i. 205.
 Journey from Berea to, i. 214₇.
 Biographical notes, i. 48–54, 67₁₅; ii. 370 f.; iii. 455–480.
 Cæsarea, i. 443, 444 f., 451₅; ii. 16; iii. 473 f.
 Trial before Felix, date, iii. 476.
 Chronology of life and writings, iii. 481 ff.
 Churches founded by—Character of, ii. 136.
 in the provinces of Asia and Galatia, ii. 135 f.
 Churches of Colossæ and Laodicea relation to, i. 460 f.
 Churches under Paul's jurisdiction, ii. 11.
 Care of, i. 206, 462 f.
 Citizenship, i. 69₁₆; iii. 75 f.
 Close of career, ii. 54–84.
 Bibliography, ii. 67 f.₂.
 Collection journey (Acts xi. 30)—
 Date, iii. 456 f.
 Conversion, in Acts compared with Epistles, iii. 121.
 Corinth, first visit, i. 256 f.
 Second visit, i. 263, 271₁₂, 271 f.₁₃, 272₁₄.
 Krenkel's view of, i. 272₁₄.

Paul—*continued.*Corinth—continued.

Unrecorded visit, i. 307, 316₂, 327 f.

Work in, i. 232 f., 256 f., 259.

Corinth, Church of—Charges Paul with fickleness, i. 321 ff., 343 f.₂.

Lost correspondence with, i. 261, 270₉.

Date, i. 262.

Lost epistle of Paul to, i. 263 f., 307, 312 ff.₁, 327 f.

Identified with 1 Cor., i. 330 ff.

Lost letter of, to Paul, i. 325.

Crete, ii. 43 f., 106.

Death of, iii. 479 f.

Date, ii. 58.

see also Martyrdom.

Doctrine—

Antichrist, i. 226 ff.

Sources of, i. 227 ff., 236 f.₄₋₆.

Asceticism, ii. 332.

Church, i. 503 f.

ἐκκλησία in epistles, i. 504 f.

Eschatology, i. 253₁₁.

in 1 Thess., i. 221, 223 f.₄.

Justification, i. 124, 129 ff.₁, 132₂.

Misinterpretations of, ii. 275, 290₁₀.

Misunderstood by Gnostics, i. 125 f.

Significance of Christ in, i. 509 ff.

Ephesus, i. 194, 199₁; iii. 331₁₂.

Church of, and Paul, i. 483 f., 489 f.₅.

Epistles of—

Agreement of Acts with, iii. 150 f.

Circulation, ii. 275 f.

in the first century, iii. 125, 140₂₄.

Criticism of, Review, i. 152-164.

Date, i. 156 ff.

Development of thought in, i. 200 f.

Genuineness, i. 156-162.

Genuineness, Views regarding—

Bauer, i. 155, 163₅.

Baur, i. 154 f., 163₄.

Dutch School, i. 155 f., 163₅, 6.

Evanson, i. 154, 163₂.

Hitzig, i. 156, 163₆.

Marcion, i. 152, 155, 156 f.

Schleiermacher, i. 154, 163₃.

Semler, i. 156.

Tradition of Church, i. 152, 154.

Weisse, i. 156, 163₆.

Paul—*continued.*Epistles of—continued.

How written, i. 234₁, 249 f.₆.

Influence of, in Apostolic Church, i. 161 f.

Jesus, name for, in, ii. 353 f.

Jesus' words and deeds, reference to, ii. 370 ff., 379 ff._{3, 4}.

Lost Epistle to readers of 2 Peter, ii. 198 f., 209, 227, 274 f., 277.

Places where written, ii. 162₁.

Preliminary critical remarks, i. 152-164.

Readers, ii. 227 ff.

Relation of Acts to, iii. 118-126, 139 f._{21, 23}.

Relation to James, i. 132₃.

Relation to 1 Peter, i. 161.

Spurious, i. 160 f., 164₇.

Style and thought of, ii. 353.

the First Roman imprisonment, i. 439-563.

Thought, form, and language of, compared with that of Hebrews, ii. 353 f.

Three oldest, i. 152-255.

Titles, i. 486.

"We" in, i. 203, 209 f.₃.

Writing of the, i. 172 f.₄.

Epistolary style, characteristics, i. 500, 516 f.₇.

Family of, i. 68 f.₁₆.

Flight from Damascus—

Date, iii. 455.

Galatia, i. 165 ff., 171₂.

Illness, i. 181.

Ramsey's theory, i. 171₂.

Visits to the churches of, i. 165, 171₃.

Gospel, i. 353 f., 357 f., 412 f.₁₇; ii. 385₇.

Origin, ii. 352.

Preached, ii. 370 ff., 379₃.

Greek language and literature—

Knowledge of, i. 51 f., 70₁₈, 71₁₉.

Heb. O.T., knowledge of, i. 51, 52, 70₁₇.

History of—

Data in, iii. 452 f.

Synchronisms with general history, ii. 455-480.

James' doctrine, attitude to, i. 124, 129 ff.₁, 132₃.

Jerusalem Collection, i. 200₁.

Jesus' life, knowledge of facts of—Source, ii. 370 f., 373, 384₆.

Luke's Gospel, relation to, ii. 387 f.

Paul—continued.

- Mark, relation to, ii. 148 f., 427, 429 f., 445₂.
- Martyrdom, ii. 165 ff.₄.
- Date, ii. 66.
- Early tradition concerning, ii. 62, 78 ff.₉.
- Not a victim of Nero's persecution, ii. 57 f., 68₅.
- Patristic testimony to, ii. 75 ff.₈.
- Testimony of Clement to, ii. 61 f.
- see Martyrdom of Peter and Paul.
- Missionary Career—
- Journeys in Asia Minor, Ramsay's view, i. 188 f.₄.
- First journey, i. 176 f.
- Churches founded during, i. 176 f., 191 f.₅.
- in Acts compared with Epistles, iii. 122.
- Second journey in Galatia—
- in Acts compared with Epistles, iii. 122 f.
- Method of work in cities, i. 265 f.₄.
- Work in Asia Minor, ii. 137 f.
- Missionary preaching, i. 237₆, 462, 471₁.
- Content, ii. 370 ff., 379₃, 379 ff.₄.
- "Gospel of Christ" in, ii. 370 ff.
- Jesus' words and deeds in, reference to, ii. 370 ff., 379 ff.₃, 4.
- Principles, i. 285 ff.
- Names, iii. 127, 140₂₅.
- Origin, i. 70₁₆.
- Nephew of, i. 50.
- Peter, parallelisms with, in Acts, iii. 151 f., 163₉.
- Pharisaism, i. 50, 68₁₅; iii. 140₂₃.
- Philippi, i. 522 ff.
- Church of, communications with, i. 524 ff.
- Lost correspondence with, i. 526 f., 535 f.₃.
- Relation to, i. 212₅.
- Philippians, Epistle to the—
- Condition when writing, i. 527 ff., 539-556; ii. 13.
- Roman law; acquaintance with, in Galatians, i. 201 f.₁.
- Rome—
- Arrival in, iii. 478.
- Imprisonment, First, ii. 1 f.
- Coptic fragments of the Acts of Paul on, ii. 83 f.

Paul—continued.

- Rome—continued.
- Imprisonment—continued.
- Evidences for activity after, ii. 59 f.
- Tradition concerning, in Clement of Rome, ii. 60 ff., 68 ff.₆.
- Release from, ii. 55 f.
- Expectation of, in Philippians, ii. 55 f.
- Probable order of events succeeding, ii. 14 ff., 66 f.
- Testimony to, ii. 63 ff.
- Imprisonment, Second, ii. 67.
- Intended visit to, i. 367 ff., 377₁₁.
- Purpose of, i. 355 ff., 371 f.₃.
- Renewal of charges against Paul in, ii. 57, 68₄.
- Residence in, i. 444 f., 451₇, 539 ff.; ii. 2 ff.; iii. 57 f.
- Trial, i. 540 ff., 542 ff.; ii. 4 ff., 13 f.
- Date, ii. 57 f.
- Voyage to, iii. 454.
- Rome, Church of—
- Acquaintance with, i. 352, 428.
- Sanhedrin letter to, language, i. 10.
- Septuagint, Quotations from, i. 52.
- Sister of, i. 50.
- Spain, ii. 161 f.
- Journey to, ii. 10, 12, 61 ff.
- Testimony of Acts of Paul to, ii. 63.
- Testimony of Acts of Peter to, ii. 63.
- Testimony of Canon Muratori to, ii. 62 ff., 73 ff.₇.
- Proposed visit to, i. 367 ff., 377₁₁.
- Supernatural leadings of, i. 555₄; iii. 16 f.
- Thessalonica, i. 203.
- Timothy, relation to, ii. 34 f.
- Titus, communication of, to Paul, ii. 46 f.
- Training, i. 53 f., 67 f.₁₅; ii. 22 f.₄.
- Troas, ii. 16 f.
- Use of names of Roman Provinces, i. 175, 185 ff.₄.
- Use of plural by, i. 354, 369₁.
- Use of terms apostles and prophets, i. 505 f.
- Use of term Evangelist, i. 507 f.
- Paul and the Jewish law, iii. 152 f.
- and the Jewish Synagogues, ii. 137 f.
- and the Roman government, iii. 75 f.
- and the readers of 2 Peter, ii. 203.
- Paul, Acts of, i. 69₁₆; ii. 170₄.

- Pella, Flight of Jews to, ii. 572, 588 f.₃; iii. 159.
- Pentecost, Place of, ii. 429, 447₇.
- Pergamum, iii. 411, 420 f.₂.
Church of, iii. 410 f., 417 f.
- Pericopes, the Church, iii. 36₁₆.
- Persecutions of Christians—in Asiatic churches, 90–100 A.D., iii. 409 ff.
Mentioned in 1 Peter, ii. 179 ff., 184 f.
Nature of, in 1st century, ii. 180 f., 189₇.
Under Nero, ii. 185.
- Peter, iii. 213, 224₄.
Alleged daughter of, ii. 164₃.
at trial of Jesus, iii. 271.
Attitude toward Jewish and Gentile Christians, ii. 276.
Confession of, ii. 550 f.
Death, ii. 160, 165 ff.₄, 214; iii. 479 f.
Date, ii. 160, 170₄, 255.
in Acts of Paul, ii. 214.
in Acts of Peter, ii. 214.
Prophecy concerning, iii. 241 f.
Discourses of, in Acts, compared with 1 Peter, ii. 173 f., 186₂.
- Epistles of—
Canonicity, ii. 284₂.
Comparison of, ii. 197, 271 ff., 289 f.₉.
Genuineness, ii. 262–293.
Resemblances between the, ii. 271, 289 f.₉.
- First Epistle of, ii. 134–194.
Alleged purpose, ii. 174 f.
Author, an eyewitness, ii. 147, 155 f.₉.
Author, relation to readers, ii. 145 f., 148, 154 f.₇.
Author's description of himself, ii. 146 ff.
Canonicity, ii. 263 f.
Character, ii. 173 ff.
Compared with discourses of Peter in Acts, ii. 173 f., 186₂.
Date, i. 128, 161; ii. 148 f., 151₁, 160 ff., 177.
Genuineness, ii. 173–194.
External evidence, ii. 173, 185 f.₁.
Greetings of, ii. 148.
Persecutions of Christians mentioned in, ii. 179 ff.
Ramsey's view of, ii. 190 f.₉.
Persons addressed in, ii. 134.
Place of writing, i. 161; ii. 158 f., 162–173₄.
Purpose, ii. 145 f.
- Peter—continued.
First Epistle of—continued.
Readers and author—
Internal evidence, ii. 134–158.
Readers, not Jewish Christians, ii. 136–142.
Gentile Christian Churches in Asia Minor, ii. 142–145.
View of Kuhl, ii. 152₃.
View of Origen and Greek Church, ii. 136 f., 152₂.
View of B. Weiss, ii. 152₃.
Relation to Ephesians, ii. 176 ff., 186 f.₄, 275 f.
Relation to James, i. 128, 133 f.₃; ii. 175 f., 186₃.
Relation to Pauline Epistles, i. 161; ii. 176 ff., 185 ff.₄.
Relation to Romans, ii. 176 ff., 187 f.₄, 275 f.
Silvanus, writer, not author of, ii. 148 ff., 157 f.₁₂, 174, 176.
Time and place, ii. 158–173.
Title, ii. 297.
- Second Epistle of—
Apologetic tone of, ii. 223.
Apostleship of Peter in, ii. 273 f.
Author and readers of, ii. 194–221.
Author, ii. 232.
An eyewitness, ii. 203 f., 215 f.₆.
Relation to readers, ii. 201 ff., 208 f.
Self-designation, ii. 271.
Canonicity, ii. 263 f.
Circulation, ii. 264.
Date, ii. 209 f., 237, 255, 278, 286₆.
False teachers of, ii. 224 ff., 231, 232 f.₂, 292 f.₁₅.
Character, ii. 279–283.
Origin, ii. 226 f.
Genuineness, ii. 262 f., 271–283.
Suspensions concerning, ii. 283 f.₁.
Occasion, ii. 221–238, 231 f.
Parousia in, ii. 273.
Expectation of, ii. 222, 230 f.
Pauline epistles, reference to, ii. 274 f., 290₁₀.
Polemical note, ii. 222.
Purpose, ii. 195.
Readers, ii. 202, 205 f., 207 ff., 226 ff., 264.
Missionaries to the, ii. 203 ff., 208.
Relation to Paul, ii. 203.
Relation to the Antiquities of Josephus, ii. 291₁₄.
Relation to the extra Biblical writings of the Early Church, ii. 264.

Peter—*continued.*Second Epistle of—continued.

- Relation to Jude, ii. 211, 250, 285₄.
- Various hypotheses of, ii. 264–268.
- Relation to Jude 4, 17 f.; ii. 285 f.₅.
- Relation to literary works after 70 A.D., ii. 279, 291 f.₁₄.
- Relation to the “Shepherd of Hermas,” ii. 284 f.₃.
- Spirit, ii. 274.
- Style, ii. 271.
- Title, ii. 297.
- Traces in literature of the Early Church, ii. 284₃.
- Transfiguration, ii. 274.
- Father’s name, i. 17₃.
- Flight from Jerusalem, iii. 457.
- Galilean origin, i. 27₁₃.
- in Corinth, i. 302 f.₁₀.
- in Pontus, ii. 154 f.₇.
- in Rome, ii. 159 ff., 163 f.₃, 165 ff.₄, 210.
- Alleged Roman episcopate of, ii. 160, 167 f.₄.
- Witnesses for, ii. 165 ff.₄.
- Acts of Peter, ii. 166 f.₄.
- Clement of Rome, ii. 165₄.
- Eusebius, ii. 167 f.₄.
- Ignatius, ii. 165 f.₄.
- Marcion, ii. 166₄.
- Papias, ii. 166₄.
- Knowledge of Greek, ii. 443.
- Lost Epistle of, to readers of 2 Peter, ii. 195, 197 f., 231, 236₄, 271 f.
- Martyrdom—
 - Early tradition concerning, ii. 62, 78 ff.₉.
 - Manner, ii. 169 f.₄.
 - Patristic testimony, ii. 75 ff.₈.
 - Testimony of Clement, ii. 61 f.
- Missionary activity, ii. 159 f., 163 f.₃, 443 f., 587₁.
- Name, i. 16₃.
 - Aramaic form, i. 17₃; ii. 146, 155₈.
 - Greek, i. 64₁₀.
 - in Galatians, ii. 155₈.
- Names used in 2 Peter, ii. 206, 219 f.₉.
- Parallelisms with Paul in Acts, iii. 151 f., 163₉.
- Parousia, expectation of, ii. 230 f.
- Party of, i. 289 ff.
- Preaching, relation to Mark’s Gospel, ii. 387 f., 434 f., 450 f.₁₂, 495 ff.
- References to, in “Acts of Philip,” ii. 163₃.
- References to, in Mark, ii. 497, 506₉.

Peter—continued.

- Relation to Churches addressed in 1 Peter, ii. 145 f., 148, 154 f.₇.
- Relation to Mark, ii. 148, 394, 427, 432, 434, 445₉.
- Wife, views about, ii. 157₁₁.
- Writings ascribed to, ii. 270.
- Peter and Corinthian Parties, i. 283 f., 287 ff.
- Peter and Paul—
 - Martyrdom, ii. 62 ff., 78 ff.₉.
 - Work and martyrdom of, in Rome, ii. 165 ff.₄.
- Peter and Paul’s Day, ii. 78 ff.₉.
- Commemoration of, ii. 62, 78 ff.₉.
- Peter, Acts of—
 - Author, ii. 449₉.
 - Gnostic teaching, ii. 270.
 - on the Gospels, ii. 390.
 - on Peter in Rome, ii. 166 f.
 - on Simon Magus, ii. 168 f.
 - on Transfiguration, ii. 218₆.
- Peter, Apocalypse of, ii. 270, 273.
- Peter, Epistle of, to James, ii. 289₈.
 - Author and date, ii. 289₈.
- Peter, Gospel according to, ii. 270.
- Peter, Preaching (κῆρυγμα) of, ii. 167₄.
 - Author, ii. 270, 273.
 - Logos doctrine in, iii. 327₄.
 - on Colossians ii. 8, i. 475₆.
- Pharisees, i. 50; ii. 258₆.
 - Attitude toward Christianity, iii. 149.
 - in Fourth Gospel, iii. 338 f., 350₁₀.
 - Name, i. 32₁₇.
- Pharisees and Sadducees—
 - Attitude of Jesus to, in Matt., ii. 549.
 - Opposed to each other, i. 50.
- Philadelphia, Church of, iii. 410 f.
- Philaster—
 - on author of Hebrews, ii. 308₈.
 - on Cerinthus, i. 515₄.
- Philemon, i. 446 f., 452 f., 458₇.
- Philemon, Epistle to, i. 452–459.
 - Authorship, i. 456₃.
 - Date, i. 452₉.
 - Genuineness, i. 457 f.₇, 8.
 - Various views concerning, i. 458 f.₈.
 - Names in, i. 458₇.
 - Relation to Ephesians, i. 493 ff.
 - Time and place of composition, i. 439–452.
- Philetus, ii. 21₃, 109 f., 129₁₇.
- Philip, the Apostle, i. 46; iii. 210, 213, 224₄, 302, 350₉.
 - Greek name, i. 63₁₀.

- Philip, the Evangelist, i. 45, 443; iii. 92₂₇, 412.
 in Asia Minor, i. 448; iii. 92₂₇, 350₉, 358, 370₃.
 Daughters of, iii. 17.
 Philip, Acts of, ii. 163₃.
 Philippi, i. 522, 532 f.₁.
 Jews in, i. 522 f.
 Philippi, Church of—
 Care of Paul, i. 212₅.
 Communications with Paul, i. 524 ff.
 Composition, i. 523.
 Condition at writing of Epistle to the Philippians, i. 529 f.
 Jewish Christian preachers in, i. 530 ff.
 Lost correspondence with, i. 526 f., 535 f.₃.
 Philippians, Epistle to the—Alleged composite character of, i. 560, 562 f.₅.
 Alleged motive for forgery of, i. 558 f.
 Date, i. 548 f., 555 f.₅.
 Epistolary style, i. 560₁.
 Genuineness, i. 556–564.
 View of Baur, i. 556 ff., 561₃.
 View of Hitzig, i. 556 ff., 561₃.
 View of Tübingen School, i. 556–559, 560 f.₂, 3, 4.
 Hist. presuppositions and occasion, i. 522–539.
 Occasion and purpose, i. 532.
 Paul's condition at writing, i. 527 ff.
 Valentinian Gnosticism in, i. 557.
 View of Völter, i. 560, 561 f.₄, 562 ff.₅.
 Philo—
 Hebrews, relation to, ii. 364 f.₁₅.
 Logos speculation of, iii. 317 f.
 Use of Greek, i. 56, 59₃.
 Use of Hebrew, i. 67₁₃.
 Phlegon, i. 420₂₄; ii. 169.
 Phrygia, i. 184₃.
 Phygelus, ii. 3, 21₃.
 Pilate, ii. 488, 502 f.₃; iii. 71, 75, 352 f.₁₂.
 Pilate, Acts of, iii. 352₁₂.
 Pilate, Apocalyptic literature of, ii. 375.
 Pisidia, i. 184 ff.₃, 4.
 Pliny, the Elder—on Galatia, i. 184 f.
 Pliny, the Younger—
 Correspondence with Trajan, ii. 178 f., 189₆.
 Epistles of, ii. 178, 180.
 on Christians in Pontus, ii. 152₁.
 Plural, used by author to designate himself, i. 171₁, 209 f.₃, 307, 316₃, 456₃; ii. 354, 365; iii. 357.
 Poetry in N.T., i. 52, 71₁₉, 118₅.
 Politarch, i. 211₄.
 Polycarp—
 Bishop of Smyrna, iii. 412 f.
 Disciple of John, ii. 435 f.; iii. 175, 191 f., 204₂₂, 24.
 in Rome, iii. 192.
 Martyrdom, iii. 416 f., 426₉.
 on Pauline Epistles to the Philippians, i. 535₃.
 Witness to 1 Peter, ii. 173, 185 f.₁.
 Polycrates of Ephesus—on John of Ephesus, iii. 205₂₇, 231 f.
 Use of μάργος, iii. 205₂₇.
 Pontus, ii. 151 f.₁.
 Christians in, ii. 151 f.₁.
 Churches in, character of, ii. 136 f.
 Peter in, ii. 154 f.₇.
 Porphyry, ii. 611.
 Pratorium, i. 541 f., 551 ff.₂.
 Preaching, Christian—
 Source of, ii. 379₂.
 Preaching, Missionary—
 see Missionary Preaching.
 Presbyter, ii. 23₅, 33 ff., 91 f., 124 f.₅₋₈.
 Priests—
 Abstinence from wine, i. 473₄.
 Priscilla—
 see also Aquila.
 in Corinth, i. 257, 265₃.
 in Ephesus, i. 262.
 Priscilla and Aquila, ii. 19.
 in Romans, i. 389 ff., 417₂₁.
 Prochorus, iii. 88₁₇.
 Author of Acta Jo., iii. 197₄.
 on John, iii. 198, 202₁₄.
 Proclus (Proculus), ii. 311₁₁.
 Prologues, Old Latin—on order of Gospels, ii. 400₈.
 to Acts, iii. 7₆.
 to John, iii. 196₄.
 to Mark, ii. 400₈, 445₄.
 Prophecy, Prophet, i. 116₂, 207₁, 227 f., 237₆, 505 f.; iii. 385 ff., 402 f.₂ in the Christian Church, ii. 97 f., 110 ff., 230, 236₄; iii. 16, 385 ff., 402 f.₂.
 in Jude, ii. 248 f.
 in Revelation, iii. 437 ff.
 Prophecy, N.T., iii. 437.
 Prophecy, O.T.—
 Agreement of history of Jesus with, in Matt., ii. 537 ff., 567₆.

Prophecy, O.T.—continued.
 Fulfilment in Fourth Gospel, iii.
 330 f._{10c}.
 Fulfilled in Gospel history, iii.
 330 f._{10c}.
 and the preaching of the Gospel
 among Gentiles, ii. 146.

Prophet—
 Use of term by Paul, i. 505 f.

Proselytes—Jewish, i. 61₈.
 of the gate, i. 213₆.

Protevangelium of James—
 Date of, ii. 375.

Pseudepigraphic writings, i. 140, 144,
 158 ff., 164₇.
 Character of, ii. 123₂.

Pseudo-Clementine Literature—
 Relation to James, i. 136₆.

Pseudo-Petrine writings, ii. 270,
 289₈.

Publius, iii. 139₂₀.

Pudens, ii. 21₂.

Punic language, iii. 139₂₀.

Quartodecimans, iii. 193, 273 ff.

Quirinius—
 Governor of Syria, iii. 96 ff., 130 f.₃, 134₇.

Rabbis—
 Attitude towards Greek, i. 62 f.₉.
 Zeal for Hebrew, i. 40.

Reading of books in antiquity, ii. 373 f., 385₈.

Resurrection—
 see Passion and R.

Revelation of John, the—Analysis, iii. 392–401.
 Antichrist, iii. 399 f., 438 f., 441 f., 446₂.
 Number of, i. 238 f.₉; iii. 444 ff., 447 f.₄, ₅.
 Author, iii. 387 f., 428–435.
 Name and nationality, iii. 428,
 433, 433₁.
 References to himself, iii. 391,
 403 f.₅.
 Tradition on, iii. 180.
 View of Justin, iii. 182, 201₁₂.
 Beasts in, iii. 439 ff., 446₂.
 Circulation of, iii. 182 f.
 Date, iii. 183, 201 f.₁₄, 412, 413, 417,
 420, 433, 438 f., 444.
 View of Irenæus, iii. 183, 201 f.₁₄.
 False teaching and practice, iii. 417 ff., 423–427₇₋₁₃.

Revelation of John, the—continued.
 Greek style of, compared with other Johannine Literature, iii.
 432 f., 435₆, ₇.
 Hebrew words in, iii. 444.

Interpretation—
 Contemporary } iii. 436–449.
 Historical, } Futurist, }

Nature of, iii. 384–389.

Parousia in, iii. 437 f.

Prophecies in, iii. 437 ff.

Purpose, iii. 384, 390.

Readers, iii. 390.
 Condition, iii. 408–427.

Reference to Caligula, iii. 445,
 449₅.

References to Nero, iii. 436, 443 ff.

Reference to Roman Empire, iii.
 441 f., 447₂.

Relation of 2 Thess. to, i. 250₇.

Seals, the Seven, iii. 394 ff., 406₈.

Sources—
 Critical discussions, iii. 407 f.₁₁.
 Structure, iii. 389–401.
 Teaching, iii. 431 f., 434 f.₅.
 Title, iii. 391, 403 f.₅.
 Unity, iii. 401, 407 f.₁₁.

Visions in—Materials of, iii. 436 f.
 Nature, iii. 385 f.
 Origin, iii. 384 f., 392, 402₁.

Witness of Epistle of Barnabas to,
 iii. 183.

Witness of Papias to, iii. 182.

Rolls, Scripture, ii. 392 f., 398₆.

Roman citizenship, i. 69₁₆.

Roman Emperors, mention of, in N.T., i. 241₁₀.

Roman Empire, in 2 Thess., i. 229 f., 238₉.

Roman Officials, Titles of, iii. 81₃.

Romans, Epistle to the—Benedictions in, i. 408 ff.₁₃.
 Contents and progress of thought, i.
 352–378.
 Date, i. 377₁₁, 434 f.

Doxology in, i. 379 ff., 396₃–412₁₆.
 Evidence (external) for, i. 380 ff.
 Evidence (internal) for, i. 382 ff.
 Genuineness, i. 385 ff.
 Hypotheses regarding, i. 385.
 Origen's testimony regarding, i.
 379 f., 396 ff.₃.
 Position, explanation of, i. 384 f., 411₁₆.
 Position in Liturgies, i. 410₁₄.

Romans, Epistle to the—continued.Doxology in—continued.

Position in MSS and versions, i.

401 f.^{5, 6, 7, 8}, 408 ff.¹³, 410 f.¹⁵.

Position with Patristic writers, i.

405₈, 9.

Hebrews, relation of, to, ii. 365.

Integrity, i. 378–421.

Marcion's text, i. 379 f., 396 ff.₃.

Occasion, i. 434–438.

Readers, i. 375₈.Nationality, i. 372₃.

Relation of 1 Peter to, ii. 176 ff., 187 f.₄, 275 f.Relation to James, i. 126 ff., 132₂.

Salutation, i. 352 f.

Salutations in, i. 387 ff.

Schott's view, i. 438₂.

Similarity to Pastoral Epistles, i.

413₁₇.Text known to Ephrem, i. 405₈, 472₃.

Vulgate MSS—

Capitula in, i. 398 ff.₄.

Rome—

Bishops of, ii. 167₄.Burning of, ii. 68₅.

Church of—

Absence of Judaizers in, i. 425 f.

Asceticism in, ii. 346.

Ascetic party in, i. 366, 376 f.₁₀.

Character of, in 58 A.D., ii. 345 f.

Conditions, ii. 350, 359₈.

Constituency of, i. 421–427, 429,

429₁.Views regarding, i. 431 f.₄.

Grouping in membership of, i.

430₁.Jewish, predominantly, i. 375₈,

421 f.

Missionary activity of, ii. 349.

Nationality of members, i. 375₈.

Origin, i. 129, 352, 427–429,

432 f.₅.Parties in, i. 365 ff., 376 f.₁₀,406 f.₁₂.

Paul's acquaintance with, i. 352,

428.

Paul's intended visit to, i. 367 ff.,

377₁₁.Purpose of, i. 355 ff., 371 f.₃.

Relation to churches in Asia

Minor, ii. 148 f.

Relation to the Jewish Synagogues,

ii. 359₈.

Government of—

Attempts to suppress Christianity,

ii. 178 f., 189₆.Rome—continued.Jewish epitaphs in, i. 67₁₃, 67₁₄.

Jews expelled from, iii. 466 f.

Jews in, i. 47, 67₁₃.Peter in, ii. 159 ff., 163 f.₃, 165 ff.₄.

Date, ii. 160 f., 166, 170.

Synagogues in, i. 47 f.; ii. 359₈.

Variant preachers in, i. 542 ff., 557 f.

Rome (Rhode), daughter of Peter, ii.

164₃.Rufus, i. 392, 420₂₄; ii. 489 f., 504₅.Sabians, iii. 332₁₂.

Sadducees, i. 50.

Attitude toward Christianity, iii. 149.

see also Pharisees.

Saints—

Meaning of term, ii. 257₃.

Salome, mother of John, iii. 187, 190, 204₂₁.

Samaria—

Greeks in, i. 35.

Jesus in, iii. 332₁₃.Samaritans, iii. 326₂.

Language of, i. 5.

Sanhedrin, the, iii. 339, 350₁₀.Sardis, Bishop of, iii. 416, 425 f.₈.Satan, Synagogue of, iii. 410 f., 421₂.

Saul = Hebrew name of Paul, i. 50.

Saul = Paul, iii. 127, 140₂₅.Scripture rolls, ii. 392 f., 398₆.

Scriptures—

Form in which written, ii. 392 f.

Seythian Christians, ii. 152₁.Secundus, i. 209₂, 213₆.Semitic idioms in Hebrews, ii. 361₁₂.

Septuagint, i. 46, 56.

Paul familiar with, i. 52.

Quoted in Gospels, ii. 610.

" " Hebrews, ii. 361₁₂." " John, iii. 354₁₅." " Matt., ii. 579 f., 596 f._{11, 12}.Serapion of Antioch, ii. 164₃.

Sergius Paulus, iii. 149.

Proconsul of Cyprus, iii. 463 ff.

Sermon on the Mount—

in Luke, iii. 112.

' in Matt., ii. 542 ff., 544, 558 f.; iii.

112.

Position in Matt., ii. 557.

The two recensions, ii. 605.

"Seventy," the, iii. 78, 92₂₇.Seventy Disciples, the, ii. 164₃, 445₃.

Shepherd of Hermas, the—Authorship of, Eusebius on, iii. 4₄.Relation of 2 Peter to, ii. 284 f.₃.Sibyllines, i. 252₉.

- Silas = Silvanus, i. 203 f., 207 f.₁, 209 f.₃; iii. 17, 87₁₂, 142 f., 160₁.
- Accompanying Paul on second missionary journey, i. 176 f., 178 f.
- Character, ii. 151.
- in Asia Minor, ii. 149.
- Name, i. 31 f.₁₆.
- Preaching of, i. 237₆.
- Prophet, i. 237₆.
- Relation to churches in Asia Minor, ii. 149 ff.
- Work of, in vicinity of Corinth, i. 265₂.
- Writer of 1 Peter, ii. 149 ff., 157 f.₁₂, 174, 176.
- Simeon (cousin of Jesus), ii. 240 f.
- Simeon = Peter, ii. 206, 218 f.₈.
- Simeon, Rabbi, i. 62₉.
- Simon Magus—
- in Clementine Romance, ii. 170 f.₄.
- in Rome, ii. 83₉, 168 ff.
- Contest with Peter, ii. 63, 74.
- Simon Niger, ii. 505₅.
- Simon of Cyrene, i. 392; ii. 489 f., 505₅.
- and his sons, i. 66₁₂.
- Sinope, Episcopates of, ii. 152₁.
- Sirach—
- Greek trans. of, i. 46.
- Language of, i. 6.
- Use of, in James, i. 121₁₀.
- Smyrna, Church of, iii. 410 f., 416 f.
- Angel of, iii. 416.
- Origin, iii. 412 f.
- Sodom, iii. 398, 406₉.
- "Son of God," iii. 309 f.
- Sopater, Sosipater, i. 209₂, 213₆, 417₂₂; iii. 31 f.₉.
- Sosthenes, i. 258, 267 f.₆.
- Soter, Bishop of Rome, ii. 75₈.
- Spain—
- Journey of Paul to, i. 367 ff.; ii. 61.
- Evidence of Acts of Peter, ii. 63.
- Evidence of Canon Muratori, ii. 62 ff., 73 ff.₇.
- Paul in, ii. 161 f., 166₄.
- Spirit—
- Work of, in early Church, iii. 385, 402₂.
- Spiritual gifts, i. 279 ff., 297₅.
- Stephanas, i. 260, 266₄, 269₈.
- Sychar, iii. 351₁₁.
- Symmachus, ii. 563₂.
- Synagogue, i. 94 f.₁.
- Christian preaching permitted in, i. 99₆.
- Synagogue—continued.
- Gentiles in, i. 212 f.₆.
- Language used in, i. 33₂₀.
- Services, i. 212₅.
- Synagogues in Rome, i. 47 f.; ii. 359₈.
- Relation of Roman Church to, ii. 359₈.
- Synagogue in Thessalonica—
- Paul began work in, i. 204, 212₅.
- Synoptic Gospels, the—
- Choice of material in, iii. 165–171, 171₁.
- Interrelation of—
- View of Augustine, ii. 402, 422₃.
- Views of early Church writers, ii. 421 f.₃, 4₄.
- View of G. E. Lessing, ii. 403 f., 422₅.
- see Synoptic Problem.
- Jesus—
- Discourses compared with discourses in Fourth Gospel, iii. 344, 354₁₇.
- Jerusalem visits of, in, iii. 167 f.
- Purpose, iii. 166 f.
- Relation of Fourth Gospel to, iii. 254–298, 306 f.
- Relation to the traditions concerning Jesus' deeds and words current in Apostolic Church, ii. 372.
- Synoptic Problem—
- Facts to be used in a solution of the, ii. 401 f.
- History of, ii. 400–427.
- Hypothesis of Bruno Bauer, ii. 407, 424₉.
- Hypothesis of F. Chr. Baur, ii. 412 ff., 425 f.₁₃.
- Hypothesis of J. G. Eichhorn, ii. 404, 422 f.₆.
- Hypothesis of J. C. L. Gieseler, ii. 408 ff., 424 f.₁₁.
- Hypothesis of J. J. Griesbach, ii. 405, 423₇.
- Hypothesis of G. Herder, ii. 405 ff., 423₈.
- Hypothesis of Hilgenfeld, ii. 414, 425₁₃.
- Hypothesis of Holsten, ii. 414, 425 f.₁₃.
- Hypothesis of J. Holtzmann, ii. 415 ff., 426₁₄.
- Hypothesis of J. L. Hug, ii. 408, 424₁₀.
- Hypothesis of G. E. Lessing, ii. 403 f., 422₅.
- Hypothesis of A. Ritschl, ii. 414, 426₁₄.

Synoptic Problem—continued.

- Hypothesis of Schleiermacher, ii. 411 f., 425₁₂.
- Hypothesis of G. Chr. Storr, ii. 407, 423₈.
- Hypothesis of K. Veit, ii. 410 f., 425₁₁.
- Hypothesis of G. Volkmar, ii. 407, 424₉.
- Hypothesis of B. Weiss, ii. 417 f., 427₁₅.
- Hypothesis of Chr. H. Weisse, ii. 414, 426₁₄.
- Hypothesis of C. Weizsäcker, ii. 417, 427₁₄.
- Hypothesis of Wendling, ii. 426 f.₁₄.
- Hypothesis of G. Wetzels, ii. 410, 425₁₁.
- Hypothesis of Chr. G. Wilke, ii. 407, 424₉.
- Origin, ii. 401 f.
- Results of the investigation of the, ii. 418.
- Syntyche, i. 530, 533₁, 561 f.₄.
- Syriac or Aramaic, i. 22 f.₄, 36.
- Syriac translations—
 - Relation to the original language of the Gospel tradition, ii. 575.
- Syrian Church, Canon of, ii. 263.
- Tabitha, iii. 137₁₄.
- Tacitus—
 - on Christians, ii. 185, 191 f.₁₀, 617.
 - on earthquake in Laodicea, i. 449₂.
 - on Neronian persecution of Christians, ii. 57, 62.
 - on Roman officials in Palestine, iii. 470.
- Trustworthiness, iii. 451.
- Targums—
 - Origin of the, ii. 515.
- Tarsus, i. 49.
 - Centre of Gr. culture, i. 53 f., 71₂₀.
- Tatian—
 - Diatessaron of, ii. 401, 421₁.
 - Order of twelve disciples in, ii. 522₁.
 - Witness for John xxi. 24 f., iii. 250₂.
 - Witness for Mark xvi. 9–20, ii. 468.
 - Witness for text of Lucan writings, iii. 22.
- Teaching in the early Church, ii. 96 f.
 - Compensation for, ii. 127 f.₁₃.
- "Teaching of Addai," ii. 164₃, 167₄; iii. 467.
- "Teaching of the Apostles" Syriac, ii. 164 f.₃.

- Temple, Bilingual inscriptions in, i. 59₅.
- Temple Cultus—
 - Alleged ignorance of, in Hebrews, ii. 361 ff.₁₄.
- Tertullian—
 - Contra Marcion*, ii. 487₁₁.
 - on Apostolic letters, i. 213.
 - on Hebrews, ii. 295, 301 f.
 - on Marcion's text of Romans, i. 397.
 - on Martyrdom of Peter and Paul, ii. 76 f.
 - Translation of 2 Thess. ii. 6 f., i. 238₉.
 - Witness to text of Eph. i. 1, i. 481, 488₃.
- Textual Criticism, Canon of, ii. 477, 486₉.
- Thaddeus, Missionary activity of, ii. 164₃.
- Theclæ, Acta, i. 181.
- Theodore of Mopsuestia—
 - Com. on Philemon, i. 446₁.
 - on Angelolatry, i. 476.
 - on Authorship of Heb., ii. 309₅.
 - on John xxi. 24 f., iii. 250 f.₂.
 - on John's residence in Ephesus, i. 490₅.
 - N.T. Canon adopted by, i. 123.
- Theodotians, ii. 302, 310₉.
- Theophilus of Cæsarea, iii. 6₅.
- Theophilus of Luke i. 3, iii. 2, 5 f.₅, 42 f., 58.
- Thessalonians, Epistles to the—
 - Authorship of, i. 203, 209 f.₃.
 - Resemblances between, i. 244 ff., 253 f.₁₁.
- Thessalonians, First Epistle to the—
 - Analysis, i. 215–224.
 - Apologetic purpose, i. 216 ff.
 - Baur's view, i. 248 f.₄.
 - Date, i. 206 f., 215, 233.
 - Eschatology, i. 221, 223 f.₄.
 - Genuineness, i. 242–255.
 - Proof of, i. 249₄.
 - Occasion and purpose, i. 215 f.
 - Place of composition, i. 205 f., 233.
- Thessalonians, Second Epistle to the—
 - Analysis, i. 224–242.
 - Antichrist in, i. 227 ff., 236 ff.₄₋₉.
 - Authorship, i. 224 f., 233 f.₁.
 - Spitta's hypothesis, i. 234, 237₅.
 - Date and place, various views on, i. 231 ff., 241₁₁.
 - Dependence on Rev., i. 250₇.
 - Eschatology, i. 226–231.
 - Source of, i. 227 f., 236 f.₄, 237₅.

Thessalonians, Second Epistle to the—continued.

Genuineness, i. 242-255, 247₁.

Nero legend in, i. 250₇, 252₉, 10.

Occasion, i. 234₂.

Place of composition, i. 233.

Purpose, i. 226.

Thessalonica, i. 203 f., 211 f.₄, 213₆.

Church of—

Membership, i. 204, 212 f.₆.

Moral condition of, i. 220 f., 223₃.

Origin and history, i. 203-215.

Persecution of, i. 204 f., 215 f., 222₁, 225.

Jews in, i. 204.

Theudas, iii. 132 f.₆.

Third person, use of, in ancient literature, iii. 86₁₁.

Thomas, iii. 213, 224₄, 302.

Missionary activity of, ii. 164₁₃.

Thomas of Heraclea—

Gr. MS. of N.T. used by, iii. 27₃.

Text of Luke used by, iii. 10.

Thyatira, Angel of, iii. 416.

Church of, iii. 417 f., 419, 426₁₁.

Tiberias, Lake, iii. 324, 333₁₄.

Tiberius Alexander, iii. 460 f.

Tiberius—

Death, date, iii. 481.

Timothy, i. 440; ii. 2 ff.; iii. 87₁₂, 142 f., 159 f.₁.

Age of, ii. 38.

Circumcision of, i. 182; iii. 152.

Conversion, ii. 6.

Episcopate of, in Ephesus, ii. 41₆.

Eusebius on, iii. 4₄.

Eschatological views of, i. 237₆.

Home of, i. 209₂.

in Corinth—

Work in vicinity, i. 265₂.

in Ephesus—

Work in city, ii. 29 ff., 34 f., 41₆.

Work outside city, ii. 33 f.

in Macedonia, i. 203 f., 209 f.₃.

in Philippi, i. 523 f., 547.

Joint author of Epistle to Colossians, i. 456₃.

Joint author of Epistle to Philemon, i. 456₃.

Location of, at writing of 1 Timothy, ii. 27 ff.

Location of, when 2 Timothy was written, ii. 18 f., 26 f.₁₀.

Pastoral office in Asia, ii. 89 f.

Picture of, in 1 and 2 Timothy, ii. 88 f.

Timothy—continued.

Relation to Church of Antioch, ii. 357₂.

Relation to Paul, ii. 6 f., 23₆, 34 f.

Reports Macedonian work to Galatia, i. 198.

Training of, ii. 6, 22 f.₄.

Work of, mentioned in 1 Timothy, ii. 29 ff.

in 2 Timothy, ii. 29 f.

Timothy, First Epistle to—

Date, ii. 35 ff.

Facts attested by the, ii. 27-42.

Lack of personal greetings in, ii. 42₇.

Occasion, ii. 28 f.

Personal notices in, ii. 35.

Place of composition, ii. 27 ff.

Relation to Epistle to Titus, ii. 52.

Timothy, Second Epistle to—

Date, ii. 37, 66.

Facts presupposed by the, ii. 1-27.

Timothy and Titus, Epistles to—Alleged forgery of, motives for the, ii. 89-118.

a. Regulation of the life of the Church, ii. 89-99.

b. Opposition to certain doctrinal errors, ii. 99-118.

Alleged interest in the organisation of the Church, ii. 93 f.

Date, ii. 118 f.

Alleged late, ii. 99-118.

False teachers of, ii. 99 ff.

Genuineness, ii. 85-133.

Argument for, ii. 85 ff.

Denial of, ii. 85, 122 f.₁.

see also Pastoral Epistles.

Title of a book, Ancient usage, iii. 81₁.

Titles of books, ii. 458 f.

Titles of Roman officials, iii. 81₃.

Titus, i. 208 f.₁; iii. 28₆, 142 f., 160₁.

Circumcision of, iii. 124 f.

Communication to Paul, ii. 46 f.

in Corinth, i. 308 f.

in Crete, Episcopate, Eusebius on, iii. 4₄.

Pastoral office, ii. 48, 53₂, 89 f.

Work, ii. 45 ff.

in Dalmatia, ii. 11 f.

Journey to Dalmatia, ii. 48.

Location of, when Epistle to, was written, ii. 43.

Titus, Epistle to—

Date, ii. 50 ff.

Facts presupposed by the, ii. 43-54.

Genuineness—

see Timothy and Titus, Epistles to.

Relation to 1 Timothy, ii. 52.

- Titus Justus, i. 266₄.
 "Tractatus Origines de libris ss. scripturarum," ii. 303, 310 f.₁₁.
 Trajan's correspondence with Pliny, ii. 178, 189₆.
 Transfiguration, the—in "Acts of John," ii. 218₈.
 in "Acts of Peter," ii. 218₆.
 in 2 Peter, ii. 216 ff.₆, 274.
 Synoptic account of, ii. 274.
 Witnesses of, ii. 204, 215 f.₆, 495.
 Trophimus, ii. 88.
 in Miletus, ii. 14 f., 26₉.
 Tryphæna, i. 393, 419₂₄.
 "Twelve," the, iii. 78 f., 213, 227₉.
 Training, ii. 463 f.
 Twelve tribes, i. 74 ff., 78₄.
 Tychicus, i. 439 f., 441 ; ii. 48, 87.
 Urbanus, i. 393, 419₂₄.
 Valentinus, Valentinians—
 Doctrine of αἰῶνες and πλήρωμα, i. 515 f.₅ ; ii. 128₁₄ ; iii. 176.
 Relation to Eph. and Col., i. 498 f.
 Doctrine of σοφία, i. 557.

- Valentinus, Valentinians—continued.
 Estimate of Fourth Gospel, iii. 176, 327₄, 349₇.
 "Evangelium veritatis" of, ii. 389.
 Gospel used by, ii. 456₁₅.
 on the Gospels, ii. 389 f.
 Versions—
 Relation to the original language of the Gospel tradition, ii. 574 ff.
 "We"—
 Use of, in Paul's Epistles, i. 203, 209 f.₃.
 Widows in the early Church, ii. 33, 94 f.
 Worship, Christian, ii. 326 f., 514.
 Year, the calendar, i. 319₅.
 Zacchæus, iii. 138₁₈.
 Zachariah, son of Jehoiada, ii. 589 f.₅.
 Zealots—
 Greek term used by Luke, iii. 92₂₆.
 Party of the, iii. 77, 78, 92₂₆.
 Zebedee, iii. 187.
 Sons of, iii. 187 f., 204_{10, 21}, 228₁₃.
 Zenas, ii. 49, 54₄.
 Zotikos iii. 416, 425 f.₈.

PATRISTIC AND OTHER EXTRA-BIBLICAL WRITINGS.

(Only the passages which are cited in full or discussed in the text or notes are here indexed.)

- Acta SS. Jun.* v. 411 ff., 423 c., ii. 76₈.
Acta Thecla xiv., ii. 129₁₇.
 Ambrosiaster in Gal. ii. 1 ff., iii. 27 f.₅.
 Augustine de consensu Ev. i. 2, 4, 5, ii. 422₂.
 Can. Mur., lines 1, 6, ii. 446₅.
 lines 9-16, iii. 197₆.
 Clement of Alex., Eclog. Proph. 27, iii. 85₈.
 Hypotyp. (in Eus. H. E. vi. 14. 5), ii. 400₉.
 Hypotyp. on 1 Pet. v. 13, ii. 448₀.
 in Eus. H. E. vi. 14. 7, iii. 197₅.
 Pæd. ii. 16, ii. 524 f.
 Quis Dives xlii., ii. 41₅ ; iii. 205₂₆.
 Strom. vii. 106, ii. 455₁₈.
 Clement of Rome—
 1 Cor. v. 1, ii. 68 f.₆.
 x. 1, i. 134₄.
 xxxviii. 2 ff., i. 135₄.
 xlvii. i. 298₉₉, 342.
 lxv., i. 269₈.

- Clementine Literature—
 Recogn. x. 71, iii. 5₈.
Didache i. 2, iii. 35₁₆.
 xi. 3-6, iii. 381₂.
 Dio Cassius lx. 6. 6, iii. 466 f.
 Dionysius of Corinth—in Eus. H. E. ii. 25. 8, ii. 75₈.
 in Eus. H. E. vii. 25. 6-13, iii. 434₄.
 in Eus. H. E. vii. 25. 15, iii. 433 f.₂.
 Epiphanius Hæc. li. 4, ii. 399₈.
 li. 12, iii. 197 f.₈.
 Eusebius, H. E. ii. 15, ii. 449₁₀, 453₁₄.
 ii. 22. 2, ii. 77₈.
 ii. 25. 7, ii. 82₉.
 ii. 25. 8, ii. 75₈.
 iii. 24. 6, ii. 403, 528₇.
 iii. 39. 4, 7, ii. 452 f.₁₃.
 iii. 39. 14 f., ii. 453 f.₁₄.
 iii. 39. 16, ii. 509-515, 525 f.₄.
 iv. 14. 6, iii. 204₂₄.
 v. 8. 2, ii. 398₇.
 v. 8. 6, iii. 201₁₄.

- Eusebius, H. E.—continued.
 vi. 14. 2 ff., ii. 308₅.
 vi. 14. 5 f., ii. 400₉, 448₉.
 vi. 14. 7, iii. 197₅.
 vi. 25. 3, ii. 397₅.
 vi. 25. 11–14, ii. 309₇.
 vii. 25. 6–13, iii. 434₄.
 viii. 25. 15, iii. 433 f.₂.
in Ps. lxxviii., ii. 528₇.
Quæst. ad Marinum, ii. 528₇.
Theoph. (Syr.) iv. 7, ii. 80₉.
 v. 31, ii. 77₈.
 Hippolytus, Refut. vii. 30, ii. 445₄.
 Ignatius, Magn. viii. 2, iii. 327₄.
Rom. x. 1, ii. 157₁₂.
Smyrn. vi. 1, i. 522₁₁.
 Irenæus iii. 1. 1, ii. 215₅, 398₇, 528₇ ;
 iii. 7₇.
 iii. 3. 4 (Eus. iv. 14. 6), iii. 204₂₄.
 iii. 11. 1, iii. 197₇.
 iii. 11. 7, ii. 456₁₆, 528₇.
 v. 30. 1, iii. 448 f.₅.
 v. 30. 3, iii. 201₁₄.
 Jerome, contra Pelag. ii. 15, ii. 484 f.₇.
Ep. ad Philem. 23, i. 68₁₆.
in Eph. iii. 5, i. 405₉.
Vir. Ill. ix., iii. 203₁₈.
 Josephus, Ant. xviii. 5. 2, iii. 134₇.
 xix. 5. 2–3, iii. 466 f.
 xix. 12, iii. 133₆.
 xx. 2. 1 ff., iii. 460 f.
 xx. 5. 1, iii. 132 f.₆.
 xx. 5. 2, iii. 460 f.
 xx. 8. 6, iii. 133₆.
Bell. ii. 13. 5, iii. 133₆.
 iii. 10. 1, iii. 333₁₄.
 Justin, Dial. xxiii., ii. 563₃.
 lxxxi., iii. 201₁₂.
 cvi., ii. 450 f.₁₂.
Mart. Polyc. xix. 1, iii. 426₉.
 Papais (in Eus. H. E. iii. 39. 16), ii.
 509–515, 525 f.₄.
 Plutarch, Vita Civ. xxix., ii. 504₄.
 Polycarp, ad Phil. iii. 2, i. 535₃.
 Polycrates (Eus. iii. 31. 3, v. 24. 3), iii.
 205₂₇.
 Suetonius, Claudius xxv., i. 433 f.₆.
 Symeon Metaphrastes in Acta SS. Jun.
 v. 411 ff., 423 c., ii. 76₈.
 Tacitus, Ann. xii. 54, iii. 470.
 Tertullian, contra Marc. i. 1, ii. 487₁₁.
 iv. 5, ii. 451₁₂.
 v. 17, i. 488₃.

INDEXES.

A.—NEW TESTAMENT PASSAGES.

MATTHEW.

i.-ii.	iii. 265 f.
i. 1	ii. 531 f., 562 ₁ .
i. 1	ii. 563 ₂ .
i. 2 ff.	ii. 533 ff., 564 ₄ .
i. 16	ii. 537, 565 ff. ₅ .
i. 18	ii. 537, 562 ₁ .
i. 20	ii. 529 ₇ .
i. 21	ii. 576 f., 592 ₈ .
i. 22	ii. 537, 567 ₆ .
i. 23	ii. 578, 592 ₉ .
ii. 1-11	ii. 537 f.
ii. 1 ff.	ii. 527 ₅ .
ii. 17 f.	ii. 539.
ii. 22	ii. 590 ₆ .
ii. 23	ii. 568 ₇ , 596 ₁₁ , 600 ₁₅ .
iii. 2	ii. 540, 568 ₈ .
iii. 3	ii. 611, 617 ₆ .
iii. 7-12	iii. 111 f.
iii. 15	ii. 540, 586 ₁ , 593 ₁₀ .
iv. 1-11	ii. 613 ₂ ; iii. 111, 137 ₁₀ .
iv. 12-25	ii. 541 f., 545.
iv. 17	ii. 541.
iv. 18-22	ii. 613 ₂ .
iv. 25	ii. 577 f., 589 ₄ .
iv. 36	ii. 614 ₂ .
v.-vii.	ii. 542 ff., 558 f., 605; iii. 112.
v. 10	ii. 595 ₁₀ .
v. 16	ii. 542 f., 568 ₉ .
v. 17	ii. 543, 568 ₉ , 585 f. ₁ .
v. 34-37	ii. 595 ₁₀ .
vi. 1	ii. 594 ₁₀ .
vi. 7-15	ii. 559.
vi. 9 ff.	ii. 603.
vi. 10 f.	ii. 501.
vi. 11	ii. 594 ₁₀ .
viii. 1-4	ii. 613 ₂ .
viii. 1-17	ii. 544 f.
viii. 5-10	iii. 291 ₁₀ .
viii. 5-13	iii. 110 f.

MATTHEW—continued.

viii. 7	ii. 588 ₁ .
viii. 18-ix. 34	ii. 545, 583 f., 600 ₁₄ .
viii. 22	iii. 224 ₄ .
viii. 27	ii. 613 f. ₂ .
ix. 1-8	ii. 613 ₂ .
ix. 2, 5	ii. 612 ₁ .
ix. 10	ii. 524 ₂ .
ix. 14-17	ii. 586 ₁ .
ix. 32 ff.	ii. 599 ₁₃ .
x. 1 ff.	ii. 545, 558.
x. 4	ii. 578.
x. 16 ff.	ii. 558.
x. 17-22	ii. 600 ₁₃ .
x. 23	ii. 587 ₁ .
x. 25	ii. 577.
x. 38	ii. 558.
xi. 2 ff.	ii. 546 ff.
xi. 6	ii. 546.
xi. 10	ii. 612, 617 ₆ .
xi. 19	ii. 594 ₁₀ .
xii. 13	iii. 137 ₁₅ .
xii. 22	ii. 599 ₁₃ .
xiii. 1 ff.	ii. 548.
xiii. 14b-15	ii. 597 ₁₂ .
xiii. 35	ii. 596 ₁₁ , 597 ₁₂ .
xiv. 1-13	ii. 614 f. ₂ .
xiv. 3	ii. 590 ₆ .
xiv. 13-21	iii. 286 ₅ .
xv. 1-20	ii. 615 ₂ .
xv. 5	ii. 577.
xv. 12-14	ii. 548 f.
xv. 22 ff.	ii. 549, 578.
xvi. 1-4	ii. 599 ₁₃ .
xvi. 6, 11, 12	ii. 549.
xvi. 16-20	ii. 550, 569 ₁₀ .
xvi. 17	ii. 578.
xvi. 18 f.	ii. 569 ₁₀ .
xvi. 21	ii. 551.
xvii. 1-13	ii. 216 ff.
xvii. 24 ff.	ii. 590 ₆ .
xvii. 24-27	ii. 552.

MATTHEW—continued.

xviii. 15-20 . . .	ii. 550 f.
xix. 1-3 . . .	ii. 591 ₇ .
xix. 1 . . .	ii. 572, 589 ₄ .
xix. 27 . . .	ii. 157 ₁₁ .
xx. 28 . . .	iii. 12.
xx. 29-34 . . .	ii. 552.
xxi. 1-xxv. 46 . . .	ii. 553 f.
xxi. 12-16 . . .	iii. 291 ₁₀ .
xxi. 23-xxii. 46 . . .	ii. 608, 616 ₃ .
xxi. 28-32 . . .	ii. 553.
xxi. 32 . . .	ii. 593 ₁₀ .
xxi. 33 . . .	ii. 608.
xxii. 1-14 . . .	ii. 587 ₁ .
xxii. 7 . . .	ii. 553.
xxii. 14 . . .	ii. 515, 526 f. ₅ .
xxii. 23 . . .	ii. 569 f. ₁₂ .
xxii. 54 ff. . . .	iii. 271.
xxiii. 35 . . .	ii. 573, 589 f. ₅ .
xxiii. 37 . . .	iii. 173 ₃ .
xxiv. 6 ff. . . .	ii. 588 ₂ .
xxiv. 9-13 . . .	ii. 600 ₁₃ .
xxiv. 20 . . .	ii. 586 ₁ .
xxvi.-xxviii. . . .	ii. 554 ff.
xxvi. 6-13 . . .	iii. 286 f. ₆ .
xxvi. 15, 25, 50 . . .	ii. 554.
xxvi. 18 . . .	ii. 494.
xxvi. 31 . . .	ii. 616 ₆ .
xxvi. 57 . . .	iii. 292 ₁₁ .
xxvii. 2 . . .	ii. 502 ₃ .
xxvii. 6 . . .	ii. 577.
xxvii. 9 . . .	ii. 596 ₁₁ , 597 ₁₂ .
xxvii. 16 ff. . . .	ii. 569 ₁₁ .
xxvii. 46 . . .	i. 15 ₃ ; ii. 578.
xxvii. 51 ff. . . .	ii. 591 ₆ .
xxvii. 51-53 . . .	ii. 555.
xxvii. 62-66 . . .	ii. 555.
xxviii. 1 . . .	ii. 596 ₁₀ .
xxviii. 11-15 . . .	ii. 555.
xxviii. 15 . . .	ii. 561.
xxviii. 18-20 . . .	ii. 382 ₄ , 557 f., 591 ₆ .

MARK.

i. 1 . . .	ii. 373, 377 ₂ , 456 ff., 480 ₁ .
i. 2 . . .	ii. 617 ₆ .
i. 3 . . .	ii. 617 ₆ .
i. 2-13 . . .	ii. 460, 609, 611, 612 f. ₂ .
i. 14, 15 . . .	ii. 460 f.
i. 16-20 . . .	ii. 613 ₂ .
i. 29 . . .	ii. 496 f., 506 ₃ .
i. 36 . . .	ii. 497.
i. 40-45 . . .	ii. 613 ₂ .
ii. 1-12 . . .	ii. 613 ₂ .
ii. 5, 9 . . .	ii. 612 ₁ .

MARK—continued.

ii. 14 . . .	ii. 507, 522 f. ₁ .
ii. 15 . . .	ii. 524 ₂ .
ii. 27 . . .	ii. 500, 613 ₂ .
iii. 5 . . .	iii. 137 ₁₅ .
iii. 13, 16 . . .	ii. 497, 506 ₇ .
iii. 17 . . .	ii. 490, 523 f. ₁ ; iii. 188.
v. 37 . . .	ii. 490.
vi. 8 f. . . .	ii. 501.
vi. 14-32 . . .	ii. 614 f. ₂ .
vi. 17 . . .	ii. 503 ₃ , 590 ₆ .
vi. 17 ff. . . .	ii. 614 ₂ .
vi. 34-44 . . .	iii. 286 ₅ .
vii. 1-23 . . .	ii. 490, 615 ₂ .
vii. 3 . . .	ii. 561.
vii. 11 . . .	ii. 577.
vii. 26 . . .	ii. 578.
viii. 35, 38 . . .	ii. 499.
ix. 1 . . .	ii. 499 f.
ix. 2-13 . . .	ii. 216 ff.
ix. 14 ff. . . .	ii. 494 f.
ix. 41 . . .	ii. 500.
ix. 48 . . .	ii. 616 ₄ .
x. 1 . . .	ii. 589 ₄ .
x. 29 f. . . .	ii. 499.
x. 35 . . .	iii. 204 ₂₁ .
x. 35-40 . . .	iii. 194 f. ₂ .
xi. 12-14, 20-25 . . .	ii. 495 f.
xi. 13 . . .	ii. 503 ₃ .
xi. 15-18 . . .	iii. 291 ₁₀ .
xi. 17 . . .	ii. 616 ₄ .
xi. 27-xii. 37 . . .	ii. 608, 616 ₃ .
xii. 1 . . .	ii. 608.
xii. 29 . . .	ii. 616 ₄ .
xiii. 3 . . .	ii. 495.
xiii. 7 ff. . . .	ii. 588 ₂ .
xiii. 14 . . .	i. 237 ₄ , ii. 500.
xiv. 3-9 . . .	iii. 286 f. ₆ .
xiv. 13 . . .	ii. 447 ₆ .
xiv. 14 . . .	ii. 429, 447 ₇ , 493 f.
xiv. 16 . . .	ii. 505 ₇ .
xiv. 17 . . .	ii. 492 f.
xiv. 27 . . .	ii. 611, 616 ₆ .
xiv. 49 . . .	ii. 609.
xiv. 51 f. . . .	ii. 428 f., 446 f. ₆ , 491 f., 505 ₆ .
xiv. 51 . . .	ii. 493, 505 ₆ .
xiv. 58 . . .	ii. 500.
xv. 1 . . .	ii. 489, 502 f. ₃ ; iii. 271.
xv. 16, Blass on . . .	ii. 504 ₄ .
xv. 21 . . .	i. 392; ii. 489 f., 505 ₅ .
xv. 28 . . .	ii. 616 ₄ .
xv. 34 . . .	i. 15 ₃ ; ii. 616 ₅ .

MARK—continued.

- xv. 38 ii. 555.
 xvi. 8, Conclusion of Mark's Gospel ii. 467, 469.
 xvi. 9-13 ii. 607.
 xvi. 9-20 ii. 467 f., 483 f.₅;
 iii. 12.
 Relation to Mark ii. 475 f.
 xvi. 14-18, Origin of ii. 471-475, 484₇, 485 f.₈.

LUKE.

- i.-ii., Source of traditions in iii. 112 f.
 i.-ii. iii. 265 f.
 i. 1 ii. 278, 376; iii.
 45 f., 82 f.₅.
 i. 1-2 iii. 44, 82 f.₅, 6.
 i. 1-4 iii. 41-56.
 Scope of iii. 53-61, 85 f.₁₀.
 i. 2 iii. 48, 78, 84₈.
 i. 3 iii. 50, 85₉.
 i. 3-4 iii. 44 f.
 i. 4 iii. 42 f., 82₄.
 i. 5 iii. 132₅.
 i. 26 iii. 35 f.₁₆.
 i. 63 iii. 37₁₈.
 ii. 1 iii. 70.
 ii. 2 iii. 68, 77.
 ii. 1-3 iii. 77, 96, 130₃.
 ii. 4 f. iii. 36₁₆.
 ii. 7 iii. 37₁₈.
 iii. 2 iii. 77.
 iii. 4 ii. 617₆.
 iii. 4-6 iii. 70.
 iii. 7-9 iii. 111 f.
 iii. 16 ii. 612₁.
 iii. 22 ii. 486₉; iii. 38 f.₁₉.
 iii. 23 ff. iii. 36₁₇.
 iii. 23-38 iii. 71, 101.
 iv. 1-13 iii. 137₁₆.
 iv. 14 f. iii. 65, 88 f.₁₈, 106 f.
 iv. 37 iii. 82₄.
 iv. 38 f. iii. 147.
 iv. 44 iii. 64, 88 f.₁₈.
 v. 1 iii. 333₁₄.
 v. 20, 23 ii. 612₁.
 v. 27 ii. 523₄.
 v. 29 ii. 524₂.
 vi. 4 ff. iii. 36 f.₁₇.
 vi. 10 iii. 137₁₅.
 vi. 13 iii. 78.
 vi. 15 iii. 77, 92₂₆.
 vi. 20-49 ii. 605; iii. 112.
 vii. 1-10 iii. 110.

LUKE—continued.

- vii. 2-10 iii. 291₁₀.
 vii. 27 ii. 617₆.
 vii. 36-50 iii. 286 f.₆.
 viii. 27 ff. iii. 147.
 viii. 43 iii. 147, 162₆.
 viii. 55 f. iii. 147.
 ix. 11-17 iii. 286₅.
 ix. 18-x. 42 iii. 89₁₉.
 ix. 28-36 ii. 216 ff.
 ix. 51 iii. 67.
 ix. 54 f. iii. 39₁₉.
 ix. 56 iii. 89₁₉.
 ix. 60 iii. 92₂₇, 224₄.
 x. 1 ff. iii. 78, 92₂₇.
 x. 38-42 iii. 66, 262.
 xi. 2 ff. ii. 603.
 xii. 13-15 iii. 73.
 xii. 16-21 iii. 73.
 xii. 38 iii. 37₁₈.
 xiii. 6 ff. iii. 169, 171 f.₂.
 xiii. 34 iii. 169, 173₃.
 xiv. 13-16 ii. 524₂.
 xvi. 9, 11 iii. 73.
 xvi. 17 ii. 586₁.
 xvii. 11 iii. 90₁₉.
 xviii. 25 iii. 162₅.
 xix. 45 f. iii. 291₁₀.
 xxi. 20 ff. iii. 158 f.
 xxi. 20-36 iii. 156 ff.
 xxii. 12 ii. 492.
 xxii. 16-20 iii. 69 f.
 xxii. 17-20 iii. 39 f.₁₉, 119 f.
 xxii. 51 iii. 146.
 xxiii. 42 f. iii. 37 f.₁₈.
 xxiv. 44-49 iii. 53.
 xxiv. 44-53 iii. 58, 87₁₄.
 xxiv. 51 iii. 87₁₄.

JOHN.

- i. 1 iii. 312-321, 326₃,
 327 ff.₄₈, 328₅.
 i. 3 iii. 314.
 i. 13 iii. 265 f., 288₇,
 310 f.
 i. 14, 16 iii. 208 f., 223 f.₃.
 i. 14 iii. 221 f., 310, 320, 326₃, 328₅, 435₇.
 i. 18 iii. 312, 326₃.
 i. 19 iii. 255, 284₂, 350₁₀.
 i. 21, 25 iii. 321, 331₁₁.
 i. 23 ii. 617₆; iii. 354₁₅.
 i. 24 iii. 283 f.₂.
 i. 28 iii. 351₁₁.

JOHN—continued.

- i. 29 iii. 354₁₅.
i. 33 f. iii. 284₂.
i. 35-41 iii. 209-212, 214,
226₈.
i. 41 iii. 209 f., 224 f.₅,
308, 326₂.
i. 44 iii. 350₉.
ii. 3 iii. 345₁.
ii. 6 iii. 325.
ii. 13-22 iii. 291₁₀.
iii. 16, 18 iii. 326₃.
iii. 19-21 iii. 355₁₈.
iii. 22-iv. 2 iii. 331₁₂.
iii. 24 f. iii. 257 f.
iii. 34 iii. 345₁.
iv. 1, 2 iii. 226₉.
iv. 4 iii. 324, 332₁₃, 351₁₁.
iv. 7-26 iii. 355₁₈.
iv. 9 iii. 325, 332₁₃,
345₂.
iv. 25 iii. 326₂.
iv. 43 ff. iii. 258 ff.
iv. 44 iii. 284 f.₃.
iv. 46-54 iii. 291₁₀.
v. 1 iii. 260, 285 f.₄.
v. 2 i. 28₁₅; iii. 335, 349₆, 353₁₃, 355₁₈.
v. 3 ff. iii. 345 f.₂.
v. 36 iii. 345₁.
vi. 1 iii. 324, 333₁₄, 351₁₁.
vi. 3 ff. iii. 260 f., 286₅.
vi. 5 ff. iii. 301.
vi. 26-65 iii. 269.
vi. 45 iii. 354₁₅.
vi. 47 ii. 486₉.
vi. 66 ii. 445₃.
vi. 68 f. iii. 343.
vii. 8, 10 iii. 330₉.
vii. 15-24 iii. 348₅.
vii. 39 ii. 486₉.
vii. 42 ii. 539.
vii. 49 iii. 338, 350₁₀.
vii. 52 ii. 539.
vii. 53-viii. 11 iii. 334, 346₃.
x. 33 ff. iii. 326₃.
x. 35 iii. 327 f.₅.
xi. 1 ii. 358₆.
xi. 1 f. iii. 261 ff.
xi. 49 f. iii. 352₁₂.
xii. 1 iii. 281, 294 ff.₁₆.
xii. 2 ii. 524₂.
xii. 2-8 iii. 263, 286 ff.₆.
xii. 12 iii. 295₁₆.
xii. 15 iii. 354₁₅.
xii. 20-36 iii. 338, 350₉.
xii. 35 f. iii. 267.

JOHN—continued.

- xiii.-xvii.-xx. iii. 268, 281 f., 288 ff.₈.
xiii. 1-4 iii. 268, 288 ff.₈.
xiii. 1-20 iii. 293₁₄.
xiii. 16, 18 iii. 226 f.₉.
xiii. 18 iii. 354₁₅.
xiii. 23 ff. iii. 214 f.
xiii. 23 iii. 213 f., 227_{10, 11}.
xiii. 33 iii. 342.
xiv. 6 iii. 315.
xiv. 16 iii. 373₉.
xiv. 31 iii. 337.
xvi. 27 f. iii. 311.
xvii. 2 f. iii. 309.
xviii. 12-28 iii. 347 f.₅.
xviii. 13 iii. 352₁₂.
xviii. 13-28 iii. 270, 291 f.₁₁.
xviii. 15 f. iii. 215, 228₁₃, 231₁₇.
xviii. 20, 36 iii. 342, 354₁₆. xviii. 28 iii. 274, 282, 293₁₄.
xix. 2-5 iii. 353₁₂.
xix. 13 iii. 352 f.₁₂.
xix. 14 iii. 295 f.₁₆.
xix. 14 ff. iii. 309.
xix. 20 iii. 333.
xix. 25 iii. 187.
xix. 26 iii. 215.
xix. 27 iii. 231₁₇.
xix. 35 iii. 207, 217-223, 223₂, 228 ff._{13, 15, 16}.
xix. 36 f. iii. 217.
xix. 37 iii. 354₁₅.
xix. 39 iii. 196₃.
xx. iii. 302.
xx. 1-8 iii. 343.
xx. 2 iii. 272 f.
xx. 17 iii. 310.
xx. 19-29 iii. 233.
xx. 30 f. iii. 232, 301, 303 f.
xx. 31 iii. 207, 223₁, 223₂,
308 ff.
xxi. iii. 232-254.
xxi. 2 iii. 333₁₄.
xxi. 6 ff. iii. 407₁₀.
xxi. 11 iii. 252₄.
xxi. 15-17 iii. 240 f., 252₄.
xxi. 18 f. ii. 213 f.
xxi. 18, 19 iii. 241 ff., 253₄.
xxi. 20-23 iii. 240-247, 252 f.₄.
xxi. 24 f. iii. 235 - 240,
250 ff._{2, 3}.
Acts of John and
Peter on } iii. 250 f.₂.
Tatian } Theodore of Mops.) xxiv. 34 iii. 333.

ACTS.

- i. 1 ii. 460; iii. 43, 54, 59, 61, 85₁₀, 88₁₆.
i. 13 ii. 429; iii. 77, 92₂₆, 210.
i. 13 f. . . . ii. 448 f.₇.
ii. 1 ii. 429, 447₇; iii.
141₂₈.
ii. 2 ii. 429, 447₇.
ii. 5 ff., 9 i. 61₈.
ii. 9 f. . . . ii. 138.
iv. 6 iii. 77, 99.
iv. 36 i. 12.
v. 36 iii. 132 f.₆.
v. 37 iii. 77, 96.
vi. 1 i. 60 f.₈, 71₂₁.
vi. 5 iii. 29₆, 419.
vi. 7 i. 66 f.₁₂.
vi. 9 i. 39, 60₈.
viii. 1-3 iii. 30₈.
viii. 10 iii. 137₁₄.
viii. 26 iii. 164₁₁.
ix. 24 f. . . . iii. 140₂₃.
ix. 29 i. 53, 60 f.₈.
x. 1 i. 60₈.
x. 36 f. . . . ii. 460.
xi. 20 i. 60₈.
xi. 20 f. . . . iii. 55.
xi. 25 iii. 478.
xi. 26 ii. 191 f.₁₀.
xi. 27 iii. 2, 14, 28₆, 143.
Text of iii. 4₈.

Harnack's criticism of the β text of iii. 4₃.

- xi. 27 f. . . . iii. 55.
xi. 27-30 iii. 456 ff.
xi. 28 iii. 68.
xii. 1 ff. . . . iii. 29₇.
xii. 1-23 iii. 456 ff.
xii. 2 iii. 188, 194₂.
xii. 10 iii. 15, 29₇.
xii. 12 ii. 429, 445₁, 447 f.₇.
xii. 12-17 ii. 493.
xii. 19-23 iii. 133₆.
xii. 25 ii. 445₁; iii. 140₂₅, 456.
xiii. 7-12 iii. 463 ff.
xiii. 9 iii. 127.
xiii. 23-29 ii. 377₂.
xiv. 11-14 i. 180.
xiv. 28 ff. . . . iii. 478 f.
xv. iii. 153 ff.
xv. 1-5 iii. 18, 32₁₁.
xv. 1-23 iii. 124 f.
xv. 5 iii. 149.
xv. 20 iii. 18 f., 33₁₂, 35₁₅.
xv. 21 i. 131₁.

ACTS—continued.

- xv. 23-29 i. 146; iii. 100,
134₈.
xv. 28 f. . . . iii. 19 ff., 33 f.₁₂, 35₁₃, 14, 15, 164₁₀.
xv. 30-34 i. 207 f.₁.
xvi. 1 f. . . . i. 209₂.
xvi. 1-6 i. 188 f.₄.
xvi. 4 i. 179.
xvi. 6 i. 176 f., 188 f.₄.
xvi. 6, 7 i. 207₁.
xvi. 10 iii. 55, 86₁₂.
xvi. 10-18 iii. 142 ff.
xvi. 12 i. 532₁.
xvi. 13 i. 534₁.
xvi. 14 i. 533₁.
xvi. 17 iii. 86 f.₁₂.
xvii. 1 i. 212₄.
xvii. 2 i. 212₅.
xvii. 4 i. 212₆.
xvii. 14 f. . . . i. 214₇.
xvii. 15 iii. 140₂₂.
xvii. 23 iii. 162 f.₇.
xvii. 28 i. 52, 71₁₉.
xviii. 2 i. 265₃; iii. 466 f.
xviii. 12-17 iii. 467 f.
xviii. 12 iii. 68.
xviii. 13 i. 267₆.
xviii. 17 i. 267₆.
xviii. 21 f. . . . iii. 15, 16, 30 f.₈.
xviii. 22 iii. 452.
xviii. 23 i. 177, 190₄.
xviii. 24 i. 262, 270₁₀.
xviii. 24-28 iii. 123.
xviii. 25 iii. 82₄, 331₁₂.
xviii. 26 iii. 82₄.
xviii. 27, 28 i. 270₁₁.
xix. 1 iii. 16, 30 f.₈.
xix. 1-7 iii. 331 f.₁₂.
xix. 8-10 i. 199₁.
xix. 23 ff. . . . iii. 150, 163₈.
xx. 1-4 f. . . . iii. 15.
xx. 3 iii. 15, 17.
xx. 3 ff. . . . iii. 56, 87₁₃.
xx. 4 f. . . . i. 209₂; iii. 31 f.₆.
xx. 5-xxi. 18 iii. 142 ff.
xx. 11 iii. 32₁₀.
xx. 12 iii. 17 f., 32₁₀.
xx. 25 ii. 56, 68₃.
xx. 27 ii. 372.
xx. 29 iii. 368.
xx. 35 ii. 381₄.
xxi. 1 iii. 87₁₈.
xxi. 9 iii. 17.
xxi. 10 iii. 127.
xxi. 16 iii. 18.
xxi. 18 iii. 87₁₃.
xxi. 21, 24 iii. 82₄.

ROMANS—continued.

- ROMANS.

- Evidence for
- $\epsilon\nu$

- | | |
|-------------------|---|
| xvi. 3-13 . . . | ii. 350 f. |
| xvi. 5 . . . | ii. 505 ₅ . |
| xvi. 6 . . . | i. 430 ₁ ; ii. 504 ₅ . |
| xvi. 7 . . . | i. 418 ₂₃ ; iii. 453. |
| xvi. 8 ff. . . . | i. 419 f. ²⁴ . |
| xvi. 13 | i. 392; ii. 489 f.,
504 ₅ . |
| xvi. 14 f. . . . | i. 430 ₂ ; ii. 351. |
| xvi. 17 ff. . . . | i. 425, 430 ₃ . |
| xvi. 24 | i. 409 ₁₃ . |
| xvi. 25 | ii. 370, 377 ₂ . |
| xvi. 25-27 . . . | i. 379 ff., 396 ₃ -
412 ₁₆ . |

Relation of Jude

- 1 CORINTHIANS.

- | | |
|----------------------|--|
| i. 2 | i. 282, 297 f. ₈ . |
| i. 6 | ii. 377 ₂ . |
| i. 12 | i. 298 ₉ . |
| i. 13 | i. 303 ₁₁ . |
| i. 17 | ii. 382 ₄ . |
| iii. 16-20 | i. 288 ₄ . |
| v. 1 | i. 296 ₄ . |
| v. 1 ff. | i. 332 ff. |
| v. 8 | i. 276. |
| v. 9 | ii. 285 ₆ . |
| v. 9-11 f. | i. 261, 270 ₉ , 322. |
| vi. 12 | i. 276. |
| vii. 1 | i. 270 ₉ ; ii. 285 ₅ . |

PHILIPPIANS.

- | | |
|------------|--|
| i. 3 ff. | i. 526, 534 f. ₂ . |
| i. 12 ff. | i. 537 ₅ , 541 f. |
| i. 13 | i. 541 f., 551 ff. ₂ . |
| i. 14 ff. | i. 542 f. |
| i. 14-18 | i. 543 f., 548. |
| i. 15-18 | i. 557 f. |
| i. 19 | i. 554 ₃ . |
| i. 19-26 | i. 544 f. |
| i. 20 | i. 546, 555 ₄ . |
| i. 25 f. | i. 545 f., 554 f. ₃ . |
| i. 27 | i. 563 ₅ . |
| ii. 5-11 | i. 557. |
| ii. 14-18 | i. 536 ₄ , 546. |
| ii. 19-24 | i. 546 f. |
| ii. 19-23 | ii. 66. |
| iii. 1 | i. 525, 530, 535 ₃ . |
| iii. 3 f. | i. 538 f. ₇ . |
| iii. 18 f. | i. 539 ₈ . |
| iv. 2 | i. 529, 537 ₆ , 559,
561 f. ₄ . |
| iv. 15 | i. 257, 534 ₂ . |
| iv. 15 f. | i. 534 ₂ . |
| iv. 16 | i. 212 ₅ . |
| iv. 22 | i. 550 f. ₁ . |

COLOSSIANS.

- | | |
|-------------------------|---|
| i. 7 | i. 449 f. ₃ . |
| i. 14-23 | i. 467. |
| i. 25 | i. 461, 471 f. ₁ . |
| ii. 1-5 | i. 462, 472 ₂ . |
| ii. 10-15 | i. 474 f. ₅ . |
| ii. 11 | ii. 382 ₄ . |
| ii. 16 | i. 472 f. ₃ . |
| ii. 18 ff. | i. 468 f. |
| ii. 18 | i. 475 ₆ . |
| ii. 20 | i. 473 ₅ . |
| ii. 23 | i. 468 f., 478 ₇ . |
| iii. 1-17 | i. 469 f. |
| iii. 11 | ii. 152 ₁ . |
| iii. 16 | ii. 371, 378 ₂ . |
| iii. 18-iv. 6 | i. 470. |
| iv. 9 | i. 439, 446 ₁ . |
| iv. 10 | ii. 428, 431, 601 f. |
| iv. 10 f. | i. 451 ₄ ; ii. 371. |
| iv. 10-14 | iii. 1 f., 4 ₂ . |
| iv. 14 | iii. 1 f. |
| iv. 15 | i. 455 ₁ . |
| iv. 15-17 | i. 499. |
| iv. 16 | i. 479, 486, 487 ₁ ;
ii. 285 ₅ . |
| iv. 17 | i. 446 f. ₁ . |

1 THESSALONIANS.

- | | |
|------------|------------------|
| i. 8 f. | i. 197-8, 205 f. |
| ii. 14 ff. | i. 248 f. |

1 THESSALONIANS—continued.

- | | |
|-------------------|--|
| iii. 1 f. | i. 205, 210 ₃ . |
| iii. 3 | i. 218, 222 f. ₂ . |
| iv. 2 | ii. 383 ₄ . |
| iv. 11 f. | i. 221, 223 ₃ . |
| iv. 15 | i. 221, 223 ₄ ; ii.
382 ₄ . |
| v. 1-5 | ii. 382 f. ₄ . |

2 THESSALONIANS.

- | | |
|--------------------------------------|---|
| i. 4 | i. 241 ₁₁ . |
| i. 5-10 | i. 253 f. ₁₁ . |
| ii. 2 ff. | i. 226 ff., 234 ₂ ,
242 f. |
| ii. 3-12, Relation to Nero Legend | |
| ii. 5 f. | i. 246 f., 250 f. ₇ . |
| ii. 6 f. | i. 226, 235 ₃ . |
| ii. 7 | i. 229 f., 238 f. ₉ . |
| iii. 14 f. | i. 229, 236 ₃ . |
| iii. 17 | i. 232, 242 ₁₂ . |
| | i. 231, 241 ₁₁ , 242 f., 245. |

1 TIMOTHY.

- | | |
|---|---|
| i. 3. | ii. 27 f., 38 ₁ . |
| i. 3, Hug on . . . | ii. 35 f., 42 ₈ . |
| i. 4 . . . | ii. 39 ₃ . |
| i. 8-11 . . . | ii. 105. |
| i. 20 . . . | ii. 22 ₃ , 42 ₇ , 108. |
| ii. 1 . . . | ii. 32, 39 ff. ₄ . |
| ii. 2 . . . | ii. 130 f. ₁₉ . |
| ii. 8 ff. . . . | ii. 40 ₄ . |
| iii. 1 f. . . . | ii. 124 ₆ . |
| iii. 1-13 . . . | ii. 32 f., 91. |
| iii. 2, 12 . . . | ii. 95. |
| iii. 2, 12, Patristic and modern interpretations of | ii. 125 f. ₁₀ . |
| iii. 11 | ii. 94. |
| iii. 14 f. . . . | ii. 39 ₂ . |
| iii. 16 | ii. 131 ₂₀ . |
| iv. 1 | ii. 260 ₁₀ . |
| iv. 1 ff. . . . | ii. 117 f. |
| iv. 13 | ii. 385 ₈ . |
| iv. 14 | ii. 98. |
| v. 3-16 | ii. 94. |
| v. 18 | ii. 119, 382 ₄ . |
| vi. 3 | ii. 39 ₃ , 371, 378 ₂ . |
| vi. 3-10 | ii. 101, 107 f. |
| vi. 20 | ii. 130 ₁₈ . |
| vi. 21 | ii. 42 ₇ , 107 f. |

2 TIMOTHY.

- | | | |
|------|-----------|-----------------------|
| i. 5 | | ii. 22 ₄ . |
| i. 6 | | ii. 98. |

2 TIMOTHY—continued.

- i. 16 f. ii. 1 f., 19 f.₁.
 ii. 17 ii. 21₃, 108 f., 117, 129₁₇.
 iii. 1-5 ii. 113 f.
 iii. 6-19 ii. 114 f.
 iv. 3 ii. 112 f., 114 f.
 iv. 4 ii. 113.
 iv. 7 ii. 9 f.
 iv. 10 i. 186₄, 416₁₉; ii.
 11 f., 25 f.₈, 48.
 iv. 11 ii. 430, 431.
 iv. 11-13 ii. 371.
 iv. 12 ff. ii. 15 ff.
 iv. 14 f. ii. 16 f., 21 f.₃, 42₇.
 iv. 16 f. ii. 6-14, 18 f., 23 f.₆.
 iv. 17 ii. 11 f.
 iv. 20 ii. 14 f., 26₉.
 iv. 21 ii. 20 f.₂.
 iv. 22 ii. 42₇.

TITUS.

- i. 5 ii. 46 f., 124 f.₇.
 i. 5-9 ii. 67₁.
 i. 6 ii. 95.
 i. 6, Patristic and modern interpretations of . . . ii. 125 f.₁₀.
 i. 9 ii. 100.
 i. 10-16 ii. 44 ff.
 i. 12 i. 52; ii. 44, 52₁.
 i. 14-16 ii. 105 f.
 ii. 8 ii. 45.
 iii. 12 f. ii. 48 f., 53 f._{3,4}.
 iii. 12 iii. 454.
 iii. 15 ii. 45.

PHILEMON.

- 1 f. i. 452, 455₁.
 2 i. 455₁.
 5-7 i. 454, 455₂.
 7 i. 455₂.
 9 i. 457₆.
 11 i. 456₅.
 18 f. i. 456₄.
 20 i. 456₅.
 22 i. 442, 444, 550.
 23 f. i. 440 f., 450 f.₄.
 24 i. 442, 451₄; ii.
 601; iii. 1 f.

HEBREWS.

- i. 1 ii. 324, 338₈.
 ii. 3 f. ii. 315.

HEBREWS—continued.

- ii. 3 ii. 347, 352, 364₁₅.
 iii. 7-11 ii. 320 ff., 337₆.
 iii. 9 ii. 320 f., 323 f., 351.
 iii. 15-iv. 11 . . . ii. 322 f.
 v. 7 f. ii. 362₁₄, 380₄.
 v. 12 ii. 319, 339₁₀, 350.
 vi. 1 ii. 325 f., 338₇, 339₁₀.
 vi. 4-8 ii. 302, 303.
 vi. 10 ii. 317, 336₈.
 vii. 27 ii. 361 ff.₁₄.
 ix. 4 ii. 363 f.₁₄.
 ix. 6 ff. ii. 340 f.₁₃.
 ix. 14 ii. 326 f., 339₁₀.
 x. 11 ii. 362.
 x. 25 ii. 339 f.₁₁, 348 f.
 x. 30 ii. 365₁₅.
 x. 32 ff. ii. 347.
 x. 32-34 ii. 317 ff., 336 f.₅.
 x. 34 ii. 304, 312₁₄.
 xi. 14-16 ii. 140.
 xii. 4 ii. 318.
 xii. 13 ii. 361₁₂.
 xii. 22 ii. 339₁₀.
 xiii. 4 ii. 333.
 xiii. 7 ii. 316, 319, 320,
 347.
 xiii. 7-25 ii. 297.
 xiii. 8 ii. 336₂.
 xiii. 9 ii. 331, 340₁₂.
 xiii. 10-16 ii. 324 f., 331, 338₉.
 xiii. 13 f. ii. 359 f.₉.
 xiii. 17 f. ii. 316, 335 f.₂.
 xiii. 18-24 ii. 304.
 xiii. 22 ii. 313.
 xiii. 23, Interpretation of Baur . . ii. 360₁₀.
 xiii. 24 ii. 345, 350, 358₈.

JAMES.

- i. 1 i. 74 f., 78 f.₄, 79₅,
 79₆, 93, 100₁₂,
 150₇.
 i. 9 ff. i. 86, 98₅.
 i. 12 i. 122.
 i. 17 i. 118₅.
 i. 18 i. 149₇.
 i. 20 f. i. 96₂.
 i. 26 f. i. 97₃.
 ii. 1 ff. i. 87 f.
 ii. 1 i. 151₇.
 ii. 2 i. 83, 94₁.
 ii. 5 i. 99₇, 116₁.
 ii. 7 i. 99₈.

JAMES—continued.

- ii. 14-26 . . . i. 122, 124 ff., 130 ff., 149 f.₇.
ii. 18 f. . . . i. 97.₄.
ii. 23. . . . i. 120.₈.
ii. 25. . . . i. 91.
iii. 9, 14 . . . i. 95 f.₂.
iv. 2, 4 . . . i. 87.
iv. 5. . . . i. 120.₉.
v. 7. . . . ii. 486.₉.
v. 11. . . . i. 77.₁.
v. 12. . . . ii. 595.₁₀.
v. 14. . . . i. 122.

1 PETER.

- i. 1 i. 185.₃; ii. 134, 146, 151 ff.₁₋₅,
154 f.₇.
i. 3 f. . . . ii. 147 f., 156.₁₀.
i. 4 ii. 186.₄.
i. 6 f. . . . i. 133.₃.
i. 8 ii. 147, 156.₁₀.
i. 10-12. . . . ii. 146.
i. 14 ii. 144, 187.₄.
i. 14-28. . . . ii. 186.₄.
i. 17 ii. 139 ff.
ii. 4-8 ii. 188.₄.
ii. 4-10 ii. 186 f.₄.
ii. 6 ff. . . . ii. 188.₄.
ii. 10. . . . ii. 142 f.
ii. 11. . . . ii. 139 ff.
ii. 12. . . . ii. 181, 189.₈.
ii. 13 f. . . . ii. 181 f.
ii. 13-17 ii. 187.₄.
ii. 25. . . . ii. 144, 154.₆.
iii. 9 ii. 187.₄.
iii. 15 ii. 184, 191.₉.
iii. 19 ii. 289.₉.
iii. 20 ii. 289.₉.
iv. 1 ii. 188.₄.
iv. 2 f. . . . ii. 186.₄.
iv. 12 ii. 179 ff.
iv. 14-16 . . . ii. 180 ff., 189 - 194.₈₋₁₀, 190 f.₉.
v. 1 ii. 146 f.
v. 4 ii. 141.
v. 5 ii. 146 f.
v. 9 ii. 158 f., 179 ff.
v. 12. . . . ii. 145, 149 f., 157 f.₁₂, 174 f.
v. 12-14 . . . ii. 148.
v. 13. . . . ii. 148, 157.₁₁, 158 ff., 162.₂-173.₄, 427,
431, 445.₂, 450.₁₀,
601.

1 PETER—continued.

- v. 13, Clement of Alex. on. . . ii. 448.₉.
v. 14. . . . ii. 135.

2 PETER.

- i. 1 ii. 194, 206,
218 f._{8, 9}.
i. 3 f. . . . ii. 207, 220 f.₁₀.
i. 4 ii. 222.
i. 9 ii. 222 f., 232.₁.
i. 12 ff. . . . ii. 199 f., 211 ff.₃, 221.
i. 14 ii. 169, 212 ff.₃.
i. 15 ii. 200, 215.₆, 272 f., 286.₈.
i. 16-18. . . . ii. 200 ff., 204 ff., 215 f.₆, 223, 274.
ii. 1-iii. 4 . . . ii. 250.
ii. 1 f., interpretation of Spitta . ii. 233 f.₂.
ii. 1 ii. 231.
ii. 1-3 ii. 224, 232 f.₂.
ii. 2 ii. 229 f.
ii. 4 ii. 225, 288 f.₇.
ii. 5 ii. 289.₉.
ii. 10 f. . . . ii. 225.
ii. 10-22 . . . ii. 229.
ii. 13. . . . ii. 211.₁, 229, 235 f.₃, 292.₁₅.
ii. 13 f. . . . ii. 225, 235 f.₃.
ii. 15. . . . ii. 225, 291.₁₄.
ii. 16. . . . ii. 291.₁₄.
ii. 18. . . . ii. 225, 229.
ii. 20-22 . . . ii. 232.₁.
iii. 1 f. . . . ii. 195 f., 199, 202, 210 f.₁, 211.₂, 271 f.
iii. 2 ii. 204 f., 218.₇.
iii. 3 ii. 251 f.
iii. 3 f. . . . ii. 196, 226, 230, 236.₄.
iii. 4 ii. 231, 236.₅.
iii. 4, view of Spitta ii. 236 ff.₅.
iii. 15 ii. 209.
iii. 15 f. . . . ii. 198 f., 211.₂, 274 ff., 290.₁₀.
iii. 16 ii. 277, 290.₁₀, 11, 12.
iii. 16-17 . . . ii. 227 ff.

1 JOHN.

- i. 1 iii. 314 f., 329.₆, 373.₉.
i. 1-3 iii. 344.
i. 1-4 iii. 356-361, 370.₂ &
i. 14 iii. 373.₉.

1 JOHN—continued.

- ii. 1 iii. 373₉.
 ii. 14. iii. 360, 370 f.₄.
 ii. 18 ff. iii. 363, 371₅.
 ii. 19. iii. 332₁₂.
 iii. 12-15 ii. 257₅.
 iv. 3 iii. 365, 371 f.₆.
 iv. 5 iii. 373₈.
 iv. 6 iii. 377.
 iv. 9 iii. 326₃.
 iv. 14-16 iii. 370₃.
 v. 5 ff. iii. 365 f., 372₇.
 v. 6 ff. ii. 380₄.
 v. 7 iii. 372₇.
 v. 21 iii. 356, 363.

2 JOHN.

- 1 ii. 148, 157₁₁; iii.
 379 f., 383₈.
 5 iii. 379 f., 383₈.
 7 ff. iii. 364 f., 372₆.
 8 iii. 384₉.
 11 iii. 373₈.
 12 iii. 370₂, 378.
 13 ii. 148, 157₁₁.

3 JOHN.

- 9 ff. iii. 375 ff., 378, 381 f.₄₋₆.
 12. iii. 377.

JUDE.

- 1 ii. 238 f., 256₂, 268.
 3 ii. 241 f., 256 f.₃,
 269, 286_{5, 6}.
 3, Spitta's interpretation of ii. 286₆.
 4 ii. 241 f., 247, 248 ff., 257₄, 259 f.₉, 260₁₁,
 265 f., 285 f.₅.
 5 ii. 252 ff., 260 ff.₁₂.
 5, text of ii. 260 f.₁₂.
 8 ii. 246, 292₁₅.
 8-16, varying interpretations of ii. 292₁₅.
 9, relation to the "Assumption of Moses" ii. 288₇.
 11 ii. 244 f., 246 f., 257 f.₅, 291₁₄.
 12. ii. 211₁, 235₃, 243,
 245 f., 257₄, 258₅.
 14 f., text of ii. 286 f.₇.
 14 f., relation to Book of Enoch ii. 286 f.₇.

JUDE—continued.

- 15 f. ii. 246.
 17 f. ii. 239, 250 f., 265 f., 285 f.₅.
 18. ii. 251, 260₁₀.
 19. ii. 244, 258₆, 279.
 21-23 ii. 248, 258 f.₈.
 23. ii. 246.
 24 f., relation to
 Rom. xvi. 25-27 ii. 291₁₃.

REVELATION.

- i. 1 f. ii. 378₂; iii. 384, 391, 402₁, 403 f.₅.
 i. 3-iii. 22 iii. 434₂.
 i. 3 ii. 385₈.
 i. 4 iii. 435₇.
 i. 4 f. iii. 391 f., 403 f.₅.
 i. 7 f. iii. 354₁₅, 389, 444.
 i. 9 iii. 408 f., 420₁.
 i. 10 f. iii. 402₁.
 i. 11 iii. 391, 404₆.
 i. 17 iii. 430, 434₃.
 i. 19 iii. 392, 404₆, 422₆.
 i. 20 iii. 413 f., 422 f.₆.
 ii. 1 iii. 423₆.
 ii. 2-6 ii. 292₁₅.
 ii. 2, 6 iii. 419, 427₁₂.
 ii. 8 ff. iii. 416 f., 426₉.
 ii. 12-17 iii. 410, 420₂.
 ii. 13 f. iii. 421₂.
 ii. 14. ii. 235₃, 291 f.₁₄;
 iii. 163₁₀, 417 f.
 ii. 20. ii. 292₁₅; iii. 163₁₀,
 416, 418, 423 ff.₇.
 ii. 23. iii. 424₇.
 ii. 24. iii. 163₁₀, 417 f., 426 f.₁₁.
 iii. 1 iii. 416, 425 f.₈.
 iii. 14 iii. 316, 329 f.₈.
 iv. 1 f. iii. 392 f., 402₁, 404₆.
 v. 1 iii. 393, 405 f.₇.
 vi. 1-17 iii. 395 f.
 vi. 9 ff. iii. 409.
 vii. 1-17 iii. 396 f.
 viii. 1 iii. 395 ff.
 viii. 2-ix. 21 iii. 397 f.
 x. 4 iii. 398, 405₈.
 x. 11. iii. 202₁₄.
 xi. 1 ff. iii. 398 f.
 xi. 1-18 iii. 438 f.
 xi. 8 iii. 398, 406₉.
 xi. 19-xiv. 20. iii. 399 f.
 xiii. 1 ff. iii. 439 ff., 446₂.
 xiii. 18 iii. 182, 436, 444,
 447₄.

REVELATION—continued.

xiv. 6	ii. 373.
xv. 1-7	iii. 402 ₁ .
xv. 1-xvi. 17 . . .	iii. 400.
xvii. 1-xviii. 24 . .	iii. 400.
xvii. 6	iii. 410.
xvii. 8 ff. . . .	iii. 436, 441 ff., 446 f. ₂ .
xviii. 20	ii. 165 ₄ ; iii. 403 ₂ , 410.
xviii. 24	iii. 410.

REVELATION—continued.

xix. 10	ii. 378.
xix. 11-16	iii. 315 f., 329 ₇ .
xix. 11-xxi. 18 . .	iii. 400.
xx. 4	iii. 409 f.
xxi. 2	iii. 406 f. ₁₀ .
xxi. 8-xxii. 5 . . .	iii. 400 f.
xxi. 10	iii. 406 f. ₁₀ .
xxi. 14	iii. 430.
xxii. 12-16	iii. 403 ₄ .
xxii. 21	iii. 403 ₄ .

B.—OLD TESTAMENT PASSAGES.

GENESIS.

iv.	ii. 257 ₅ .
v. 1	ii. 563 ₂ .

ISAIAH.

vii. 14	ii. 537.
viii. 23-ix. 1 . . .	ii. 541.

LEVITICUS.

xix. 12, 36	ii. 595 ₁₀ .
---------------------	-------------------------

HOSEA.

i. 2	ii. 481 ₂ .
----------------	------------------------

PSALMS.

xcv. 7b-11. . . .	ii. 320 f., 337 ₆ .
-------------------	--------------------------------

BARNABAS.

iv. 14	ii. 526 f. ₅ .
------------------	---------------------------

C.—GREEK WORDS.

(The words found in this Index unaccented follow the form of the words adopted by Dr. Zahn in the text of his book, and represent simple transliterations from the Hebrew and Aramaic.)

αββα, i. 16₃, 48 f. ἀγαπᾶν, iii. 227₁₀, 249₁, 289₈.
 ἀγάπη, ii. 211₁, 229, 235₃; iii. 289₈.
 ἀγαπητός, iii. 326₃, 356.
 ἀγαρεύνειν, i. 66₁₁.
 ἄγγελος, iii. 133₆, 402₁, 413-417, 422 f.₆.
 ἄγιοι, οἱ, i. 455₂, 506 f.; ii. 257₃, 336₃.
 ἀγίρας, i. 26₁₂.
 ἀδικεῖν, i. 349₆.
 Ἀδρίας, iii. 138₂₀.
 ἄζυμα, iii. 296 f.₁₇.
 ἄθεσμος, ii. 228.
 αἵρεσις, ii. 232 f.₂.
 αἰρετικοί, ii. 100.
 αἰῶνες, i. 498, 515 f.₅.
 Ἀκελδαμα, i. 281₅.
 ἀληθινός, iii. 218.
 ἀλληλουῖα, i. 12.

ἄλλος, ii. 277, 290₁₂.
 ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, ii. 190₉.
 ἀμαθής, ii. 228 f.
 ἀμαθία, ii. 229.
 αμην, i. 13, 18₃; iii. 136₁₂, 316, 329 f.₈.
 ἀναβαίνειν, iii. 30₈.
 ἀνάγνωσις, ii. 385₈.
 ἀναγράφειν, iii. 31.
 ἀνθρώπινος, ii. 188₄.
 ἄνθρωποι, ii. 613 f.₂.
 Ἀννας, i. 17₃.
 ἀνομία, i. 229, 240₉, 251₈.
 ἄνός (adj. ending), ii. 193. ἀντίδικος, i. 64₁₁.
 ἀντίθεος, i. 226, 228, 252₉.
 ἀντίχριστος, i. 227 ff., 240₉.
 ἄνωθεν, ii. 170, 214₃; iii. 52 f.
 ἄπαξ, ii. 256₃, 260₁₂.

- ἀπεκδύεσθαι, i. 474₆, 521₉.
 ἀπό, i. 60₈; ii. 358₆, 384₈; iii. 29₇, 435₇.
 with gen., ii. 578.
 ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, iii. 46 f., 84₇.
 ἀποδορίζειν, ii. 258₈.
 Ἀπολλῶς, i. 270₁₀.
 ἀπολογία, i. 540.
 ἀπόστολος, ἀποστολή, i. 210₃, 354,
 370 f.₂, 505 f., 507; ii. 206 f., 220₁₀, 386 f.; iii. 78 f., 226 f.₉.
 ἀρετή, ii. 289₉.
 ἀρχή, ἀρχαί, ii. 457 ff.; iii. 162₈.
 ασαρtha, i. 26₁₂.
 ἀσσάριον, i. 41, 66₁₁.
 ἀστήρικτος, ii. 228 f.
 ἄστος, iii. 161₅.
 αὐλή, ii. 504₄.
 αὐτήκοος, ii. 439.
 αὐτόπτης, ii. 439; iii. 46 f., 82₅, 84₇, 130₁. ἀφέωνται, ii. 612₁.
 ἀφωρισμένος, i. 68₁₅; ii. 258₈.
 Βαραββας, i. 30 f.₁₆.
 βάρβαρος, i. 26₁₂, 59₃; iii. 139₂₀.
 Βαρθολομαῖος, i. 31₁₈.
 Βαριωνα, i. 17.
 βάρος, i. 516₇.
 Βαρναβας, i. 31₁₆.
 Βαρσαβας, i. 31₁₆.
 βασανίζεσθαι, iii. 160₅.
 βασιλεία τ. οὐρανῶν, ἡ, ii. 539 f., 568₈, 10.
 βασιλεῖς, ii. 130 f.₁₉.
 βᾶτος (βάδους), iii. 136₁₂.
 Βεελζεβουλ, i. 19₃.
 βελώνη, iii. 162₈.
 Βηθεσδα, i. 28₁₅; iii. 353₁₃.
 Βηθφαγη, i. 29₁₅.
 βιβλίον, iii. 393 f., 405 f.₇, 8.
 Βοανηργες, i. 16₃.
 Βασορ, ii. 292₁₄.
 Γαββαθα, i. 28₁₅.
 Γαλατία, Γαλλία, i. 174 ff., 188 f.; ii. 25 f.₈.
 Γαλατική χώρα, ἡ, i. 187 ff.₄.
 γεεννα, i. 19₃; ii. 488.
 Γεθσημανει, i. 29₁₅.
 γειώρας, i. 30, 67₁₃; ii. 153₄.
 γενεαλογία, ii. 103 ff., 128 f.₁₈, 562 f.₂.
 γένεσις, γέννησις, ii. 531 f., 562₁.
 Γεννησάρ, ἡ, iii. 333₁₄.
 γνωστός, iii. 231₁₇.
 Γολγοθα, i. 29₁₅.
 γράμματα, γραφή, ii. 277, 290₁₂.
 γράφειν διά τινος, ii. 157₁₂.
 γράφω, ἔγραψα, i. 172 f.₄, 345 f.₈; ii.
 39₂; iii. 238 f., 370 f.₄.
 Δαλματία, i. 186₄.
 δέειν, ii. 569₁₀, 578.
 δεικνύναι, iii. 402₁.
 Δεκάπολις, ἡ, i. 35.
 δεσπότης, ii. 234 f.₂.
 δηνάριον, i. 41, 65₁₁; ii. 503₄.
 διά, with acc., i. 437₁; iii. 420₁.
 with gen., iii. 372₇.
 διὰ μέσον, iii. 90₁₉.
 διάβολος, ὁ, i. 19₃, 520; iii. 136₁₂.
 διαθήκη, i. 41, 65₁₁. διακονεῖν, ii. 613₂.
 διάκονος, ii. 91 f., 123 f.₄.
 διάλεκτος, i. 27₁₃, 54 f.
 διασπορά, i. 80₇, 82₉; ii. 140 f., 153 f.₅.
 διδασκαλία, ii. 133.
 διδάσκαλος, i. 116₂.
 διδαχή, i. 116₂; ii. 133.
 δικαιοσύνη, ii. 593₁₀.
 δοκίμιος, τὸ δοκίμιον, i. 133₃; ii. 186₈.
 δύναμις, ii. 215₆.
 δυσεντέριον, iii. 161₅.
 Ἑβραῖος, i. 48 ff., 59₃, 60 f.₈, 67₁₄; ii.
 296 f., 307₄, 359₈.
 ἑβραΐζειν, ἑβραϊστί, ἑβραῖς διάλεκτος, i.
 11 ff., 26 f.₁₂; ii. 525₄. ἐγκαταλείπειν, ii. 339₁₁.
 ἐθελοθησκεία, i. 478₇.
 ἔθνος, i. 68₁₅, 354 f., 370 f.₂.
 εἰ (oath), ii. 502₂.
 ἐκ, gen. partitive, iii. 284₂, 353₁₄, 435₆.
 "ἐκείνος," iii. 219 f., 228 f.₁₃, 16.
 ἐκκλησία, i. 297₇; ii. 550; iii. 30₈; in Paul's Epistles, i. 504 f.
 ἐκλεκτή, ii. 157₁₁.
 ἐκλεκτός, ἐκλέγεσθαι, ii. 153₄, 157₁₁;
 iii. 227₉, 284₂.
 Ἑλλήν, ἑλληνίς, ἑλληνικός, i. 24₇, 36, 58₂, 373 f.₄.
 ἑλληνική διάλεκτος, ἡ, i. 54-57.
 Ἑλληνιστής, i. 60 f.₈, 71 f.₂₁.
 ἐνέστηκεν, i. 235₂.
 ἔξοδος, ii. 215₆, 398 f.₇.
 ἐορτή, ἡ, iii. 285 f.₄, 476.
 ἐπιδημεῖν, i. 61₈.
 ἐπιούσιος, ii. 594.
 ἐπίσκοπος, ii. 32, 90 ff., 123 f.₄, 124₆;
 iii. 416 f., 422 f.₆.
 ἐπιστάτης, iii. 38₁₈, 69, 136₁₂.
 ἐπιστρέφειν, ii. 154₆.
 ἐπισυναγωγή, i. 236₄, 255; ii. 340₁₁, 347, 350.
 ἐπιφάνεια, i. 255; ii. 133, 215₆.
 ἐπιχειρεῖν, iii. 29₇, 44, 82 f.₅, 6.
 ἔργα, interchanging with τέκνα, ii.
 594₁₀.

ἔργα νεκρά, ii. 326, 339₁₀.
 ἐρμηνεύειν, ii. 511 ff.
 ἐρμηνευτής, ii. 394, 442 f., 451₁₂, 454 f.₁₅.
 ἔρχεσθαι, ii. 505₇, 589₄; iii. 372₇.
 ἐτεροδιδασκαλεῖν (meaning), ii. 126 f.₁₂.
 ἐτεροδιδάσκαλοι—
 in Pastoral Epistles, ii. 126₁₁.
 Origin, ii. 117.
 Patristic application of references in Pauline Epistles, ii. 128₁₄.
 Relation to Judaizers, ii. 116.
 Relation to Ebionism, ii. 116.
 Relation to Petrine Party, ii. 116.
 Relation to Jewish teachers in Col-ossæ, ii. 116.
 Relation to Marcion's teaching, ii.
 118.
 Relation to Jewish teachers in Ignatius, ii. 116.
 ἐτεροδιδασκαλοῦντες, ii. 96 f., 101 ff.
 ἔτερος, ii. 277, 290₁₂.
 εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, i. 165, 171₂, 372₃; ii.
 481₃. εὐαγγέλιον, i. 507; ii. 373, 385₇, 386 ff., 457, 461, 481_{2, 3}; iii. 166,
 373₉.
 N.T. usage of term, ii. 481₃.
 εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ τινα, ii. 386 ff., 396 f._{1, 3}.
 εὐαγγέλιον τ. Χριστοῦ, ii. 370 f., 377 f.₂, 456 ff.
 εὐαγγελιστής, i. 507 f.; ii. 30; iii. 200₁₀.
 εὐθύς, ii. 482₄; iii. 135₁₂.
 εὐλαβής, i. 61₈.
 εφφatha, i. 15₃.
 ζηλωτής, ii. 578; iii. 77, 92₂₆.
 Ζωτικός, iii. 426₈.
 ἡγούμενος, ii. 70, 316, 347, 350.
 ἡλει=ελωϊ, i. 15₃.
 θάλασσα=λίμνη, iii. 136₁₃, 249₁, 333₁₄.
 θέλειν ἔν τινι, i. 477₇.
 θηρίον, iii. 161₈.
 θρησκεία, θρησκός, i. 97_{3, 4}, 131₁, 468 f., 477 f.₇.
 θυματήριον, ii. 363.
 θυρεός, i. 519.
 ἰανός, adj. ending, ii. 193 f.
 ἰδιος, iii. 225₅.
 ἰδιώτης, i. 25₉.
 Ἰερουσαλήμ (Ἱεροσόλυμα), i. 29₁₈; ii.
 592 f.₉.
 Ἰησοῦς, i. 451₄; ii. 260 f.₁₂, 555, 569₁₁, 576 f., 592₈; iii. 91₂₁, 371₆, 434₃.
 Ἰουδαία, i. 186₄.

Ἰουδαίος, i. 60 f.₈; ii. 561.
 in Fourth Gospel, iii. 340 f., 354₁₆.
 usage and meaning, ii. 306 f.₄.
 Ἰσκαριώτης (Ἰσκαριώθ), iii. 351₁₁.
 Ἰωάν(ν)ης, i. 17₃; iii. 227₁₁, 250₂, 433₁.
 Ἰωσηφ, Ἰωσης, Ἰωσηχ, i. 28₁₅, 29₁₆. καθαρισμός, ii. 232₁.
 καθίζειν, iii. 352 f.₁₂.
 καθιστορεῖν, iii. 7₆.
 καί, ii. 502₂, 576, 591 f.₇, 616₃; iii.
 353₁₄.
 κακοποιός, ii. 181 f., 189 f.₈.
 καλός, ii. 132.
 Κανααῖος, i. 32₁₇; ii. 578.
 Κανανίτης, ii. 578.
 καταβραβεύειν, i. 472₃, 518₉.
 καταλείπειν, ii. 340₁₁.
 κατέχον, κατέχων, i. 229 f., 236₃, 238 f.₉, 250 f.₇.
 κατήγωρ, i. 64₁₁.
 κατηχεῖν, iii. 42 f., 82₄.
 κατοικεῖν, κατοικία, i. 61₈; ii. 153₄.
 κεντυρίων, ii. 503₄; iii. 136₁₃.
 κῆνος, i. 66₁₁; ii. 503₄.
 Κήρυγμα Πέτρου, i. 475₆.
 Κηφας, i. 16₃; ii. 155₈.
 κλήσις, i. 254₁₁.
 κοδράντης, i. 41, 66₁₁; ii. 503₄; iii.
 136₁₃.
 κοινή, ἡ, i. 54.
 κολοβοδάκτυλος, ii. 445₄.
 κορβαν, κορβανᾶς, i. 16₃; ii. 577.
 κράββατος, ii. 503₄.
 κρατίστος, iii. 6₅, 42, 81₃.
 κυρία, iii. 379, 382 f.₃.
 κυριακή ἡμέρα, ἡ, iii. 426₁₀.
 κύρις, i. 41, 65₁₁.
 κύριος, ὁ, i. 150.
 in 1 and 2 Thess., i. 254₁₁
 in John, iii. 91₂₁, 249₁.
 in Jude, ii. 253, 260 f.₁₂.
 in Mark, ii. 476, 486₈.
 in Rev., iii. 434₃.
 Λάζαρος, i. 30₁₆.
 λαλιά, i. 27₁₃.
 λαμπρότατος, iii. 6₅.
 λαός, ὁ=Israel, ii. 143, 253 f., 545.
 λατρεία, λατρεύειν, ii. 326, 339₁₀.
 λεγεών, i. 41, 66₁₁.
 λεγμών, ii. 503₄.
 λεπτόν, i. 66₁₁.
 Λιβερτίνος, i. 60₈.
 λόγια, ii. 525₄, 579.
 λόγια τά, ii. 509 ff.
 λογιζομαι, i. 516₇.

- λογικός, ii. 187.
 λόγος, i. 234₂; iii. 312–321, 327 ff.₄₋₈.
 431, 434₅.
 λόγος τοῦ κυρίου, ii. 378 f.₂. λοιπός, ii. 277, 290₁₂.
 λουσάμενη, ii. 232₁.
 λύειν, ii. 569₁₀, 578.
- μαθηταί, iii. 226.
 μαμωνας, i. 18₃; iii. 135 f._{11, 12}.
 μαρναθα, i. 13, 303 ff.₁₂.
 Μαρθα, i. 30₁₆.
 Μαριαμ, i. 30₁₆.
 μαρτυρεῖν, μαρτυρία, μάρτυς, ii. 70, 155₉; iii. 205₂₇, 228₁₄, 239 f., 435₅.
 μαρτύριον τοῦ Χριστοῦ, ii. 377 f.₂.
 Ματθαῖος, ii. 524₁, 3.
 Μαθθίας, ii. 524 f.₃.
 Μεσσίας, i. 20₃; iii. 326₂.
 μονογενής, iii. 310 f., 326₃.
 μῦθοι, ii. 103 ff., 128 f.₁₅. μυστήριον, i. 229, 236₃, 413₁₇; iii. 422₆, 447₄.
 μωρός, i. 17 f.
- Ναθαναήλ, i. 31₁₆; ii. 524₁; iii. 225₆.
 ναί, iii. 330₈.
 νεκρός, ii. 326, 339₁₀.
 νομικός, ii. 54₄, 103.
 νομοδιδάσκαλοι, ii. 103, 130₁₈.
- ξένος, ii. 139.
 ξέστης, ii. 503₄.
- οἰκονομία, οἰκονόμος (θεοῦ), i. 471₁; ii. 39₃.
 οἰκουμένη, ὅ, iii. 130 f.₃. ὀνειδίζεσθαι, ii. 190₉.
 ὄνομα, iii. 381₂, 426₈.
 οὖν, in John, iii. 285₃.
 ὄχλος, iii. 351₁₀.
 ὀψώνια, i. 375₈.
- παῖδες, ii. 594₁₀.
 πάλαι, ii. 252, 260₁₁.
 πανδοκεῖν, πανδοκέυς, i. 41, 65₁₁.
 παραγγέλια, ii. 40.
 παραδιδόναι, παράδοσις, ii. 384₆; iii. 48, 84₈.
 παράκλητος, i. 41, 64₁₁; iii. 373₉.
 παρακολουθεῖν, ii. 455; iii. 6₆, 85₉.
 παραλυτικός, iii. 161₅.
 παραμένειν, i. 555₃.
 παρασκευή, ii. 488; iii. 295 f.
 παραχρήμα, iii. 161₅.
 παρπέδιλμος, ii. 139 ff., 152 f.₁. [152 f.₁.
 πάροικος, παροιμία, i. 61, 82; ii. 139 ff.,
- παρουσία, ii. 215₆.
 πασχα, i. 19₃; iii. 282 f., 296 ff.₁₇.
 πάσχειν, ii. 190₉.
 Παῦλος, iii. 140₂₅.
 πέραν τ. Ἰορδάνου, ii. 572 f., 577, 589₄.
 περιπατεῖν, ii. 332, 340₁₂; iii. 32 f.₁₁.
 περιτομῆς, οἱ ἐκ, usage of term, ii. 307₄.
 Πέτρος, ii. 219 f.
 πλάνη, ii. 247, 258₇.
 πλὴν, iii. 164₁₀.
 πληροφορεῖν, iii. 45, 50, 83 f.₆.
 πλήρωμα, i. 497 f., 515 f.₅.
 πνεῦμα, i. 207₁, 234₂; ii. 110; iii. 402₁, 2.
 πνευματικός, i. 297₅; ii. 258₆, 279.
 ποιμήν, i. 520; ii. 124₅.
 πολιτεία, πολιτεύμα, i. 520.
 πολιτάρχης, i. 211₄.
 πορθεῖν, iii. 140₂₃.
 πραιτώριον, i. 541 f., 551 ff.₂; ii. 503 f.₄.
 πράξις, πράξεις, ii. 526₄; iii. 3₁, 87₁₅.
 πρεσβύτερος, ii. 23₅, 33, 91 f., 124 f.₅₋₈; ii. 146 f., 436 ff., 452₁₃; iii. 380.
 πρεσβύτερος, ὁ, in 1 John, iii. 184, 185.
 πρεσβύτεροι, οἱ, in Clement of Alex., iii. 178, 197₅.
 in Irenæus, iii. 175, 178.
 πρεσβύτες, i. 457₆.
 προπέμπειν, i. 438₃; ii. 54₄.
 προσδοκᾶν, iii. 161.
 προσευχή, i. 523, 534₁.
 πρόσκλησις, i. 298₉.
 προφήτης, προφητεία, i. 116₂, 207₁, 505 f.; iii. 385 ff., 402 f.₂.
 πρῶτος, -ον, πρότερος, i. 372 f.₄, 532₁; ii. 22₄; iii. 61, 88₁₆, 139₂₀, 224 f.₅.
 πτωχός, i. 148₄.
- ραββι, ραββουνι, i. 20₃; ii. 155₈.
 ρακα, i. 17₃.
 ραχα, ii. 577.
- σάββατον, -τα, i. 19₃, 31₁₆.
 = week, i. 212₅; iii. 136₁₂.
 μία and πρώτη σ., ii. 475 f.
 σ. δευτερόπρωτον, iii. 168.
- σάινειν, i. 222₂.
 σαμβαθεῖον, iii. 425₇.
 σατανas, i. 18₃, 520.
 Σαῦλος, iii. 140₂₅.
 σεβόμενος, i. 61₈, 213₆.
 σημαίνειν, iii. 43₃, 402₁.
 σημεῖον, iii. 233, 304 ff., 325 f.₁. σίκερα, iii. 136₁₂.
 Σικμα, Συχεμ, i. 30₁₆; iii. 351₁₁.
 Σιδας (Σιδωνανός), i. 31 f.₁₆, 207₁.
 Σιδωάμ, i. 29₁₅.

Σίμων, Συμεών, i. 29 f.₁₆; ii. 219₉.
 σινδών, ii. 491.
 σκηνοῦν, iii. 223₃.
 σπείρα Ἰταλική, Σεβαστή, i. 60₆.
 σπεκουλάτωρ, ii. 503₄.
 σπιλάς (σπίλος), ii. 258₅.
 στοιχεία, τὰ, i. 473 f.₅.
 στρατοπεδάρχης, i. 552.
 συγγενής, i. 417 f.₂₂; iii. 231.
 συκάμινος, συκομορέα, iii. 162₈.
 συλλαμβάνεσθαι τινα, i. 537₆.
 συμβιβάζειν, i. 472₂.
 Συμεών, ii. 219₉.
 Συμεών Πέτρος, ii. 271.
 συμπληροῦσθαι, iii. 141 f.₂₈.
 συμπερεσβύτερος, ii. 146 f.
 συναγωγή, i. 94 f.₁; ii. 340₁₁.
 συναιχμάλωτος, i. 418₂₃, 440, 451₁. συνέδριον, i. 41, 64₁₁.
 Σύρος, i. 23₄.
 Συροφονίκισσα, i. 24₇.
 σύσσωμος, i. 520.
 συστρατιώτης, i. 440, 447₁.
 συστρέφειν, συστροφή, iii. 28₈.
 ταβίθα, i. 26₁₁; iii. 137₁₄.
 ταλιθα κουμ, i. 15₃.
 τάξις, ii. 400₉, 439, 606.
 ταπεινοφροσύνη, i. 468 f., 477 f.₇. ταχινός, ii. 212.
 τέκνα, ii. 594₁₀.
 τέρμα τῆς δύσεως, ii. 72.
 Τιβεριάς, iii. 324, 333₁₄.
 τότε, ii. 591 f.₇.
 τρῆμα, iii. 162₅.
 τράπαιον, ii. 82.

ὕγιαίνειν, ὑγίης, i. 78₂; ii. 129₁₆.
 υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ, ὁ, iii. 309 f.

φαγεῖν τὸ πάσχα, iii. 282 f., 296 ff.₁₇.
 Φαρισαῖος, i. 32₁₇, 68₁₅; ii. 258₆.
 φιλεῖν, iii. 227₁₀, 249₁, 289₈.
 φιλοπρωτεύειν, iii. 376, 382₆.
 φοβούμενος, i. 61₈, 213₆.
 φραγελλοῦν, ii. 503₄.
 φρονεῖν τὸ αὐτό, i. 537₆.
 φωτίζεσθαι, ii. 337₅.

χααναῖαι = priests, i. 26₁₂.
 χαίρειν, i. 85, 119₇; iii. 134₈.
 Χανααῖα, ii. 578.
 χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη, i. 119₇.
 χάρισμα, i. 297₅, 375₈.
 χαρίσματα, i. 279 ff.
 Χερουβειν, ii. 361₁₂.
 Χρηστός, i. 433₆.
 Χριστιανός, χρηστιανός, i. 21₃, 433₆; ii. 185, 191 f.₁₀₉, 617.
 Χριστός, i. 20 f.₃, 433₆; iii. 434₃.
 χρώς, iii. 161.
 χωρεῖν, iii. 250₂.

ψευδοδιδάσκαλος, ii. 232 f.₂.
 ψευδοπροφήτης, ii. 232₂; iii. 403₂.
 ψευδόχριστος, i. 228, 238₈, 239₉.
 ψύχαι, ii. 289₉.
 ψυχικός, i. 498; ii. 258₆, 279.

ὥς, i. 214₇; ὥς καί, ii. 234.
 ὠσαννα, i. 9, 12, 21₃, 304.

Date Due

[illegible]

PRINTED	IN U. S. A.
---------	-------------

BS2364 .Z194 1917 v.1
Introduction to the New Testament

Princeton Theological Seminary-Speer Library

1 1012 00063 9718